For the first time in its history our government faces a draft rebellion not only by the young but by the old, not only by men but by women, not only by individuals alone but by groups coming together in surprising and ever-growing numbers. And the leaders are not the poor and impotent but men of some prestige and power. Those indicted with Dr. Spock were the Rev. William Sloane Coffin, civil rights leader and chaplain of Yale University; Mitchell Goodman, author; Marcus Raskin, former White House aide under President Kennedy and now co-director of the Institute of Policy Studies in Washington, and Michael B. Ferber, Harvard University graduate student.

It is no secret that these five are only a handful of the participants in the anti-draft movement whom the Justice Department could—and perhaps will—prosecute. Within five weeks after the indictments, the anti-draft organization, Resist, with headquarters in Cambridge, Mass., reported that more than 10,000 signatures had been obtained, from among others, doctors, lawyers, writers, housewives and students, asserting in effect that they too would have to be prosecuted if the defendants were found guilty.

The Civil Liberties Legal Defense Fund, Inc., headed by Robert A. Rosenthal, professor of education at Harvard, has been established to aid draft resisters and their supporters. In New York's Town Hall on January 14, about 900 persons, two-thirds of those present, turned their advocacy of draft resistance into overt action by donating money to support draft resisters. (The Justice Department insists it will not prosecute for advocacy of draft resistance, only for overt acts.) Resist is organizing a nation-wide academic day of protest to coincide with the trial of the defendants; 1,000 campuses are expected to participate with teach-ins, mock trials and "field trips" to induction centers, draft boards, munitions plants.

Such a large-scale, anti-draft movement, led by persons of influence, is unheard of in our history. Men of prominence in other countries, for example, Great Britain and France, have preached and practiced stalwart resistance to coercive military service. Such figures as Bertrand Russell, Ramsay MacDonald and several members of Parliament were active resisters of the draft. Philosopher Jean-Paul Sartre and a coterie of French intellectuals, called the "Committee of 121," organized an underground escape route for deserters and those about to be conscripted during the Algerian War. About 3,000 young men evaded the military.

Although there have been isolated exceptions—Thoreau's civil disobedience being the most famous example—we have witnessed until now, no such active opposition to the draft by Americans, especially Americans of unquestioned stature in the community. Only once have we had an anti-draft uprising of any size and import, a pitifully sordid affair immediately after our first national draft act was passed in 1863 during the Civil War. The working class, mainly Irish immigrants, who refused to be cannon fodder for the "rich man's war to free the niggers," as they called it, formed a mob in New York City, smashed the draft lottery wheels, stormed Horace Greeley's Tribune, burned the armory, and for five days terrorized the city, looting and killing. Finally, cannons and regiments of soldiers had to be brought into the streets to halt the mob. An estimated 1,000 persons were injured or killed in the rioting.

Aside from that one bloody outburst, Americans have, for a people that prides itself on individual freedom and resistance to coercion, submitted with surprising docility to the draft. We had no significant organized resistance to the draft during World War I, World War II or Korea. Most certainly during wartime and even during peacetime since 1948, the draft has always had a firm grip on the hearts of Americans—most particularly on the hearts of the generations too old to be drafted.

In the beginning it appeared that the current resistance to the draft might be little more effective than it had been in previous wars. To superpatriots like L. Mendel Rivers, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, the protests on college campuses that erupted soon after escalation of the war were just another display by a few cowardly boys—"scum and vermin," he called them. And the government knew how to handle that kind of resistance; force them into the service or lock them up one by one, as in previous wars.

It soon became evident, however, that the protests contained the seeds of a different kind of resistance. Students protected from the draft by educational deferments were nevertheless demonstrating for abolition of the 2-S classification, branding it and the war immoral. Several boys burned their draft cards, signifying that the order of the day was perhaps no longer resistance by acceptance of conscientious objector status but outright defiance of Selective Service: noncooperation.

Many conscientious objectors, in a trend that has accelerated greatly recently, gave up their status that would have kept them safe forever from the draft and the war, and on moral principle returned their draft cards or destroyed them, making them liable for up to five years in prison and a $10,000 fine. Clearly, these were not young men trying to save their own skins. They were acting out of deep conviction, concern and personal responsibility, putting themselves unnecessarily in jeopardy through an act of civil disobedience to save others and to try to end a war they considered immoral and illegal.

From the first, the government has taken a hard line against the dissenters. Although the draft protesters were vocal and received wide press coverage, their organization and numbers were not really strong. A survey in 1965 showed that less than 1 per cent of college students were engaged in anti-war activities. Nevertheless, Washington's militants were thrown into what Sen. Wayne Morse called "near hysteria" by the noisy opposition to the war. In a fit of fury, Congress in August, 1965, at the instigation of Congressman Rivers, passed an anti-draft-card destruction law with penalties of up to five years in prison and a $10,000 fine. Since burning a draft card does not impede Selective Service's operation in any way, the intent of the law was patently to squelch dissent.

Gen. Lewis B. Hershey soon afterwards began a program of intimidation by threatening to draft college students who "misbehaved." General Hershey and the Justice Department also began a systematic clampdown on conscientious objectors—the usual primary source of wartime dissent. One notable sacrifice to political expediency was Cassius Clay whom General Hershey was determined one way or another to make an "example for his race." Although Clay's hearing officer, after studying an FBI investigation of Clay and questioning him personally, determined that Clay's beliefs warranted c.o. status, the Justice Department in an unusual move overturned the decision.

Persecution of men who became conscientious objectors

after they were in the military services was also stepped up. Of the 860 men who applied for discharge from the service as conscientious objectors between 1962 and 1965, only 226 or 26 per cent were denied 1-O or 1-A-O status. In 1966, 448 or 52 per cent of those 850 who applied were refused. By 1967, the denials had risen to 70 per cent—473 out of 677.

Nothing illustrated Congress' anger and determination to crush draft resistance as clearly as their "reform" of the draft act when it came up for renewal in June, 1967. In defiance of all critics, including a Presidential commission which called for constructive changes, Congress, led by Rivers and Sen. Richard Russell, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, vented its spleen on antagonists by adopting amendments—mainly directed against conscientious objectors and draft resisters—that set the draft law back twenty years.

Such heavy-handed governmental suppression of dissent, coupled with growing alarm over an expanding war, only intensified the rebellion among the resisters. But despite growing hostility between the government and many of its youth, no one a year ago could have predicted the future of the resistance movement—or whether it had any. It was still loosely organized, lacked power and prestige, and revolved around a cadre of young martyrs, such as David Miller, the first to be arrested for burning his draft card. It was still, to quote Paul Lauter, director of Resist, "a kook movement."

And it might have stayed that way except for the entry of Dr. Spock and friends. When this group began identifying itself with draft card turn-ins in 1967 and actively supporting draft resisters, the character, size and future of the anti-draft movement started to change. Dr. Spock and his fellows, by virtue of their age and status, lent the anti-draft movement a meaning, impetus and respectability that it otherwise probably could not have attained.

In all the controversy and interpretation surrounding Dr. Spock's action it has not been pointed out that by abetting young men in evading the draft he committed an unheard-of breach of the gentlemen's code concerning war. It is an inviolate, unspoken rule in every country that, as Arlo Tatum, executive secretary of the Central Committee for Conscientious Objectors, put it: "Wars are fought with the determination of one generation and the blood of another." The old men conduct the war from the safety of the home front, while the impotent young (many not even able to vote) must kill and be killed at the bidding of their elders. In order for this system to work, society demands the complicity of the older generation—which until now has been virtually absolute.

We have only to look at the Selective Service System to see how firmly our youth are gripped by the hand of old age. Hershey, who has headed Selective Service for a quarter of a century, is 74 years old. Until this year men in their 80s were manning the local draft boards. Congress has now set a maximum age of 75, but in February Hershey appointed a man 76 years old as Selective Service state director of Colorado (a position not regulated by the maximum age law). The two most powerful pro-draft forces in Congress are Rivers, 74, and Russell, 70, who believe every young man should be drafted for his own good.

This insidious control of the young by military-minded older generations permeates the entire fiber of American society. As a result of World War I, World War II and Korea, we now have in this country a sizable number of veterans who say: "We served. Now why not you, too?" These middle-aged and elderly men, Kenneth Boulding, professor of economics at the University of Michigan, has pointed out, present the most formidable, psychological force for keeping the draft and wars alive.

Against the united front of an older generation, draft resistance has traditionally been a lone battle, waged by the young for the young. Refusing to go was a solitary action, meaning less in the chambers of power. As long as resisters were isolated from one another and from older generations, the threat from dissent was minimal.

From this viewpoint, the real crime of Dr. Spock and his followers is that they are challenging the morality of the silent conspiracy of older generations against the nation's youth. It is for no ordinary protest that Dr. Spock is being tried; he is being tried as a traitor to his generation. For the first time in our history the older men, themselves safe from the draft, have joined forces with the young.

That the government recognizes the significance of this unprecedented state of affairs is evident. The Justice Department reacted almost instantaneously, beginning as early as last summer to collect evidence for prosecution. They shelved hundreds of pending prosecutions of draft-card destroyers and draft noncooperators to strike directly at the heart of the more formidable enemy by filing charges against the older accomplices. Att. Gen. Ramsey Clark admits that the purpose of the prosecution is to crush the spreading support of draft violators by making an example of the five men.

As the government has rightly appraised it, one Dr. Spock is more dangerous to the war effort than 1,000 young draft-card burners. The manpower pool of draft-eligible men is so large—12 million from ages 18 to 26—that conceivably the government could, if time, facilities and public opinion permitted, lock up a few million draft resisters, and still have an oversupply of the 3.5 million men reportedly needed to sustain the war in Vietnam. But the government cannot tolerate the kind of rebellion Dr. Spock represents: a revolt in the ranks of the older generation, especially those with some status and influence. It cannot fill its prisons with doctors, and clergy and politicians and writers, without losing credibility as a free nation. Although it is highly unlikely that youth alone could ever form a mass movement strong enough to stop the war, it is not inconceivable that a coalition of youth and their older compatriots could be successful.

That the Spock and associates indictments are cementing an alliance of young and old war resisters is already strikingly evident. Prior to the arrests there was a general feeling, as one draft resistance leader phrased it, that "the resistance had run its course with the turning in of draft cards. It seemed at a dead end in its effectiveness." Now, says Paul Lauter of Resist, a one-time English professor and long-time opponent of the draft: "The growth of draft resistance is incredible. Two years ago there were probably only twelve boys who had turned in their draft cards; now there are at least 2,000, and all of them are out proselytizing. A recent poll of Harvard seniors showed that one-fourth of them would flee the country or go to prison rather than be inducted. Adults, some who have never participated before in anti-war activities, are rising to the defense of Spock and the others. For example, before the indictments Resist had contacts on seventy campuses; now we have contacts on 200 campuses. The persecution by the government is pushing people to more advanced positions than they otherwise would take." In other words, as Arlo Tatum puts it: "Without the help of the Justice Department we couldn't establish a movement."

As of now, in resister circles the outcome of the trial is seen as less important than the fact of its occurrence. Some compare it with the Dred Scott case in which, although Scott was forced back into slavery, the decision focused so much attention on the evil that the case became a turning point in the victory for abolition. Similarly, some believe the government cannot win in the Spock case,

'warning and notice'

San Francisco, Calif.

DEAR SIRs: The public expression of dissent in Oakland, Calif., seems to have become a felony punishable by a three-year prison term. Last October, thousands of concerned people expressed their opposition to the Vietnamese War at the Oakland Army Induction Center. Among them were university professors, ministers, scientists, writers, artists and students.

Now seven of the demonstrators, all in their early 20s, have been singled out for prosecution on conspiracy charges. The "conspiracy"—a felony—consists of the defendants allegedly banding together to commit misdemeanors. Justice Robert Jackson once called use of the conspiracy charge "the prosecutor's darling."

Dist. Atty. J. Frank Coakley explained to the press: "Technically a hundred or even a thousand of the demonstrators could have been indicted for their actions. . . . We have to take the most militant leaders." He added: "The indictment procedure is a new one, a new policy we have adopted, and should serve as a warning and notice to people who would violate the law in so expressing themselves."

The prosecutor's "new policy" is designed to make an example of these seven—to silence dissent against the war. These are not nationally famous leaders like Dr. Spock; they are young people plucked out of the group to be isolated and punished.

We are horrified at this frank frontal assault on constitutional liberties. The law is being used to suppress the right of dissent.

The undersigned protest the indictments and urge support for the defendants. The cost of defending these cases may run as high as $50,000. Contributions can be sent to: Stop the Draft Week Defense Fund, 6468 Benvenue Ave., Oakland, Calif. 94618.

Kay Boyle

Jessica Mitford

Herbert Gold

Mark Schorer

whatever the outcome. If the defendants are found innocent—all five are pleading not guilty—the verdict will give wide license to thousands of others to support draft resistance as a means of wrecking the Selective Service System and forcing a conclusion to the Vietnamese War. If they are convicted, they will exist in the minds of free men everywhere as the Martyred Five who followed the dictates of the Nuremberg Tribunal by placing their duty to oppose a criminal war above an allegiance to their country's leaders.

One does not see how the Justice Department could possibly prosecute the thousands of other men and women beyond draft age who, if Spock and his co-defendants are found guilty, must also be found guilty. And if the arrest of five men brought forth the support of thousands, how much support would the arrest of thousands produce?

Thus the government faces a problem that cannot be solved by the old method of locking up "draft dodgers" one by one. Because of the historic actions of Dr. Spock and others like him, the nation can no longer regard draft and war resistance as a product of the lunatic fringe. Resistance is no longer even spelled with a small "r," nor does it need the preceding words of "war" and "draft" to define its meaning. By both adults and youth who subscribe to its principles it is called simply The Resistance, a fact which in itself should give Washington's war leaders some indication of its strength and substance.

FIFTY-YEAR FLIRTATION

Our Illusory Affair With Japan

WALTER LaFEVER

Mr. LaFeber, professor of history at Cornell University, is the author of The New Empire (Cornell University Press) and America, Russia and the Cold War (John Wiley).

Once again anti-American riots have bloodied Japanese streets. And for the third time in seventy years important American spokesmen look hopefully to the Japanese as partners in stabilizing and developing Asia. The Fourteen Scholars writing from Freedom House in December observed: "No concern of the United States in the Pacific is more vital than that Japan's emerging initiative in foreign policy should be exercised in such a way as to utilize her enormous potentials in support of world peace and prosperity." Praising Japan's economic growth as "extraordinary" (one of the few understatements in the entire document), the scholars nevertheless deeply regretted that "in political affairs abroad, she has remained largely inactive if not frankly isolationist." But this situation was improving: "Today, however, reviving self-confidence is moving Japan increasingly to a reassertion of an independent stance in world politics."

To anyone with a knowledge of 20th-century American history, these words have a familiar and ominous ring. They have been sounded at least twice before, in the 1895-1910 period and again during the 1920s and early 1930s. In each case American diplomats failed to find a proper spirit of partnership in their Japanese counterparts, and the second time the denouement was marked by a World War. Particularly since the Fourteen Scholars have urged a discussion of America's position in the Far East, the time is not too early to analyze briefly Japan's recent resurgence, the state of Japanese-American relations, and the unavoidable questions which arise about that relationship.

There are two bases for present American interest in Japanese affairs. First, the appalling costs of Vietnam have forced even the most outspoken proponents of American power overseas to wish that they had some respectable Asians to help pacify Asia. Second, the fantastic upsurge of the Japanese economy since 1961, and the resulting extension of Tokyo's influence into Korea, Thailand, Burma, the Philippines, Malaysia, China and Asiatic Russia, have rebuilt Japan into a political power throughout the Far East. This record should make historians, government officials and the Fourteen Scholars more cautious in their use of the term "isolationist," for in Japan as in the United States, expansion in the domestic economy has proved over a period of time to be inseparable from expansion of economic and political power abroad. To the Fourteen Scholars and many others, "isolationism" means: "You do not agree with my hopes for American (or Japanese) power." Only in that sense, indeed, are the Japanese "isolationist."

Electronic Bootstrap

The Japanese are developing and using their power in their own way. Their economic growth has made a worldwide impact. Japan's shipbuilding has led the world for a decade; in late 1967 it had twice the orders of its three closest rivals. Its automobile factories, producing more than 2 million units a year, challenge Germany for second place in the world market. Only the United States outranks Japan in electronics and computers. Its involvement in these two fields will increase, for Japan is superbly equipped in these key industries: it trains a large number of highly skilled technicians and engineers, and the industries have relatively little need for ground space and raw materials, items the Japanese lack in comparison with the United States.

Japan's ability to produce and market transistors is legendary, in part, no doubt because President de Gaulle once referred to a Japanese Premier as "that transistor salesman." The country has a chemical complex second only to that of the United States in the production of synthetic rubber, plastics and resin, rayon and acetate, non-cellulosic fiber and caustic soda.

Twenty years ago the Japanese were a defeated people fingering the rubble of burned-out and atomically bombed cities which were 80 per cent destroyed. An explanation for their success since then might begin with an observation by the editor of Forbes: the Japanese "work like hell." When they began to modernize in the late 19th century, the Japanese did not destroy their feudal institutions but tended to shift them into the industrial sector. Plants are consequently organized around a family concept of mutual obligation, with wages providing only a relatively small portion of worker incentive. This arrangement also means that unions are, in the Western sense, company unions. These characteristics not only explain Japanese craftsmanship and productivity, but create obstacles which prevent American capital from penetrating that country as it has Europe.

Japan has perhaps the most thoroughly rationalized and integrated business-government relationships in the non-Communist world. Its government bureaucracy is highly trained and efficient, and members move between business and government with a rapidity exceeding even that in the United States. This movement is particularly noticeable among some bureaucrats who upon reaching their 50s often move into key executive jobs in industry and banking. The economy's efficiency is further increased by close links between banks and industries. Japanese tend to invest their money in savings rather than in stocks which, in marked contrast to Western economies, make up less than 30 per cent of total business capital. This allows the banks to channel funds quickly and in volume into priority sectors of the economy.

Glitter and Squalor

Efficiency also results from concentration, a characteristic which Gen. Douglas MacArthur and other occupation authorities tried to purge from Japan in the immediate postwar years. By the mid-1960s, pro-Japanese observers admitted that the consolidation movement appeared to be evolving toward the situation of pre-World War II. A 1965 recession hurried this process. In 1966 a record 11,058 companies became bankrupt, and the giants sought help through mergers. The second largest auto producer, Nissan, merged with the fourth largest, Prince Motors, to become number one; this triumph was short-lived because the former number one, Toyota, merged with number eight, Hino, to regain the top position. In steel the two largest producers began to cooperate in scheduling sales. Some aggregations, such as Mitsubishi and Mitsui, carry the names of the 1930s. The economic power of these combines is unquestionable; their political power in the area of foreign affairs is a lesser known quantity.

That latter power now rests on total overseas assets of approximately $8 billion. Only the United States, Great Britain and West Germany claim more. In 1966 Japan was one of the few nations to export more capital than it imported. The economy as a whole is dependent upon overseas trade, particularly imports of raw materials and fuels.

The economic picture glitters in Japan, but beneath the surface are uneven development, squalor and disturbing political instability. Japan's economy was shaken by a recession in 1965-66 which cut its growth to 2.7 per cent for that fiscal year. One major channel of escape from this downturn was the Vietnamese conflict. Japanese growth jumped back to a 7.5 per cent rate after being stoked by $1 billion of American spending for Vietnam. This war-generated income not only spurred a general recovery but raised foreign trade, particularly imports, with the United States to a record high. Wars in Asia have recently occurred at opportune moments for the Japanese. During the Korean conflict $2 billion of American spending brought Japan's economy into full postwar recovery. The Vietnamese conflict has now stopped another skid. What that economy will do, and specifically what will happen to Japanese-American trade—the key to general relations with Japan—if the Vietnamese struggle tails off are vital questions.

The Japanese social structure is showing the strains of this economic resurgence. The country has become pockmarked by a mass movement of population from countryside to urban areas. This influx of cheap labor fuels the industrial renaissance, but it also creates severe problems of pollution, crime, juvenile delinquency and general resettlement, which not even the Japanese with their tradition and efficiency have been able to solve.

Liberalism, Socialism, Mysticism

These failures have caused political ripples. The Liberal-Democratic coalition, ruler of Japan for twenty years, has within the past year been severely challenged from within and without. The Liberal-Democrats themselves form factions which have to be carefully balanced by Premier Eisaku Sato. Such juggling was difficult even in a period of economic expansion, few foreign policy problems, and relatively minor social maladjustments. In January, 1967, the time of reckoning seemed to be approaching. For the first time in two decades the Liberal-Democrats won less than 50 per cent of the popular vote in the general elections. They continued to control a majority in the Diet, but had to do considerably more bargaining with opposition parties.

That opposition was also undergoing change. The Socialists have moved closer to Peking as the Communists have split and then tended toward Moscow. The Socialists paid for this reorientation by losing large numbers of votes which were picked up by two minor parties, the Democratic Socialists and the Komeito (the political apparatus of the Soka Gakkai, a mystical religious sect based on Buddhism which has expanded tremendously in Japan during the last seven to ten years). They won thirty and twenty-five seats respectively in the lower house. Komeito has been an especially interesting phenomenon. Meaning literally the "Clean Government Party," its rise has been remarkable, but this can be explained in part by the movement from countryside to city and in part by its mysticism. Soka Gakkai's numbers are largely comprised of agrarians newly resettled in the cities, shopkeepers, workers and women who want a political voice in a traditionally male-dominated society. For these reasons it is conservative enough socially so that it has been compared with the Poujadists in France, but it also is vocally anti-American and urges diplomatic recognition of Communist China. Robert Scalapino, one of the Fourteen Scholars, has precisely summarized the significance of these political changes: "Clearly, Japan lacks a consensus on foreign policy, now or for the foreseeable future."

Teddy Roosevelt's Partner

The United States is now urgently asking this rapidly changing Japan for help in staving off Asian revolutions and stabilizing the Far East so that both Japanese and American interests can prosper. The central question is whether American and Japanese interests coincide to the extent that policy makers assume. History provides some instruction, for on two other occasions, Washington urged Japan to do much the same thing, and each time the affair ended disastrously because the key assumption was wrong.

In 1900, after annexing the Philippines and announcing its great-power status in Asia through the open-door notes, the United States looked to Japan as its partner. The Japanese had been the one people to accept the notes with some enthusiasm, agreeing with Secretary of State John Hay that China and Manchuria must be maintained as a "fair field" with no unequal "favours" to any power. Japan was also the single nation which possessed the location, determination and resources to block America's number-one enemy in the area, Russia.

Alfred Thayer Mahan, the famous naval strategist who deeply influenced Theodore Roosevelt's views of Asia, heavily counted upon the Japanese to help the United States. Mahan—a 1900 version of the Fourteen Scholars as a one-man band—argued that the Japanese were "Teutonic by adoption" and comprised "the grain of mustard seed" which would regenerate all of Asia. Mahan and Roosevelt consequently did nothing to stop Japan from going to war with and defeating Russia in 1904-05. At the point when Japanese resources seemed to be reaching their limit, Roosevelt interceded to mediate the peace.

By 1907 Russia was indeed no longer a major threat in Asia. The United States had helped make Japanese power dominant. The Japanese proceeded to exercise that power. They conquered and closed off Korea. Roosevelt did not object. The Japanese next moved into southern Manchuria, shutting out the large amounts of American petroleum and textiles which had found rich markets there. Roosevelt thought this was going too far, and when on top of it the Japanese began to act up about American immigration legislation which discriminated against the "yellow peril," he sent the Great White Fleet on a show of force to the western Pacific. The Japanese received the fleet cordially, but their smiles hid a renewed determination not to be overawed or placed at the mercy of that fleet.

Roosevelt and his successor, William Howard Taft, both attempted to use American economic power to re-open Manchuria. T.R. soon realized the futility of the venture and retreated, but Taft persisted. The result was a surprising but easily formed partnership in 1910 between the two former enemies, Japan and Russia. Japan would control south Manchuria, Russia the north, and the United States would be largely excluded from both. Not for the last time Japan reached agreement with its old enemy in an attempt to exclude American power from Asia. By 1913 round one had ended with the collapse of United States policy.

Alfred Thayer Mahan

Line Down the Pacific

Mahan now displayed the insight and courage to change his mind. In publications during 1910 and 1911, he no longer termed Japan "Teutonic by adoption" but a "problem state." He argued that a line should be drawn down the Pacific, with Japan controlling the western portion and the United States retreating to the area east of Hawaii-Samoa-Australia. Although continuing to argue that American might made right in the Western Hemisphere and Europe, Mahan had learned that Asian power politics were quite another matter.

Woodrow Wilson and the Republican administrations of the 1920s did not listen to Mahan's advice. As other powers focused their attention on World War I, Japan had tightened its control by forcing concessions within China and conquering the former German colonies on the periphery of Asia. After Wilson had failed to loosen the Japanese grip at the Versailles Peace Conference in 1919, the new Republican foreign policy, formulated by Charles Evans Hughes and Herbert Hoover, tried another approach. At the Washington Conference of 1921, Japan, over the strong protests of our Navy Department, was given naval superiority in the western Pacific. This arrangement was written into the Five-Power Pact. In return, Japan signed a Nine-Power Treaty in which it guaranteed that the door to Chinese markets would remain open equally to all.

Or, to phrase the American policy in contemporary terms, the Japanese, in return for a supposed minimum build-up in armaments, promised to use their economic and military power to moderate the revolution raging in China, contain the Bolsheviks in Russia (whom the United States refused to recognize), and keep the entire area open for Western democracy and Western goods. The second round had now begun, and as it progressed it began to resemble the first. After trying to contain and exploit the Soviets by occupying parts of Siberia in 1919-20, Tokyo by 1925 had reached an accord with Moscow in which diplomatic relations were restored, trade resumed, and a division of labor implicitly worked out between the two powers. These agreements lasted for two decades, enduring through the hectic 1930s because the United States between 1932-34 rejected Stalin's requests for help against Japanese aggression in Manchuria. For the second time in a quarter century, Japanese and Russian interests proved not irreconcilable. They conveniently renewed their pledge of benevolent neutrality in April, 1941, on the eve of Hitler's attack on Russia and the Japanese strike against Pearl Harbor.

Journey to Pearl Harbor

With Soviet relations in order, the Japanese could take advantage of the turmoil within revolution-torn China. The major step occurred with the invasion of Manchuria in 1931. This move was caused by political pressures and instability in Tokyo and the need for markets and raw materials by Japanese industry, particularly that part producing increased amounts of military goods.

The United States was trapped. It had supported Japan since 1921 in the belief that the Japanese would contain and ultimately stabilize the revolution in the Far East, while, at the same time, acting properly toward American economic and political interests. When the Japanese struck Manchuria, President Hoover and Secretary of State Henry Stimson could not call on either the Russian or Chinese revolutionaries for help; the United States refused to admit officially that the former existed and could not bring itself to trust the latter. Hoover refused to use force against the Japanese. That could escalate into full-scale war, would be an admission of the failure of American policy and, besides, was no way to treat your major partner in the area. The Japanese moved on, renouncing the Five-Power Treaty in 1934, attacking China proper in 1937, and announcing an "East Asian Co-Prosperity Sphere" in which Japanese economic power would stretch into and ultimately dominate Southeast Asia.

By 1939 American officials had begun drawing the line. They admitted that their Japanese policy in round two had been a failure. Vital exports to Japan were stopped and demands made that Tokyo withdraw its troops from China and Southeast Asia. Instead, the Japanese attacked Hawaii.

Third Time Around

After four years of bloodshed, round three opened with the United States determined to restructure Japanese society from the Emperor down. Under Gen. Douglas MacArthur's consulship, Hirohito was divested of his divinity, Shintoism banned, American-style farms mistakenly given to agrarians, the zaibatsu supposedly broken up, war criminals and Communists purged, and the famous Article IX, stating that Japan renounced war and would never again maintain armed forces for offensive purposes, inserted in the new Constitution.

These policies lasted for two years. In February, 1948, the Social Democratic government of Tetsu Katayama fell from power, and with it fell the reform program. That same year George Kennan returned from an official visit to Japan to recommend that the reforms and purges be slowed down so that the Japanese could control their own government. He suggested that American forces in Japan be reduced to "tactical" elements, with bases left for future negotiations. By early 1949 many American controls had been loosened.

Then came the fall of China to Mao and the explosion of the Russian atomic bomb in the autumn of 1949. In September, 1949, Secretary of State Dean Acheson and British Foreign Secretary Ernest Bevin agreed that Japanese-American relations must be regularized through a formal peace treaty. American bases in Japan would be retained and guaranteed through a separate security pact. The Russians bitterly complained that although they had been among the victors in the Pacific war, they were not included in the treaty negotiations.

Kennan evidently objected strongly to the militarization of Japan, but given his own premise that Japan was potentially the most potent power base in Asia and therefore necessary for American security, he had little room to maneuver. The treaty negotiations were placed in the hands of John Foster Dulles, and to make the new policy doubly clear, Washington signed assistance agreements with the French forces fighting in Indo-China in May, 1950. As the famed NSC-68 memorandum explained that spring, the United States would now have to lead a global war against communism. Containment was extended in detail to the Far East.

Cesare, Outlook

The Open Door

These American policies, particularly with regard to Japan, were doubtless a major reason why Stalin encouraged North Korea to attack across the 38th Parallel in June, 1950. The Soviets tried to strike at what they feared would be a NATO of the Pacific with a remilitarized Japan serving as the linchpin of the alliance. That attack, however, simply confirmed Washington's estimate of the Far Eastern situation. Japan once again would have to serve as the Asian bulwark against the Russian advance into Korea and China, just as the Japanese were to have been the bulwark in 1900 and 1921. This third time, we hoped to escape the distasteful side effects.

Fortress against the Dominoes

The peace treaty was rushed to completion in 1951 and the Japanese were free to repeal MacArthur's reforms if they wished. The islands prospered as the advance base for the American effort in Korea. Allies in Australia, New Zealand and the Philippines, however, had longer memories. They demanded American guarantees against future Japanese aggression. The State Department responded with the ANZUS and U.S.-Philippine security treaties.

Japan was now the American fortress in the western Pacific. A former Japanese possession, Okinawa, had become the key logistics base in the deployment of United States power around the southern rim of Asia. And as Japan became ever more important as a critical segment of the containment policy, the French effort in Vietnam began to weaken.

President Eisenhower described the relationship between the struggle in Indo-China and Japan in his famous news conference of April 7, 1954, when he first announced the theory of the "falling dominoes." In the response which contained the domino allusion (or illusion, as some would have it), Eisenhower outlined the economic value of Southeast Asia, its strategic importance, and then neatly summarized and concluded his remarks: "It [any "Communist" success in Indo-China] takes away, in its economic aspects, that region that Japan must have as a trading area or Japan, in turn, will have only one place in the world to go—that is, toward the Communist areas in order to live. So, the possible consequences of the loss are just incalculable to the free world."

This thesis became a controlling assumption: the loss of Vietnam would mean the economic undermining and probable loss of Japan to Communist markets and ultimately to Communist influence if not control. At the NATO Foreign Ministers' meeting in Paris on May 10, 1955, Secretary of State John Foster Dulles warned that "the stakes are too high" to give up the fight against Communist China, for "Japan represents an industrial capacity, which if combined with the manpower and raw material resources of the Continent would be formidable."

A month earlier, Dulles had announced a major change in American policies toward South Vietnam. Our aid would henceforth move directly from Washington to the Vietnamese, instead of through French colonial officers. This effectively terminated French influence in the area, but Dulles also explained its significance for Japan: the new policy undercut French monopolies and created "a competitive situation" in which "there is a good chance of Japanese textile goods, for instance, moving into Indo-China. The French are somewhat concerned about that"

Scramble for Markets

If, however, the United States hoped to keep the Japanese away from traditional markets in China and safe for the Western world, Washington, as in 1921, would have to provide a quid pro quo. Now, however, unlike 1921, Japanese forces were to be increased, and under American pressure Article IX was to become a dead letter. In 1954 Japan promised to increase its force of 110,000 men. So-called "depurges" returned many pre-1945 officials to public life. By the end of the 1950s Japanese war industries produced arms for Southeast Asian markets and, at one point, 200 Lockheed F-104 jets. Highly sophisticated anti-missile defenses appeared in the home islands, and Japan possessed a "defensive" missile capacity. It now seems safe to say that during this period the majority of Japanese did not want to rearm. The Tokyo Foreign Office shrewdly used these feelings to persuade the United States that Japan could rearm, but would have to do so in its own way and without undue American interference.

Despite all that Dulles was doing for them in Southeast Asia, the Japanese nevertheless wanted to resume trade with China, and trade did begin, despite the absence of any formal diplomatic relationship. In 1958, however, this link broke and Japan began avidly searching for Western markets. A large influx of Japanese textiles and steel, among other items, met with a request from Washington that Japan place so-called "voluntary" restrictions upon these imports. Western European nations followed the American lead. The Japanese rightly denounced these moves as a violation of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, a pact which in happier days was an American-developed lever to increase free trade in the non-Communist world. Japan retaliated more directly by restricting imports of American goods. For this it was roundly denounced by the United States. In the midst of this economic warfare occurred the renegotiation in 1960 of the security treaty, the terrible riots preventing Eisenhower's visit, and the arrival of Hayato Ikeda as Prime Minister.

Manning, The Cincinnati Inquirer

"Hey! Those Seats Are Taken!"

THE NATION/March 11, 1968

Return of 'Co-Prosperity'

Ikeda's economic "miracle" has been accompanied by increased Japanese activity throughout Asia. In early 1967 Japan had under way in Southeast Asia 400 major construction projects totaling more than $100 million. Five Japanese automobile companies control more than half the Thai market, and Tokyo-based textile and steel companies have begun extensive operations in that country. In Korea, a Japanese possession from 1905 until 1945, the former rulers have installed large machine tool companies and banks, and are increasing trade through the 1965 normalization agreement. One economic weapon has been the Asian Development Bank, strongly supported by President Johnson to develop the countries surrounding China. The Japanese matched the American contribution of $200 million to the bank, each nation's contribution being carefully tied so that the donor's money had to be spent on goods in the donor's country. Tokyo is stepping up its foreign aid program, again tying it to Japanese trade. Outside Asia, Japanese investors are moving large amounts of capital into Brazil, Saudi Arabia, and particularly Alaska and Canada, where Japan hopes to find badly needed oil.

Premier Sato, who displaced Ikeda in 1964, has said that his country's economy "has now evolved to the point where we can—and must—take a more active role in assisting in the development of Asia." Others use different terms. U. S. News & World Report outlined Japan's economic upsurge under the title: "New Idea for 'Co-Prosperity Sphere.'" Repeated references to the infamous Co-Prosperity Sphere of the 1930s have led Foreign Minister Takeo Miki and other officials to insist upon the term "Asia-Pacific Concept" to describe present Japanese plans.

Japanese relations with China have meanwhile moved away from the days when Dulles persuaded Japan not to sell steel pipe, machine tools and chemical fertilizers to Mao's regime. Shortly after Ikeda assumed power, negotiations began to regularize trade with the mainland. In 1962 the "L-T" agreement (named after the initials of the two key negotiators) initiated five years of government-sponsored trade which reached a peak of $621 million in 1966. This sagged to $560 million in 1967 when the agreement expired, but some of the loss has been made up through the operations of so-called "friendly companies" (Japanese companies acceptable to Peking) which accounted for 70 per cent of Sino-Japanese trade in 1967. In 1966 the Chinese ranked fourth among Tokyo's trading partners. This was abetted by a constant increase of tourism; some 4,000 Japanese visited China in 1966. The Red Guards and Mao's dislike of heavy Japanese trade with Formosa and Vietnam have strained relations. Indeed, the Soviets have replaced China as Japan's main source of trade within the Communist bloc. China recently replaced the Soviets at the bottom of a popularity poll conducted in Japan.

Groene Amsterdammer (Holland)

Russia and Japan Arrange a Treaty

Containment or Trade

The Japanese nevertheless continue to regard China as a great potential market, and Tokyo is less interested in "containing" China than Washington could wish. Former State Department official George R. Packard III, recently quoted a member of Japan's Defense Agency as complaining: "It seems that the Pentagon wants us to play the infield while you play the outfield against the Chinese." The Japanese prefer to penetrate the Chinese market, not contain it.

This attitude carries political overtones. In a Cabinet reshuffle in November, Sato moved into key positions men who were leading exponents of peaceful coexistence and trade with China. Sato's government did not rush to join the Asian and Pacific Council, becoming a member only after the Koreans and Thais promised that ASPAC would not concentrate upon the containment of China. After encouraging Japan to enter ASPAC, the State Department found Tokyo preventing the council from taking strong anti-Peking positions.

While attempting to restore historic ties with China, the Japanese also are improving relations with Russia. The two nations have not yet signed a formal peace treaty, but a consular agreement has taken effect and there are now direct commercial air flights between Moscow and Tokyo. In March, 1967, the two nations agreed to increase mutual trade by 16 per cent. Most important, the Soviets are asking the Japanese to work jointly in the development of immense natural resources, including oil, copper, timber and coal, in Sakhalin and Siberia. A sore point is the Russian refusal to return southern Sakhalin and the Kurile Islands, taken by Stalin in 1945. It is not a minor irritant, but as the Soviets point out, Japan can import their coal at nearly one-third the cost of American coal. Soviet oil resources also attract the Japanese, who must import 99 per cent of their petroleum, 65 per cent of it from the unstable Middle East. It also might well be that, made anxious by Vietnam, Japanese officials are beginning to view the Asian balance of power anew and, like their ancestors of the 1905-10 era, are turning toward cooperation with Russia.

Madame Butterfly

New York Times

Nuclear Allergy

Historical analogies must of course be used with great care, and particularly in this instance, for in the 1905-10 and 1921-40 periods Japan enjoyed a freer hand than now. No equivalent of the U. S. Seventh Fleet roamed the western Pacific. But this distinction must also be made with care. Do Japanese-American relations really rest upon overwhelming American military power instead of upon common economic and political interests? If so, the United States must step up its investment of military resources in the Pacific, not only to contain China and Russia but, in the long run, Japan as well. This is a peculiar type of "partnership," but it does have disturbing historical precedents.

A rearmed, nuclear-equipped Japan is no longer wholly imaginary. Article IX has become a convenient cover for the rebuilding of the image and power of the Japanese military. The Cabinet considers raising the Defense Agency to full ministerial rank; Sato urges the use of the terms "army," "navy" and "air force" instead of "self-defense forces"; and a forty-minute feature film has been made of military programs in West Germany, France, England, Switzerland and NATO headquarters to be shown in commercial movie theatres in Japan. The "self-defense" force itself has grown into a quarter-million-man army, and is still expanding.

Most significant, however, has been the development of Japan's nuclear power. It already employs advanced space and nuclear research programs for peaceful purposes, but these have been so developed that they can quickly be converted to military ends. The Chinese test explosions are having a marked effect on public opinion, and the Sato government is using brilliantly the strong Japanese desire to repossess Okinawa as a club to keep anti-nuclear politicians on the defensive. Sato has gained support rapidly in the past year with the argument that if Japan wants Okinawa, it must accept as permanent fixtures United States bases and the attendant nuclear weapons.

Interesting variations are being played on this theme. Takeo Fukuda, the most probable successor to Sato, announced in late December that Japan "must get away from the nuclear allergy." No street demonstrations erupted. Instead, Nobuhiko Uchiba, the parliamentary Vice Minister for Foreign Affairs expanded the argument to declare: "If we insist only that Japan will not possess nuclear weapons and will not permit their entry, it will be impossible to debate the future foreign policy and defense of our country." The Japanese ambassador in Washington announced that Japan should not surrender the possibility of controlling its own nuclear weapons, and Foreign Minister Takeo Miki refused to define or limit what the ambassador meant. Most ominously, Education Minister Hirokichi Nadao has proposed that primary and junior high school teachers be taught "defense consciousness," and that textbooks be rewritten so that Japanese children will appreciate future military programs.

Keeping Japan 'Sweet'

The growing centralization of Japanese education, expansion of the military, and Sato's apparent rush to make nuclear weapons politically acceptable form a combustible mixture. But the Japanese can ask whether these steps are not imperative if they are truly to end their supposed "isolationism." This question has become more urgent in the aftermath of Britain's announced military withdrawal from the Far East. Throughout much of this century England has cooperated closely with Japan along lines first indicated in the 1902 Anglo-Japanese agreement: Japan would respect Great Britain's primary Asiatic interest in India, and in turn London would not disturb Japanese expansion in Manchuria and parts of China. Together they would keep open the vital trade routes of the Indian Ocean and South China Sea. Britain kept its part of the bargain even when it had to assume an anti-American position as, for example, in the 1907-11 years. Now that the British have retreated, vacuums will appear, particularly in the vital Malacca Straits through which Japanese oil imports flow from the Middle East. Japan can no longer depend on British help, and given the historical record, may legitimately wonder whether it has enough common interests with the United States to work out a division of labor comparable to that developed with Great Britain. Japan will have to fend for itself militarily.

How the United States thinks it can keep Japan "sweet" (as Franklin D. Roosevelt liked to say), is not clear. The Japanese are not repeating the European mistake of allowing American corporations to enter and dominate their economy. Last May, George Ball called for an end to the traditional American open-door policy in Africa, to be replaced by a policy which would allow European politicians to worry about the political enigmas of Africa, and European corporations to develop African resources. He could do this with the confidence that American businessmen are so firmly entrenched in Europe that they will get their share even if Europe becomes politically dominant in Africa. No such easy view can be taken toward Japan's development of Asia.

Fighting Off the Dollar

Only $750 million of American money is invested in joint ventures within Japan. This is not expanding rapidly. Most Japanese agree that, generally speaking, American capital should be excluded. They can do this, moreover, because with the high rate of internal savings, Japanese banks can find the necessary funds and do not have to rely upon foreign money. In addition to the factor of control, the Japanese fear that an influx of American capital would bring with it a unionism which, because of its payment for production rather than for seniority, would undermine the traditional and highly fruitful Japanese labor-management relationship. When Tokyo did relent slightly and allow Nestlé's and General Foods to enter the retail market, the two firms immediately took 80 per cent of the instant coffee market from Japanese retailers. No similar mistakes have been made in more vital areas. In July, 1967, when it appeared that American investors were quietly buying up gilt-edged shares of Sony Corporation, the Japanese Finance Ministry stepped in to stop all further purchases by foreigners.

After intense American pressure, Tokyo finally announced last July that it would allow American money into fifty types of businesses. The announcement was deceiving, for the seventeen types in which Americans were permitted to have 100 per cent interests included steel, shipbuilding and motorcycles, fields in which Japanese ownership is so solid that American money cannot compete. At the September meeting of the Joint U. S.-Japan Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs, the American delegation politely called the Japanese announcement of July "somewhat disappointing" and expressed "the hope that liberalization be accelerated as soon as possible." The Americans also complained about "recent measures which appear adversely to affect the operations of existing United States businesses in Japan."

Waite, The Sun (London): Ben Roth
"There Seems To Be Quite a Demand for Them"

In his January 1 announcement that curbs would be placed upon the flow of U.S. dollars abroad, Mr. Johnson specifically exempted Great Britain, Canada, Australia and Japan, as well as the "developing countries." Why Japan was so favored is a fascinating question, the more so because the President immediately sent Under Secretary of State Eugene Rostow and Rostow's top deputy on a flying trip to Tokyo to explain the new measures personally to Premier Sato. Obviously, the United States has not given up on the Japanese market, but one may doubt whether Japan appreciates being lumped in with Great Britain, Canada and Australia, three nations which have become dependent upon American capital for development of many of their critical industries. These problems have not been offset by easing trade relations. Foreign Minister Miki complained to Secretary Rusk in September of "some visible tendencies in the United States and among American industry toward protectionist movements." Miki singled out textiles and steel as items requiring particular "cooperation" between Tokyo and Washington. It is extremely doubtful if that "cooperation" will be forthcoming. American steel imports in early 1968 are running 13 million tons above the comparable 1967 period, and Japan controls 45 per cent of that market.

'Confrontation' or 'Interplay'

In sum, the Japanese economy is booming, but the causes and results of this expansion should give pause, particularly when Japan's political instability seems to be increasing and its urban problems are becoming dangerous. The historical record gives no one the right to assume that Japanese-American interests in the Far East are compatible or even, in the long run, reconcilable. Tokyo's views of China and Russia, as well as its recent determination to overcome its "nuclear allergy," gravely compound the historical problems. Nor is there any reason to suppose that over a period of time American money and business management practices can bring those interests together. Sen. Mike Mansfield recently hoped that Japan would not rearm, but would instead concentrate on developing its economic power, so that "military confrontation" in Asia might be transformed into "economic interplay." This is only a wish, not a set of assumptions on which policy can be based. A more accurate view was provided by a delegation of Japanese businessmen and politicians who told visiting American dignitaries last September in Shimoda that the future political position of Japan "is obviously going to be different from what it is now," and then warned that over the next few years Japanese foreign affairs would become increasingly independent.

Bloodshed for Motorcycles

Given the current American determination to save Asia from Asians, there are apparently only two broad policy alternatives. First, the United States can continue to rely upon military intervention to "contain" China. That is the course the Johnson Administration thinks it is pursuing in Vietnam. It is ironic that despite the impetus Vietnam has given the Japanese economy, Tokyo differs with the United States on fundamental aspects of that conflict. Foreign Minister Miki has publicly called the struggle "a civil war." Japanese public opinion is such that when President Johnson hoped to visit Tokyo after the Manila Conference of October, 1966, the Japanese Government immediately rejected the President's plans. Sato refused to be connected publicly in such a manner to the American war effort.

The State Department says that Japanese officials express in private appreciation for the American military involvement since it has kept Asian Communists off balance and protects the key Japanese raw material and market areas in the southwestern Pacific. But if such views are stated, they inevitably raise a further question, which Prof. Thomas McCormick has phrased precisely: is the United States sacrificing more than 16,000 of its young men "in order to make Southeast Asia safe for Japanese economic interests"?

No State Department spokesman has tackled that question, although it has been circumvented numerous times since Eisenhower first outlined the Vietnam-Japan relationship in 1954. The former President recently suggested that it would perhaps be better not to discuss this particular aspect of the war at the present time. If indeed American blood is not being shed for Japanese motorcycle manufacturers, a second policy alternative appears: the United States has committed more than half a million men to Southeast Asia in order to advance its own strategic and economic interests. Given the rising political and economic stake in the area (including the recent establishment of American branch banks which want, as one of their officials phrased it, to be in on the "ground floor" when Vietnam is reconstructed), this seems the more enlightened alternative for Washington "realists." It and the increased exhortation that the Japanese end their supposed "isolation" mean that, given a "fair field" (that is, a field without Communist or left-wing nationalist agitation to interrupt the play), the United States and Japan could truly form the partnership and have the "economic interplay" for which the Fourteen Scholars and Senator Mansfield have such high hopes.

The prospect may look rosy, but we should be aware that we have already visited where the Fourteen Scholars and Senator Mansfield now want to take us. They are not pioneers. Some years ago another Democratic politician proclaimed that Americans and Japanese would march "shoulder to shoulder" to develop Asia. That was Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1923.

NO PORT FOR THE PHOENIX

GEORGE LAKEY

Mr. Lakey is professor of sociology, the Upland School of Social Change, Chester, Pa. He is co-author of A Manual for Direct Action (Quadrangle) and In Place of War (Grossman).

Anti-war groups protest in many places: the Pentagon, induction centers, napalm plants, city halls. I have lately been part of an effort to take the protest into the very zone of war itself, in the voyage of the Quaker ketch Phoenix to South Vietnam.

The Phoenix had been in the news in March, 1967, as a ship which carried medical supplies to the Democratic Republic of Vietnam in violation of a United States law that forbids "trading with the enemy." I expected that fact to complicate my discussion with the Ministry of Health in Saigon in October, 1967, but the officials seemed to take in stride the proposal of a Quaker Action Group to bring $6,000 worth of newly purchased medicines to South Vietnam, to be divided equally between the Red Cross and the militantly anti-war Buddhists. Even the information that we intended later to take a medical cargo to the Red Cross of the National Liberation Front did not seem to disturb them.

Consequently, when the eight-man crew sailed the Phoenix out of Hong Kong harbor on November 14, seven of us had South Vietnamese visas; the State Department had invalidated the passport of skipper Robert Eaton, 24, who had shipped as first mate on the voyage to Haiphong. The voyage to Danang passed without incident except for some seasickness, and we began to grapple (amusingly, in retrospect) with the problem of how to respond to red-carpet treatment in Danang.

We were told that the anchorage where we were to remain the night of the 19th was safe and that we could proceed to Danang docks in the morning. But how safe is an anchorage near a hillside which is raked by tracer bullets from the gunboat escorting you? For that matter, how coherent could our strategy discussions be when shells whistled over our mast and exploded on the beach several hundred yards away—not to mention the shells which do not quite make it to the beach?

However misleading our South Vietnamese naval escorts may have been about the peacefulness of the vicinity, they were dead wrong about our going to the docks next morning. A Vietnamese official came out from Danang on the morning of the 20th to inform us that we must leave within a day. He could offer no explanation. We gently explained that we had sailed a long way and had no intention of leaving voluntarily, especially without receiving even the courtesy of an explanation. After formally requesting an opportunity to meet with responsible officials, we set to work devising our response to a forcible towing. We had learned our first lesson of direct action in a war zone—there is no Civil Liberties Union to telephone.

While we were waiting for the next governmental move, the press hired a launch and twice attempted to get to us. Both times they were rebuffed; once, we heard, with machine-gun fire across the bow for emphasis. We learned our second lesson—in a war zone one cannot count on the protection afforded by publicity. We were alone, with gunboats guarding us, an NLF-contested hillside facing us, and even reputedly poisonous sea snakes in the water around us.

We wrote a letter to the captain of South Vietnamese naval vessel #602, the gunboat standing by. After explaining our mission of identification with the victims of war, we announced that, should towing be attempted, we would begin jumping overboard, and would try to reach shore and make our way to a responsible official to begin human dialogue. We affirmed our good will toward him and his crew and our intention to be nonviolent in our actions. After providing fuel, water and repairs for our electrical system, the government on the 21st again urged us to leave on our own. We again refused, and as dusk approached and gunboat #602 moved toward us we put on life jackets.

Dr. Harrison Butterworth, 48, a professor at Ohio University, was the first overboard. We saw gunboat #610 try to maneuver between him and the shore; then we lost sight of him as three Vietnamese sailors jumped in to get him.

I was next in the water. I shall never forget the bizarre scene—the warm water, the mast of the Phoenix seemingly intertwined with the larger gunboat against the darkening sky, the spotlight from #610 now blinding me and now missing me as I swam toward shore, the shouts of the Vietnamese officers as #610 maneuvered close to me, the splashes as four sailors jumped into the water. As they surrounded me the English-speaking one asked if I would grab the line. I refused but smiled as I explained they would have to force me, but that I loved them and would not try to hurt them. He grinned back and I suddenly saw the strangeness of the five of us bobbing about in the South China Sea like corks, spotlighted in our smiles of human understanding. As he was wrapping the line around my waist he said, "Excuse me," and then I was pushed and hauled up the side of the gunboat.

We learned our third lesson—even the brutalization of war cannot prevent the human spirit from breaking through. On being returned to the Phoenix I learned that Harrison Butterworth had outswum his pursuers and reached shore. Towing operations were suspended and #602 backed away.

While we were anxiously praying for his safety, Harry was walking down the road toward Danang. He had made 2 miles when United States Marine sentries halted him and gave him a bed for the night before taking him to the Vietnamese commander for the Danang area. There Harry was told that the reason for our unenthusiastic reception was connected with the Saigon government's hostility to the anti-war Buddhists, to whom we had consigned half our cargo.

"We regret towing," read the signals from #602 as it towed us out, with Harry now back aboard the Phoenix. Three days had passed since we came into the area. We were not giving up, however, and conducted a "sea vigil" for three days, hoping for a change of heart in the government. It was not forthcoming, and after an interlude at the South Vietnamese Naval Base at Danang to make arrangements for Harrison Butterworth, now ill, to fly to Hong Kong, we set sail for Cap St. Jacques.

Cap St. Jacques (in Vietnamese, Vung Tao) is the rendezvous for ships wishing to go up the Saigon and Mekong Rivers. Testing our hypothesis that the rejection at Danang was connected with a veto of our mission by regional authorities for local reasons, we planned to wait three days to see if the port at Saigon was open to us. Those days at Vung Tao were strained.

There was a stream of incidents which we could interpret only as efforts to intimidate us. A United States patrol launch circled us with deck-mounted machine gun pointing steadily in our direction, and a sailor stood by with another machine gun ready. A Vietnamese gunboat shot tracer bullets parallel to us and machine-gun fire into the water near us. More dangerously, the gunboat again and again crossed immediately in front of us; we once avoided a collision only by jamming the engine into reverse. This harassment usually occurred in the evening when the ocean seemed very large and our small boat very vulnerable. When we were told that the government remained unmoved, we were not entirely reluctant to set sail for Sihanoukville, Cambodia.

There we learned our fourth lesson, for we unwittingly sailed into an international storm over charges that the NLF was using Cambodian territory for sanctuary and Sihanoukville as a source of supplies. We had been considering giving some of our cargo to the NLF Red Cross in Phnom Penh (since our program includes humanitarian aid to all sides), but from the viewpoint of the severely threatened Cambodian Government this was exactly the wrong time for such a project. The fourth lesson was: be willing to invest in expensive communications equipment, because a lot can change in twenty-seven days at sea.

Our morale picked up, however, when we began swimming in the Gulf of Siam, hiking on an island off which we were anchored, and eating bananas, papayas, oranges and coconuts. This part of the direct action program of A Quaker Action Group was over.

What had we accomplished? We had failed to deliver our medical cargo to the South Vietnamese Buddhists and Red Cross. That can probably be done soon in a quiet way. We had succeeded in convincing skeptical Vietnamese (especially Buddhists) that there are some Americans who will go to great lengths to identify themselves with the Vietnamese people in their time of suffering. We had dramatized the contradictions of a society at war, where the genuine needs of the Vietnamese people are sacrificed to the political self-interest of a shaky and unrepresentative regime.

The final lesson that we learned—this time, about ourselves—might be as relevant to the American scene as to direct action in a war zone. We reacted very differently to the confrontations at Danang and at Vung Tao. At Danang we felt no hostility toward the men who were holding us incommunicado: one of our new verses to an old folk song went “To the crew of 602,

Don't you know that we love you?”

At Vung Tao we were more than angry with the harassment: we were resentful toward the men who did it. Why the difference? The major reason, I believe, is that at Danang we were able to think of tactics which gave full vent to our feelings of frustration: consequently there was no need for bitterness in our hearts or in our rhetoric. At Vung Tao, on the other hand, we did not think of a way to respond to the harassment: all we could do was “hold on” and feel the resentment rising.

But that is analogous to what so many of us in the protest movement do at home—hold on to our jobs and security and feel the resentment toward the government and its policy rising. True, the resentment may issue forth in violent rhetoric, but far from making us revolutionaries, the rhetoric only reveals the gap between belief and action, reveals our lack of genuine commitment.

Can we devise tactics which express our righteous indignation toward American foreign policy? If so, will they be tactics which express the substance of radical commitment or just a blustery style of anger? If the substance, will we risk enough to carry out those tactics?

The direct action venture of the Phoenix in the war zone, whatever its effect may prove to be in other ways, finally taught me a little more about myself than I really wanted to know.

RHETORIC IS NOT ENOUGH

Michigan Democrats in Disarray

DOUGLAS CRASE

Mr. Crase, currently enrolled in the University of Michigan Law School, is a graduate of the Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs, Princeton University. His thesis at the Woodrow Wilson School was The Politics of Frustration, a study of Michigan's political system.

Ann Arbor

Michigan's rambunctious Democratic chairman, Zolton Ferency, sent a nervous jiggle across the party seismograph last fall when he urged his party to produce a substitute for Lyndon Johnson at the national convention in August. The few Democrats who remain in high state offices scrambled to “dissociate” themselves from Fer-ency's statement and requested his resignation. National chairman John Bailey loosed a barrage of unprintable expletives. In two months there was a new name, Sander Levin, on the chairman's door in Lansing, and Ferency was practicing law in Flint.

Since Ferency's removal was occasioned by his dovish anti-LBJ statement, peace Democrats across the nation helped themselves to another martyr. Much was missing, however, from the popular image of Ferency as a casualty of the war in Vietnam. Dissatisfied Democrats outside the state, who listen to the traveling Ferency, and fasten on Michigan as an illustration of their problems and possibilities, would do well to remember that his fate cannot be understood apart from the politics of the Auto State.

Ferency's tenure as Democratic chairman began one month after George Romney moved boisterously into the Statehouse that had been Democratic for fourteen years. No party could maintain its organizational vitality in face of the evictions that Romney visited on the Democrats. U.S. Sen. Philip Hart consistently declined to help harness and revivify his party. Would-be leaders from all the party's discontented groups sought to fill the vacuum. Last year, many began to gravitate toward the infant Michigan Conference of Concerned Democrats (MCCD). The glue of party cohesion was coming unstuck, and membership and fund-raising drives all failed to restore party health.

Though Romney is largely responsible for this Democratic disarray, many Democrats, liberal and old guard, accuse Ferency of contributing to their party's disintegration. Ferency made no attempt to put in motion an organized, continuous resistance to Romney's advances. In fact, party organization didn't seem to interest him at all. "Zolton is great at going around the state and making speeches about the need for new directions," moaned one party orderly, "but when it comes to thinking up ways to keep them involved in the districts, he's just not there."

Ferency's popularity with Detroit labor delegates, the black caucus and the intellectual Left might have saved him had it not been for his inexplicable propensity to go on sounding and acting like the party challenger when he was supposed to be its chairman. His "dump LBJ" statement, for example, was issued only twelve hours after a leadership meeting in Detroit, at which he had given no sign of his intentions. When the furor arose, he maintained that he had been misinterpreted—he had not called for a dump-Johnson movement. Within one week, however, state Democratic publicity director James Harrison, the Sancho to Ferency's Quixote, had resigned to form the first McCarthy for President committee in the nation. And after his own resignation, Ferency, although withholding endorsement of the Minnesota Senator, urged Democrats to "join McCarthy's cause and support his challenge."

Ferency had been asked to resign before. The clamor over his dump-Johnson statement provided the perfect occasion. It is thus a mistake to attribute his fate to an organized inquisition designed to keep Michigan pure for Dean Rusk. But it would be equally deluding to dismiss Ferency as a Michigan aberration that can be safely ignored by Democratic politicians at large.

In Michigan, the Democratic Party was made according to the familiar New Deal recipe—labor, urban minorities, intellectuals, the poor—although Michigan necessarily leaned heavily on the labor ingredient. But as labor moved out of Detroit to the suburbs, becoming increasingly satisfied and conservative as it went, the coalition began to lose cohesion and appeal. Now Vietnam and the unresolved misery of the ghettos may be the final demolition charges under the New Deal structure. For the anti-war Left and for an increasing number of urban blacks, the whole Democratic house is becoming downright unlivable.

The New Deal coalition, as Princeton Prof. Edward

Schneier pointed out recently ("The New Tide of National Politics," The Nation, January 22), worked as long as there was consensus among the interest groups on basic ideology. But, says Schneier, "to satisfy either the anti-war groups or the ghettos . . . is to provoke conflict, and conflict is precisely what interest-group liberalism seeks to avoid." Like Democrats everywhere, Michigan Democrats have tried to absorb the two great issues into the New Deal sponge. The party, they assert, is big enough for all liberals.

But it is precisely the fear that the party is too big that is the unstated core of the dissenters' complaints. They worry that if they stay Democrats they will lose political relevance in a party that cannot be persuaded to try their alternatives because it is wedded to the dominant consensus. Since World War II, politics has stopped at the water's edge. Now that Detroit has attempted to solve its problems by enlisting the joint efforts of such as Henry Ford II, J. L. Hudson, Jr., and Walter Reuther, the dissenters fear that the coalition of which they are part expects politics to end at the ghetto's edge too. It is the resulting frustration, as Schneier has suggested, that is jiggling Michigan's New Deal structure in 1968, and which could shake it to the ground by 1972.

To cope with their frustrations, the rebels have begun to coalesce around the newly hatched Conference of Concerned Democrats. The Michigan branch has registered 500 names since it began accepting memberships in January, and it is aiming for a roster of 2,000 to 3,000 by election time. (Regular dues paying Democratic membership stood at 15,000 in the last election year.) Encouraging gestures of support have come from important but unorthodox figures such as Detroit Mayor Jerome Cavanagh, Negro Congressman John Conyers and, of course, Ferency.

In public, CCD-ers talk excitedly about taking a McCarthy delegation to Chicago, but in more sober private moments they are likely to admit that any such attempt is just another scrimmage with the windmills. Michigan's delegation will be named at the state convention this summer, and the delegates to that convention are picked in the counties by conventions whose make-up was determined in 1966, before the MCCD was even conceived. Thus the predominant character of the Michigan delegation makes it largely proof against anti-Johnson tampering.

Two districts from Detroit's inner city are planning to send uncommitted delegates to the state meeting. But, while this is encouraging to peace Democrats, it is mostly significant as a black attempt to gain leverage within the Michigan party, and the conduct of these two delegations will hinge on that struggle, not on Vietnam.

The imposing presence of labor also confronts the MCCD. In 1967 labor dropped its powerful convention caucus, partly to appease charges of labor domination, but mostly because politics were such last year that there was little a caucus could accomplish. In 1968 the stakes will be higher, and it will be difficult for state AFL-CIO President Gus Scholle, whose Executive Board has endorsed Johnson's policies, to sit out the convention game. True, Michigan's UAW leaders have not all been wholehearted in their devotion to the President's conduct of the war. Victor Reuther and Emil Mazey both spoke last fall at the National Labor Leadership Assembly for Peace. But few labor people have expressed even private interest in the peace candidacy of MCCD member Jerome Dupont, a Congressional hopeful in Ann Arbor. The most realistic assessment of labor's attitude came from the state McCarthy chairman, who warned his committee: "We can't expect much help from labor."

MCCD support remains spotty, centering around university towns like East Lansing and Ann Arbor, and the districts deep within Detroit. Mounting a serious challenge across the state will require organizational muscle that the MCCD does not possess. Its urgent needs now are to define its relation to the regular organization, and to find a leader who can command state-wide attention and provide state-wide direction. But its dilemma is that leaders are necessary to help define the organization's role, and those who have been asked, such as Cavanagh and Conyers, will not commit themselves until the problem of role definition has first been solved. By then, the liberal new party chairman, Sander Levin, may have reclaimed enough of the Democratic Left to give the MCCD an incurable case of political rickets.

The MCCD benefits from the emergence of a more militant attitude among many black Democrats. The large Negro vote is crucial in Michigan; Democrats like Mennen Williams and Jerome Cavanagh probably owe their careers to it. In Detroit, the 600,000 Negroes are about 40 per cent of the city's population, and may reach the magic halfway mark by the next census. Black aspirants for Mayor Cavanagh's job are certain to appear in 1969. Both of the delegations that will go uncommitted to the state convention have Negro Congressmen.

One of these is young John Conyers, Jr., who traces Democratic weaknesses in Michigan to the "unwillingness of many to merge around the only able leader we have—Zolton Ferency." Conyers' record includes one of the sixteen votes against last year's flag-burning bill, and one of four against appropriations for Vietnam. Because of the indulgent nature of his constituency (Conyers' district embraces much of the area of last July's rebellion) these votes are not as brave as they seem at first glance. Nevertheless, they have given him considerable stature with the white Left in the MCCD.

Conyers welcomes the new spirit of black independence as a way to force the Michigan party into a deeper commitment to black problems. Democratic reaction to these pressures will largely determine the future of the Michigan party. And here, not on Vietnam, is where Democrats will have their most agonizing difficulties.

The party's racial trials begin, and will possibly end, with relations between labor and the Negro. No matter how enlightened Walter Reuther may be, the all-important position of "Labor" will ultimately be determined by the myriad of unrecorded encounters, at the precinct, county, district, and door-to-door levels, between white union men and their erstwhile black allies in the party that white laborers once considered wholly their own.

To date, those encounters have promised badly for future party unity. In the 1964 primaries, for example, the UAW officially endorsed both Conyers and his Negro opponent, but UAW rank and file worked almost exclusively, if unofficially, for Conyers' more "acceptable" opponent. Conyers won the primary by only 100 votes, and he has not forgotten it.

More recently, black militants under the leadership of Rev. Albert Cleage, Jr., organized an inclusive Federation for Self Determination to focus ghetto power and influence the work of the prestigious New Detroit Committee which seeks to revitalize the city. When a rival, and "moderate," black group was organized, its press releases issued from the office of Horace Sheffield, in the UAW's glass-walled Solidarity House. Neither Walter Reuther nor the UAW was aware of Sheffield's intentions, but the impression of union interference is impossible to avoid, for Conyers and other militants are not impressed by the argument that the UAW cannot control the political actions of its staff. "If some union official had tried to undercut Williams," complains one bitterly, "Reuther would have clamped down faster than a Ford comes off the assembly line." The strained relations between organized labor and militant black Democrats will undergo their most severe test in 1969, when black candidates seek the mayor's office in Detroit.

The party will try to contain its racial tensions. "The urban crisis," says Chairman Levin, "is really a crisis of all our society, including the suburban areas around the urban centers." In the suburbs, however, Levin faces a number of anxious little George Wallaces who antagonize the black wing of the party by advocating stronger police powers, comprehensive anti-riot measures, and who campaign against state-wide open housing. Of forty-five white Democrats in the state House of Representatives, twenty-eight copped out on open housing when the bill came to the floor last year.

Levin also faces the problem of improving communications between white liberals and Negroes. In 1967, black Democrats introduced in Lansing a bill providing for the election of Detroit's nine-man common council from wards, rather than at large. As of now, only one councilman is black, a situation which the ward system could rectify. The measure failed and has been reintroduced this year, but Democratic liberals in Lansing have not yet seen that the ward plan is a hot issue, even though representation in local government is more important to ghetto blacks than the open housing bill which has bestirred liberals to heights of oratory in the state capitol. The failure of white Democrats to recognize which issues are important makes them easy targets for Conyers' charge that they "want to play around the fringes of important questions without ever meeting them."

By the same token, perhaps the greatest potential strength of the MCCD is the happy black-white relationship it has so far enjoyed. However, the conference has not yet dealt with specific political problems, and its unity may dissolve when confronted with real choices. The danger is that the white Left will prove to be a one-issue lover; that when Vietnam is no longer an arousing cause, it will fade away into the mainstream, leaving black rights betrayed once more. The result will hinge at least partly on how well the black militants educate their white allies while they are by disposition willing to listen—and in desperate need of black support. Here, too, the test may come in Detroit's next election for mayor. If Cavanagh runs again, challenged by a Negro who is sure to be supported by Conyers (if it is not Conyers himself), the strain could rupture the MCCD.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

Regardless of all the fuss over the MCCD in Michigan, it is not going to walk away with any challenge cups this year. The real question now is this: if the elections of 1968 produce another four years of frustration politics for radical Democrats, what will be the fortunes of the MCCD and the regular Michigan party?

The MCCD is the single dissident Democratic group visible in Michigan. There is no confusing welter of factions in the California style. The MCCD has managed to make the situation look simpler than it really is: there are the old regulars and then there are the progressive people who want a change. Four more years of frustration could give that dishonestly oversimplified position an irresistible appeal to those who have lost patience, and, hopes the MCCD, to the virgin voters surfacing between now and 1972.

A second factor which makes the emergence of the MCCD crucial is that Michigan's Democratic Party is a volunteer organization. There is little patronage and little control over nominations with which to shore up party strength. Instead, Democratic unity has been achieved in the past by building a programmatic, issue-oriented party closer to the European model than any other party in the United States. Program not only replaced patronage as party cement; program became a kind of psychological patronage. Michigan's party worker went to the doorbells not for money or jobs but for an issue; and, in the days of Mennen Williams, his reward came from the knowledge that the issue, even if never resolved, was at least taken up by the candidates for whom he worked.

In contrast was the mood of 1966 when one Congressman heatedly told his volunteers that Vietnam was not to be an issue in his campaign. Many of the volunteers, for whom Vietnam was the issue, left in disappointment. A write-in campaign was begun for a peace candidate, and the election was ultimately lost. That the party is in desperate need of new psychological commitment, its status and this example demonstrate. If it ignores, or only half-heartedly meets, the issues that are vital to many of its workers, black and white, it will swell the ranks of both the MCCD and the political dropouts.

Levin, who has a master's degree in international relations from Columbia, and a cum laude law degree from Harvard, is eager to meet the test. "The challenge of 1968," he says, "is to be strong organizationally and vigorous intellectually. It may be more difficult in 1968, but it is more important."

But Levin must supervise the disintegration of the old coalition while simultaneously helping his party to fashion a new one. His and the party's first task is to define that new coalition in such a way that the party can tap the tremendous political power in the protests of the white Left, the black militants and discontented youth. At the same time, he must guard against a heavy loss of labor support.

Orthodox Democrats claim that the party cannot bend its consensus without betraying its constituency. That argument misses the point, for the present turbulence demonstrates that the party has already ceased to represent a cohesive constituency. It also overlooks the fact that parties whose constituencies are disintegrating must fight to create new coalitions, as Franklin Roosevelt's party did in 1936 when it built the structure that has governed the United States for thirty years. As it approaches the 1970s, the party must be willing to lead the way, as Mennen Williams and Neil Staebler led, and sometimes dragged, the immobilized Michigan party into the New Deal twenty years ago.

Levin's second task is the tireless building and servicing of functioning party conferences and committees, in order to involve each tentatively committed worker. Already he has set idle party automobiles in motion toward conferences and committee meetings. New weekend-issues meetings have been scheduled to devote full days to wrangling on subjects like Vietnam.

This kind of party interaction will hearten people who might otherwise have left in indifference, or turned to the MCCD. In fact, the MCCD is happy with Levin's new plans, and has encouraged its members to participate actively. If he succeeds in alleviating their frustrations by giving them a role and a voice in what is, overall, still the most liberal major party in any state, he will render the MCCD unnecessary.

Ferency's failure, ironically, was that he could not fully involve the CCD people, his own supporters, in his own party. He talked about a new coalition, but was without the political resources to build it, block by block, in the face of the older structure. His criticisms painted his own party in such unattractive terms that he actually scared the Left into the MCCD. He became the most vocal dissenter from the organization he tried to lead.

If apprehensive Democrats around the country want to make Michigan an example of something, it should be this: the Democratic Party cannot be moved from its crumbling foundations to stronger ones with only rhetoric and pickets. To lay the new foundations will require the same hard political spadework that built the great Michigan structure of the 1950s. It will also require its builders to get their hands dirty with the political mortar of compromises and deals to hold the party walls together. Radical Democrats should watch the Auto State hopefully for clues. For this, muses Levin, "is the Michigan party's experimental period."

THE OFF-DUTY GUN

KENNETH G. GROSS

Mr. Gross, a reporter on the New York Post, is completing, with Bernard Lefkowitz, a book on the Wylie-Hoffert murder case.

The reassuring pat, slap, pat against the thigh is like the loving stroke of a mother with her baby, and it has a lulling, smiling effect. Slap, pat, slap, and their faces, stonelike, reflect nothing except the slightest degree of cockiness as they walk past. They are armed men, on and off duty, and dangerous.

"Take my gun away!!!" Suggest it and watch their faces. It is almost too embarrassing to see the instinctive motion to check that it is still hanging there, and the relief. Some suggest that the whole business is phallic, but it is far more dangerous than that.

It is the gun, the deadly potential, the implicit threat that makes cops different. They should be forced to check their pistols at the precinct door. An off-duty cop should not be armed. He should be an ordinary citizen, taking his chances, just like me, with the city. He might begin to understand what it is like to be a defenseless citizen in an armed camp.

It is the gun that changes him and makes him different. And it is the authority, usually the obligation, to carry the gun off duty that makes him different on duty. He begins to think of himself as different. He sets up a different category of personnel. People and cops. Creeps and cops. Threats and cops.

"Off-duty cop kills mugger"; "purse-snatcher killed by off-duty cop"; "cop shot while asleep by wife"; "policeman's son shoots himself in the head with dad's gun."

Those are real headlines about a real danger. How often does an ordinary mortal mistake a cop for an ordinary mortal and pay for it with his life? But let us assume that the level of risk is acceptable. It's not, but let's assume it, because the more important issue is the permanent warp the gun puts in the mind of the cop. That warp stays with him on or off duty, but on duty it at least carries with it the obvious weight of the law. The cop who carries a gun off duty begins to think of himself as permanently different; a special human being who embodies the law, who exerts his force to implement the law, who is the law. So on duty he begins to convey a certain arrogance.

The John Birch Society puts out a monthly bulletin in New York, in which every so often they tease the city's finest by suggesting that there are plans afoot to disarm a certain precinct, unnamed, in Queens. These reports create such counterrevolutionary anxiety that police brass go double lengths to deny them. The reports also increase Birch membership in the department, since cops become convinced that only such forces as the Birch Society care about their right to bear arms.

Of all major American cities, only Philadelphia gives policemen the option to carry their weapons off duty. Invariably they carry them. Why? "The policeman is apart and must maintain a certain status," explains Dr. Ralph S. Banay, consulting psychiatrist to the New York City Police Department. "Too much familiarity with the community at large could create problems of contempt for authority." In other primitive societies, symbols are carried by medicine men, witch doctors, chiefs, et al.

In July of 1964, Lieut. Thomas Gilligan, off duty, watched a 15-year-old Negro boy named James Powell toss an ash can cover at a Manhattan landlord who was spraying other teen-agers with water from a hose. What happened next took seconds. Powell appeared to turn on Gilligan and Gilligan drew his pistol and fired three times, killing Powell. Three days later Harlem sputtered and flared into five bloody days of rioting—the first in the long hot-summer series.

The point is not whether Gilligan was or was not threatened or even whether he felt himself threatened. The point is that the presence of the gun altered the situation. What might have been a harmless street confrontation became a killing. In England, where the police still do not carry guns, there is less violence and less killing. The presence of a gun alters the situation so drastically that it creates the very forces it presumes to oppose.

Violence breeds violence. Death inspires killing. A gun is there to shoot with and every policeman is made to understand that it is not an ornament. To carry a gun means that a man must be prepared to kill. And the potential for death escalates. It is hard enough for a cop off duty to think like an ordinary citizen. A policeman on duty chases a speeder, breaks the speed laws and justifies that because there is simply no other way to catch a speeder. When he goes off duty, he finds that the habit of speeding is still present and the distinction between breaking the law off or on duty becomes blurred, indistinct, then perhaps disappears. (An off-duty detective friend of mine performed an almost suicidal U-turn on a California highway recently, and when he was stopped he flashed his New York police shield and was released without question.)

There begins to creep into the policeman's life a sense of isolation. He spends his off-duty hours with policemen. All his friends are policemen because ordinary civilians are always leery about how far they can go with cop friends.

In Behind The Shield, a book in which a former cop writes about cops, the author attempts to explain this sense of isolation and how it becomes heightened by the presence of the gun. The gun becomes the visible symbol of difference.

Bar owners endure the rantings of loud off-duty cops. Cops accept bribes and do mental gymnastics to justify them as the legitimate cost of doing business and the legitimate ransom of men who put their lives on the line.

The alienation grows into a resentment between civilian and cop that can only result in hostile confrontations.

Dr. Banay insists that it is important to make the policeman feel apart and obliged to sustain a greater image of law enforcement. But it is precisely that apartness that alienates the community from the police and underlies the misunderstandings and hostility. To remove the gun would be to remove the greatest single source of alienation, since it is the gun that is the greatest reinforcer of arrogance.

Norman Frank, spokesman for the Police Benevolent Association of New York City, becomes purple at the suggestion. "You would denude this city of a great force of men. It would mean that we would have to triple the force. Some of the best arrests come from off-duty cops It would be a disaster"

The price is too high. It is too expensive to alienate the on-duty force in order to maintain an off-duty army of dubious value. Soldiers are not allowed to carry their weapons off duty. Men should be authorized to carry their weapons only under the strictest supervision. When they begin to suspect that they carry guns on their own authority, they may use them on their own authority. On duty, too.

The principle should be insisted upon that policemen carry guns at the sufferance of the majority of civilians. They should be made to understand that the gun is too terrible a weapon to be personal. It should be a piece of government, city, municipal property; it should be locked in the locker rooms of police precincts.

LETTERS (continued from page 322)

still alive in this country, and it would be unforgivably naive to assume that if the United States were torn by race riots innocent black people would be safe from massive retaliation. The conspiracy itself in the novel is a way of making a metaphor out of a fact—the fact that many "good" Americans would like to see most black Americans simply vanish overnight, by magic if possible, by massacre if necessary.

Leo Hamalian

beagle?

Cambridge, Mass.

DEAR SIR: The Bible said it, in Proverbs 26:17. "He that passeth by, and meddleth with strife belonging not to him, is like one that taketh a dog by the ears."

Florence H. Luscomb

labor's soup

New York City

DEAR SIR: Burton Hall's article in your Jan. 22nd issue, "The Thumb in Labor's Soup," is a contemptible and tragic example of the perversion of truth by an attorney, who has been variously described as a Socialist and a voice of dissent in the labor movement.

Hall has completely distorted and shamelessly fabricated the true condition of 10,000 members of our local union. . . .

Hall's client, one James Gleason, after unrestricted freedom, time and opportunity to defend himself, which he took full advantage of, was expelled from Local 11 by a vote of 1,227 to 17. . . .

Hall's scandalous charges against Local 11 and myself are, without exception, despicable lies. . . .

Hall charges that I was hiding from the McClellan committee in a New York hospital. That is absolutely untrue. I had discussed pertinent facts with agents of the McClellan committee in my office, prior to entering the hospital and we have advised . . . our members, very carefully, with respect to the issues introduced at the hearings. In passing, may I state that many of us in the labor movement remain extremely dubious of the McClellan committee and its purposes.

Hall suggests I was paid off by someone through two maintenance companies. This is a flagrant untruth! No employer having relations with Local 11, at any time, was ever solicited or had any dealings or connections with these companies.

Hall charges deficiencies in Local 11's welfare department of hundreds of thousands of dollars. There has been no looting, depletion or wasting of any moneys in our welfare fund or services.

Hall charges our no-strike, no lock-out, permanent arbitration structure, in three newly organized chains is a sellout of the workers. Hall is grossly ignorant of the history, experiences and results of this institution and the fact that it is not compulsory arbitration at all but a formula bargained for and unanimously ratified by the restaurant employees themselves.

Our local union has never signed a "sweetheart" contract! All of our agreements are negotiated with the full participation and final approval of our members. We think our local operates with a maximum of democracy and we are proud of our organizational successes and the standards we have achieved.

It is indeed frightening that your publication, without verification or corroboration, allows itself to be so misused as resulted from your association with Mr. Hall.

Fred Ferrara, President, Local 11

New York City

DEAR SIR: I have only represented restaurant unions for about 25 years (including, I hasten to add, Local 11) and have written contracts for thousands of shops. Contracts I have written and the clauses I drafted are literally used in unions throughout the United States. . . . I think the Schrafft's contract is a good one, especially in view of the fact that it is the first agreement with an employer who bitterly resisted organization for decades. I know—I tried the NLRB case against the Shattuck Company for weeks.

The discharge clause Attorney Hall bitterly attacks is not unusual. Even so strict a union as the Waiters Local permits discharge for cause, and some of the contracts spell out several "causes," and then have general language encompassing other cases. I think that an employee guilty of "gross insubordination" should be fired. I also think that if an employee is guilty of "offensive language or conduct," the employer should have the right to fire him. I don't think such clauses in a labor agreement are "noteworthy" as Attorney Hall calls them. I hasten to add, as Attorney Hall did not, that in each and every such case, the employee has recourse to grievance machinery and, if need be, to arbitration. I have read thousands of such clauses.

The no-strike clause is new, but not quite as "startling" as Attorney Hall alleges. It is an attempt to substitute bargaining and arbitration for strikes and the threat of strike. It is a good attempt, especially in view of the past anti-labor history of the company involved. Whether it has the legal effect that Attorney Hall states in his learned, reasoned opinion, I hesitate to say. Perhaps he is just a better lawyer than I am, but I am not certain that a contract can bind either party after it expires, despite statements of intention. Perhaps the language is hortatory and not necessarily binding. I really wonder what would happen if four contracts and twelve years from now, the workers voted strike. Perhaps Attorney Hall will be on the bench by then, and be in the position to definitively rule on the question. At present, I am not as shocked as he is by this no-strike clause. . . .

Harold L. Luxemburg

New York City

DEAR SIR: If all these "scandalous charges" contained in the report of the findings of an investigation conducted by the McClellan subcommittee are "despicable lies," as Ferrara now says they are, then why didn't Ferrara appear before the Senate's Permanent subcommittee to deny them? The subcommittee subpoenaed him to testify on these matters at its hearings that began on Sept. 27, 1966, and continued Sept. 28 and Oct. 4—but Ferrara didn't appear. The day before he was to appear, Ferrara submitted an affidavit from his doctor saying that the doctor had admitted him to St. Clare's Hospital on Sept. 25 for a "medical condition" (unspecified) and that his "physical condition" (also unspecified) was "such as he is unable to appear as a witness before the Subcommittee."

His "physical condition" didn't prevent Ferrara from leaving the hospital on Oct. 1 to sign the Schrafft's contract; why should it prevent him from testifying before the subcommittee at its Oct. 4 session?

Ferrara says there has been no depletion of Local 11's Welfare Trust Fund. That will come as a surprise to the New York State Insurance Department, which has recently completed extensive hearings in the proceeding brought by it against the trustees of that fund for alleged depletion of some $156,564.72 through the optical plan alone.

And about the "maintenance companies," which Ferrara owned in partnership with the brother-in-law of labor consultant Jack McCarthy. Employers with whom Local 11 bargains testified to the subcommittee that they hired labor consultant Jack McCarthy upon Ferrara's recommendation. Other employers testified that they hired the two maintenance companies, from which Ferrara received at least $36,606, upon McCarthy's recommendation. . . . But, says Ferrara, the worst "lie" of all is the suggestion that his low-wage, permanent no-strike contract with Schrafft's is a "sweetheart." The contract permits the employer to discharge employees for any reason whatever upon twenty-four-hour notice—and it permits the employer to fire employees even without notice for such reasons as "gross insubordination." Its wage level is on the borderline of New York State's minimum wage (and has been actually below that borderline for extended periods of time). And the contract provides that even after the expiration date the union will still be barred from striking and from any concerted action; all issues arising at negotiations thereafter are submitted in advance to the supposedly impartial arbitrator, Jack McCarthy's partner, J. Kenneth O'Connor. . . .

(Ferrara says the contract was ratified by the employees but neglects to point out that neither the employees nor their committee were allowed to read the contract, nor were they told its terms before the vote for approval.)

Harold Luxemburg . . . argues that the permanent no-strike clause is not really binding on the union, even though the employer was tricked somehow into thinking it would be. He may be right—or maybe, not; there are cases in the law books indicating post-expiration effect of collective bargaining agreement clauses. If Mr. Luxemburg thinks he can nullify the no-strike clauses, then why doesn't he seek a declaratory judgment doing just that? . . .

Of course, all this reasoned discussion is largely beside the point. Ferrara has stronger weapons at his disposal. One of these is the power to expel from the industry anybody who dares to oppose him; since he appoints the trial committees, rank-and-file members are at his mercy. And since the Local 11 bylaws permit him, without ratification or approval by anybody, to sign collective bargaining agreements binding on Local 11, he is in a position to enchain the rank and file to the conditions spelled out in the Schrafft's agreement. With weapons like these, perhaps, Ferrara is free to go on shouting "Lies, all lies!" whenever someone discusses publicly the true condition of workers under his rule.

Burton Hall

alternative

Notre Dame, Ind.

DEAR SIR: Hoosiers for a Democratic Alternative is an Indiana organization pledged to support candidates for public office who will work for an end to the war in Vietnam. We will campaign actively for the election of public officials who favor a negotiated political settlement of the Vietnamese conflict. If you agree with this aim, we invite you to join. For more information write Hoosiers for a Democratic Alternative, Room 410 Sherland Building, South Bend, Ind. 46601.

James A. Bogle, Chairman

radical experiment

Berkeley, Calif.

DEAR SIR: I have read Report From Iron Mountain and find in it a closely reasoned argument based on reasonable premises. However, as a scientist, I know that even the best of theories must stand or fall on the basis of experimental evidence. I therefore suggest that we experiment with peace for a while, and discover empirically what its effects on society would be. New experiments often turn up facts which the theoreticians have overlooked.

John E. Gaustad

BOOKS & THE ARTS

'A Billy Goat Pining for Purity'

TOLSTOY. By Henri Troyat. Translated by Nancy Amphoux. Doubleday & Co. 762 pp. $7.95.

ANITA M. LERNER

Mrs. Lerner taught Russian literature at Sarah Lawrence College.

For the new Tolstoy reader, desiring to comprehend both the tumultuous life force of the Russian author and the family background within which his extravagant talents ripened, Henri Troyat's biography provides a beginning. In childhood scenes the boy, 2 to 9 years old, encounters death—his mother's, father's and grandmother's. Later come seductions, gambling, gypsies and wild parties, soldiering and sparring with literary people. All are presented by Troyat swiftly and dramatically, with the skills of a fellow novelist. Tolstoy is captured alive—that is the big achievement. Before marriage, his life was already shaped by three women: his intelligent mother, to whom he prayed even in old age; his substitute mother, Tatyana Ergolskaya (Aunt Toinette), and his spinster relative, Countess Alexandra Tolstoy, who moved in court circles, and maintained "an amitié amoureuse" with Tolstoy, through letters.

The biographer appreciates Tolstoy, the artist, and shows how he grew. Quietly the boy Leo sat among the adults, listening, watching, sometimes asking questions. Storytellers surrounded him and soon he became a voracious reader. Aunt Toinette was sure her Leo was destined to write his own stories and encouraged him to begin. As he grew up, nothing else he tried worked out. Far from home, as a soldier, he managed to stay at his desk and complete his first serious work, Childhood.

War stories on Sevastopol followed, not emphasizing glory but "the reeking hospital room," and Tolstoy took steps to exchange his uniform for civilian clothes. Surrounded by the literary crowd in Moscow and Petersburg, however, he found that he preferred his old associates on the battlefield. "The whole little menagerie" of quarreling Westerners and Slavophiles was "seething with emulation, vanity and jealousy." Said Tolstoy: "There is no one acting out of sheer goodness, anxious to win over and reconcile people to each other in a happier world." He wrote independently, in spite of the aggravations of censorship, neither to please the authorities nor to gain popularity. "Truth" was Tolstoy's goal.

One-tenth of Troyat's book is devoted to the three great novels. He shows the surrounding environment out of which they grew, the critical reception they received, as well as how each evolved in the author's mind. (This I thought the best part of the biography.) At first, for example, the heroine of Anna Karenina was to be a man killer, a devil incarnate, in contrast to her two victims, Karenin and Vronsky. While creating the sinner, however, the author himself became enamored and gave her not only beauty but spontaneity, grace and warmth. But Tolstoy found it difficult to complete this novel (written in the shadow of five family deaths) and dropped it to return to peasant teaching.

The fault in the book is that Troyat, liking the artist, fails to understand the man behind the art. This is not surprising, since the background and prejudices of biographer and subject differ widely. Though born in Russia, Troyat settled in France as a schoolboy, at the time of the Bolshevik Revolution, and writes from the point of view of a patriotic, middle-class Frenchman. Everything touching on Tolstoy's French experiences—the public execution in Paris, the appraisal of French schools, his attitude toward Napoleon—is explained, not in terms of Tolstoy's purposes but through the editorial comments of the Frenchman. Above all, the biographer is antagonized by the Russian's repudiation of orthodox religion.

While the hero's external experiences are recorded (each seduction, naming names, and each gambling bout, assessing losses), Troyat refuses to take seriously his inner struggles reflected in the Franklin "Rules of Life." Here the young man dreams of reformation and plots out devices to achieve success, but Troyat labels him "a billy goat pining for purity." (There was, of course, a relationship between his great sensuality and his great talent.) Trying to explain his hero's premarital changes of place and occupation, the biographer overuses such words as "suddenly" and "abruptly," having no psychological explanations to offer. Thus the deeper, emergent self, the searching, contradictory figure, suffering and enduring, sometimes ridiculous and then again moving and miraculous, eludes Troyat. But it was precisely this man, involved in a terrible fever of inner growth, who fashioned the novels to which Troyat pays tribute.

Such a biographer would fail to understand the crisis of Tolstoy's middle years, in which he courted death rather than life, and was so physically reduced as to be barely recognizable. In order to regain an affirmative outlook he purged himself through Confession (Troyat doesn't analyze the document). All the works, Anna Karenina and Confession are clearly linked: the first dealing with death and despair; the second searching for a religion that would bring him back to life. In time Tolstoy worked out a pragmatic faith (which Troyat scorns), and managed to fill his days with productive activities.

He was not satisfied, however, yearning to relate word and deed (here Troyat accuses him of "the temptation of sainthood"). In sum, this biographer rejects not only Tolstoy's religious struggles but most of his nonliterary activities, such as his pioneer peasant schools, calling the pupils his "guinea pigs." But teaching, and a love of children, was a life talent of Tolstoy, second only to writing itself. His great anti-war work (The Kingdom of God Is Within You) and the support he gave to such activities internationally is hardly touched upon. However, Lenin claimed that it was primarily Tolstoy's pacifist influence that made the first Communist revolution of 1905 fail.

Everyone knows by now that Tolstoy's wife, Sonya, was unable to go along with her changed husband—the man who wished to live like a peasant and take with him his wife and children—and nobody in his right mind could blame her. But what Troyat fails to make clear is that Sonya permitted him no escape: neither flight nor a rational compromise. The Kreutzer Sonata (a "nasty" story as Tolstoy recognized) dealt a deathblow to their marriage. Though sexual relations continued, mutual respect was lost. Thereafter Sonya aimed to preserve the pretense of a loving relationship, fearing that history would condemn her. At best she became a nagging wife; at worst one bent on raising her own prestige by means of destroying her husband's.

Sonya's diary is a marvelous human document, as close to the cutting edge of life as Tolstoy's own novels. (They were well matched in vitality and stubbornness.) It records breathlessly, and of course partially, the daily quarrels in their complex household and generates many moods—anger, hatred, self-pity, desire for love, dependence, fear of madness, gratitude for periods of coexistence, as well as moments of confessional clarity. The unforgivable distortion of Troyat is to side wholly with Sonya in these domestic battles, seemingly basing his portrait of Tolstoy on her diary image. Sonya affirms that Leo should stick to novel writing, since only that brings him happiness; Troyat agrees. Sonya pictures him as entirely self-centered, choosing activities that feed his vanity and bring him fame; Troyat agrees. Both are suspicious of his good deeds, calling them poses. In short they see the man as a fraud. (But one side of Sonya worshiped her husband, at the same time that she reviled him. Beside him, she described herself as “feeling like a criminal.”) Of course Tolstoy was sometimes ludicrous and far from perfect, as Troyat reveals him. But he had the stamina, in the midst of surrounding apathy, to oppose the tyrannies of Church and state. This important moral work Troyat fails to appreciate.

It is no easy matter to write a biography of Leo Tolstoy. To view him objectively is almost impossible, since his strong reactions engender strong responses. But an interpreter can at least see first through his eyes, then record his own evaluations, exclaiming (as Chekhov did on reading The Kreutzer Sonata), “This is the truth!” or “This is absurd!” Tolstoy knew the limitations of logic and learned to accommodate himself to his contradictions, saying, “The cat and the dog can live under the same roof.” Perhaps this great bulk of a man—a bear of strength and a dove of sensibility—has suffered from the sanity of his biographers.

Really Bad Off People

THE DRIFTERS: Children of Disorganized Lower-Class Families. Edited by Eleanor Pavenstedt. Little, Brown & Co. 345 pp. $10.50.

ROBERT COLES

Dr. Coles, a child psychiatrist, is Research Psychiatrist at the Harvard University Health Services. He is the author of Children of Crisis: A Study of Courage and Fear (Little, Brown).

It is unlikely that this very important book will get nearly the attention it deserves. The poor have once again had their day in America. For a few years they seemed about to obtain a better deal from this rich nation. Then came another war for freedom and democracy, surely something important to anyone who considers himself in trouble because he can't eat very well, or afford a doctor, or decent living quarters. Consolation, after all, is priceless; and America's poor can at least know they possess freedom, if nothing else, and as an added bonus live under a standard that compares very favorably with that enjoyed by hundreds of millions of Africans or Asians.

So, a book like The Drifters only serves to cause trouble. We are reminded that all is not well, even if the gross national product is edging toward something called a trillion. We are “hurt” abroad; our enemies can leap upon our problems, once again documented, and succeed in tarnishing our “image.” Even more significantly, we are made to feel “guilty”—because we are told that even the most chaotic and disorganized of people, even the “lower-lower” families, will respond to the consistent and persistent attention of those who care, who really want to help others find a more secure and comfortable life.

In a way, then, this book could not be more disturbing. Unlike many others that dote on the misery of the poor, or use them to advance one or another strictly ideological scheme. The Drifters aims to report on a long, earnest and difficult attempt on the part of a group of child psychiatrists, psychologists, sociologists, social workers and teachers to reach, to understand, above all to befriend, be of use to “the children of disorganized lower-class families.” The effort took place in Boston and began in 1955—something that must be emphasized. Not all people in the so-called “mental health professions” needed a “war on poverty” (such as it has turned out to be) in order to extend the range of their sympathies and concerns.

The “drifters” described are the parents and children (mostly white, it must be emphasized) who live in a place called “North Point” in the book—in actuality it is Boston's mildly notorious South End. The city's generally conservative or understated tradition affects even its ghettos. Or, as a youth I know who grew up in Boston and later went to New York, put it: “It's quieter here in the South End. You go to New York and things are alive there all the time.” He was referring to and making a contrast with Manhattan's Hell's Kitchen. And in fact the South End is rather quiet to the outsider, if he chances to pass through it at the right time.

For a year I rode on a school bus that transported Negro children through the South End on their way to white schools that at least gave each child a desk, some decent books and a teacher who did more than scorn and belittle her pupils. At 8:15 in the morning the South End was indeed like a sleeping dinosaur. The streets are littered with garbage, and particularly empty bottles, drained by the “hobos” and “bums” and “alcoholics” (heavily white, again) who have considered the district theirs for many years. The buildings are very old, shabby, full of rats, cold-water flats, dank and dark hallways, broken stairs and railings, lights that don't work and, above all, men, women and children—to whom alcohol and drugs, taverns and pushers, prostitutes and pawnbrokers are part of everyday life. A Negro child once put it all together as we moved along on the bus: “Man, I'll tell you, here's one place where Whitey has it as bad as us. I'll confess, I like to see that we're not alone, the black man. My daddy, he told us that when you really want to get to the bottom, it's the white man you'll find there, and now I know what he meant. They're really bad off here, you can tell.”

“Bad off” they are; and The Drifters tells us in its first section exactly how bad off—socially and psychologically—“bad off” can be. The “setting” is described, the neighborhood and the institutions that serve it and all too often fail it miserably. The “social science literature,” in all its relative poverty, is also reviewed—by a group of workers and authors whose modesty comes across again and again. The “team” who worked with the “drifters,” and now have written up their lives, has no intention of supplying us with more rhetoric, more clichés—or more cheap, political slogans meant to win an election and not much more. I suppose voters in suburbia do feel a bit “guilty,” and I suppose it is good politics to play up to that guilt, to the extent that other “commitments” allow. Meanwhile the ghettos persist, and one study after another tells us that they shouldn't, but that—well, these things do take time. Somehow, sandwiched between some set of wars, that “time” may be found. Until then, there is always a Band-Aid here, a quick coat of paint there.

What is so haunting, and finally outrageous, about this book is the radical seriousness of the activity its pages describe and the remarkable discoveries its authors insist upon confronting us with. Here was a group of professional men and women who took great pains to seek out the most troubled and confused and disorganized of American citizens—in order to work with them for years, slowly, patiently, carefully. Young children in a specially designed nursery school were virtually brought up again, taught for the first time, against great obstacles of well-developed fear and suspicion, to trust other human beings, to look them directly in the eye, to stay with them, feel toward them, accept from them, give to them. Things we and our children take for granted those children had never experienced. They darted about, exploded, withdrew, evaded; more than anything else they evaded grown-up people whom they saw to be, had found to be, unreliable, unpredictable, impulsive, alternately violent and smothering. It is heartbreaking to read about these children, and particularly heartbreaking to read about the changes in them and their parents as a result of this research project, and (with the project's end) the slow encroachment back of disorder and sorrow in boys and girls who for a moment breathed life, grace, love, redemption—only to feel them all slowly slip away.

Here is something for us to think about—we who are so full of talk about those “impossible” slum youths, those “hard-to-reach” families, those poor people whose presence irritates us in the face of our occasional glances of sympathy, our last minute niggardly cash, voted by Congressmen eager to adjourn, to go home, you can be sure not to a slum: “Perhaps the most important findings of the project was that many of the children's educational handicaps are to an extent remediable through the combined therapeutic-educational techniques used in our nursery school. . . . Though the children still appear to have definite limitations in terms of their ultimate school success, early pre-school intervention for this group of low socio-economic children has proved successful, at least up to a point.”

Nor were the mothers necessarily “hopeless” or unchangeable: “The mothers finally have shown a capacity to develop some social competence and organization in their lives. They have been like people inundated by a volcano and unable to remove the debris. With assistance in shifting the earth from the stones they have been able to select problems out of the burdensome morass. With some realistic goals and insight they showed an unexpected capacity for initiative, competence and organization.”

So, psychiatrists and social workers and nursery school teachers, from the middle class, and with no power to change the basic social and cultural conditions of “North Point,” yet succeeded in having a decisive effect on a small number of that neighborhood's residents—and in the process found themselves as professional men and women surprised, and thus educated. They started their project in order to determine what could be done with the most impoverished, the most “pathological,” and even in such people they found “islands” of intactness, “fragments of adulthood,” moments when “their motherliness, which has been obscured by clouds, peeps out with momentary brightness and warmth.” In children of 3 or 4 they found plenty of trouble, but again an astonishing kind of shrewdness and guile, on the part of boys and girls who were destined to be a source of trouble to “us,” but who surely learn every day how to make do in their own world. It

Gambits on the Shore

THE FARTHER SHORES OF POLITICS. By George Thayer. Simon & Schuster. 610 pp. $7.95.

FRANK J. DONNER

Mr. Donner is a New York attorney who specializes in constitutional law and civil liberties cases. He is the author of The Un-Americans (Ballantine).

There is a literary genre which might well be called the Icarian, books which, if cast in a more modest vein, might instruct or amuse but which are defeated by their ambitions—the high fliers which fall to earth because of overstrained equipment. Mr. Thayer's book is unmistakably of the genus: like Icarus it never reaches the farther shores.

The book is a compendium of the gambits and distortions which plague popular “exposé,” political writing. Because of its sheer size and scope, and its author's lack of basic familiarity with his subject, its treatment of political minorities is, in part at least, unconsciously parodic—a hastily written Reader's Digest article 600 pages long. Mr. Thayer relies heavily for enlightenment on interviews (the book might well have been called “What They Told Me About the Farther Shores of Politics”) which he uses not merely to convey the opinions of his subjects but as authority for his own observations and conclusions. This reliance is wildly uncritical and leads to odd miscomprehensions—of the sort sometimes found in accounts of American life by foreign travelers. For example, he tells us that members of peace groups are not as radical as they sound: they speak leftist “jargon but fail to understand its meaning,” a conclusion which he documents with a quotation from an interview with a peace activist that “quite a few” peace group members “are middle-class Jewish kids who react against . . . the regimentation of being Jewish, or wearing lovelocks when they were kids.”

Mr. Thayer has organized this material in a neat structure, but formal organization by itself cannot redeem its is not that they cannot learn; that is learn in “our” (old, crowded, hopelessly rigid and uninspired) schools. It is rather that they have already learned what learning really matters—to them, not “us.” Given our country's present “priorities,” its present inclinations and (rather obvious) deeds, who can call such children anything but “realistic,” and even wise?

lack of organic unity. The result is a hodgepodge of anecdotes and exotica which bears about the same relationship to politics as a medieval bestiary to natural history.

Our historic political diversity has long suffered from the conceit of establishment liberalism that commitment is somehow intellectually disreputable. A related notion scornfully dismisses politics which deals with causes rather than symptoms as “conspiratorial” regardless of its targets or rationale. An assumption common to both these views (and to Mr. Thayer's book) is that “social adjustment” is a self-evident virtue, just as “extremism” is a self-evident political vice which, in Lipset's words, “appeals to “A monumental undertaking . . .

By collecting material on all the writers who took sides in the Spanish Civil War, including the minor ones, Stanley Weintraub has recaptured the excitement of those tragic years.”

—MALCOLM COWLEY

THE LAST GREAT CAUSE

THE INTELLECTUALS AND THE SPANISH CIVIL WAR

By Stanley Weintraub

A fascinating study of the profound psychological impact of the Spanish Civil War on the novelists, poets, and journalists of the Thirties.

All bookstores $8.50

WEYBRIGHT AND TALLEY

the disgruntled, psychologically homeless, to the personal failures, and economically insecure, the uneducated, unsophisticated and authoritarian persons at every level of society."

The Right has prospered in part because it has made itself the custodian of a potent political tradition, nativist anti-radicalism. Intensified first by the cold war and later by Vietnam, anti-communism has become the ecumenicism of the American Right. The nationalist and know-nothing passions which kindled the Right over an entire generation following the depression have been refueled in the past decade by an emerging politics of cultural despair. The discrediting of reform through traditional welfare strategies and the emergence of new "way of life" issues (alienation, racism, crime, juvenile delinquency, drug addiction, mental health) have produced a crisis in liberal ideology. The Right has exploited this impasse by developing a politics which makes increasingly nostalgic and symbolic appeals to the middle class, shaping a still inchoate ideology with many points of similarity to European-style fascism.

The old Left, battered by McCarthyism, has not only failed to adapt its dogmas to the realities of American capitalism but, like the New Left, seems incapable of forging a politics that speaks to our condition.

Though orphaned of a setting, Thayer's book might still be useful if he could only have gotten his facts straight. But the book—especially its treatment of the Left—is rife with errors.

The McCarran Act of 1950 is not a criminal statute and there were no "numerous convictions of the (Communist) Party's leaders . . . under the McCarran Act of 1950 which physically removed the more active Communists from the scene for a stretch." No Communist ever even registered under the Act. Both William Epton, the Progressive Labor Party leader, and Farrell Dobbs, the Trotskyist, were convicted—on grounds inaccurately summarized by the author.

The late Francis E. Walter never subpoenaed "Professor Linus Pauling to appear before the HUAC for no other reason than an eccentric remark that Pauling made in public." Pauling was subpoenaed to appear before the Senate Internal Security Committee for his activities in organizing scientists in opposition to nuclear testing. Nor do these committees "serve quite unwittingly to stifle dissent" because a "particularly offensive remark is often grounds enough for the committees to issue a subpoena to the individual concerned demanding that his statements be explained."

About the 1960 execution of Caryl Chessman, Thayer writes: "The case of this convicted murderer, exploited unmercifully by American Marxists, contained enough seeds of doubt concerning his guilt, that it provoked the young to question the validity of all laws, the very foundation on which the country rests."

Although we are almost stoned on this heady "Scottsboro" gambit (the subversive exploitation of injustice), the author plies us with an equally potent chaser—a "true believer" gambit which makes Chessman "a martyr of the left." "American Marxists" ignored the Chessman case and the humanist impulses it stirred among students, and were attacked for that reason by young radicals. Besides, the issue in the Chessman case was not innocence or guilt but capital punishment.

"Jimcrow" [sic] is not part of "an ingroup language . . . on the left" like "Comsymp" on the right." The Palmer raids are not a "euphemism for the 'Red Scare,'" nor are the Catholic Worker "Houses of Hospitality" a "euphemism for flophouses." The unworldly Mennonites do not "still play a leading role" in the Fellowship of Reconciliation, let alone the even more unworldly "Amish Mennonites."

Dorothy Day is not one of the "three well-known personalities" which the Catholic Worker movement "has produced . . . of late." Nor has she yielded "to Cardinal Spellman over the church's view of the Vietnam War." The Catholic Worker is a monthly and not a weekly, and its circulation in the thirties was more than 300,000, not 165,000. The significance of the sign on the wall of its office, "This floor will safely sustain a load of 40 lbs. per square foot," is purely structural and not, as the author invites the reader to believe, homiletic, like the messages (such as "Pax," "Jesus Caritas") which flank it.

Milton Rosen, the leader of the Progressive Labor Party, is not a brother of Jacob Rosen, a youthful activist. John and Albert Maher are brothers—but the author confuses them. The Progressive Labor Party does not include among its goals "a police review board in New York City." It is opposed to a police review board.

Aaron Henry does not "still play a dominant role in the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party." There is no Negro nationalist group known as the "Blood Brothers." Newspaper accounts about it were subsequently admitted to be a hoax. Dr. W.E.B. DuBois was not a black nationalist. He was anathema to the Garvey movement with which the author links him.

None of the old Left groups ever made a "take-over bid" of the Black Muslims, as the author states twice. And the Socialist Workers Party, "a predominantly white organization," never "believed it would lead a militant all-black drive for equal rights" initiated by Malcolm X. (This is well known in the trade as the equality-professing-Reds-discriminate-more-than-anybody-else gambit.) Neither the Left nor the Right characterizes the power drives of its leaders as the "Lenin complex" or "Hitler complex," respectively (the "deadly parallel" gambit).

It is not true that "violence . . . has become endemic" to the Socialist Workers Party (the ever-ready automatic force and violence gambit) "and endures today" (the leopard cannot change its spots gambit). Trotskyists are not "hated with uncommon passion by everyone," and such animosity is not demonstrated by the assassination of a young activist in the party's Detroit headquarters by a man who (the author fails to tell us) was demented.

While Trotsky was alive he did not prevent splits and schisms, as the author states. Indeed the major historic split in the Socialist Workers Party (between the Cannon and Schachtman groups) took place during Trotsky's lifetime. Participation in elections is not a departure "from the path of strict Trotskyism."

Bettina Aptheker, daughter of Communist theoretician Herbert Aptheker, was never chairman of the DuBois Clubs, and she does not foam at the mouth when she speaks. The song The Internationale is not part of a "legacy of Americana," left by the Wobblies. Neither it nor other songs actually composed and sung by the Wobblies (The Rebel Girl, Hallelujah I'm a Bum, Dump the Bosses Off Your Back) "are still sung today by ardent trade unionists everywhere, even in the AFL-CIO."

These and other errors too numerous to list may possibly make Thayer's book a curiosity, prized by bibliophiles like a misprinted stamp among philatelists. But then, writings in this area are notoriously inaccurate (though rarely as badly edited as this book). The conventional restraints on publishers (such as libel suits) are minimal and the unpopularity of the victim limits even the risk of effective protest.

Nor are Thayer's inferences, characterizations and conclusions any more rewarding. Most of them have a "see Spot run" tone. Thus, he says of the peace movement that it "is transfixed by the Vietnam War—far more than the ordinary American citizen." And that, "Perhaps the one point that distinguishes the Citizens' Councils from the Klan is tactics." Thayer can be banal and baffling at the same time: "coupled with an historical threat of starvation [the Puerto Rican] people have always had a desire for physical well-being, regardless of other considerations"; "there is obviously a gray area between blatant subversion and what might be called 'legalized dissent,' no matter how idiotic the latter may be."

Thayer's capacity for broader speculation is equally precarious. His discussion of the CPUSA's decline brings us fresh reminders of the comic possibilities presented by criticism for the wrong reasons, an allotropic variant of the any-stick-to-beat-a-dog gambit. Thus, he rebukes the party because it "has not come up with a good anti-capitalist slogan in years." The Communists "only belatedly jumped on the (anti-Vietnam) bandwagon to embrace the cause as its very own," and they are still laggards for "when enemy flags are carried in protest parades, it is sections of the New Left that carry Vietcong flags, not American Communists carrying Soviet flags." (Sic; Thayer is no stylist.) The party devotes itself to fund-raising functions at which it serves "food to the impoverished faithful who anticipate such gatherings with relief to fund off the monotony of their lives."

The party also "makes money on the stock exchange, being tipped off in advance by Moscow when the Soviets plan to dump some commodity on the world market." And the "impoverished faithful" notwithstanding, not "all Party members are poor, however, nor has this historically been true. Indeed many of them have been quite wealthy." The author's crusher is that the party has retreated to a "soft line" which merely "calls for a 'socialist' America," not, he triumphantly notes, "a 'Communist' one." This judgment reflects as crude a misconception of Communist theory and practice as one is likely to find anywhere and answers the question which steadily shames Thayer's glib pages: can one write informatively about any political movement, no matter how distant its "shores," without understanding it?

Thayer's final chapter rehashes explanations of extremism with characteristic obscurity and includes the by now obligatory equation of the Left and the Right. ("Their vision," he says, in a particularly illiterate summary of childish theories of totalitarian politics, "is apocalyptic, where the world is on the verge of an explosion unless their particular brand of solutions be adopted.") In demonstrating that les extrêmes se touchent, Thayer tells us that both sides see the major threat to the "country as internal." I suppose that this cryptic judgment means that both leftists and rightists believe that the threat of the overthrow of our government by a foreign-based attack is minor. This presumably is in contrast to the opinion of sober-minded, moderate and responsible citizens (like Everett Dirksen and Mendel Rivers) who are convinced of the contrary. Who's loony now?

WRITERS

Y. publisher wants books on all subjects, fiction, nonfiction. No fee for professional opinion. FREE: Brochures that show how your book can be published, publicized, sold; contracts. Write Dept. 147C

EXPOSITION PRESS INC.
386 Park Ave. So., New York, N. Y. 10018

Shocking facts of present-day

SLAVERY

grippingly told by Robin Maughan in the 255 pages of THE SLAVES OF TIMBUKTU, also 12 packed issues of TRUTH ON FIRE!—the evangelical magazine which dares to print what most would only dare to think! Both for only $2.00.

THE BIBLE HOLINESS MISSION (TN)
P.O. Box 223, Postal Stn. A, Vancouver 1, B.C., Canada

Youth & Age in Chile

THIS SUNDAY. By José Donoso. Translated from the Spanish by Lorraine O'Grady Freeman. Alfred A. Knopf. 177 pp. $4.95.

OLIVER T. MYERS

Mr. Myers is chairman of the Department of Spanish and Portuguese at the University of Wisconsin, Milwaukee.

The decennial awarding of a Nobel Prize to a representative of Hispanic letters (Gabriela Mistral, 1945; Juan Ramón Jiménez, 1956; Miguel Angel Asturias 1967: can we deduce a pattern?) should be an occasion for taking a closer look at recent literary production in the Spanish-speaking world. The reader of English has available now a larger and better selection of current novels from Spain and Latin America than probably at almost any earlier time. Best of all, the time lag for English translations is being reduced by enterprising publishers, so that we can have access to Cortázar and Fuentes within a year or two.

It took about six years for José Donoso's Coronation to reach the United States, but the success of that has brought This Sunday to us in two years. With the latent fear that the "typical" Latin American novel might scare off the American public, Knopf hastens to assure us that Donoso "never seems an exotic, he speaks directly to us, his tone and style . . . seem to be in tune with our sensibilities. . . ." We can interpret this easily as: No Indians, no gauchos, no dictators, no jungles, no dreary Romantic rhetoric, and especially no United Fruit.

The blurb writer is accurate in one sense, which is that we have read novels that resemble Donoso's (although we probably haven't come across anything quite like Asturias'). We will recognize some of the characters, the lecherous, psychically impotent scion and the earthy, "enduring" servant (here, white), the all-seeing, innocent child and the superannuated matriarch, the lower-class youth striving, with the patronage and patronizing of the upper classes, to pull himself up somewhere. . . . (In 1962 Donoso was awarded the William Faulkner Foundation Prize for Chile for the novel Coronation.) Some of the scenes (like the seduction of the young master by the lusty serving wench) have the déjà vu flavor. But it is difficult to buy the thesis that we're that much accustomed to the way Donoso looks at these people or makes them act.

It might be that This Sunday is too much like Coronation, not only in characters and milieu but even in some of the plotting. As a novel This Sunday comes off better. But what Donoso has been giving us (here and foreshadowed in some earlier stories, a few written origi-

(Continued on page 353)

An American Punch?

An adult ~~AVANT~~?

A thinking man's ~~SERIAL~~ ENQUIRER?

Yes, it's

CARICATOUR

The New Monthly Of Contemporary Satire

PUT-DOWNS AND PUT-ONS ON WHAT'S UP (FOR PEOPLE WHO MISS TWO)

CARICATOUR SUBSCRIBE TODAY

260 WEST BROADWAY, N.Y., N.Y. 10013

☐ 1 YEAR $3.50 ☐ 6 MOS. $1.90
(CHECK OR MONEY ORDER)

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____ STATE _____ ZIP _____

THE FALSE SCORPION

*Diminutive, harmless, resembling the lethal kind,
Without a tail,
It is not rare. You cannot fail
To find*

*In America's average suburban back yard
A hundred or more,
If you know what you are looking for.
It's hard*

*To grasp why such a retiring animal
Will cross a sheet
With stately step but then retreat
From a ball*

*Of dust more quickly than it can advance.
It won't forego
Living contenders, however, though
The chance*

*That it will ever eat the conquered is small.
Its appetite
Is scant. Yet, when the time is right,
All*

*Its digestive juices start to flow before
It takes the prey
Into its body. It has a way
Of stor-*

*ing gravel and bark against itself to build A shelter when
It molts, until it is shut in,
Self-sealed.*

*Precaution and pleasure are more clearly one
When the male expends
Energy on a dance which depends Upon*

*The female's motionlessness. He extrudes a thread—
Tipped with a drop—
Stiffening, on the ground, straight up.
The wed-*

*ding's over. She leaps on it. His pincers pick Her up and shake
Her for some time fiercely to make It stick.*

DAVID GALLER

THE WALLS OF SNOW

*Bright snow, white sheeted, winter drifted, lies
Beyond the glass on the other side of the mind
Where it is shining, wet on rail track, cold street
And unshovelled walk. Inside this room, ice
Hardens in the hard body of my lover and friend
Who by his own hand died out of reach last night.
Not last night. I had to go back twenty years to find
His death, when I learned that a body has vacant eyes
And dead flesh is solid, heavy, and gray as granite,
Laid rigid on the bed. The room is blind.
The ceiling presses inward, the rugs rise,
The woodwork bends where the papered walls meet.
No sheen from the blazing snow outside could pass
Into that closed room to lighten it, where he lay
And I stood, wet booted, chapped raw at the wrists, my sorrow Caught in breathy sobs over him. That loss
These twenty years have never equalled. Snow Lies bright on the walls of winter. It is still that day.*

PHYLLIS ROSE

WHISKEY CREEK BRIDGE

*Standing on the wooden bridge at Whiskey Creek where my father's old and new farms meet and join,
I listen for a moment: everything is silent save mosquitoes and the stiff dry-sounding dragonflies that skim the water's smooth back for dark specks.*

*Below me, poised and waiting in silver webs that flex under the bridge, huge spiders shine and dangle in the dark,
the harmlessly exotic and the deadly,
a black widow looming by the dry shell of her mate, her womb filled with seed fed by its father's flesh,
the hourglass of blood set in her belly.*

*Where water clear as amber runs
I watch the sluggish traffic from the swamps drain toward the Gulf: cypress branches wrapped in moss, half sunk, rigid garfish, mullet in dull swarms, cottonmouths and perch, broad leaves turning slowly in the underwater light, and a variety of turtles—some softshelled and graceful, some with brilliant faces, orange and yellow streaked as if their budshaped heads were splitting into bloom, and some, harder, darker, whose horned beaks crack the others' shells and ream them while they die—, all moving downstream to feed the broad Caloosahatchee where fresh water and salt collide and mingle, where seabirds, sand sharks, and bull gators wait.*

*When a branch snaps and falls, breaking the surface,
I start with the fish, the shivers of rising silver that feign and turn, vanish into the spreading calm where the shadow of my childhood holds them all, a darkness deep almost beyond my seeing.*

WILLIAM PITT ROOT

nally in English) is the portrait of ■ decaying society, nostalgic for a glory that had never quite existed, with the other classes lacking the moral and psychological dominance to succeed except through violence. The relations between master and servant will elicit comparisons with the modern American South, but without the complication of race. The strength of the household servants, of the poor, of the criminal, is contrasted with the enervation of the well-to-do, but is insufficient for any real accomplishment.

But this cannot be said to be Donoso's theme. It will be apparent in This Sunday but becomes disturbingly obvious when traced across earlier writings. Donoso does not write about adults. The most fully realized characters in what I've read of him are the young, the innocent or overly wise children, the adolescent bursting with (or from) sex; or the middle aged, prematurely senile from menopause or ennui; or the very old, who have outlived too many generations. We don't see child-parent relationships, a generation is skipped, we are made to feel the remoteness of the grandchild from the grandparent.

The central figure of Coronation is a man in his 50s still under the thumb of his nonagenarian grandmother. The first-person narrator of This Sunday hardly speaks of his parents; it is the grandparents that we see through his eyes and then, alternately, through their own. The middle generation appears as confused lists of names and is dead, whether in the grave or on their feet. The memories of the grandparents go back to their youth, passing over their young adulthood as though over a desert. As the children are deprived of parents (figuratively for the rich, literally through illegitimacy or abandonment for the poor), so parents have no children. The law professor's wife in This Sunday, despite her many offspring, is alienated from them and searches for ■ babe to suckle, like a "littered bitch." Her children are the poor, as she ambles about performing her aimless works of charity. The greatest of these has as its object the rescuing of a strayed lamb (a murderer, in fact) who turns to her as to a mother and who is saved by her up to ■ point; she merely succeeds in stifling him (her real children at least had the strength to abstract themselves) and driving him to further violence. Her own destruction is brought about by the youngest generations of her surrogate children. It is the youngest of the poor who surround her and deprive her of life. And it is they, not her own descendants, who inherit her house as they overrun the abandoned mansion.

Donoso has created a more horrifying nightmare for his victims in this latest work than in Coronation, which at times was merely grotesque. He has now a surer hand with delineation of oddity (the aging grandson's prized walking-stick collection in the earlier novel was silly; here, the deaf grandfather attempting Handel's Harmonious Blacksmith, imitating Cortot's tempo, tells us much more). He finally succeeds in making us know the full complexity of the immature and the post-mature mind with remarkable economy.

Donoso's This Sunday is scarcely longer than a novella. But we can take from it as much experience of human decay as we can bear.

The Child's Style of Learning

HOW CHILDREN LEARN. By John Holt. Pitman Publishing Corp. 189 pp. $4.95.

CHANDLER BROSSARD

Mr. Brossard is a novelist and author of a forthcoming book on Spain, The Spanish Scene (Viking). He teaches at C. W. Post College and Fairleigh Dickinson.

It is a chilling paradox that in a country where the most urgent cultural value is education—so urgent that it is literally against the law not to go to school—the "educational" experience itself is surreal and degrading, especially on the primary level. In most classrooms, and hour by dreadful hour, the child is systematically disengaged from his fragile dignity, his natural animal intelligence, and (here is the essence of surrealism) punished for showing signs that he does not like this. Another paradox is that the teaching job, which should be held by persons of quality, spirit and fastidious humanness, is sought out and captured, by and large, by the mediocre, the mean, the most deeply anti-imagination and anti-intellectual.

There are many reasons for this, most, but not all, deeply imbedded in the dynamic of our culture. The monolithic, unrelenting purpose of "education" in any "civilized" society is to mold its members into non-rebellious, functioning units of that particular society. Certain points of view, value systems, experience schemata, and societally relevant needs are

This Book presents a hard, inside look into the "Facts of Life"—and Death, of our actions in Vietnam!

$2.95 (Paperback)

$4.95 (Hard Cover)

David Schoenbrun, formerly Chief Correspondent for CBS News says:

"In the Name of America" discloses an American crisis and issues that must be faced by every responsible citizen.

To whom are the President of the United States and his subordinates responsible for charges of violating the supreme law of the land and thereby their oath of office? What can be done to restore the rule of law in America?

Any compromise on these issues risks the destruction of the principles upon which our society has been built.

The news dispatches of our activities in Vietnam, contained in this book do not make pleasant reading. Their cumulative effect is overpowering for they establish something few of us have known—that American conduct in Vietnam has been characterized by consistent violations of almost every international agreement relating to minimal standards of human behavior in time of war.

When we measure American actions in Vietnam against the minimal standards of constraint established by the Hague Convention of 1907, the Geneva Conventions of 1929 and 1949, and the Nuremberg Trials, our nation must be judged guilty of having broken almost every agreement to maintain standards of human decency.

"In the Name of America" is a Must!

Available at book stores, Regional Offices of the American Friends Service Comm., or use this order form. Check or Money Order Must Accompany Each Order

Clergy ■ Laymen Concerned About Vietnam
475 Riverside Drive (Room 547) • New York, N. Y. 10027

Enclosed is $ for Paperback copies ■ $2.95 ■
Enclosed is $ for Hard Cover copies at $4.95 ea.

NAME
ADDRESS
CITY STATE ZIP

thoroughly instilled in the individual while he is in school by others who have been similarly acculturated. This process cannot be successfully carried out if the person too frequently uses his imagination (emotions, fantasy) and intelligence. Ergo, the process of dehumanization and degradation. Anything the individual wants to do that is trans-cultural or trans-schematic is punished, because he is very simply threatening the very structure of which he is supposed to be a part. He has to acquiesce if he is to make it.

In this culture, people of brains, originality and spirit are generally not attracted to the teaching scene. It is just too dreary and unrewarding, on almost any level. Lively teachers, like lively children, suffer humiliations beyond measure. Teaching, unfortunately, has nothing to do with true love, illumination, richness of experience. It has to do with unquestioned authoritarianism, white-collar status, job security and bureaucratic camaraderie. The inescapable conclusion, from the foregoing elements, may sound snobbish or "elitist," but it is nonetheless fact: what types of people in the democratic struggle need those things? Aristocrats? Intellectuals? Humanists? Zen Buddhists? Millionaires? Of course not. Frustrated, enraged, insecure, inferiority permeated members of the "lower class," the little bourgeoisie and a variety of other "out" groups. Being a teacher is "classier" than being a clerk, and you have a hell of a lot more power.

By and large, these are the human beings to whom one's children are presented for their education. It is no wonder that the result is awful and heart-breaking.

John Holt is clearly a remarkable exception to these empirical facts, and his book, a poetic, humane, perceptive account of some of his own teaching experiences with the very young, should be made required reading for every teacher in America (but of course it won't). Holt's principle is two-part: children are people who can be hurt and discouraged; children have an incredible capacity for figuring things out by themselves. (Naturally. Otherwise, how in God's name did the human animal ever struggle out of the ooze and into the trees?) "I believe," he says, "and try to show here, that in most situations our minds work best when we use them in a certain way, and that young children tend to learn better than grownups (and better than they themselves will when they are older) because they use their minds in a special way. In short, children have a style of learning that fits their condition, and which they use naturally and well until we train them out of it. We like to say that we send children to school to teach them to think. What we do, all too often, is to teach them to think badly, to give up a natural and powerful way of thinking in favor of a method that does not work well for them and that we rarely use ourselves."

In spite of his superior consciousness and authentic love for children, Holt from time to time found himself doing some dumb things (cultural compulsions that he has not yet managed to shake), and the results proved his points and further enlightened him. One day he visited some friends who had a very young boy. He took along a box of Cuisenaire rods for the kid. They emptied the fascinating stuff out on the rug. "At the time," he confesses, "I felt I had to start him off 'learning' something. So, in what I supposed was my low pressure way, without even saying, 'Watch,' I took some rods from the pile and began to make a pattern of them on the floor, thinking that he would soon imitate me. Danny's father joined me. . . . When we finished, we looked at (Danny). He looked at us for a while, expressionless. Then, without saying a word, he came over and with one swipe of his hand knocked our little building all over the rug." Puzzled, he and the boy's father did the same thing. And Danny knocked it down again. And the whole thing again. "Then, at last, we had the wit to see something was happening that we did not understand, and let the little boy play with the rods in his own way."

Among many other things, Holt happily shows up as fraudulent some of the silly notions about the "proper" environments for learning, "structured" vs. "chaotic," and all that sort of thing. (One can begin to see, with horror, how many elements in the loony puritan ethic, those having especially to do with anxiety-propelled "ideas," fears of "free form" flooding one with madness—how these elements find their objective correlative in "structuring.") He cites a project involving a friend of his and the development of ingenious mathematical and logical materials, destined for children's schools. "They found a very interesting thing about the way children reacted to these materials. If, when a child came in for the first time, they tried to get him 'to work' right away, to play some of their games and solve some of their puzzles, they got nowhere. The child would try to do what he was asked to do, but without joy or insight. But if at first they let the child alone for a while, let him play with the materials in his own way, they got very different results." The kids did all kinds of things, messed about, worked up fantasies, and so on. Holt continues: "When, through such play and fantasy, the children had taken these materials into their minds, mentally swallowed and digested them, so to speak, they were then ready and willing to play very complicated games, that in the more organized and business-like situation had left other children completely baffled. This proved to be so consistently true that the experimenters made it a rule always to let children have a period of completely free play with the materials, before asking them to do directed work with them."

How Children Learn, like all other first-rate books, is really about a great deal more than its stated subject. It is a calm, penetrating and extremely revealing examination of American mores, from top to bottom. If you want to get a slightly better understanding, for example, of why so many thousands of Americans, all of them products of the schooling system here under discussion, are quite able to do the unspeakable things they are doing in Vietnam—from burning people alive to later "pacifying" the lucky remainders—read this book. It should make you cry.

THEATRE

HAROLD CLURMAN

Look out for the Open Theatre! According to a recent announcement it is "a group of approximately thirty-five: directors, actors and playwrights, who have been experimenting with new theatrical forms for the past five years. From time to time it has given informal programs of improvisations and short plays in various Off-Off Broadway houses. The Off-Broadway productions of Viet Rock and America Hurrah! grew from our work. . . ." The signatories of this statement are the troupe's director, Joseph Chaikin and Jean-Claude van Itallie, the author of America Hurrah!

Though its heart was in the right place I was not enthusiastic about Viet Rock, produced independently two seasons ago. I admire the Motel episode of America Hurrah! which is still running at the Pocket Theatre on Third Avenue. Last week I attended an evening at the Village Gate of songs and skits given as a benefit for the purpose of providing the company with the means to accept an invitation to appear at various European theatre festivals. I paid for my tickets and enjoyed what I saw.

Pleasure was aroused by the company's spirit. It had dedication and vigor. Someone suggested that it promises the recrudescence in the sixties of the "fervent years" of an earlier time. Maybe so. It is, at any rate, a healthy theatre expression of the moment. What its eventual destiny is to be is a matter of conjecture. The theatre, though composed of individuals, does not depend on them alone but on a complex of external circumstances.

The Open Theatre is not literary; it stresses the purely theatrical: sights and sounds, movement, acrobatics, a kind of juvenescent festiveness—not quite “Dionysiac.” It is motivated by social as well as histrionic ardor. Besides the songs, rock and roll anti-war doggerel (of which I could not distinguish the words, though the sense was clear enough), the benefit program consisted of pantomime, improvisations and two playlets, one by Ionesco and another by Brecht. Most of this was aesthetically raw but full of Village verve. The effect was tonic.

What is the “message”? Apart from reaching for “new forms”—none of them actually new but a departure from the commercial commonplace—what is revealed are some of the basic tensions of the day. The first number, for example, was a silently rhythmic exposition of our impulses toward fraternity or at the very least the sensory contact people naturally desire to have with one another, followed by an even stronger loathing of proximity. Changes were rung on this motif, for instance in the actors’ pleasurable awareness of the audience and then their equal animosity toward it, or again the hope for release from anxiety through exhaustion in unbridled fun and games: in short, the polarity of mutual attraction and revulsion.

Another was a mock doxology with the WASP minister invoking love for man and God while enjoining both to rip the guts out of our enemies. The congregation’s “amens” echoed the clergyman’s prayer, dutifully or with barely repressed profanities, while an obscene epilogue of almost impersonal sexuality ended the scene.

Later on we were shown synoptic dramatic structures which impugn the male adequacy of our population and the consequent quasi-spastic gyrations of its womanhood. Events were celebrated in songs of dazed sadness accompanied by exhaustingly jittery trances.

Ionesco’s skit Foursome is an epigram exemplifying the pigheaded hostility within the human species that leads it to battle over often absurdly trivial causes which are utterly forgotten in the ensuing slaughter. Brecht’s Clown Play is a pantomime illustrating the progressive dismemberment of “Mr. Smith”—little Everyman—to the tune of circus jingles.

In short we are living in a murderous world of shattered nerves and fractured faiths against which we can cry out with lusty imprecations and take hope in our still vibrant capacity for protest. Our very curses, the actors of the Open Theatre seem to be saying, bear witness to our innate appetite for life. They “dance wildly to keep their balance.” The Open Theatre’s motto might be the line from Aeschylus: “Shout, ye people, the chanting is done.”

The actors mix with the audience, join them at their tables (if any), but best of all they throw themselves into their tasks with considerable bodily abandon. In this respect they are children compared to the young folk in certain of the newer theatres in Czechoslovakia and Poland, but then these Americans haven’t the facilities for training afforded the stage aspirants of those “backward” countries. The Open Theatre actors signal something good taking seed in and out of our theatre, but to grow they will have to develop an authoritative voice, one or more dramatists to give their speech coherence and their thrust effective aim. Otherwise they will remain augurs without artistic issue.

The Open Theatre is one rivulet of a current in dramatic entertainments and demonstrations in the streets, meeting places, union halls and the like. None of this is altogether indigenous with us although it recalls fairs and frolics around campfires, in saloons or boats of our virtually forgotten past. But Les Ballets Africains in a limited engagement at the Mark Hellinger Theatre brings us the real thing from French Guinea.

Their ritual dances and festive folklore are the fruit of an age-old tradition. They are truly of the land and of its people and not of a formal boxed-in art we call “theatre.” Theirs is a tribal expression which sprang into being in their fields, hamlets, town squares and streets, dating from ancient times down to the present day. At Les Ballets Africains we are allowed a glimpse of the theatre’s roots as one reads about them in history books or at lectures in drama courses.

What a riotous evening! I cannot say whether the overwhelming exuberance and physical endurance of the company are due to aboriginal racial traits or to these combined with extraordinary practice plus the particular endowment of the participants, but I don’t remember ever before having seen such a display of fiercely exultant agility. Here we witness wild excitement, a great rough sweetness, a constantly bounding and bursting drive of irrepressible human energy. The frenzy of our bands, discothèques and dervish hippies are kindergarten merriments compared to this Ensemble Artistique et Culturel de La République de Guinée. The color is amazingly varied, running a gamut from primitive ceremonial dress to the more recent modes—rich and poor—of the encroaching industrial habit.

All this bespeaks a rich, turbulent, still intact nature in vocal and instrumental sound. One seems to hear the hourly voices of the dawn, the dusk and the night, the ululation of strange birds and beasts, the hissing, chirping, cooing of to us unknown fauna which are familiar and almost domestic to the singers, musicians and dancers of these African scenes.

There is no “composition” to them, no center or aesthetically conceived focus. They were not designed for the stage as we know it. They are meant to spill out and to spread through a neighborhood, a country horizon. Go, be astonished and

A DISTINGUISHED STAR!
A BRILLIANT FAUSTUS!

COLUMBIA PICTURES
Presents
THE BURTONS PRODUCTION

DOCTOR FAUSTUS

Starring
RICHARD BURTON
and
ELIZABETH TAYLOR

THE OXFORD UNIVERSITY DRAMATIC SOCIETY

Music Composed and Conducted by MARIO NASCIMBENE
Adapted for the Screen by NEVILL COGHILL
Screenplay by RICHARD BURTON and RICHARD MCMHORTER
Directed by RICHARD BURTON and NEVILL COGHILL - Technicolor

AMERICAN PREMIERE NOW

THE paronet
59th St. at 3rd Ave. - EL 5-1663-4
A WALTER READE THEATRE

learn there is still lava under the earth's crust and that some of it still courses in some folk's veins—a fact that should awaken us from our lethargy and make us rejoice.

The second presentation of the Negro Ensemble Company season (St. Marks Playhouse, 133 Second Avenue) is Ray Lawler's Summer of the Seventeenth Doll. I reviewed this play from London (where it was a success) in the spring of 1957, and Robert Hatch reviewed its New York performance the following fall. We both liked the play, but it failed on Broadway, probably because, oddly enough, The New York Times critic said he couldn't understand the Australian "dialect"!

The locale of the play has been changed from its original setting "down under" to New Orleans. Otherwise it is much the same play, and still good. It is a better piece of writing than Peter Weiss's "documentary" about Portuguese Africa which preceded it at the "Ensemble" but not as complete a production. It is nevertheless worth seeing because of the quality of the text, some individual performances and the general cordiality in the atmosphere of the theatre—company and audience—as a whole. Two workers have been coming for a five-month love spree with their particular female counterparts down from cold country at Christmas to where there is warmer weather at that time. The men offer the girls presents each time they make their "honeymoon" trip. Every year the older of the two men brings a doll which has become for the girl an emblem of the enchanted season she and her lover spend together.

The play takes place in the summer of the seventeenth doll. None of the amorous quartet is young now. The younger man's former girl has married a local fellow; a neighborhood widow has been invited to replace her. The play's main theme is the precarious realization of age, the passing of youthful potency of the spine, the vertebrae and in venery.

But the play goes beyond this. The two men are still relatively robust; the older one offers to settle down in New Orleans with his girl and marry her. But she won't have it so; the offer of marriage fills her with fear. It means the end of romance, the abandonment of that oasis of glamour in her drab everyday life. For her the tranquillity of a settled household means nothing but days of quiet desperation—the lot of the common citizen.

There is a certain poignancy in this comedy, implicit in the humorously truthful depiction of its single characters. For all its modest realism, the play has a larger dimension than its slight plot might indicate. Some of it is hilarious; most of it is surprisingly touching.

Moses Gunn, as one of the men, has a moral as well as a physical stature and a finely resonant voice with a slight humanizing "break" in it which contribute to his imposing stage personality. He and others play well (though two members of the cast are too young for their roles), but they might play better if the direction did not press them to "results," that is, points and postures—especially in pathos—of conventional theatrics. Also, violence or overdramatization of effect at times reduce the play's fundamental seriousness.

Only this remains to be said: the first favorable impression made by the Negro Ensemble two months ago was no fluke: it's a sound company and we can look forward to its further development with confidence.

FILMS

ROBERT HATCH

Given the chance, would you prevent the human race? That is the central issue in Planet of the Apes, a science fiction picture based on a novel by Pierre Boulle, celebrated previously for The Bridge on the River Kwai. The virtue of good science fiction is that it formulates basic questions in new ways; the weakness of even the best of it is that it does not pursue such questions very far, being distracted by suspense, exoticism and mechanical wonders.

There are no mechanical wonders in Planet of the Apes, aside from the spaceship whose voyage ends in the first ten minutes of the film, but otherwise the judgment holds. Three astronauts have landed on a planet where apes are the dominant species and man exists as a vegetarian plains animal, running in considerable herds. The apes hunt these fleet creatures on horseback, partly to hold down their numbers, partly to keep watch for signs of incipient humanity. The spacemen are caught up in one such drive, and one of them, Charlton Heston, survives to become a bone of contention between a pair of iconoclastic young anthropoid scientists and the senior member of the academy who is also the foremost keeper of the faith. This latter has his own reasons for insisting that dogma shall take precedence over knowledge, and you can perhaps carry the theme from there.

Planet of the Apes is interesting in a boring sort of way. The central situation is attractive and the physical details are ingenious, but the story development is unaspiring and the dialogue stultifying. It was a good idea, in this rejection of humanity, not to glorify the apes in utopian sentimentality. They are crude, limited, brutal from lack of imagination, and organized in a rigid theocracy. Their virtues are that they do not despoil their environment and do not prey on their own kind.

On the other hand, Maurice Evans, Roddy McDowall, Kim Hunter, James Whitmore and the rest are utterly expressionless in their mobile ape masks and the dialogue given them never raises their roles above puppetry. Thus, Heston has to play the human race in a black and white that scores a number of easy points but will seem oversimplified to anyone familiar with the species. I think the picture is worth seeing, if you go in a popcorn state of mind.

You don't have to be Jewish to love Sidney Lumet's Bye Bye Braverman, but it helps a lot to be a New Yorker. I'm not certain why a picture set in one's own territory is so gratifying: perhaps it is the flattering implication that you live and work in places someone thinks interesting enough to put on film.

SANDY DENNIS · KEIR DULLEA · ANNE HEYWOOD
AS ELLEN MARSH

Between Ellen
and Jill came Paul...

IN D. H. LAWRENCE'S
THE FOX
—symbol of the male—

Presented by THE JOINT CENSORED and HONORARY BOARD - Produced by RAYMOND STROSS - Directed by MARK RYDELL
Color by DeLuxe - From CLARIDGE PICTURES

VICTORIA / THE FESTIVAL A WINTER BEAD THEATRE

B'WAY & 42nd ST. - JU 6-0540 57th St. at 5th Ave. - LI 1-1115

This new book FREE to each new subscriber to The NATION

$5 at retail, it's FREE with each NEW subscription

The good fight is now in
THE NATION
—why not join now?

In past wars, Americans have “submitted with surprising docility to the draft,” Jean Carper reports in this issue of The Nation.

But this is not true of the current war waged by the United States in Vietnam.

The history of the U.S. draft, the purposes its labyrinths are intended to conceal, and well-documented evidence to encourage the growing resistance to it, are told in Miss Carper's new book, Bitter Greetings.

Bitter Greetings brings valuable information about the confrontation between the Administration leadership and the military on the one side, and the doubts, disenchantment, and unambivalent opposition of civilians on the other.

We'll be glad to send this valuable book free to each new subscriber. If you've thought of subscribing to The Nation, why not do so today?

To join the good fight, clip out and send to:

The NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll sign up for one year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me, FREE, Jean Carper's new book, BITTER GREETINGS.

☐ I'll try you for a half year (24 issues). I enclose $6.

Name

Street

City State Zip

N 3-11

In this case, though, the city has been made the love interest of the picture. It is a great day in early summer, and from Sheridan Square to Far Rockaway the metropolis sparkles as though it were young and fresh from a bath. New York is no doubt the dirtiest, most crowded, most exhausting city on earth, but, as New Yorkers know, you also get Sundays in June.

For the rest, the movie is a stock item of folklore: the clowns in search of the funeral. Braverman has dropped dead, he is to be buried from a funeral home somewhere out in Brooklyn, and four of his friends set out to find the place. They are full of the memory of Braverman, but fuller yet of their own preoccupations, vanities, fears and needs. These four—George Segal, Jack Warden, Joseph Wiseman and Sorrell Brooke—play types, maybe stereotypes, so one must be on guard. However, I saw no offense, except perhaps in a tasteless scene with Godfrey Cambridge who plays a Negro convert to Judaism, and the worst of that passage was that it tried so hard and so unsuccessfully to be funny.

The picture is not exactly Sholem Aleichem, but neither is it mean. It doesn't make the mistake of patronizing these Jews by making them lovable, but it does just allow them to be likable; and I'm not going to let the Anti-Defamation League con me out of saying that modern urban Jewry has developed a gallery of personality styles that can be defined by fraternal caricature. Bye Bye Braverman is very slight, but it has a quota of gentle laughter. And the helicopter shots of bridges, elevated lines and expressways, the street-scene kaleidoscope of upper West Side, lower East Side, Bay Ridge, Flatbush and Prospect Park, give a hint of why John Lindsay ever wanted to be mayor of the place.

sources, would be more critical, responsible and knowledgeable interrogators. They have the lever of executive-legislative accountability.

Another example of news management was President Johnson's three-network rocking-chair television appearance last December. When a program guest makes the decision on timing and format, when he controls the production, direction and editing, he doesn't make news; he makes propaganda. Only one network (C.B.S.) announced it had help from the President. The other two presented the programs as if they truly were productions of their own news departments.

The most convenient, direct form of propaganda is one's own weekly program, a recent development of which Mayors John V. Lindsay of New York and Sam Yorty of Los Angeles are notable practitioners. Several considerations secured this unfiltered pipe line to the public. Both have show-business savvy. Second, American television, a licensed activity, has a bias toward power. A chief executive has power, and broadcasting is susceptible to the slightest governmental pressure. Finally, there is the traditional definition of news. A mayor, governor or President does not make news so much as he is news. The system overwhelmingly favors the ins over the outs, as the Republicans, Sen. Eugene McCarthy and other minorities are fully aware.

TELEVISION JOHN HORN

The spread of propaganda by television has acquired several degrees of sophistication since Richard M. Nixon, like a wind-up doll, played piano for Jack Paar four years ago. A recent example of the new look was the White House arrangement of a special Meet The Press appearance by Secretaries Dean Rusk and Robert McNamara early in February, which resulted in two stories and a photograph on the front page of next day's New York Times, plus another story and a half page of transcript excerpts inside. The Times and N.B.C. apparently believe this good journalism. When the President can order a command performance from a network and by his Cabinet officers, designating in advance who shall sit on the panel, it is also good controlled news.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee wants to know why the Secretary of State finds an N.B.C. television program a more suitable forum than open-committee sessions—which Mr. Rusk has been declining for two years on the ground that the situation in Vietnam is too "delicate." The reason is simple. Meet The Press is a controlled environment: limited questions by a limited number of reporters, with little power to press for answers. Senators, who don't have to be respectful to their news

An even more deplorable form of propaganda is the increasing special-plea or good-guy appearance by men in public life on television's entertainment shows. Jim Garrison, district attorney of New Orleans, continues to try his conspiracy charges in the assassination of President Kennedy out of court. His latest appearance, January 31, found him giving hearsay evidence to comedian Johnny Carson, of all people, about Jack Ruby's being in the vicinity of the Dealey Plaza grassy knoll an hour before the slaying.

Sen. Jacob Javits (R., N.Y.) has made small talk with his host on the Merv Griffin Show. And Mrs. Lyndon B. Johnson was booked into a "nonpolitical" appearance on the Today show, as though sympathetic mass-media exposure in an election year could be anything but political.

It was perhaps inevitable, since commercial television is largely given to entertainment and selling, that public figures would insinuate themselves in these areas. (Thoughtful talks or debates on substantive issues are not conducive to high ratings.) But it hardly speaks well for the state of our civilization, justice and sanity that we try criminal cases on variety shows on days when our lawmakers or their wives are not joshing with the emcees.

PUBLICATIONS

DEBATE THE ANTIBALLISTIC MISSILE—pros and cons on the deployment of the ABM; 11 articles prepared by military and political experts. Pp. 169. Paper, $1.50; Hardbound, $5. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, 5201 Kimbark, Chicago, Illinois 60615

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

BOOK BARGAINS!! Both new and used. Free lists. Also free search elusive titles. Harco, Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032

BOOKPLATES

FREE CATALOG—beautiful designs for every age and taste. Special designing too. Address: BOOKPLATES, Yellow Springs 2, Ohio.

ART

WOULD YOU BELIEVE? EXCITING ORIGINAL woodcuts, etchings, lithos, $4.50 each. Subscription information: Graphic Circle, (N), 65 Fifth Avenue, New York City 10011

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 3-11-68
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10011

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

Name

Address

City

State..... Zip No.....

Crossword Puzzle No. 1240

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 It's of no purpose to honor inordinate pride. (9)
- 6 Divides tenor and bass, perhaps. (5)
- 9 Allow this sort of language? (7)
- 10 Is the Brooklyn, for example, cut short?
- 12 See 6 down.
- 15 Trucks sometimes put on covers, but the Highway Commission might not let them. (8)
- 16 With us, this workroom would be given to deep thought. (6)
- 18 Classifying what the office girl might be doing. (6)
- 20 Do cuts in deductions from the nominal value? (8)
- 23 Press club? (4)
- 24 and 28 Doesn't sound like the first visitor should be thought of after the fact! (6-7)
- 25, 11 and 13 Prevent a number of passes from being caught, and then prepare for the blow! (6, 4)
- 28 See 24 across.
- 29 You might have striven this way in reverses? (7)
- 30 Such tactics might get you right to 27 down. (5)
- 31 False conceptions in old 27 might be wrong. (9)

DOWN:

- 1 Man for man? (5)
- 2 In ten seconds it should start to be acute. (7)
- 3 One might be opposed to the Guelphs.

- 4 Hopi indian, but not in make-up of the Brotherhood of the Serpent? (8)
- 5 Has a desire for some time to get a couple of points. (6)
- 6 and 12 across Left behind, giving an advance indication. (10)
- 7 Cherry tree, for example? No, a coniferous type. (7)
- 8 Firm the majority hinder in the extreme. (9)
- 14 Securities about took a header, according to European fliers. (5, 5)
- 15 Float on one side, rather peculiar for a boat! (9)
- 17 Felis leo, for example? It's just an expression! (8)
- 19 What they do to films and food nowadays. (7)
- 21 Might be taken raw or burnt to a king.
- 22 How the field might be prepared for the best players, presumably. (6)
- 26 It takes two narwhals to have a pair.
- 27 Adversity's are reputedly sweet. (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1239

ACROSS: 1 and 7 down Landing strips; 5 Putter; 10 Cover; 11 Transmits; 12 Enclave; 13 Presser; 14 Misses; 15 Ratline; 18, 24 and 30 Present company excepted; 21 Ascots; 26 Tutored; 27 Alabaster; 28 Caret; 29 Sestet. DOWN: 1 Licked; 2 Novocaine; 3 Inroads; 4 Gutters; 6 Unspent; 8 Reserves; 9 Pamper; 16 Interpret; 17 Specials; 19 Emanate; 20 Trysts; 21 Anthrax; 22 Cuticle; 23 Edited; 25 Meals.

PERSONALS

Searching?

It's not enough to just "know thyself." COM/PAIR, the "people-matching-people" of Princeton speed your research. It's a way to meet a truly interesting match. National, international clients. $10.00 fee payable when you return questionnaire. Request free questionnaire from COM/PAIR Systems. NR9, 194 Nassau, Princeton, N.J.

COM/PAIR SYSTEMS, Inc., Dept. N
194 Nassau St., Princeton, N.J. 08540

© Copyright 1966 COM/PAIR Systems Inc.

TYPING WORRIES??? Expert Typing, Reasonable Rates. Manuscripts, doctoral and masters theses our specialty. Call (201) 667-5145

FIGHT JUNK MAIL. Send it back at THEIR expense. Labels and instruction $1.00. Artichoke, P.O. Box 9123C, Bridgeport, Connecticut 06601

INTERESTED IN LIFE? Believe men should live each day to the fullest? So do humanists. For information write: Dept. N-1, American Humanist Association, 125 El Camino del Mar, San Francisco, Calif. 94121.

DISCOVER an intriguing, fun approach to meeting alert, literate Jewish singles. No computers used. For FREE analytical questionnaire write: Dept. N, OPERATION MAZELTOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036. (PL 7-3638)

"McCarthy in '68", "Reagan & Lassie in '68", "Dump Johnson in '68", "LBJ for Ex-President", "RFK in '68", "The Governor of Alabama is a Mother", "Draft Beer, Not Students", "Kill for Peace", "Stop the War", "Ban Napalm", "Give LBJ the Bird", "Make Love Not War", "Studying Causes Cancer", "Legalize Pot", "Incest Begins at Home", "Chaste Makes Waste", "Hands Off Tim Leary", "Make War on Poverty, Not People", "Sex Before Finals", "Apple Pie Makes you Sterile", "Melt General Hershey". King-Size bumperstrips. 2/$1, 5/$2, 15/$5. TOPP, P.O. Box 1802-N, Chicago, Ill. 60690

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE

(Computerized Matching—All Ages)
"Let TEAM make you a team."

Write:

TEAM Project

245 East 30th Street
New York, N.Y. 10016, Phone 889-6020

DID YOU GO TO THE USSR IN 1933-34-35? Meet for reunion sponsored by the CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS, CEC Building, 10 West 46th Street, N.Y.C. 10036—(212) LT 1-8113.

EDUCATIONAL

TOUGHEST CURRICULUM IN THE COUNTRY: You design it. Convince us you can help make a new kind of college work. Write: Admissions N, Franconia College, Franconia, N.H. 03580.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Mrs. Martin Luther King, Jr. H. Stuart Hughes

984 Memorial Drive, Cambridge, Mass. 02138

Dear Friends:

We do not like to think that one man can stand between the American people and their will to end the terrible war in Vietnam. But it is clear that, as long as Lyndon Johnson is President of the United States, the killing will not stop. And as long as the war continues, the threat of an even wider and more disastrous conflagration looms over us all. The struggle for peace is, then, the struggle to turn Lyndon Johnson out of the White House.

The Presidential candidacy of Senator Eugene McCarthy gives us the opportunity to turn our protest to politics, and to join with millions of our fellow citizens in the effort to restore our government to the people.

Alone among public officials, Eugene McCarthy has had the courage to challenge Lyndon Johnson where he is most vulnerable: in the political arena. Eugene McCarthy is not content with an occasional speech against a particular aspect of the war policy. He knows that war is wrong, and that it must be brought quickly to an end. And he knows further that only when this war ends can we even begin to tackle the smoldering crises of racial injustice, economic deprivation, and urban squalor which so afflict our country. Where others have taken cover, not daring to challenge the President, Eugene McCarthy has carried the issue of peace directly to the American people. He is a candidate for President in the Democratic primaries in New Hampshire, Wisconsin, Massachusetts, Oregon, and California. And if he wins these primaries, the Johnson candidacy will have been dealt a devastating blow. Certainly, we, who have for so long sought to alert our nation to the dangers of a belligerent foreign policy, would be irresponsible if we did not make Senator McCarthy's effort our own. The Johnson machine is unscrupulous and it is rich. To defeat it will take vast energies and vast sums. But this can be done—with your help. Please send as large a contribution as you can today. Make checks payable to McCARTHY FOR PRESIDENT.

Thank you very much.

Mrs. Martin Luther King, Jr.
H. Stuart Hughes

NOTE: These funds will be allotted by McCarthy national headquarters to the most crucial primary campaigns.

Mrs. Martin Luther King, Jr.
and Prof. H. Stuart Hughes
984 Memorial Drive
Cambridge, Massachusetts 02138

Dear Mrs. King and Professor Hughes:

- ☐ Enclosed is my contribution of _____ to help elect Senator Eugene McCarthy as President of the United States.
- ☐ I wish to make a substantial contribution.
Please have someone call me.

Name

Address

City State Zip

Vocation

BURLINGAME
MAR 20 1968
LIBRARY

HARRY GOLDEN

THE

NATION

MARCH 18, 1968 35 cents

California Maelstrom

The Politics of Desperation

PHIL KERBY

Last Summer in Cambridge

YOUNG RADICALS AND THE FEAR OF POWER

KENNETH KENISTON

Cleveland's 100 Days

The Education of Carl Stokes

ADELE ZEIDMAN SILVER

THE DOUBLE HELIX

J. BRONOWSKI

3-21-68 PLS-149
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

NEWSPAPER

LETTERS

peace and McCarthy

La Jolla, Calif.

DEAR SIR: In your issue of Feb. 19 [editorial: "Thoughts in a Dry Season"] you suggest that . . . Peace and Freedom Party members register in order to vote for McCarthy in the Democratic primary. There is a general tone of condemnation for those in the anti-war movement who will not support McCarthy. There are a number of reasons why the Peace and Freedom Party does not support McCarthy and why we are not only encouraging Peace and Freedom Party members to stay registered in the Peace and Freedom Party but are trying to obtain new registrants as well.

We are unconvinced that McCarthy is part of the peace movement, much less that he is capable of leading it anywhere but back into the Johnson camp in November. The Nation in its initial response to his candidacy pointed out that he had never voted against any of the war measures in the Senate as have Morse, Gruening, Young and some others. His peace plan is barely distinguishable from that of Johnson. He apparently would urge the North Vietnamese to negotiate in return for a bombing halt. The terms might be slightly more generous than those offered presently. McCarthy has yet to say what he would do in the very likely event his overtures fall on the same deaf ear that does not hear the present proposals. . . . The Peace and Freedom Party has always said unequivocally that we are for an immediate withdrawal from Vietnam. . . .

In most of California the registration drive for the Peace and Freedom Party was carried on as a genuine attempt to build a new party. Prospective registrants were told that they could re-register in another party but they were urged to commit themselves to the new party. In these counties we have had little trouble holding our registrations. . . . In some counties the registration drive was carried on in the way that you suggest. People were told to vote against Johnson twice, McCarthy in June and Peace and Freedom in November. In these counties the Peace and Freedom organization is disintegrating and there will be no local candidates in June or November and a feeble McCarthy candidacy in June. . . . If the White House were looking for a way to destroy peace candidates there could be no more clever ploy than a McCarthy candidacy.

Francis R. Halpern, Chairman San Diego County Peace and Freedom Party

peace and the Peace Corps

Bronx, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: After Gerald D. Berreman's article ("The Peace Corps: A Dream Betrayed"; The Nation, Feb. 26), your readers may be interested in one way out of moral imperialism that is already available.

UNESCO gift coupons enable recipients to buy needed books and equipment free of currency and import controls. The coupons are a kind of international money order—available in $10, $50 and $100 denominations—aiding literacy projects, World University Service, and the Freedom from Hunger Campaign.

For further information, please write UNESCO Gift Coupon Office, Room 2201, United Nations, N.Y. 10017.

George Koski, Pastor
Bernadotte Lutheran Church

Chevy Chase, Md.

DEAR SIR: Prof. Gerald D. Berreman's article is a shotgun attack on the Peace Corps in which the author seeks to

(Continued on page 378)

EDITORIALS

Which War?

In only one respect is the report of the President's Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders stronger and broader than we had anticipated ("The Fact-Finding Charade" by Sherwood Ross, March 4). So far as the findings are concerned, they have been made before, as Dr. Martin Luther King observes, "almost to the last detail and have been ignored almost to the last detail." But as an essay in political leadership, the commission's unanimous summary is a first-rate document. It places prime responsibility for the disorders where it properly belongs—on the white community—and the force and directness of its basic conclusion are inescapable: the nation is moving toward two societies, one black, one white, separate but unequal.

By posing the problem in these terms, the commission has raised the dominant political issue of 1968 in such a way that it can hardly be ignored. For while the commission does not directly relate the war in Vietnam to this "other war," it does stress the fact that "there can be no higher priority for national action and no higher claim on the nation's conscience" than to take whatever steps are necessary to end the trend toward separate but hostile societies.

The rough estimate which the commission made of the cost of implementing its recommendations is substantially the equivalent of what we are currently spending to carry on a disastrous, and rapidly escalating, war in Vietnam. It is begging the question to argue, as the Administration does, that in theory we could fight both wars at the same time: the fact is that resources of manpower and materiel are limited and that we must therefore choose which war we intend to wage. In Vietnam we are fighting an undeclared war which may well lead us into World War III; on the other front we have not even begun to fight the war against poverty which the Administration declared with such fanfare.

The President is well aware of the potency of the priorities issue. He appointed the commission because he wanted to divert attention from it, knowing that the commission's recommendations would come too late for the summer of 1968 and fiscal 1969. By appointing the commission he was able to stall for seven months, during which something might have been done to prevent a recurrence of last year's disorders.

That very little has been done is demonstrated in a detailed three-state survey conducted by The New York Times (March 5). No wonder the commission's report now has the President's staff "weaving, ducking and dodging." The silence of the President—his failure to emphasize the importance of the report or swing into action behind its recommendations—simply points up the dilemma he now faces. He cannot carry on the war in Vietnam and carry out the recommendations of the report. So he is sulking, and is said to feel that the commission should have patted him on the back for past gestures and achievements and condemned Congress and the public. But Congress is right in feeling that both wars cannot be fought at the same time. It is one or the other.

The commission's summary not only raises the priorities question in bold and dramatic terms; it appeals for support to the new constituencies that just might, if properly combined, constitute the winning political coalition of the future. And, as a windfall benefit, it identifies John V. Lindsay with the leadership of the forces now beginning to demand a reordering of our national priorities. Dr. King, with the political instinct that so seldom fails him, has seized the initiative by shrewdly relating plans for the "nonviolent poor people's march on Washington," scheduled for April 22, to the commission's report and recommendations. For the first time an effort will be made in this demonstration to link the war against poverty and discrimination with a campaign to end the war in Vietnam. "Flame throwers in Vietnam fan the flames in our cities," he has said. "I don't think the two matters can be separate as some people continue to feel . . . The commission's report is a physician's warning of approaching death [of American society] with a prescription to life. The duty of every American is to administer the remedy without regard to the cost and without delay."

The Dropouts

Or you could call them defectors—but not the kind that Americans like to hear about. These are the defectors who have changed their minds about the Vietnamese War. Once they supported it, or kept quiet; now they oppose it. Some speak out, some only act, but their names carry so much weight that they drag others in their wake.

The dropouts are of all kinds. Probably the most stunning, as far as the Johnson Administration's feelings are concerned, is the scientist George Kistiakowsky, professor of chemistry at Harvard, one of the creators of the atomic bomb and for years a key adviser to the Department of Defense. He has withdrawn from all government activities directly related to the Vietnamese War. Radical tendencies are the last thing Dr. Kistiakowsky can be accused of. He was born in Kiev in 1900 and joined the White Army fighting the Bolsheviks. He fought in this hopeless cause for two years, then made his way to Western Europe and finally, in 1926, to the United States.

As if to rub it in, Kistiakowsky received the National Medal of Science at the hands of President Johnson just two weeks ago, and in 1964 he was one of the organizers of the committee of scientists and engineers who supported Johnson. This despite the fact that among the jobs he has held was that of special assistant for science and technology to President Eisenhower (1959-61). After his return to Harvard, he continued to advise the President and the Defense Department. Now he is described as "deeply distressed" over the course the war has taken, he just can't bring himself to have anything more to do with it.

Another one-time Presidential expert is Richard N. Goodwin. He was one of President Kennedy's principal advisers and a speech writer for both Mr. Kennedy and Mr. Johnson; his close connections with Sen. Robert Kennedy are well known. Lately he has been writing and

IN THIS ISSUE

March 18, 1968

EDITORIALS

362

ARTICLES

366 California Maelstrom:

The Politics of Desperation

Phil Kerby

370 Last Summer in Cambridge:

Young Radicals & the Fear of Power

Kenneth Keniston

374 Harry Golden

Journalism on the Air:

375 The Seven O'Clock Supermen

Desmond Smith

377 TV's First Real Paper

Michael Harris

379 Cleveland's 100 Days:

The Education of Carl Stokes

Adele Zeidman Silver

BOOKS & THE ARTS

381 Honest Jim and the

Tinker Toy Model

J. Bronowski

382 A Biography of His Age

Dan Levin

384 Exploring Inner Space

Paul Zweig

386 Three Poems About Che

Lawrence Swaim

Stanley Moss

Peter L. Simpson

387 Man With A Mission

F. A. Macklin

388 Theatre

Harold Clurman

390 Television

John Horn

391 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-2533. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office. Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION

Volume 206

No. 12

teaching at M.I.T. The other day he enlisted in the campaign of Senator McCarthy and is now helping out in the New Hampshire and Wisconsin primaries. "I've just felt so guilty sitting at home and reading the papers," says Goodwin. "It's better to be fighting than agonizing at home." What does RFK think of Mr. Goodwin's decision? Goodwin doesn't know. He didn't ask Kennedy. He made his own decision, and it was on the ground that "if you believe something is deeply wrong with the direction of your society, you should try to do something to change it."

Similarly, Louis G. Halle, a former member of the State Department's Policy Planning Board and author of The Cold War as History, has written a letter to The New York Times (March 4) in which he refers to the Administration's policy in Vietnam as "intellectual bankruptcy" and suggests that the time has come for the Congress to block any further legislation leading to an increase of our military commitment, thus forcing those conducting the war to "face the need of some alternative to the impractical military way out." A move in that direction can be seen in the March 7 Senate debate, led by Senators Fulbright, Mansfield and Robert Kennedy, on the commitment of additional forces to the war.

Among elected politicians, eighteen House Democrats on March 4 urged the Administration to make clear that it would accept a Vietnam settlement that would give the Vietcong a role in the selection of a new government for South Vietnam. This, of course, is precisely what Secretary Rusk, in particular, will allow to be done over his dead body. A novelty in the pronouncement of these eighteen Northern liberals is that four of them—Ottinger, Rees, Reuss and Scheuer—indicated at a news conference that they were prepared to vote against appropriations to send more troops to Vietnam.

Also in the political area, Tilford E. Dudley, Democratic chairman for Washington, D.C., has split with his party organization over Mr. Johnson's war policy and will not be on the ticket for the national convention. Earlier this year, Mr. Dudley had tried unsuccessfully to have a question on Vietnamese policy placed on the primary ballot.

Another category of informed dropouts is that of the journalists. One press defector is Peregrine Worsthorne, whose name could have come out of an Anthony Trollope novel but whom The Christian Science Monitor describes as "one of the warmest journalistic friends of the United States in the British islands." Writing on the editorial page of the conservative London Sunday Telegraph, Mr. Worsthorne declares that he has "defended the war most vehemently" but that justifications now stick in his throat. The revulsion of world opinion is reaching crisis proportions; before the eyes of mankind, Vietnam is being destroyed by American military power and the refusal of the Vietnamese to yield. "I cannot help concluding," says Mr. Worsthorne, "that what is being demonstrated today is not the validity of American protection but its brutal impotence: not the point of resisting Communist subversion but its ghastly futility." Exit Mr. Worsthorne.

Walter Cronkite is the C.B.S. anchor man in TV news-casting. He went to Vietnam two years ago and came back "feeling that really we were doing the right thing and were moving ahead." He went a second time in February and on his return dropped out editorially, first in a special report on the night of March 5 and then in his nightly news show. His disillusionment was reluctant; he still talked of our obligation to preserve freedom in Southeast Asia (isn't it tyranny that we have been supporting?), but we had been deceived too often by the optimism of our leaders, and the war just couldn't be won that way. "The only rational way out," Cronkite concludes, "will be to negotiate, not as victors but as honorable people who lived up to their pledge to defend democracy and did the best they could."

Such is a partial roster of the dropouts as of this writing. An odd point may now strike the observant reader: here are all these men of influence mutating from hawks to doves, but has anyone heard of a single dove turning into a hawk? In fact, it isn't really odd: the United States took the wrong course, got itself into a fearful mess, and now all its friends, at home and abroad, want to see it get out—and the sooner the better.

Kidding the Public

Some years ago, somebody wrote a book called How To Lie With Statistics. The art still flourishes, but it is high time that a knowledgeable observer did a parallel exposé on the hoodwinking of the public by pollsters. Not that reputable polling organizations like Gallup and Harris set out to deceive anyone, nor that they are not as scientific in their approach as they can manage. But the results of these surveys are taken far more seriously than they deserve. So many irrelevant factors enter into the tests of public opinion that a fluctuation from one week to the next, or even one month to the next, may not mean very much. Often polling is no more than a pseudo-scientific procedure which has about as much validity as observing the flight of birds—a form of divination which survives in the word "auspice."

Perhaps not quite so emphatically, Dr. Leo Bogart has criticized the polling business in the Fall, 1967, issue of The Public Opinion Quarterly, published by Princeton University Press. The title of Dr. Bogart's piece is "No Opinion, Don't Know, and Maybe No Answer." He asks in his preamble: "How meaningful are survey data that emerge from uninformed, apathetic, and indecisive individuals who have conflicting opinions on the same issue, tailor their views to the roles they are playing, and lack any sense of responsibility for, or feeling of personal engagement in, the subject matter of the survey?" The answer is, of course, that such data are meaningful only in the sense that fools rush in where angels fear to tread.

In a democracy fools have as much right to vote as wise men, but the fool's vote should not count for more than the wise man's vote—and yet the polls may be tending in that direction. One variety of political idiot, for instance, wants above all to be on the winning side. When he reads that 71 per cent of the voters (not 70, mind you, nor 72) are inclined to vote for Joe Doakes, he stops using what brains he has and, instead of at least making an effort to compare Joe with his opponent, he jumps on the bandwagon. Thus, by encouraging people to line up on the winning side of questions they have not thought about and have no interest in, we are in some degree acquiescing in the proposition, as Dr. Bogart puts it, "that a democracy should be ruled by the public will, as described by the polls." Democracy has enough troubles without putting its decisions on that basis.

The allocation of precise percentages makes the polls sound more authoritative than they are. Actually public opinion is a volatile conglomerate of feeling, thought, prejudice, projected hostilities, inculcated loyalties, skepticism and what-not. A change in the popularity of the President from one poll to the next may be due not to anything he has done or failed to do but to a widely circulated picture of the careworn grandfather cuddling his daughter's baby in his arms. No one begrudges the President the joys of grandfatherhood, but if it leads to public confidence that he must be doing the right thing in Vietnam, it hardly enhances the health of democracy.

The trouble is that the media, looking for hard news and hard figures in the midst of uncertainty, make too much of the polls. It is a very good thing for the country that the hazards of polling have been brought to public attention by someone in a position to know and who cannot be suspected of having a grudge against the opinion-research industry. There is no danger of that in Dr. Bogart's case. His article is a reprint of his presidential address to the American Association for Public Opinion Research in May, 1967, and he is executive vice president and general manager of the Bureau of Advertising of the American Newspaper Publishers Association.

TV News

The portion of the adult public that places its prime news reliance on television news, which in practical effect means three network news programs, is steadily increasing; the younger the viewing audience, the greater the reliance on network news and the greater the degree of confidence in it. But does television news coverage improve as the public's reliance upon it increases? Or, to put it another way, do network expenditures for news coverage advance proportionately with the public dependence upon it? (See the article by Desmond Smith this issue p. 375). Recently CBS News President Richard Salant announced that C.B.S. would cover Secretary Rusk's forthcoming appearance at public hearings of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee only in the event that N.B.C. failed to do so.

The decision to cover an event of this kind should not be made upon the basis of what a rival network does or does not do but upon the national importance of the event itself. To make the decision turn on what a competitor does is equivalent to saying that economies of news coverage take precedence over the public interest. An incident of this kind should serve as a timely warning of the position the public may well find itself in at some point in the future, given (a) the mortality of newspapers; and (b) the tendency of the networks to minimize expenditures for news coverage. What the networks would like to do, of course, is to induce the Corporation for Public Broadcasting to finance noncommercial video as a "network of record," thereby relieving them of the obligation to carry public service programs. With the increasing public reliance on network television, the FCC should insist on a steady improvement in the scope and quality of TV news coverage. In most instances, this means spending more money on news gathering; but there are other ways to improve television news coverage as Michael Harris' article in this issue (p. 377) indicates.

No Busing for Watts

Los Angeles, which offers less suburban housing to Negroes than Atlanta or New Orleans, has implicitly restated its determination to keep Negro children in their central ghetto. For years, a fog of rhetoric emanating from the Los Angeles Board of Education has frustrated efforts to integrate more than ninety Negro schools. Now the Board's faithful servant, Superintendent of Schools Jack Crowther, has provided Negroes with additional evidence that nothing is going to happen, even though Los Angeles has the fastest growing Negro population of any city in the United States.

After persistent goading from the Southern California American Civil Liberties Union, the Los Angeles Board of Education finally announced last December that it would work toward "an integrated system at all levels and divisions" and instruct its staff to develop "every feasible technique and program to accomplish this goal." Since then, individual members of the board who pushed the hardest for this declaration have gutted it by stating publicly that they did not favor extensive compulsory busing.

A banner-waving, anti-busing audience jammed the Board's small auditorium for Crowther's February 26 re-

ANNOUNCEMENT

Last month the Carolina Israelite suspended publication. Published in Charlotte, N.C., the Israelite has been for twenty-six years the personal voice of Harry Golden who, in its always lively pages, has talked great good sense to a loyal and influential readership on the topics that have engaged his interest and attention. Now, because of personal considerations, Mr. Golden is unable to continue publication of the Israelite, and The Nation has agreed to fulfill its unexpired subscriptions. Israelite subscribers will receive, starting with this issue, four issues of The Nation (up to a full year) for each issue of the Israelite to which they were entitled.

We are pleased that Harry Golden asked us to fulfill the obligations of the Israelite; we welcome these new readers and trust that they will enjoy The Nation. Nation readers, of course, are familiar with Harry Golden's writings. Under his editorship, the Israelite has been a consistent and courageous voice for liberalism in the South, a staunch friend of the Negro, an advocate of civil rights, and a defender of civil liberties. From time to time, beginning with this issue, The Nation will carry a Harry Golden column or page. Mr. Golden, an old friend of the magazine and an occasional contributor, is the author of many successful books, including Only in America.

JAMES J. STORROW JR., PUBLISHER

port, which was to implement the December statement. Crowther recommended against "any projects involving mandatory, large-scale busing primarily for the purposes of integration Parents must have the prerogative of determining whether their children will participate in any program which has integration as a primary thrust and which takes the child away from the home school." This insistence on voluntary busing eliminates the hope for cost-free integration plans, such as pairing black and white schools, that have proved successful in other cities but would require compulsory busing.

Six years ago, the Board of Education formed an ad hoc committee to listen to such proposals. Audiences at the committee meetings were usually almost all black. There was even a period in 1962 when Negroes threatened to boycott a number of all-black schools in an effort to force integration action from the Board of Education. They were dissuaded by a promise of imminent relief.

Two years ago, John and Laree Caughey reviewed the sad struggle that followed in their book, School Segregation on Our Doorstep:

In June the Watts high schools graduated the class of 1966. Having enrolled in the first grade twelve years earlier, these young people might have been the first to be the full beneficiaries of the Supreme Court's landmark decision on school desegregation. But in the Los Angeles ghetto, these students had attended a Negro elementary school, a Negro junior high school and a Negro high school. They had the misfortune to be in a city where the spirit of Brown v. Board of Education was not honored.

In the spring of 1968, Watts couldn't care less what Mr. Crowther proposes, because Watts no longer hopes. The audience that heard his report was almost all white. One batch of anti-integrationists managed, ironically, to charter a Board of Education school bus to bring them to the meeting.

CALIFORNIA MAELSTROM

THE POLITICS OF DESPERATION

PHIL KERBY

Los Angeles

On April 9 at a municipal election, the voters of Beverly Hills, a 5.6-square-mile island of opulence in the surrounding 464 square miles of the city of Los Angeles, will offer their advice to the President of the United States on the war in Vietnam. Placed on the ballot by petition will be the following referendum measure: "Resolved that the city of Beverly Hills inform the President and the Congress of the United States that the city favors an immediate cease-fire and steps toward rapid de-escalation of the war in Vietnam through negotiations with all participants to the conflict, specifically including the National Liberation Front."

If Beverly Hills votes to withdraw from the war (refer-

Class of 1977

When 19-year-old Douglas Rowden of Jacksonville, Ore., received a pre-induction examination notice from his draft board in nearby Medford, his parents strongly objected. "I feel we have done enough for the Vietnam cause," said Harvey Rowden, a sawmill worker. James and John Rowden, both 21, had been killed in combat while serving with the Marines. If Douglas was inducted, the Rowdens would be left with one child, Malcolm, a grade-school son. Mrs. Rowden applied for a deferment for Douglas and went about collecting signatures to support her stand. In a few days, as the word spread, she collected almost 1,000 names, which she presented to the Jackson County Selective Service Board.

The draft board had its problems; it had to meet its quota, an ever-increasing chore. But it could not ignore the anger and pleading of the people among whom it lives. After a closed-door session, the five members voted unanimously to grant Douglas Rowden a compassionate hardship deferment for one year.

The press hailed the draft board's action as a victory for compassion, but Mr. Rowden, the mill worker, came closer to the meaning of the word. "Our hearts go out to all of the others who have to go," he said.

But the board's deferment is still good for only one year, and if the quotas rise as more men are needed in the quicksands of Vietnam, will Douglas obtain another stay? The Rowdens may be pondering this. And, perhaps, reading what the generals now say about the war lasting years, they may be thinking of their youngest son, Malcolm. He is only 10 now, but Douglas was only 10 when every inside military dopester in Washington was sure Saigon would clean up the rebellious mess in just a few months.

endum sponsors say its chance of passing is excellent), the result will not have any effect on the President's policy. (What has had?) Supporters of the referendum understand this, yet their effort, like similar attempts in Dearborn, Mich., and San Francisco, is not quixotic. It represents the politics of direct action, one might say the politics of desperation, in a time when the national government is massively unresponsive to rising protests.

Desperation, frustration, a sense of helplessness, pervade Democratic politics in California. The regular Democratic organization, shattered and demoralized by Gov. Ronald Reagan's million-vote victory in 1966, is apathetic and views the party's prospects next fall with sullen apprehension. Three hundred members of the Democratic State Central Committee and county central committees recently telegraphed the following forlorn plea to President Johnson: "In our judgment, the only action which can avert major Democratic Party losses in this state in 1968 is an immediate all-out effort to secure a nonmilitary settlement of the Vietnam War."

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

Organization Democrats rest their hope for a Presidential victory on the nomination by the Republicans of Richard Nixon. They feel that Johnson, despite the war, would prove in November to be slightly less unpopular than Nixon with the American people. The eyes of liberal Democrats, regardless of their current zeal for Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy, are also turned to Miami rather than Chicago. Less concerned than organization Democrats for the temporary fate of the party and far more deeply troubled by the war, they believe the nomination of Nelson Rockefeller would give more promise of a settlement in Vietnam than any other present prospect. Gov. George Romney's withdrawal and the looming candidacy of Rockefeller, which sent a chill through the Democratic regulars in California, was good news to liberals and moderates of both parties, who see a choice between Johnson and Nixon as the dreariest political debacle of the century.

Into the midst of this chaos, Senator McCarthy will fly on April 4 to give a three-day push to his California campaign. His success in stimulating broader support than he has gained thus far will depend on his showing on March 12 in New Hampshire. If he wins 30 to 40 per cent of the primary vote there, his California drive will pick up tremendously.

The enthusiasm of the 35,000-member California Democratic Council (CDC) for McCarthy exceeds the enthusiasm that the urbane, 52-year-old Minnesota Senator has so far displayed publicly for himself. Despite the slim hope that McCarthy, even if he makes an impressive showing in the primaries, can wrestle the nomination from Johnson, the CDC is grimly organizing for the June 4 California primary with a national Democratic convention peace slate of delegates pledged to the Senator. Regular Democrats will enter a stand-in Johnson delegation headed by Att. Gen. Thomas C. Lynch.

McCarthy's modesty, his low-key style, his refusal to oversimplify the great problems of war and race are widely admired among his followers, who in the same breath express the fear that these qualities will not rally voters.

Item: In January, he talked to a $100-a-plate dinner crowd in San Francisco. After granting that he had not been among the earlier and more vigorous critics of the war, he said: "The issue has more strength and more adherents than I have." Self-depreciation is an appealing trait in an age of inflated egos, but on this occasion the Senator's audience was moved only to polite applause.

Item: In Fresno, where he spoke to a state-wide collection of Democrats eager for a call to action against Johnson and the war, McCarthy quietly urged: "Stand with me in this attempt to rewrite foreign policy in this year of 1968."

Item: Before an audience of 1,000 Beverly Hills women, pro-McCarthy, anti-war, anti-Johnson and ready to cheer, the Senator offered a studied analysis of Administration policy in Vietnam and said it really ought to be changed. Many of the women felt they should have brought along their knitting.

Nonetheless, the party professionals, who were inclined earlier to write off the CDC drive as a minor nuisance, are now taking it seriously. Gerald N. Hill, CDC president and co-chairman for McCarthy in the state, claims the McCarthy-pledged delegation has a fifty-fifty chance to beat the Johnson stand-ins. More realistically, if the Johnson slate, as Hill says, "has nowhere to go but down," the CDC slate has nowhere to go but up. A mid-January poll published in the Los Angeles Times showed the regular delegation winning by 63 to 18 over the McCarthy slate, with 19 per cent undecided.

If the flow of disastrous news from Vietnam continues, McCarthy will gain strength. Aside from that, the party regulars may not be able to quiet the drab, but fierce, quarrels that have erupted over the make-up of their delegation. As usual, Mayor Sam Yorty of Los Angeles is the divisive factor. With the guts of a burglar, Yorty has proposed two nominees for the Johnson delegation who supported Reagan against former Gov. Edmund G. Brown. That is a bit too much for Brown, and he has threatened to quit the delegation unless they are kicked off. Other prominent Democrats will desert the slate if he leaves. Brown said, and he predicted that in that case the pro-Johnson delegation would lose to the McCarthy slate in the primaries. Assemblyman Leo J. Ryan and Robert Crown of northern California have already withdrawn from the regular Democratic delegation. Party leaders, Ryan said with considerable evidence on his side, "are still picking the same old group that engineered the defeat of candidates in the last election." Crown, a political ally of Assembly Speaker Jesse M. Unruh, said he was pulling out because he had decided he could be more effective off the slate than on.

Whichever way the fight is resolved, the delegation may be in danger of bleeding to death from internal wounds. In one of her rare understatements, Mrs. Carmen Warschaw, still seething over her failure to become party chairman two years ago, said she thought the Johnson delegation leaders are not "dedicated particularly to seeing President Johnson re-elected." Mrs. Warschaw, dubbed the "Dragon Lady" of California politics, is correct. This lack of enthusiasm ranges from tepid public defenses of Johnson to morose private admissions that he is a disaster. Yet the weight of the regular organization cannot be discounted. Seventeen of California's twenty-one Democratic Congressmen will be on the Lynch slate. Two have defected to the McCarthy delegation and two others will sit the whole thing out.

Speaker Jesse Unruh, the most powerful individual

Interlandi, Los Angeles Times

"He's Not a Very Dynamic Speaker, Is He?"

Democrat in California, has again revealed his political astuteness by staying away from the regular delegation. But he has earned few points with McCarthy supporters because of persistent rumors, all credited to Unruh, that Sen. Robert F. Kennedy will try for the nomination at Chicago. The Kennedy mystique is still so powerful that such gossip, despite the Senator's disavowals, has been sufficient to make many potential McCarthy supporters hold back. Unruh, who wants to be governor of California, has been saying recently, without appearing to be excited by the prospect, that he just might run for the U.S. Senate. Yorty also had been playing around with the idea of running for the Senate, but of late has seemed more interested in Unruh's potential candidacy than in his own. The Mayor's untypical behavior may derive more from the conflict-of-interest scandals which broke out not long ago in his city administration than from any decline of personal ambition.

State Sen. Anthony Beilenson may get the CDC endorsement for the U.S. Senate in the Democratic primary. Hugh Manes, Los Angeles attorney, announced March 3 that he will run for the U.S. Senate as a candidate of the Peace and Freedom Party, California's new free-floating group, if he can obtain the endorsement of the P. and F. convention on March 16 at Richmond, Calif. Manes went to Hanoi in March of 1967 as an investigator for the International War Crimes Tribunal, sponsored by the Bertrand Russell Peace Foundation, and he took part in the Tribunal's Stockholm session the following May. He has recently been advised by the State Department that his passport has been revoked because of the Hanoi trip. Paul Jacobs, a writer and self-described "radical," who has worked up a limited reputation in Left circles as a vehement anti-Communist, is among other prospective P. and F. candidates for the U.S. Senate.

Since going to Washington in 1952, Republican Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel has been immune to Democratic challengers. Kuchel, a moderate's moderate with an appeal extending across party lines, refused to support Barry Goldwater, Sen. George Murphy and Reagan; and after Reagan's triumph, the Senator was in deep trouble with California Republicans. He was on a select list that Reagan ominously described as party "traitors." But now the two men have signed a neutrality pact. Reagan, captivated by the insistence of his aides that he had a chance for the Republican Presidential nomination, wanted, above all else, party harmony in 1968; and Kuchel's urgent need was to survive the Republican primary by pacifying the party's conservatives. He had more to fear from them than from any Democratic opponent.

Kuchel's noisiest critic in California is Dr. Max Rafferty, state superintendent of public instruction, an ultra-conservative, a furious orator, and a man of deep philosophical convictions based on McGuffey's Third Reader brought up to date by Reader's Digest. Rafferty chose Washington's Birthday to announce that he would "go to the mat" in the primary with Kuchel. The issues in 1968, Rafferty said, are: "Restoration or rottenness, life or death, survival or eventual destruction of the great Republic herself." For his part, Rafferty sided with restoration, life and survival, leaving the public to guess where Kuchel stands. Democratic interest in the Senate race immediately picked up, with the certainty of a divisive Kuchel-Rafferty brawl.

Rafferty is a "bomb-'em-back-to-the-stone-age" patriot and Kuchel has generally supported Johnson on Vietnam. The differences between them over the war are considerably less sharp than the division on the issue in the Democratic Party. Governor Brown's son, Edmund G. Brown, Jr., is a member of the McCarthy slate, and Brown's law partner and old friend, Joseph Ball, is among McCarthy's strongest advocates. While Charles Warren, the easygoing Democratic state party chairman, struggles to help form the Johnson stand-in slate, his law partner, Hirsch Adell, has joined the other delegation.

McCarthy backers, happily spared the dissension that has plagued the regulars, have put together a broad delegation representing minority groups, labor, business, education and other professions. The list of 344 delegates and alternates (the state has a huge 172-vote delegation) is studded with influential names. Among them are Dr. Herbert York, former chancellor of the University of California at San Diego; Martin Stone, Los Angeles businessman and co-chairman of the McCarthy drive in California; Harry Ashmore, the Pulitzer Prize-winning editor and an official of the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions at Santa Barbara; Reps. George Brown, Jr., and Don Edwards, former national president of Americans for Democratic Action, whose board has endorsed McCarthy; state Sen. Anthony Beilenson, perhaps the most promising young Democratic leader in the state; George Slaff, vice mayor of Beverly Hills; Robert Vaughn, the actor and chairman of Dissenting Democrats; Ed Mosk, a Los Angeles attorney and brother of State Supreme Court Justice Stanley Mosk, and Dr. Robert McAfee Brown, chairman of the Department of Religion at Stanford University. Simon Casady, who was deposed as CDC president in 1966 because of his prematurely correct attacks on the war, is on the delegation. He has close ties with the New Left and minority groups. The Negro and Mexican-American communities of the state are strongly represented.

CDC leaders will use the organization's state-wide convention in Anaheim over the weekend of March 16 to rally more support and public attention for McCarthy who, on the final day of the convention, will be marching in the St. Patrick's Day parade in New York with Robert Kennedy. After hearing Martin Luther King, Jr., the convention will devote itself principally to working out a platform that its slate, if elected, will support in Chicago. The platform will make a strong appeal to Negroes, other minorities and labor in an attempt to create a broad anti-war, pro-McCarthy coalition.

McCarthy's problem is to keep pace emotionally with his liberal supporters and to extend his appeal to the Center and to labor and minority groups, the mass base of the party. His campaign to date has caught the attention of neither labor nor the minorities.

These groups pose special problems. Labor will be hard to reach. Workers know that the war underpins California's booming economy. The billions poured into aerospace and related industries mean thousands upon thousands of steady, well-paying jobs. Prosperity, even wartime prosperity, works to the advantage of an incumbent President. This is not to say that if the issue were reduced to war and prosperity or peace and the possibility of unemployment, labor would vote for war, but the situation is never seen that simply—the war is far away and jobs are real.

Black militants, obsessed with "their own war," see little evidence that McCarthy is disposed to make a serious commitment to the ghettos. One Negro legislator, who is personally, but privately, for McCarthy, said that anti-war sentiment is not strong among large sections of the Negro community. Many Negroes, excluding the politically militant, tend to believe, he said, that by supporting Johnson they are supporting the Negro soldiers who are fighting in Vietnam in such disproportionate numbers. The Mexican-American population, again excluding the politically aware, is more concerned with jobs, housing and discrimination than with Vietnam.

Labor and the minorities are not lost to McCarthy, but he will have to sharpen his attack on Johnson and propose a domestic program with direct appeal to these groups. G. L. (Bud) Simonson, director of the Packinghouse Workers for the eleven Western states, put it this way: "McCarthy is not blunt enough against the war. He has to make it clear that workers not only fight the war but pay for it." Marvin Brody, an international labor representative for the United Automobile Workers, repeats the theme: "McCarthy is not moving strongly enough, yet it is copping out not to support him." State Sen. Mervyn Dymally said McCarthy has not sparked any excitement among Negroes, but regardless of that Dymally admires the Senator for "having the guts to take on Johnson."

California's anti-organization Peace and Freedom Party will be an important factor in the June primary. Most of the 105,000 Californians who have registered with Peace and Freedom would have been voters for McCarthy and against Johnson in June. In appealing to Democrats to register with P. and F. and qualify the party for the ballot, the new party's leaders pointed out that Democrats later could re-register to vote in the Democratic primary. The appeal was effective, and now the McCarthy forces are attempting to shepherd the delinquents back into the fold. They are hoping to persuade at least 50 per cent of them to return, but are having more luck with P. and F. members over 30 than with those younger.

If CDC leaders and McCarthy backers dismiss the Peace and Freedom Party as a children's crusade, the children (some of them are twice 30) see McCarthy at best as a whimsical figure and at worst as a stalking-horse for Johnson. Francis R. Halpern, chairman of the P. and F. Party in San Diego County, said: "Politically, we are unconvinced that McCarthy is part of the peace movement much less that he is capable of leading it anywhere but back into the Johnson camp in November." [See letter from Mr. Halpern, page 362, this issue.] Another party leader said: "We are advising our people not to re-register to vote for McCarthy. We have no illusion that our candidates will win. In fact the result may be the defeat of some good candidates who are Democrats. This is a chance you have to take in building a new party. We are using electoral politics to educate, to organize, to build for the future." This attitude suggests more confidence than the New Left customarily exhibits in the hated Establishment. They at least believe there is a future beyond Johnson or Nixon—or Reagan.

The November "ifs" are many. If the choice lies between Nixon and Johnson or Reagan and Johnson, the Peace and Freedom candidate (whoever he may be) may collect as many as half a million votes in California. An experienced Democratic politician believes that can be expected. If Rockefeller runs against Johnson, P. and F. leaders grant that the New Yorker will get "a lot" of the party's vote. But this gain could be wiped out by George C. Wallace and his American Independent Party, which might steal half a million conservative California votes from the GOP.

Bastian, San Francisco Chronicle

Since the AIP qualified for the California ballot in December, nothing much has been heard from the far Right in the state, but Wallace has only to return to California and mount the barricades for "law and order" to stir his followers into action. Leaders of the two major parties, while they reject him as a demagogue, don't underrate his appeal to the low-income white voter, who feels threatened by the Negro revolt, is squeezed by high taxes and inflation, and is confused and disturbed by the "no-win" war in Vietnam. And Wallace may siphon off more votes than many predict from the suburban class, which suppresses its racial prejudice more effectively in the living room than at the ballot box.

If the prospects of the third and fourth splinter parties in California seem absurd, it may be well to remember that California politics is peculiar. One thing is certain, the state's 8.5 million voters (which include 4,720,000 Democrats and 3,350,000 Republicans, in addition to the few hundred thousand of more radical disposition) will have a loud voice at Miami and Chicago, and in November.

LAST SUMMER IN CAMBRIDGE

Young Radicals & the Fear of Power

KENNETH KENISTON

Last May, a member of the National Steering Committee of the forthcoming Vietnam Summer approached Kenneth Keniston, psychologist on the staff of the Yale Medical School and the author of The Uncommitted (Harcourt, Brace & World) to urge that he study the development and effectiveness of the project. "We hope," said his caller, "that we can learn more about ourselves."

Dr. Keniston, after some initial hesitancy, decided to juggle his summer plans and to accept the invitation. He directed his study primarily to the process of "politicalization" whereby these young radicals had reached their present position of commitment; his method was to conduct extensive interviews with members of the national headquarters staff in Cambridge and to supplement this detailed personal material by observation of the Vietnam Summer in operation.

From this material Dr. Keniston has derived a book, Young Radicals, to be published by Harcourt, Brace & World in May. The following article is based on material that will be presented in that book.

In the middle of Vietnam Summer, there occurred a "revolt of the secretaries" which can stand as introduction to the vexed and unresolved problems of authority, leadership, power and control which continue to plague the participants in organizations of young radicals.

As Vietnam Summer was originally organized, the national office was divided into two groups: "political" staff concerned with questions of national organizing, coordination, publicity, the funding of local projects, and so on; and "office" staff, who addressed envelopes, typed, ran the mimeograph, and answered the telephone. This second group was largely recruited from among college girls and recent college graduates in the Boston area. It was a group of attractive and unusually intelligent young women. As the summer progressed, and as members of the political staff and the office staff came to know one another, a blurring and overlapping of functions began to occur. Most of the members of the political staff seemed embarrassed that, often for the first time in their Movement experience, they had others to do their routine work for them. Furthermore, it became obvious to all that the office staff was not only talented but that they had volunteered to work for subsistence wages because of their strong commitment to the goals of Vietnam Summer.

In the middle of the summer, then, the secretaries were "organized" by the political staff. "It was a classic organizing situation," said one of the political staff who engineered the revolution. "They were underemployed, dissatisfied with the work they were doing, and had a lot of good ideas about what they should do instead. It was simply a matter of organizing them, encouraging them to speak out." The organized confrontation occurred, the political staff (who constituted both the exploiters and the organizers of the exploited) capitulated immediately, and the distinction between political and office work was abolished. The ex-secretaries were more or less integrated into the political staff and given "political" responsibilities, especially for the organization of publicity and public functions. Girls who had been typing letters one week found themselves negotiating with Sol Hurok the next. To be sure, the completeness of the "revolt of the secretaries" should not be exaggerated. In the end, the superior training and skills of the political staff meant that they continued to make most of the "major decisions"; but the participation of the ex-office workers increased as their experience and competence grew.

This paradoxical revolt, organized by the "bosses" against whom it was directed, illustrates some of the strengths and problems of work in the New Left Movement. The incident points to the extreme discomfort felt by most young radicals when they are in a position of power and control over another person, especially if that person is then expected to do routine, boring or unenjoyable work. At another level, it points to the great value the New Left places on participation, and to its continual effort to devise new institutional forms that will give concrete meaning to the vague phrase, "participatory democracy." The goal behind this slogan is to create an informed group, rather than a single informed person with power over others; to elaborate new techniques for collective decision making; to eliminate traditional bureaucratic organizational structures and hierarchies of power; to develop new social groups that enhance the self-esteem of those who form them and permit the "creative" participation of those involved in decisions that affect them.

All of these issues were raised with singular intensity because of the condensed history of Vietnam Summer. Less than two months elapsed between the conception and the start of the project. Unlike most Movement organizations, Vietnam Summer was at the beginning a "top-down" project with no basis in local communities, with no "constituency." Indeed, one of the prime objectives of the project was to create such constituencies in local communities, with the explicit hope and plan that as the summer progressed they would increasingly take over the organization from the bottom up.

As a result, Vietnam Summer leaders and organizers at all levels found themselves in a conflict-filled situation: by joining together to create an initially "top-down" organization, they violated the Movement's objectives of participatory democracy and grass-roots organizing. But simultaneously, the national office and its field workers had to deal continually with local anxieties that the Movement was excessively dominated from what was sometimes called the "walled city of Cambridge," while other local workers questioned the source of Vietnam Summer funds (did they perhaps come from Bobby Kennedy's political machine?). Members of local projects, especially those in large cities, sometimes expressed concern that the entire summer "achievement" would simply be "turned over" to some existing political machine for use in the conventional party politics shunned by the New Left.

The leaders of the project, then, whether located in Cambridge or moving across the country, had to try to reassure others about aspects of Vietnam Summer which in fact worried them as well. The extent of their discomfort was reflected in the heated arguments, especially in the early summer, between national office staff members and "older members" of the National Steering Committee, a group that included a number of "old New Leftists" plus representatives of a traditional peace organization. In all such arguments, the national office staff made it extremely clear that they were not interested in joining into conventional political alignments, that their emphasis was on community organizing, and that they considered civil disobedience (for example, organized draft resistance) a valid tactic. The national office staff was in the position of defending its own "radical" position from the somewhat more "liberal" position of some of the National Steering Committee, while at the same time allaying the worries of those in the field that it was not radical enough. Further, and even more important, their leading role in a national organization not only provided these young radicals with opportunities but also created considerable personal anxiety because it conflicted with their own values of participatory democracy.

The acceptance of leadership roles, particularly when they entailed the possibility of exercising authority and power, also seemed difficult for many of those I interviewed. In their manner and style, these young radicals are extremely "personalistic," focused on face-to-face, direct and open relationships with other people; hostile to formally structured roles and traditional bureaucratic patterns of power and authority. Although most possessed a great capacity for personal organization, psychological structuring and individual orderliness, they were almost uniformly opposed to bureaucratic organization, tight institutional structure or organizational orderliness. For example, when one of those interviewed was "officially" given increased responsibilities in the national office, and a title to go with them, he was the object of merciless teasing from his friends. This teasing expressed not only the affection others felt for him but their (and his) embarrassment that he should have a position with "bureaucratic" implications. Throughout the summer, a deliberate and consistent effort was made to play down formal leadership and organizational structures within Vietnam Summer. Although "leaders" often had clearly defined regional or task responsibilities, project decisions were generally made on a group basis of those involved, with very little "pulling of rank." At times this suppression of leadership and the power that accompanies it was extreme: individuals not adequately informed of the issues or facts were included in policy-making discussions; while those "natural" leaders who had the most experience and the best grasp of the issues sometimes seemed deliberately to refrain from voicing their opinion lest they appear to "dominate" others. Indeed, I sometimes felt that too little distinction was made between the rational use of authority based on competence and the irrational and authoritarian exploitation of leadership roles. Similarly, power based on capacity and role sometimes seemed confused with domination and sadistic control.

A closely related issue is that of manipulation as contrasted with "sincerity." In keeping with their open and personalistic style, most young radicals seek in relationships with others a direct, unmanipulative and honest encounter. For example, what little organizational infighting occurred during Vietnam Summer seemed extremely overt, with disagreements directly stated. And in their interviews with me, these young radicals expressed considerable affection for their co-workers, and often, after stating a controversial view, would add, "But you should talk with X—he will give you a very different picture." Yet this eagerness to maintain open, direct and unmanipulative personal relationships, to avoid controlling others, seemed at times to obstruct other organizational needs. Thus, if everyone is to be honest, open and direct with everyone else and to allow all others a full say, decision making is often slow, especially in times of crisis. Furthermore, decisions which might best be made by a small group of the most experienced and best informed tend to be turned over to larger groups and to become rather blurred. The extent to which it is possible to retain an open, personalistic, unmanipulative and extremely trusting style, and yet mount an effective program on a national scale, is one of the key unresolved questions of the New Left.

The fear of manipulation, for example, seemed to impede organizational effectiveness on a broad scale. Like those involved in more conventional politics, Movement workers sometimes face the problem of how to make people want what they do not at present want. In recent years, conventional American politics has raised to high art public relations techniques like "managing the image" of political candidates, suppressing, selectively presenting, or neglecting crucial facts, deliberately appealing to the irrational anxieties of the electorate, and creating "pseudo-candidates" by publicity. All these tactics are closed to the New Left by their own principles. Indeed, so strong is the fear of manipulation that at times Movement workers found it difficult to appeal to the "rational" anxieties of their constituencies, even by suggesting appropriate efforts to remove the cause of these anxieties. For example, behind the many discussions during the summer over the usefulness of publicity there often seemed to run a conviction that "flashiness" and "publicity seeking" were somehow in themselves illegitimate forms of manipulation, regardless of whether the cause for which publicity was sought was legitimate or the facts to be presented were true. Thus, while intensive, long-range and largely unpublicized community organizing has many other arguments to recommend it, the appeal of this method is increased in the New Left by the fact that community organizing under the banner of "let the people decide" seems perhaps the least "manipulative" political tactic available.

The attitude of Vietnam Summer workers toward the National Conference for a New Politics, which was to be held in Chicago at the end of the summer, illustrates another dilemma of the contemporary New Left. What was to happen at the Chicago meeting, intended as a meeting of all "radical" political and social groups in the country to formulate plans for national action, was of considerable importance, both personal and organizational, to many of those I interviewed. A few had been involved in developing and planning NCNP, and others, when discussing their futures, imagined that they might later become associated with this effort to form a radical coalition in America. Furthermore, as fall approached, discussions of "what would become of" Vietnam Summer were frequently connected with what might emerge from the Chicago conference.

But despite the importance of the NCNP to those interviewed, the national office staff of Vietnam Summer made no prior effort, formal or informal, to "organize" so as to influence, much less control, the proceedings at Chicago. There were many rumors that the conference might be dominated by highly disciplined groups representing older leftist factions, or else by a coalition of black power and insurrectionist militants. The loosely defined voting rules at NCNP were intended to give maximum voice to organizations with a strong community base; the existence of active local projects was therefore crucial in determining voting power. But even though Vietnam Summer had created a large number of such local projects, and was in a position to wield considerable voting power, a number of those interviewed three days before the opening of the Chicago conference had not even secured individual voting rights for themselves. Under the same circumstances, other, old Left groups would have made consistent and perhaps successful efforts to "control" NCNP by exploiting the organizations they had helped create.

Abu, The Tribune (London): Ben Roth

What actually happened at the large, tumultuous and confused Chicago conference has been discussed at length elsewhere. Some days after the development of a "black caucus" which demanded and obtained equal representation for the minority of Negroes present, a "white caucus" was slowly organized, largely around a nucleus of Vietnam Summer staff workers. But this "organization" grew up after the beginning of NCNP, as an ad hoc response to the cross currents within that meeting. Whether the chaos and the ultimate results of NCNP could have (or should have) been avoided is an open question. What is clear is that as individuals and in groups, young radicals like those interviewed are surprisingly nonfactional, nonparanoid, trusting, guileless and anti-organization. And what remains to be seen is whether this style, and the rudimentary organizational forms to which it has so far led, is capable of operating effectively in the same socio-political arena as highly organized, bureaucratized, manipulative and centrally controlled groups.

Throughout Vietnam Summer, then, issues of power, leadership, manipulation and control were continually visible. Although the importance of "power" is increasingly stressed in the rhetoric of the New Left, the actual exercise of power produces considerable discomfort in individual New Leftists. Indeed, it seems conceivable that the tough talk of "power" is a compensation for a group that is essentially so unmanipulative and unsuspecting.

The fear of the abuse of power, of irrational authority, and of dominating leadership is in many respects a legitimate reaction to a world in which power, authority and leadership are used cruelly rather than benignly. The various positions, styles and forms that cluster around the concept of participatory democracy are an important attempt, no matter how incomplete and experimental, to devise new forms of organization and action that will humanize the organized and vitalize the actors. The strength of this position is seen in the revolt of the secretaries; its potential weakness in the dilemma inherent in trying to devise large, effective national programs that maintain their participatory basis. In small, face-to-face groups, participatory democracy works relatively well; it has yet to devise suitable forms and strategies for large-scale organization.

But although participatory democracy is more than just a matter of individual psychology, it has deep psychological roots for the New Left. In many of the young radicals interviewed, discomfort at manipulating, controlling, or wielding power over others was related to their previous experiences within the Movement and to their own individual development. If one concentrates within small, tight groups a considerable number of individuals who have been accustomed from childhood to positions of leadership, participatory democracy can be seen as a "compromise" which permits a certain degree of group harmony, although possibly at the expense of speedy decision making and organizational effectiveness. According to this compromise, everyone agrees to give up his own leadership potential in return for the assurance that no one else will try to lead him. The ability to maintain this compromise requires highly developed self-control, especially among those who enjoy dominating or being dominated.

At a more individual level, discomfort with power is related to personal concerns over dominance, control, superiority and ultimately aggression. For example, several of those interviewed commented on how difficult it had been to learn in Movement work not to be excessively impatient when others did a less adequate job than they themselves might have done. Similar themes appeared in other interviews: difficulties in delegating responsibilities to others, in learning to work cooperatively with other people, in overcoming their own tendency to "take over" groups by using their articulateness to dominate group discussions. Moreover, the fusion of will and conscience which one finds in many young radicals requires special restraint if it is not to become smugness and self-righteousness. Those I interviewed had this restraint, often holding themselves back in dealing with others whom they considered less competent, less experienced, or simply wrong. On one or two occasions, for example, these young radicals' enthusiastic praise for the superlative human qualities and talents of those with whom they had worked in previous projects had a faintly hollow ring, as if the interviewee were protesting too much. In most cases, then, these young radicals were still quite consciously attempting to overcome in themselves any propensity to dominate, control, feel superior or be impatiently angry with others.

It is axiomatic that the issues which produce in us the greatest distaste are the same issues with which we have struggled most intensely in ourselves. And in the early lives of a number of these young radicals, the issue of struggle, and even of violence, looms large. Their early experiences had accustomed them to conflict and yet inoculated them against it, teaching them how to cope with anger in themselves and in others, how to respond "rationally" to provocation, how to avoid violence. Yet the special sensitivity to dominating control, to exploitative power and sadistic anger remains, and may help explain why in this group the avoidance of anything that approximates such abuses of power is so intense. The avoidance is almost completely successful; whatever sadism, rage and violence lie within is now expressed only directly in a quickly rejected feeling of one's own superiority, a fleeting fantasy that one could have more power, or the determination not to manipulate others.

Yet the fear of power and control in oneself and others—the avoidance of violence, inner or outer—cannot be fully explained by such psychological issues as these. It is a fear with historical as well as psychological roots and it constitutes, understandably, a central theme in this group of young radicals who came together for a summer to attempt to persuade their fellow Americans to make peace.

Harry Golden

Terry Sanford, the second "Education Governor" in North Carolina's history, announced in mid-February that he would not challenge Samuel Ervin for the Senate seat in 1968. Sanford's reasons for declining a primary were realistic: "I do not believe I can win."

At this stage in the game, Sam Ervin is unbeatable. That is a sad commentary and a sad state of affairs for North Carolina and the Senate.

In 1963, during the Senate Civil Rights hearings, Att. Gen. Robert Kennedy asked Senator Ervin whether he believed there was any discrimination against Negroes in Mississippi. The Senator said he did not know. The Attorney General suggested they go down there for a day or two and look around. The Senator declined. He said, "No, I'm too busy up here defending the Constitution."

Senator Ervin has been the Constitution's defender ever since the Supreme Court ruled racial segregation in the schools was unconstitutional. He is firmly convinced there is no constitutional sanction for putting black children in a school also attended by whites. Mixing the races in their use of public facilities is a constitutional desecration. This comes from the horse's mouth because Senator Sam is known as the constitutional authority.

I am quite sure that if, say, the Missouri Synod or the Vatican had declared in 1954 that segregation was un-Christian, Senator Sam would have become a theological authority, maintaining that "the Bible doesn't say one damn thing about colored children havin' to go to school with white."

Sen. Sam Ervin is unbeatable because he reflects the thinking in North Carolina. The Eastern area of the state is as rigid on race as are Alabama or Mississippi. These precincts almost elected I. Beverly Lake governor in the last election. Dr. Lake, a professor of law at Wake Forest and the supreme intellectual segregationist of the South, polled only 100,000 votes less than the conservative Dan Moore and the liberal Richardson Preyer. Lake ceded his votes to Moore and today sits on the state supreme court.

The Western area of North Carolina—Charlotte and the Piedmont—is liberal on race but conservative on economics. Charlotte would be capable of electing Martin Luther King mayor if somehow he could guarantee that there would be no collective bargaining and no minimum wage for laundry workers and domestics.

Sen. Sam Ervin is both the obverse and the reverse of the North Carolina coin. He satisfied the eastern part of the state filibustering against civil rights bills and he satisfies the western part with his anti-union record.

Ex-Governor Sanford, now practicing law, never played any "heads-I-win, tails-you-lose" games. He was the first Southern governor to proclaim that color should not stand in the way of a man being employed in any job he was competent to hold.

The first of North Carolina's "Education Governors" was Charles Brantley Aycock who built public schools all over the state at the turn of the century. Sixty years later, Terry Sanford secured appropriations from a recalcitrant legislature to build new schools, raise teachers' pay, and provide students with free textbooks. Lest anyone think this normal behavior on the part of a governor of North Carolina, I remind readers that the state has no kindergarten systems and that, beyond a certain grade, students still must rent their textbooks.

Sanford proposed to raise revenues for these reforms by taxing cigarettes. Had he offered to sell the daughters of the Tar Heel state into white slavery he couldn't have elicited a greater outrage. Cigarettes are sacrosanct in North Carolina. If Terry Sanford had succeeded in taxing them, he would have wiped out the smugglers who buy a carton for $1.40 and sell it to a New York distributor for $1.90, who then sells it for $2.90, much to the distress of Gov. Nelson Rockefeller.

When the legislature balked, Sanford asked it for a tax on food. To a North Carolina politician a tax on milk is a much more conscionable levy than a tax on smokes. Sanford said: "The only way to beat the cycle of poverty is through education." Of course in North Carolina when a political figure says poverty he means the "Negro problem," so the response of the PTAs was less than enthusiastic. But Sanford stuck it out and put all who believe in public education in his debt.

I first met Terry Sanford during W. Kerr Scott's campaign for the Senate against Alton Lennon. I wrote speeches for Kerr Scott and one night Sanford and I shared a hotel room in Raleigh. He was a smart man then, destined for political advancement. I remember him at the Democratic convention when he seconded the nomination of John F. Kennedy.

When he departed Raleigh after the one term North Carolina permits its governors, he left behind him the first state-wide anti-poverty program ever enacted, as well as the foundation of the Governor's School, an institution for especially talented children who have finished their secondary education. He also issued a stern departing warning: "I have come to believe that charity and relief are not the best answers to human suffering, that the schools are not the answer so long as only half of our students finish school, that the wealth of America is not the answer if some families have only 50c a day per person for all expenses"

That a civilized area of the United States in the late 20th century could not respond to these accomplishments, could not retain such a man in public life, is a reason for despair. But Sanford is still a young man and that is a reason for hope. If we who hope that Terry Sanford will some day serve his nation and his state we must accept the political reality that he cannot afford to become known now as a "loser," which he surely would be if he tried to unseat Sam Ervin, Mr. Constitution himself.

JOURNALISM ON THE AIR

The Seven O'Clock Supermen

DESMOND SMITH

Mr. Smith, a frequent contributor to The Nation, has covered television network assignments in the Soviet Union and South-east Asia.

"I've said twenty times that I wanted my on-camera closer included in the news spot!" stormed an outraged TV correspondent as he returned to his typewriter from a trip to the editing room. "My last paragraph is just as important as my first, but some nitwit news editor tells me Bob Young will summarize my piece!"

This close-up of the frustrations of a TV correspondent ought not to be surprising. Network news programs are so dominated by the news stars—Bob Young, Walter Cronkite, Huntley-Brinkley—as to obscure the mass of individual contributions whose accumulation makes up the true shape of the news. This has come about because TV ratings, the network's yardstick of success, are believed to be the direct product of the star's personal popularity. Thus the image has been carefully cultivated of a journalistic superman—all-knowing, Olympian, omnipresent. It is he who guides the viewer across the electronic front page. His personality (summed up by one network vice president as "believability") touches every story like the light of the evening sun, spreading the same warm glow of authority over Vietnam, race riots, California floods, Congressional hearings or White House weddings.

The star system came to television news during TV's precocious infancy, the 1940s. It came from Hollywood where tradition held that stars, not stories, sold tickets. Thus the star system was taken from the dream factory to the reality factory; and when critics charged that N.B.C. spent more to promote John Cameron Swayze than to improve its news coverage, the network contended that the carnation-wearing Mr. Swayze was the chief reason why people tuned in Camel News Caravan. Twenty years later, the audience has shifted from the nation's barrooms to the nation's living rooms. In the process the television audience, seemingly without those who participated in it noticing, has undergone profound social change. In 1968, the national audience includes 10 million college graduates and more than one-half of all the high school educated people in the world.

Every weekday night at 7, an estimated 50 million Americans turn to their TV sets to watch Bob Young (A.B.C.), Walter Cronkite (C.B.S.) or Huntley-Brinkley (N.B.C.) bring them the news. How good are the news-gathering organizations behind these highly paid journalistic supermen? Ponder the following three cases:

(1) Recently all three news programs carried the story of President Johnson's remarkable action in demanding that each member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff sign a statement that Khesanh could be defended. In each instance the network credited Time with the news break. Yet the President's action was known to at least half a dozen sources—including talkative Congressmen—in Washington.

(2) The TV audience first learned that automobiles bearing the "Made in Detroit" stamp were unsafe at any speed during Senate hearings in March, 1966. Readers of The Nation were alerted to the story five months earlier when Ralph Nader wrote "The Corvair Story" (November 1, 1965).

(3) And Linda Fitzpatrick. In early October, 1967, the TV news organizations were confronted with a story possessing deep national interest. On the surface it concerned a pretty girl from a wealthy American suburb who had been murdered in unusual surroundings. But Linda Fitzpatrick lived in two worlds—the well-adjusted world of Greenwich, Conn., and a drug-hallucinated world of Greenwich Village. Both C.B.S. and A.B.C. covered the sensational story as though it were just another murder. Jack Perkins of NBC News tried to dig a little deeper, following up with a series of reports on hallucinatory drugs. But it took the brilliant reporting of Anthony Lukas and a team of reporters from The New York Times to give the story its full significance. Ironically, Lukas used a movie technique, cutting rapidly between the shuttered world of Linda's parents and the reality of her drug-preoccupied friends. The juxtaposition of interviews would have made an absorbing program.

These differences in performance between the newspapers and magazines and TV news have helped provoke considerable soul-searching among television people in recent years. "The networks," says Walter Cronkite of C.B.S., "including my own, do a first-rate job of disseminating the news, but all of them have third-rate news-gathering organizations. We are still basically dependent on the wire services. We have barely dipped our toe into investigative reporting." David Brinkley of N.B.C. agrees. "When it comes to covering news," he told an audience of newspaper editors "in any kind of detailed way, we are just almost not in the ball game." But network brass are still more concerned with the identity of their news stars than with their programs. To be sure, the days when ABC News wanted to dress Chet Huntley in a milkman's costume for something called The Milkman's View of the News have disappeared. Yet all are still on call for celebrity appearances at rodeos, post office openings and state fairs. Show business continues to dominate the TV news business.

At stake is a good deal more than the newscaster's own professional concern. It is a question of whether the public will be shortchanged as TV news continues to expand in influence and impact. More than 1,000 newspapers have vanished since the 1930s, and, in the big-population centers, the mortality rate is climbing. Of the nine daily papers published in New York during the forties, only three survive. Confronted by broadcasting competition, newspapers have gobbled up TV outlets as fast as they have come on the market. From the Daily News to the Los Angeles Times newspaper management has become increasingly involved in the TV business. One result has been a drastic reduction in the number of competing editorial voices in the community. Nowadays there are more than 350 single-voice cities in the United States, a trend that shows no sign of slowing down.

What is significant and must be recognized is that newspaper coverage is now secondary to TV coverage in the United States. According to an Elmo Roper poll, some 58 per cent of the U.S. public gets most of its news from TV. Walter Cronkite's news program now has more viewers than forty-one of the weekly prime-time entertainment shows. Huntley-Brinkley is ahead of nearly as many such programs. A.B.C.'s Bob Young draws more than 9 million viewers a night; Cronkite and Huntley-Brinkley are tied with 20 million apiece. From zero in 1945 to 50 million viewers in 1968 is a phenomenal achievement. But the star-dominated format is still TV's basic news pattern. It has served the public better than most critics realize, but it is overdue for revision of its aims and methods. The three main criticisms are: The format is tired, worn out, old-fashioned; twenty years ago a case could be made for the star system on the ground that there really weren't any news departments; today the journalistic superstar survives only as an anachronism. Second, there has been little encouragement of investigative reporting and insufficient regard for independent judgment. Third, the system has worked better as a news pipe line than as a news-gathering organization.

TV news should operate like a good newspaper, with the emphasis on a company of first-rate reporters. Reuven Frank, executive vice president of NBC News, took a giant step in the 1950s with Huntley-Brinkley, and another one last year with the addition of "contributing editors" Sander Vanocur, Jack Perkins and Douglas Cater. This change is significant; it would be consistent with the second requirement of reform; that the investigative reporter should play a bigger role in the daily news program. The need is made sharper by the all too clear evidence from Vietnam—and elsewhere—that a badly motivated government inevitably leads to a badly informed public. This generalization is perfectly clear to a good reporter. Much television reporting is shoddy. Morley Safer's famous CBS News film sequence showing U.S. Marines in August, 1965, burning a Vietnamese village is a true condemnation of much TV reporting. Safer made his report memorable by abandoning the so-called "equal by stop watch" objectivity. The clue to a network's integrity lies in the distinction it makes between a reporter's objectivity and his responsibility. What the reporter must guard himself against is whitewash. The reporter is called on to investigate what lies behind the whitewash—solid brick or rubble. It is no longer enough merely to marshal the facts. "If you have nothing to tell us," wrote Voltaire in his article on history for the Encyclopedia, "except that one barbarian succeeded another on the banks of the Oxus and Jaxartes, what is that to us?"

Few doubt that the networks have the technical resources, but the networks must now overcome the present impression that that is all they have. Last year, competition as diverse as Ramparts, The Wall Street Journal and I. F. Stone's Weekly showed more investigative zeal than the networks.

Unfortunately, hopes for improving television news suffered a sharp setback this season. The three networks—for the first time in recent memory—all suffered profit declines (not to be confused with losses). In the case of A.B.C., the failure to merge with ITT was a blow to an already cash-short company. Predictably, the decline in advertising revenues has been accompanied by a staff cut-back at all the networks; the cost accountant's "winter-spring" offensive has fallen hardest on the news rooms. Putting sentiment aside—and bookkeepers always put sentiment aside—this is absolutely wrong. For some time now, though editorial expense amounts to something less than 15 per cent of a network's news budget, the trend has been toward less newsmen. The business office lightens its own and management's darkness by explaining through graphs and computer breakouts why newsmen make up an entirely burdensome cost. Like sugarless candy, NoCal beer, and tobacco-free cigarettes, the reporter has become an item that some executives feel a news room can do without. There's nothing wrong with the wire services, but the AP and UPI are no substitutes for a reporter and a camera team on the spot.

All of this does not add up to a cry of doom. But it does add up to an overwhelming case for saying that network news presidents Elmer Lower, William McAndrew and Richard Salant should ask their superiors what is the future for television news. It will be a great calamity if 1968 comes to be regarded as the year when TV news stood still because, for a season, broadcasting profits happened to be only tiptoeing along.

TV's First Real Paper

MICHAEL HARRIS

Mr. Harris is on the staff of the San Francisco Chronicle.

San Francisco

When reports of progress toward settling San Francisco's first major newspaper strike began to be heard, a surprising tone of regret appeared in some of the mail received by KQED, the city's educational television station. Many San Franciscans, it developed, had come to prefer seeing reporters and editors on Channel 9 instead of reading their work in the city's two daily papers.

The television station, aided by a $5,000-a-week grant from the Ford Foundation, began presenting its daily Newspaper of the Air from 7:30 to 8:30 each night on the third day of the strike. Since the beginning of this special project in early January, KQED, which is probably the nation's most successful educational television station, has built up the largest audience in its fourteen-year history.

More significantly, those of us who have participated in the experiment think we have helped produce a new type of news programing, with far more depth and a great deal more liveliness than the headline-oriented news broadcasts developed by commercial radio and television. Some of our most enthusiastic praise has come from colleagues in commercial television, who are distressed that the private stations failed to come up with anything stimulating or imaginative during the strike. Local newspaper men have been stopped on the street by strangers who tell us what a pleasure it is to be able to connect the face with the by-line, local restaurant owners say that a number of their 8 P.M. regulars have been coming in an hour late in order not to miss their daily paper on television.

The KQED audience has seen, either during the nightly broadcast or in the morning and noon reruns the following day, a chatty editorial conference at which reporters discuss their stories and answer questions on the significance of what they have found. (The end of the strike means the end of the Newspaper of the Air as a daily program, though KQED hopes to keep it alive on Sunday nights.) We are not polished performers, but like most newspaper men we like to talk, and we have learned to relax before the camera. The atmosphere is informal, and when a reporter is asked what the reason is for a vote by the Board of Supervisors or for an appointment by Gov. Ronald Reagan, his answer is apt to prove informative and amusing.

The local staff has had its problems, but the greatest technical hazards have come from trying to gather a balanced report of world and national news. The program signed up first for the UPI radio wire, but that proved unsatisfactory because the material was written so briefly that the significance of the news was lost. After a few days, the program switched to two UPI newspaper wires instead. Copies of the day's New York Times, Christian Science Monitor and Los Angeles Times were obtained locally, and special arrangements were made with United Air Lines to have a late copy of The Washington Post placed each day aboard the morning nonstop flight to San Francisco. A telegraph editor forced to rely solely on the wire services during the Pueblo crisis and the sudden Vietcong offensive in the cities would have found it impossible to keep his perspective.

In the first five weeks of the newspaper strike, some eighty reporters, editors, columnists, photographers and artists from the two local papers appeared on the Newspaper of the Air, many on a regular basis. Ten of us were invited to form the basic news staff; Mel Wax, a former Nieman Fellow who quit a newspaper job last year to become KQED's public affairs director, served as our editor. Most of us had had at least a little experience on television, but two men who were new to the medium turned out to be natural performers.

One was William German, the Chronicle's news editor,

LETTERS (Continued from page 362)

weave the pellets together into a polemic on the Vietnamese War. . . . I was the first and only Peace Corps director ever to serve in Guinea, one of the countries listed by the professor. Our expulsion had nothing whatever to do with the Vietnamese War. President Sekou Touré himself explained it as a gesture protesting the alleged American involvement in the arrest of the Guinean foreign minister off a Pan American airplane in Accra, Ghana. . . . Both in Guinea and in the United States, important officials of the Guinean Government expressed regret to me about our leaving and suggested the desirability of our eventual return. At no time, either during the crisis that resulted in our departure or since, has the war in Vietnam ever been mentioned in any way as having influenced the decision of the government of Guinea.

The other expulsions were also the result of antagonisms that were local in nature. In Turkey, it was the Cyprus question; in Mauritania it was the Middle East war; in Pakistan it was our relationship with India; and in Gabon it was the strings from Paris manipulated by a leader determined to rid Africa of any American presence.

There is little question that making the Peace Corps the scapegoat for host country disagreements with foreign policy actions directly affecting such countries creates acute problems for the future of the Peace Corps. However, I think Professor Berreman does a disservice to the cause of peace when he seeks to make the Peace Corps a casualty of the war in Vietnam.

Henry R. Norman

vote on Vietnam

Madison, Wis.

DEAR SIRs: For three months a broadly based, nonpartisan Wisconsin organization called Madison Citizens for a Vote on Vietnam has worked to place the following resolution before the electorate in the April 2 primary:

It is the policy of the people of the City of Madison that there be an immediate cease fire and the withdrawal of United States troops from Vietnam, so that the Vietnamese people can determine their own destiny.

On Jan. 25, the Madison Common Council reluctantly acted on the petition of 7,959 of its constituents, and voted to place the resolution on the spring ballot. At present it appears that the people of Madison will be the only ones in America with such an opportunity to repudiate President Johnson's policies.

We are now mounting a full-scale publicity and educational campaign. Our resources are slender, and readers who may wish to assist are urged to send contributions to: Madison Citizens for a Vote on Vietnam, 206 King Street, Madison, Wis.

Paul H. Hass

Werth's sources

Baltimore, Md.

DEAR SIRs: I could not let Alexander Werth's article "Russia on the Nile" [The Nation, Feb. 12] go by without some sort of protest. Mr. Werth's capsule history of the genesis of the June war is too cute for words. The political affairs commentator of Radio Moscow could not have done a better job. To speak of Israeli "aggression" against Syria or to speak of an Israeli "attack" against Syria brings back memories of Federenko's words in the UN. The world is expected to conveniently forget the continual artillery, mortar, and sniper fire against Israeli ships in Lake Huleh and against Israeli lowland settlements beneath the Golan Heights.

Let us be more accurate with our history, Mr. Werth. The Israeli "attack" against Syria was a retaliation after many warnings. The Arabs thought that the Israelis would either fold up or be provoked into a losing war. What the Russians thought I cannot say. I can only stick to history as it happened.

Leo Sirota

Paris

DEAR SIRs: Mr. Sirota is talking through his hat. My number-one source was not "Radio Moscow" but the absolute top French authority on Egypt, Jean Lacouture. So much so that I was even a little nervous in case he thought I was borrowing a little too much from some of his writings, and notably from his outstanding article on the subject in a recent issue of the liberal French weekly, Le Nouvel Observateur. In the course of the article I acknowledge my debt to Mr. Lacouture, though perhaps not emphatically enough.

Alexander Werth

correction

New York City

DEAR SIRs: The implication in the review by Edith Anderson of Frederic Ewen's book on Brecht ["The Restoration of Brecht," The Nation, Mar. 4] that the play Simone Machard is unpublished here is incorrect. It came out in 1965 as a separate paperback in the Grove Press edition of the works of Brecht and is of course still in print.

Eric Bentley

who became managing editor of the Newspaper of the Air. For many viewers, the best part of the evening has come in the last two or three minutes when German, with a soft marking pen in hand, draws up page 1 of the Newspaper of the Air. He has proved an informative editor, explaining why some stories are played higher than others and why the big news of the day doesn't always command the big headlines.

Robert Bastian, the Chronicle's editorial cartoonist, has been the other surprise. He astonishes the viewers and his fellow participants by turning out four or five delightful cartoons in the course of an hour.

Because of technical problems, we found that we could use very little film. But this has turned out to be no hardship since we also discovered that films and interviews frequently slow down presentation of the news. It has proved better to offer a quick report than to spend time on anything less than the most extraordinary interview. Among those who proved excellent subjects were James Farmer, Dr. Benjamin Spock and Seichi Ozawa, the young Japanese who is to succeed Josef Krips as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony. Perhaps the liveliest interview came when Judy Stone, feature editor of the program, brought Stanley Kramer into the studio and asked him why he had made so many compromises in his interracial movie Guess Who's Coming to Dinner.

Once the news is covered, in half an hour or more, the critics and columnists appear. The theatre has been reviewed thoroughly and frequently by the Chronicle's Paine Knickerbocker and the Examiner's Stanley Eichelbaum (The New Yorker's original "our man Stanley" until he moved West). There have been reports on books, society weddings and divorces, sports, fashion and business—in short, the normal diet of a daily paper—two or three times a week.

Art Hoppe, the Chronicle's political satirist, not only provided his own columns but was also assigned the task of reading the funnies—a device that is worn thin, but is probably essential in a community that lives and breathes with "Peanuts." Herb Caen reported gossip not only for KQED but for a temporary daily paper put out by Ramparts and for a commercial radio station. In fact, it has been a curious characteristic of the strike that many newspaper men went to work temporarily for other San Francisco employers and wrote everything under their own names.

As had been expected, there were omissions in the Newspaper of the Air. No effective way was found to provide stock market news, and other vital statistics had to be omitted. Only the most prominent deaths have been reported, and not all of them. Newspaper editorial departments learn about most deaths from the carbons of paid funeral notices purchased by local mortuaries. We have had to rely on the families and friends of the dead.

The second major area of omission has consisted of all the news that couldn't make page 1. To allow enough time to present the important news adequately, we have had to omit much state and local activity that would have made the local news columns of the daily papers. As one result, the city's commissions have been able to operate more freely than has been customary or healthy for them.

With the strike over, San Francisco journalism is returning to business as usual. It is too early yet to know whether any of the lessons learned from the Newspaper of the Air will be absorbed by the commercial stations. There is probably no reason to be unduly optimistic.

CLEVELAND'S 100 DAYS

THE EDUCATION OF CARL STOKES

ADELE ZEIDMAN SILVER

Mrs. Silver writes a regular column for the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Cleveland

Poor Carl Stokes! Everybody wants to pass judgment on his first hundred days as Mayor of Cleveland, and his famous dimpled grin is looking a little strained. As the hundredth day dawned, a county-wide TV poll indicated that 65 per cent of the viewers who bothered to call in were dissatisfied with his performance to date. Though that didn't mean much—only city votes, not county votes, had elected him—the TV commentators reported the results with grim glee. A local editor compared Stokes to the allies in North Africa, saying he wasn't at the beginning of the end yet, just at the end of the beginning.

The rush to judgment is premature, but the town is nervous. He has only another 600 days to go, and the record to date is being read for omens and portents, like the opening scene of a classic tragedy. Stokes is a mild man to be cast in a role of such heroic consequence. But, being the first black mayor of a major American city, he has been set up, even by his own promises and his own ardent supporters, as a knight on crusade. Knocking him down is the new sport in Cleveland politics.

How does the record so far really read?

(1) Stokes has cleaned out some deadwood and reorganized some sloppy areas of government, notably in the Law Department, the Metropolitan Housing Commission and the Port Authority. In the absence of both money and time, he has tried to tighten up, make more efficient, a government whose most conspicuous legacy was twenty-five years of honest lethargy.

(2) He found quickly that the city needed funds—a needlessly surprising discovery because of his silly campaign talk about a hidden surplus. Now he is asking for a

0.3 per cent increase in the new city income tax for 1968 and, for 1969, a full 1 per cent. If approved, the tax will bring in a little more than $4 million.

(3) He opposed a charter amendment for police and fire salary raises, which would use up $3.5 million of the projected tax increase. The police are a touchy spot in Cleveland, as in most big cities, and Stokes is suffering pot shots from all sides because of his relations with the department. He has pulled 230 men from office jobs to put them on street patrol. Crime rates continue to go up; traffic arrests have dropped sharply; low morale and intramural bitterness plague the police department.

(4) After three months' search, Stokes finally found a man to take over the urban renewal mess. He is Richard Green of the Cambridge Corporation, a protégé of Ed Logue, who became nationally known in connection with the Boston renewal project. Logue had turned down the job at the beginning of the 100-day search. Green's salary of $28,000 is higher than Stokes's, and several councilmen were shocked for the TV cameras, stating that for that kind of money, they could do the job. As much as anything else, their passionate public idiocy confirmed public approval of Green's appointment.

(5) Stokes had made no apparent progress yet in unlocking the federal urban renewal funds that were withheld from the previous administration, though promises that his victory would virtually guarantee the city access to the federal purse were implicit in his campaign. At the end of the fourth month, on March 4, HUD released $251,750 to continue a program of tearing down vacant and vandalized buildings, and announced a grant of $11,790,192 for the stymied University Euclid Renewal project. Stokes called it "the end of the freeze." HUD Secretary Robert Weaver said: "Substantial progress has been accomplished," but added, "let me make it perfectly clear that we are not satisfied on all points yet."

(6) He has opened up Board of Control meetings to the public, inaugurated Open House nights at City Hall ("shades of Lester Maddox," cracked one wag), has instructed all public officials to list their home telephones, and has answered his own cheerfully at 7:30 A.M. (it was a reporter calling, to check). He is appearing in public more than he really wanted to, trying to bolster his position with his attractive personality.

(7) On the whole, appointments have been undramatic. Whether he thought he couldn't get top men and so didn't try for them, as some astute observers say, or whether he got turned down more often than anybody close to him cares to admit, or whether his judgment of men is flawed, Stokes has not come up with a distinguished administration. Probably all three reasons are part of the truth.

(8) He can no longer count on a united Negro community, thanks to the reapportionment that provided one heavily Negro Congressional district out of Cleveland's four. More than two dozen Negroes originally filed for the race; the number is now down to fourteen, one of them Stokes's able brother Louis. The splintering of the Negro community was bound to come, but it came sooner than is comfortable for the Mayor.

(9) Stokes has been criticized for unimportant but foolish gestures—most recently his suggestion that the city

buy an $11,000 limousine "to show it's really a Big City," and most severely for having taken a couple of vacations early in his term, especially one to a luxurious resort in the Virgin Islands. What's really damaging is that the criticism in such matters tends toward ridicule, which is particularly hard for an ambitious politician to accept.

On balance, the record thus far is mediocre. But mediocrity is what Cleveland is used to in its city government, so why the shouting? Because, deep in the city's fears for its future, is the notion that Carl Stokes may be its last chance. If he succeeds, the city may be spared more racial violence (as it was last summer when he was a candidate), may indeed attract large sums of federal money, may restore itself to a significant place among the nation's ten largest cities.

If he fails, there may come after him a deluge of every urban woe imaginable to man. That cheerless thought struggles in the city's conscience with the temptation to joust with him just one more round, to hit him one more blow before helping him shine up his battered armor. Nobody wants a public part in bringing him down, with the terrible consequences that could follow. A knight must be brave and pure, but innocence is another matter. As a relative newcomer to the middle class and the upper-middle reaches of power, Stokes believes a little too fervently in the Establishment. Local business and industry leaders have, with rare exceptions, been unwilling as yet to put their money where their pious mouthings are. If the signs and omens are read accurately, Carl Stokes's first 100 days show that he will have to make the next 600 count. Including vacation time.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Honest Jim and the Tinker Toy Model

THE DOUBLE HELIX. By James D. Watson. Atheneum Publishers. 226 pp. $5.95.

J. BRONOWSKI

Dr. Bronowski is senior fellow of the Salk Institute of Biological Studies at La Jolla, Calif. His many published works on science and literature include The Common Sense of Science (Harvard), Identity of Man (Doubleday), and William Blake and the Age of Revolution (Harper & Row). The Nation has twice devoted special issues to his major essays, Science and Human Values (Dec. 29, 1956) and The Abacus and the Rose: A Dialogue After Galileo (Jan. 4, 1964).

James Watson and Francis Crick both enjoy (I use the verb literally) the reputation of enfants terribles among their fellows in biology. Francis Crick likes the stress to be on the word terrible, of course, as any Englishman does. But James Watson is a child of America, the culture indifferently of the spoiled child and the child wonder, and he has never balked at the simple art of playing the enfant.

The pleasure of this book about their collaboration is that it perfectly catches both attitudes. It is an open secret that there have been some disputes over it, chiefly between the principals (who include Dr. Maurice H. F. Wilkins of the University of London, who shared the Nobel award with Watson and Crick), but also with others in the story, and that the book has been changed and bowdlerized here and there as a result. As a reader with an average relish for gossip I am of course sorry to lose any of the small darts of fun and barbs of malice that have gone. But it would be silly to pretend that the book has lost its savor because they are now fewer than they were. It remains just what James Watson perceived and conceived in the beginning, a classical fable about the charmed seventh sons, the anti-heroes of folklore who stumble from one comic mishap to the next until inevitably they fall into the funniest adventure of all: they guess the magic riddle correctly. Though the traditional parts of Rosalind Franklin as the witch and Linus Pauling as the rival suitor (for example) have been toned down, they are still unmistakably what they were, mythological postures rather than characters.

Historically, the essential story goes in this way. James Watson was 23 and a recent Ph.D. when he came to Cambridge in 1951 on the fag end of a fellowship to learn about nucleic acids. Francis Crick whom he met there was 35, but he had not yet finished his Ph.D. because he had been a fledgling physicist when the war began and had only turned about to biology in 1947. There was by now a spreading belief (based on the work of O. T. Avery toward the end of the war) that the material that carries the blueprint of heredity from the cells of the parents to those of the child might not after all be composed of proteins, as had long been thought, but of nucleic acids, DNA. Since it was evident that DNA is many times simpler than any protein, this was a cheering thought, and Watson and Crick cheerfully resolved to unravel its chemical structure. I ought to say this more exactly: they proposed to build up a geometrical model of the DNA molecule from which its known properties and behavior would be seen to follow naturally.

The sum total of known properties of DNA that they had to guide them was meager. There were pictures taken by the diffraction of X-rays in Wilkins' laboratory in London which suggested to them that the molecule had the shape of a regular spiral. Everyone's mind was then full of spirals because Linus Pauling had recently built a model which showed that there is an underlying spiral in some proteins—the alpha-helix. Francis Crick was able to calculate precisely what X-ray picture a spiral or helix will produce, and that was his first important paper.

It was known that each nucleic acid is composed of the same four chemical bases, and is presumably characterized by the particular pattern of repetitions in which they are strung along the chemical backbone of the helix. It was likely that the helix had several strands, and Rosalind Franklin was sure (but Watson and Crick were not) that the bases were strung inside the backbone and not outside. Above all, Crick and Watson had one master key to the structure which other workers disregarded. They were impressed by the evidence of Erwin Chargaff that the four chemical bases come in pairs—the number of units of thymine seemed to be always the same as the number of adenine, and the number of units of cytosine the same as those of guanine. Unfortunately, between the intervals of being impressed, they mostly disregarded it too.

With this modest equipment of the known and the hazarded, the two young men set out to solve the problem that goes back to Gregor Mendel crossing peas in a monastery garden 100 years ago: how is heredity handed on physically? They tackled it by building tinker-toy models of whatever looked like possible arrangements of the bases in DNA. This seems a childish and farfetched procedure, and they had some nasty setbacks with it; yet it worked, and in eighteen months they had the structure that renowned men were looking for from London to Pasadena.

In retrospect, the achievement is so lucid that it looks transparent. The helix, made of two matched strands, a unit of thymine always opposite one of adenine, and cytosine always opposite guanine, is so logical and natural that it now seems self-evident. Clearly this is how the dividing cell is able to split its hereditary material in half, and how each of the two daughter cells is able to make a whole again by using one strand of DNA as a template to form the other strand. If we had to design heredity, and were as simple as nature and as clever as Crick and Watson, that is just how we would do it.

No one could miss the excitement in this story of a great and beautiful discovery. But James Watson has given it something more, and unexpected: a quality of innocence and absurdity that children have when they tell a fairy story. The style is shy and sly, bumbling and irreverent, artless and good-humored and mischievous, so that the book leaves us with the spirited sense of intellectual knockabout of a novel by Kingsley Amis. It would obviously have been called Lucky Jim if Amis had not been so inconsiderate as to make that title famous in advance. In the same vein, it was called at different times Honest Jim and (with a tartar pun) Base Pairs before it settled down soberly to The Double Helix; and the easy air of confidence that has gone from the title still blows happily through the narrative.

Of course there are hidden tugs of personality that give this brisk edge to the style. In a sense, James Watson is playing Boswell, and inevitably Francis Crick becomes Dr. Johnson—monumental, admired, and (every so often) scored off. And if the effect is amusing as a tease, it is also fair. After all, the story is not an adventure of Sherlock Holmes, and James Watson did not play that Dr. Watson. What he writes is a labor of love—a labor of self-love in part, no doubt, but dominated by the love for the open adventure of science that formed and troubled and fulfilled his dreams.

In the result, the book communicates the spirit of science as no formal account has ever done. Of course it will be read by scientists, but what it has to say is vivid and important for every reader. For example, it will bring home to the nonscientist how the scientific method really works: that we invent a model and then test its consequences, and that it is this conjunction of imagination and realism that constitutes the inductive method. The models in science are not always as concrete as those which Crick and Watson put together with their hands; Albert Einstein could not have made a visible model of his space-time; and yet space-time is a model, and so is every discovery, and it takes its power from the closeness with which the consequences that flow from it match the real world.

Building models with one's hands is an engaging task, during which the builder becomes attached to his model and is tempted to gloss over its faults. Since most models are wrong and have to be discarded, however attractive they seem, it is therefore helpful to have two people at work, so that each may be ruthless with the other. This is a point that Francis Crick has made, and it comes out firmly in this book—the progress of science depends on criticism. This is why there are no scientific critics in the sense that there are literary critics in their own right. Criticism is a necessary and positive function in science, but it has no independent status; and if you cannot make and take it without anger, then (like Jimmy Porter in John Osborne's play) you are out of place in the world of change that science creates and inhabits.

I come back to the phrase I have already used, that James Watson in this book expresses the open adventure of science: the sense of the future, the high spirits and the rivalry and the guesses right and wrong, the surge of imagination and the test of fact. Science is an optimistic profession because anyone can win the prizes but he has to work for them, he has to prove his gifts and to love his work—they are not prizes in a lottery or a shooting gallery. This is a contemporary message that every reader ought to get from the book, and it gives it the force of a social document. Its two happy, bustling, comic anti-heroes are new in literature today and yet should be a model for it, because they run head-on against the nostalgia for defeat which haunts the writer's imagery of action now. Here is a working world that shows by contrast how pitiful are the heroes of violence and hard luck, the numbers players, the addicts and the Kansas killers; and that we are to be pitted for envying their rage on the pretext that it is a form of social protest. I do not suppose The Double Helix will outsell Truman Capote's In Cold Blood, but it is a more characteristic criticism and chronicle of our age, and young men will be fired by it when Perry Smith and Dick Hickock no longer interest even an analyst.

A Biography of His Age

GORKY AMONG US (Gorkii sredni nas). By Konstantin Fedin. Moscow, 1967.

SEVEN YEARS WITH GORKY (S'em l'et s Gorkim). By Ilya Shkapa. Moscow, 1966.

THE BRIDGE AND THE ABYSS. By Bertram D. Wolfe. Frederick A. Praeger. 188 pp. $5.95.

GORKY. By Irwin Weil. Random House. 238 pp. $2.25 paper.

DAN LEVIN

Mr. Levin teaches creative writing and comparative literature at Post College, Long Island University. His Stormy Petrel: The Life and Work of Maxim Gorky (Meredith) has recently been republished in England (Frederick Muller).

On the 16th of March, the 100th anniversary of the birth of Alexey Maximovich Peshkev—Maxim Gorky—will be celebrated in the Soviet Union. His shade leads an uneasy coexistence with Lenin's and confronts that of Stalin.

His life was a vast drama. He was "the hobo who became a writer," but he insisted on growing, and became the beau ideal of the writer of conviction and integrity; and the evidence, for millions, that the lowly can rise to greatness. Never a Marxist, he believed, despairingly, in "Man." "I have no faith, Lev Nikolayevich," he said to Tolstoy, who nevertheless insisted Gorky was essentially a believer. Faith in a spiritualized human reason he combined with a harsh atomic view; the poet Blok sardonically asked him if this was "pan-psychism."

He supported, with trepidation, the Revolution of February, 1917; and opposed the Bolshevik Revolution of October. Finally he came to terms with Lenin, in order to save human lives and much of Russian culture, in time of civil war, suffering and terror. Immediately after, he went into exile, bitter but still hoping a "New Man" would arise in the Soviet Union.

An honest close-up of his last years is almost impossible while so many who took part in the acts and psychology of the Stalin period are still alive and believe they were justified. Gorky returned, torn by many motives, to a Soviet Union in its iron age, and became Stalin's "superintendent of writers." The evidence seems clear that he tried to mitigate; to build within the dictatorship the foundations of that "New Man." However, a young revolutionary idealist of the old breed, Victor Serge, looked at him with disenchantment, as a servant of tyranny.

He "meddled"—in his writing, and finally in action—with Stalin's machine: an old knight, with wooden lance, charging a tank division. He tried to save the Old Bolsheviks, and obstructed an understanding with the Nazis. His world reputation was still such that the Great Purges could not begin while he lived. He died—"was died," is the grim Russian phrase often used—on June 19, 1936; was interred in the Kremlin wall in a formidable ceremony; and an effort was made to have him remembered as a party liner. A "cover story" was even invented, that he had been murdered by the opposition. It has now been abandoned, and nobody knows what to say.

This is because the physical and moral price Russia paid for revolution and industrialization is still hard to admit, and Gorky's story opens it wide. He embodied so much: Blok once said that if there was such an entity as Russia—"that great, boundless, spacious, melancholy and felicitous something"—Gorky was its highest expression. There are faint signs that the Soviet Union is moving, with qualms, toward a truer view of him.

One dare not expect candid statements from those most able to make them—old writers who knew both Gorky and Russian history, which they lived. Ilya Gruzdev has published another book which again avoids discussing the grown man. Konstantin Fedin's new book of memoirs, Gorky Among Us, repeats unbelievable clichés. ("There is one man who understands everything splendidly and sees all splendidly." Gorky is silent, smiles, and with a look of pleasure sees that I understand him. Then he pronounces in a soft, low bass voice: "Lenin.") But some intonations in the book suggest the search going on in cultured Russian consciences.

Fedin's own cross is that, equipped to be a major novelist, because of his time and conditions he had to settle for less. His Early Joys, for example, which should have been a top-flight novel, falls short through lack of candor. (Of course the demand that the Russian writer speak the truth, boldly and recklessly, is based on the assumption—stated once by the old Populist Karonin to the young Gorky—that Russian literature is "a form of holy writing"; of no other literature has so much been asked, when it comes to matters affecting the state itself.)

The same "less than candor" stamps Fedin's book about Gorky. Interesting points stud it. Trotsky is mentioned, not as traitor but as overzealous Communist (an event!). Light is thrown on Gorky's estimate of Blok. The Serapion Brotherhood, which stood under Gorky's protection, is defined as a group of writers who were all different, and whose value was in the differences.

Fedin even explains why, although for sixteen years he had rushed to see Gorky at every chance, when the news came that Gorky was "ill," near Moscow, Fedin—along with all the other writers whose guiding spirit Gorky had been—merely sat waiting, weeks, for a phone call that finally came, telling him to be at the funeral. To try to recall the reason for his neglect, Fedin writes, "would he like trying to throw a seed on the ground during a storm. Either it was a deep absentmindedness, or a prolonged agitation." If the Olympics included a gymnastic event such as "Explanations," surely Fedin's would win a gold medal.

And still, even this is a movement on the waters.

More telling, although (or because) so awkwardly and naively written, is Seven Years With Gorky by Ilya Shkapa. It deals with Gorky's badly documented last years. Shkapa was one of the young, poorly educated writers who were directly under Gorky's wing, his main hope. They staffed the magazines he controlled, such as Our Achievements. Their worship of him comes through, and his affectionate, if clumsy and even pathetic, effort to mold them along lines of humanism. "He helped us grow, but demanded study and hard work." When Gorky went down, his magazines were locked, their staffs thrown into concentration camps.

Things told in aesopian form in Gorky's late and nearly unknown plays appear also in Shkapa's book, as direct quotes: the same phrases of desperation, mention of similar awful dreams. (Poisonous adders eat his legacy.) A final chapter relates Shkapa's last meeting with Gorky.

Assigned by Gorky to report for his magazine on a new steel plant, Shkapa tells Gorky he found mismanagement and exploitation of the workers. Higher-ups want to hush the story; Gorky tells him to run it. Kriuchkov, Gorky's "secretary" (in effect his warden, planted by the Stalin apparatus), leaves to answer the phone (Gorky obviously is not permitted to do so). In his absence Gorky leans toward Shkapa and says: "I'm surrounded. Locked in. Unbelievable." He then tells Shkapa to go at once to Ordzhonikidze, to tell him "everything." (Ordzhonikidze, who stood up against Stalin, was later forced to kill himself, Khrushchev told the 20th Party Congress.) Kriuchkov returns. "It's the Kremlin," he tells Gorky. "They want to see you before you leave." (Gorky was going to the Crimea—his last trip; he died right after his return to Moscow. He had been refused a passport to go abroad. His movements were carefully controlled. "They" can only be Stalin and his ruling party faction.)

Gorky urgently repeats that Shkapa must see Ordzhonikidze, begs Kriuchkov to arrange this. He suddenly embraces Shkapa, blubbers, and kisses him on the forehead (traditionally the long, often the last, farewell). Shkapa, crying, kisses Gorky several times, then leaves, puzzling anxiously about the meaning of Gorky's words, his desperation.

Shkapa never kept that date with Ordzhonikidze. "External forces burst in, which rudely changed the path of my life and fated me to more than twenty heavy years."

It sounds as if Gorky was trying to steer his young disciple to another protector, and maybe to signal to Ordzhonikidze about himself. When he blubbered, was it for his fate, or Shkapa's? It is one thing to doom oneself by taking a stand, something else to have doomed others.

Chekhov said, of the young Gorky, that the man would not be forgotten in a thousand years. What of the writer? His social and political import has slowed a true estimate of his works. A naive romantic realism (in the early stories) gave way soon, as complex issues struck against an unusually high intelligence without being resolved. How is one to rate The Lower Depths, that cloudy, angry allegory, so long revered mystically by the old Left? Or The Confession—a novel of heretical Christianity married to the Socialist dream?

I have just finished going over The Lower Depths with undergraduates. The character of Luka (wandering saint or charlatan; Tolstoy? Gorky-Tolstoy?) affected most of them. What is "doing good"? Is a bitter truth better, or a sweet lie? The play forced them to basic questions. Jean Renoir's old movie also happened to be shown at the college; it was strange to see Gorky's play give birth to something so unlike, yet legitimate. I once coined a term for Gorky's work: that it is a "mother-of-literature." Even his failures are full of ideas, that ask to be developed and transformed.

His finest things nearly all came after 1912, when he had long stopped being a revolutionary. First, his Autobiography (if possible, use Isadore Schneider's old translation, for Citadel Press): no autobiography equals it. Of course, the Reminiscences of Tolstoy, Chekhov, and Blok: there are few parallels in literature. The Diary Fragments, long out of print in English: they too are unmatched—their own genre. The unproduced movie script of Stepan Razin—a rugged allegory of Gorky and Lenin. Finally, the late (1932) play of Yegor Bulichev. It must be dragged from oblivion, but will need an aware translation, inspired directing and staging, an aware audience. It is a two-edged play—an affirmation of idealistic revolution, and underlying this a furious statement of disillusioned despair, at its seeming

An American Punch?

An adult MAD?

A thinking man's ENQUIRER?

Yes, it's

CARICATOUR

The New Monthly Of Contemporary Satire

PUT-DOWNS AND PUT-ONS ON WHAT'S UP (FOR PEOPLE WHO MISS TW)

CARICATOUR SUBSCRIBE TODAY

280 WEST BROADWAY, N.Y., N.Y. 10013

☐ 1 YEAR $3.50 ☐ 6 ISSUES $1.90 (CHECK OR MONEY ORDER)

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____ STATE _____ ZIP _____

death in Stalin's age. It is his stage masterwork.

In this country, Bertram D. Wolfe's The Bridge and the Abyss and Irwin Weil's Gorky are both useful. Wolfe's book is best for new details about Gorky's inspired role in 1918-21; Weil's for reportage of his relations with Soviet writers, as reconciler, protector, and builder of a legacy of idealism. Both books help break the tintype of the politically orthodox hack. Weil's views about literature are too conventional, perhaps, to size up an unconventional self-made writer like Gorky; but his view of the man's humanity is clear.

Wolfe's subtitle, "The Troubled Friendship of Gorky and Lenin," is misleading. Gorky—who kept seeking "a man with an active and living faith"—had a brief crush (1901-05) on Lenin and his activists; what remained thereafter was mainly a respectful, and awed, distaste.

Exploring Inner Space

SELECTED WRITINGS. By Jules Supervielle. Poetry translated by James Kirkup, Denise Levertov, Kenneth Rexroth. Prose translated by Enid McLeod and Alan Pryce-Jones. New Directions. 278 pp. $6.75. Paper $2.75.

PAUL ZWEIG

Mr. Zweig is a poet who teaches at Columbia University.

When Jules Supervielle published his first volume, Débarcadères, in 1922, he was already an exile in poetry. The cultural stage was reverberating to the excitement of young men like André Breton and Tristan Tzara, who dreamed of descending into the street, revolver in hand, to perform an act of "poetry"; or of dark Cossacks leading their horses to drink in the fountains of La Concorde.

In 1922, Supervielle was 38 years old; a voyager whose earliest memories were not of France but of Uruguay: not of cities which were themselves acts of confused surrealism but of pampas, oceans and the kind of solitude which comes easily to a man surrounded by his own images. Supervielle was not and would never be a voice in Breton's surrealist tradition. His poetry was concerned with a kind of invisible reality which had to be coaxed into perception; there was no place for the shock of disparate images yoked together, or the liberating incoherence of the surrealist games. His only connection with surrealism is ironical, as he indicates in a long ode to Lautreamont, the ancestor

It is true that emotions never die fully, and in the script of Stepan Razin (1921) the young poet (Gorky) weeps when he quits the ship of the ruthless rebel, who slaughters innocents for Russia's sake. To speak of a "genuine" or even "troubled" friendship, however, is to give plasma to a myth. Gorky could not tolerate the ruthless. It is useful to recall that Jefferson and Hamilton disliked each other; but that this nation went on.

Any striking new chapter in the Gorky saga must come, I think, from the Soviet Union. Its writers and critics have not been able to deal frankly with him, or his work, because he was "the biography of his age" (Fedin) and they cannot yet discuss that age frankly. Like Yegor Bulichev, Gorky comprised more than himself: all the tragic complexities; and if this centennial throws a more honest light on what he stood for, or why he died, it will mean the USSR is a bit closer to unbinding them.

of all surrealists who, like Supervielle (and like Jules Laforgue), was born in Montevideo. We can only wonder at the coincidence which brought such unlike poets (all of them great) from this backwater city of South America, closer to the South Pole than to the cosmopolite Paris where they would become famous.

If we were to invent an ancestry for the open style of Supervielle's best poetry, it would have to include Rilke, Whitman, perhaps even Wordsworth. The poems selected for the New Directions volume represent the entire span of Supervielle's career. They reveal no abrupt changes in his style or in the poetic mood he chose to create. Supervielle was slow in discovering his imagination, but the spiritual ground he finally claimed he continued to explore until his death.

In an early poem, he speaks to a child, describing the "astonished look" she wears, like "a basket filled little by little with flowers and sweet-smelling grasses." The little girl faces him "like a signpost in the heart of a forest, pointing the way," for she represents to him the wonderment of poetry. Yet she is "the forsaken one," because her wonderment is also helpless and isolated:

The sky is so vast—perhaps there is no place beneath it for such a little child! We are stifled by too much space just as we are by too little; And yet, just like a grown-up person you must learn to bear The entire universe and all its moving heaviness;

Even the ants get used to it, and their little ones too.

Like the poet, the child is alive to all the small things of earth: the wonderment in her eyes surrounds her with a garland of images, and yet in all that vast extent of the world there is no place which is home for her. Unlike the ant, she has the power of wonderment and surprise (the power of poetry), and so can be at home nowhere if not in the inner spaces of her mind.

Supervielle devoted his poetic life to exploring these inner spaces. His most beautiful poems create a mood of ocean-like immobility. The poet becomes a spiritual diver, descending into the hidden reaches of his life:

When the drowned man awakens at the bottom of the ocean and his heart Begins to flutter like an aspen leaf He sees riding gently toward him ■ a horseman Who breathes without difficulty and motions to him not to be afraid. He strokes his face with a handful of yellow flowers And cuts off one of his hands without ■ trace of blood. The hand has fallen into the sand where it disappears without a sigh, Another hand exactly the same has taken its place and the fingers are working.

Supervielle's ocean is lighthearted and roomy, appearing wherever the poet needed its powerful inward space in order to drown the loneliness and the exile of his life in the outward spaces.

Whitman wrote that he could bear the wild energy of the sunrise only because he could also bring sunrise out of himself. Supervielle would have understood that impulse. But he knew that the imagination which brought sunrise out of him condemned him as well. The vigorous pleasure of the sunrise is present in every poem Supervielle wrote. Yet when the creatures of his mind turn to him, as in the poem "The Burden of a Single Day," saying, "Listen to me! Listen to me!" he remembers all at once that he has no power, answering: "I can do nothing for you," until the images vanish and he is left alone with "only my long table, my books, my papers." And his lips "begin to dream on their own, like lost children."

It is rare that poems translated from the French are as well served as those in Supervielle's Selected Writings. The poems translated by Denise Levertov and Kenneth Rexroth are gracefully and delicately done. Those (the majority) done by James Kirkup are sometimes uneven and surprisingly inaccurate; but just as often Mr. Kirkup has managed readable English versions capable of giving real poetic pleasure.

(Continued on page 387)

NEW UNIVERSITY CONFERENCE

University of Chicago—March 22-24, 1968

A CALL TO ACTION

We are committed to the struggle for a democratic university, one within which we may freely express the radical content of our lives and one which will be the antagonist and not the ally of pacifiers, domestic and international.

We are prepared to act on this now and in the future just as we have acted throughout the freedom struggles at home and the Movement to end the war in Vietnam. The New University Conference is not the beginning of the struggle for a democratic university; it is merely the beginning of the intensification of that struggle.

The New University Conference has three general tasks: it must lay out a comprehensive program for radical university reform, it must plan and initiate the organizations which will carry out that program, and it must encourage a significant expression of radical research and scholarship relating to public policy, the wider culture and the needs of the resistance, Black and poor people's movements.

From the New University Conference will come:

1. a national membership organization of faculty, graduate students and Movement intellectuals with a program for radical transformation of the American university.
2. new plans for campus activity and campus organizing and thus an end to the isolation which afflicts so many radicals, especially on the smaller campuses and those located away from large urban centers.

3. plans and organization to encourage and support radical scholarship and research so that it may be carried out on a professional and vocational basis rather than as now, a part-time occupation of a few. In addition, we hope to launch a high quality national periodical and to encourage further the formation of radical caucuses within professional associations.
4. expansion of anti-war and other Movement related research as well as new initiatives for university opposition to the war.
5. cooperative and informal Working Groups in American History, Political Science, Sociology, Asian Studies, Cold War History and other disciplines in which radicals are now challenging the doctrines of the university establishment.
6. intensification of the national movement to expose and dislocate university collaboration in war research and social manipulation.
7. a Placement and Defense Organization prepared to assist radicals in obtaining university positions and to provide defense support against the inevitable attacks of McCarthyites, respectable and otherwise.

Sponsors of The New University Conference *

Gar Alperovitz
Richard Barnett
Norman Birnbaum
Russell Block
Heather T. Booth
Jeremy Brecher
Carol Brightman
Michael Brown
Ray Brown
Noam Chomsky
James Cockcroft
William Derman
Steven Deutsch
Richard duBoff
John Ehrenreich
Richard Flacks

William Gamson
Bertram Garskof
Alex Georgiados
Edward Greer
Al Haber
Andrew Hawley
Tom Hayden
Michael Hirsch

Carol Holmes
Florence Howe
Paul Jacobs
Louis Kampf
Michael Klare
Paul Lauter
Jesse Lemisch
Richard Levins

William Livant
Janice Lloyd
Lee Lowenfish
Kenneth Lux
Cathy McAfee
John McDermott
Don McKelvey
Barton Meyers

Julie Nichamin
Myra Riskin
Melvin Rothenberg
Karen Sachs
Adam Schesh
Franz Schurmann
Richard Shaull
Vera Simone

James Somers
Karen Spaulding
Michael Warner
Lee Webb
Naomi Weisstein
Michael Wolff
Michael Zweig
" partial listing

New University Conference
1307 East 60th Street
Chicago, Illinois 60637

- ☐ I plan to attend. Please send me additional information.
☐ I enclose $_____ to help defray the costs of the Conference.

Name
Address
City State Zip

Three Poems About Che

CHE

I don't want to die shot in the stomach with a child's soft smile and blood smeared like jam on my face.

I am

Che and I have failed

*In one bright week, like a children's pageant they burned you into a jar of ashes, stretched your body in an autumn sun
let the children come and look at you*

There were your children: see, the quick ones glancing like murderers behind the backs of Army men: not at you or at the Army but at a village bigger than the one in which they began. These are yours, the small quick thieves of Latin America who saw in the dead man's face no fear

but the permissive smile of a sleeping brother

*"Remember, comrades, love of life does not sow fear of death" I could not live with it I cannot live with the pictures of my body twisting, coiling as the bullets strike it the brilliant grimace and the hands clasping one shoe off, one dirty moccasin blown away;
so I will go on dying for myself listening to the clean wind in my open body, faces of justice circling in peaceful death murmuring like a family in grief.*

LAWRENCE SWAIM

CHE GUEVARA

*Anyone can see suffering made you look like Christ, tied on a donkey,
fainting like a girl,
an icon on the front page of the New York Times, somebody's dead lover.*

STANLEY MOSS

A COMMON HARVEST

(to John Carter)

*. . . and I remember well
That in life's everyday appearances
I seemed about this time to gain clear sight
Of a new world —*

—William Wordsworth, "The Prelude"

We will have blizzards and the salt we spread to clear the streets will streak and etch its pallid white veins on the stone curbs.

The corpse of Che, or a wax-doll in his image, was stretched on a stark rack for the eyes of all the Western reporters.

*No, Che Guevara's dead: the duty of the dead is to make death.
The photo of his flesh in Time suggests the snow-destroying salt.*

*Our lakes are down the highway, serious, lovely, moral William,
who sickened of revolution and shored a dream with strength.*

Now each day passes; deep in the wild marshes, out in the native wheat, all men are sleeping well with you.

The ecstasy of the waning of the Fall with its wild colors at the quiet mind, prophesies dissolution.

PETER L. SIMPSON

Included in the New Directions volume is a collection of Supervielle's stories, and his short novel, The Man Who Stole Children, which follow the poems. The stories are written with the light simplicity of children's tales and, like the poems, they are often about children.

But these are a strange race of lonely, enigmatic creatures Supervielle evokes, as in his haunting parable, "The Child of the Open Sea." A small girl, we are told, lives in a desolate corner of the Atlantic Ocean. She walks up and down a watery street, between gardens of water and houses that are as ordinary as any to be found in France. When a ship appears on the horizon, the child of the open sea falls asleep, the town sinks beneath the waves, and the ship goes on without ever seeing the ephemeral street with its single inhabitant. The story is told simply, convincingly. The most marvelous events take on a natural color which compels our belief. Like so many of Supervielle's characters, the child is a prisoner of the imagination: a poor creature who, when she cries "Help!" to a passing ship which cannot see her, suddenly understands "all the hidden meanings of the word."

The legends Supervielle retells are fascinating—among them Orpheus, St. Anthony, The Rape of Europa, The Flight Into Egypt. In all of them he describes the dilemma of the poet isolated and yet curiously strengthened by his imagination like St. Anthony by his temptations, or like Orpheus by the magic of his singing.

Supervielle's short novel, The Man Who Stole Children, creates a similar mood of the marvelous. It tells the story of Colonel Bigua who steals unloved children. South American, rich, living in exile, Bigua tries to construct a world of love and good deeds, like the castle of daydreams he builds each afternoon as he relaxes at his sewing machine. Bigua is a childlike and lonely man, who finally leaps into the sea in order to preserve his daydream. That is where the novel ends. The story leaves the reader wondering whether the sea which claims him is the deadly, cold one that we know or the magical one of Supervielle's poems from which death has disappeared.

"Different evils need different modes of attack: from Swiftian saeva indignatio to subtle puncturing, from 'more in sorrow than in anger' to reductio ad absurdum . . ."

The second chapter of Private Screenings is particularly interesting because Simon discusses his twelve favorite motion pictures. There are some standard choices: Welles's Citizen Kane, Carné's Children of Paradise, Renoir's Rules of the Game, Antonioni's L'Avventura, and a Chaplin film, but also some offbeat choices—e.g., early films of Bergman and Fellini's The White Sheik and I Vitelloni. (He dismisses 8½ and Juliet of the Spirits as vacuous and tawdry.) Other choices are Clement's Forbidden Games, Kurosawa's The Seven Samurai, and perhaps the most surprising selection, Wajda's anti-war film, Kanal. Though there is an ill-advised attempt to have the discussion of the pictures connected, and the coherence is strained, the importance of the chapter is that we get examples of what one critic considers great art and why he does.

The bulk of the book consists of an impressive accumulation of essays from The New Leader. In almost every piece Simon employs the concept of art; it completely guides the book. He also scathingly reveals that which is non-art: ". . . that perfect piece of pseudo-artistic mediocrity Tom Jones"; ". . . today, a large body of film-makers, film-reviewers, and film consumers have lapsed into a tacit agreement: the brainless, trashy, antihuman—provided only that it be tricky or pretentious—shall be accepted and hailed as art"; "Otto Preminger's The Cardinal is very probably the last word in glossy dishonesty posturing as serious art. . . ."

Simon also discusses failed art with a tinge of sadness. Of Dear John he writes, "What is it that nevertheless prevents the film from attaining full artistic stature?"

Man With A Mission

PRIVATE SCREENINGS. By John Simon. The Macmillan Co. 316 pp. $6.95.

F. A. MACKLIN

Mr. Macklin is an assistant professor of English at the University of Dayton, and the editor of Film Heritage.

John Simon's new book, Private Screenings, is a furious defense of art, from its opening essay "A Critical Credo" in which Simon insists on the recognition of film as an art form. He believes criticism must have consummately high ideals: "It should never judge something, as is commonly done, on how well it fulfills its own aims, for by that standard, if it sets out to be junk, junk will have to be found excellent."

Simon is a fine stylist and a man of literature. He emphasizes the importance of the word in cinema, ". . . film is the one complex art in which two main components are equally important: text and cinematography, that is, word and image. . . . Words are no less important than pictures." His criticism recognizes the value of the script and the need for solid foundations to film art. He sees the corruption of this value: "The sooner we realize that improvisation is useful only in very small doses—and then, usually, with children, psychotics, or geniuses—the sooner, in other words, we fathom that dialogue, to be a work of art, must preponderantly be written, the better." Simon fears the lack of substance, the mindlessness, in extravagant chance creation, and is appalled by the work of Jean-Luc Godard, Andy Warhol and the proponents of the underground.

He dedicates himself to responsible criticism: "The first and last responsibility of the film critic, then, is—prepare yourself for a thundering truism—to raise the standard of motion pictures." Simon does this through different styles:

SANDY DENNIS · KEIR DULLEA · ANNE HEYWOOD

AS STARRING

*Between Ellen
and Jill
came Paul...*

IN D. H. LAWRENCE'S
THE FOX
...symbol of the male

Produced by RAYMOND STROSS - Directed by MARK RYDELL
Color by DeLuxe - From CLARIDGE PICTURES

VICTORIA / THE Festival

B'WAY & 57th ST. · JU 6-0041

A WALTER READE THEATRE

57th St. at 5th Ave. · LT 1-2323

of The Pawnbroker which he thinks failed, he introduces his review with the remark, "Any attempt in America to make a film a work of art must be hailed." Of The Spy Who Came in from the Cold, a film he liked, "A movie such as this one does, however, present one very serious problem: the problem of not being art. . . ." "Art is that which gets better with reexperiencing; nonart is what can be fully relished only once. It would be foolish to argue that there is no room for the perishable pleasure, the impermanent work. It would be slipshod not to evaluate it, too, according to its greater or lesser interest. But it would be wrong to make too much of it: it would be wrong to call it art."

In his discussion of To Die in Madrid he writes: "One of the greatest problems of art—perhaps the greatest—is that truth is not beauty, beauty not truth. . . . The artist must find a way of bringing these two, if not inimical at least alien, concepts into a temporary liaison, lasting, let us say, the length of a film." Simon's emphasis on art at first glance might seem to be a very restrictive theory. But it offers the strength and stability of a constant, strong point of view. Simon is the least contradictory of critics.

One of the most decisive elements in his criticism is the poetic sense of humanity and his insight in expressing it. He writes of the final image in The Organizer: ". . . such an impeccable parabola and rhythm of surprise, pathos, beauty of movement, sense of loss and void that what might be tear-jerking fills the eye not with dimming tears but widening vision." The facial expressions in Nothing But a Man are ". . . the silences at the core of art in which roars the inexpressible." Of Anouk Aimee in A Man and a Woman: ". . . everything in her speaks of a gentleness that only long nights of loving could have instructed in groping its way to the core of human darkness. . . ."

Simon can also be pungent. Of Melina Mercouri: "Her standard expression is a bemused, constipated smile which is supposed to convey everything from mysterious female canniness to irrepressible hormones. . . ." Of Elizabeth Taylor's performance in Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf?: "Martha, whom Uta Hagen made so richly, rottenly ripe, is here still in the throes of a difficult puberty. . . ."

He insists on a critical morality. "Nothing is more suspect in criticism nowadays than a moral position, and yet there can be no criticism without one . . . for aesthetics is the morality of art, just as morality is the aesthetics of living." (There is an interesting condemnation of Fellini and Godard for the abusive, self-justifying, brutalizing exploitation of their wives in their films.)

The chapter called "Godard and the Godardians" is a shocker. It is written in almost indefensible taste and is a brutal vilification of Godard and his work. It is obviously done in the "Swiftian saeva indignatio/reductio ad absurdum" Simon included in his critical creed. For Simon, Godard is "the quintessential antiartist," and his influence on the young and on our culture is abominable and ruinous. ". . . because Godard puts so much brute sight into his films, he gives the new blind, the new deaf their only seeing and hearing. And that, I submit, is truly dreadful."

In outrage at Andrew Sarris' comment that "Godard's allegedly revolutionary position is comparable to the positions of Stravinsky, Picasso, Joyce, and Eliot," Simon responds: "About the only place where Godard's position might be comparable to that of the other four is on the toilet seat. But Godard, alas, also expels his works from that position."

It is an attack to the death, nothing held back, anger boiling out against the enemy—and it is obvious that Simon views the Godardians as those who can destroy art and warp life. ". . . if you feel, as I do, that the locus of art is the point of intersection of three lines of pursuit—the aesthetic, the intellectual, and, in the loosest sense of the word, the moral—you will find Godard's work far removed from that point. . . ." He rages against the critics who spread the cockeyed vision of Godard. ". . . to a critic like Susan Sontag—a critic, by the way, who is 'against interpretation,' which is rather like being against criticism—this [Godard's] very affectless emptiness is a virtue."

Simon also tries to demolish the point of view exhibited by Pauline Kael, ". . . that curious combination of lively shrewdness, sentimental-hysterical self-indulgence, and dependably plebeian tastes. . . ." "Godard is the essence of immature, escapist nostalgia under a thin veneer of sophisticated irony, and it may be that because Miss Kael shares some of his attitudes his films become so attractive to her."

John Simon has often been chastised and ignored because of his alleged pedantry (he quotes foreign languages) and his harsh point of view, but he is ignored more because filmgoers are unable to bear a morality of art that is severe and demanding. That morality is "a relevance to human life, an elegance of spirit. . . ." John Simon's Private Screenings keeps a sense of ideals before us; it demands prestige for film in the arts; it clarions a loving but fierce humanity.

THEATRE/Harold Clurman

The quality of lyricism in Jerome Kass's Saturday Night is not strained (Sheridan Square Playhouse). When papa Harris, a retired tailor, only slightly misquotes T. S. Eliot—"I grow old . . . I grow old . . . I shall wear the bottom of my pants rolled . . ."—one is surprised, amused and above all touched. Everything in the play is like that. The story line partakes of what has by now become a tradition of American Jewish comedy, renewed here by a special fillip of tenderness.

The old man quotes Eliot: his daughter Rochelle quotes Whitman and Yeats because she is a librarian whose education is an aspiration rather than a property. Both father and daughter long for "Byzantium"—a painting on the Bronx baroque ceiling of a neighborhood movie house—because they dream of escape from the humdrum of the city's bedroom ghetto. He escapes to Doris Day on Saturday nights, she to the fantasies she spins with her fat friend Ellie while Pop is away.

The girls tell each other impossible tales of romantic encounters during the week, Rochelle in headlong ecstasy and Ellie, more earth-bound with some reluctance. They dress fancifully for the occasion, redecorate and spread incense over the apartment, play Brahms, drink bourbon and tell lies like truth. Even Rochelle's downheartedness, couched in distortions of poets and prophets, is a form of consolation for her loveless life. She finds in all the deep thinkers a confirmation and an echo of her own melancholy. "In a crappy world all crap goes. No God, no rules: Camus in a nutshell!"

The hilarity with which one greets Rochelle's literary lamentations is always tinged by the gentle pity (without condescension) with which Jerome Kass informs his play. He is all warm sentiment, yet rarely sentimental. He is a shrewd observer yet ever kind. A local realist, he is nevertheless something of a poet. He knows the stenographers, the cab drivers, the cops of our town, but there is no trace of vulgarity in his view of them, only a fine sense of fraternity. His sadness is wreathed in a bashful smile. He is a young playwright to be cherished.

The play is very well acted by Zina Jasper as Rochelle, whose fervor needs only greater vocal modulation and variety of emotional attack to make it perfect. Gina Collins is brilliant as Ellie, whose blend of wistful naïveté and canny bluntness produces a consummate portrait of the hope and disabused yearning of our ladies of the subways. The director, Burt Brinckerhoff, might do a little more to make Shimen Ruskin as the aggrieved Mr. Harris suffer from hurt rather than exasperation.

Portrait of A Queen, a staged reading rather than a play, is an arrangement by William Francis from the letters, diaries, speeches, newspaper reports and spicy ditties of Victoria's long reign (Henry Miller's Theatre). A narrative continuity is shaped from the material, and for those who like myself are enchanted by leaves from the pages of history it makes a most agreeable evening.

To many Americans history is a dead letter. The past fails to speak to us in a living voice. But for the English, history is present: they know themselves—even when they disdain it—to be its direct heirs. Because this is so, Portrait of A Queen can be a box office success in the London theatre. It is not without glamour for some of us here.

A good deal of the effect is owing to Dorothy Tutin's refreshingly cool portrait of the Queen. Victoria in Miss Tutin's reading is forever putting the best face on disagreeable or painful matters. Her voice is pitched high in sweetly regal loftiness: even in grief her countenance remains a white cameo of unforced dignity. The language throughout has a relaxed and formal purity which alights on our sensibilities in this time of rasping exacerbation like a steady hand, a smooth detergent.

The last act, perhaps the most interesting in the familiarity of its personages, falls short of full effectiveness through the too ponderous caricature of James Cossins' Gladstone (the Prime Minister was after all a force, neither fool nor bore), and through Dennis King's too stagily resonant Disraeli, who was famous for his keen wit, not for his voice.

Jakov Lind's Ergo (at the Public Theatre on Lafayette Street) is a savagely anti-German comedy in a typically German vein. (Lind is an Austrian but his artistic forebears are German.) The play is extremely interesting as evidence of the violent loathing felt by a whole generation of postwar writers for the ever-present characteristics that German artists since 1919 (and some before that)—Heinrich Mann, Frank Wedekind, Carl Sternheim, Georg Kaiser, Oskar Kokoschka and others—have repeatedly vented.

The tone of Lind's play is one of obscenely raucous derision too fierce to be called funny. Foreigners have never spewed as much contempt on the Germans as have some of these Germans themselves. In doing so, very few have so glaringly exemplified the symptoms which are the targets of their abuse. The satire is frantic, scabrous, grossly over-inflated; excess among Germans is not confined to Hitlerism.

Lind hoots at the erstwhile lower-class Nazis' insane attempt to absolve their guilt by hounding out the more correct breed which hides in obscure places, immaculate with a sense of order and scientific precision. (A couple make love wearing antiseptic surgical masks.) With every step these characters take and every word they utter they betray the same ineradicable traits which made them the bane of humankind in the days of their triumph. Their offspring are either the now scruffy and mostly impotent intellectuals of time-honored Teutonic stripe or the turgid hairsplitting philosophic maniacs engaged in concocting a new hash from the old metaphysics for dubious political purposes. They are surrounded by silly Socialist workers, seedy Junkers with the same supercilious Wilhelmian arrogance as before, and by vast hordes of bloated bourgeois sheep who bleat and croak to the perennial beery tunes of pompous and disgusting flatulence. Above all these proceedings the double-headed eagle spreads its wings, while down below the apologists sigh that their people lack "character."

What gives such satire relevance beyond the immediate accusations of neo-Nazism and not dissimilar strains of thought, feeling and behavior (police brutality, bureaucratic arrogance and punitive bigotry in education) is the suspicion that the Germans may not be the only ones to be so infected. In its raging invective, wild symbolism and verbal power, this post-expressionist diatribe still has value.

Except for the inadequacy in staging of the final moments, Ergo is extraordinarily well produced by Joseph Papp and directed by Gerald Freedman. In setting, casting, costuming, make-ups and general treatment, the play's style is admirably caught in all its grotesquerie. Tom Aldredge as the covert but "clean" Nazi, Jack Hollander as the one besmirched and buried in tons of discarded newspapers, Robert Stattel as the soiled pundit, and Sam Waterston the macerated scion of the good old German culture are especially effective.

Because I directed Christopher Fry's translation of Jean Giraudoux's Tiger at the Gates in London, New York, and later on television, I shall not discuss its production at the Repertory Theater of Lincoln Center. I shall confine myself to repeating for the umpteenth time an axiom of theatre aesthetics which has apparently not yet been absorbed as knowledge in the minds of those who should have learned it long since.

A towering dramatic text is a bad play when it is ineptly produced. Hamlet or any such masterpiece, when its essential quality is missed, has less theatric (or artistic) value than a third-rate occasional piece.

Tiger at the Gates is not a great play, but it is one of considerable point and stature. It is a passionate comedy, not a bit of boulevard fluff. Its wit and eloquence are not due to anachronism—fabled Troy in the guise of France on its way to the Second World War—they are the outcry of a seer masking himself in tense irony. Giraudoux utters his warning with a semblance of disengaged hauteur so as not to disturb us overmuch by exposing his apprehension and heartbreak at what he foresees. In his play, a memory of tragedy and a haunting premonition of its eternal perpetuation are draped in the comely garb of Gallic calm, splendor and sensuality.

This is the significance of the play as it was presented in Paris in 1935, again in English in 1955, and as it still remains in its text. But without a stage vision of its core and tone it becomes nothing but soggy verbiage. If it seems so now the fault is not Giraudoux's.

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 3-18-68
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

- ☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

Name.....

Address.....

City.....

State..... Zip No.....

TELEVISION/ John Horn

The President's National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders has taken the essential step of clarifying to whites what has been obscure to them because of chronic self-deception: that white racism is father to racial injustice. Yet the commission's view of television is so curiously narrow—regarding it as one of the news media, not as the wall-to-wall, sunrise to sunrise, social environment of Pop culture it more importantly is—that one wonders whether the superficiality stems from ignorance or intent. At best the Kerner commission, by looking at television as merely one of the news media and considering only their collective role in the amelioration of racial tension through wider, better and integrated news coverage, suggests that even it has not yet faced up to the profound upheavals that are necessary in the hearts, minds and practices, both individual and institutional, of the white majority.

To newspapers and broadcasting the commission recommended expansion of news coverage of the Negro community, integration of Negro and white coverage, recruitment and training of more Negroes as journalists, improvement in the reporting of riots and coordination with police. All these proposals are to the good, but to consider television in its relatively minor role as reporter, while ignoring its major role as social conditioner—creating a social climate, setting standards and examples of morals, goals and behavior, stimulating desires and expectations—is to be blind to the medium's effect on our society.

Television is a fifth column bringing into Negro homes white nonsense, white violence, white affluence, white materialism, white indifference to fellow Americans of color. To all human beings television is a continuous assault on the heart, the mind and the spirit. To Negroes, as to all racial minorities, it is a major alienating force.

The promise of television was that of a window on the world. The reality of television today is a shop window on a world of commercial-studded frivolity created by broadcasting and advertising interests. Negroes in their ghettos look at this artificial world and see that it is white, hedonistic, violent, affluent and exploitative. The situation comedies, the game shows, the Westerns, the adventure tales, the dramas, the movies, variety, comedy, discussions and commercials—just about all the fare is aimed at the white middle class. Black viewers did not need the Kerner commission to tell them that "our nation is moving toward two societies, one black, one white—separate and unequal." Television by and large excludes Negroes. It denies them the public air waves. It tells them the great white society does not care for them. It gives them a false image of themselves.

The world of television, of course, is a false image of the white world as well, but it is a true reflection of white values. Affluent whites who have control of television employ it to their own economic ends, not for human communication. It is a deprivation of grave consequence.

There have been unusual instances when Negroes were addressed by television as Negroes and people. It was startling to hear, during local station breaks, a plea from Negro leaders to the Negro community of New York City to cool it during the Harlem riots of 1963. Startling because television is seldom used for such direct, social communication. Several years ago the program, The Comers, on New York City's educational Channel 13, gave a group of racially and economically diverse youngsters, mainly high school juniors and seniors, the opportunity to get to know one another in free-wheeling discussion on camera. In the process they learned and at the same time taught the television audience that we are all of us, no matter the race, creed or economic position, one community. By having freedom of microphone and camera, the youngsters learned too that the community cared. Typically the program was dropped, on pretext of insufficient funding, after the kids got into a frank discussion of sex that offended adults in the TV audience.

Such examples are rare and they exist now only as history. Every night of the week television offers the more usual sights and sounds of fiddling while civilization burns.

The prospect of changing television into a tool that would help rather than exploit America is not hopeful. The FCC has been permissive about public service. Congress has been more concerned with private broadcasters than public welfare. The most recent proposal to better American television, the still-in-prospect Public Broadcasting Corporation to aid noncommercial television, may need, according to its chairman, Frank Pace, Jr., twenty years to develop into a potent social and educational force. The slow build-up will put America where England was when it began its television system in 1936 by creating the autonomous British Broadcasting Corporation. A communications gap of fifty-two years is ludicrous for an America with crucial and urgent problems to solve now.

Was it too much to expect the Kerner commission to examine television in some depth? The commission was cautious about treading on freedom of the press in discussion of news coverage of riots. It completely overlooked the responsibility of television stations—not their news organizations but the stations themselves—to operate "in the public interest, convenience and necessity." That is how their licenses read. But television is used to amuse the whites and to move their goods. It gives no one, least of all Negroes, a sense of community or a feeling of human dignity. It is divisive. It deprives minorities, especially Negroes, of a part in the American present and future.

The frightful thing is that we have institutionalized white American prejudice by entrusting television to commercial interests which are committed to the majority (white) audience on a limited, materialistic basis. We have in effect given away the instrument that could save us.

PUBLICATIONS

BOOK BARGAINS!! Both new and used. Free lists. Also free search elusive titles. Harco, Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032

GARRISON RIGHT? Conspiracy report 'The New Nazis' $1.00 or free information. Vikar N, Box 2241, Springfield, Mass. 01101

THE FUTURIST, published bimonthly by World Future Society, reports scientists' forecasts for coming decades. Subscription: $5 yearly. Box 19285-N, Twentieth Street Station, Washington D.C. 20036.

POETRY HAIKU STYLE—365 1/4 by Sal Omon. Paper, $1.50 S. Gerstenfeld, Box 8326 Mt. View, Alaska 99504.

FROM PEKING & HANOI: Mao Tse-tung's "Quotations" ■ "On People's War," both famous little red books for $1.00. Ho-Chi-Minh's "Prison Diary," 75c. Subscription to Peking Review, 52 weeks, air, $4.00. Subscription to Vietnam Courier, 26 weeks, $5.00. Payment with order to CHINA BOOKS, Dept. N, 2929-24th St., San Francisco 94110. FREE CATALOG.

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

DEBATE THE ANTIBALLISTIC MISSILE—pros and cons on the deployment of the ABM; 11 articles prepared by military and political experts. Pp. 169. Paper, $1.50; Hardbound, $5. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, 5201 Kimbark, Chicago, Illinois 60611

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION

Independent, lively, and original. Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION

P.O. Box 1413

Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

Crossword Puzzle No. 1241

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Where the stars might be out in the country? (2, 8)
- 6 Ring in a box? Quite the contrary. (4)
- 10 The candidate is obviously in operation.
- 11 Making someone it seems like the pricing of an article. (7)
- 12 Primer to confuse one who may have a duty to bring things in? (7)
- 13 A suggestion on what to do for meat? (5)
- 5 Johnson's place in the news occasionally? (5)
- 7 March past as one might be taken in? (5, 4)
- 9 We might come to grips soon with this forecast. (9)
- 21 Goes under, like many disreputable places. (5)
- 23 Reduces the length of the strands of coral, possibly. (5)
- 24 A confused rumble on the line, in short? Food for worms by implication. (8)
- 27 Get a certain amount back after this trouble with the neck. (7)
- 28 Proceed to furnish on credit. (7)
- 29 Cuts the support out from under those who are typified by 17. (4)
- 30 Starts to pen letters for a churchman?

DOWN:

- 1 and 25 down In France, bear certain spirits reflecting on us. (9)
- 2 Perhaps tackle a worker for the phone company. (7)

- 3 Feature nothing but cotton cloth? (5)
- 4 Because they roll their money into them? (9)
- 5 You terrestrials don't live in such space, but hope to find it early here. (5)
- 7 12 across might fit this to a T, but it used to be fair game. (7)
- 11 Unmindful of the large dress design? (10)
- 9 Urges a boy to have such a sandwich? (3, 5)
- 14 Only black or white allowed when the invitation calls for them to be held by the owners? (10)
- 16 Give a little, good-looking! (8)
- 18 Serving the nuts later, in consequence? (9)
- 20 Dance, as a general course of action. (3-4)
- 22 In, over, and around the balcony. (7)
- 24 Numbered among the 4. (5)
- 25 See 1 down.
- 26 Worst, paradoxically. (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1240

ACROSS: 1 Vainglory; 6 Parts; 9 Lettish; 10 Abridge; 15 Overload; 16 Studio; 18 Typing; 20 Discount; 23 Iron; 24 and 28 Second-guessed; 25, 11 and 13 Batten down; 29 Inverts; 30 Ruses; 31 Delusions. DOWN: 1 Valet; 2 Intense; 3 Ghibelline; 4, Ophidian; 5 Years; 6 and 12 Portending; 7 Redwood; 8 Sternmost; 14 Stock doves; 15 Outrigger; 17 Binomial; 19 Process; 21 Umberto; 22 Seeded; 26 Tusks; 27 Uses.

PERSONALS

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE

(Computerized Matching—All Ages)
"Let TEAM make you a team."

Write:

TEAM Project

245 East 30th Street
New York, N.Y. 10016, Phone 889-6020

SALASACAN WALL-HANGINGS — Tapestries hand-woven by the Salasacan Indians of the Andes. Moderately priced. (C.D.Project). Write: ANDEAN, Box 472, Cuenca, Ecuador.

"LBJ DARTBOARD GAME." A giant 14" solid cobra construction dartboard with LBJ's face as the target (or Reagan, Bobby Kennedy, Sigmund Freud, Nixon, Nasser, Wallace and DeGaulle) is yours for only $3.95 postpaid. Three precision brass darts imported from England are included for your bull's eye accuracy. Send check or money order to: TOPP, P.O. Box 1802-V, Chicago, Illinois 60690

DISCOVER an intriguing, fun approach to meeting alert, literate Jewish singles. No computers used. For FREE analytical questionnaire write: Dept. N, OPERATION MAZELTOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036. (PL 7-3638)

"IS INTERNATIONAL RACE WAR IMMINENT?" Ted Baker leads discussion, Thursday, March 21, 7:45 P.M., Metropolitan-Duane Church, 13th Street, Seventh Avenue, Manhattan. Contribution $1.00.

FIGHT JUNK MAIL. Send it back at THEIR expense. Labels and instruction $1.00. Artichoke, P.O. Box 9123C, Bridgeport, Connecticut 06601

INTERESTED IN LIFE? Believe men should live each day to the fullest? So do humanists. For information write: Dept. N-1, American Humanist Association, 125 El Camino del Mar, San Francisco, Calif. 94121.

I WOULDN'T BUY A USED CAR FROM EITHER JOHNSON OR NIXON—239 other underground buttons. Free catalogue to all. Free sample to stores. 1/25c, 5/51, 50/55, 125/10, and 1000/$75. A Big-Little Store, Dept. N, 1671 Washington, San Francisco, 94109

BOOKPLATES

FREE CATALOG—beautiful designs for every age and taste. Special designing too. Address: BOOKPLATES, Yellow Springs 2, Ohio.

ART

WOULD YOU BELIEVE? EXCITING ORIGINAL woodcuts, etchings, lithos, $4.50 each. Subscription information: Graphic Circle, (NI), 68 Fifth Avenue, New York City 10011

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

TYPING WORRIES??? Expert Typing, Reasonable Rates. Manuscripts, doctoral and masters theses our specialty. Call (201) 667-5145

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Next week in The NATION

Theodore Roszak reports on the "Counter Culture"

Theodore Roszak is editor of the recent book, The Dissenting Academy, which he has described as a "polemic that would reveal the unreal remoteness of academic work."

For The NATION, Roszak writes movingly of other kinds of "unreal remoteness" in the troubled America of today. He looks at the cultists of Hippiedom and the victims of the needle.

And he studies the message of intellectual leaders who have gained new audiences for work that denies the accepted, traditional methods of classifying our national problems as curable by the "new products" of an old system.

A Searching Series

In examining men like Timothy Leary, Paul Goodman, and Allen Ginsberg, Roszak pursues his own search for a fresh reality to replace the jaded, monstrous myths that flourish in today's Establishment.

You won't agree, we're reasonably confident, with every word Roszak writes. But you may be moved by new ideas in his series, and you may be stirred by the rigorous, uncynical search for hope that informs his critical approach.

Are you the kind of reader for whom men like Roszak write? If you are, you may find The NATION a rewarding weekly experience. Why not sign up now?

FREE offer with new 1 year subscription:

The NATION, 333 Sixth Avenue,
New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join your good fight for 1 year (48 issues).
I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me
FREE Jean Carper's new book on the draft,
BITTER GREETINGS (retail price $5, 205 pp.).

☐ I'll try you for half a year. I enclose $6.

Name

Street

City State Zip

N 3-18

The good fight is now in
THE
NATION
—why not join now?

ENGLAND'S ORPHANS RICHARD BLUMENTHAL

THE
NATION

MARCH 25, 1968 35 cents

BURLINGAME
MAR 26 1968
LIBRARY

The Counter Culture: / PART I

YOUTH AND THE GREAT REFUSAL

THEODORE ROSZAK

Vietnam Analogy
Greece, Not Munich ARNO J. MAYER

NEXT STOP, WISCONSIN JOHN PATRICK HUNTER

ROBERT BLY
and
The National Book Awards

2-21-68 P-3-1449
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
-LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

NEWSPAPER

LETTERS

knowing the school

San Francisco, Calif.

DEAR SIR: As a long-time subscriber and lover of The Nation and a long-time faculty member at San Francisco State, I'm irritated by the long letter signed by Richard Fitzgerald and Anatole Anton in the Feb. 19 issue.

Our college has received considerable national and even international attention in recent months and much of the press coverage has been inaccurate. However, the writers you have selected to cover us—Shover, Windmiller and finally David Swanston, have a record of liberal achievement on this campus and they are all able writers who know the scene. Anatole Anton and Richard Fitzgerald are not listed in the current bulletins and catalogues, have no record that we know about except disruption this past semester and miss the boat in so many ways in their letter that it would take pages to refute their mystique.

Because of their lack of history and knowledge of the campus they may deem the quality of radical leadership at the college as "very high." Swanston, as a former editor of our daily college paper and now a reporter on the San Francisco Chronicle with Berkeley as his beat, knows that the quality of FSM leadership and the present UC student radicals put us to shame. It is tragic for us that our radicals cannot discriminate between the cold warriors and the hot progressives as their enemies.

Kay Boyle, who knows the scene here and still spends much of her time in jail for persistent peace activity, is right: "The Swanston piece . . . is the one really accurate piece of reporting and speculation. . . . It is a fine and just report."

Jerrold L. Werthimer tasks for the intellectual Naperville, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Dr. Nettl's description of the intellectual ["Are Intellectuals Obsolete?"; The Nation, Mar. 4] as a man with universal concerns, absorbed with the quality of life and dedicated to a socio-political role is superb, but it would be helpful to be more definitive. What are the universal values of the intellectual? What qualities of life should concern him? What socio-political role must he play?

The questions I pose are not impossible. Indeed, they are imperative. We live in a technological culture which is trying to make universals out of speed and efficiency and productivity, and science has been prostituted to this effort. . . .

The genuine task of the intellectual is twofold. He must engage in a serious attempt to evaluate the values of our technological civilization, and he must commit himself to the preservation of the values which undergird a humanist world community. The universals to which I refer are the values upon which science is founded: truth, the use of reason as a means thereto, and freedom. There may be no objective reason why a person should prefer truth to falsehood, reason to irrationalism or freedom to slavery, but there can be little doubt that if we remain ethically neutral when truth is aborted, reason neglected and freedom violated, humanity has suffered a setback. Let no one think of this struggle in terms of the so-called "East-West conflict." The problem is inherent in Western industrialism. . . .

Only the intellectual can comprehend the magnitude of the human predicament and provide the leadership sorely needed. Until intellectuals do comprehend and act, we are at the mercy of the bureaucratic social engineers, the trained military killers, the mindless nationalistic politicians and their hirelings. . . .

Rev. Eugene Wm. Kreyes

EDITORIALS

McCarthy's Victory

Senator McCarthy has scored a stunning victory in New Hampshire. Not only did he receive a higher percentage of the Democratic vote than even his backers anticipated (42 per cent) but he actually managed to walk off with twenty of the state's twenty-four delegates (because of a surplus of pro-Johnson candidates; there were forty-five of them for the twenty-four openings). When the campaign began, McCarthy was almost unknown in the state, and President Johnson had every advantage, including the support of the local Democratic officials. Under these circumstances, McCarthy's victory is truly impressive. It will add momentum to the primary campaigns in Wisconsin and California where his prospects, even before March 12, seemed brighter than they did in New Hampshire. It will give a real lift to the pro-McCarthy amateurs, notably the young college students who added so much color and interest to the campaign. They may not have been a major factor in the outcome, but their activities, widely and favorably reported by the mass media, have greatly stimulated national interest in McCarthy's candidacy. To be sure, he got help from two serious mistakes on the part of the Johnson forces: they sent out pre-election pledge cards in violation of the spirit if not the letter of the election laws and at the last minute they tried to apply the smear tactics of Joe McCarthy to Eugene McCarthy. Both moves backfired; even some of the President's supporters took exception to them.

The vote was also a tribute to Senator McCarthy's talents as a campaigner. The Nation has felt from the start that the Senator's manner of campaigning has more to commend it than some of his friendly critics are prepared to concede. But then we had occasion to measure the effectiveness of his personal political style at the Nation Institute Conference last year (February 25) in Los Angeles and so were prepared to believe that the enthusiasm he aroused then was a measure of the reception he might expect elsewhere. The notion that he is too "professorial," theoretical and restrained is another mass-media cliché that was concocted long before it could be put to the test.

But it has been the dramatic shift in sentiment against the war since the Tet offensive that more than anything else accounts for Senator McCarthy's fine showing. We had occasion last year to commend Sen. George McGovern (D., S. Dak.), who also appeared at the Nation Institute Conference, for his remarkable courage in taking a strong stand against the war. At that time we suggested ("Speaking Out," May 8, 1967) that not only had he taken the correct position but that it would probably turn out to be good practical politics. And so it has. Since the Tet offensive, support for Senator McGovern has shown a sharp increase. The latest report of the usually reliable South Dakota poll shows Senator McGovern leading Gov. Nils A. Boe, who is his likely Republican opponent, by a 71 to 24 margin. This is a truly remarkable lead for a Democrat incumbent in a largely Republican state.

Now that the President's vulnerability has been demonstrated—now that the deep division within the Democratic Party has been revealed on the issue of the war and on Johnson ("There is a feeling," Senator McCarthy notes in one of his most perceptive understatement, that "the President doesn't really represent what America stands for"), Senator Kennedy has decided, as we suggested he might, to add his challenge to that of McCarthy's. In general, this is a good move; it will insure an assault in strength on Johnson-Humphrey and it will redouble pressure on Johnson to stand aside. It will also, by indirection aid Rockefeller; the wheel horses of the GOP will not relish the prospect of a Kennedy-Nixon campaign, even with a "new" Nixon and a different Kennedy. But as we see it, Senator Kennedy should not enter the primaries; on the contrary he should support McCarthy. He can do so on the theory, which is sound, that their joint task at the moment is to maximize the opposition to Johnson. Between now and the convention, Kennedy can make his major contribution by lining up delegates from the non-primary states and by helping McCarthy in the states that will be holding primary elections. The campaign may well shape up as a repeat of the 1952 campaign in which Kefauver's remarkable showing in the primaries was a factor in President Truman's decision not to seek re-election, but when Stevenson, not Kefauver, gained the nomination. Let the delegates at Chicago choose between Kennedy and McCarthy if it comes to that; the decision will rest with them in any case. But there should be no split or division in the anti-Johnson forces. A great deal can and will happen between now and the convention; the immediate task is to keep the anti-Johnson elements moving in the same direction. Whatever happens, the country owes a round of thanks to Senator McCarthy who has managed to set the political system in motion. Suddenly it is spring, and a flood of political energies will now find release, thanks to his courage and initiative and imagination.

Double Stalemate

In an editorial, "An Appeal to the President" (The Nation, March 11), we echoed Sen. Thruston B. Morton's suggestion that, for the good of the country, Mr. Johnson should not seek re-election. The idea may have sounded quixotic; in reality, it was and is a sober political proposal. As far as mortal wit can tell, and whatever may be the case with Governor Rockefeller, or Sen. Robert Kennedy, or Senator McCarthy, President Johnson has no solution for resolving the fundamental problem afflicting the country—the Vietnamese War. That American policy faces crisis in Vietnam is now almost universally conceded. The dropouts multiply, the disaffection spreads. Newsweek threw in the towel this week, Time may follow with the next issue or the one following. (If it isn't pondering such a move, it isn't living up to its name.)

Everyone of mature political sense now sees our dilemma: we can't apply our power except at a price which we, as a predominantly sane nation, are not prepared to pay, either on our own behalf or that of our South Vietnamese wards. The basis on which we are willing to

IN THIS ISSUE

March 25, 1968

EDITORIALS

394

ARTICLES

398 Next Stop, Wisconsin

John Patrick Hunter

400 The Counter Culture: Part 1

Youth and the Great Refusal

Theodore Roszak

407 Vietnam Analogy:

Greece, Not Munich

Arno J. Mayer

410 Orphans of Empire:

A Bad Day in Commons

Richard Blumenthal

BOOKS & THE ARTS

413 The National Book Awards

414 On Pablo Neruda

Robert Bly

417 Lies (poem)

Robert Bly

418 A Sadness for America

Paul Zweig

420 Theatre

Harold Clurman

421 Films

Robert Hatch

422 Art

Max Kozloff

423 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 for Canadian postage; $2 for foreign postage.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 206

No. 13

negotiate is not and will never be acceptable to the Vietcong and the North Vietnamese. Our involvement rises, our strength wanes, the pacification program is moribund, and the people of the United States are divided as never before in a time of national travail. The national crisis is mirrored by the personal crisis Lyndon B. Johnson faces in this election year. In any direction he looks, he is stymied. He can let the stalemate continue, but politically that is impossible except as a short-term stalling maneuver. He can escalate yet once more, raising the casualty lists (the Russians will match him weapon for weapon) and bringing us closer to World War III.

But there is a way out of both stalemates: he could decide not to seek re-election and thus create the circumstances which might make it possible to negotiate a settlement. The President is so heavily committed to a military solution that at this late date his options are narrowly limited. It is his candidacy that divides and will continue to divide his party and the nation. Sensing the situation, as no doubt he does, he should stand aside. If Richard Nixon is nominated, it is conceivable that he might defeat Johnson. That would be a climactic humiliation for the President and might well be catastrophic for the country. A brighter outlook would be the Republican nomination of Nelson Rockefeller and that would be more likely if the President were to step down. As matters stand, the Republicans, who are eager to win, feel that even Nixon can beat Johnson. If the President withdraws, his action would have been relatively selfless, and he would have the satisfaction of knowing that he had given his party a chance to unite under new leadership and perhaps even to go on to win the election. History will look on him more benignly, and his pride will suffer far less, if he decides to follow the example of President Truman and not seek re-election.

The Complete Demagogue

It may go against the grain, but let us give Richard Nixon his due. He is a remarkable political figure, with the resilience of a tennis ball and also some of its flight characteristics. The astonishing way in which this man has rebounded from the humiliations of 1960—when Dwight D. Eisenhower nearly jettisoned him—and 1962, when after defeat in California he took out his rage on the press, is proof that he is a phenomenon even among politicians of his type.

In contrast to those dark days, he is now a model of equanimity; he even looks better. Credit for this must be given to his TV make-up and the cosmetics industry in general. His move to New York and his $200,000 income, from a law practice for which he manages somehow to find time, have had a very good outward effect. Inside his head, where his political thoughts swirl, he is of course the same old Nixon. New Hampshire gave ample, if unneeded proof.

The marks of a demagogue are many, but the principal ones are an appeal to the emotions, the lower the better; a contempt for consistency—which also implies a contempt for the voters—and reckless promises so worded that they will sound plausible to the inexperienced. Drawing on the last, the new Nixon used a maneuver which had worked when Ike tried it: he promised to "end the war." He gave no details and ignored the differences between Vietnam and Korea, as well as those between Eisenhower and himself. Moving in the same direction, he suggested that the draft might be eliminated. This was smart. Opinion from moderate to left opposes the draft, and for their own reasons the right wing of the Republican Party and the so-called new conservatives are also against it. Nixon's comments on the report of the President's commission on civil disorders were sure-fire with the bulk of the good, solid, property-owning middle class; in any case he has no hope of making serious inroads on the Negro vote.

The appearance of being "against the war" was coupled with statements implying the contrary. Naturally this was a bit confusing, but sowing confusion is one of the prime requisites of success in the demagogue business. When asked just how he would end the war, Nixon came up with the most impudent of all his ploys—that since he may well be the next President of the United States, it would not behoove him to say what his plans were at this time. New Hampshire voters are a smart lot on the whole, but the ones who swallowed that excuse must be at the lower end of the intelligence curve.

There is no comfort in the fact that, being a complete opportunist as well as a complete demagogue, and sensing the mounting feeling against the war, Nixon might wind up a dove, or at least a hawk in dove feathers. Lyndon B. Johnson looked as though he might be trusted in 1964; Richard M. Nixon lacks even the appearance.

Disaffection in the Senate

The publicly televised hearings of 1966 were the first serious effort by the Senate—specifically the Senate Foreign Relations Committee—to get back into the act, to recapture some of the power and assume some of the responsibility it had abdicated over a period of twenty years or more. This year it has insisted that Secretary Rusk appear publicly. He has refused—until now. Last week's hearings were far more effective than those of 1966. The Senate is rebelling; the debate that preceded the hearings showed it. The hearings were a good thing per se, in terms of the balance between the Executive and the legislative branches, and because they conveyed to the public the Senate's deep uneasiness and concern.

More specifically, on the Gulf of Tonkin question, Senator Morse was devastating. What he said was a brilliant vindication of the position he and Senator Gruening have held right along. Rusk did not attempt to reply. He simply said that the record was available and anyone could read it and make his own judgment.

Senator Cooper tried to get an answer to what was really meant by "negotiation," the San Antonio formula, etc., but Secretary Rusk was evasive. Yet his very evasiveness underscored the fact that, despite what it says, the Administration is not willing to withdraw American troops from Vietnam because it knows that the Saigon government would fall flat on its face as soon as they left.

There is merit in what Morse and The Nation have said in the past, namely, why not take the issue to the Security Council, with a promise in advance to be bound by the results? The Birchites would howl; well, let them. If the Security Council refused to act, take it to the General Assembly. The familiar argument on the other side is that North Vietnam, China and North Korea are not members. But, as Morse pointed out, the Charter imposes an obligation on the UN to try to maintain the peace of the world, and is quite clear on the point that the UN's activities can extend to situations in which one of the parties is not a member. Whether or not the Security Council members like such a procedure is irrelevant. They are not at the UN for their material or psychological comfort, but to make an honest effort to preserve the peace.

There remain serious tactical weaknesses in the critics' position. They still hesitate, for example, to say in so many words that containment will not work in Asia because the conditions are quite unlike those in Europe. They still have not thought very deeply or clearly about so-called wars of national liberation or about revolutionary wars in general. They are still unable to see that it is the failure of American policy toward China which has been largely responsible for both the Korean War and the present war in Vietnam. But disaffection is mounting in the Senate and in the House and there will be further encounters.

From the public's point of view the hearings were a success and N.B.C. is to be commended for televising them. The confrontation was vivid and dramatic. Some of the commentators contend that the exchange failed to move either side; the divergence of views remained. But this assessment does not take into account the impact on the large audience that watched the hearings. What the hearings did was to dramatize the depth and intensity of the opposition to the Administration's handling of the crisis and the extent to which the legislative committee is ranged against the Executive. Of the committee members, only Lausche, Dodd and Sparkman could be fairly listed as Administration supporters.

Afterthoughts on Orangeburg

The Deep South remains deep, and one needn't go as far as the Gulf of Mexico to be convinced of it. By the "incident" of February 8 at Orangeburg, South Carolina has put in a strong bid for the "white supremacy" championship partly relinquished by a somewhat chastened Mississippi. No other paper has done a better job on the confusing events at Orangeburg than the Los Angeles Times, and no other reporter has made a more thorough and impartial investigation than Jack Nelson, whose summation appeared on February 18—ten days after the killing of three Negro students and the wounding by gunfire of at least twenty-five others. Nelson had time to interview everyone who had anything to tell and to put the evidence together coherently. The only tenable conclusion is that some of the state police disgraced themselves and that Gov. Robert E. McNair disgraced both himself and his state by putting up a blanket defense of their actions.

The trouble began when black students from South Carolina State College and adjacent Claflin College were barred from a local bowling alley. As a result, disorder erupted on the night of February 5. The next night the students tried again to enter the bowling alley and were beaten back by local police. Seven coeds were among those clubbed—Southern chivalry remains lily-white. The night of February 7 produced further premonitory trouble, and the authorities made preparations for what civil rights leaders quite accurately call the "massacre" of February 8.

Early that evening some random shots of unknown origin were fired on the South Carolina State campus, but these had nothing to do with what followed, except perhaps to make the more nervous of the state troopers still more jittery. Some 100 students built a bonfire on U.S. 601, by way of protest and self-assertion. Firemen put out this blaze and apparently were not molested, but the 100 students then found themselves facing about fifty state troopers armed with shotguns and automatic weapons, and backed up by about forty-five National Guardsmen and some local police. Sticks, stones and miscellaneous missiles were thrown, and a trooper named D. W. Shealey was struck in the mouth. An Associated Press photographer, Dozier Mobley, relates what followed. Some of the state police thought Shealey had been shot and they "panicked." Mobley says: "I was surprised and disappointed. They lost their composure. They were running around and shouting and hollering. It was bad."

It was bad, all right. Six or eight of these officers fired three or four rounds apiece at close range. They fatally injured a college freshman, a sophomore, and an Orangeburg High School student, each 18 years old. A TV crew member covering the scene also said that six, eight, or at most ten state troopers "panicked." According to some student witnesses, the sophomore who later died was struck with a gun butt and billy clubs as he was being dragged out of the way. He gasped, "You can hit me, but you can't hurt me no more."

The most significant piece of evidence is that none of the Guardsmen, none of the local police, and only a few of the state troopers did any shooting. Further mute evidence is offered by the fact that sixteen of the twenty-eight students who were shot, including two of the three who were killed, were hit in the back. There was no need for shooting. Those who did it had lost their nerve. They were guilty of manslaughter.

Governor McNair's explanation is that the officers fired "spontaneously," believing their lives were threatened when one of their detachment was struck by a hand-thrown missile. The character of the Governor's representative, a lawyer named Henry Lake, may be judged by the fact that he referred to a former student, Cleveland Sellers, a SNCC organizer, as "the main man. He's the biggest nigger in the crowd." Sellers, the only person arrested on the night of the massacre, was charged with inciting to riot, arson (a capital offense in South Carolina), breaking and entering, larceny and assault and battery. He had told newsmen earlier that if trouble broke out he would be the "scapegoat." He is being held under $50,000 bond.

What McNair has sanctioned will bear bitter fruit on other Negro campuses, and is a preparation for the violence of the coming spring and summer.

NEXT STOP, WISCONSIN

JOHN PATRICK HUNTER

Mr. Hunter is a political reporter for the Madison (Wis.) Capital Times.

Madison, Wis.

The abrupt withdrawal of Governor Romney of Michigan has taken some of the drama out of the Wisconsin Presidential primary, but the election is nonetheless shaping up to be a significant referendum on the war in Vietnam. Romney's withdrawal has angered Wisconsin supporters of former Vice President Nixon, who were set to clobber the Governor. And it has shifted the spotlight from the GOP primary to the Democratic contest, where Lyndon Johnson's name is entered opposite that of Eugene McCarthy of Minnesota.

Senator McCarthy has fallen heir to the still sizable following of the late Adlai Stevenson—a loose amalgam of liberals centered principally in Madison, but with enclaves in northern and western Wisconsin. Not even Senator McCarthy's most sanguine supporters here expect him to win the Wisconsin primary, but they hope that he will cut the President's margin of victory and send McCarthy delegates to the national convention from at least three Congressional districts.

The Presidential candidates are not entered in a mere popularity contest: they are fighting for delegates to the two national conventions. Wisconsin primary law has no winner-take-all provision. In order to win the total delegation, the candidates must carry every one of the state's ten Congressional districts. In the Democratic primary, President Johnson and Senator McCarthy will be wooing sixty delegates (with fifty-nine convention votes); the Republicans will send thirty delegates with a vote apiece to Miami Beach. McCarthy's state organization is counting on a strong current of anti-war sentiment to overcome the support the Administration is getting from Wisconsin party officials.

The recent revision of the sixty-three-year-old primary law has not proved thoroughly satisfactory to its bipartisan drafters. It was intended to provide an "open" election, giving voters a wide-ranging choice of virtually every possible candidate, but two of the most frequently mentioned Presidential hopefuls are missing from the ballot: Gov. Nelson Rockefeller of New York, and Sen. Robert Kennedy of New York. Their absence has prompted some state legislators to demand changes in the law before the 1970 Presidential primary.

However, the new law allows Wisconsin voters to select the primary they want to vote in—Republican or Democratic. It also contains a startling new provision that lets the voter cast a No vote, if he does not want to support any of the candidates listed. The unprecedented No provision was written into the law at the insistence of the Republicans, who control both houses of the state legislature. They hoped to embarrass President Johnson by providing a vehicle for anti-war voters of both parties to register a negative vote in the primary. The idea did capture the fancy of a group of Wisconsin anti-Johnson Democrats, and they had begun a No vote campaign to register protests against the Administration's Vietnamese policies when Senator McCarthy announced as a peace candidate. The dissidents then dropped their No campaign and rallied behind the Minnesota liberal.

McCarthy's entrance into the race is expected to cut the Democratic crossover to a minimum, while Romney's withdrawal is expected to free thousands of Republicans, both moderate and conservative, to jump over into the Democratic primary to take a slap at Mr. Johnson.

Nixon, like President Johnson, has the near-solid support of party leaders. McCarthy, who had hoped that some of Wisconsin's better-known anti-war lawmakers would rally to his cause, failed to gain their support. But he did get a pledge of "neutrality" from Democratic U.S. Sens. Gaylord Nelson and William Proxmire, and from Democratic Reps. Robert W. Kastenmeier and Henry Reuss. The only other Democratic member of the Washington delegation, Rep. Clement Zablocki of Milwaukee, has endorsed the President.

Illingworth, Punch (Ben Roth)

Nelson, Kastenmeier and Reuss are outspoken critics of the Administration policies in Vietnam. Proxmire has been a leading hawk, but is now known to have serious misgivings about the conduct of the war. In any case, he has lent McCarthy a measure of support by remaining "neutral" in the primary.

Wisconsin's Democratic Att. Gen. Bronson C. LaFollette, who is seeking his party's nomination for governor, has also maintained a neutral stance in the campaign. But the White House has the solid backing of the state's top labor leaders. This support is supplemented by the work of the Democratic state chairman, Richard Cudahy, a Milwaukee meat-packing firm executive. Also supporting Johnson is David Carley, the Democratic national committeeman, a Madison housing developer. Carley's pro-Johnson position has mystified many of his friends. Until McCarthy threw his hat into the ring, Carley was a persistent public critic of Vietnamese policies. Since then, he has remained silent.

Madison is McCarthy country. The Dane County Democratic Party is controlled by McCarthy supporters and its county chairman, Michael Bleicher, a University of Wisconsin mathematics professor, is state co-chairman of the McCarthy for President Committee. Bleicher recently swamped an opponent for re-election as county chairman in a contest widely heralded as a test of Johnson-McCarthy strength.

A pro-McCarthy supporter also won recent re-election in the Eau Claire County Democratic unit. He is Karl Andresen, a political science professor at Eau Claire State University. Eau Claire, the most populous city in the sprawling 10th District in northwestern Wisconsin, is the other area of the state where McCarthy is rated ahead of Johnson.

There is a strong anti-war current in Wisconsin, but McCarthy's ability to tap this latent source of support depends on both finances and organization. The state's liberal newspaper, the Madison Capital Times, plans to endorse McCarthy, according to Miles McMillin, executive publisher. But the odds against McCarthy are staggering. Cudahy recently pressured sixty-five of the state's seventy-two county chairmen to endorse Johnson. Carley, the national committeeman, is candid about his reasons for supporting the President. He says McCarthy doesn't have a chance of winning the primary and he wants to cut the post-primary anti-Johnson spin-off from the party to a minimum. McCarthy's campaign has picked up momentum with his surprising showing in Minnesota party delegate balloting on March 5, and should move even faster in the wake of New Hampshire.

A Milwaukee mayor's race that has civil rights overtones is also expected to have a bearing on the outcome of the election. Mayor Henry Maier, under fire from civil rights groups, is seeking re-election. He is expected to get strong support from conservatives, especially in Milwaukee's South side, and it is thought that this will aid President Johnson. Most of Milwaukee's large Polish-American population is strongly hawkish and will back the President.

But an "End the War" referendum on the Madison ballot in the primary is expected to work for McCarthy. The referendum, drafted by a committee of Madison clergymen and others, calls for an immediate cease-fire and the withdrawal of troops from Vietnam. Maurice Zeitlin, the University of Wisconsin sociologist who is directing the campaign for support of the referendum, confidently expects Madison to become the first city in the country to come out in favor of stopping the war. Outsiders tend to share Zeitlin's optimism.

Romney's pull-out and the refusal of Governor Rockefeller to permit his name to remain on the Wisconsin ballot have upset the carefully scheduled Nixon timetable. He had expected to pick up solid momentum here after an impressive New Hampshire showing. Sharing the Republican ballot with Nixon are Gov. Ronald Reagan of California, and former Gov. Harold Stassen of Minnesota, now a well-heeled lawyer in Philadelphia. Reagan has strong ties with Wisconsin's ultra-rightists, who opened their hearts and pocketbooks in 1964 to Barry Goldwater. But there is no evidence that Reagan's "non-candidacy" has caught on in Wisconsin.

Stassen scorns both Johnson's and Nixon's war policies. An articulate moderate, he has been dividing his time between New Hampshire and Wisconsin. But not even his toupee can hide the fact that he is 61 and has been pounding the campaign trail for more than two decades with a singular lack of success.

Stassen, who considers himself the GOP peace candidate, is counting on the anti-war sentiment to bring him support. It will be recalled that he put the skids under another well-known hawk—Gen. Douglas MacArthur. Stassen pulled a major surprise in 1948, winning the state's Presidential primary. That victory marked the end of the political trail for MacArthur.

There is some talk here among GOP moderates of organizing a write-in campaign for Rockefeller, but except for two or three preliminary meetings, the plan has not been pushed as yet. While write-ins are simple in Wisconsin, both on voting machines and paper ballots, the state, unlike New Hampshire, has no strong tradition of adding names to those provided on the ballot.

By the time that Senator Kennedy decided to enter the race, the deadline for filing in the Wisconsin primaries had passed, and there is no plan to organize a write-in campaign. Kennedy conferred with Wisconsin Democratic leaders before a selection committee approved the list of candidates for the April election, and got them to agree to keep him off the ballot. He has a strong body of supporters in Wisconsin, an inheritance from the 1960 campaign, when he directed his brother's successful fight against Hubert Humphrey.

Paradoxically, the key leaders in the recent formation of a Wisconsin Citizens for Johnson-Humphrey Committee, have been "Kennedy" Democrats. They include former State Chairman Patrick Lucey and party chairman Cudahy. There are reports that the White House is now eyeing this citizens' committee with reserve. Cudahy has assured the McCarthy people that the controversial New Hampshire advertising campaign would not be employed in Wisconsin. National Committeeman Carley has denounced the campaign, calling it an "outrage."

As the candidates pursue their quest for votes throughout Wisconsin, stopping in Beloit, Janesville, Manitowoc, Green Bay, Superior, La Crosse and Eau Claire, they bring along bittersweet recollections of other years:

Young John Kennedy, asleep in the back seat of an auto or sipping hot soup aboard the Caroline as he drove or flew from one engagement to another. Kennedy, his hair flecked with a late March snow, charming a street-corner audience in Lancaster, in rural Grant County.

Or gangly, soft-spoken Estes Kefauver drawing smiles from a Waupaca audience by telling of his exploits as a benchwarmer on the University of Tennessee varsity football team. Kefauver, stretched out in his stocking feet in a Wisconsin Rapids motel, gratefully accepting a bourbon on ice after a long day's campaigning that brought fleeting fame to rural Wisconsin.

Or Sen. Robert Taft in the 1952 primary. He turned back a surprisingly strong bid by the then Gov. Earl Warren of California, only to have the slick Easterners deal him out at the convention in favor of Eisenhower.

It could be that before it is through, 1968 will regenerate the political excitements of 1952.

THE COUNTER CULTURE: PART I

YOUTH AND THE GREAT REFUSAL

THEODORE ROSZAK

Published herewith is Theodore Roszak's introductory essay to a four-part series on what he calls the "counter culture," or by allusion, the "invasion of centaurs." In this impressive work of synthesis he brings together, organizes and evaluates the many aspects of a phenomenon now generally if inadequately perceived and variously referred to by such terms as the New Left, flower power, mind explosion, psychedelia, pot and Zen. Subsequent essays will focus on religiosity, dope and the sense of community, specifying the aspects of the counter culture that spring from these sources and examining the ideas and influence of leaders associated with them. However, the counter culture does not readily compartmentalize and these essays both overlap and reinforce one another. Together they constitute a clear-eyed, occasionally ironic, but basically appreciative estimate of a movement which the author compares, at least in potential, with Christianity under the Roman Empire.

Mr. Roszak, an associate professor of history, is chairman of the History of Western Culture Program at California State College, Hayward. He edited and contributed to The Dissenting Academy (Pantheon Books).

The struggle of the generations is one of the obvious constants of history. One stands in peril of great presumption, therefore, to suggest that the rivalry between young and adult in America of the 1960s is uniquely critical. And yet one must risk that presumption in order to grasp the full significance of what is happening to our contemporary culture. For the fact is that cultural innovation in America is becoming more and more the captive of youth who are profoundly alienated from the adult society. For better or worse, most of what is happening that is new, provocative and engaging in the arts, in politics, in education, in social relations (love, courtship, family), in journalism, in fashions and entertainment, is very largely the creation either of the discontented young or of those who address themselves primarily to the young. It is at the level of youth that many of our best minds—as well as our worst—look to find a responsive hearing as, more and more, it becomes the common expectation that the young should be those who act, who make things happen, who take the risks. Until, at last, the adults of the society begin to settle back into the role of amused or disgruntled but mainly passive observers. Adolescent-watching is fast becoming our greatest national spectator sport.

Some simple economic and demographic facts of life

help explain this peculiar state of affairs. A bit more than 50 per cent of our population is now under 25 years old. Even if one grants that people in their mid-20s have no business claiming (or letting themselves be claimed for) the status of "youth," there is still, among the authentically young—the 13-to-19 age bracket—a small nation of 25 million people. I will, however, argue below that there is good reason to group the mid-20s with their adolescent juniors.

But numbers alone don't account for the aggressive prominence of youth in our society. More important, the young seem to feel the potential power of their numbers as never before. No doubt this occurs to a great extent because the market apparatus of our consumer society has invested a deal of wit into cultivating the age consciousness of old and young alike. Teen-agers alone control a stupendous amount of money and enjoy much leisure; so inevitably, they have been turned into a self-conscious market. Whatever the young have fashioned for themselves has rapidly been rendered grist for the commercial mill and merchandised by admass—including the ethos of dissent, a fact that has created an agonizing kind of disorientation for the dissenting young (and their critics) and to which we shall return in a moment.

But the force of the market has not been the only factor in intensifying age consciousness. The expansion of higher education has, I suspect, done even more. Just as early industrialism concentrated labor and helped create class consciousness, so the university campus, where up to 25,000 students may be gathered, has served to crystallize the group identity of the young—with the important effect of mingling freshmen of 17 and 18 with graduate students in their mid-20s. On the major campuses, it is often the graduates who assume positions of leadership, contributing a degree of competence that the younger students could not muster. When one includes in this alliance that significant new entity, the "non-student"—the campus roustabout who may be well along in his late 20s—one sees why "youth" has become such a long-term career. The grads and the non-students easily come to identify their interests and allegiance with a very young population which, in previous generations, they would long since have left behind.

These campus elders play a role, particularly crucial for they tend to be those who have the most vivid realization of the new economic role of the university. Being closer to the organization-man careers for which higher education is supposed to be grooming them, they have both a stronger sensitivity to the social regimentation that imminently confronts them, and a stronger sense of the potential power with which the society's economic needs invest them. They know how great is society's demand for their skills and they soon see that making trouble on the campus is making trouble in one of the economy's vital sectors. And once the grad students—many of whom may be serving as low-level teaching assistants—have been infected with qualms and aggressive discontents, the junior faculty, with whom they overlap, may soon catch the fever and find themselves drawn into the orbit of dissenting "youth."

The troubles at Berkeley in late 1966 illustrate the expansiveness of youthful protest. First a group of undergraduates stages a sit-in against naval recruiters at the student union. They are soon joined by a contingent of non-students (whom the administration then martyrs by selective arrest) and a non-student of nearly 30—Mario Savio, already married and a father—is quickly adopted as spokesman for the protest. Finally the teaching assistants call a strike in support of the demonstration. When at last the agitation comes to its ambiguous conclusion, a rally of thousands gathers outside Sproul Hall to sing the Beatles' Yellow Submarine—which happens to be the current hit on all the local high school campuses. If "youth" is not the word we are going to use to cover this obstreperous population, then we may have to coin another. But undeniably the social grouping exists with a self-conscious solidarity.

Pleasure, Freedom & the Reality Principle

A particular plight of the senior and graduate students offers still another reason for the remarkable volatility of the young. The current generation of students is the beneficiary of the permissive child-rearing habits that have been a feature of our postwar society. Dr. Spock's endearing latitudinarianism is much more a reflection than a cause of this new (and wise) conception of proper parent-child relations that has prevailed for some time in the middle class.

A high-consumption, leisure-wealthy society doesn't need rigidly trained, "responsible" young workers. The middle class can afford to prolong the ease and drift of childhood, and so it does. It "spoils" its kids, meaning it influences them to believe that being human has something to do with pleasure and freedom. But as life in the multiversity wears on, the reality principle begins to demand its price. The students get told they are now officially "grown up," but they have been given no taste for the rigidities and self-denials that adulthood is supposed to be all about. General Motors all of a sudden wants barbered hair, punctuality, and an appropriate reverence for the conformities of the organizational hierarchy. Washington wants patriotic cannon fodder. Some kids summon up the square-jawed "responsibility" to adjust to the prescribed pattern of adulthood (though even the Young Americans for Freedom, who champion the virtues of the corporate structure, have decided, with the vigorous endorsement of Ayn Rand, that conscription is a species of "selective slavery").

Others, being incorrigibly "childish," continue to assert pleasure and freedom as human rights and begin to ask aggressive questions about the meaning of adulthood. Perhaps at last they drop out, restless and bewildered and hungry for better ideas about grownupness than GM or IBM or LBJ seem able to offer. This often places them in the position of nostalgically cultivating the styles of the teen-age world, like the rock music and dance which now unites the whole 13-to-30 population.

The dropouts stall in a protracted adolescence out of which they are eager to break, but not as their parents did. Some become ne'er-do-well dependents; others resort to flight. The FBI reports the arrest of more than 90,000 juvenile runaways in 1966; most of those who flee well-off, middle-class homes get picked up—by the thousands each current year—in the big city bohémias, fending off malnutrition and venereal disease. The immigration departments of Europe record a constant level, over the past few years, of something like 10,000 disheveled flower children (mostly American, British, German and Scandinavian) migrating across to the Near East and India. The influx has been sufficient to force Iran and Afghanistan to boost substantially their "cash in hand" requirements for prospective tourists. And the British Consul General in Istanbul officially requested Parliament in late 1967 to grant him increased accommodations for the "swarm" of penniless young Englishmen who have been showing up at his consulate, seeking temporary lodgings or perhaps shelter from Turkish narcotics authorities.

One may flippantly construe this exodus as the contemporary version of running off with the circus, but the more apt parallel might be with the quest of 3rd-century Christians (a scruffy, uncouth, and often half-mad lot) for escape from the corruptions of Hellenistic society: it is much more a flight from than toward. Certainly for a youth of 17, clearing out of the comfortable bosom of the middle-class family to become a beggar is a formidable gesture of dissent. One makes light of it at the expense of ignoring a significant measure of our social health.

The Only Audience

The final ingredient that goes into this ebullient culture of youthful dissent is the adult radical who finds himself in a fix that much resembles that of the bourgeois intellectual in Marxist theory. Despairing for the timidity and lethargy of his own class, Marx's middle-class revolutionary at last turns renegade and defects to the proletariat. In postwar America, the adult radical, confronted with a diminishing public among the "cheerful robots" of his own generation, gravitates to the restless middle-class young. Where else is he to find an audience? The working class, which provided the traditional following for radical ideology, now for the most part neither leads nor follows but bogs down to become the heaviest ballast of the established order. If the adult radical is white, black power progressively seals off his entree to Negro organizations. As for the exploited masses of the Third World, they have as little use for white Western ideologues as do our native blacks—and in any case they are far distant. Unless he follows the strenuous example of ■ Régis Debray, the white American radical can do little more than sympathize from afar with the revolutionary movements of Asia, Africa and Latin America.

On the other hand, the disaffected middle-class young are at hand, suffering the “immiserization” that comes of being stranded between a permissive childhood and an obnoxiously conformist adulthood, experimenting desperately with new ways of growing with self-respect into a world they despise, calling for help. So the radical adults offer to become gurus to the alienated young, or perhaps the young draft them into that service.

I take the hyper-dynamism of the young to be a thoroughly unhealthy state of affairs. It is not properly youth's role to bear so great a responsibility for inventing or initiating for their society as a whole. It is too big a job for them to do gracefully. The rise of our youth culture to a position of such prominence is a symptom of grave default on the part of adults. Trapped in the frozen posture of befuddled passivity which has been characteristic of our society since the end of World War II (what Paul Goodman has called “the nothing can be done disease”) the mature generations have divested themselves of their adulthood—if the term means anything besides being tall and debt-worried and capable of buying liquor without showing a driver's license. It has surrendered its responsibility to make morally demanding decisions, to generate ideals, to control public authority, to safeguard the life of the community against its despoilers. It has been scared off and bought off its proper function in a variety of ways that need not be reviewed here, until it has become, not a catalyst to the growth of its more sensitive children but a barrier of paralyzed complacency, deservedly inviting contempt.

This is the America whose god Allen Ginsberg, somewhere back in the middle fifties, identified as the sterile and omnivorous “Moloch,” the America whose premature senility President Eisenhower so marvelously incarnated, and the disease of whose soul shone so lugubriously through the public obscenities that men like John Foster Dulles, Herman Kahn and Edward Teller were prepared to call “policy.” There are never many clear landmarks in the affairs of the spirit, but Ginsberg's Howl may serve as the first public report announcing the war of the generations. It can be coupled, chronologically, with the appearance of C. Wright Mills's aggressively activist sociology—with the publication of Mills's Causes of World War III (1957). Mills was by no means the first postwar figure who sought to tell it like it is about the state of American public life—nor was he necessarily all that right in what he said. But his tone was angrier and his rhetoric catchier. He wanted his sociology to function as part of a public dialogue. Above all, he insisted more urgently than any before him that he wanted action, and wanted it now. He was prepared to step forth and brazenly pin his indictment like a target to the enemy's chest. And, most important, Mills was lucky enough to reach ears that would hear: his indignation found an audience.

When Mills died in 1961, the New Left he was searching for but had despaired of finding among the forces and institutions controlled by his peers was beginning to emerge—of course, from among the students. If he were alive today he would be into his 50s; but his following would still be primarily among the under 30s. Just as Ginsberg, now more than 40, remains the bard of the young.

Elderly Carpers

Admittedly, the dissent that began to simmer in the mid-fifties was not confined to the young. At the adult level of resistance, SANE was created in 1957, and later Turn Toward Peace. But precisely what do groups like SANE and TTP reveal about adult America, even about the politically conscious types? Looking back, one is struck by their absurd shallowness and conformism, their total unwillingness to raise fundamental issues about the quality of American life, their fastidious anti-communism, and, above all, their incapacity to sustain any significant initiative on the political field. Even the Committee of Correspondence, a promising effort formed around 1961 by senior academics, quickly settled for publishing a new journal. I can remember attending meetings of the West Coast committee at which Seymour Martin Lipset, who was the sort of responsible, anti-Communist liberal everybody felt certain had to be included, put the damper on any radical action by arguing without significant opposition that the cold war was entirely the fault of the Russians, and there was nothing to do but leave things to the government, which was in excellent hands, and so why were we all meeting anyway

At present, the remnants of SANE and TTP have been reduced to the role of carping (often with a good deal of justice) at the impetuous extremes and leftist flirtations of far more dynamic youth groups like SDS or the Berkeley VDC or the Spring Mobilization. But avuncular carping is not initiative. And it is a bore, even if a well-intentioned bore, when it becomes a major preoccupation. Similarly, it is the younger Negro groups that have begun to steal the fire of adult organizations—but in that case with results that I feel are bound to be disastrous.

The fact is, it is the young who have—gropingly, haltingly, amateurishly, even grotesquely—gotten dissent off the adult drawing board. They have torn it out of the books and journals that an older generation of radicals wrote, and they have fashioned it into a style of life. They have turned the hypotheses of disgruntled elders into experiments, though often without the willingness to admit that one may have to concede failure at the end of any true experiment.

This readiness to experiment with a variety of dissenting life styles is what has made the youth culture of the day so prominent and fruitfully provocative, despite its frequent lapses into the absurd. But, inevitably, the kids have run into criticism, often from no quarter so severe as that of the older radicals. For generations now, radical intellectuals have lambasted the bad habits of bourgeois society: “the bourgeoisie,” they have insisted, “is obsessed by greed; its sex life is insipid and prudish; its family patterns are debased; its slavish conformities of dress and cosmetics are degrading; its mercenary routinization of existence is intolerable; its vision of life is drab and joyless, etc., etc." So the kids try this and that, and one by one they discard the vices of their parents, preferring the less structured ways of their own childhood and adolescence—only to discover that many an old-line radical, embarrassed by the brazen sexuality and unwashed feet, glad-rags and playful ways, is taking up the chorus: "No that is not what I meant, that is not what I meant at all."

Critics and Publicists

Thus, a good liberal like Hans Toch (writing in The Nation for December 4, 1967) invokes the Protestant work ethic to give the hippies a fatherly tongue-lashing for their "consuming but noncontributing" ways. They are being "parasitic," Professor Toch observes, for "the hippies, after all, accept—even demand—social services, while rejecting the desirability of making a contribution to the economy." But of course they do: because we have an economy of cybernated abundance that does not need their labor, that is rapidly severing the tie between work and wages, that suffers from hard-core poverty caused by maldistribution, not by scarcity. From this point of view, why is their voluntary dropping out any more "parasitic" than the enforced dropping out of impoverished ghetto dwellers? Is it perhaps because the hippies seem to enjoy their mendicant idleness, do not feel appropriately guilty and frustrated? There are criticisms I shall want to make of the beat-hip bohemian fringe of our youth culture—but this is surely not one of them.

It would be a better general criticism to make of the young that they have done a miserably bad job of dealing with the distortive publicity with which admass has burdened their embryonic experiments. Too often they fall into the trap of reacting narcissistically or defensively to their own image in the fun-house mirror of the media. Whatever these things called "beatniks" and "hippies" originally were, or still are, may have nothing to do with what Time, Esquire, C.B.S.-N.B.C.-A.B.C., Broadway comedy and Hollywood surf operas have decided to make of them. If anything, the media tend to isolate the weirdest aberrations and to attract to the movement many extroverted poseurs.

But what can bohemia do when it finds itself massively infiltrated by well-intentioned sociologists (and now, all of a sudden, we have specialized "sociologists of adolescence"), sensationalizing journalists, curious tourists, and weekend fellow travelers? What doors does one close on them? The problem is new and tough—a cynical dilution of dissent by saturation coverage—and it begins to look like a far more formidable weapon in the hands of the established culture than outright suppression would be.

The situation seems to call for strategies of dignified secrecy which the young have not yet developed.

But to grant the fact of admass distortion is not the same as saying that the young have evolved no life style of their own, or that they are unserious about it. It would be surrendering to admass an absolutely destructive potential if one took the tack that whatever it touches is automatically debased, or perhaps has no reality at all. Commercial vulgarization is one of the endemic pests of 20th-century America, like the flies that swarm to the sweets of summer. But the flies don't create the sweets (though they may make them less palatable), nor do they bring in the summer. It will be my contention that despite the fraudulence and folly that collect around its edges, a significant new culture is being born among our youth, and that this culture deserves careful understanding, if for no other reason than the sheer size of the population it potentially involves.

I think there is another reason, namely the intrinsic value of what the young are making happen. But I would insist that in order to understand it one must avoid, as far as possible, relying on the exotic tidbits, the sensational case histories, admass provides. And that would include the superficial snooping that comes of cruising bohemia for a few exciting days in search of local color and the inside dope. Rather, one should look for major trends that seem to outlast current fashions, and seek out the most articulate public statements of belief and value the young have made or given ear to: the thoughtful formulation, rather than the offhand gossip. Above all, I think the older generations must be willing, in a spirit of critical helpfulness, to sort out what seems valuable and promising, as if indeed it mattered whether or not the alienated young succeeded in their project.

Culture or Counter Culture?

Again, it must be granted that it is an old story that the young should have to scrap or remodel in some degree the culture they inherit. Indeed, the Spanish philosopher, Ortega, has elaborated a theory of history (in Man and Crisis), based on the fitful transition of the generations. What is special about the present case is the scale on which the cultural revision is taking place and the depth to which it is reaching. I have referred to the "culture" of the young; but would it be an exaggeration to call what is arising among them a "counter culture"? That is, a culture which so radically rejects the mainstream assumptions of Western society that it is scarcely recognizable to many as a culture at all, but looks, instead, like a barbaric intrusion. One thinks of the invasion of centaurs on the north pediment of the Parthenon, which a stern Apollo, as guardian of the orthodox culture, steps forward to admonish. Apollo, being older than 30, could hardly expect his authority to be trusted now. And, besides, these latter-day centaurs, while "high," are not drunken, and most likely come bearing flowers.

Major cultural disjunctures have happened before, though not with the same high acceleration. Toynbee identified them as the work of a disinherited proletariat and used as his paradigm the role of the early Christians within the Roman Empire. Hopelessly alienated by ethos and social class from the official culture, the primitive Christian community fashioned of Judaism and the mystery cults a culture that could not fail to seem absurd to Greco-Roman orthodoxy. But the absurdity, far from being felt a disgrace, became a banner of the community.

For it is written [St. Paul boasted] I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and will bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent . . . For the Jews require a sign, and the Greeks seek after wisdom . . . But God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty.

Once such a cultural disjuncture opens out in society, nothing is guaranteed. What happens among the minority that finds itself isolated by the rift is as apt to be ugly or pathetic as it is to be noble. The primitive Christian absurdity can be credited at least with the potentiality of saintly service and visionary poetry. The alienated stock clerks and wallpaper hangers of post-World War I Germany sullenly withdrew to their beer halls to talk imbecile anthropology and prepare the horrors of Buchenwald. So too, contemporary America's isolated minorities include the Hell's Angels and the Minutemen from whom nothing beautiful or interesting can be expected.

And the alienated young: how to characterize the counter culture they are in the way of haphazardly assembling? A heroic generalization about this still embryonic culture is to say that what the young are up to is nothing less than a reorganization of the prevailing state of personal and social consciousness. From a culture that has a long-standing, entrenched commitment to an egocentric and intellectual mode of consciousness, the young are moving toward a sense of identity that is communal and nonintellectual. I think the disjuncture is just that great—as great in its implications (though obviously not as yet in historical influence) as the disjuncture between Greco-Roman rationality and Christian mystery. Against the traditional Cartesian cogito, with its blunt, initial assertion of individuality and logicity, the counter culture opposes the community and visionary inspiration. This really amounts to an assault on the reality of the ego as an isolable and purely cerebral unit of identity.

Hippies and Leftists

At first glance, it may seem that this counter culture, shading off as rapidly as it does into the mind-blown bohemianism of the beats and hippies, diverges radically from the hard-headed political activism of the student New Left. Are there perhaps two separate and antithetical developments; one (tracing back to Ginsberg and company) which seeks to abscond from American political life, and the other (tracing back to Mills and the remnants of the old Socialist Left) which seeks to penetrate and rechannel the mainstream of American society? I think not. At a deeper level, there is a theme that unites these two variations. It is revealed among the activists by the personalism that characterized the beginnings of New Left dissent. [See "Young Radicals & the Fear of Power" by Kenneth Keniston, The Nation, March 18.]

New Left groups like SDS have always taken strong exception to the thesis that we have reached the "end of ideology" in the Great Society. But there is a sense in which ideology is a thing of the past among most politically involved, left-wing students. By and large, most New Left groups have refused to allow doctrinal logic to obscure or displace an irreducible element of personal tenderness. What has distinguished SDS, at least in its early years, from old-line radical youth groups (say, like the Progressive Labor Movement) is the unwillingness of the former to deify doctrine, granting it more importance than flesh and blood. For most of the New Left, there has ultimately been no more worth or cogency in any ideology than a man infuses it with by his own action: personal commitments, not abstract ideas, are the stuff of politics. Alienation has been the root problem of New Left politics. But not alienation in the sheerly institutional sense, in which capitalism (or for that matter any advanced industrial economy) tends to alienate the worker from the rewards of production; but rather alienation as a deadening of man's sensitivity to man: a deadening that can creep into even those revolutionary efforts that seek to eliminate institutional forms of alienation.

Wherever nonhuman elements—whether revolutionary doctrine or material goods—assume greater importance than human life or well-being, man becomes alienated from man and the way is open to the self-righteous use of others as objects. Thus, revolutionary terrorism is the mirror image of capitalist exploitation.

The flavor is caught by the SDS Port Huron statement of 1962:

We are aware that to avoid platitudes we must analyze the concrete conditions of social order. But to direct such an analysis we must use the guideposts of basic principles. Our own social values involve conceptions of human beings, human relationships, and social systems.

We regard men as infinitely precious and possessed of unfulfilled capacities for reason, freedom, and love. . . . We oppose the depersonalization that reduces human beings to the status of things. If anything, the brutalities of the twentieth century teach that means and ends are intimately related, that vague appeals to "posterity" cannot justify the mutilations of the present . . .

Loneliness, estrangement, isolation describe the vast distance between man and man today. These dominant tendencies cannot be overcome by better personal management, nor by improved gadgets, but only when a love of man overcomes the idolatrous worship of things by man.

In his recent work The Politics of Experience, the British psychiatrist, R. D. Laing, a leading figure in Britain's visionary Left, catches much the same spirit: "No one can begin to think, feel or act now except from the starting-point of his or her own alienation . . . We do not need theories so much as the experience that is the source of the theory."

'Scrupulosity' of the Young

Once upon a time Harry Pollitt, the leader of the British Communist Party, could, with a clear conscience, tell the poet Stephen Spender that he ought to go to Spain and get himself killed—the party needed more martyred artists to bolster its public image. Nor have such perversions been confined to the Stalinist Left. It was an adamant anti-Stalinist, Sidney Hook, who in his famous exchange with Bertrand Russell during the early fifties, logic-chopped his way to the conclusion that thwarting the ambitions of the world's Harry Pollitts was worth wiping out the entire human species: anti-Stalinist militancy required 2 billion martyrs, willy or nilly. This is precisely the sort of corrupted human relations, the sort of subordination of the person to doctrinal logic, that has been pretty much absent from the best New Left politics. If the New Left draws upon the Marxist tradition, its Marxism has been significantly mediated by Camus and the postwar existentialists. Or, in the American radical tradition, it is a humanist Socialist text like Dwight MacDonald's eloquent The Root Is Man that one discerns behind a document like the Port Huron statement. (As I write, however, I am bleakly aware that an ideological drift toward righteous violence is on the increase among the young as an adjunct of black power and a romantic infatuation with guerrilla warfare. Despite Camus' wise admonition, the search may be on again among left-wing dissenters to "make murder legitimate," and the New Left may be about to lose its original soulfulness.)

Colin MacInnes, discussing the difference between the youthful radicals of the thirties and the sixties (Encounter, November, 1967), observed that the contemporary young "hold themselves more personally responsible than the young used to. Not in the sense of their 'duties' to the state or even society, but to themselves. I think they examine themselves more closely and their motives and their own behavior." Anyone who has spent much time with New Left students knows what MacInnes is talking about. They show a quality of somber introspection that almost amounts to what the Catholic Church calls "scrupulosity." It is a refusal to allow theories or rhetoric to get in the way of intensive self-awareness. Honesty to the inner motive must be kept paramount and so the final appeal is to the person, never to the doctrine.

But then the question arises: what is the person? What, most essentially, is this elusive, often erratic, human something which underlies social systems and ideologies, and which now must serve as the ultimate point of moral reference? No sooner does one raise the question than the politics of the social system yields to what Alan Watts has called "the politics of the nervous system." Class consciousness gives way as a generative principle to consciousness consciousness. And it is at this juncture that New Left and beat-hip bohemianism join hands. The transition from the one to the other shows up in the pattern that has come to govern many of the free universities. These dissenting academies usually get their send-off from campus New Leftists and initially emphasize heavy politics. But more and more the curricula tend to become hip in content and teaching methods: psychedelics, light shows, multi-media, McLuhan, exotic religion. (See "The Free Universities," by Ralph Keyes, The Nation, October 2, 1967.)

The same transition can be traced in the career of Bob Dylan, who commands respect among all segments of the dissenting youth culture. Dylan's early songs are traditional folk protests, laying forth obvious issues of social justice: anti-boss, anti-war, anti-exploitation. Then, quite suddenly, rather as if Dylan had come to the conclusion that the conventional Woody Guthrie ballad didn't reach deep enough, the songs turn surrealistic and psychedelic. All at once one is thrust somewhere beneath the rationalizing cerebrum of social discourse, and is probing the nightmare deeps, trying, it would seem, to get at the tangled roots of conduct and opinion. It is at that point that the project which the beats of the early fifties had taken up—the task of remodeling themselves, their way of life, their perceptions and sensitivities—takes precedence over the task of changing institutions or policies.

Priorities of Liberation

One can discern, then, a continuum of thought and experience among the young which shades off from the New Leftist sociology of Mills, through the Freudian-Marxism of Herbert Marcuse, through the Gestalt-therapy anarchism of Paul Goodman, through the apocalyptic body-mysticism of Norman Brown, through the Zen-based psychotherapy of Alan Watts where political involvement seems to begin evaporating rapidly, and finally into Timothy Leary's impenetrably occult and quietist narcissism where the world and its woes may shrink at last to the size of a mote in one's private psychedelic void. The different schools of thought become an integrated series as soon as one surrenders the notion that institutional patterns are the basis of social reality, and substitutes instead psychic patterns.

Unrelated as the extremes of this spectrum may seem at first, one would not be surprised if the men just named were to turn up at the same teach-in. The Congress on the Dialectics of Liberation, held in London during the summer of 1967, was pretty much that kind of affair: an effort to work out the priorities of psychic and social liberation within a group of participants that included New Left revolutionaries and existential psychiatrists. Allen Ginsberg was also on hand to chant the Hare Krishna. As one would expect, the priorities were never established. And, significantly, it proved impossible for the congress to maintain more than minimal rapport with black power spokesmen like Stokely Carmichael for whom, tragically if understandably, real social power has, despite all that history teaches us to the contrary, once more begun to look like something that flows from the muzzle of a gun. Still, for the most part, the common cause was there: the same insistence on revolutionary change that must at last embrace psyche and society. So it is that when New Left groups organize an anti-war demonstration, the misty-minded hippies are certain to join in, though they may tune out the heavy political speechifying in favor of launching a yellow submarine or exorcizing the Pentagon.

The underlying unity of youthful dissent consists, then, in the effort of beat-hip bohemianism to work out the personality structure, the total life style that follows from New Left social criticism. At their best, the beats and hips are the utopian experimenters of the social system that lies beyond the intellectual rejection of the Great Society. The counter culture is the embryonic cultural base of New Left politics, the effort to discover new types of community, new family patterns, new sexual mores, new kinds of livelihood, new aesthetic forms, new personal identities on the far side of power politics, the bourgeois home, and the Protestant work ethic. If the experiments are raw and often abortive, it must be remembered that the experimenters have been on the scene only for a dozen years and are picking their way through customs and institutions that have had more than a few centuries to entrench themselves. To criticize the experiments is legitimate and necessary; to despair of what are no more than beginnings is premature.

Decadence & Innocence

The counter culture described here is but the latest stage in a major tradition of Western social and intellectual history. The parallels with Romanticism, that first great assault on the scientific world view and the conception of personality that flowed from it, are striking. Goethe, describing his generation's rejection (almost 200 years ago) of Baron Holbach's mechanistic System of Nature, hits an unmistakably contemporary note:

How hollow and empty did we feel in this melancholy, atheistical half-night, in which earth vanished with all its images, heaven with all its stars. There was to be matter in motion from all eternity; and by this motion, right and left in every direction, without anything further, it was to produce the infinite phenomena of existence If, after all, this book had done us some harm, it was this—that we took a hearty dislike of all philosophy, and especially metaphysics, and remained in that dislike; while, on the other hand, we threw ourselves into living knowledge, experience, action, and poetizing, with all the more liveliness and passion.

Even more striking is the overlap between the contemporary counter culture and the late-Romantic "decadents" of France and England, whose favorite constellation of luscious vices—drugs, eclectic mysticism, and outré sexuality—is an obvious prototype of beat-hip bohemianism. It is no coincidence then that the art nouveau of the sickly sweet fin de siècle should now be revived as the official expression of the psychedelic vision. So the English art critic Lawrence Gowing speaks of Aubrey Beardsley as "the prophet of the heightened hallucinatory rhythm . . . the forerunner of the psychedelic flux and its liberated bisexual languor."

But there is an important difference. The style of the "decadents" was brazenly to court damnation by aspiring to satanic wickedness. Today's young assert the innocence, indeed the holiness, of their forbidden pleasures—which is all the more exasperating. The difference stems, I think, from the fact that the bohemianism of the younger generation has been able to claim unashamedly the sanctions of Oriental religion for its erotic and psychedelic adventures. The "decadents," caught in a less debilitated Christian ethos, had to take their joys at the expense of grace.

The counter culture's tie-in with Romanticism is important for one particular reason. In its latest stages, Romantic culture degenerated into one of the central ingredients of fascism: "Feeling is all," Goethe's Faust proclaimed; and a little more than a century later Hitler, almost paraphrasing D. H. Lawrence, provided a distorted echo: "Think with your blood." Murderers and maniacs can, of course, seize upon any body of thought and twist it to serve their debased purposes, a fact which too many intellectual historians overlook in working out intricate genealogies of ideas. But still, the vulnerability of certain ideas to such abuse is the more reason for artists and intellectuals to give the greatest thought to the human potentialities their thought and imagery may release—especially when the audience for their work becomes as young as that of the counter culture. "Make Love Not War" is still the banner most of the dissenting young are rallying to—and those who cannot see the difference between that sentiment and any banners the Hitlerjugend carried are plain perverse. So too, one of the most remarkable aspects of the counter culture is its cultivation of feminine softness among the males, a deliberate effort to undercut the crude and compulsive "he-manliness" of our political life. Beat-hip bohemianism is quite simply and unashamedly feminine-centered in its ideal of personality. At the same time, one perceives, still at the fringe of the counter culture, a worrisome fascination with violence-minded phenomena like the Hell's Angels and James Bond movies, or with the chichi sado-masochism of Phoebe Zeitgeist and Barbarella.

Saviors of Santa Claus

Despite all the counter culture owes to previous generations, however, one comes back finally to the striking fact that it is a youth culture. What was in the past a bohemian frontier populated by a marginal few—an elite of effete gentlemen, outcast revolutionaries, risqué artists—has been staked out and democratized by a mass movement of the young, and mainly the white, middle-class young. So where the "decadents" specialized, as old roués, in corrupting little boys and girls, now the little boys and girls have gone into business on their own, but refusing to yield their claim to innocence.

The result is dissenting thought and culture at the adolescent level, if not on the part of its creators, then on the part of much of its audience. And these tastes now reach surprisingly far back into the early years of adolescence. I offer one illuminating example. In December of 1967, I watched a group of 13-year-olds from a London settlement house perform an improvised Christmas play as part of a therapeutic theatre program run by the International Theatre Club. The kids had concocted a show in which Santa Claus had been imprisoned by the Immigration authorities for entering the country without proper permission. The knock at official society was especially stinging, coming instinctively from some very ordinary youngsters, who had scarcely been exposed to any terribly advanced intellectual influences. And whom did the 13-year-olds decide to bring on as Santa's liberators? An exotic species of being known to them as "the hippies," who Shiva-danced to the jail house and magically released Father Christmas, accompanied by strobe lights and jangling sitars.

However lacking older radicals may find the hippies in authenticity or revolutionary potential, they have succeeded in embodying what Herbert Marcuse calls "the Great Refusal" in a form that captures the need of the young for unrestricted joy. The hippie, real or as imagined, now seems to stand as one of the few images toward which the very young can grow without having to give up the sense of enchantment or playfulness. Hippies who may be pushing 30 wear buttons that read "Frodo lives" (in Elvish yet) and decorate their pads with maps of Middle Earth (which is also the name of one of London's current rock clubs). Is it any wonder that the best and brightest kids at Berkeley High School (to choose a school that happens to be in my neighborhood) are already coming to class barefoot, with flowers in their hair, and ringing with cowbells?

When radical intellectuals must deal with a dissenting public this young, all kinds of problems accrue. Adolescent dissent is certainly as far from ideal as the proletarian dissent that bedeviled radical intellectuals over the last three or four generations when it was the working class they had to ally themselves with in their effort to reclaim culture for the good, the true and the beautiful. Then the horny-handed virtues of the beer hall and the trade union had to serve as the medium of radical thought. Now it is the youthful exuberance of the rock club, the love-in, the teach-in.

The kids, miserably educated as they are, bring with them almost nothing but healthy instincts. And the project of building a sophisticated framework of thought atop those instincts is rather like trying to graft an oak tree upon a wild flower. How to sustain the oak? More important, how to avoid crushing the wild flower? But that is the project, for dissent has very few other social levers with which to work. This is the "significant soil" in which the Great Refusal has begun to take root. If we reject it, frustrated by the youthful follies that also sprout there, where then do we turn?

VIETNAM ANALOGY

GREECE, NOT MUNICH

ARNO J. MAYER

Mr. Mayer, professor of history at Princeton University, is the author most recently of Politics and Diplomacy of Peacemaking: Containment and Counterrevolution at Versailles, 1918-1919 (Knopf).

Even, or perhaps especially, in this secular age the citizen craves reassurance that history follows a patterned and discernible course. In his quest for direction he is predisposed to welcome, and any government is inclined to provide, reminders of past events or situations which make those of the present and future recognizable. That being the case, he is likely to look askance at critics who question the legitimacy of a prevalent analogy without proposing a better one to take its place. Particularly in the United States, where any critic of government is suspect if he refuses to propose concrete remedies, this failure reduces his effectiveness.

Further, many critics leave the impression that anything short of a perfect analogy should be proscribed. But in the absence of perfect analogies, which exist only in the world of formal abstractions, this is equivalent to ruling out analogic arguments altogether. What, then, is an analogy? According to Webster it is "a relation of likeness between two things or one thing to or with another, consisting in the resemblance not of the things themselves but of two or more attributes, circumstances, or effects." In short, analogy is not identity. Reasoning by historical analogy consists of isolating two or more circumstances or processes which have structural, relational and/or causal resemblances in a context of differences and indeterminacies, the resemblances being emphasized for the purpose of proceeding to the clarification of a situation, a process, or an effect which appears not to be characterized by unalloyed uniqueness.

If E. H. Carr is right in saying that the current era is exceptionally history-conscious and if today's citizen has that pronounced need for and is peculiarly susceptible to analogies—and these two points await empirical verification—then any administration may be expected to harness only such analogies as will bolster up and justify its policies. Moreover, government spokesmen and supporters, as well as dissident action intellectuals, will tend to violate the canons of sound analogic explanation: rather than give due weight to degrees of similarity or difference, they will tend to speak in terms of immaculate identity or contrast.

Accordingly, present government spokesmen and supporters seek to press into service the analogy of Munich, hoping thus to rally public and Congressional support for a resolute, forward policy in Vietnam. The opposition on the Left tends to reject this analogy—without, however, providing the citizen with alternate historical sign posts.

By its proponents, the Munich analogy is designed to stress the identity, not the similarity, of Hitler and Mao; of the Nazi German and the Communist Chinese political systems and foreign policy objectives as well as methods; and of the externally incited subversion as well as the strategic significance of Czechoslovakia and South Vietnam. The ensuing lesson is presented as self-evident: no self-respecting American should want in the White House a Chamberlain or Daladier, who by surrendering South Vietnam to the Chinese-controlled North Vietnamese and Vietcong would encourage Peking to activate its timetable for aggressive expansion into Southeast Asia and beyond.

Needless to say, government critics, including professional historians, have excelled in exposing the flaws in this Munich-Vietnam analogy. They have sought to demonstrate that the South Vietnamese insurgency, unlike the Sudeten insurgency, is essentially and authentically indigenous and popular and is directed against a corrupt regime; that South Vietnam, unlike Czechoslovakia, is at best of marginal strategic importance; that Communist China, unlike Hitler Germany, does not appear to be intent on military aggression; and that the United States of the 1960s, unlike the Anglo-French allies in 1938, has overwhelming military capabilities in readiness if Peking should, after all, embark on a course of outright military aggression.

But these corrections, though well-grounded, do not come to grips with the pivotal assumption underlying the Munich parable. Today's anti-appeasers imply that if the Anglo-French statesmen had stood their ground firmly on Czechoslovakia, Hitler would have climbed down and the Second World War would have been averted. Quite apart from the fact that such counter-factual events are difficult to prove, this particular proposition is left intentionally vague. Specifically, it begs the question of whether, in order to persuade Hitler to desist or delay, it would not have been necessary to confront him with the unequivocal prospect of a two-front war arising from a timely and binding military alliance between the two Western allies and Soviet Russia, including arrangements for the transit of Soviet military power through Poland and Romania.

It is worth noting that many critics, who rightly question the accuracy of the Administration's interpretation of the nature and purpose of the struggle in South Vietnam, tacitly accept its representation of Munich, thereby ignoring or concealing the anti-Communist mainsprings and objectives of Western diplomacy since 1917. Concern and priority for the containment of Russian Bolshevism and for the maintenance of the domestic status quo significantly influenced many of the provisions in the post-1918 peace treaties which during the thirties quickened Europe's diplomatic and political crisis. This twin concern and priority also inhibited England and France from entering into an operative mutual security pact with Moscow, either before or immediately following Munich. The allies thereby denied themselves substantial and credible military support for their diplomacy. If the Western powers, by then including the United States, eventually combined with the Soviet Union to defeat the Axis, the alliance was in the nature of a momentous but short-lived and precarious political truce in an international civil war that began in 1917 and resumed before the Second World War was over. In this larger perspective, not only Munich but also the Nazi-Soviet pact—both of which have the outward earmarks of classic moves of power politics in a stable international environment—are diplomatic maneuvers in an international civil war, with World War II and the extermination camps the diabolic wages of revolution and counterrevolution in a pre-atomic age.

Today, most spokesmen for the Left opposition as well as the self-styled anti-appeasers prefer not to go into those aspects of Munich and appeasement which stem from the anti-Soviet and anti-Communist texture of inter-war politics and diplomacy. They have good reasons. After all, the one-dimensional lesson of Munich—stand fast, refuse to negotiate, rearm, and prevent war—figured prominently in Washington's justificatory and explanatory rhetoric from 1945 to 1956. Specifically, successive administrations proclaimed that since the nature, dynamics and objectives of Stalin and the Soviet system were analogous to, if not identical with, Hitler and the Nazi system, the only way to contain expansionist Russia and surging Bolshevism in third countries was to stand up to Stalin as the allies should have stood up to Hitler. As of 1948-49 even the ADA, not to speak of allegedly scholarly historians and political scientists, accepted, legitimized, and propagated the cold-war eschatology according to which Nazism and Bolshevism were essentially identical totalitarian systems bent on unlimited expansion by a crude blend of outright military force and externally engineered subversion. It thus became the American consensus that, even though the Marshall Plan contributed substantially to the removal of those economic and social grievances which fed the Communist conspiracy in so many European countries, in the last analysis superweapons and NATO were what kept Stalin's Red hordes from sweeping across the Elbe.

It is thus understandable, if paradoxical, that most of the Establishment critics of President Johnson's Vietnamese policy cling to this time-bound interpretation of the nature and purpose of the Soviet Russian threat, the Communist insurgency and American containment. They seem to be saying that, though Stalinist Russia was blatantly expansionist, militarist and interventionist, Maoist China is launched on an altogether more prudent course: that though European communism was monolithic and Moscow-controlled, Asian communism is polycentric and independent of Peking; that though communism in Greece, France and Italy was an externally fostered conspiracy, communism in Vietnam is an authentically indigenous rebellion; and that though American containment in Europe was defensive, in Asia this containment policy is aggressive. Behind this polyphonic position lurks the questionable assurance that, provided a Communist revolution is indigenous rather than externally instigated and controlled, the United States has not and should not intervene militarily to either thwart or overthrow it.

In actual fact, the confrontation of the so-called

Free World and the so-called Communist World in Europe is so similar in origins, dynamics and purposes to that confrontation in Asia that it is somewhat puzzling that neither the Administration nor its critics have drawn the parallel. For it would seem that, with due allowance for specific dissimilarities, the intervention in Greece is the most striking and meaningful positive analogue to the intervention in Vietnam. Historians are beginning to note that in Greece Stalin played a reticent role, not unlike Mao Tse-tung in Vietnam today; that the Greek guerrillas were thoroughly indigenous, not unlike the Vietcong today; and that Tito, rather than Stalin, most eagerly supported the insurgency from across the border, not unlike Ho Chi Minh rather than Mao today. As for U.S. policy, both then and now Washington at first intervened primarily with sea and sea-borne air power coupled with a military mission, in one case in the wake of British retrenchment, in the other of French retrenchment. After 1945, President Truman and his advisers took advantage of Russia's momentary military and economic incapacity to risk supporting the Greek revolutionaries, just as since the mid-1950s Washington has taken advantage of China's glaring but impermanent weakness. And last, whereas for the benefit of Congress and the public President Truman invoked the so-called domino theory to warn of the disastrous consequences of a Communist breakthrough in Greece for the nearby Middle East, as well as for France and Italy, so today President Johnson invokes the domino theory to warn of the consequences of a Communist breakthrough in Vietnam for nearby Southeast Asia and the developing nations beyond.

Vital official and private archives for the study of the origins of the cold war continue to be inaccessible. Even so, there is sufficient evidence to postulate that, because of Stalin's caution and Tito's backdown, America was spared in Greece a test of the length to which it was prepared to go to defeat revolutionary insurgency. Once the Marshall Plan and NATO were erected on the foundations of the Truman Doctrine, the Greek operation was hailed with the same enthusiasm and rationale with which the American-supported restoration in Western and Central Europe had been celebrated. After the defeat of Henry Wallace, the shift to strident anti-communism by the non-Communist Left and the ravages of McCarthyism, few critics remained to question the assumptions, methods, costs and results of this containment crusade in Europe.

Greece was the only country in which guerrilla forces had to be defeated. Even there, quite apart from the rapid victory, others did the fighting, America's contribution being confined to the offshore fleet, the Van Fleet military mission and money. In the rest of Europe—including "pacified" Greece—American intervention took the form of deliberate and massive economic, technical and military assistance. American divisions were stationed on the Continent, but they never went into action and the Berlin airlift further encouraged the assumption that air power would be decisive in limited as well as in general war.

As for Korea, there the international civil war was fought across rather than within fixed boundaries, so that even that bloody war failed to show Americans, including liberal Americans, the realities of guerrilla warfare. For quite some time Americans could tell themselves that only the English, the French, the Dutch and the Belgians fought guerrillas in their last-ditch struggle for the preservation of empire. Many Americans, including John F. Kennedy, were outraged by the barbarous methods of counterinsurgency and pacification in overseas territories. Before long, however, these transgressions were legitimized as part of the wages of ordered decolonization from above.

Throughout NATO Europe, except in Greece, the restorative containment of communism, pump primed by American economic aid, paved the way for significant and rapid improvements in per capita income and welfare, with the result that the sources for revolutionary agitation were quickly and effectively undercut. But now that the battlefield of the cold war has shifted away from Europe the question arises whether this containment strategy, so appealing to the anti-Communist Left, will work in pre-modern societies, including Greece, where development is held back or blocked by rapid population growth, adverse terms of trade and, above all, ossified political and social elites. Or will the containment of communism, which has been and continues to be central to America's world project, require interventionist means and methods that will be increasingly difficult to square with the reformist persuasion? The Bay of Pigs, the Cuban missile crisis and the war in Vietnam (as well as the coup in Indonesia?) suggest that the iron fist of counterrevolution is beginning to show through the velvet glove of Point Four and the Alliance for Progress.

Why this crescendo of violence, notably in Vietnam? Notwithstanding an occasional call for a turn to isolationism, America does not seem to be on the verge of resigning its role as the chief architect, carrier and coordinator of anti-communism, a role it has played with consummate skill and unprecedented success ever since 1945. At present, the crisis managers in Washington, who rigidly adhere to the anti-revolutionary assumptions underlying America's world mission and project, are searching for a containment formula that will work in the developing countries, many of which hover on the brink of grave internal disturbances. In this sense, Vietnam is not only an execrable and taxing civil war but also a testing ground for political and military strategies of revolution and counterrevolution.

Particularly when placed in the context of this century's international civil war, whose primary battlefield has shifted to nonmodernized, semi-colonial and ex-colonial countries, the similarities of the Greek and Vietnamese situations are striking. The question arises, therefore, as to why the Greek-Vietnamese analogy has not been enlisted either by the Administration or by its Establishment opposition on the Left.

For the Administration to use it publicly would be to give too much away. The analogy would only lend credence to Mao Tse-tung's interpretation of the instrumental and experimental nature of the Vietnamese conflict in America's—as also in China's—project; it would exacerbate Moscow's embarrassment vis-à-vis Peking; and it would serve notice to a restless black-ghetto population at home that counterrevolutionary forays and wars on poverty in the Third World are likely to enjoy continued precedence over the war on poverty in America.

At the same time, the Greek-Vietnamese analogy presents grave difficulties for liberal-action intellectuals like Schlesinger and Galbraith. From the very start they, too, portrayed the cold war as a battle between light and darkness, insisting that the underlying thrust and ultimate purpose of containment were not only politically libertarian but also economically and socially reformist. With the anti-Communist Left in Europe, they canonized the Marshall Plan. For a while they balked at the galloping military build-up, criticized the rearmament of Germany, and protested the inclusion of Spain in the military system of the Atlantic world. Before long, however, they rationalized such restorative and conservative costs and consequences of containment, whether intended or unintended, by simply moving their vital center farther to the right. In Western and Central Europe, as also in America, Schlesinger and Galbraith increasingly trusted corporate and welfare capitalism to provide the sinews for consensus politics.

Yet not only Greece—as the recent coup demonstrates—but also many of the developing countries lack the political integration, the social cohesion, and the economic sinews to sustain gradual and ordered modernization and reform, even with considerable foreign aid. In particular, throughout the developing world, whenever the Left—whether reformist or revolutionary—threatens or seems to threaten the status quo, significant components of the ruling political classes switch from tolerating or cooperating with the Center-Left to praetorian guards which, at a minimum, undertake to uphold order. Not only the local grantees but also important segments of the entrepreneurial and professional middle classes have good reason to assume that Washington wishes them and the military to err on the side of caution. In fact, the most retrograde elements are so confident that Washington considers them essential backstops to order that they impudently block those ameliorative structural reforms which Washington normally would like to see fostered in exchange for aid.

When historical analogies are used for political purposes, professional and professorial historians have an obligation to correct and qualify them, as they have done with the Munich-Vietnam analogy. But historians who at the same time are critics of power have the additional obligation to raise analogic controversies to a level where they stimulate and enhance meaningful political discourse and debate. The opaque censure of the Johnson Administration's one-dimensional Munich-Vietnam analogy has at best made a marginal contribution to the critical examination and assessment of America's course in Vietnam. The Greek-Vietnamese analogy could conceivably throw a more intense searchlight on the context and implications of the Vietnamese crisis. Though it has not been invoked publicly, perhaps for fear of quickening Congressional and public distrust of the direction and design of America's postwar foreign policy, the Greek-Vietnamese analogy may well have guided the inner circle of the Johnson Administration in setting and maintaining its course in Vietnam.

It is by correcting and criticizing the uses and abuses of history that historians mount that "true vigil at arms" to which Croce summoned them and in which he wisely insisted there was "no use for either narcotics or intoxicants."

ORPHANS OF EMPIRE

A BAD DAY IN COMMONS

RICHARD BLUMENTHAL

Mr. Blumenthal, a frequent Nation contributor, is currently in the London office of Newsweek.

Even so, I beg the government now, at this last minute to drop this miserable, shameful, shabby bill. Let them think, and inquire before they deal another deadly blow at the commonwealth.

London

Seven years have passed since Hugh Gaitskell thundered against the first curbs on immigration, introduced by the Tories to cut down the flow of nonwhite Commonwealth citizens into Britain. But the fiery little leader who steered the Labour Party in opposition might have used the same words with even greater venom last month—and now against his own party. In a mere three and one-half days, the Labour government rammed through Parliament a new immigration law, directed not against the nonwhites of the Commonwealth countries but against citizens of the United Kingdom itself, mainly 167,000 people of Asian descent now living in Kenya. The law makes no mention of race, merely excluding people whose parents or grandparents were not born in Britain. But the panicky rush to approve the law, smashing solemn promises and raising the specter of mass prejudice, has left Parliament stunned and shaken. For the curbs will create a second class of citizens, free to enter every country but their own, possibly jobless, homeless and stateless.

Though Home Secretary James Callaghan claimed that the government had been preparing the bill for six months, the Tories plainly called Callaghan's hand by playing on spiraling fears of a nonwhite deluge. The Asians, encouraged by the British to come to Kenya to take over skilled jobs and businesses during the colonial era, had been granted British passports at the time of Kenya's independence in 1963. Now Jomo Kenyatta's policy of "Kenyanization" was forcing them out of jobs and homes. And certain Tories—notably Duncan Sandys, the former Commonwealth Secretary who had actually granted them their citizenship—were urging that Britain seal its borders from the hordes that were bound to flee Kenya. Intent on beating possible curbs, the Asians began streaming into London's Heathrow airport at the rate of 700 a day, thus turning Sandys' warnings into a self-fulfilling prophecy. So Secretary Callaghan rose in Commons, with "regret" naturally, to propose a quota of 1,500, forming an "orderly queue."

Callaghan, far from displaying six months' worth of preparation, then seemed to draft the bill as he went along in debate. As originally introduced, the legislation lacked any provision for an appeals procedure. The Home Secretary, responding to a torrent of criticism, announced that two attorneys would be appointed to oversee the decisions of immigration officers in Kenya. Beyond vague references to "humanitarian needs," he did not recite the criteria these officers would use to choose between applicants. Nor did he settle the question of what would happen to the hapless citizens if they were expelled from Kenya or if, by their own choice, they just planted themselves on Britain's doorstep. "Shall we have refugee camps around the airports?" asked Liberal leader Jeremy Thorpe.

As anxiety mounted on the back benches, causing all sides to demand an increase in the quotas, Callaghan conceded that the number must be "flexible," not "rigid." If a man were "thrown out of work" or "ejected," he said, "we shall have to take him in. We cannot do anything else in those circumstances." But he refused to write any provision for flexibility into the legislation, and the Home Office spent the next morning backtracking from his promise. What Callaghan meant, officials told reporters, was that expelled Asians would be put at the "head of the queue," not necessarily admitted. Clearly, Callaghan wanted to avoid giving Kenyatta the impression that he could fob these refugees off on Britain, even if they were British citizens. The success of the curbs, said Callaghan, would depend on the "civilized behavior of other governments."

Such fumbling, however, never jeopardized the bill's overwhelming support in Commons and the country at large. Between 80 and 90 per cent of the voters, according to most opinion polls, want to cut off all nonwhite immigration. "Coloreds" now comprise 2 per cent of the population, clustered in pockets of poverty and bound by informal discrimination in housing and jobs. There is widespread fear of a Watts-type racial "explosion," weariness of taking on "other people's" burdens, and anxiety for the future of a country now apparently threatened from all sides. No party can afford to favor immigration these days, and the Labourites still recall with horror how they opposed the first Tory Commonwealth Immigration bill in 1962, and as a result nearly lost the 1964 general election.

So Callaghan might faithfully repeat his contention that "it is a wild exaggeration to refer to this legislation as racist . . . the test that is adopted is geographical, not

Punch

"... To Allow the Bearer To Pass Freely Without Let or Hindrance . . ."

racial." But only Tory home spokesman Quintin Hogg, who aimed to "keep the temperature down," took him seriously. Indeed, the "responsible" argument for the bill assumed not only the racist character of the measure but the existence of widespread race prejudice. "This is clearly a racial problem, a problem of potential racial tension," said Reginald Maudling, another Tory frontbencher. "The problem arises quite simply from the arrival in this country of many people of wholly alien cultures, habits and outlook. . . . Race prejudice is a basic human instinct; one cannot legislate it away but can only legislate to insure that the damage which it does becomes less and less as the years pass." Restricting the flow of immigrants, so the argument went, would allow the country to build schools and housing for them before they arrived, would allow people to overcome fears and insecurity that fed racial prejudice and would thus be in the interests of the immigrants as well as "our own people."

This argument made strange bedfellows. Extreme Left Socialists like Mrs. Renee Short, who has bitterly attacked her own government for deserting Socialist principles, marched into the lobby with staunch reactionaries like Sir Frederick Bennet, who has sympathized with Ian Smith's Rhodesian regime. Among the strongest supporters of the bill on the Labour side were trade union M.P.s like Charles Pannell. "It is often said with some truth that color prejudice is a working-class vice," said Pannell. "It has to be because these people come into working-class places." How many of the Liberals, he asked, had ever lived next to a colored or entertained one in their homes?

On the Conservative side, the real racists mostly stayed off the floor, fearing no doubt that their speeches might be inconvenient for the consciences of supporters, and left the argument for the bill to "realists" like Harold Burden: "I have a responsibility to my constituents. This is where it all starts." While both parties supported the bill, only Labour imposed a full-fledged, three-line whip. There seemed little need for it, since the main vote was a comfortable 372 to 62, and the whip carried no penalties for those who defied it.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

Opponents of the bill, like the supporters, came from all over the political spectrum. Some of them, Tories as well as Labourites, argued that Commons must try to fight prejudice, not merely defuse it—or at least avoid enshrining it in a law. "One of the problems of prejudice in this country is that one can never meet an anti-black," said Ben Whitaker, a young patrician Labourite. "Such people always shelter behind their neighbors. If honorable members are to mirror the lowest common denominator of public prejudice, what is the point of being in this House?" Though the government was promising a Race Relations bill, it was now making prejudice respectable, he said, pandering to the worst instincts of the British voter instead of attempting to bring out the best. The government wildly exaggerated the number of Asians who might enter, and shamefully underestimated Britain's capacity to absorb them. After all, these were not destitute, illiterate peasants; they were skilled and semi-skilled workers, shopkeepers and professionals with precisely the talents and resources that Britain needed.

But most of the opponents, particularly on the Conservative side, felt much more deeply about Britain's honor than they did about the immigrants. Though Duncan Sandys might continue to insist with unshakable guile that "no such pledge was given, either in public or private," no one could doubt that Britain had promised the Asians free entry. "My right honorable friend may wriggle and squirm as hard as he likes," said Sir Douglas Glover, the vice chairman of the strongly traditionalist 1922 committee. "What this bill is doing is going back on Britain's pledged word. . . . Let us admit that there is a great deal of racialism in this house, in this country . . . and we shall not get very far by making either a virtue or a sin of it." "It is not a question of color," said Norman St. John Stevas, a progressive Tory, "but of honor, and we must each make our own stand on that." Of all the groups opposing the bill, only the Liberal Party stood united against racialism as the main issue.

Though much of the heart searching and hand wringing rang somewhat false, there were moments of genuine pathos—when the Archbishop of Canterbury, for example, rose in his streaming white robes before the House of Lords to recall a life's work among the poor, and to proclaim, quietly, that this bill was "very, very wrong indeed." Or when Lady Gaitskell, the gray-haired widow of the late party leader, noted before the Lords that this bill had "the smell of apartheid about it" and made her feel "a bit alien." Or Michael Foot, the silver-tongued intellectual leftist, speaking in the musty, near-deserted chamber as dawn fell through the windows at the end of the Wednesday-Thursday all-night debate: "This is the most melancholy day in the history of the House of Commons."

The turbulent debate, calling forth so much of Britain's fear and insecurity, may count as a prelude to the more turbulent repercussions ahead. The law is bound to wrench, if not rip apart, the Commonwealth. It may not be, as one Indian Congress Party leader suggested, "the last nail in the coffin" of this unique multi-racial institution. But India and Kenya have already begun retaliating, the one by barring its door to Britain's refugee citizens, the other by making the Asians' lives increasingly uncomfortable.

The Commonwealth, so carefully nurtured by Britain as it set its colonies free, was cracking even before this latest bout with racialism. Many British have claimed that this country could continue to play a major world role, in spite of its recent defense reductions, by displaying moral leadership, diplomatic skill and democratic example. But the handling of the Immigration law, whatever the wisdom of breaking the East of Suez commitments, has done little to make credible Britain's moral and diplomatic excellence. The less real hardware power it commands, the more it needs this credibility. As for democracy, the Asians might have easily wished for a good old-fashioned American-style filibuster, an institution designed to prevent the very kind of parliamentary efficiency that the government exploited.

The new law has lowered even further the standing of the present government and the Labour Party at home. The law itself may be popular; but Callaghan's bungling has confirmed the image of a punch-drunk, divided Cabinet, reeling from bouts with the press and lurching helplessly into new measures. When the government introduces its Race Relations bill—still unpublished—it will probably lose many of the friends it gained from the Immigrants bill. The new law has battered party discipline, already eroded by defections of leftist M.P.s in recent votes on cuts in social spending. It has increased friction between Labour Party factions—between the middle-class intellectuals who opposed the bill, and the working-class trade unionists who supported it. And it has all but shattered Labour's claim, or what remained of it, to be the party of principle. In spite of its past measures to protect individual freedom and dignity—reform of laws affecting homosexuality, abortion and capital punishment—this government must now be remembered equally for betraying the rights of nonwhite citizens in Kenya. "The Labour Party is nothing," Harold Wilson once said, "if it is not a principle." That leaves Wilson and his party with precious little for the next election.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The National Book Awards

Robert Bly's acceptance speech and act of civil disobedience dominated all other events of the week of the National Book Awards; but even apart from Bly's overpowering contribution, there was a marked difference this year from earlier book industry celebrations.

The day before the awards ceremony at Lincoln Center, in both the morning "Workshop for Book Editors" and in the afternoon symposium "Poetry Now," there were visibly open rents in the smooth fabric the book and culture industry prefers to present in public. The poets (John Ashbery, Robert Creeley, Allen Ginsberg, Ronald Gross, Dick Higgins and Walter Lowenfels) built no palpable bridges to the predominantly tradition-oriented book reviewers and book editors who represented publications of smaller cities and towns across the country. In the case of Allen Ginsberg, a most charitable description of his intent would be to say that he hoped to shake up the middle-class audience with a barrage of four-letter words and outrageous opinions; unfortunately he came off more intellectually arrogant and unpleasant than revolutionary, and far from gaining friends for contemporary poetry, he may have lost a few potential allies.

The afternoon session underlined what had been made apparent in the earlier book editors' discussion: that added to the other dangerous splits which exist in the country, there is an enormous gap between the intellectual and creative community on the one hand and those who claim to express the tastes of the nation's mass audience on the other. The division was almost painfully drawn between editors concerned with reviews which describe a book's ability to afford pleasure for the general reader and those who see the book review as a more responsible, creative and authoritative task. It was interesting that the differences appeared to assume a regional aspect, a tug between East and Midwest/West, perhaps because those arguing for a stronger intellectual base and against the concept of book publication as a commercial event, were representatives of Eastern publications. They were Theodore Solotaroff, formerly of Commentary and Book Week and now editor of The New American Review; Saul Maloff of Newsweek and Richard Gilman, recently appointed book editor of The New Republic. In his talk, Gilman named those book review sections which he felt embraced a responsible approach, listing The New York Review of Books, Commentary, The Nation and The New Republic.

In the poetry symposium, the country's two great wounds, the war in Vietnam and black/white relations were somewhat opened up, but it was the acceptance speeches of Jonathan Kozol for Death At An Early Age and Robert Bly for The Light Around the Body the following evening which effectively denied the

We have some things to be proud of. No one needs to be ashamed of the acts of civil disobedience committed in the tradition of Thoreau. What Dr. Coffin did was magnificent; the fact that Yale University did not do it is what is sad. What Father Berrigan did was noble; the fact that the Catholic Church did not do it is what is sad. What Mitchell Goodman did here last year was needed and in good taste; the fact that the National Book Committee, in trying to honor those who told the truth last year, should have invited as a speaker Vice President Humphrey, famous for his lies, was sad.

Isn't the next step, now that individual people have committed acts of disobedience, for the institutions to take similar acts? What has the book industry done to end the war? Nothing. What have our universities done to end the war? Nothing. What have our museums, like the Metropolitan, done? Nothing. What has my own publisher, Harper & Row, done to help end the war? Nothing. In an age of gross and savage crimes by legal governments, the institutions will have to learn responsibility, learn to take their part in preserving the nation, and take their risk by committing acts of disobedience. The book companies can find ways to act like Thoreau, whom they publish. A publishing house can take space in The New York Times to announce that it opposes more men being sent to Vietnam, or to announce that it thinks Dr. Spock and Dr. Coffin are right; it can refuse to pay taxes.

From Robert Bly's acceptance speech, National Book Awards

country cause for cultural self-congratulation.

With the exception of these two books, the other awards were given to distinguished and safe books, The Eighth Day by Thornton Wilder; Memoirs: 1925-1950 by George F. Kennan and Soren Kierkegaard's Journals and Papers, Vol. I, translated by Howard and Edna Hong. The award to William Troy for Selected Essays was given posthumously. Troy was for several years a regular fiction reviewer and film critic for The Nation.

It was also interesting to note that Jonathan Kozol's acceptance speech echoed a similar insight expressed by June Meyer ("Spokesmen for the Blacks," The Nation, December 4, 1967) in her discussion of his study of the destruction of the minds of black children in Boston ghetto schools. He accepted the award "in the names of those many hundreds of Negro kids . . . who have never been allowed to make their voices heard within America," and continued: "It is a part of the crime . . . that with a few notable exceptions black people in this nation have had a hearing only when they were granted the intermediary services of a white person like myself. Reading the reviews and considering the disputations, I sometimes feel that we are almost more interested in the white authors than in the black people that the books are all about."

Kozol said that "for this reason" he wished to redirect the attention of the audience to the issue and that he was giving his $1,000 prize money to the community leaders within the Boston ghetto. Earlier, he had departed from his prepared speech to associate himself fully with Robert Bly's denunciation of the Vietnamese War.

The most electrifying moment at Lincoln Center came when Bly summoned Mike Kempton (later identified as the son of New York Post columnist Murray Kempton) of the Resistance movement and counseled him "not to enter the U.S. Army now under any circumstances." In handing over to Kempton his $1,000 prize money, Bly asked that it be used "to find and counsel other young men to defy the draft authorities and not destroy their spiritual lives by participating in this war."

There were some boos and hisses, but there was no question that on the heart-breaking issue of the war, dissenters of our official policy had grown from the hundred or so who had walked out on Vice President Humphrey's appearance at the book awards last year to a majority of the 1,200 people from the book industry who stood and applauded Bly's action this year in Lincoln Center.

In the citation for The Light Around the Body, judges Donald Hall, Harvey Shapiro and Theodore Weiss wrote: "If we poets had to choose something that would be for us now our Address on the State of the Nation, it would be this book." Bly, in turn, accepted the award by "speaking for many, many American poets when I ask this question: Since we are murdering a culture in Vietnam at least as fine as our own, do we have the right to congratulate ourselves on our cultural magnificence?"

Bly was born in Madison, Minn., in 1926. He spent two years in the Navy at the end of World War II and was graduated from Harvard College in 1950. He founded his magazine and press in 1958 and operates it with his wife from a farm in western Minnesota. The Sixties Press was the subject of an essay by Paul Zweig ("The American Outsider," November 14, 1966), which described its pioneering work in introducing to American readers many great European and South American poets. In September of 1967, Mr. Bly refused a $5,000 grant from the National Foundation on the Arts and Humanities to The Sixties Press, with the statement: "Since the Administration is maiming an entire nation . . . it is insensitive, even indecent, for that Administration to come forward with money for poetry . . . there could be no pride in such an award."

For many years Bly has been an important influence in American poetry, as much through the work of his magazine, The Sixties, as through his own poetry. His critical articles, his translations of the German and Spanish poets, his extensive and impressive work in opposing the war through the formation of American Writers Against the Vietnam War, culminating in his splendid action at Lincoln Center, are exemplary for our time.

The Nation is devoting most of this section to new work by Robert Bly and to a review of his book of poetry, the private work on which all the rest is based.

THE EDITORS

On Pablo Neruda

ROBERT BLY

Mr. Bly's essay which follows will appear as the preface to Twenty Poems of Pablo Neruda, translated by James Wright and Robert Bly (Sixties Press).

Poets like St. John of the Cross and Juan Ramon Jiménez describe the single light shining at the center of all things. Neruda does not describe that light, and perhaps he does not see it. He describes instead the dense planets orbiting around it. As we open a Neruda book, we suddenly see going around us, in circles, like herds of mad buffaloes or distracted horses, all sorts of created things: balconies, glacial rocks, lost address books, pipe organs, fingernails, notaries public, pumas, tongues of horses, shoes of dead people. His book, Residencia en Tierra, (Living on Earth—the Spanish title suggests being at home on the earth), contains an astounding variety of earthly things that swim in a sort of murky water. The fifty-six poems in Residencia I and II were written over a period of ten years—roughly from the time Neruda was 21 until he was 31, and they are the greatest surrealist poems yet written in a Western language. French surrealist poems appear drab and squeaky beside them. The French poets drove themselves by force into the unconscious because they hated establishment academ-icism and the rationalistic European culture. But Neruda has a gift, comparable to the fortuneteller's gift for living momentarily in the future, for living briefly in what we might call the unconscious present. Aragon and Breton are poets of reason, who occasionally throw themselves backward into the unconscious, but Neruda, like a deep-sea crab, all claws and shell, is able to breathe in the heavy substances that lie beneath the daylight consciousness. He stays on the bottom for hours, and moves around calmly and without hysteria.

The surrealist images in the Residencia poems arrange themselves so as to embody curious and cunning ideas. In "La Calle Destruída," for example, he calls up injustice, architecture exploding, massive buildings weighing us down, exhausted religions, horses of pointless European armies—all of these things, he says, are acting so as to eat life for us, to destroy it, to disgust us so we will throw life away like old clothes. The poems give a sense of the ferocity and density of modern life.

Neruda's poetic master in the Residencia poems is not a European poet but the American, Walt Whitman. He looked deeply into Whitman. Whitman wrote:

I see the workings of battle, pestilence, tyranny, I see martyrs and prisoners,

*I observe a famine at sea, I observe the sailors casting lots who shall be kill'd to preserve the lives of the rest,
I observe the slights and degradations cast by arrogant persons upon laborers, the poor, and upon negroes, and the like . . .
I hear bravuras of birds, bustle of growing wheat, gossip of flames, clack of sticks cooking my meals,
I hear the sound I love, the sound of the human voice,
I hear all sounds running together,
combined, fused or following . . .
I hear the violoncello ('tis a young man's heart's complaint,) Hear the Key'd cornet, it glides quickly in through my ears,
It shakes mad-sweet pangs through my belly and breast.*

Neruda writes:

*I look at ships,
I look at trees of bone marrow
bristling like mad cats,
I look at blood, daggers and women's stockings,
And men's hair,
I look at beds, I look at corridors
where a virgin is sobbing,
I look at blankets and organs and hotels.*

*I look at secretive dreams,
I let the straggling days come in,
and the beginning also, and memories also,
like an eyelid held open hideously
I am watching.*

*And then this sound comes:
a red noise of bones,
sticking together of flesh and legs yellow as wheatheads meeting.
I am listening among the explosion of the kisses,
I am listening, shaken among breathings and sobs.
I am here, watching, listening, with half of my soul at sea and half of my soul on land, and with both halves of my soul I watch the world.*

*And even if I close my eyes and cover my heart over entirely
I see the monotonous water falling in big monotonous drops.
It is like a hurricane of gelatin, like a waterfall of sperm and sea anemones.
I see a clouded rainbow hurrying.
I see its water moving over my bones.*

He shows what it is like, not to be a poet but to be alive. The Residencia poems, however, differ from Song of Myself in one fundamental way. The Residencia poems are weighed down by harshness, despair, loneliness, death, constant anxiety, loss. Whitman also wrote magnificently of the black emotions, but when Neruda in Residencia looks at the suicides, the drowning seamen, the blood-stained hair of the murdered girl, the scenes are not lightened by any sense of brotherhood. On the contrary, the animals and people on all sides isolate him still further, pull him down into his own body, where he struggles as though drowning in the stomach and the intestines.

It so happens I am sick of being a man . . .

I don't want to go on being a root in the dark,

Full of fears, getting larger, shivering in my sleep, going on down, into the moist guts of the earth, taking in and thinking, eating every day. . . .

I don't want so much misery.

I don't want to go on as a root and a tomb, alone under the ground, a warehouse full of corpses. . . .

Pablo Neruda was born on July 12, 1904, in a small frontier town in southern Chile, the son of a railroad worker. The father was killed in a fall from his train while Neruda was still a boy. He said: "My father is buried in one of the rainiest cemeteries in the world." He described his childhood in Temuco in an essay called "Childhood and Poetry," printed as a preface to his Collected Poems. His given name was Nefthali Beltran, and his pseudonym was taken very young, out of admiration of a 19th-century Czech writer.

In 1920, when he was 16, Neruda was sent off to Santiago for high school. His poem "Friends on the Road" is written about those days. He was already composing poems, a poetry of high animal spirits and enthusiasm. At 19, he published a book called Twenty Poems of Love and One Ode of Desperation, which is still loved all over South America.

I remember you as you were in that ultimate autumn.

You were a gray beret and the whole being at peace.

In your eyes the fires of the evening dusk were battling,

And the leaves were falling in the waters of your soul.

He said later that "love poems were spouting out all over my body."

Body of a woman, white slopes and white thighs,

You resemble the world in your attitude of surrender.

My body, savage and peasant, undermines you

And makes a son leap in the bottom of the earth.

In the preface to a short novel he wrote

THE NATION/March 25, 1968

at this time, he said: "In my day to day life, I am a tranquil man, the enemy of laws, leaders, and established institutions. I find the middle class odious, and I like the lives of people who are restless and unsatisfied, whether they are artists or criminals."

The governments of South America have a tradition of encouraging young poets by offering them consular posts. When Neruda was 23, he was recognized as a poet, and the Chilean Government gave him a post in the consular service in the Far East. During the next five years, he lived in turn in Burma, Siam, China, Japan and India. Neruda has said that those years were years of great isolation and loneliness. Many of the poems that appear in the first two books of Residencia en Tierra were written during those years.

Neruda came back to South America in 1932, when he was 28 years old. For a while he was consul in Buenos Aires; he met Lorca there, when Lorca came to Argentina on a lecture tour. Residencia I was published in 1933. In 1934 he was assigned to Spain.

The Spanish poets had already known his wild poems for several years, and greeted him with admiration and enthusiasm. The house in Madrid where Neruda and his wife Delia lived soon overflowed with poets—Lorca and Miguel Hernandez especially loved to come. Residencia II was published in

New for Spring

P. V. Annenkov

The Extraordinary Decade

Literary Memoirs

Edited by Arthur P. Mendel

Pavel Annenkov's literary memoirs of the tumultuous 1840's in Russia portray his friends, the intellectual giants of the time—including Gogol, Belinsky, Turgenev, Bakunin, and Tolstoy—in vivid detail. Though the main focus is on the renowned critic Belinsky, Annenkov considers all of the principal figures and comments incisively on the general intellectual, economic, and political climate.

$8.50

Now in Paperback

The New Writing in Russia

Edited and Translated by Thomas P. Whitney

Students of Russia and general readers will value this highly praised collection of current literature. These stories by five modern Russian writers, Aksenov, Kazakov, Rozov, Nagibin, and Tendryakov have the enduring qualities common to great literature of all times. Whitney analyzes the important role of literature in the U.S.S.R. and the rising conflict between writers and the government.

$4.95 paperback

$6.95 hardbound.

Rebel Voices

An I.W.W. Anthology

Edited, with Introductions, by Joyce L. Kornbluh

Industrial Workers of the World tell their own story in a brilliant collection of songs, poems, stories, and cartoons. The selections range from the Wobblies' manifesto that "all peace as long as the wage system lasts is but an armed truce" through the famous poems of Ralph Chaplin and the satires of T-Bone Slim. Each selection begins with an introduction that clearly relates to the over-all development of this powerful radical group.

$ 4.95 paperback

$12.50 hardbound

The UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN PRESS

ANN ARBOR

Spain in 1935. Lorca, Hernandez and many others published their surrealist poems in Neruda's magazine Caballo Verde por la Poesia (Green Horse for Poetry). Spain had been for fifteen years in a great period of poetry, the most fertile for Spanish poetry since the 1500s. This period was brought to an end by the Civil War.

On July 19, 1936, Franco invaded from North Africa. Neruda, overstepping his power as consul, immediately declared Chile on the side of the Spanish Republic. After being retired as consul, he went to Paris, where he raised money for Spanish refugees, helped by Breton and other French poets, and by Vallejo. Neruda's poetry now became seriously political for the first time. Neruda had come to love Spain, living there, and he shared the shock of the Spanish poets, which was essentially the loss of their country to the right wing. The growth of political energy in his poetry was probably inevitable in any case. In Residencia I and II, the outer world is seen with such clarity, and with such a sense of its suffering, that the later development of political poetry does not come as a surprise. He returned to America in 1940, and served as Chilean consul to Mexico during 1941 and 1942. The poems he had written about the Spanish Civil War were also incorporated into Residencia, under the title of Residencia III.

In 1944, the workers from Antofagasta, the nitrate mining section of Chile, asked Neruda to run for Senator from their district. He did, and was elected. He now found himself in his country's Senate as Yeats had. He took a keen interest in Chilean politics. Several years later he described in a long poem written to the Venezuelan poet, Miguel Otero Silva, how happy the Senators would have been if he had remained a love poet:

When I was writing my love poems, which sprouted out from me everywhere, and I was dying from depression,
nomadic, abandoned, gnawing the alphabet,
they said to me: "What a great man you are, Theocritus!"
I am not Theocritus: I took hold of life, and faced her, and kissed her until I subdued her,
and then I went through the tunnels of the mines
to see how other men live.
And when I came out, my hands stained with depression and garbage,
I held up my hands, and showed them to the generals, and said, "I do not take responsibility for this crime."

They started to cough, became disgusted, left off saying hello, gave up calling me Theocritus, and ended by insulting me and assigning the entire police force to arrest me, because I did not continue to be occupied exclusively with metaphysical subjects.

Neruda's experience as a Senator ended, as he mentions, with his pursuit by the secret police. It came about in this way: In 1948, Gonzalez Videla, a right-wing strong man supported by United States interests, took over as dictator. Six months later Neruda, as Senator, attacked him for violations of the Chilean constitution. Videla responded by charging Neruda with treason. Neruda did not go into voluntary exile, as expected, but attacked Videla once more, and Videla ordered him arrested. Most people assumed he would have been killed if he had been arrested. Neruda went underground; miners and working people, to save his life, passed him from one house to another at night, first in Chile, later in other South American countries. He remained in hiding for some months. Finally he crossed the Andes on horseback, and made it to Mexico; from there he flew out of the continent to Paris. All this time he was working on his new book, which he called Canto General; it was finished in February of 1949.

The title suggests a poetry that refuses to confine itself to a specific subject matter or kind of poem. Neruda worked on the book for fourteen years. It is the greatest long poem written on the American continent since Leaves of Grass. It is a geological, biological and political history of South America. The book contains 340 poems arranged in fifteen sections. The fertility of imagination is astounding. Not all of the poems, of course, are of equal quality. In some, especially those written while Neruda was being hunted by the Chilean secret police, the anger breaks through the container of the poem.

The book as a whole gives a depressing picture of the relations between the U.S. State Department and South American governments. Neruda's Canto General is not a great favorite of U.S. cultural organs dealing with Pan-American relations. North Americans, both in universities and in the USIS, who know Neruda's work often say quite soberly that since Neruda became interested in politics, he has not written a poem of any value.

Neruda went from Paris to Russia for the 150th anniversary celebration of Pushkin's birth, and then back to Mexico, where the first edition of Canto General was published in 1950.

When Gonzalez Videla's government fell, Neruda returned to Chile. Since 1953 he has lived on Isla Negra, a small island off the coast near Santiago; in recent years he also has spent part of his time in Valparaiso.

There was a considerable change in style from the inward, surrealist poems of Residencia I and II to the narrative, historical poems of Canto General. However, the style of his poetry has changed several more times since then. Both the Residencia and Canto General poems used, for the most part, the long loping line into which he could put so much power. In the middle 1950s he began writing odes using willowy lines only two or three words long. They were Odas Elementales, or Odes to Simple Things. He wrote an ode to a wrist watch, which Jerome Rothenberg has translated very well, an ode to air, to his socks, to fire, to a watermelon, to painting, to salt. Book after book of these odes came out until he had published 100 or so odes in three or four years. More recently he has embarked on a book of autobiographical poems called Memorial to Isla Negra.

At the moment, Neruda entirely dominates South American poetry. I heard a young South American poet complain of Neruda's abundance. He said that whenever a new idea appears in the air, and some younger poet manages to finish a poem on it, Neruda suddenly publishes three volumes! But, he said, "how can we be mad at Pablo? The poems continue to be good—that's the worst part of it!"

In "Childhood and Poetry," Neruda speculates on the origin of his poetry.

"One time, investigating in the backyard of our house in Temuco the tiny objects and minuscule beings of my world, I came upon a hole in one of the boards of the fence. I looked through the hole and saw a landscape like that behind our house, uncared for, and wild. I moved back a few steps, because I sensed vaguely that something was about to happen. All of a sudden a hand appeared—a tiny hand of a boy about my own age. By the time I came close again, the hand was gone, and in its place there was a marvellous white toy sheep.

"The sheep's wool was faded. The wheels had escaped. All of this only made it more authentic. I had never seen such a wonderful sheep. I looked back through the hole but the boy had disappeared. I went into the house and brought out a treasure of my own: a pine cone, opened, full of odor and resin, which I adored. I set it down in the same spot and went off with the sheep.

"I never saw either the hand or the boy again. And I have never again seen a sheep like that either. The toy I lost finally in a fire. But even now, in 1954, almost fifty years old, whenever I pass a toyshop, I look furtively into the window, but it's no use. They don't make sheep like that any more.

"I have been a lucky man. To feel the intimacy of brothers is a marvellous thing in life. To feel the love of people whom we love is a fire that feeds our life. But to feel the affection that comes from those whom we do not know, from those unknown to us, who are watching over our dream and solitude, over our dangers and our weaknesses—that is something still greater and more beautiful because it widens out the boundaries of our being, and unites all living things.

"That exchange brought home to me for the first time a precious idea: that all of humanity is somehow together. That experience came to me again much later; this time it stood out strikingly against a background of trouble and persecution.

"I never dreamed in my childhood that by giving something resiny, earth-like, and fragrant, I had entered into the brotherhood of humanity. But just as I once left the pine cone by the fence, I have since left my words on the door

LIES

Excellent Roman knives slip along the ribs.

A stronger man starts to jerk up the strip of flesh

Do you actually believe in the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost?

A long scream unrolls.

More.

From the political point of view, Democratic institutions are being built, wouldn't you agree?

A green parrot shudders under the fingernails.

*Blood jumps
in the pocket.*

The scream lashes like a tail.

"Let us not be deterred from our duty by the voices of. . ."

The whines of the jets pierce like a long needle.

As soon as Rusk finishes his press conference, black wings carry off the words, bits of flesh still clinging to them; somewhere in Montana near Hemingway's grave, they are chewed by timid hyenas.

• • •

Lie after lie starts out into the prairie grass, like lines of Conestogas going West

And a long desire for death flows out, guiding the enormous caravans from beneath, stringing together the vague and foolish words.

*It is a desire to eat death,
to gobble it down,
to rush on it like a cobra with mouth open*

To take death inside, to feel it burning inside, pushing out velvety hairs, like a clothes brush in the intestines

This is the thrill that leads Johnson on to lie

Your life finally significant, prophesied by Isaiah feeling it deep inside your warm guts surrounding it

Now the President lies about the date the Appalachian Mountains rose

*He lies about the population of Chicago, about the weight of the adult eagle,
about the acreage of the Everglades,*

He lies about the composition of the amniotic fluid, about which city is the capital of Wyoming

He lies about the birthplace of Attila the Hun, about the number of fish taken every year in the Arctic He denies that Luther was ever a German and insists that only the Protestants sold indulgences, That Pope Leo X wanted to reform the church but the liberal elements prevented him,

That the Peasants' War was fomented by Italians from the North

And Rusk lies about the time the sun sets.

• • •

*This is only the deep longing for death the longing that someone will come and lead you by the hand to where they all are sleeping.
Where the Egyptian Pharaohs are asleep, and your own mother and all those disappeared children, who went around with you in a swing in grade school—*

*Do not be angry at Johnson—he is longing to take in his hand
the locks of death hair*

*And to meet his children sleeping, his own children,
sleeping and unborn*

He is drifting sideways toward the dusty places of so many people who were unknown to me, people in prison, or hunted, or alone.

ROBERT BLY

"That is the great lesson I learned in my childhood, in the backyard of a lonely house. Maybe it was nothing but a game two boys played who didn't know each other and wanted to pass to the other some good things of life. Yet this small and mysterious exchange of gifts has perhaps remained inside me, like a sedimentary deposit, bringing my poems to life."

This curious and beautiful story, which Neruda carefully links to the origins of his own poetry, is a conscious rejection of the connection between poetry and sickness, so often insisted on by Europeans. What is most startling about Neruda, I think, when we compare him to Eliot or Dylan Thomas or Pound, is the great affection that accompanies his imagination. Neruda read his poetry for the first time in the United States in June of '66 at the Poetry Center in New York, and it was clear from that reading that his poetry is intended as a gift. When Eliot gave a reading, one had the feeling that the reading was a cultural experience, and that Eliot doubted very much if you were worth the trouble, but he'd try anyway. When Dylan Thomas read, one had the sense that he was about to perform some magical and fantastic act, perhaps painting a Virgin while riding on three white horses, and maybe you would benefit from this act, and maybe you wouldn't. Pound used to scold the audience for not understanding what he did. When Neruda reads, the mood in the room is one of affection between the audience and himself.

We tend to associate the modern imagination with the jerky imagination, which starts forward, stops, turns around, switches from subject to subject. In Neruda's poems, the imagination drives forward, joining the entire poem in a rising flow of imaginative energy. In the underworld of the consciousness, in the thickets where Freud, standing a short distance off, pointed out incest bushes, murder trees, half-buried primitive altars and unburied bodies, Neruda's imagination moves with utter assurance, sweeping from one spot to another almost magically. The starved emotional lives of notaries public he links to the whiteness of flour, sexual desire to the shape of shoes, death to the barking sound where there is no dog. His imagination sees the hidden connections between conscious and unconscious substances with such assurance that he hardly bothers with metaphors—he links them by tying their hidden tails. He is a new kind of creature moving about under the surface of everything. Moving under the earth, he knows everything from the bottom up (which is the right way to learn the nature of a thing) and therefore is never at a loss for its name. Compared to him, most American poets resemble blind men moving gingerly along the ground from tree to tree, from house to house, feeling each thing for a long time, and then calling out "House!" when we already know it is a house.

Neruda has confidence in what is hidden. The establishment respects only what the light has fallen on, but Neruda likes the unlit just as well. He writes of small typists without scorn, and of the souls of huge, sleeping snakes.

He violates the rules for behavior set up by the wise. The conventionally wise assure us that to a surrealist the outer world has no reality—only his inner flow of images is real. Neruda's work demolishes this banality. Neruda's poetry is deeply surrealist, and yet entities of the outer world like the United Fruit Company have greater force in his poems than in those of any strictly "outward" poet alive. Once a poet takes a political stand, the wise assure us that he will cease writing good poetry. Neruda became a Communist in the middle of his life and has remained one: at least half of his greatest work, one must admit, was written after that time. He has written great poetry at all times of his life.

Finally, many critics in the United States insist that the poem must be hard-bitten, impersonal and rational, lest it lack sophistication. Neruda is wildly romantic, and more sophisticated than Hulme or Pound could dream of being. He has few literary theories. Like Vallejo, Neruda wishes to help humanity, and tells the truth for that reason.

A Sadness for America

THE LIGHT AROUND THE BODY.
By Robert Bly. Harper & Row. 62 pp.
$3.95.

PAUL ZWEIG

Mr. Zweig is a poet who teaches at Columbia University.

Robert Bly's imagination is like a light moving around a central wick. The title of his book describes it well: the light around the body; a darting, flickering illumination, extending the private energies of the body into a circle of images. His poems do not assume the form of an argument, or an ongoing parable. They return to the inward spring of the body and move away again, line by line, until slowly the shape of the poem has emerged. "Those Being Eaten by America," moves in this way from image to image, as if each were somehow beginning the poem again. It ends:

Ministers who dive headfirst into the earth

*The pale flesh
Spreading guiltily into new literatures*

*That is why these poems are so sad
The long dead running over the fields*

*The mass sinking down
The light in children's faces fading at six or seven*

The world will soon break up into small colonies of the saved

The ministers and the long dead and the fading light are groping toward a clarity which comes in the last line: "The world will soon break up into small colonies of the saved." The moments of the poem need this sudden shift of understanding. Not the accumulated sorrows and images of the poem but now, suddenly, the clear-sighted thought which a man comes upon only when he has lived with the sorrows for a long time.

There are many such lines in The Light Around the Body. They have a prophetic ring, inviting the reader to shape the poem into a meditation:

Come with me into those things that have felt this despair for so long

This indeed is Robert Bly's invitation in The Light Around the Body. It is lonely, but unhesitating. Above all it is filled with a sense of betrayal. Robert Bly must have loved the places and the names of America very deeply to have been so powerfully stirred by the terror in the land: the tires he evokes, howling on thruways; the ghost train in the Rockies loaded with Indian blood; the generals in Washington who peddle their splinters of black light from country to country, teaching "the children of ritual to overcome their longing for life."

Bly takes us with him into these things. The overpowering sadness in his book is not a closed anxiety. Paradoxically, the voice in the poems is essentially a happy one, healthy enough to say "come with me." We are being invited to look at the real despair of a country where

*Bishops rush about crying, There is no war,
And bombs fall,
Leaving a dust on the birch trees.*

It is a peaceful country:

We drive between lakes just turning green;
Late June. The white turkeys have been moved
To new grass.

And yet the peace turns out to be a mistake. For we have mislaid our suffering. We have somehow gotten turned around the wrong way. We are gay, and yet dangerous to others. Therefore:

Our own gaiety
Will end up
In Asia, and in your cup you will look down
And see
Black Starfighters.
We were the ones we intended to bomb!

There are a number of epigraphs in The Light Around the Body, heading the separate sections of the volume; and one of them, taken from Jacob Boehme, describes very well the unique quality of Robert Bly's poetry:

So then I found in all things good and evil, love and wrath, in creatures of reason as well as in wood, in stone, in earth, in the elements, in men and animals. Withal, I considered the little spark "man" and what might be esteemed to be by God in comparison with this great work of heaven and earth.

In consequence I grew very melancholy, and what is written, though I knew it well, could not console me.

There is a playfulness and an excitement in the poems; a gift of praise, enlivening those "things" into which we are being taken. Without the praise, the melancholy would be pale; it would be ungenerous.
The danger is real because Bly knows how precious are those things which the "spark" of man destroys:

The grave moves forward from its ambush,

Moving over hills on black feet,
Living off the country,
Leaving dogs and sheep murdered
where it slept;
Some shining thing, inside, that has served us well

Shakes its bamboo bars—
It may be gone before we wake . . .

Whatever it is, enclosed in the bamboo cage, it may be gone before we gain our senses. The grave moves quickly, and we move slowly. Just as the grave carried by American planes speeds around the world; while we, the plane makers, move slowly. Until we discover that the cage inside us, the inward place, is empty.
"We are the ones we intended to bomb."

It is this ability to move between the inward and the outward emotion that makes Robert Bly one of the finest political poets in America. The middle section of The Light Around the Body is entitled "The Vietnam War," and it contains a number of sobering, wryly humorous poems, like this one entitled "Counting Small-Boned Bodies":

Let's count the bodies over again.

If we could only make the bodies
smaller,
The size of skulls,
We could make a whole plain white with skulls in the moon-light!

If we could only make the bodies
smaller,
Maybe we could get
A whole year's kill in front of us on a desk!

If we could only make the bodies
smaller,
We could fit
A body into a finger-ring, for a keepsake forever.

The words repeat themselves, until bodies seem to turn into money, and the money into little souvenirs, like the ears harvested for trophies from the dead bodies of the "enemy" in Vietnam. The poem lets us in on a ghastly practical joke. In his office an executive is acting out his name, "executing" the rebellious lives in those bodies, while he dreams of gathering his kill in small, clean heaps on his desk, purified of suffering, as far from the broken lives and villages as the pilot in a B-52 bomber, 6 miles higher than the clouds.

The sadness in The Light Around the Body is a sadness for America. The book quietly, but firmly, translates the inward mystery and melancholy of which Boehme speaks, into an expansive public language.

To be sure, not all the poems in Bly's volume sustain this clear language. There is a tendency in some poems to evoke a cast of "accountants," "bankers," "executives," "dentists," who float heavily across the scene, without ever really emerging. They are negative characters, and often boring.

There is another fault which tends to limit the impact of some poems. At times the spiritual moment of which Bly writes has been so entirely transposed into fantasy, that one misses the enveloping shape of the human. The poem "Suddenly Turning Away" is about a crisis of love between people. It begins:

Someone comes near, the jaw
Tightens, bullheads bite
The snow, moments of intimacy waved away,
Half-evolved antennas of the sea snail
Sink to the ground.

Missing here is the simple gesture, the familiar situation which must encircle

"This book is causing a severe case of jitters in official Washington."

Its conclusion is that endless war may be good for the U.S. Some say it is grimly serious. Others call it leg-pulling satire. Sources close to the White House revealed that the Administration is alarmed.
These sources say cables have gone to U.S. embassies, with stern instructions: Play down discussion of 'Iron Mountain'."—U.S. News & World Report

Report from Iron Mountain

ON THE POSSIBILITY AND DESIRABILITY OF PEACE

With introductory material
by LEONARD C. LEWIN
$5.00, now at your bookstore
THE DIAL PRESS

The American Motorist is getting away with murder

90% of all highway fatalities are caused by bad drivers, not by bad cars.

This explosive book puts the blame squarely on the motorist rather than the car manufacturer—and shows how flabby state laws (31 states permit a blind man to renew his license), careless drivers, excessive drinkers, and people who simply don't know how to handle cars, are responsible for our shocking highway statistics.

LICENSED TO KILL

The incompetent
American motorist and how he got that way.

by Ronald M. Weiers

$2.95 cloth, $1.95 paper
Now at your bookstore

CHILTON

and anchor the fantasy. By taking us so far inward, Bly has paradoxically left us outside. He has kept the secret of suddenly turning away.

These faults mark a danger in Bly's imagination. But they are only minor blemishes in a book as richly and as variously sustained as is The Light Around the Body.

THEATRE

HAROLD CLURMAN

Edward Albee's most recent play (given at the Studio Arena Theatre in Buffalo and there till March 30) is a work in progress. It is that in several senses: the play was written as two separate short plays, one called Box, the other Quotations from Chairman Mao Tse-tung, but at present they are being played "enmeshed," which I believe is the right way to do them. When I speak of "work in progress" I allude also not only to slight amendments, chiefly cuts, that are still being made in the text but also to the fact that the play reveals Albee in search of new methods and forms.

There is a hint of Beckett in the play but its tone is entirely Albee's. It begins with the sound of an invisible woman's voice as the audience looks into the interior of a large cube which fills most of the stage space. Following her monologue the stage lights are dimmed and there emerges the outline of a boat deck in which, at different points on the stage, are an old woman in bedraggled clothes, an elegant lady of the moderately wealthy class, a somnolent minister—the latter two sitting on deck chairs—and the figure of Mao Tse-tung who circles about the stage and around the audience whom he directly addresses.

Harold Clurman has received the first Sang Prize for Critics of the Fine Arts, presented by Knox College, Galesburg, Ill. The award carries a $5,000 stipend. Among those receiving special mention in the competition was Julius Novick, also honored for his Nation theatre criticism.

The invisible woman speaks the entire text of the play initially called Box, her most significant phrases being intermittently repeated during the independent section originally entitled Quotations from Mao Tse-tung. The solo voice is thus both a choral comment and in itself a declaration, a slow, quiet rumination. Its writing reminds me of the author's own subdued, hesitant and occasionally cryptic manner. The voice speaks dispassionately but somewhat mournfully of a "box" as a place to which one may retire and think freely, privately formulating one's innermost reflections. It dwells on the deterioration of the arts into crafts, on the moral apathy of our day, on the past when music was the expression of purity, but above all and most movingly on the waste of substance and lives—the dumping of milk, the killing of children—the total corruption of the times. It is the little things, the small cracks, as well as the glaring horrors, the woman's voice submits, that disclose the general decay. Now the very existence of art—when it is art and not mere craft—hurts. Overhead, a black net of birds rushes by and there is "just one, moving beneath, in the opposite way," the one being emblematic of those precious few among us who refuse to fly toward universal disaster.

These are the play's key themes structured into a polyphonic chamber work, bits of which keep sounding during the play's later "movements." Though still abstract, what follows the introduction contains a "narrative." The wealthy lady on the main deck who has been reading Trollope or James or Hardy tells the mute minister of her 40-year-old husband's death, of her brash and indifferent daughter, of her attempt at suicide by jumping off the boat, and the other passengers' suspicion that she may try to do it again. Her account is a graph of the emptiness and futility of the middle-class world. Will she really kill herself? "Good heavens, no; I have nothing to die for," she answers.

As counterpoint to this the destitute old lady tells of abandonment by her children in doggerel. ("So they have shirked and slighted me, and shifted me about. . . . So they have well-nigh soured me, an' wore my old heart out.") Her complaint is broken by long pauses during which Mao, in measured, sweetly reasonable discourse, enunciates the plausible Marxist-Leninist doctrine of the inevitability and desirability of world revolution spiced with von Clausewitz's famous dictum, "War is the extension of politics by other means."

In short, we are confronted with banality on three levels: the despair of the middle class, the heartbreak of the dispossessed, the role of the professional insurgent. The representative of religion is mildly perturbed but for the most part sleeps the sleep of the just. It is the ultimate indignity, the woman's voice from the "box" asserts again, when we cannot listen to music any more because it makes us cry and "nothing belongs."

The message is not "new" but in this reading (and especially in retrospect) it acquires a poignancy all its own. It may puzzle at first but it becomes ever more telling as the play proceeds. It disturbs without clamor and yet it is somehow reassuring because along with the ominous black net of birds there remains "just one, moving beneath, in the opposite way." Perhaps the future will tell us more about that particular "one" than the contrariness of its direction.

The play will surely bore many theatre-goers, though further abbreviation may help to mitigate this effect. Thinking of such a reaction reminded me of Bacon's aphorism, "There is no excellent beauty that has not some strangeness in the proportion." There is a melancholy beauty in this play and genuine feeling without tears. The play convinces me that we have in Albee a dramatist who is still growing. Box-Mao-Box is like no other play he has written and like very few others written by anyone else.

At the American Place Theatre on West 46th Street Ed Bullins' The Electronic Nigger and Others (the others being two short plays called A Son, Come Home and Clara's Ole Man) is the work of a young writer of whom it can be said without condescension that he is promising because he performs. The mark of his promise is the diversity of his attack, subject matter and style.

The first and least satisfactory of the trio is a sketch composed of "impressionist" fragments to suggest the unhappy background of a young poet who on his return to his birthplace and mother recalls the painful stages of his emergence into conscious maturity. There is some juggling with time sequences and no embarrassing stress on the plight of the developing artist, but on the whole this opening piece must be set down as

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION

3-25-68

333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 12 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign Postage $2; Canadian Postage $1 per year extra)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

a prologue, with perhaps more biographical interest than intrinsic value, to the two "panels" that follow.

The first of these, The Electronic Nigger, is a sharply funny satirical farce in which the two main characters, like Bullins himself, are Negroes, but the play is not about Negroes. It deals with modern schools and schooling, with "computerized" thinking and teaching, with the force, attraction and horror of mechanized education. It is, if you will, a parody on "McLuhanism" not as a theory but as a symptom.

A neophyte college teacher on his first day as instructor in creative writing opens his class by introducing himself and confidently explaining the intention of his course. A late arrival enters and with caustic and irrepressible officiousness begins to question every bit of the pedagogic procedure. He disapproves of both the conduct and the idea of the course. He is, he asserts, a "sociological-data-research-analysis-technician-expert," in the name of which he challenges every word uttered on the ground of semantic imprecision. He speaks with machine-gun velocity and projectile power.

The young teacher, failing to halt the bullet-hard hail of apostrophes by polite objection, finally loses his head, pleads and screams: "I was fed on Faulkner, I cut my teeth on Hemingway," to no avail. He gives up in despair, dismisses the class and leaves to be soothed by the ministrations of one of his sympathetic girl students. Other students, fascinated by the streamlined and brazen self-assurance of the "new man," gather round him and will soon become his slavish disciples. The "humanist" teacher has been defeated. The imbecile of "science" triumphs.

The evening's third item, Clara's Ole Man, is a naturalistic picture of a poor black family in which the conditions of thousands upon thousands of similarly wretched households are mercilessly exposed.

There are a spastic illegitimate child, a ruthlessly cynical and grotesquely oversized Lesbian who blames her unsightly physique as well as her state of mind on education by "Christians." Also present are Clara, under thrall to the older woman (her "ole man") and Clara's well-spoken, relatively educated suitor, a postal employee. Three hoodlums enter, their viciousness being viewed with equanimity, even some satisfaction by the big female. A woman neighbor, a drug addict, also intrudes on the scene briefly. The young man invited on his first visit by Clara, hoping for a decent husband, escapes the premises in disgust and terror only to be beaten up by the hoodlums for his presumed uppityness.

There is neither a pulling of punches nor moralizing in this group portrait. There is no Negro or race "question" in it, no plea, pathos, apology or call for a "solution." Some members of the audience found comedy in the human havoc presented—at least they laughed in gleeful accord with its unabashed savagery. The play's effect is shattering and silencing because it never once tries to trade upon the sense of pity. It also avoids the unpleasant shock of certain plays in which the audience is supposed to appreciate the skill and daring with which ugliness has been depicted. The acting throughout the last two plays is excellent.

FILMS / Robert Hatch

There is clearly a "new wave" in the British cinema, if by that is meant a readily detectable style and some homogeneity of preoccupation. As a term of excellence, however, the phrase cannot be so confidently applied. There is not much force to this wave; it is more gaudy foam than torrent of energy. Ever since the Beatles emerged as a substitute for the lost empire, the English have been on a youth kick, celebrating the exploits of lower-class cubs or attributing cubbish aspirations to characters old enough to feel the strain. And they have been dressing these small tales in Carnaby psychedelia, a commercialized exploitation of hippie revolt. It is stylish enough, all acrylic color, rocking beat and hallucinated interpolation, but it looks like a style generated in the box office and not behind the camera. The British seem more intent on making a pot than a point, and their amiable ripple must be vulnerable to the first fickle breeze. That may be why the pictures seem to work so hard to put their little sensations across.

Thus, Here We Go Round the Mulberry Bush. A nice grammar-school boy, his father a decent shopkeeper, his mother taking an extension course in the 19th-century novelists, itches to cohabit with at least one of his mini-skirted contemporaries before going off to a red brick university. He would prefer to cohabit with all of them, but one—any one—will do for a start. He makes it, this attractive scamp, after variously humiliating mishaps, and then, oh irony, finds himself becoming possessive about the hussy of his predatory ambitions. Next time, he will pick a girl who can cook his kippers as well as tickle his fancy.

That's nice enough, but it's also familiar enough, and when it is tricked out with several rock bands, some voyeur sex shots, a little à la mode satire and a quantity of stroboscopic dream sequences, the freight seems excessive for such youthful fumbings. The brasses should be muted for recording the acne of the soul.

About the matter of dreams: many pictures are featuring them these days; they give a chance for asymmetric optical effects, with delusions of costume. But, as in Mulberry Bush, there is often a trick to this trick, in that the dubiously licit reveries of the audience are also being massaged. It is one thing to make visual the boy's images of himself as an erotic despot, but something else to stage a midnight orgy (how was it arranged?) in the showroom of a bedding concern. The picture also postulates a night away from home when not only the girl but her parents as well become lecherously drunk and pursue one another and a bewildered German au pair girl through the corridors; and it is at a sun-drenched, permissive Motel (there is sailing) of sybaritic austerity that the neophyte finally gets himself thoroughly seduced

An American Punch?

An adult ~~MAN~~?

A thinking man's ~~ENQUIRER~~?

Yes, it's

CARICATOUR

The New Monthly of Contemporary Satire

PUT-DOWNS AND PUT-ONS ON WHAT'S UP (FOR PEOPLE WHO MISS TWO)

CARICATOUR SUBSCRIBE TODAY

260 WEST BROADWAY, N.Y., N.Y. 10013

☐ 1 YEAR $3.50 ☐ 6 MOS. $1.90
(CHECK OR MONEY ORDER)

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____ STATE _____ ZIP _____

by a cool, amused practitioner. These are not his dreams; they are intended as our dreams. Everyone, it is true, has his mulberry bush, and age doesn't necessarily wither it; there comes a time, however, when such exuberant fruit begins to taste waxy.

I once knew a woman who, when she felt the conversation to be sagging, would turn to her son with, "Say something amusing, George." He was a fairly witty fellow, but never on those occasions. Something of the sort has been happening to Dudley Moore—in his recent screen appearances—earlier in the year with Peter Cook in Bedazzled and now on his own in 30 Is A Dangerous Age, Cynthia. Moore has certain attributes for comedy: a repertory of humorous accents, a reliable falsetto, fluent parodies on the piano, an ability to look resolutely muddled. He is also short, a characteristic he accentuates, as did Harry Langdon forty years ago, with voluminous and bagging trousers.

A plot for Dudley Moore takes these risible possibilities and hangs them like washing on the line; it instructs him to do his funny routine. In the present instance, a man three months short of his 30th birthday determines to become married and to write a successful musical comedy before he reaches that watershed age. As the film opens he has yet to take a first step toward consummating either of these projects, and no one needs to be told that he will exercise his special gifts to bring them off in a whirl of guileless confusion.

Mr. Moore's young man is somewhat visionary, and a considerable portion of the picture is devoted to his waking dreams, in which appear a wealth of pretty girls in bridal garb. He himself is seen as Beethoven and Bach and Mozart and Handel, and I saw no reason why he should not have appeared also as Wagner, Verdi, Sibelius and George Gershwin since repetition is never thought a weakness in this picture, and since it is only a question of running up a wig and a proper suit of clothes for each impersonation.

That seems to me the trouble with this unassuming, good-natured picture—it depends too much on wigs, not enough on wit: there is no structure of comedy beneath the funny turns. The energy is prodigious but not the invention: for example, Moore's musical, when at last it opens, offers nothing but pandemonium in the balcony and a blank on the stage. It would be wrong to say that the movie is without laughs—they come, but they come reluctantly, and from the belly. One chuckles at least in part from remembering how very droll Moore was in Beyond the Fringe. That early vehicle has been worth a fortune to him, as to Cook, but it won't run forever without gas.

ART

MAX KOZLOFF

Chrysalis and scythe, the open-eye camouflage of peacock and moth, hairy antennae and splattered fireworks: these are among the keening images of Lee Krasner's latest paintings at the Marlborough-Gerson Gallery. Or rather, they exist as inferences in her art, even below that threshold of recognition that would give these paintings the status of semi-abstractation. Gesture and form are too masticated to evoke the presence of real subject matter. But emerging shape and gyratory rhythm are keyed into a large sense of animal combat and floral growth. Miss Krasner's hooked, flung commas of paint punctuate larger loping mandibles, or swaying tufts and fronds eccentrically sheared off by each other. One can no longer distinguish between the manual activity of the artist and the magnified flutter of movement in the bush.

Pictorial metaphors this much developed, and paint lashing so loose and yet controlled, do not crop up suddenly full-blown in an artist's vision. For twenty years Lee Krasner had tenaciously pursued some of the options inherent in the style of her husband, Jackson Pollock, and behind him, never so evident as now, the malignant entomology of André Masson, the French Surrealist. But in place of the zigzags and saw-tooths of the European painter, and the unspooled tracteries of the American, there appeared in her work of the early sixties a smudgier, more crumbled dervish of lines, dots and tones. If it was as "all over" as Pollock's, it was a style more of dovetailing than interlacing, more centrifugal than labyrinthine. Out from multiple centers that seemed to funnel across the surface there churned ragged shards of light and dark. Though it already conveyed the force of a strong personality, this art was embroiled in a number of particularly messy problems.

The major difficulty was the conflict between imagery meant to be perceived in one swoop, and complex, episodic passages that detained and absorbed the glance. This condition might have enriched the overall experience had it not been for an intrusive incoherence in the relation of part to whole, and means to ends. For instance, calligraphy flailed about without committing itself fully either to the role of gesture or contour. And space, for this reason, was indiscriminately buckled, crunched or squeezed, preventing a meaningful reading of depth or shallowness. At her 1962 exhibition at the Howard Wise Gallery, these stresses dominated a series of giant, rather monochrome façades, mostly indistinguishable from one another. It was a display of monumentalized irresolution.

The current show, scanning five years of revisions, reveals Krasner first to have pulverized (within much smaller formats) her immense gyrations into a webbing of lines squiggled and smeared from the tube; then to have attacked the problem of color by scraping strong hues into the surrounds as well as assigning them to the handwriting. At first very harmonic, for instance dark cobalt against olive white, this color began to move out into fresher, more surprising combinations for which the precedent is not Pollock but Matisse. Subtle forms of beige and ivory on the unprimed canvas may at any moment counterpoint markings of alizarin, permanent green and cadmium yellow, as in "Pollination," 1968. To the excitement of these contrasts, simultaneously raw and understated, is added the tension of perceiving color as a sharp halo or shadow, rather than as a property or part of the substance of an image. Elsewhere, striations of color are more decorative and synthetic as they splash over goggling forms or are pinched into corners. "Uncial," "Transition" and "The Green Fuse" are all very recent works sprouting quick and knowing variations on the theme of image and ground. They signify that the burgeoning of a mature art has resulted in an incredibly bright and calamitous vision as well.

BOOKPLATES

FREE CATALOG—beautiful designs for every age and taste. Special designing too. Address: BOOKPLATES, Yellow Springs 2, Ohio.

EDUCATIONAL

Toughest Curriculum in the Country: You design it. Convince us you can help make a new kind of college work. Write: Admissions N, Franconia College, Franconia, N.H. 03580.

TRAVEL

TOUR YUCATAN—July 8th, all expenses from New Orleans and return—12 unforgettable days —$400. MEXIVAC TOURS, P. O. Box 274, Lombard, Ill. 60148.

ART

WOULD YOU BELIEVE EXCITING ORIGINAL woodcuts, etchings, lithos, $4.50 each. Subscription information: Graphic Circle, (N), 68 Fifth Avenue, New York City 10011

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

TYPING WORRIES??? Expert Typing, Reasonable Rates. Manuscripts, doctoral and masters theses our specialty. Call (201) 667-5145

Crossword Puzzle No. 1242

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 It certainly doesn't imply a very objective legal viewpoint, as the sentence might show. (10,4)
- 9 This probably bothered the vision of a wondrous wise man. (7)
- 11 Concerning the common man, possibly reactionary. (7)
- 13 Smaller pictures, perhaps, of how some court battles are lumped. (6)
- 2 and 15 across At least they might on the late, late show! (You've got something to hang onto, here.) (7,6)
- 4 A bit of an insult an American might think to be in a British cake. (7)
- 7 Earned, as they say about a penny. (5)
- 9 Not straightforward, the rest lie like a mule! (7)
- 11 Severely criticizing in reviews of pictures, "Adult" might! (8)
- 3 and 4 down Certainly not formal neckwear sometimes expected in the service.
- 5 It's the job of the maestro to look over the runway. (7)
- 6 Jail, as well as one who ought to be in jail. (7)
- 7 A sudden inclination to be with such as Mercury? Many an account is enriched with their trips. (4,10)

DOWN:

- 1 Found under pictures of the Skate and the Nautilus, for example. (9)

- 2 More people blow them than rub them.
- 3 Poetic description of New England farmers? (9)
- 5 Spotted when the sporting crowd is in changed environment? (10)
- 6 Don't use the brakes, since there's no danger when it's clear. (5)
- 7 The lady a radical type, hence cut off?
- 8 An early patriot brings nothing to its makeup. (4)
- 13 and 21 down Overtaking a small Pontiac, perhaps, doesn't imply wide shoulders. (7,3,4)
- 15 I'm in a magazine such as this? Life, rather! (9)
- 16 Sweeps by the fire? (9)
- 18 Open gallery operated in the Hindu scripture. (7)
- 20 Copy of a bird, but not an early one.
- 22 Produce a vehicle, perhaps. (5)
- 24 The charms of the West Indies might get around in the orient. (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1241

ACROSS: 1 On location; 6 Spar; 10 Running; 11 Tagging; 12 Importer; 13 Steer; 15 Ranch; 17 April fool; 19 Prognosis; 21 Dives; 23 Reefs; 24 Mulberry; 27 Isthmus; 28 Advance; 29 Saps; 30 Protestant.
DOWN: 1 and 25 down Ourselves; 2 Line-man; 3 Chino; 4 Tightwads; 5 Outer; 7 Primero; 8 Regardless; 9 Egg salad; 14 Properties; 16 Handsome; 18 Resultant; 20 One-step; 22 Veranda; 24 Miser; 26 Best.

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

THE FUTURIST, published bimonthly by World Future Society, reports scientists' forecasts for coming decades. Subscription: $5 yearly. Box 19285-N, Twentieth Street Station, Washington D.C. 20036.

GARRISON RIGHT? Conspiracy report 'The New Nazis' $1.00 or free information. Vikar N, Box 2241, Springfield, Mass. 01101

PERSONALS

BOOK ACCESSORIES KIT, contains markers, pockets, tabs, stickers. $1.00 Educational Service, 2790 West Fifth Street, Brooklyn, N. Y. 11224

INTERESTED IN LIFE? Believe men should live each day to the fullest? So do humanists. For information write: Dept. N-1, American Humanist Association, 125 El Camino del Mar, San Francisco, Calif. 94121.

I WOULDN'T BUY A USED CAR FROM EITHER JOHNSON OR NIXON—239 other underground buttons. Free catalogue to all. Free sample to stores. 1/25c, 5/$1, 50/$5, 125/$10, and 1000/$75. A Big-Little Store, Dept. N, 1671 Washington, San Francisco, 94109

$500 REWARD TO DEBATE THE RACE ISSUE. Debate Records offers $500 each to two highly articulate contenders who can present scientific proof that the Negro race is equal or unequal to the Caucasian race. DEBATE RECORDS, Box 199, Ridgewood, N.J. 07451

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE

(Computerized Matching—All Ages)
"Let TEAM make you a team."

Write:

TEAM Project

245 East 30th Street

New York, N.Y. 10016, Phone 889-6020

FIGHT JUNK MAIL. Send it back at THEIR expense. Labels and instruction $1.00. Artichoke, P.O. Box 9123C, Bridgeport, Connecticut 06601

"McCarthy in '68", "Reagan & Lassie in '68", "Dump Johnson in '68", "LBJ for Ex-President", "RFK in '68", "The Governor of Alabama is a Mother", "Draft Beer, Not Students", "Kill for Peace", "Stop the War", "Ban Napalm", "Give LBJ the Bird", "Make Love Not War", "Studying Causes Cancer", "Legalize Pot", "Incest Begins at Home", "Chaste Makes Waste", "Hands Off Tim Leary", "Make War on Poverty, Not People", "Sex Before Finals", "Apple Pie Makes you Sterile", "Melt General Hershey", King-Size bumperstrips. 2/$1, 5/$2, 15/$5. TOPP, P.O. Box 1802-N, Chicago, Ill. 60690

DISCOVER ■■ intriguing, fun approach to meeting alert, literate Jewish singles. No computers used. For FREE analytical questionnaire write: Dept. N, OPERATION MAZELTOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036. (PL 7-3638)

PEACE AND FREEDOM PARTY ORGANIZING IN VIRGINIA! Interested? Contact: PFP, 14 Cornell Drive, Hampton, Virginia.

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
242-8400

We'll send you this new book FREE
if you become a NATION subscriber

FREE with each NEW subscription

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014

I'll join the good fight. I enclose $10 to subscribe to THE NATION for 12 months (48 issues). I understand you'll send me LBJ Lampooned free with this new subscription.

($11 Canada, $12 Foreign)

Name

Street

City State Zip

NA 3-25

"There are charitable ways of describing Lyndon Johnson," writes Jules Feiffer in the introduction to LBJ LAMPOONED: "They will not be found in this volume."

LBJ simply is not our picture of the Happy Warrior. Somehow we don't think he's yours either.

And there's much to be learned from cartoonists' insights into what goes into the making of this particular President.

We'd like to share the book with you and we'd like you as a regular NATION reader.

In fact we need creative readers to do our job (we've been at it 102 years) of contributing to sane discourse on and sound insights into American life. A job we've never taken more to heart than we do in this Presidential election year.

The good fight is now in

THE NATION

--why not join now?

COUNTER CULTURE II THEODORE ROSIAK

THE NATION

APRIL 1, 1968 35 cents

LURLINGAME
APR 2 1968
LIBRARY

Three Prisoners

THE PETTY ROUTE HOME

HOWARD ZINN

Vietnam & the Gold Drain PETER L. BERNSTEIN

This Spring in Prague JIRI MUCHA

REVIEWS

THOMAS WOLFE / Mina Curtiss

CONRAD AIKEN / Richard Eberhart

IRDECAI RICHLER / Robert Hatch

LYCE CAROL OATES & WENDELL BERRY / Richard C. Sterne

U.S.-1449
PUBLIC
LIBRARY
CA 94010

LETTERS

responsibility in science

Brewster, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: I am glad to see in your Mar. 4 letters column a reference by Dr. Esther Milner to the Society for Social Responsibility in Science, whose members strive, in accordance with their individual consciences, to exercise their profession for the benefit of humanity. It is deplorable that the SSRS, with its splendid objectives and the self-sacrificing efforts of many of its members, does not have a larger constituency. Now more than twenty years old, it has members in twenty-five countries and its Newsletter circulates in forty, but the membership has remained stable at approximately 500 for the past five years.

Dues are adjusted according to income, but at most amount to the cost of a few drinks at a metropolitan cocktail lounge. The $2 subscription for the Newsletter is included in the dues. The president for 1967-68 is Prof. E. U. Condon of Boulder, Colo., and the chairman of the membership committee is Daniel Berger, 6655 Lawnton Ave., Philadelphia, Pa. 19126.

Nation readers in the New York metropolitan area can hear Dr. Milner herself on the evening of Thursday, April 4, at the Community Church, 40 East 35 Street, New York 10016. Admission is free and the public is cordially invited. The subject of Dr. Milner's talk will be announced shortly.

Carl Dreher

napalm

Ottawa, Ont.

DEAR SIR: Following the statement by Joe Alex Morris, Jr. ["The Strategy of Daydreams" The Nation, Jan. 22] that napalm had been used in November last by Israeli forces against either Jordanian army positions or a refugee camp—the article did not say which—I wrote to the Israeli ambassador in Ottawa asking if this was a correct statement. The ambassador's reply is enclosed. [Ambassador Arie Eshel declined to answer Dr. Rosenberg's question, but went on to point out that napalm has not been banned by any international convention.]

All weapons of war inflict suffering; but napalm is surely one of the most barbarous, and its continued use is inexcusable. Particularly unforgivable is the use of napalm against guerrillas such as in Vietnam, where the unfortunate civilians caught between two belligerents are likely to constitute by far the largest proportion of the victims. . . . Poison gas was outlawed by international convention; and surely the same could be done with napalm. Could not The Nation . . . initiate a campaign to take the issue of napalm to the International Court—or to the greater court of public opinion—and have this torture banned by international law?

Horace D. Rosenberg, M.D.

money pays the bills

Tougaloo, Miss.

DEAR SIR: There is not a Mississippi Newsletter this week. There was simply no money. We at Freedom Information Service are writers (and filers, and sorters and pasters). We are not salesmen. If you are not our salesmen, there are none. We've gotten an abundance of promises and sympathy. Only money pays the bills.

Miracles we don't ask. Only that you contact those you know. Add up small donations or talk a fat cat into remembering there's still (some semblance of) a civil rights movement in Mississippi. We can only wait to hear from you.

Freedom Information Service
Box 120, Tougaloo, Miss. 39174

EDITORIALS

LBJ's Moment of Crisis

After the big shake-up of the last two weeks, the political situation should now begin to shake out. In the meantime, a few words of caution. Because of what we had to say (issue of March 18) about the unreliability of polls in this election, it is worth noting that all of them were wrong about New Hampshire. So read and study the polls, by all means, but be wary. For much the same reason be skeptical about those big fat dogmas to which the press is addicted in election years. For example, we have been reminded again and again that "not since Chester Arthur was rejected by his party in 1884 has an incumbent President been denied renomination." Now the fact that it had happened at least once should suggest to the pundits that it might happen again. In fact, it has happened more than once: Tyler (1844), Fillmore (1852), Pierce (1856). But more important than precedent is the fact that this is an exceptional election. "You have to remember," a Democratic politician told a reporter for the National Observer, "that we've never had a situation like this before. I mean we've never had so much emotion." Emotion is volatile and hard to measure. Even a brief survey of the post-New Hampshire scene suggests why the dogma that a President can always have the renomination if he wants it is open to question.

In New Hampshire, the President's vulnerability, in his own party, was demonstrated. But Wisconsin is much more important. It has far more voters and shares certain voter characteristics with some eight states in the area. Wisconsin is good political terrain for McCarthy; he has more going for him there than he will have in the other primaries he has entered. The timing is excellent—not too long after New Hampshire and not too soon. The McCarthy partisans are "up" and they will stay that way. McCarthy, in brief, can win in Wisconsin. If he does, the President's assurance of renomination, though not utterly doomed, will be badly shaken. The crisis for both McCarthy and Kennedy will come later, in Oregon (where George Wallace's name will appear on the Democratic ballot), and in California (where the Peace and Freedom and Wallace parties will have some impact). But for Johnson, the moment of crisis is right now in Wisconsin, and this for several reasons.

Sensing the importance of the state, the politicians and party chieftains will begin to desert Johnson if he loses. To them, politics is much too serious a business to be left to chance or voter caprice; they can't afford to be sentimental and, as between Johnson and Kennedy, they can hardly afford to be neutral. If Johnson loses, they will say to themselves: What might Kennedy have done in Wisconsin with his money and organization? And what might he do elsewhere? Kennedy they can understand; he is "big-time politics." He is one of them. He understands organization and believes in money and muscle. They do not "dig" McCarthy in the same way. He has proved himself to be a fine campaigner and a brilliant tactician and more likely to unify the Democratic Party than either Johnson or Kennedy, but considerations of this order are not uppermost in the minds of politicians. If Johnson loses in Wisconsin, the loser tag, which had been reserved for Nixon, will be applied to him. And this is not an election in which an incumbent President can rely upon the loyal support of well-organized state machines. With a few exceptions, the Democratic state organizations are in bad shape. Johnson has been an almost total disaster as party leader. When Sandy Levin, the new party chairman in Michigan visited Washington recently, neither the President nor Marvin Watson nor James Rowe, the President's campaign manager, had time to see him; it is reported that Levin left the Capital "less than enthralled" by the Administration.

But the bosses and politicians are not the only ones who will begin to desert Johnson if he loses in Wisconsin. Kennedy's candidacy provides excellent political cover should Walter Reuther now decide to break with the AFL-CIO. If Bobby can risk a rupture with Johnson, Reuther can risk one with Meany, who is backing Johnson. Reuther and Kennedy are in much the same position: it is now or never for both of them. If Reuther wants to get back into the mainstream of labor leadership, he must act soon. Labor policy today must be shaped with full realization, as he himself has said, that "the world is in deep trouble." Three cents more an hour is important, but so are inflation, the "austerity" programs to check it, and Vietnam. Even before Kennedy's announcement the UAW, always a big contributor, had decided not to join the AFL-CIO's political drive this year; campaign funds will be distributed to candidates approved by the union. Nor will its experienced organizers be available to the AFL-CIO.

In Oregon, the AFL-CIO state committee, to its shame, is not supporting Sen. Wayne Morse, but he does have the endorsement of the UAW. It is still not too late for Reuther to break with the Administration, despite his fairly recent mild plug for Johnson ("the best thing we see on the political horizon at this time"). If he were to join the rapidly expanding army of "dropouts," his action might well trigger a rank-and-file insurrection in labor nationally.

Dr. George Gallup reports: "The solid support given President Johnson and his Vietnam policies, demonstrated by the heads of organized labor . . . is not in line with the view of rank-and-file union members." Forty-three per cent of union families disapprove of what the President is doing in Vietnam. Other leaders of mass organizations now face the same hard choice that confronts Reuther. Both the President and the Vice President jetted to Minneapolis to woo the National Farmers Union, but late reports indicate that the membership of the organization is sharply divided on Vietnam. "I have an open mind," said the president of the Illinois Farmers Union, "but we're going to talk to Bobby Kennedy to see how he stands."

It is being said, of course, that the President will certainly not stand aside now, so great is his hatred of Bobby Kennedy. But the "total situation" at Chicago might dictate the wisdom of that decision. The chance may be improbable; it is not unthinkable. And the President is not likely to seek re-election if he feels certain that he would be defeated in November. He is a proud and vain man but

IN THIS ISSUE

April 1, 1968

EDITORIALS

426

ARTICLES

430 Vietnam & the Gold Drain

Peter L. Bernstein

431 Three Prisoners:
The Petty Route Home

Howard Zinn

437 This Spring in Prague

Jiri Mucha

439 The Counter Culture: Part II
Politics of the Nervous System

Theodore Roszak

444 Democratic Shake-Up:
The California Survival Kit

Phil Kerby

BOOKS & THE ARTS

446 Wolfe Among the Monstres Sacrés

Mina Curtiss

448 Versions of Rural America

Richard Clark Sterne

450 Snow Lodge (poem)

Leonard Nathan

451 Man With a Marvy Lymph System

Robert Hatch

452 A Fearful & Mindless Violence

David Thorburn

453 Thumb-Sucking

Richard Eberhart

454 Theatre

Harold Clurman

455 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERRY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 for Canadian postage; $2 for foreign postage.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION

Vol. 206

No. 14

he is not the kind who would go down to defeat just to spite the Kennedys.

Will this be then, as most of the pundits are also saying, "the night of the long knives," in which bitter rivalries will hopelessly fragment the Democratic Party? Not if the case against Johnson is made on the issues, as Senator McCarthy has suggested. Since Johnson is, in a real sense, the issue, he can expect rough treatment, the more so since Kennedy is now in the race. But there is no occasion for a Kennedy-McCarthy feud. Senator McCarthy has said that he will support Kennedy if he is nominated; Kennedy must give his support if McCarthy wins. In the District of Columbia, a joint slate has apparently been agreed upon; similar arrangements may be worked out elsewhere. If the fight is kept to the issues, and develops as one between those supporting Johnson and those opposing him, then his renomination is by no means assured and the Democratic Party may emerge the stronger for the challenge. We do not remember just what troubles the unfortunate Chester Arthur faced in 1884, but they could not be as serious as those Lyndon Johnson faces in 1968.

Blockbuster

Governor Rockefeller's decision not to seek the Republican nomination is the most dramatic—and surprising—development to date of this wild campaign. That it was a sudden decision, however long it may have been pondered, is incontestable; some of the Governor's staunchest supporters were caught completely by surprise, including Senator Morton who had agreed to manage his campaign. Was it, asks Tom Wicker in The New York Times, "surrender or strategy"? Or was it for compelling, undisclosed personal considerations? The best guess is that it was a combination of all three. About personal reasons it is futile at present to speculate, but it was "surrender," in the sense that the Governor has measurably enhanced Nixon's chances; "strategy" in the sense that some combination of circumstances might, with the polls pitted against the primaries, create an overwhelming demand for Rockefeller as the strongest candidate the GOP could name.

In a way, the New Yorker has made it difficult for Nixon to overcome the "loser" tag, unless Nixon-Reagan fights develop, and has created a vacuum within the party insofar as the liberal-moderate element is concerned. But, on the record to date, it is difficult to place much confidence in that element; they do not act when they should act and when they finally act they do the wrong thing. There were reasons for the Governor to be discouraged. The group of Republican leaders that assembled in his New York apartment to urge him to run was not at all representative, and the inclusion of William Miller, the forgotten Vice Presidential nominee of 1964, merely made the absentees more conspicuous. The more recent meeting in Washington was not much more impressive. Slight wonder that Rockefeller was reported to be "grumpy and pale" when he left this session.

What it comes down to is implicit in the remarkable statement Senator Morton issued a week earlier. "The United States and the Republican Party teeter at the brink of a disaster that is probably without parallel . . . Suicide is a term not unfamiliar to those who have seen the Republican Party dutifully march over the cliff like a troop of lemmings. At this very moment, my party is once again poised at the edge of the precipice and perhaps, like the Whips a century ago, for the last time." The GOP is a third party today, in numerical terms, and there is little reason, despite the number of Republican governors and fairly good Republican prospects in the Congressional elections, to believe that Nixon can bring in the dissident Democrats and the independents whom the party must attract in order to win. This is a year when "the not-to-be-conceived" has been happening and will probably continue to happen, but it would be something of a miracle if the Republicans, responding to the shock of this blockbuster, were now to rally to the Governor or to one of the bright young talents in the party.

Maximum Security

"Your President," as Mr. Johnson likes humbly to refer to himself, has reached that point of disheveled morale where nothing he does turns out happily. Early in March, he set off with his wife, his daughter, his son-in-law, his grandchild and his dog for a weekend of sunny relaxation at Ramey Air Base in Puerto Rico. Inasmuch as security is now approaching monomania with Mr. Johnson, he told no one where he was going and warned no one—at least no Puerto Rican—that he was coming.

He golfed, churched and shook GI hands, but he did not shake the hand of anyone representing the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. Since LBJ is a prodigious handshaker, the oversight was felt. And Latin feathers were not smoothed by the report that the Caribbean spot which the President had really preferred was St. John in the Virgin Islands. St. John, it was explained, was insufficiently "secure," though in fact it is today virtually a Rockefeller satrapy. No barbed wire, though, and no lookout towers. When Lyndon plays, he likes to be locked in.

The Event of the Year

Time inaugurated the custom of featuring on its cover at year's end the "man of the year." It was not a bad idea but it suffered from two inherent defects: in some years the outstanding man was so obvious that the cover was anticlimactic; while in other years, Time chose someone who looked better to the editors than to anybody else, except possibly the subject's wife. But since the greatness of men is tied up with the events they influence, will one of the media accept our suggestion that they feature the "event of the year"? It may be happening right now.

Vietnam, the run on gold, the remarkable Bobby-Gene-Lyndon political configuration, have obscured the importance of the extraordinary events in Czechoslovakia. It is not only what is now happening that may stand out come Christmas, but the way in which it is happening. The Czech intellectuals are rebelling, and they are doing so in a way that should delight Prof. J. P. Nettl, who suggested in an unpleasantly convincing article (The Nation, March 4) that intellectuals might be obsolete. But those were Western intellectuals. Perhaps Professor Nettl should visit Czechoslovakia as soon as possible and raise his spirits.

Nation readers can't say they were not alerted to the coming events in Czechoslovakia. The editor ("The Outmoded Wall," August 28, 1967), reporting on the writers' congress in Prague, recorded his impression that "the intellectuals were capable of defending their interests; they certainly do not hesitate to say what they think about ■ wide range of issues." Later we ran an editorial, "The Czech Writers" (November 6, 1967) commending them for their courage but, even more than that, for their realism and sense of responsibility. We included in that issue a piece by Josef Skvorecky about modern Czech writers. Now we publish (p. 437) a remarkable article by Jiri Mucha, an outstanding Czech writer who suffered acutely under Stalin. Yet the tone and manner of his piece reflect the essential good sense, the matter-of-fact acceptance of a half-mad world, and the good humor which has survived his personal afflictions. The piece does credit both to Mucha as a man and to Czech intellectuals as a body—at least those who are anything like Mucha.

Can a revolution of intellectuals be both courageous and good-humored? Can it be carried on in a spirit of hope, warmth and freedom from egotism? Above all, can intellectuals understand that, while politicians have their problems and usually are not stupid politically, they are often stupid culturally—especially the ones who are delegated to supervise intellectuals? One must try to understand and humor them as psychiatrists deal with abnormally assertive but not hopelessly psychotic patients.

It may be too early; no one knows how events will turn out. In Poland the outlook is more ominous. The Poles have overplayed their hand repeatedly throughout their agonized history. But the Czechs have the possibility, as the president of their writers' union said recently, of "achieving what has never been done before—produce a Socialist society based on personal freedom . . . which it should have been from the beginning."

That would be a great event indeed. In the meantime, the United States is in the ridiculous position of harboring a Czech general who apparently was ■ Stalinist, while Czechoslovakian socialism is turning toward liberalism. With our anti-Communist obsession, the last thing we would want to see is a civilized, humane type of socialism. We have our scapegoat and we mean to keep it.

Smoke Signal

"A ghetto is a prison" is one of those reversible statements—you can as justly say "A prison is a ghetto." The force of this was evident in comments and explanations that followed the recent $2-million riot at Oregon State Penitentiary. "I don't believe the riot was planned," said State Corrections Administrator George W. Randall. "It started with a mild spark and picked up from there." Watts? Detroit? Newark?

There are other parallels. The Oregon convicts had grievances specific to their condition, but what principally riled them were more general offenses against human dignity: they had no way of communicating their complaints, they were searched without rhyme or reason, they were made to walk a line, there was no resident doctor and only one dentist for 1,400 inmates. And the style of the riot was familiar: it was not systematic, not directed at any enemy; everything was destroyed that could be destroyed, everything that would burn was burned. It was really a smoke signal, saying "Look, we are here."

Billy Ray Bolwing, serving life plus three years, summed it up: "You throw men in a cage like animals and expect them to act human." It doesn't much matter whether the cage is ■ cell or a tenement. Keep a man in that cage long enough, and if he has a match he will light a fire.

Red Hunting Beyond the Grave

W. E. B. DuBois was one of the great figures in American history, a leader in the struggle for the emancipation of the Negro, which is still so far from consummation. He was born in Great Barrington, Mass., in 1868, a descendant of Revolutionary ancestors and as much a New Englander as a Negro. Great Barrington, with its neighboring towns in the upper Housatonic Valley—Stockbridge, Lenox, Sheffield, Pittsfield and others—is a center of culture, and recently some of the citizens, and in particular the editors of The Berkshire Eagle of Pittsfield, called for a memorial to DuBois to be erected on the site of the farm where he was born.

No one denies that up to the age of 65 or so, DuBois was a great, good and learned man. He studied at Fisk, Berlin and Harvard, where he won his doctorate, and was a friend of Henry James, George Santayana and other noted teachers, who did not see what the pigmentation of a man's skin had to do with his scholarship. In 1909, he was one of the founders of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and beginning in 1910 he was the editor of The Crisis for twenty-four years. In the opinion of most historians, black and white alike, no one has done more for the cause of Negro equality than W. E. B. DuBois.

But DuBois did not die, or retire, at 65. He lived to be 95. And as he viewed the meager progress of the Negro over his long life, and despite his own valiant efforts, he grew impatient. He accepted the Lenin peace prize, renounced his American citizenship and became a citizen of Ghana, and shortly before his death in 1963 he joined the Communist Party. Therefore, the American Legion in the neighborhood, the Veterans of Foreign Wars and the Knights of Columbus, as well as some residents who maintain that their views are unbiased, oppose the memorial.

This is a current example of the Communist phobia that has distorted the judgment of a large section of the American people for the past fifty years, with a brief interlude in World War II. In the eyes of such opponents, the taint of communism is enough to make all of a man's achievements count for naught—although there is not the slightest danger that the United States will adopt a totalitarian philosophy, except possibly fascism. The enlightened, patriotic citizens of the Housatonic Valley should be proud of their distinguished son, and they should proclaim their pride to the world by erecting the proposed monument to W. E. B. DuBois.

VIETNAM & THE GOLD DRAIN

PETER L. BERNSTEIN

Mr. Bernstein, an investment counselor, lectures on economics at the New School for Social Research. His latest book is A Primer on Money, Banking and Gold (Random House).

The forces that have unleashed the crisis in gold are strikingly and distressingly similar to the forces that brought on the military crisis in Vietnam: persistent underestimation of the enemy's resources and determination, paralysis of policy and leadership, naive hopes that soothing words would make the trouble disappear and a credibility gap of appalling and widening dimensions.

This combination of circumstances makes prediction unusually difficult, but perhaps some perspective on how the United States got where it is today will provide at least a tentative look at where we might be going.

The origins of the crisis go back a full ten years to the time when it first appeared that expenditures by Americans abroad for foreign goods and services, for investments in foreign countries, in aid to developing nations, and on military activities in Europe and Asia were going chronically to exceed outlays by foreigners in the United States. For a time, foreigners were willing to hold the excess dollars they received, because Fort Knox contained more than enough gold to pay them off if they chose to cash in their chips. However, as some did cash in their chips and as our gold stock shrank, the growing accumulation of claims against our gold grew increasingly ominous to the financial communities abroad.

Yet no one could argue that the dollar was a weak currency or that America's situation was in any way comparable to Britain's. We continued to show a comfortable excess of exports over imports. We were building up an enormous array of highly profitable investments abroad—the output of American-owned enterprises around the world ranks today with the output of the entire Soviet economy. The rate of increase in our price level and wages was persistently below Western Europe's—and is likely to remain so. Our well-balanced economic growth and prosperity were the envy of the world.

With the escalation of the war in Vietnam in late 1965, however, three things happened to intensify the difficulties that had been building up for the dollar. First, military outlays abroad turned sharply higher (and most of the outlays in Vietnam end up in French banks). Second, the overheating that developed in the economy sparked a significant increase in imports of foreign merchandise and services. Third, the war itself created among Europeans a crisis of confidence in America's leadership and use of power, leading in turn to a desire to humble us.

Led by the French, they told Washington that there was a limit to the number of dollar bills they would take to finance our deficit. De Gaulle and his associates insisted that excess payments abroad had to be settled in cash rather than in IOU's. Pressures, doubts and controversy swirled through the financial centers as the United States took only half measures to bring its affairs to order. No one could afford longer to ignore the possibility that the United States might one day have to raise the price of gold. Then the value of its gold hoard would comfortably exceed its liquid liabilities and would thus provide more breathing space to work matters out.

Some observers believe that at this point the United States made a series of strategic errors in policy. We forgot that monetary stability rests upon confidence, decisiveness and ruthlessness toward speculative forces. On the contrary, we humbly agreed with General de Gaulle that gold is the kingpin of the monetary system. Instead of stressing the dollar's enormous strength and instead of emphasizing that gold has value only because we stand ready to convert each ounce of it into $35, we followed de Gaulle right down the line by acting as though it is gold that gives value to the dollar. Thus, by pouring our golden treasure into the hands of private speculators in the hope that this would hold the price down to $35, we actually increased the likelihood that the price of gold would some day have to go up.

Consequently, the stage was set for the denouement when sterling caved in last November. Indeed, the British experience acted only to encourage the attacks on the international monetary system as a consequence of two extremely important related factors.

First, these events proved that the pledges of statesmen are never to be believed. As Abraham Lincoln reminded us (and in contrast to the rest of the world), Anglo-Saxon statesmen both want to be believed and expect to be believed. But when the President of the United States has declared, "We seek no wider war," and when the British Prime Minister has pledged that "We will never devalue," and when both statements turn out to have been gigantic and tragic untruths, the credibility gap becomes immeasurable. In this atmosphere, a pledge to preserve the $35 price for gold means nothing.

Macpherson, Toronto Star

The Bullion Run

Second, the British experience showed the power that speculation can generate. Many experts doubt that the pound was fundamentally in serious trouble, although some short-run difficulties (mostly the seamen's strike and the closing of Suez) had developed. As the speculation against the pound built up, however, it became self-justifying: the lower the British exchange reserves fell, the more likely became a devaluation, which further increased the attractiveness of selling sterling; that in turn depleted the reserves further and encouraged still more selling. Recently, the identical pattern developed in the gold markets abroad: the greater the run on gold, the greater the chance of an increase in its price. Thus, speculation again became self-justifying, no longer bearing any real relationship to the strength or weakness of the dollar.

An important factor that greatly intensified the speculation was the absence of risk. The man who sold sterling in November for $2.80 knew that at worst he would not be required to pay more than $2.80 if he decided to repurchase sterling. Similarly, the man who buys gold at $35 has been reassured repeatedly that he can always sell it back for at least $35. Given the lure of gold and the disarray in which the world finds itself, the wonder is that the crisis took so long to develop.

From this it is clear that the most immediate way to stop the speculation is to give it an element of risk. Since we seem to worship too stubbornly at the feet of the golden idol to suggest that we might cut the buying price of gold, the next best thing is to allow its price to private buyers to rise above $35. The closing of the London gold pool thus serves two purposes: it ends the drain on officially owned reserves and, because it exposes the speculators for the first time to the risk of loss, it is likely to reduce the private demand.

However, in order to persuade our European friends—and adding up all the pluses and minuses they are indeed good friends—to refrain from making a fancy profit by buying gold from us at $35 and selling in the free market at a higher price, we must meet some of their demands. We shall be forced to deflate.

This is an uncomfortable, unpleasant and in many ways paradoxical condition. The pressure is clearly on to raise taxes and interest rates and to cut public spending—a move that few think will reduce prices but that most expect will reduce incomes and employment. But we are being asked to do this in an economy where industry is operating at no more than 85 per cent of capacity, where capital spending shows no real upward thrust, where inventories except in strike-infested industries are more than ample, and where consumers are saving an abnormally high proportion of their incomes. These are hardly the ingredients of a hyper-inflationary situation. Furthermore, postwar history has demonstrated repeatedly that inflationary episodes in this country are relatively brief. Finally, taking demographic and labor-supply factors into consideration, cost-push inflationary pressures in Europe are endemically more intense than they are here.

The battle for gold and the dollar thus involves much more than America's domestic economic picture. It seems odd indeed that we should squeeze ourselves down when we are not suffering from (or enjoying) excessive demands on our productive resources. It is even stranger that we should be spending $30-odd billion on a war when there are such strongly competing demands here at home. The greatest paradox of all is that a balance of payments deficit of only $2 billion to $3 billion should force our $800 billion economy into even more deflationary policies and into program cuts whose ultimate impact will fall most heavily on the poor.

This is why, in the end, Vietnam is the crux of the dilemmas that affect us at home and that shake international monetary stability. Much of the deficit in our balance of payments is well worth some sacrifice: imports provide us with goods and services we enjoy; foreign investments are highly profitable; foreign aid makes friends. But our military expenditures abroad seem to accomplish none of these objectives but do account for much more than our total balance of payments deficit. If, then, we really want to stop the golden hemorrhage, it is the military side that demands attention.

THREE PRISONERS

THE PETTY ROUTE HOME

HOWARD ZINN

Mr. Zinn, a frequent Nation contributor, teaches courses in political theory and civil liberties at Boston University. He is the author most recently of Vietnam: The Logic of Withdrawal (Beacon).

Somewhere between Bangkok and Paris on the flight home, our tensions beginning to ebb, I confessed to Dan Berrigan (after all, he is a Jesuit priest) that, despite heroic efforts to match my political science colleagues on the Cynicism Scale, I had somehow retained in my bones a granule of naiveté about governments, especially my own. And this despite my recent talks to students about Machiavellianism in the contemporary world, and my entranced reading of The Spy Who Came in from the Cold (which can be seen as a modern-day version of William Godwin's early anarchist novel, Caleb Williams, where a man is viciously hunted by all governments). But let me explain . . .

The State Department had learned from Radio Hanoi that North Vietnam was about to release three captured American fliers, and had read in The New York Times

(all this is known as Intelligence) that Hanoi had wired David Dellinger, inviting a "responsible representative" to come to Hanoi to receive the fliers. After Dellinger had phoned Father Berrigan at Cornell and me in Boston (What was his thinking? That the two of us might, with strain, comprise one "responsible representative"?), Ambassador-at-large Harriman's office asked for a meeting with the two emissaries before their departure. The next day, a State Department man arrived in New York, while Berrigan and I were talking with Dellinger and Tom Hayden, two veterans of the New York-to-Hanoi peace run. Hayden was also a recent escort of three prisoners of the NLF from Cambodia to the United States.

The man from State had several things on his mind. First: the government would be happy to validate our passports for travel to North Vietnam. (No, thanks, we said; we don't recognize the government's right to validate or invalidate anyone's right to travel anywhere.) Second: if the Vietnamese would like some reciprocal act, perhaps the United States could release a few captured North Vietnamese sailors. (If the circumstances of the capture were similar, these men would have been picked up at Coney Island; otherwise it was not a parallel offer; nevertheless, we absorbed the suggestion.)

Third (this came near the end, almost as an afterthought): we might make clear to the Vietnamese that the United States would negotiate on the basis of the San Antonio formula, and would not require, for a cessation of bombing, that the North stop all supplies to the South—only that it not increase the present flow. (I wondered if henceforth all major international crises were to be settled by formulas made in Texas towns; it seemed to me Geneva, for all its difficulties, was more neutral than San Antonio.)

However, what was most important to the man from State—quite clearly it was his main reason for approaching us—was the question: How would we return home with the fliers? By what route? By which aircraft? We didn't really know; all we had to go by was one cablegram from Hanoi. We suggested that we would wait and see what developed when we got there. To the proposal that we and the fliers all return to the States from Vientiane, Laos, by military aircraft, Father Berrigan and I said this would not please us. The man from State then said they could provide a plane which was "as far from the military as you can get"—but he did not mean Mohawk Airlines, only another kind of government plane. Nevertheless, we tentatively agreed that the decision as to how we should go would, as far as possible, be left up to the released fliers themselves.

That Wednesday evening, January 31, we departed Kennedy Airport. The next twenty-eight hours were spent almost continuously on airplanes as we dashed halfway around the globe (Copenhagen, Frankfurt, Rome, Tehran, Karachi, Calcutta, Bangkok, Vientiane) in order to intercept the Friday flight to Hanoi via Vientiane. This was a special plane run by the International Control Commission six times a month (every Friday, every other Tuesday), departing Saigon in the morning, to Phnompenh to Vientiane to Hanoi (arriving at night), and back. We made it to Vientiane on schedule, only to be informed that the NLF offensive in Saigon had closed Tan Son Nhut airport, and kept the ICC plane from taking off.

So we spent a week in Vientiane (the next scheduled flight, Tuesday, was also canceled), waiting until the plane could manage to leave Saigon. In the meantime, we visited the North Vietnamese embassy, which offered tea, sympathy and visas to Hanoi. We visited the Cambodian embassy (beginning to think the ICC plane would never make it) to obtain transit visas for Phnompenh, because the only other way to get to Hanoi is via China, and there is a flight from Phnompenh to Canton. We also approached the Chinese embassy for transit visas, but were tersely discouraged at the embassy gate, and turned our hopes to the more substantial Chinese mission in Phnompenh.

We talked with journalists (N.B.C. and C.B.S. crews had flown in from Tokyo and Seoul to record our mission). We talked with young Americans in the International Volunteer Service (these IVS people were the best informed of all; they spoke Lao or Vietnamese, lived with the villagers rather than in the sprawling American Levittown outside Vientiane, and harshly criticized United States policy in both Vietnam and Laos). We spent a day with Lao villagers, and also interviewed a Pathet Lao spokesman in Vientiane.

From time to time we met with the folk at the U.S. Embassy. (An embassy man had met us on arrival at the airport, said the Ambassador would be happy to see us, but considering the "delicacy" of our position, would understand if we did not visit him.) They asked us once again if we wanted our passports validated (the last approach was: "Not even verbally?"), discussed the problem of the canceled ICC flights, and once more showed great concern over how the pilots would come home. Again we agreed: we would leave it to the men themselves to decide.

My first reaction to the question of the route home was to consider it rather unimportant. Yet it became evident that the United States Government was much concerned, indeed (and this took me by surprise) apprehensive. Why? Did they want to get the pilots out of the deadly hands of the peace movement (Berrigan and Zinn)? That didn't seem to be the point; they offered to take us back on the same plane. Apparently, they did not want the pilots to meet the world press in an unfettered series of interviews—in Bangkok, Paris, New York, and wherever else the commercial airline would stop. Why? Did they think Radio Hanoi was accurate in describing the pilots as "repentant"? This did not seem likely. These were not reluctant conscripts but career military men who had gone through intensive training: an Air Force major, an Air Force captain, a Navy lieutenant. They had been prisoners a short time (all were shot down in October, 1967). And judging from the three NLF prisoners released to Tom Hayden, the other side was either not using "repentance" as a condition for release, or had very loose criteria.

What it seemed to come down to (and all this is inference, because the embassy people never discussed their anxiety explicitly; Father Berrigan and I were scarcely viewed by them as psychiatric counselors) was worry, not about desertion or denunciation (although this was always an outside chance) but merely the possibility of embarrassment, perhaps by the men showing a bit of warmth toward the Vietnamese, or (at the worst) offering implied criticism of the bombing of the North. We who spend much of our time denouncing governments for their insensitivity to human need cannot really comprehend how delicate are the antennae of governments to any criticism, to any disturbance of the carefully constructed but frail image they hold up to the world. Thus, Dan Berrigan and I, assuming cool rationality on the part of the Leviathan, could not predict that it would remain so fiercely determined to have its way on something as minor as the route home—and even at the risk of hurting (as it turned out) its “own.”

On Friday, the 9th of February, the ICC plane got special dispensation to take off from harassed Saigon, and arrived at Vientiane, ready to take us and a handful of others (mostly ICC personnel and their families; also an elegantly dressed young British Foreign Service officer) to Hanoi. It was a very old four-engine Boeing craft; we were told that only six of them had been left in the world as of two years ago. Since then, three had crashed, including one lost with all aboard on the run from Vientiane to Hanoi (apparently shot down, but it was still a mystery).

The plane flew along a narrow, pre-arranged corridor, at prescribed altitude, at agreed-upon time and air speed (so that all those anti-aircraft batteries below would hold fire), and had a last-minute check by radio with Hanoi before take-off to make sure Hanoi was not being bombed. As we crossed the Laos-Vietnam border, the French stewardess handed out flak helmets, but it was an easy flight. Over the Hanoi airfield, a searchlight picked us out, and we were soon on the ground, received warmly by members of the Peace Committee of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam, holding out two bouquets of flowers (it is hard to be unmoved when the people who have been bombed for three years by your countrymen extend their hands). Then followed an eerie auto trip through the night into Hanoi, past bombed-out buildings, anti-aircraft crews bunched in the darkness, people on foot and on bicycles moving along the road in an endless, thick stream.

In that first get-together with the Peaceniks of Hanoi (it was like visiting friends in San Francisco: “What would you like to see while you’re in town, fellows?”) we hit it off right away. They were a far cry from the apparatchiks of East or West—a relaxed bunch, young, dressed in rough jackets, hands in pocket, great guys: Oanh, Hieu, Vann, Phan. Three spoke English; one spoke French. That first night, the airmen were mentioned briefly and then that subject disappeared from the agenda while we explored people and places in Hanoi—a fascinating, intense learning of history, politics, day-to-day living. This went on for five days, and Berrigan and I were beginning to wonder about the prisoners. On Wednesday evening, returning from one of our discussions over tea, we found our friend Oanh waiting for us at the hotel. (A composer, his casual slouch deceptive; he was unerringly efficient.) He said: “Please eat supper quickly. In one hour we will meet the three prisoners.”

We drove through dark streets to the prison; it seemed, like so many other government buildings, an old French villa adapted to the new exigencies. Inside, there was the usual introductory tea session. The prison commandant read us his data on the three fliers: Maj. Norris Overly, 39, flying out of a base in South Vietnam, wife and two children in Detroit; Capt. John Black, 30, flying out of Udorn airfield in Thailand, wife and three kids in Tennessee; Lt. (j.g.) David Methany, flying off an aircraft carrier, 24, single.

Then we moved into another room, where Berrigan and I were seated at a small table with two of our Peace Committee buddies. Along the wall to our right was a table for the prison commandant and his interpreter. Along the wall to our left, below a photo of Ho Chi Minh, another table with three empty places. On all the tables were tea, cookies, cigarettes. Hieu whispered to us: when they come in, we will introduce you briefly. He hesitated: "Whether or not you shake hands is up to you."

There was a curtained door to our left, and a very short, very tough-looking soldier came quickly through it, followed by the three fliers, who stood behind their seats, bowed to the commandant, and sat down. Dan and I were introduced. We walked over and shook hands. Then followed an hour of what can be described only as small talk: "You fellows are looking good." (They did; they looked well fed, indeed more rounded than Dan Berrigan and me, though that is not saying much.) "Where are you from?" "Oh yes, I know that town." "Do you know so-and-so in Des Moines?" And so on. An absurd conversation under the circumstances? Perhaps.

About half an hour through our chat, Major Overly became aware that we had left the Vietnamese out of the conversation, and turned to the prison commandant with a mild apology for our immersion in American-type subjects. The commandant was gracious. He wore spectacles, and his manner was mild. But he dropped one disturbing statement into the room: "You realize that if Hanoi is bombed before you leave, we may reconsider our decision to release you." Back in the hotel later, Dan and I mused and pondered over the encounter.

Hanoi had not been bombed in our first five days there, although, from the first morning, there were alerts which sent everyone into shelters. After our return to the States, newspaper men kept referring to the "bombing pause" over Hanoi—but on those five days of "the pause" the skies were completely overcast. The day after our first meeting with the fliers, Thursday, the sun shone for the first time. And on that day, the bombers came. We crowded into a shelter with several Catholic lay leaders whom we had been visiting, and heard the bombs exploding in the outer districts of Hanoi, planes droning overhead.

We wondered later about the priorities of the American Government. They knew we were in Hanoi to pick up three fliers; did it not occur to them as at least a slim possibility that to bomb Hanoi at exactly that time might endanger the release? Granted that the military objectives of the bombing were more important to the United States than any consideration for the lives of Vietnamese (with hundreds of schools, hospitals, churches destroyed; with whole villages razed, with anti-personnel bombs dropped in huge quantities, that much was clear); but were these military objectives also more important to our government than the freedom of three American fliers, who themselves had been engaged in that same military action? The insistence that the bombing should go on anyway could be seen as an admirable lack of chauvinism on the part of the U.S. Government: to it, all people, even Americans, were created equally expendable. Exactly this equalitarian ruthlessness would be revealed again (yes, The Spy Who Came in from the Cold) when we brought the three airmen back from Hanoi.

We prepared to leave Hanoi on Friday, the next scheduled departure of the ICC plane. This was two days after our first formal meeting with the airmen, one day after the bombing. As if to provide what scientists call a "control" on the thesis that a bombing "pause" meant bad weather, that Friday the skies were murky, and there was a "pause" over Hanoi.

In the afternoon, we met with Pham Van Dong, the Premier of North Vietnam, a man of high intelligence, oceanic calm, exuberant personal warmth (altogether a man of such stature as to make us cringe thinking of the Kys, Chiangs, Parks, Duvaliers, Humphreys and other leaders of the free world). His grasp of political realities was both firm and subtle: "Your leaders make a mistake when they think we are depending on the American peace movement. It is our own efforts, our own determination that we count on. We have no illusions about the power of the peace movement. However, it is a fact that as the war goes on, your own problems at home will intensify, and as the social issues in the United States become more difficult to solve, the war will become an intolerable burden on your society, and your people will demand that the war end, for their own sake."

Several hours before take-off from Hanoi, we "received" the three airmen from the North Vietnam Peace Committee in a little formal ceremony: Oanh made a brief statement for the committee; Dan Berrigan made one for us; Lieutenant Methany for the fliers. ("We thank the North Vietnamese Government for its treatment of us.") Then we went back to the hotel, where the committee had arranged for Father Berrigan and me to have supper alone with the fliers. (Throughout, the handshake incident being only one example, they treated with sensitivity our relationship with the fliers.) The supper was splendid, served by a battery of waiters (endless bowls of hot potage, cold cuts, chicken, bread, beer). Methany (the youngest, blond, only a few years as a Navy flier, not as sure as the other two about a military career) said, in the nearest we got to any discussion about the war: "I hope we get a chance to talk about the war with you fellows. You know, I'm a flag waver from way back; I believe in fighting to defend my country. But I hope we get to talk."

Over supper, we discussed the route home from Vientiane. We laid out the alternatives carefully: the government would probably have an Army plane waiting at Vientiane; it would get the men home faster (perhaps twelve to twenty-four hours faster) than a commercial flight. (Air France could take us from Bangkok to Paris to New York, arriving Sunday noon.) It would also mean less press harassment—although Methany had handled the press quite coolly at the just finished ceremony, despite a wild scene of flash bulbs, whirring cameras, importunate questioners from the world press. We noted that the U.S. Government obviously preferred that the men take a military plane, yet had assured us at least twice that the fliers were free to choose their own route home.

On the side of a commercial flight was only one factor: the North Vietnamese had indicated to Dan Berrigan and me that (without setting it as a condition for the release) they would not be pleased if the fliers were immediately trundled into a military plane and taken to a military base. Somehow, they thought that would violate the spirit of the release. It was not that they had illusions about the men rejecting military life after their arrival in the States; indeed, they had said to Berrigan and me that it was even conceivable that the three would return to bomb North Vietnam again, and that this would sadden them. But even if this occurred, they said, they would retain their basic feeling that the American people, even the American fighting men, were not their enemies.

After that summary of the alternatives, Major Overly spoke very firmly: "Our first concern must be for the fellow prisoners we left behind, and the possibility of future releases by the North Vietnamese. It's clear that we should go back to the States together by commercial flight." The other two agreed immediately.

The flight from Hanoi to Vientiane was smooth; the stewardess served candies and aperitifs and we all relaxed. I sat between Major Overly and Captain Black. Father Berrigan sat with Methany. Overly told me about his experiences in captivity. "I was shot down north of the DMZ. The next twenty-eight days—the trek, under military guard, north to Hanoi—were an experience I never want to have again. I was abused, spat on, threatened, beaten. But I could understand exactly why those people would want to kill me. My guard saved my life three times. It was all strange. One moment, someone would want to kill me. The next minute another Vietnamese would act toward me with such compassion that it just staggered me. I had a huge infection on my back and was in great pain. They gave me sulfa, and after a long time it was cured. When I got to the regular prison, the worst was over. We were well treated. I got no indoctrination, just a few books on Vietnamese history. We got plenty to eat, medical care as needed. The Air Force has a rule against men shot down returning to the combat zone; that's fine with me. I've got three years to go before I can retire. I'd like to do something State-side maybe."

Overly and Black knew I had written some books; they wondered how they could get copies. I promised to send them some, took their addresses. Overly said: "Before this trip is over, I'm going to tell you my whole story, in detail. I think we owe that much to you fellows."

That never happened. As we taxied into the Vientiane airfield, the pilot relayed a message from the tower: "Will the five men connected with the prisoner release please remain aboard the plane while the other passengers descend?" We could see a great gathering on the field of newsmen, cameras, lights. The other passengers got off. Four neatly dressed men got on, and introduced themselves. One was the American Ambassador to Laos, William Sullivan. The others were his air attaché, his naval attaché, his press attaché. Sullivan asked the fliers if they needed medical attention. (His whole manner was crisp, neat, cool toward the three; but perhaps Berrigan and I could not understand the sentiment that lies beneath official exteriors—did not McNamara choke up when saying good-by to the Pentagon?) They said no, they had no urgent medical problems. (One of the statements made later by a Navy spokesman was that the men took military planes so they could have medical attention. We have developed the technology of the lie far beyond the crude days of the Commandments.)

Sullivan moved quickly to his most important business: "You men can choose whether you go home by commercial line or by military plane. However, you do understand that you are still members of the armed forces, and it is my duty to report to you that the Department of Defense has expressed the preference that you go home by military aircraft. About 100 feet away on this airfield is an Army jet, waiting and ready to take the three of you to Udorn Airfield in Thailand, and then tomorrow you will fly home. I might add that this decision was made in Washington." He hesitated just a moment. "Indeed, it comes from the White House."

There was a bit of silence. Then Major Overly responded. "Sir, I have been in the Air Force seventeen years, and when my government speaks like that, I know what it means. We will go back by military aircraft." Captain Black quickly assented. Lieutenant Methany was obviously upset. He said: "Wait a minute. Let's talk about this." Then followed forty minutes of tense argument in the confines of the old Boeing plane. We agreed on the advantages of the military plane (speed, less harassment by the press), but asked if this overrode the matter of future prisoner releases by the North Vietnamese. Whether or not the Vietnamese released future prisoners, the Ambassador said, was a cold matter of political calculation with them. (In the grade-B movies about the Red Menace, the thickset man with the heavy Russian accent says: "There is no room for sentiment in our considerations, comrades.") We have not yet done justice in grade-A movies to the same point made by slim, dapper men, speaking in our own clear tongue.)

The Ambassador turned to me: "I didn't know the North Vietnamese were setting conditions for this release." They were not setting conditions, I replied; it was a more subtle problem, one of psychology and spirit. The Ambassador questioned how we knew this was indeed what the North Vietnamese preferred. Major Overly cut in: "The North Vietnamese told us exactly the same thing." (This was news to me; I had not known that they expressed their feelings also to the fliers.)

What advantage of the military plane, we persisted, could be more important than the question of future

prisoner releases? Well, the Ambassador countered, it might be hurtful to such releases if the men met the press and said the wrong things. We told about the very first press encounter in Hanoi, where the fliers had handled themselves admirably, with no embarrassment to anyone. Besides, the simple device of a prepared statement could take care of such problems. So: what other objection was there?

The Ambassador could only keep saying: "They have considered all the alternatives in Washington before making their decision. The best minds in Washington have been involved." (We let this slide; the NLF offensive was still going on, so why rub it in about the "best minds"?) We did suggest that the men in Washington, smart as they were, had not been recently in North Vietnam, had not spoken with North Vietnamese, were hardly in a position to judge this specific situation as well as the fliers or us. Sullivan's reply, a stunning non sequitur, was a good example of how an intelligent man, trapped in a bureaucratic decision, makes unintelligent statements: "The man in Washington who had much to do with this decision came out of a Japanese prison camp in 1945 weighing 97 pounds."

Berrigan had had enough. "Let's go," he said to me. The fliers were very troubled. Methany was fighting back some indefinable emotion. They shook our hands. "We're sorry," they kept repeating. "Good luck," we said. Overly whispered something to me, quite warm, quite personal. They walked out, talked to the cameras, lights, crowding newsmen, then went to the Army jet. They were no longer prisoners, yet not quite free.

As I write this, two weeks later, that argument about the route home seems as it did at the start of our trip, ludicrously trivial; an almost childish dispute on both sides. Three men released from war—how puny a fact was even that, with millions still trapped in the cauldron of death that is Vietnam. Why should these be released, these who dutifully bombed villages, roads, people, schools (not deliberately, let's agree—only inevitably)? Why not the three tiny Vietnamese kids we found one day squatting in the entrance to the air-raid shelter? Perhaps there was a larger issue involved. Perhaps we move closer to the end of the war whenever even one of the parties shows compassion, in a unilateral act, and toward the most guilty of warriors—the blind bombardiers.

Now don't get sentimental, even my most radical friends insist; there must have been some political motive on the part of the North Vietnamese in this prisoner release. Well, all right. But all decent acts in this world are marred to some degree by selfish motivation; if we let that fact determine how we respond to such acts, the possibility of ending the vicious cycle of reciprocal cruelty is foreclosed. If people and nations can react only on the basis of the most cynical interpretations of the other party's conduct, the world doesn't have much of a chance.

There is something else. I asked Oanh that last day (as we sat next to each other at a little good-by luncheon) if there wasn't something we should ask from the U. S.

Government in return for the release. He shook his head. "You don't understand. We have released these men in the time of our lunar New Year. That is a very important holiday to us, very deep in our tradition. It is the time when, wherever we are, we return to our families for the New Year. So, we thought of a small gesture, even in the midst of war, in the spirit of the holiday: to release three men to go back to their families." And so they preferred that the fliers return directly to their homes, rather than what did take place: the immediate flight of the pilots to the very air base in Thailand from which one of the men (Black) had taken off to bomb North Vietnam.

Against the cynicism of the Ambassador (as well as my own) another fact must be measured: it is canonized in the revolutionary ideology of North Vietnam that enemy soldiers are to be treated with compassion. From the start of the war against the French, Ho Chi Minh insisted on this. In a message (September 26, 1945) meant not for the world but for his own troops, he said: "I want to recommend to our Southern compatriots just one thing: as far as the Frenchmen captured in the war are concerned, we must watch them carefully, but we must also treat them generously. We must show to the world, and to the French people in particular, that we want only independence and freedom, that we are not struggling for the sake of individual enmity and rancor. We must show to the world that we are an intelligent people, more civilized than the homicidal invaders."

The word Ho used was "show," not "tell." If the prisoner release was "propaganda" (as newspaper men kept saying, before and after our flight to Hanoi) it was propaganda by deed, which, if generally adopted, would improve the world overnight. The United States, if envious, could respond with its own propaganda move: stopping the bombing in the North. Or with the greatest propaganda of all: withdrawing all its bombers, all its guns and troops, from Vietnam.

The pinched, mean reaction to the prisoner release (a "propaganda ploy," Life said lifelessly) is an indicator of what has happened to the spirit of generosity we always liked to believe was characteristic of America. Some future generation will catch the irony better: that a tiny country, under daily attack, should deliver back to the behemoth three of its marauders. And the behemoth, meanwhile, seeks to imprison five men who have not bombed or killed a single soul—but who have spoken the forbidden words to the behemoth's children: Thou Shalt Not Kill.

Whatever softening possibility came from that small act of the Vietnamese was destroyed by this country's fear. Never in history has a country been so rich, so powerful, and so fearful. In this case, it was a fear of something as small as three very straight American airmen saying something that would slightly embarrass Washington—an event so unlikely, and so minor if it did occur, that only a government almost hysterical in its anxiety would behave as ours did. True, a government so harassed by fact as ours today, so trembling on the brink, fears even the slightest nudge, the smallest breeze from an unexpected direction. It refuses to take even the tiniest of risks.

In risk, however, lies the only hope of escape from deep troubles—the risk of humane response to humane acts, or even the risk of unilateral initiatives. This is not possible, however, when a nation has forgotten its professed values and is instead obsessed with political advantage as an ultimate objective, when it has adopted as a universal criterion for all its actions that of Colonel Cathcart in Catch-22, who measured everything in the world by a simple test: “Will it give me a black eye, or put a feather in my cap?” Our sickness is even worse than that, because our single test is (and we are ready to blow up the world on the results): will it give them a black eye, or a feather in their cap?

This obsessive fear, that if the next point is won or lost, the game, the world, and all the galaxies are lost (those deadly dominoes again), leads to disregard not only of the lives of the enemy's children but of one's own. When the American people discover this—that our government is not only indifferent to whether the Vietnamese live or die but also to whether Americans live or die—then we shall have a great commotion through the land, and the war will come to a grinding halt.

THIS SPRING IN PRAGUE

JIRI MUCHA

Mr. Mucha, one of Czechoslovakia's most distinguished writers, is the author most recently of Living and Partly Living, an account of his stay in a Czech prison during the Stalin era. He was sentenced to six years, spent some time in solitary confinement, and later worked in a coal mine.

Prague

As the winter wears on toward spring, a hopeful, invigorating atmosphere can be sensed in this old wistful town. After a dangerous December (“another Hungary?” asked the Frankfurter Allgemeine, a usually well-informed paper) things seem to be settling down. A new pattern slowly emerges, and with it new people. No doubt the unyielding stand of the writers, following their much publicized summer meeting, was what triggered the events. The underlying malaise, till then carefully camouflaged, was forced into the open, and progressive elements within the party were able to judge on whose side the majority of the population stood. The outcome is known; the old guard was outvoted, a new first secretary was elected in a secret ballot, and the road became open to sweeping changes.

A preliminary draft for the future policy of the party, issued on the 19th of February, opened to discussion subjects that hitherto have been presented as doctrine, and made no hazy excuses for failures of the past. Among the subjects brought up for debate was the dominant role of the party itself, a crucial problem of Socialist structure. The assumption of party supremacy, applied rigorously and without exception, has led to results that might be compared to the trials of a distance runner, obliged to obey the orders of his coach at every step. Now it seems that a more subtle approach will be sought, a more remote control giving some discretion both to individuals and to various forms of enterprise.

An equally important paragraph deals with personal liberties. If, as it claims, the draft wants to secure greater freedom for the individual than exists in fact in capitalist society, then it must face the need to abolish at least those restrictions that do not exist in the other system. No less interesting is the stress the document lays on building up the authority of the Parliament and the constitution, hitherto endowed only with symbolic power. Intellect is to be the governing consideration, and socialism will thus catch up with the requirements of the technical revolution.

The fact that while these principles were being proclaimed, radio and television were being given almost complete freedom for the expression of opinions, indicates at last a readiness to match action to theory. It seems to me that never, since Stalin's dethronement, has there been so much frank public criticism. The difference is that after Stalin comment smacked of bitter disillusion, while now there is good will and people are ready to lend a hand. After years of stock phrases and resigned lassitude, one hears words worth thinking about.

All this sounds surprisingly cheerful, given the Czechs' ingrained skepticism, but it is the feeling that prevails here today. A tooth that stops aching produces euphoria, even though one knows the hole is still there and must be filled eventually. And in any case, I do not think a return to the old methods is possible. The people now at the top know that they can succeed only if they attract wide popular support. Should they fail the public, the country would revert to morose indifference and it would be almost impossible to rouse it again. Every new society must reclaim all the freedoms that had been attained in the past, but were then lost in the process of gaining others.

As for the writers who have played such an important part in these events, they have seen most of their wrongs made good. They got back their weekly paper, which as punishment had been handed over to the ministry of culture, and the man who agreed to be its officially appointed editor in chief earned general scorn. Moreover, a complaint that has been lodged with the journalists' union demands an investigation of the whole matter. This and the way in which the paper was restored to the writers are good examples of the new approach to political issues. Despite the government's new pledge, the ministry of culture was reluctant to vacate the paper's premises and delayed the registration of the new weekly. Not long ago, this sort of contest would have been waged behind closed doors, the public being informed only of its result. But this time the Writers' Union sent a complaint to the government and handed the full text to the press, which published it under big headlines. The ministry was obliged to make a statement, defending itself as best it could, and shortly thereafter it gave way. The procedure would have been unthinkable even two months ago.

Preliminary censorship of films has either been or is in the process of being abolished. All film scripts awaiting decision for the last ten months or more have been passed for production—a relaxation vital for the survival of the “Czech Wave.” Books waiting years for publication have gone to press. The whole question of censorship—the focus of the writers’ concentrated attack—is being examined anew.

As a matter of fact, I am not an unconditional enemy of censorship. Paradoxically, it is a tangible proof of the writer’s impact on the public—even though, I fear, the effect is not as great as the censor likes to imagine. It is a tribute, a grim tribute, to the writer from someone who rather dislikes him. As long as there is a censor, the writer is never alone, he knows he will have at least one attentive reader, and his feeling of importance is in direct proportion to the number of sentences deleted.

However, few writers here share my views on this matter. At present, they are wary, waiting to see whether the present benevolence will be permanent. For the present, they feel a strong attraction to the new regime and are willing to support it wholeheartedly, knowing that if it means serious business it will sooner or later run into trouble. There will be much opposition to its program, much ill will. The stagnant, unproductive part of the population, which was the main support of the old guard, will be shocked to find that it can no longer fatten on egalitarianism, that mediocrity can no longer defend itself against wit by accusing active minds of anti-social individualism. There will be no work for loafers and no money without work. It is an obvious economic principle, but alas not so obvious in a Socialist state.

If truly democratic relations are re-established in the country, the writers will no doubt be on the government’s side. I hope, however, that as in the past they will keep one or two steps ahead, mobilizing public opinion against the temptation to compromise, and enjoying, at least for some time to come, the honor of being censored.

On the morning of March 18, The Nation received from Mr. Mucha the following postscript to his article:

Events that were galloping in Czechoslovakia seem to have reached a moment of marking time. Tomorrow or the day after will probably bring more big news, but as of now the new forces are consolidating their gains and probing the ground for a further thrust. Radio and TV are flooding the country with harangues, discussions, commentaries and attacks on top figures of state so vehement that many ordinary people are frightened by the unaccustomed freedom. It is difficult to say exactly what worries them. When I ask the question they shrug, remarking that “It can’t be good,” or that “There must be some limit.” Probably they fear that an atmosphere so suddenly permissive will produce a reaction of strict and severe control. They agree wholeheartedly with the issues, but smell the bonfires.

And they want their peace—a mediocre, slightly sordid and unostentatious peace of body and mind. It took them twenty years to attain a degree of constitutional security. Private property is once more guaranteed, the laws now offer a fair amount of protection, it is even possible to make money—not much, but enough to annoy the neighbors. So why, in a world bristling with rockets and gallows, run unnecessary risks for moral principles?

According to a recent poll, however, 55 per cent of the population has declared itself emphatically in support of the new way, the rest being either indifferent or without an opinion. Only 1 per cent is against change. But—and this I think is the crux of the situation now developing—what exactly is this new way; where does it lead? No one should suppose that what is taking place in Prague is some Castroism, Maoism, Titoism, or whatever variant “ism” of Communist rule. If the road goes on, it will lead—for the first time in history—to a free, nontotalitarian state, testing, with the general consent of the population and under conditions of true democratic freedom, new patterns of a working Socialist order.

Picha (Belgium): Ben Roth

The De-Stalinization of Czechoslovakia

This, I agree, sounds somewhat less plausible than the promise that a wolf will change into a sheep. But from here, and when one looks back into Czech history, the prospect is credible enough. Czechoslovakia is the only country of the whole Socialist bloc that has the advantage of a serious democratic experience and background. (I apologize if this sounds rude to our Polish or Hungarian neighbors.) The country’s experience in the 1930s of being a working democracy surrounded by totalitarian states cannot be forgotten—the more so since it was living up in those years to the whole history of the country. For more than 1,000 years the region had been an outpost of progressive ideas.

Prewar Czechoslovakia, led by the philosopher, Masaryk, trusted more in its ideas than in its industry and weapons, even though it had become an industrial power supplying or smuggling weapons to the trouble spots of five continents. The fact that Czech democracy was beaten at Munich, means only that the ardent but frail idealism of the Czechs was incongruous in a world rushing toward war. Now—and this is where Czechoslovakia links up with its history—the country will try again. In a world bristling with rockets and gallows, it wants to create a free, democratic state, based on Socialist economic principles. It was no idle symbolism that moved the papers to publish on March 7, Masaryk's birthday, the first long articles about him that have appeared here in twenty years. And the students were not indulging in nostalgia when they laid wreaths on his grave. What Masaryk did, the people want to do again, under different conditions and with somewhat different premises, but in the same conviction that truth, freedom and decency must prevail. If we succeed, we shall prove that it has been worth while living through these last twenty years.

THE COUNTER CULTURE: PART II

POLITICS of the NERVOUS SYSTEM

THEODORE ROSZAK

Mr. Roszak, an associate professor of history, is chairman of the History of Western Culture Program at California State College, Hayward. He edited and contributed to The Dissenting Academy (Pantheon Books).

On October 21, the Pentagon was besieged by a motley army of civil demonstrators. For the most part, the 50,000 protesters were made up of activist academics and students, men of letters, New Left and pacifist ideologues, housewives, doctors and such. But also, we are informed: "witches, warlocks, holy men, seers, prophets, mystics, saints, sorcerers, shamans, troubadours, minstrels, bards, road men, and madmen"—who were on hand to achieve the "mystic revolution." The picketing, the sit-down, the speeches and marches: all that was protest politics as usual. But the central event of the day was a contribution of the "superhumans": an exorcism of the Pentagon by long-haired warlocks who "cast mighty words of white light against the demon-controlled structure," in the hope of levitating that grim ziggurat.

They did not succeed—in floating the Pentagon, that is. But they did manage to convey their generation's political style, a style so authentically original as to border on the bizarre. If the youthful political activism of the sixties differs from that of the thirties, the difference reveals itself in an unprecedented penchant for the occult, for magic, and for exotic ritual which has become an integral part of the counter culture. Even protesters who didn't participate in the rite of exorcism took the event in stride—as if they understood that here was the style and vocabulary of the young, and one had to tolerate its expression.

Religiosity has been characteristic of the postwar youth culture since the days of the beatniks. One finds the quest for God in many of the earliest poems of Allen Ginsberg, well before he and his colleagues had discovered Zen and the mystic wealth of the East. In his poetry of the forties, he showed a sensitivity for visionary experience—"Angelical raving" as he was to call it—which suggested even then that the social dissent of the younger generation would never quite fit into the adamantly secular mold of the old Left. Ginsberg spoke then of seeing all the pictures we carry in our mind images of the Thirties, depression and class consciousness transfigured above politics filled with fire with the appearance of God.

These early poems contrast strongly with Ginsberg's style today. They are often brief, tightly written affairs, done in a short, orderly line. The more familiar Ginsberg line, rambling and ham-fisted (the line based on "Hebraic-Melvillian bardic breath") does not appear until the 1949 poem "Patterson." But the religiosity was already there, giving his work a sound very different from the social poetry of the thirties. From the outset, Ginsberg was a protest poet, but his protest runs back not to Marx but to the ecstatic radicalism of Blake. The issue is never as simple as social justice; rather the key words and images are those of time and eternity, madness and vision, heaven and the spirit. And as early as the later forties Ginsberg is experimenting with marijuana and writing poems under the sway of narcotics.

By the early fifties, Ginsberg had abandoned the conventional virtues of poetry in favor of a spontaneity that comes across as an unchecked flow of language. From then on, everything he writes has the appearance of being served up raw. There is never the trace of a revised line; rather, another line is added on: instead of revision, there is accumulation. To rework would be to rethink, hence to doubt the initial vision. For Ginsberg, the creative act was to be a "come-as-you-are" party. Lack of grooming marks his poems as "natural," therefore honest. They are the real thing, not artifice.

There is a good deal of Charlie Parker's improvisation in Ginsberg's work, and of the action painters. Jackson Pollock worked at a canvas with a commitment never to erase or redo or touch up; but to add, add, add, and let it all somehow work itself into a pattern. Similarly, Jack Kerouac came to the point of typing out his novels non-stop onto enormous rolls of paper—6 feet a day—with never a revision. At last, a deal of Ginsberg's late work sounds very much as if it were taken off a tape recorder as dictated.

That this improvisatory method of writing produces a great deal of trash is, for our purposes here, less important than the light this choice of method throws on the generation that accepted Ginsberg's work as a valid form of creativity. It is a search for art unmediated by intellect; or rather, since the application of intellectual control is what makes art of impulse, it is an effort to extract and indulge the impulse, without regard to the nature of the product.

Poetry defined as an oracular outpouring has a genealogy running back through the Hebrew prophets to the shamans of dim antiquity. The Hebrew term for prophet is nabi: mutterer, babbler, one who speaks with tongues. Unhappily, Ginsberg is no Amos (though perhaps we should have a poorer opinion of Amos if we had the whole of his life's utterances to get through instead of only the most elegant passages), but he belongs within that tradition. He belongs there, however, not as an artist but as a conjurer with subterranean forces, a kind of witch doctor. It is as if, initially, Ginsberg set out to write poetry: to say something about the anguished state of the world. What came of that was a howl. But at the bottom of the howl Ginsberg discovered what it was that Moloch was most intent upon burying: the non-intellective powers.

Every artist has discovered something of that in the creative process. What sets Ginsberg's career apart is that, having once experienced the powers, he set out to make over as much of his own life and as much of the culture as he could lay hold of in the image of that experience. For Ginsberg the use of narcotics was not simply a perverse Bohemian vice; it was another, more effective way of short-circuiting the intellect and tapping the energy beyond. It was a way of subverting Moloch by reorganizing the politics of the nervous system.

There is something more to be noted about the visionary impulse in Ginsberg's work and life. The ecstatic power he and most of the early Beat writers reached for was never sought in other-worldly sources. Their mysticism was never escapist or ascetic; it did not lead them, like T. S. Eliot, into a transcendent rose garden. Theirs was to be a this-worldly mysticism, an ecstasy of the body and of the earth that somehow would embrace and transform mortality. Joy was to be had even (or perhaps especially) in the commonplace obscenities of existence. As Ginsberg put it in one of his early poems:

*This is the one and only firmament . . .
I am living in Eternity.
The ways of this world are the ways of Heaven.*

Or, even more powerfully:

For the world is a mountain of shit, if it's going to be moved at all, it's got to be taken by handfulls.

William Carlos Williams observed in the poems of the young Ginsberg "a beat that is far removed from the beat of dancing feet, but rather finds in the shuffling of human beings in all the stages of their life, the trip to the bathroom, to the stairs of the subway, the steps of the office or factory routine, the mystical measure of their passions." This is, in fact, a remarkable anticipation of the Zen doctrine of the "illuminated commonplace."

Popular Zen

If one can believe the account Jack Kerouac gives in The Dharma Bums, the book which was to provide the first handy compendium of all those Zen catch phrases that have since become more familiar to contemporary youth than any Christian catechism, it was from the West Coast poet, Gary Snyder, that he and Ginsberg learned their Zen upon going to San Francisco in the early fifties. But behind Snyder stood Alan Watts, who had recently begun teaching at the School of Asian Studies after leaving his position as an Anglican counselor at Northwestern University. When he arrived in San Francisco, Watts, who was only 35 years old in 1950, had written at least seven books dealing with Zen and mystical religion. He had in fact, been a child prodigy in his chosen field of study: at 19, he was appointed editor of The Middle Way, an English journal of Buddhist studies, and at 23, co-editor of the English "Wisdom of the East" series. Along with D. T. Suzuki, Watts, through his televised lectures, books and private classes, was to become America's foremost popularizer of Zen.

Of the two, Watts's influence has been the more widespread, for often at the expense of risking vulgarization, he has made a most determined effort to translate the insights of Zen and Taoism into the language of Western science and psychology. He has approached the task with an impish willingness to be catchy and cute, and to play at philosophy as if it were an enjoyable game. It is a style that has exposed him to a deal of rather arrogant criticism, on the one hand from serious Zen devotees who have found him too discursive for their mystic tastes (I recall one such telling me bluntly, "Watts has never experienced satori"), and on the other from professional philosophers who have been inclined to ridicule his popularizing bent as making him, in the words of one academic, "the Norman Vincent Peale of Zen." It is the typical and inevitable sort of resistance encountered by anyone who makes bold to find a greater audience for an idea than the academy or any restricted cult can provide—and it overlooks the fact that Watts's books include such solid intellectual achievements as Psychotherapy East and West.

There is a sense, however, in which it would seem impossible to "popularize" Zen. Traditionally, the insights of the religion have been communicated only directly from master to student as part of an extremely demanding discipline in which verbal formulations play almost no part. Zen is neither a proselytizing creed nor a theology but a personal illumination that one must be tricked into while intellectually off guard. Thus, the best way to teach Zen might be to talk about anything but Zen, allowing the illumination to break through of its own unpredictable accord—which is rather the way the composer, John Cage, one of Suzuki's students, uses his music. Similarly, I have watched one of Watts's colleagues in San Francisco try to bring students around to the key experience through what purported to be rehearsals of a drama that was never intended to reach production. Much the same intention seems to underlie the sensory awareness classes of Charlotte Selver, with whom Watts often works.

If this sort of psychic jujitsu is the essence of Zen, then it may very well be that on the religion's own terms, all the youthful confabulation with Zen over the past decade or so has been less than useless. "Those who know do not speak; those who speak do not know"—and I would have to leave it to the Zen adepts to decide whether anything that deserves to be called authentic has actually taken root in our culture. What is indisputable, however, is that the San Francisco Beats, and much of our younger generation since, thought they had found in Zen something they needed, and that they proceeded to use what they understood of this exotic tradition to fulfill the need. The situation is rather similar to Schopenhauer's attempt to integrate his limited knowledge of the Upanishads into a philosophy that was primarily an expression of his generation's Romantic melancholia.

What did Zen offer or seem to offer to the young? It is difficult to avoid feeling that Zen's great advantage is its unusual vulnerability to what one might call "adolescentization." Zen, vulgarized, dovetails remarkably with a number of adolescent traits. Its commitment to a wise silence, which contrasts so strongly with the preachiness of Christianity, can easily ally with the inarticulateness of youth. Why do Zen masters throw their disciples into a mud puddle?, asks Kerouac's Sal Paradise in The Dharma Bums. "That's because they want them to realize mud is better than words." A generation that had come to admire the tongue-tied incoherence of James Dean and which has been willing to believe that the medium is the message, would welcome a tradition that regards talking as beside the point. Similarly, Zen's commitment to paradox and randomness could be conveniently identified with the intellectual confusion of unformed and restless minds. Perhaps above all, Zen's antinomianism could serve as a sanction for the adolescent need of freedom, especially for those who possessed a healthy distaste for the competitive exactions and conformities of the middle-class life from which they came.

The Radical East

But with that much granted, it must also be recognized that what the young were vulgarizing in this way was a body of thought which, as formulated by men like Suzuki and Watts, constituted a radical critique of the conventional scientific conception of man and nature, which has been long due for reappraisal. Even if they seized on Zen with shallow understanding, they grasped it with a healthy instinct. And grasping it, they bought the books, and attended the lectures, and spread about the catch phrases and, in general, helped to provide the platform from which a few good minds who understood more deeply could speak out in criticism of the dominant culture. Perhaps what the young took to be Zen has little relationship to that venerable and elusive tradition; but what they went for was a gentle and gay rejection of a positivistic and compulsively cerebral technological society.

This is another way of saying that beyond a certain point it becomes little better than pedantic to ask how authentically "Buddhist" are poems like Ginsberg's "Sunflower Sutra" (1955). Perhaps not very, but it is a poem of great tenderness, expressing an unashamed wonder for the commonplace splendors of the world and calling into question that anthropocentric arrogance with which our society, in the name of progress, has gone about mechanizing and brutalizing its environment. And it is a commentary on the state of what our society regards as its "religion" that the poet who still commands the greatest attention among our youth should have had to cast about for an exotic tradition from which to take inspiration in expressing these humane sentiments.

The same holds true for Ginsberg's more recent interest in Hinduism. It is, at the very least, a fascinating Odyssey of the contemporary spirit that takes a young Jewish poet from Paterson, N.J., to the banks of the Ganges to become America's most renowned Hindu Brahman. But is his Hinduism the real thing? Again, the question is beside the point. What is far more important is his deeply felt need to turn away from the dominant culture in order to find the spirit for such remarkable poems as "The Witch-ita Vortex Sutra" and "Who Be Kind To"—both compelling expressions of humanity and compassionate protest. And even more important is the social fact: Ginsberg the mantra-chanting Hindu does not finish as an isolated eccentric but rather as one of the foremost spokesmen of the younger generation.

Following Ginsberg, the boys and girls don cowbells and tuck flowers behind their ears—and listen. Ginsberg claims a greater audience among dissenting youth than any Christian or Jewish clergyman could hope to reach or stir. Perhaps the one exception to this might have been the late A. J. Muste in the final years of his life. But then Muste always kept his ministerial identity as unobtrusive as possible.

After Christianity

Indeed, we are in a post-Christian era, despite the fact that minds far more gifted than Ginsberg's—like that of Thomas Merton—continue to mine the dominant religious tradition for good treasures. But it has been a decided mistake to expect that the death of the Christian God would be followed by a thoroughly secularized, thoroughly positivistic culture, dismal and spiritless in its obsession with technological prowess. That was the world Aldous Huxley foresaw in the 1930s when he wrote Brave New World. But in the 1950s, detecting the rising spirit of a new generation, Huxley's utopian image had brightened to that of Island, where prevailed a nonviolent culture elaborated out of Buddhism and psychedelic drugs. It was as if suddenly he had seen an emerging possibility: beyond the Christian era and the "wasteland" that was its immediate successor, might lie a new, eclectic religious revival.

That is precisely what confronts us now as one of the massive facts of our youthful counter culture. The dissenting young have indeed got religion. It is not the brand of religion that Billy Graham or William Buckley would choose for youth's crusade, but nonetheless it is religion. What began with Zen has now rapidly, perhaps too rapidly, proliferated into a phantasmagoria of exotic religiosity.

Who would have predicted it? At least since the Enlightenment, perhaps with the exception of the early Romantics, the major thrust of avant-garde thought has always been anti-religious, if not defiantly atheistic. And even among the Romantics, the most pious tended to become the most politically reactionary. Would-be Western revolutionaries have always been strongly rooted in a militantly skeptical secular tradition. Rejection of a corrupted religious establishment has carried over almost automatically into a root and branch rejection of all things spiritual. "Mysticism" has always been one of the dirtiest words in the Marxist lexicon.

But now the psychedelic weeklies, sprouting like mushrooms across the land, splash across their pages pictures of Christ and the prophets, mishmashed mind-bogglingly with Zen, Hinduism, primitive shamanism, theosophy, the Left-Handed Tantra. The youthful counter culture is cluttered with satanists and neo-agnostics, would-be witch doctors and self-proclaimed swamis. The Berkeley "wandering priest" Charlie (Brown) Artman, who was in the running for city councilman in 1966 until he was busted for confessing to possession of narcotics, strikes the right note of eclectic religiosity: a stash of LSD in his Indian-sign necklace, Hindu cowbells, and the campaign slogan, "May the baby Jesus open your mind and shut your mouth."

No anti-Vietnam War demonstration would be complete without a hirsute, bell-festooned contingent of holy men, bearing joss sticks and intoning the Hare Krishna. The Berkeley Barb, an underground weekly, gives LBJ a good left-wing slamming on page 1, but devotes the center spread to a crazy mandala for the local yogis. And in its back pages, the "Servants of Awareness," "a unique group of aware people using 136 symbols in their meditation to communicate directly with Cosmic Awareness . . .," are sure to take a 4-inch ad. The San Francisco Oracle runs photos of stark-naked madonnas with flowers in their hair, suckling their babies . . . and the effect is not at all pornographic, nor intended to be.

At the level of youth, the mid-1960s begin to resemble nothing so much as a cultic hothouse of the Hellenistic period, when every manner of mystery and fakery, ritual and rite, intermingled in a marvelous indiscrimination. And, for the time being, the situation makes it next to impossible for many of us who teach to convey much in the way of education to the radical young, given the fact that the conventional curriculum, even at its best, is grounded in the dominant Western tradition. If you asked the kids to identify (a) Milton and (b) Pope, their answers are likely to be: (a) Milton who? and (b) which Pope? But they may do no mean job of rattling off their Kabbala or I Ching (which the very hip get married to these days) or, of course, the Kama Sutra.

Magic & Counter Magic

What the counter culture offers, then, is a remarkable defection from the long-standing tradition of skeptical, secular intellectuality that has served as the prime vehicle for 300 years of scientific and technical development in the West. Almost overnight (astonishingly, and with no great debate on the point), a significant portion of the younger generation has withdrawn from that tradition, as if to provide an emergency balance, often by occult aberrations just as gross, to the gross distortions of technological society. As often happens, one cultural exaggeration calls forth another to be its opposite equivalent. In the hands of a Herman Kahn, science, logic and the precision of numbers have become their own caricatures as part of a mystogogy of mass murder. Even official Washington calls its Sino-Soviet advisers "demonologists"—and the designation is scarcely a wisecrack. Mumbo-jumbo is indeed at the heart of human affairs when so-called scientific decision making reveals itself as a species of voodoo. ("Crack-pot realism," C. Wright Mills called it; and Allen Ginsberg "a communion of bum magicians.")

When science and reasons of state become handmaidens of political black magic, who can blame the young for diving headlong into the Jungian stew, in search of "good vibrations" that might ward off the bad? Of course, they are soon glutted with what they find. Whole religious traditions become baubles to play with. A light-show group in Detroit names itself "The Bulging Eyeballs of Gautama," and all of a sudden the Beatles become the contemplative converts of a particularly simple-minded swami who advertises in every London underground station.

One does not unearth the wisdom of the ages by shuffling about a few exotic catch phrases—nor does one learn anything about anybody's lore or religion by donning a few talismans and dosing on LSD. The most that comes of such superficial muddling is something like Timothy Leary's brand of easy-do syncretism—"somehow" all is one, and never mind precisely how. Fifty years ago when Swami Vivekananda first brought the teachings of Sri Ramakrishna to America he induced a gaggle of high-social dilettantes to say as much. The results were as ludicrous as they were ephemeral. Yet things are just beginning. In the present state of affairs, in the turgid flood tide of discovery, sampling and restive fascination, it would perhaps be too much to expect disciplined order—as surely it would be folly to try to deduce order from this happy chaos. The young have happened upon treasure trove long buried and are busy letting the quaint trinkets spill through their fingers.

Science ■ Superstition

Still, for all its frequently mindless vulgarity, for all its tendency to get lost in exotic clutter, a powerful and important force is at work in this wholesale willingness of the young to scrap their inherited culture's entrenched prejudice toward myth, religion and ritual. The life of Reason (with a capital R) has all too obviously failed to produce the agenda of civilized improvements the Voltaires and Jeffersons foresaw. Reason, materialism, the scientific world view have revealed themselves too often as simply a higher superstition, based on dubious but well-concealed assumptions about man and nature. Science, it has been said, thrives on sins of omission, and for 300 years those omissions have been piling up like the slag tips that surround Welsh mining towns: immense, precipitous mountains of frustrated aspiration and metaphysical yearning, which threaten to come cascading down in an impassioned landslide. It is impossible any longer to ignore the fact that our conception of intellect has been narrowed disastrously by the prevailing assumption, especially in the academies, that the life of the spirit is: (1) a lunatic fringe best left to artists and marginal visionaries; (2) a historical bone yard for antiquarian scholarship; (3) a highly specialized adjunct of professional anthropology. For along none of these approaches could the living power of myth, ritual and rite penetrate the intellectual establishment and have any existential (as opposed, at best, to merely academic) significance. As Lewis Mumford has suggested in his recent study, The Myth of the Machine:

... the whole sphere of early man's existence which the modern scientific mind, in its consciousness of intellectual superiority, rejects, was the original source of man's self-transformation from an animal into a human person. Ritual, dance, totem, taboo, religion, magic—these provided the groundwork for man's later higher development.

This blind spot has made it possible, in the name of intellectual respectability, to ignore the obvious fact that not only early man but man through the ages has always devoted as much of his wit, care and energy to the creation of mythologies, ritual forms and world systems as to gathering the physical "necessities." And yet the standard stance of every "good" college teacher who is confronted with the task of breaking in a freshman class and introducing it to the life of the mind, is still that of the old village atheist, wielding a ruthless, positivistic skepticism.

The anti-religious prejudice of the intellectual establishment has severely crippled science and scholarship by fanatically ruling out whole areas of experience from systematic inquiry. If conventional scholarship touches those areas of life it is usually with the intention of compiling knowledge, not with the hope of salvaging value. And yet it was "science" in the highest sense of the word that brought William James to his study of religious experience, and Aldous Huxley to his experiments with the hallucinogenic drugs.

The Dark Side

Similarly, when Lewis Mumford insists—as he does in all his work—that historical studies must come to grips with the undeniable power of dream, myth and the sacred in human affairs, he is upholding the highest standards of scholarship. But when academics and intellectuals arrogantly truncate this greater conception of science and scholarship, they come up with that "middle-class secular humanism" of which Michael Novak has aptly said:

It thinks of itself as humble in its agnosticism, and eschews the "mystic flights" of metaphysicians, theologians and dreamers; it is cautious and remote in dealing with heightened and passionate experiences that are the stuff of great literature and philosophy. It limits itself to this world and its concerns, concerns which fortunately turn out to be largely subject to precise formulations, and hence have a limited but comforting certainty.

I think we can anticipate that in the coming generation large numbers of students will begin to reject this reductive humanism, demanding a far deeper examination of that dark side of the human personality which has so long been written off as "mystical" by the dominant culture. It is because this renaissance of mythical-religious interest promises such enrichment of Western culture that one is led to despair when, as often happens, the young reduce it to an esoteric collection of peer-group symbols and slogans, vaguely wicked and ultimately trivial. Then instead of culture, we get collage; a miscellaneous heaping together, as if one had simply ransacked The Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics and the Celestia Arcana for exotic tidbits. For example, the International Times of London prints a major article on Aleister Crowley, but the treatment goes no further than the sensational surface. It is a simple inversion of what too often dominates the underground press: the straight papers say "scandalous"; the underground says "marvelous"; but understanding gets no aid.

This is the point at which the young, who are offering, I feel, a great deal that is good to work with, need the help of mature minds, in order that distinctions can be drawn between the deep and the shallow, the superstitious and the wise. It is important to discern the underlying connection between the inspired seer on the one hand, and the side-show charlatan on the other, and to recognize that the skeptical, en bloc rejection of both has been a prime disaster. That much the young have seen. But between seer and charlatan there is also an all-important difference, and it is apparent only upon reflection. But who, among the alienated young, constantly on the lookout for the narks, has time for reflection?

THE CALIFORNIA SURVIVAL KIT

PHIL KERBY

Anaheim, Calif.

The volunteer 30,000-member California Democratic Council (CDC), distrusted by the New Left as bourgeois liberal and feared by the right as a vanguard of socialism, is predominantly white, middle class and reformist in the tradition of Woodrow Wilson and Franklin Roosevelt. But the shock waves reverberating through the nation from the war in Vietnam and the racial insurrection have shaken this essentially comfortable group of liberal activists. Over the weekend of March 16, the state-wide CDC convention proposed revolutionary changes in American political life.

The significance of the convention action was lost even by many of the delegates themselves in the wake of Sen. Robert F. Kennedy's sudden announcement that he would contest President Johnson for the Democratic nomination. The 757 delegates were at once repelled and fascinated by Kennedy's action. Buoyed by Senator McCarthy's dramatic showing in New Hampshire, they had gathered in Anaheim still not fully convinced that the Minnesotan could win at Chicago. They criticized Kennedy for the manner and timing of his announcement, but conceded his potential was greater than McCarthy's. Their anger was oddly mixed with the hope that Kennedy actually could mobilize enough political strength between now and the convention to force Johnson into retirement.

The night before Kennedy's announcement, CDC leaders quickly pushed through a pledge of "total support" to Senator McCarthy. That pledge will hold good for the hard-core CDC leadership group, but rank-and-file defection to Kennedy was quickly apparent. A sizable percentage of the membership may swing to Kennedy in the June 4 primary, when three delegations will be on the ballot: the CDC peace slate pledged to McCarthy, the Kennedy delegation now being formed and the dissension-riddled stand-in slate for Johnson headed by Atty. Gen. Thomas Lynch. Several state legislators on the pro-Johnson slate already have announced their intention of dropping out in favor of Kennedy, and other members of the delegation are likely to jump ship. Jesse M. Unruh, speaker of the State Assembly, and Kennedy's chief supporter in California, is trying to push through the legislature a law that would permit delegation members to switch allegiance. Under present law, delegates who resign may not join another slate.

CDC leaders, who tried frantically to persuade Kennedy not to enter the California primary, warned that he would split the peace forces and hand the state's convention votes to Johnson. But Unruh, who once served as John F. Kennedy's Southern California campaign chairman, believes that Kennedy can so divide the vote and still win the primary. He bases this belief on the assumption that Kennedy's campaign will reach far beyond the peace issue and bring into the primary hundreds of thousands of additional votes from labor and from the Negro and Mexican-American communities. Kennedy's appeal to these groups, excluding perhaps the black militants, is potent. "Senator Kennedy," Unruh said, "will clearly win, whether it's a two-cornered, three-cornered or five-cornered race."

Speaking to the convention by telephone from Indianapolis, Senator McCarthy said he had no intention of making any deals or concessions. "If I tried to deal them [his supporters] off, I'd have a revolution on my hands." CDC leaders are hoping that "some sort of accommodation" can be worked out between McCarthy and Kennedy before June 4. Nobody at Anaheim could know how that might be done. Rep. Philip Burton of California, a long-standing CDC favorite, flew to Anaheim from Washington to advise the delegates, in a tortured, convoluted speech, not to "eat one another up," advice that earned him the least applause he has ever received from the organization. Burton stopped just short of announcing for Kennedy.

Kennedy, McCarthy and the warring state Democrats will monopolize California headlines up to June 4 and perhaps beyond. The CDC endorsement for the United States Senate went to state Sen. Anthony G. Beilenson.

Interlandi, Los Angeles Times

"Why Not—All the Others Are Just as Ridiculous!"

Alan Cranston, founding president of CDC but now at odds with the organization over the issue of Johnson's candidacy, will also enter the race; Mayor Sam Yorty of Los Angeles is or is not a candidate for the Senate, depending on which hour of which day he is interviewed.

It indicated the temper of the times that the war in Vietnam was the least controversial issue among a broad range of proposals adopted by the convention for submission to the Chicago convention platform committee. The convention called for an immediate end to the war in three steps: a halt to the bombing, negotiations which would include the National Liberation Front, and a phased withdrawal of American troops. That is a standard position that even Johnson would accept under certain conditions, but the CDC went further. Our foreign policy, it stated, has failed in the post-World War II years because "an exaggerated fear of communism . . . has produced a distorted view of the world and an oversimplified approach to its problems In a vain pursuit of 'absolute security,' we have involved ourselves in needless foreign intrigues and conflicts . . . and we have contributed to the danger of nuclear war."

The convention urged a series of foreign-policy changes: admission of Peking into the United Nations; an agreement between NATO and the Warsaw Pact nations for withdrawal of all foreign troops from Central Europe; recognition of East Germany and the Oder-Neisse frontier with Poland; international guarantees by the great powers for the security of Israel and the Arab states in the Middle East, with an embargo of arms sales to both sides.

The CDC issued a routine call for an end to poverty in America and the junking of our "inadequate and ancient public assistance program that embitters millions of Americans whom it is intended to serve." To accomplish this, the convention advocated an income floor of $3,000 to $4,000 for every family, a goal which the delegates said is easily made possible by advanced technology.

The adventurous temper of the convention was then reflected in a proposal for the federal government to take over the production of military hardware, "thereby eliminating private profit as a factor in military procurement." In a statement on "public ownership" the convention said: "One of the most persistent special-interest lobbying efforts in American politics has been to equate any form of public ownership with alien social and economic doctrine. As a result, a vast amount of public money and public assistance has been poured into virtually every phase of our national economy with little or no return to the American people. This form of subsidizing private profits with public funds should be thoroughly reviewed with the aim of nationalizing those areas of the economy where the public interest could be better served by public in place of private ownership, such as the railroads and utilities."

As though that were not enough, the delegates proposed tax reforms which would: treat capital gains and income from bonds and dividends like other income for tax purposes; use taxes to discourage urban land speculation; eliminate sales taxes on necessities; shift the cost of education and welfare to the federal treasury to lower the burden on home owners, and levy all taxes on the basis of ability to pay.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

Racism, as the convention views it, is essentially economic discrimination. The delegates proposed: creation of jobs at adequate wages for the unemployed; vocational training financed by federal funds; construction of metropolitan school areas designed to meet the special needs of students from minority groups; rehabilitation of the black ghettos and other blighted housing areas; and low-cost urban transportation. (Lack of transportation prevents many Negroes trapped in ghettos like the Watts area of Los Angeles from reaching available jobs.)

The CDC said the quality of education offered in the black and Mexican-American communities is a "national scandal," which is "largely due to the cultural chasm between the educational structure and the students." The convention, composed largely of middle- and upper-class professionals and held in the depressingly luxurious Anaheim convention center (adjacent to Disneyland) asked: "How can the poverty-ridden and often hungry child relate to the well-fed, comfortable middle-class teacher who follows a curriculum dictated by middle-class values?"

National dissent against the war and mass protests against racial discrimination have produced the first signs of a reaction which caused the CDC to warn: "The kangaroo-court methods of governmental investigative agencies, the subversion of organizations by the CIA, the FBI assumption of political-police power have spread rapidly to local and state enforcement agencies. The politicalization of the police, supported by anti-democratic statements from high military personnel, is rapidly leading toward the use of new instruments of physical intimidation that go far beyond the limits of reasonable standards of law enforcement." To restore and guarantee the right of dissent and protest, the CDC, as it has done before, proposed the abolition of the House Committee on Un-American Activities. The delegates advocated gun-control laws, stricter laws against wire tapping and declared their opposition to all forms of censorship, cultural and political.

As a vehicle of practical politics, these proposals are highly impractical. Acknowledging this fact, one CDC official explained: "They were not tailored to practical politics but are intended as a realistic assessment of what has to be done to enable this nation to meet its problems and survive." Dr. Martin Luther King, who understands the use of practical politics as well as anyone, refrained at Anaheim from endorsing either one "of these fine men"—Kennedy and McCarthy—but asked for the defeat of Johnson. That is no panacea for the country's present ills, but it is probably the essential first step for recovery.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Wolfe Among the Monstres Sacres

THOMAS WOLFE. By Andrew Turnbull. Charles Scribner's Sons. 374 pp. $7.95.

MINA CURTISS

Mrs. Curtiss is the author of Bizet and His World (Knopf), and the translator and editor of My Friend Degas by Daniel Halevy (Wesleyan) and Letters of Marcel Proust (Vintage).

To someone who knew Tom Wolfe and Aline Bernstein well, the impulse behind this biography is puzzling. What drove the author to work his way through masses of unpublished and often redundant material, to spend his time interviewing 700 people, in order to recount again this oft-told tale? For surely, apart from Proust and Joyce, monstres sacrés, a category in which Tom and the admirers of his work thought he belonged (all nine volumes of Proust in the Modern Library edition run to 4266 pages, the first edition of Ulysses has 732 pages, Wolfe's four major novels add up to 3012 pages), no writer's life in this century has been more fully documented. His autobiographical novels are literally and chronologically true. Seven hundred and seventy pages of his letters have been published as well as his agent's biography of him, and an account of their relationship by Aline Bernstein, whom Mr. Turnbull describes as one of "the twin engines that got Wolfe's heavy plane off the ground." There are also personal interviews, articles and books by members of his family and by friends. Why, then, did Mr. Turnbull feel impelled to add to this mass of material another biographical study of a writer who describes himself as an "unhappy monster who can do nothing else but write [and] never come to the end of what he is writing"?

The reason is not because he fell in love with Wolfe's work. I remember when he came to interview me I mentioned to him the contrast in tone between the description of an incident in one of the books and the letter Tom had written me the day after it actually happened. Mr. Turnbull said that he had not yet reread the books because he wanted first to talk to all the people who had known Tom. And in his note on Sources he admits not having read Look Homeward, Angel until he started the biography. It is not then his own reading of Wolfe's work that caused him to accept as the hypothesis of his biography Tom's early statement: "... by God, I have genius . . . and I shall force the inescapable fact down the throats of the rats and vermin who want the proof."

But it was not rats and vermin, however much he may have treated them as such, but a brilliant, devoted editor and a loving, dedicated mistress, who enabled him to transform his dysenteric stream of verbose self-expression into a meaningful and communicable novel form. His gigantic presence, his animal magnetism, the dynamism and massiveness of his personality, both actual and as it translated itself into his work, made him a legend in his lifetime and for a decade or more thereafter. It is this legend which seems to have seduced Mr. Turnbull and deprived him of the detachment necessary for a truthful account of the life of a monster, the kind of detachment that Henri Troyat managed to preserve in his biography of that greatest of all modern monstres sacrés, the author of War and Peace and Anna Karenina. One never ceases being appalled by Tolstoy's behavior. But one goes back and reads those two books, loses oneself in a world that seems truer than life itself, and marvels at the complexity, the inconsistency, the near madness of genius. Of the genius there is never any doubt.

Mr. Turnbull's biography sent me back to Wolfe's books. Forty years ago I read Look Homeward, Angel and was deeply moved by the description of his brother's death and its aftermath. Again I find it moving, one of the few passages in his work where Tom's permeating self-pity is quite absent. Of his second book Of Time and the River, I must honestly admit that, at the time of publication, I read only the last few pages where there is a brief description of me which, as I reread it, seems to be rather in the style of Marie Corélli or Ouida. I have made some effort to read the rest of the book, but it is a roman à clef to which I lack the keys. As a result the characters seem at best two-dimensional, and the narrative is interrupted by purple patches of the hero's self-indulgent moaning and groaning:

... In his heart a dogged and furious resentment was beginning to glow and moulder—a savage hate of hate, a fear of fear, a murderous intensity of desire to strangle the shapes of death and barrenness—a resistance still passive, but growing in bitterness and pugnacity with every passing day, as he saw how uselessly and horribly men allowed themselves to be duped, cheated and beaten by the living rat and by the fraud of fear, and that was being strengthened momentarily [sic] now by an implacable conviction, a dogged and incontrovertible memory that, incredibly sharpened by his fury and desire, awoke and netted out of the sea-depths of the past, the shining fish of a million living moments.

Six pages of this hyperbole form an introduction to a passage about his teaching at New York University, a class made up, he writes, "of thirty or forty Jews and Jewesses, all laughing, shouting, screaming, thick with their hot and swarthy body-smells, their strong female odors of rut and crotch and arm-pit and cheap perfume, and their hard male smells that were rancid, stale, and sour. . . . He spoke to them out of the lips of Herrick, Donne and Shakespeare, of all the things that never change, of all the things that would abide forever," implying, it would seem, that in the good old days of Queen Elizabeth and James I, poets and clergymen, if not the hoi polloi, smelled like roses.

In the last two novels, The Web and the Rock and You Can't Go Home Again, Wolfe changed his pseudonym from Eugene Gant to George Webber, but the chronology in the telling of his life story remains unchanged. When The Web and the Rock was first published, I read the portions that concerned people I knew. Then I was merely shocked by the exhausting, repetitious account of his and Aline Bernstein's love-hate affair. On rereading parts of it now I can see that his portrayal of Aline's attitude toward her work, her mannerisms, her speech, and even the eat-your-cake-and-have-it-too side of her character, which she was the first to admit, are accurate. But of the particular quality of warmth and empathy for which her non-infatuated friends loved her there is little hint. The satirical portraits of such then well-known writers as Alexander Woollcott and Carl Van Vechten are easily recognizable and show a certain Pickwickian gift. However, when I explored some pages I had not previously read, I was apalled by a vulgarity that had never appeared in the volumes edited by Maxwell Perkins.

The hero is indulging in a fantasy of the kind of love affair he would like to have, and here is how he imagines the Park Avenue lady of his dreams with whom he dines in her elegant apartment. "In unadorned but costly evening dress, of heavy, pearl-colored silk, with silver hose, and black, jewelled slippers, she would reveal an unsuspected maturity, depth of breast and fullness of limb. . . . Later in the evening, they would sit before the fire, he in a deep upholstered chair, she on a chaise-longue, where they would have small cups of black coffee, a glass of green Chartreuse, or of Grand Marnier. He would smoke fragrant, toasted, loose-drawing Lucky Strikes; she would smoke Melachrinos. From time to time he would move her limbs slightly, and her silken calves, sliding gently apart together, would cause an audible and voluptuous friction." Because this passage evoked for me the advertisements in The New Yorker, I looked at the end of the chapter to make sure that it was not intentionally satirical. It is not. He would wear her love like a most invulnerable target over his heart. She would be the heart of his desire, the well of his passion."

The hero's susceptibility to this phantom, blonde, gentile lady contrasts strikingly with his subsequent remarks about "those fine Jewish ladies on Park Avenue with their million dollar soul earnings and their fancy fornications . . . the simple pleasures of the Jewish millionaires and the innocent adulteries of their wives," which he shouts at his Jewish mistress in one of the quarrels.

From the few excerpts I have quoted in this review it is clear that a biographer would have to face the problem of Tom's anti-Semitism. The way Mr. Turnbull treats this subject seems to me to show one of the dangers of basing a writer's biography on his day-to-day life rather than on his work. "The anti-Semitism evident in Wolfe's treatment of Aline cannot be blinked but must be qualified," Mr. Turnbull says: ". . . If Wolfe was anti-Semitic he was also at times anti-German, anti-French, anti-Irish, and even anti-American." Yet in Germany in 1936 Wolfe wrote in his notes: "I don't like Jews and if most of the people I know would tell the truth about their feelings, I wonder how many of them would be able to say that they liked Jews." In spite of this statement, Mr. Turnbull bolsters his defense with at least two of the clichés that always make Jews laugh. A Jewish girl with whom Tom had a brief

Anti-Textbook*

"A polemic it is . . . an obvious attempt to goad the intellectual community into action . . . Professors of course have always faced the charge of living in ivory towers, but Roszak and the eleven other dissenting contributors hold that the so-called scholars no longer even serve scholarship in their runaway careerist concern to serve themselves."

—F. Y. BLUMENFELD, Newsweek

"Academic independence may never be so much in jeopardy as it is when the professionals are affluent and the rewards high — and this, is the major warning of THE DISSENTING ACADEMY."

— PETER SCHRAG, Saturday Review

"Recommended reading for all seriously concerned with higher education in the United States today."

—Library Journal

"An absolute must, and hopefully a trend-setter." —Kirkus' Service

The Dissenting Academy Edited by THEODORE ROSZAK

* This is the first in a new Pantheon series of "Anti-Textbooks" — which will stress the work being done by young scholars, and the criticisms they have to offer both of the way their subject is being taught and of the role it plays in society. Coming in April: TOWARDS A NEW PAST, edited by Barton J. Bernstein.

$6.95, your bookstore

PANTHEON

affair says that he was not "deeply anti-Semitic," not deeply enough, obviously, to keep him from making an exception of her. And Maxwell Perkins, that most intelligent of Wasps, who even after Tom's betrayal of him continued to regard him as a combined "archangel and rascal," said that Tom had "no anti-Semitic leanings," indeed some of his best friends were Jews.

The prejudices of an author are of no importance as long as they do not diminish his gifts as an artist. Henry Adams would never have denied his anti-Semitism, but not until his letters were published would a reader of The Education or of Mont-Saint-Michel and Chartres have been aware of it. However, over and above the repeated references in Wolfe's last two volumes to "great, proud and potent beak-nosed Jews . . . great beak-nosed Jews filled with insolence and scorn," there is an important episode at the end of You Can't Go Home Again that illustrates the extent to which this prejudice weakened his judgment as a writer.

When he was leaving Germany in 1936, one of the passengers in his compartment was arrested and held at the border. The man turned out to be a Jew trying to escape from the country. "As the car in which he had been riding slid by, he . . . looked once, directly and steadfastly, at his former companions, and they at him. And in that gaze there was all the unmeasured weight of man's mortal anguish. George and the others felt somehow naked and ashamed, and somehow guilty. They all felt they were saying farewell, not to a man, but to humanity; not to some pathetic stranger, some chance acquaintance, but to mankind; not to some nameless cipher out of life, but to the fading image of a brother's face. The train swept out and gathered speed—and so they lost him."

That paragraph is a perfect ending for this section of the book—intensely felt, yet objective and controlled. But this simple statement of shared experience is not enough. It is followed by the purplest of patches, the dirge for Tom's own personal loss of his beloved Germany. "It was the other part of his heart's home, a haunted park of dark desire, a magic domain of fulfillment. It was the dark, lost Helen that had been forever burning in his blood—the dark lost Helen he had found.

"And now it was the dark, found Helen he had lost. . . . Ended now for him, with the sharp and clean finality of the closing of a door, was the time when his dark roots, like those of a pot-bound plant, could be left to feed upon their own substance and nourish their own little self-absorbed designs." And so on and so on.

After his return to America, following the episode in the train, Wolfe was outraged by a reporter's version of a newspaper interview he had given. "I wonder," he wrote to Hamilton Basso, "just how much longer we've got to sit by meekly and submissively while the scavengers, the shysters, the traducers and filth-purveyors of every sort are allowed to go their way unchecked. It almost makes me long for dear old Adolf and his S.S. men. They at least could put a stop to a good many of our own accepted forms of thugdom. Of course, in doing so they would establish another and much more powerful one of their own, and there's the rub."

The last thing I ever heard Tom say he shouted at Aline Bernstein in one of their last quarrels: "Hitler knows what to do with people like you."

Geniuses are never "nice" men, and the greater the genius the less "nice" he is likely to be. But their masterpieces live after them, and after they are dead their very monstrosity can become a gauge of their achievement. As a prejudiced critic, I am clearly incapable of judging whether Wolfe's books are sufficiently enduring to warrant this additional personal history. But there is one page in this biography more or less hidden away in the notes that I find fascinating. It reproduces a portion of the original manuscript of Look Homeward, Angel, with Max Perkins' corrections, or rather deletions.

Mr. Turnbull, after the publication of his excellent life of Scott Fitzgerald, edited a volume of Fitzgerald's letters. One would like to think that he might follow this devoted biography of Wolfe with a volume of excerpts from his manuscripts, collated with the editorial changes. Such an undertaking might not settle the question of Wolfe's genius but it would be an illuminating study, very useful to students and teachers of so-called creative writing.

Versions of Rural America

A GARDEN OF EARTHLY DELIGHTS. By Joyce Carol Oates. Vanguard Press. 440 pp. $5.95.

A PLACE ON EARTH. By Wendell Berry. Harcourt, Brace & World. 550 pp. $7.50.

RICHARD CLARK STERNE

Mr. Sterne is associate professor of English at Simmons College.

These two authors respond very differently to the sinister dreariness of a Muzak-and-murder society, in which we all tend to the condition of displaced persons. While Miss Oates's characters, whether migrant farm workers or men of property, move and have their restless being in a kind of torture garden that we see as through shattered glass, Mr. Berry's rural figures live an essentially ordered life, in whose course not only birth and familial love but the pain of grief over death by flood and in war imply the author's rejection of "absurdity" as the inevitable human condition. A Garden of Earthly Delights is a mechanized domain of witches who sometimes transform the despised poor into the despising rich; A Place on Earth is a Virgilian landscape, painted to suggest what a sane life might be.

Miss Oates's novel, its title borrowed from Hieronymus Bosch, focuses disturbingly on three generations of an American family—from unlettered, indebted and openly violent migrant laborer to literate, power-fearing, power-loving landowner. Carleton Walpole, the first member of the family we meet, carries with him as he travels with his wife and children from Arkansas to South Carolina to New Jersey to Florida in the late 1920s and early 1930s, a yearning memory of his Kentucky home and land. Dying of cancer while futilely searching for a daughter who has run off with a man, he feels he must go on living because his death would be the death of his memories:

It terrified him that people and places and dates should fly off into nothing . . . belonging to no one and making no sense—who else could know what that photograph meant . . . and who else could remember his father's face, who else could remember the mistake he'd made with Rafe that time, ending up with Rafe dead and for what reason? . . .

His runaway daughter, Clara, knows only that she wants "somethin'." Her home has been one migrant labor camp after another: she has been called "white trash" by a schoolteacher, and Carleton has taken a mistress—after his wife's death—who is almost as young as she. The young vagabond to whom Clara succumbs, after being struck by his resemblance to her father, acts almost paternally toward her. He makes her wash herself, and teaches her to read—at the level of romance magazines. But he is restlessly violent and suddenly takes off for Mexico, leaving her pregnant in a Southwestern town called Tintery.

"Stands massively between Lyndon Johnson and history, an obstacle yet to be surmounted."—CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

The definitive edition of the brilliant case study in American foreign policy

THE DOMINICAN REVOLT

by THEODORE DRAPER

COMMENTARY published Theodore Draper's article on The Dominican Crisis two years ago, in December 1965. Within a matter of days, a New York Times editorial hailed it as "monumental." The weeks immediately following brought a torrent of mail applauding its achievement.

Sen. Ernest Gruening wished "that copies could be sent to every member of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate."

Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy called it "a complete observation of the whole Dominican movement."

Irving Howe wrote that it was "intellectual journalism at its best."

The author of this remarkable article had already established himself as a uniquely conscientious and objective student of contemporary American politics. Previous writing on Latin America, as well as two published volumes in an exhaustive history of American Communism, had won him international acclaim. Theodore Draper's analysis of a crucial moment in American foreign policy which was all too evocative of the Bay of Pigs could not help but be of widespread interest.

Yet the immediate response to The Dominican Crisis exceeded all expectations. And the furor has never ceased.

From Senator Gruening's letter to today, COMMENTARY has been besieged with requests for copies of the December 1965 issue, for reprints, for related books. Theodore Draper has also been besieged—by publishers eager to present his work to an enlarged audience in book form.

The reason is not hard to find. By meticulously dissecting American foreign policy as it applied to a political upheaval in one small country, Theodore Draper provided a wide screen on which could be viewed what had happened before—and what has happened since. The Dominican Crisis emerged as a primer for Vietnam.

Now, by special arrangement with Theodore Draper, COMMENTARY is pleased to issue an expanded version of The Dominican Crisis under the title The Dominican Revolt. Published as a flexible-cover 64-page book, it is almost three times as long as the original, with new facts and documents marshalled to clarify and support the author's line of thought.

Inquiries received since the original publication—more than for any other COMMENTARY article—reflect continued widespread demand for this work, especially for use in college courses. We are, therefore, announcing The Dominican Revolt as subject to the same quantity discount schedule offered for COMMENTARY Reports (which are issued primarily for text use by college students and members of discussion groups).

QUANTITY DISCOUNT SCHEDULE

25-49 copies	less 10%
50-99 copies	less 15%
100-299 copies	less 20%
300-499 copies	less 30%
500-1,000 copies	less 40%
more than 1,000	less 50%

THE DOMINICAN REVOLT

by Theodore Draper

$2.50

THE DOMINICAN REVOLT

A CASE STUDY
IN AMERICAN POLICY
Theodore Draper

order copies now
from

Commentary

165 East 56 Street
New York, N.Y. 10022

Payment is enclosed for _____ copies of
The Dominican Revolt.

Name

Street

City

State

KDR-1

Zip Code

With no Wordsworthian remembrances to help her see "into the life of things," Clara becomes the mistress of a wealthy, sanctimonious married man—Revere. This somber personage sets her up with a car and a house, believes the child she gives birth to is his own, and marries her seven years later, after his own wife's death.

Clara calls her child "Swan," although his legal name is Steven, because swans "look real cold, they're not afraid of anything." Significantly, she has thought of "Clara" (the name of one of her father's sisters) as having "nothing to do with her at all." And "Swan" proves to be shrinkingly apprehensive rather than intrepid. Thus, in the course of three generations, from Carleton Walpole who vividly recalls his father, to Clara who has mixed feelings toward hers, to the illegitimate "Swan" who comes only to suspect who his real father is, names become increasingly dissociated from the persons who bear them.

Coincident with this incremental dissociation is a growing preoccupation with power and status. Carleton took pride in his own physical strength and his superiority to "Niggers" and "Mexes"; Clara becomes intensely possessive of her house and garden (as a little girl she had stolen an American flag from the porch of a middle-class house), admires strength wherever she finds it, and is contemptuous of her son's timidity. "Swan" early in life sees power as the deepest reality in human relationships, and because of his inability to reconcile his fear of having it with his drive to possess it, he goes mad. In his childhood he has been, and felt, responsible in an ambiguous way for

SNOW LODGE

*The door is open
Winter
I send back
This word
Winter
Shape
Sounding
A man's voice
Going where it goes.*

*I have said you
Winter
And lived
And my heart is
The same
As anyone's heart
But let winter in
And said it.*

*The snow in my palm Melts
And can be drunk.*

LEONARD NATHAN

the accidental death by shooting of one of his three foster brothers. In his early 20s, torn between his "strange mystical love" for the Revere land of which he has become a kind of steward, and his desire to "destroy everything," he kills the foster father who incarnates power, then kills himself.

At the end of Miss Oates's impressive lumpen-Buddenbrooks, the middle-aged Clara has moved to a nursing home, where she is visited frequently and "for the rest of Clara's life" by her oldest foster son, whom she had once encouraged to try to make love to her, and then rejected. She does virtually nothing except watch television:

She seemed to like best programs that showed men fighting, swinging from ropes, shooting guns and driving fast cars, killing the enemy again and again until the dying gasps of evil men were only a certain familiar rhythm away from the opening blasts of the commercials, which changed only gradually over the years.

There are flaws in the novel. The last third of it, dealing chiefly with "Swan" and Revere, seems diffuse, less carefully worked out than the superbly controlled first part about Carleton, or the complex, vivid second part which focuses on Clara. The symbolism is sometimes too blatant, as when the saturnine Revere makes love to Clara—who is thinking of her lost young lover—in a parlor, their bodies surrounded by "drifting bunches of dust and the corpses of insects and odd pieces of furniture hunched beneath soiled sheets." But this book, which reminiscent of at least one of Miss Oates's short stories, "First Views of the Enemy" is not only distinctly better than her first novel, With Shuddering Fall, but constitutes as penetrating an examination of our American sickness as the best work Dreiser, Fitzgerald or Faulkner.

A Place on Earth is less familiar ground. Wendell Berry has written not a novel but a long georgic and elegiac poem in the form of a prose narrative. Essentially, he is attempting to affirm the secular sacredness of life by creating an atmosphere of grief, a weathered pain. He could have used as epigraph line from one of his own poems, "Canticle for Robert Hazel": "A creed a grave never did equal the life/of anything."

The setting (like that of Nathan Coulter, Berry's first novel), is Kentucky tobacco country shortly before and shortly after the end of World War II. Mat Felton, a farmer in his early 60s, learns at the rainy beginning of March, 1945, that his only son, Virgil, is missing in action. A tense quietness falls upon him, his wife Margaret, and their pregnant daughter-in-law, Hannah. The months that follow are a hopeless-hopeful waiting, until one day in June Mat breaks the spell in which they have been living:

Virgil is dead. He's not going to come back. He's dead, Margaret. Hannah, he's dead. Say so. We'll kill ourselves trying to pretend anything else.

Berry's concern throughout the book with the individuality of every person and his irreplaceability in the minds of those who love him, is balanced by an evocation of a natural order—always threatened by chaos—of which each person is a part. The war that destroys Virgil and his neighbor Tom Coulter, the flood that takes the life of little Annie Coulter, the lonely despair that drives the late carpenter Ernest Finley—to suicide, are chaotic eruptions, as are the hideous events which the radio and newspapers mechanically inform villagers and farmers: camps discovered by our armies in Europe; the atomic bombing of Hiroshima. It seems to Mat, when he hears of the destruction of the Japanese cities that the years of violence have at last arrived at what, without his knowing it, they had been headed for, not by any human reason or motive or wish but by the logic of violence itself.

More than ever before, the relatively communal, unacquisitive life embodied in Mat's easy relationship with his tenant and in his care for and pleasure in his orchard and garden, newborn granddaughter and newborn lamb, seems menaced by the world's madness.

WRITERS

N. Y. publisher wants books on all subjects, fiction, nonfiction. No fee for professional opinion. FREE: Brochures that show how your book can be published, publicized, sold; contracts. Write Dept. 147D

EXPOSITION PRESS INC.
222 Park Ave. So., New York, N. Y. 10010

Just Published

How 88,648 Heavy Smokers Stopped Smoking

NEW YORK — The Anti-Tobacco Center of America has just published a booklet which explains how 88,648 heavy smokers (of whom many are physicians) have stopped smoking without straining their will power. This booklet is available free of charge to smokers. All you need to do, to obtain it, is to send your name and address to The Anti-Tobacco Center of America, Dept. A-31-v, 276 Park Avenue South, New York City, 10010. This offer is open while the supply of these booklets lasts.

The special music of A Place on Earth is stayed in my mind. But this pastoral almost intolerably slow moving, and is musically too sentimental for my taste. While Wendell Berry knows and shows that there have been violence and unbearable unhappiness in rural Kentucky, he is too intent on evoking a way of life antithetical to that of anxious self-seeking and compulsive destruction. I liked the quirks and ribald eccentricities of such well-drawn characters as Jayber Crow, Old Jack, Big Ellis and Whacker Spradlin. But I wish there were one country feller hungry for power, and sufficiently clever to win high public office, and to astonish and frighten the home town with his acts.

are you so afraid of?" His attempts to extricate himself, with dignity and generosity toward all, from the charge of denying a birthright that in fact is not his, loses him the intimate attentions of his wife and the friendship of a fellow editor (a diminutive and one-man London Irgun) and shortly he finds himself the symbol of rabid anti-Semitism in the whole humane community. Similarly, Griffin's care to avoid any suggestion of a patronizing gesture in an encounter with a handsome young Negro woman earns him the maternal epithet that black power seems to have made peculiarly its own.

What Mortimer cannot recognize is a degree of malice lurking in the lesser breeds he is so eager to embrace. He goes blundering through the racial undergrowth, crying "friend, friend," and never sees a guerrilla until he has been zapped.

The other protagonist is a pseudonymous Greek known as Star Maker, who owns all of Hollywood and is steadily buying control of the world's communications industries. But power seems to be less the preoccupation of this enigmatic and curiously asymmetrical figure (his arms and legs are poor matches) than is the quest for immortality; and it was about to call Cocksure derivative, if the word is insufficient for the book's vacuity. There are in it patches of Andy, After Many a Summer Dies the Swan, Lucky Jim, the short stories of Levi, Goldfinger, and I have no idea what other fiction that Mordecai Richler has read and I have not. The book feels like a syllabus of satiric observations from about the period of World War I to the present.

Man With a Marvy Lymph System

COCKSURE. By Mordecai Richler. Simon & Schuster. 250 pp. $4.95.

ROBERT HATCH

There are two reasons, though, why its acquisitiveness should not be held a fault (that it may put some readers off is another matter). In the first place, it seems to be entirely deliberate. Richler is writing Pop fiction, and Pop is a style that draws, not from life but from the warehouse—its point is that it is second-hand. Beyond that, I think Richler is not much interested in creating plot and character—at least, he shows no sign of any such design. He has made his reputation over the past few years as a social critic of impressive acuity and singular good nature, and though he turns from time to time to fiction I could judge from Cocksure (I have not read his other novels) that he does not change the direction of his interest. He is in a hurry to document some of the more aberrant tendencies of our present and can work faster with prefabricated materials.

Like many of its sources, Cocksure is often a very funny book; it is also, being the most recent, more obscene than any of them. Indeed, it is so wildly indecent in spots that I should find it awkward were to indicate even the nature of the encounters described. For all that, the book is less erotic than Mansfield Park, and I take it to be one of Richler's principal charges that, from excess of permissiveness, clinical mindedness and generally indiscriminate experimental jizzling, the age has lost its sexiness. Isn't the most persuasive section of the book (though at moments absurdly hilarious), and a degree of stridency makes me think that the author knows it.

The two other matters that principally engage Cocksure are the scrupulosity of the liberal ethic and the parasitic basis of large entrepreneurial activity. The hero of the first of these is Mortimer Griffin, editor for a small London publisher, whose Wasp superego is in pawn to the victims of prejudice. Disaster strikes Mortimer when, after a lecture he has given, one of his auditors comes forward to congratulate him as a fellow Jew. Griffin modestly denies the relationship, eliciting the predictable, "What

BUT, THERE WERE THE WARS

by C. & M. Bayet

A haunting novel...

A timely message...

A cry for PEACE...

The 20th Century is sick with World War psychosis. The echoes of one war have not yet died that the rumors of another war start roaring. In 1919, the Armistice had just been signed, the dead had just been buried, and already the laboratories were busy. Men were trying to discover the most deadly gases. And now, far from being satisfied with two wars that surpassed in atrocities everything that could be imagined, we apply ourselves to the most important task: the next war will be a masterpiece of destruction, more frightful than the darkest threats of the Apocalypse. $4.50

Order at your bookstore or:

Vantage Press, Inc., 120 West 31 Street, New York City 10001

The Carolina Israelite is Passing from The Scene but

HARRY GOLDEN

will

LIVE ON FOREVER

JOIN "The Harry Golden Followers" and write for details to:
Mrs. Morris Rubinsohn, 60 Schiller Ave., Narberth, Pa. 19072

soon becomes evident that he exploits his enormous staff in a shockingly direct way. His absorption of enterprises seems motivated primarily by a quest for ebulliently healthy potential donors, whom he binds to him financially and by the cannibalistic sentimentality that pervades really big business. A man very much of his times, Richler earns the good luck of his topicality. The recent heart transplant publicity has raised ghoulish speculations in precisely the area of Star Maker's solicitude for the organic welfare of his junior associates.

There are also several sub-themes, my favorite being that of Polly Morgan, a girl so drenched in the screen "medium" that her life, cinema style, tends to "cut" rather than to flow. Thus a guest, caught in her time pattern, may find himself blipped from the promise of cocktails to a stack of empty dishes suggesting a recently completed feast; and later in the evening he may be unnerved by an abrupt transition from shy approaches to the sight of his hostess lying in bed, mussed and replete, and murmuring: "It was super for me, darling; was it super for you?"

The main themes and the subsidiaries are efficiently threaded together. Mortimer's son attends the Beatrice Webb school, scene of some of the more outlandish pornographic exploits, and he has attracted Star Maker's favorable attention because of what the old man calls his "marvy lymph system." He has also spent a night with Polly, hoping for some respite from the wars of social justice, but gaining little refreshment from the ellipses of her reality.

It is indeed a marvy book, an easy night's reading of riotous social terrorism designed to provide inoculation against the madness now seeping down the air shafts of all our bomb shelters.

characters or the thrust of the plot—A Hall of Mirrors the urban setting evoked with a brilliant sensory concreteness that is palpably true, and is also resonant of the psychic and moral anxieties which press upon the characters.

The novel's central character is Rheinhardt—we never learn his first name—an alcoholic, sometime classical musician of great but unfulfilled promise, who drifts into New Orleans as the book opens. Relying on his con man's gift for talk he eventually gets a job as an announcer on a right-wing radio station whose racist message furthers the sinister political ambitions of its millionaire owner.

Drenched in self-loathing and assault by alcoholic nightmares, Rheinhardt quiets his conscience by turning on the marijuana-smoking world of some near-beatnik types who live in his apartment house, and by wearily making love to a tough, unlucky bar girl whose desperate circumstances mirror Rheinhardt's own. Rheinhardt's nightmares are brilliantly described and prefigure the nightmare of violence and brutal madness at the political rally turned race riot with which the novel concludes:

The last dream went on in some littered darkness, a dim loft-like place—he was pressed into a glass booth the size of a coffin from which he could see a floor of worn wooden planks that was strewn with burned charcoal and wrapping paper. There were piles of coal and heaps of green sticks, rusted nails upright—and stretching into the darkness, rows of dusty glass display cases where shapeless artifacts lay covered with mold. . . . He kept trying to rise on his toes to test the top of the booth, but it was always higher than his head; he sank down, bending his knees to look at the planks of the floor and saw small bright-eyed animals with furred parabolic ears rising from their heads, who came forward in darts and rushes to peer in at him and pressed bare teeth and quivering nostrils against the glass walls. Cavies, he thought, they were called covies.

The essential qualities of this passage—its eerie vividness, its fine desperate intensity—are characteristic of the whole novel; and the nightmare fear of entrapment and savage attack which is projected here is the book's defining metaphor. If Rheinhardt is imprisoned from within, his girl Geraldine moves in the novel through a series of small enclosed places, tiny bedrooms, the dirty waiting room of a bar to which she retreats from a threatening lover, finally to the human steel closeness of the jail cell to which she hangs herself.

The cold damp links chilled the back of her neck, pressed at her throat. I'm there.

A Fearful & Mindless Violence

A HALL OF MIRRORS. By Robert Stone. Houghton Mifflin. 409 pp. $5.95.

DAVID THORBURN

Mr. Thorburn teaches English at Yale University.

This remarkable first novel was one of the best works of fiction published last year. It received a good deal of attention in the daily press, but there is more to be said about it, primarily because it confronts with unique directness the fearful and mindless violence in which America is presently immersed.

In bare outline A Hall of Mirrors resembles dozens of similar books whose estimate of our circumstances is bleak and even despairing, whose central characters are maimed victims and sufferers, whose modern urban setting, as the blurb (rather nicely!) puts it, "is that rootless one of the all-night tenth-run movie, the mission house lunch, the corner where everyone has to move on, buddy." But this novel is distinguished from the conventional roman de malaise as gold from dross.

Where in other superficially similar novels the despair seems forced or modish, in this one it is earned. Where other writers have been content with the abstract idea of the passive or suffering hero, Stone gives us characters whose weaknesses and deformities are projected with extraordinary and persuasive energy. Where in less successful novels the menace and violence and sordidness of the city are either indifferently rendered or are presented in descriptive set pieces—self-serving interludes really, which deflect our attention from the life of the

SANDY DENNIS · KEIR DULLEA · ANNE HEYWOOD

Between Ellen and Jill came Paul

IN D. H. LAWRENCE'S

THE FOX

...symbol of the male

Screenplay by PENELOPE JOHNSON and HOWARD KOEN - Produced by RAYMOND STROSS - Directed by MARK RYDELL
Color by Deluxe - From CLARIDGE PICTURES

VICTORIA / THE festival

8 WAY & 46th ST. JU 6-0540 57th St. at 5th Ave. LI 1-7552

Geraldine closed her eyes, took a breath, and kicked her bunk up against the wall; above her head the slack chain played out with a terrible sound, went taut, held. She stiffened with the shock; her fingers stretched in fear and pain over a dangling hem of cloth blanket beside her body.

Mistake, mistake, she thought. Nobody could want this. But she knew there was no mistake. It was very familiar.

At its core, this book is about the disease of violence which it takes to be the essential condition of American life. It sees that this violence is ubiquitous and inescapable, and that, like all true evil, it has a complex character. It has, for example, its bizarre, half-comic side:

Woody was holding her arm and talking slow—making the speech about the gun and how—talking real slow—he was gonna take that little old gun and stick the ever lovin' barrel right smack up against the top of her mouth and when he pulled the trigger her brains were going to smear the ceiling and so forth. It was one of his favorite lyric recitations and Geraldine always found it a little fascinating to hear.

It has, even, an aspect of gaiety:

The razors were [displayed] in concentric circles, or rather in a wide dazzling spiral that carried the eye graciously from one degree of craftsmanship to the next. Those on the perimeter were . . . modest . . . a man might conceivably use them to shave with. In the next circle, they were smaller, but much prettier. . . . In the deepest circles, the razors were altogether festive, merry with carnival colors, brilliant in riotous plastic—some had wooden finger grips for when the palm sweated; the cutting edges of the blades had a happy sparkle and looked wonderfully precise.

And it possesses also, at times, a sinister gentleness:

"You'll be all right, little one," the man said. She looked up at him then. He looked wise and kind. . . .

"Go ahead, little one." He kept holding the brass knuckles to her mouth; she could taste the sour brass afterward in dreams. "Move out."

He had the gentlest voice she could ever remember hearing.

Unpretentiously, and without resort to fable, this novel tells us that we are drowning in the inhuman and the violent; it confronts us with precisely those visions which paralyze one of its characters: "If he looked back, he thought, there might appear against the awful clarity of that evening some dreadful procession of things as they are. . . ." It is not a perfect book. One feels in particular that its plot is somewhat contrived and that one of its central characters is less credible than the others. But these flaws barely affect the novel's power, its seriousness, its impressive authority as a kind of inspired report. It gives us things as they are, and with a lyrical evenness in which there is not a trace of surprise or even outrage.

This is what is most disturbing about the book. Stone's recognition of the violence and malignity which oppress his characters has about it something casual, something taken for granted. None of this is unusual or unexpected, the novel, in its pain, tells us; this is just the way things are.

And, more, unlike Mailer's heavy-handed allegory of brutality, Why Are We In Vietnam?, and unlike Styron's The Confessions of Nat Turner (where the violence is distanced as history), Stone's novel will not allow us to regard it as a metaphor; we are not protected from its insights by the comforts of analogy. In this book the people who feel compassion or human affection are pursued relentlessly. They are caught and destroyed. The places of power and authority are held by malignant and insane men. These men are the victors.

In its earned hopelessness, A Hall of Mirrors sees, and dramatizes with terrible conviction, a truth which has afflicted men at all times but which presses upon us in this moment with particular intensity: that we are all prisoners, our humanity imperiled, and in the grip of monsters.

Thumb-Sucking

THEE: A Poem. By Conrad Aiken. Drawings by Leonard Baskin. George Braziller. 14 pp. $5.

RICHARD EBERHART

Mr. Eberhart, who teaches at Dartmouth, won the Pulitzer Prize for poetry in 1966. His most recent book is Thirty One Sonnets (The Eakins Press). A new book of poems, Shifts of Being, will be published this year by Oxford University Press.

Thee is a new short long poem, or a long short poem, of 8 unnumbered pages, published with six page-drawings by Leonard Baskin.

The poem is written in short lines, sometimes one word to a line, none of the lines having more than nine words, in a single lyrical movement of praise to the THEE, always capitalized, of the

Interested in Social Change?

Then Consider

THE UPLAND SCHOOL

Offering study, experimentation and field work in major conflict areas of American Society. Two-year graduate program leading to an M.A. in Social Change. Professional training emphasized. Coeducational and non-sectarian. For admission, B.A. or equivalent in training and experience required.

September opening

For complete information write:

Director of Admissions

THE UPLAND SCHOOL OF SOCIAL CHANGE

CHESTER, PA. 19013

poem. The ideas are extremely simple. It is a simple-minded poem, really a song not a prayer.

If it is a prayer the cleverness of Aiken is to use a word usually used to praise God or Christ, at least in Christianity, without going that far. He refuses outright religious commitment, deviating into aestheticism where he has always dwelted. The poem idea, then, is schizothymic. It is modern in this sense. The THEE, then, is not God or Christ, to whom he does or does not pray, but if he does not pray, he celebrates. He celebrates everything—life and death, doubt, the spirit, "what fatal question" of the THEE, the ultimate eyes, breath and identity as prime terms thrown on the page.

He celebrates the mysteries of being. He does mention God once, as follows:

*Self-praise were then our praise of THEE
unless we say divinity cries in us both as we draw breath*

*cry death cry death and all our hate
we must abate
and THEE must with us meet and mate give birth give suck be sick and die and close the All-God-Giving-Eye for the last time to sky.*

The mystery of the poem is that the THEE is unknown, manifold. But it is not unknown, and is single. It is obvious that Aiken is sucking his own thumb. The solution is that Aiken is his own THEE.

Baskin's drawing of the morning-glories is delightful, but his representations of the human form are ugly. Aiken's lines are not.

PUBLICATIONS

FROM PEKING & HANOI: Mao Tse-tung's "Quotations" and "On People's War," both famous little red books for $1.00. Ho-Chi-Minh's "Prison Diary," 75c. Subscription to Peking Review, 52 weeks, air, $4.00. Subscription to Vietnam Courier, 26 weeks, $5.00. Payment with order to CHINA BOOKS, Dept. N, 2929-24th St., San Francisco 94110. FREE CATALOG.

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 13 Street, New York City 10011.

WORLD DEMOCRACY by Bin Dir Woor, Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 7th Avenue, N.Y.C. Bin Dir Woor calls on millions of people to write out a prayer for World Democracy, burn it in a candle flame, and bury the ashes at the roots of a white rose bush. He thinks these will be the whitest roses ever to bloom on earth.

THE FUTURIST, published bimonthly by World Future Society, reports scientists' forecasts for coming decades. Subscription: $5 yearly. Box 19285-N, Twentieth Street Station, Washington D.C. 20036.

"Adventures of a Farm Boy" (non-fiction)—$2.00. Paul Burke, 201 S. 32 Avenue, Omaha, Nebraska 68131

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

TYPING WORRIES??? Expert Typing, Reasonable Rates. Manuscripts, doctoral and masters theses our specialty. Call (201) 667-5145

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION

4-1-68

660 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

- ☐ One Year, $10
- ☐ Two Years, $18
- ☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign Postage $2; Canadian Postage $1 per year extra)

Name.....

Address.....

City.....

State..... Zip No.....

Gore Vidal's Weekend (Broadhurst Theatre) has some amusing quips about LBJ and Nixon ("anti," of course), a funny scene in which a conservative Southern lady attempts integral cordiality with a Negro couple, the slight "twist" being that the Negro couple is in almost every respect reactionary. Still, it is a trivial play; its topicality no deeper than a barber shop sun tan.

The situation Mr. Vidal offers is that a liberal Republican Senator makes his bid for the Presidential nomination at the moment when his son returns from study abroad with a black fiancée. The play's "switch" is that the Senator insists his son marry the girl (she is pregnant) even though the boy is reluctant to do so and had never seriously intended marriage. But instead of ruining the Senator's political career, the contretemps appears virtually to assure his nomination, since the polls indicate public enthusiasm for his liberalism.

The play is such a drummed-up affair that the normally sensible Joseph Anthony's direction shows signs of desperation. Obvious points are made embarrassingly more so by a hammering so energetic that I imagined it could be heard inside Sardi's restaurant across the street.

Nice performances are nonetheless provided by most of the cast, notably on the distaff side: by Rosemary Murphy as the Senator's wife, by Kim Hunter as the Senator's mistress (Miss Hunter is even more attractive now than she was ten years ago), and by Eleanor Wilson who is most entertaining as the simple-minded lady from Dixie.

I have on several occasions noted my pleasure at the City Center Joffrey Ballet. There is of course a special delight in such purely choreographic numbers as (Vivaldi's) Cello Concerto or in the Donizetti Variations. There is also great theatrical excitement in Astoria with its erotic drama—superbly carried out by Trinette Singleton of a beauty both tantalizing and disturbing, and by the proud and powerful Maximilian Zomosa—who move against a background of colored images slithering and melting in anticipatory or complementary replica of the stage movement. All of this is accompanied by the freewheeling rock and roll sound at once cacophonous and exhilarating. The piece offers agony and release, the whole being sort of extended epigram of tormented desire and ultimate liberation of the individual person amid the chaos of modern cars and the attendant machinery of the contemporary landscape.

The climax in this vein of theatrical symbolism is to be seen in a new number called The Clowns, with serial music rendered popular in the expert orchestration of Hershy Kay. Clive Barnes has interpreted this production as the struggle of those persons of good will in the holocausts of civilizations who arise from its debris, only to be destroyed again in an eternally recurrent cycle. It did not occur to me to interpret the piece at all—it may very well mean what Barnes says it does or something entirely different—but I was much taken with it as a visual stage phenomenon.

I enjoyed seeing these two ballets; they will bear repeated visits. I was also pleased by the few "boos" they provoked among those who resented the breach of ballet aesthetics, and the faint admixture of Music Hall sport in these numbers as well as in the humorous entertainments of the Distractions, choreographed by Lew Christensen to music by Joseph Haydn. Controversy and dissidence in the ballet world—regarded much too complacently by most of us—is a healthy sign.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1243

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Doesn't sound like one of the things that would fit into a square hole as a matter of course. (5,5)
- 2 The chances are someone is missing from 22. (4)
- 3 The female of the species, when it comes to such as Coccinellidae? (7)
- 4 Does it go well with a swagger stick? (7)
- 5 Slight hint, possibly. (4)
- 6 At the same time I'd be in the money and after more money! (10)
- 7 Richmond's state before its conqueror became a wanderer? (7)
- 8 Cheese at least one foot high this way? (7)
- 9 A spot around nearby? Calm down! (7)
- 10 He certainly shouldn't keep you from dropping off! (7)
- 11 Lodge with those who shouldn't be even there? (10)
- 12 It might take its turn at the opening. (4)
- 13 Last longer, like an overcoat? (7)
- 14 One might on the back, and wind up sort of reddish. (7)
- 15 An artist's subject, but just barely! (4)
- 16 The secret dupe of the oppressed? (10)

DOWN:

- 1 Who, for example, should refer to your mother or sister like this! (8,7)
- 2 Immortal. (7)
- 3 Little quantities of fish? (4)

- 4 Goat, but hardly recognizable as one that should pull something. (7)
- 5 Are they less likely to be colorful personalities? (7)
- 7 Certainly not the cheapest term of affection. (7)
- 8 By doing this does one get only half a loaf, or just extended musical fare? (10,5)
- 9 Spain's air, though hardly balmy, is too far south for them. (9)
- 14 Equal to a yard-plus as a mathematic variable. (9)
- 18 Studied the books, and listened to the speech? (7)
- 19 Make a big deal out of what was just a snap? (7)
- 20 Such as Tom in the woodyard? (7)
- 21 A place of high calling in religion? (7)
- 24 Pertaining to the force of poetry? (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1242

ACROSS: 1 Subjective case; 9 Bramble; 10 Reagent; 11 Insets; 12 and 15 across Western saddle; 14 Sultana; 17 Saved; 19 Sterile; 21 Berating; 23 and 4 down Casualties; 25 Conduct; 26 Brigand; 27 Bank messengers.
DOWN: 1 Subtitles; 2 Brasses; 3 Embattled; 5 Variegated; 6 Coast; 7 Sheared; 8 Otis; 13 and 21 down Passing the buck; 15 Animation; 16 Enfilades; 18 Veranda; 20 Emulate; 22 Truck; 24 Obis.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address: Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014.

ART

ORIGINAL SIGNED GRAPHICS

Beckmann
Campendonck
Heckel
and other German Expressionists
Catalogue on request

Weingarten & Co.
40 West 56th Street, New York City 10019

WOULD YOU BELIEVE? EXCITING ORIGINAL woodcuts, etchings, lithos, $4.50 each. Subscription information: Graphic Circle, (N), 68 Fifth Avenue, New York City 10011

TO RENT OR EXCHANGE

WRITER & FAMILY need pleasant, reasonable house/apartment for 2 adults and 4 civilized kids June 4 for 2-4 weeks in N.Y.—N.J. area. Could exchange for our house in San Juan. References: Kal Wagenheim, Box 2689, San Juan, Puerto Rico, 00903

PERSONALS

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE

(Computerized Matching—All Ages)
"Let TEAM make you a team."

Write:

TEAM Project
245 East 30th Street

New York, N.Y. 10016, Phone 889-6020

INTERESTED IN LIFE? Believe men should live each day to the fullest? So do humanists. For information write: Dept. N-1, American Humanist Association, 125 El Camino del Mar, San Francisco, Calif. 94121.

FIGHT JUNK MAIL. Send it back at THEIR expense. Labels and instruction $1.00. Artichoke, P.O. Box 9123C, Bridgeport, Connecticut 06601

DISCOVER an intriguing, fun approach to meeting alert, literate Jewish singles. No computers used. For FREE analytical questionnaire write: Dept. N, OPERATION MAZELTOV, 415 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036. (PL 7-3638)

"LBJ DARTBOARD GAME." A giant 14" solid cobra construction dartboard with LBJ's face as the target (or Reagan, Bobby Kennedy, Sigmund Freud, Nixon, Nasser, Wallace and DeGaulle) is yours for only $3.95 postpaid. Three precision brass darts imported from England are included for your bull's eye accuracy. Send check or money order to: TOPP, P.O. Box 1802-V, Chicago, Illinois 60690

SALASACAN WALL-HANGINGS — Tapestries hand-woven by the Salasacan Indians of the Andes. Moderately priced. (C.D.Project). Write: ANDEAN, Box 472, Cuenca, Ecuador.

Searching?

It's not enough to just "know thyself." COM/PAIR, the "people-matching-people" of Princeton speed your research. It's a way to meet a truly interesting match. National, international clients. $10.00 fee payable when you return questionnaire. Request free questionnaire from COM/PAIR Systems. H 194 Nassau, Princeton, N.J.

COM/PAIR SYSTEMS, Inc., Dept. H
194 Nassau St., Princeton, N.J. 08540

© Copyright 1966 COM/PAIR Systems Inc.

TRAVEL

TOUR YUCATAN—July 8th, all expenses from New Orleans and return—12 unforgettable days —$400. MEXIVAC TOURS, P. O. Box 274, Lombard, Ill. 60148.

How to fight "negative nostalgia" in the classroom—for 65c a week

"In a world that is trying to survive on negative nostalgia," wrote one department chairman in ordering block subscriptions to The NATION for his classes, "The NATION is one of a few publications that are trying to move us forward."

What others say:

"Student boredom is one of the great barriers to learning. Where a course can be enlivened by social controversy and by knowledge passionately felt and applied to the critical problems of our time, the interests of the students come alive. That is why in over 15 years of teaching in mid-Western and Eastern colleges I have often turned to The NATION for classroom subscriptions to supplement the factual, but passionless, American government textbook."

*Associate Professor Kingsborough Community College
Brooklyn, N.Y.*

"I have used The NATION for 20 years in my courses in American government and American foreign policy. Its consistently high level of performance has made it the most useful aid of any periodical attempting to interpret the American scene to the college student. It challenges them to think, to dispel the fog of intellectualism in which they have moved, to put to examination the easy assumptions of their community."

*Head, Social Science Department
Middle Tennessee State College
Murfreesboro, Tennessee*

"Once again, may I thank you for a truly great magazine. . . . 'The invisible shield of daring is a weapon from the sky, against being dead.'—Lao Tze, 6th century B.C."

*Student, Antioch College
Yellow Springs, Ohio*

"I subscribe to The NATION, and I regard it as an excellent source of political commentary for teachers and students both. You have maintained your bite and vitality over the years, and I have dropped subscriptions to other magazines while always renewing my NATION subscription."

*Professor, Politics Department University of Massachusetts
Amherst, Massachusetts*

"As a class tool, The NATION has the virtue of stimulating the students, of awakening them to a whole new world of unhappy people, of conflicts and injustices and frank discussion of problems which the polite world of our local journalism ignores."

*Dean of Arts and Sciences
San Diego State College
San Diego, California*

What say you?

N4-1

The NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

I wish to use The NATION in my classroom for the next 3 months. Enclosed is $1.95 per student, or _____ for _____ students.

Name _____

School _____

Street _____

City _____ State _____ Zip _____

If you teach classes that relate to the future of the United States, to the uncertain present, or to the story of our past national progress, you may find it wise to take out block subscriptions to The NATION for classroom use.

As seen from New York...

Your students can follow the front-line battle for the cities in The NATION. Mayor John V. Lindsay has said of The NATION: "It is a publication which has advanced the public interest and which understands that truthful speaking by an enlightened public is essential to a nation's well-being. I may disagree from time to time with editorial policy or with content, but I am always in hearty agreement with The NATION's willingness to speak out."

and from Cambodia...

Prince Sihanouk found time to cable The NATION: "I must express to you my most sincere gratitude for the understanding and objectivity which your magazine has shown toward my country and myself. . . . The future is very gloomy for our country's peaceful and neutral nationalism. But thanks to some Americans of ability and heart, and to certain independent publications that dare to come to the defense of Cambodia, libeled and soon perhaps to be invaded, we shall not completely despair of the American nation."

How about your classroom?

We can deliver The NATION for your classroom use for 65c per month per student, in lots of ten or more. Ten such subscriptions, for the next three months, cost just $19.50, or $1.95 per student. A pretty small investment, perhaps, when you consider what is at stake in our classrooms today.

To bring your students the mature and challenging presentation of current issues presented in The NATION, fill out and return the form at left.

COUNTER CULTURE III THEODORE ROSZAK

THE NATION

APRIL 8, 1968 35 cents

BURLINGAME
APR 10 1968
LIBRARY

OFF AND RUNNING

What Works for McCarthy W. DAVID GARDNER
Kennedy in Disneyland PHIL KERBY

An End to Barter

New Politics of Conviction GRANT McCONNELL

FRAGMENTS OF A VERSE PLAY

Simone Weil

Translations and Note by William Burford

JEWISH WRITING IN ENGLAND / Gerda Charles

21-68R PLS-1449
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

'there will be solidarity'

New York City

DEAR SIR: Jean Carper ["The Real Crime of Dr. Spock," The Nation, Mar. 11] puts her finger on one of the few encouraging factors in our whole situation today: "The government cannot tolerate the kind of rebellion Dr. Spock represents." Cannot tolerate it because of the dimensions of the threat.

For we are not going to allow Benjamin Spock and a few others to take the rap for the rest of us. There will be solidarity. May I call the attention of Nation readers to two possibilities, one small, the other larger, in which they might want to cooperate? David Mitchell is in jail right now for refusing induction because he insisted that "patriotic obedience in crime does not establish innocence"—the Nuremberg verdict on Goering. A benefit to help pay Mr. Mitchell's continuing legal expenses was held at the American Place Theatre, Sunday, Mar. 17. The larger matter is this. At Columbia University over 100 faculty members have signed a statement expressing solidarity with Columbia students who refuse induction. Those of us who helped draw up and distribute the statement recommend that the faculties of other colleges follow suit. Copies of our statement can be obtained from David Caplovitz, Social Research, 605 West 115th Street, New York 10025.

Eric Beniley

command performance

Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: John Horn's column in the Mar. 11 issue of The Nation, as it referred to Meet The Press, contains some errors which are damaging and which I hope that you will want to correct:

(1) The President did not "order a command performance from a network." We had been trying for some time to get McNamara and Rusk for Meet The Press interviews, and when we heard that both might be available, we sold the White House on the program. Meet The Press was not commanded to do anything, nor do we accept commands.

(2) The President did not designate "in advance who shall sit on the panel." I picked the panel, as I always do, and when I had picked it, I told Bob Fleming of the White House who would be questioning. The panel was one we had already picked and announced for a program with General Taylor, except for Elie Abel of NBC News, who was substituted for Ronald Gorski of NBC News.

(3) I don't know what you mean when you say Meet The Press is "a controlled environment." Certainly there are a "limited number of reporters" and time limits the number of questions we can ask, but a reporter is always free to ask any question he desires and to press as hard as he wishes for an answer.

Lawrence E. Spivak

The phrase, "designating in advance who shall sit on the panel," was added to Mr. Horn's analysis on the basis of news reports published after his column was submitted to the magazine. We are glad to accept Mr. Spivak's statement that he alone selected the panelists. As to his other points, Mr. Horn comments as follows: "If there is any doubt about the President's ability to order a command performance as stated in the context of my column ('A mayor, governor or President does not make news so much as he is news'), it should be cleared up by the following two statements:

(1) The President seems to have, I believe, sufficient

(Continued on page 476)

EDITORIALS

Once More, With Blood

The massive retaliatory raid staged by the Israelis following a wave of Arab terrorist acts conducted from bases in Jordan has compounded the problems besetting the peace efforts of UN representative Gunnar Jarring. This seemed to be the main concern of the major powers when the Security Council met again in emergency session on the latest round of violence in the Middle East. Even before that outbreak, a negative response from the United Arab Republic had forced Ambassador Jarring to shelve a promising device whereby Israeli and Arab diplomats might have coexisted, if not actually conversed, at Mr. Jarring's headquarters in Cyprus. The flaring up of hostilities across the Jordan River reopened wounds that show exceptional resistance to healing.

The Security Council debate occasioned still another outpouring of emotional arguments on both sides, but the desire of all concerned to keep the Jarring mission alive (from lack of any alternative course) was reflected in efforts to obtain a unanimous resolution dealing strictly with the present incidents, and without touching upon the balanced set of principles given as a mandate to the Swedish diplomat. The large-scale Israeli attack, launched to wipe out bases of terrorist raids in Jordan, was condemned in severe terms in the resolution adopted by the Security Council; but the acts of provocation which had preceded the raid were not ignored completely, being deplored under the label of "violent incidents in violation of the cease-fire." This was the price for the affirmative vote of the United States, a price readily accepted by the Soviet Union, which supports the Arab position up to the point where it threatens a new eruption of armed violence. Nevertheless, the American and Russian representatives immediately after the vote gave diametrically opposed interpretations to the text that they had both approved.

Since the June war, this has become the pattern in UN decisions on the Middle East. Jordan and the U.A.R. go along with the equivocal approach, which is denounced violently by more extremist Arab governments like Algeria, and humorously by the representative of Saudi Arabia, Jamil Baroodi, self-appointed guardian of international morality and candid observer of "Emperor's clothes." (At a recent meeting of the Security Council, after Arthur Goldberg had demonstrated a knowledge of the Russian language, Mr. Baroodi exclaimed: "If the representatives of the United States and the Soviet Union begin to speak Russian to each other, God help us!")

The latest blood-letting has called attention to new and serious problems in the development of Arab terrorist groups and the methods which Israel has chosen to cope with them. There is no doubt that Israeli soldiers discovered on the east bank extensive evidence of para-military activity in locations alleged to be refugee camps or civilian villages, but it is less certain that a full-scale offensive against such bases will stop acts of terrorism and sabotage for any length of time. Much was made in the Council of the patriotic character of "acts of resistance to occupation forces" and the abhorrent nature of official expeditions of reprisal. Some speakers had in mind World War II, some thought of anti-colonial liberation movements, some of Vietnam. These analogies tarnish the moral prestige of Israel. Localized responses to terrorism, on an approximately congruous scale, are more acceptable to the international conscience, and possibly as effective.

Yosef Tekoah, UN representative of Israel, implied that further raids would be met by further reprisals. Such a cycle of violence could hardly add to the security of the Jewish State. Furthermore, a repetition of the armed attack of March 21, while bringing UN sanctions into the realm of possibility, would make it more and more difficult for Jordan and the U.A.R. to move toward peace.

On the other hand, these governments, especially Jordan, cannot avoid the responsibility for and consequences of terrorist organizations they do not sponsor but refuse to disavow or curb, letting guerrilla warfare on a rising scale serve as a substitute for a policy. They must understand that, in the absence of any indication on their part of a readiness to move toward some acceptance of Israel, the latter's policy is bound to be based on force and military occupation as the only instruments available.

ANNE TUCKERMAN

The Great Cleavage

The cries of agony, the recriminations and counter-recriminations that resound through the land, the skipped heartbeats and the eyes looking fearfully over the shoulder—all these are signs of the New Politics. The Old Politics is being torn asunder, and many a politician knows not which way safety lies—or if there is any longer a locus of least danger.

The conflicts are within the parties, even within families. Between fathers and sons bitter contention is to be expected at such a time, but in The Wall Street Journal Alan Otten writes. "It's a commonplace at Washington cocktail parties and dinners to watch an influential Johnson aide or Johnson backer in Congress squirm while his wife blasts away at the President's Vietnam policy—and often at the President himself." And it's only April. What emotions may be expected to boil up as the weather and the campaign grow warmer!

Between the various opposing candidates there will be personal as well as political differences, in which Eugene McCarthy may be expected to play the most gentlemanly role and Lyndon B. Johnson the least. Both Johnson and the Kennedys have long memories; among the latter it goes back to Joseph P. himself, a dangerous and formidable enemy, as many a businessman had occasion to learn. So if you decide against Robert—whoever you are and wherever you may be—be sure that it will be noted and that the memory will still be fresh in 1972, when Kennedy will be only 46. As a hater, Johnson cannot be excelled. While Kennedy is dispassionate in public, the President is a poor dissembler when anger wells within him, as it does these days most of the time. By these two and by their cohorts, arms are being twisted, toe holds applied. And again the pressure is only beginning.

Sectional loyalties are disintegrating. In Texas ■ strong

THE NATION/April 8, 1968

IN THIS ISSUE

April 8, 1968

EDITORIALS

458

ARTICLES

Off and Running

462 What Works for McCarthy

W. David Gardner

464 Kennedy in Disneyland

Phil Kerby

466 Counter Culture Part III
Capsules of Salvation

Theodore Roszak

471 An End to Barter:
New Politics of Conviction

Grant McConnell

BOOKS & THE ARTS

477 Our Literary Anglo-Jewish Cousins

Gerda Charles

478 Bills Past Due

Peter Berek

479 The Relevance of Nietzsche

James Gutmann

480 Fragments of a Verse Play (Translations and Note by William Burford)

Simone Weil

482 People of Sanchez

Philip Darraugh Ortego

483 A Here and Now Hell

Elmer Bendiner

483 The Shower (poem)

Michele Murray

484 Book Marks

484 Theatre

Harold Clurman

485 Films

Robert Hatch

487 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher

JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher

GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor

CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor

PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor

ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor

HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add ■ for Canadian postage; ■ for foreign postage.

Change ■ Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well ■ their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION

Vol. 206

No. 15

candidate is running for Johnson's old Congressional seat under the slogan "Bring Lyndon home." Campuses are divided (but none is for Johnson as far as one can see). Labor is splitting, especially in California. Paul Schrade of Los Angeles, a district director of the 1.5 million-member United Automobile Workers, is the third prominent labor leader in that state to come out against Johnson. He and Gilbert Simonson of the United Packinghouse Workers are for Kennedy; Leonard Levy, a vice president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, is running on a slate pledged to McCarthy.

Money talks, but those who give it often squeal. In Washington, the bite is being put particularly on civil servants of Grade 15 and higher, with salaries ranging from $18,400 up. They are being invited to a $250-a-plate dinner on April 4. Some have always objected; this year the objections are more numerous and more vocal because of the Vietnamese horror. In some cases bargain rates are offered: five officials may pay $50 apiece and share one plate. According to a New York Times report (March 26), one participant in a Maritime Administration meeting quoted the acting administrator of the agency as stressing the usefulness of keeping a "clean file." The administrator denies it.

Money is probably less of a problem for Kennedy than for Johnson, but politically the splits in one camp are matched by splits in the other. Richard Goodwin is still working for McCarthy, Arthur Schlesinger (no surprise) for Kennedy. And some of the Kennedy people in Washington are "loyal to Lyndon"—Orville Freeman, Stewart Udall, Averell Harriman, Nicholas Katzenbach, and of course Dean Rusk, who was trying to sweet-talk Vermont Gov. Phil Hoff into not endorsing Kennedy (Hoff did). And Sargent Shriver is going to Paris, far from the bivouacs along the Potomac. But it is best not to name too many names, for no one knows what the morrow will bring.

Nor are the Republicans united behind Nixon, although their divisions are less noisy. A coalition has been made up to seek alternatives—Hatfield, Percy, Lindsay, besides Rockefeller, who, if he takes a sane stand on Vietnam, may still cut the ground from under Nixon.

Even as recently as St. Valentine's Day, American democracy seemed to be somnolent, but who will say that now? The result no man can predict, but certainly the action should pump some health into the body politic.

The McCarthy Phenomenon

The emergence of Eugene McCarthy as a genuine contender for the Presidency is a once-in-a-lifetime political happening. He entered the contest purely on principle, and said himself that he had no thought of actually wresting the nomination from Johnson. All he proposed to do was to bring the issue of Vietnam before the American people and force a change to a policy befitting a civilized nation.

But the nation, especially some of its younger members, proved to be more civilized than the conduct of the Johnson Administration had led most of us to suspect. It was like drilling a water well, expecting to pump up a few gallons a minute, and hitting a gusher. If Wisconsin follows the lead of New Hampshire, a flood might start which would actually sweep McCarthy into the White House. The odds are against it, but if it happens it will be a tribute to the sagacity and humanity of the American people.

Even if McCarthy loses, the significance of the showing he is sure to make is beyond exaggeration. What he has done is to start the conversion of the old parties, with their spurious appeals to the voters and their dominant interest in the spoils of office, into new national groupings revolving around national values that had been all but forgotten. McCarthy had intuition that this potential remained among a large proportion of the voters, and he had the courage to act on it—almost alone.

In this issue we feature an article by Dr. Grant McConnell that goes into this matter in more detail. The new issues have a "value" aspect that makes them awkward to handle through the old-style "economic" or interest-group type of coalition. Value issues, being essentially moral, cut right across and through all kinds of interest groups, as in the case of labor, part of which is for the war (war means jobs), part against (war means sending sons to die, and for what?). No less important, these new constituencies tend to be national, ignoring regions, sections, localities and even interest-groupings. So McCarthy, aware of this shift, is making an intelligent and conscious appeal to the new national constituencies.

He speaks to these constituencies quietly, sensibly, as if he respected them and expected them to respect him. Part of his base is the approximately 30 per cent of the voters, some independent and some affiliated, who are disenchanted with the leadership of both parties.

Whatever happens between now and the conventions, the McCarthy phenomenon is likely to be regarded in the future as one of those breakthrough campaigns of great interest to political scientists who search for significance amid the ephemera. He is doing, in a new way consonant with the changing times, what Al Smith did in 1928. Smith lost, but the coalition he put together sent Roosevelt to Washington and kept the country from falling apart. We are now witnessing another breakthrough—it had better succeed.

Put Spain on the Agenda Now

One factor that cripples democratic politics is that the mass media live exclusively in the present, exaggerating the salable triviality of the moment beyond all bounds of taste or reason. Consider the British import, Twiggy.

When it comes to serious matters, the opposite policy is followed. In 1953, we made a "defense pact" with Spain rather than a treaty, since the latter would have required Senate ratification. Under this pact we built four major bases, spent billions of dollars, made the Falange's position impregnable for the time being, created a pleasant life for our embassy people in Madrid, and buttered up Franco with ceremonial visits from Dean Rusk, Adlai Stevenson and other statesmen of note. The pact ran for ten years and was duly extended in 1963 for another five. It comes up for renewal or reconsideration in September of this year. From reading the newspapers or newsmagazines, who would know it? Presumably State Department officials at the appropriate desks are gravely weighing the pros and cons, but as far as the media are concerned, the expiring pact does not exist. As one consequence, public opinion on the subject does not exist either, except among the Veterans of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade, the Committee for a Democratic Spain, and a few other interested parties who, precisely because of their interest, are regarded with suspicion by ignorant Americans.

The September date should now be put on Senators' calendar pads, and the Foreign Relations Committee should be preparing to hold hearings on the matter. At home Franco is politically weaker than ever before; he may live another five years, but it is better than an even bet that within that period he will be politically dead. His troubles increase with every passing day. The ordinary Spaniard, who is possibly less afraid of death than the man of any other nationality, is speaking up louder and louder; legal defense in political cases is becoming bolder; elements of the Roman Catholic Church are in open rebellion. The whole Franco edifice is shaky, and what are our molders of public opinion doing about it?

The fraud of "nonintervention," underwritten by France, Britain and the United States, sealed the fate of the Spanish Loyalists and brought on World War II. Franco thereupon aligned himself—covertly at least—on Hitler's side. We no longer need the bases (if we ever did need them). After the H-bomb crash at Thule, and the loss of four similar bombs off Spain two years ago, the Pentagon is finally coming around to the view that the airborne alert is useless. If, despite these conditions and purely on the basis of obsessional "anti-communism," we give Franco another lease on life, and predictably at a higher price this time than last, we shall have proved that we are the world's greatest political suckers.

The Farce of the Year

By a vote of sixty-seven to one, with thirty-two abstaining, the Senate has finally adopted a code of ethics for its members, and for Senate employees earning more than $15,000 a year. The single Nay vote was cast by Senator Aiken, who has a low tolerance for eyewash. He felt—and the terms of the resolution bear him out—that the code gives the impression of dealing with a problem that has bothered the Senate for a long time, but actually does no more than cover it up. After the Dodd affair, and by comparison with the tough talk when the ethics investigation was first projected, the outcome is ludicrous.

In some respects the situation is worse than it was before the resolution was adopted. Part of the problem was—and still is—that certain "gray areas" call for clarification. Many of these borderline activities have never been problems to the more scrupulous members of the body; they just didn't do such things. For example, should members of a Senator's staff—employees paid by the public—be used for campaign purposes, particularly for money raising in connection with campaigns? Many Senators regarded this as improper; for one thing it gives an unfair advantage to a Senator running for re-election against an outsider contesting his seat. But now the Senate has given its approval to the practice by declaring that if a Senator's employee makes $10,000 a year or more he may participate in such activities. In other words, the key people may pitch in; only stenographers and such are barred.

Another point concerns the collection of money for non-campaign purposes. This has often presented more of a problem than campaign expenses per se, especially when such contributions come from lobbyists. Yet now the Senate has opened the door wide by stipulating that such panhandling is perfectly in order, as long as the contributions are used to defray travel expenses, TV appearances, printing and mailing of speeches, newsletters and reports to constituents (actually a form of electioneering), telephone, telegraph, postage, subscriptions, etc., in excess of official allowances. But for what other purposes could the Senator use such contributions legitimately? Presumably he is not given the money to buy roses and perfume for female members of his staff, or bonded bourbon for visiting constituents. In these respects the resolution actually lowers the existing informal or implied standard, enabling a Senator to do with assurance what was previously regarded as somewhat dubious if not downright improper.

What the resolution says about Senate staff "moonlighting" is probably as effective as can be expected, but this relates back to the Bobby Baker case, on which the Senate was substantially united from the start (how could it be otherwise?). But taking it in its entirety, about all that can be said for this enactment is that it is a first, small, timid, ineffectual step. The view that any straw should be grasped was what impelled Sen. Joseph S. Clark and other strong proponents of tough ethical standards to vote for it. Some felt the requirement that each Senator must file a copy of his income tax return and certain other data with the Controller General may have an inhibiting effect, despite the fact that the tax return may leave much to be desired on the score of disclosure, and that the documents will be held in a sealed envelope, to be examined only on a majority vote of the ethics committee. Such examinations, we may be sure, will be rare.

A Faculty Speaks

Bowdoin College's contribution of distinguished citizens to American life goes quite far back into the past—forgotten President Franklin Pierce, Hawthorne and Longfellow (both of the class of 1825), Gen. Joshua Chamberlain (hero of Little Round Top), explorer Robert Peary. The college abides peaceably amid the pine forests of Maine, a few miles from Winslow Homer's ocean. Last week, however—perhaps remembering that Uncle Tom's Cabin had been written by a Bowdoin professor's wife—more than 50 per cent of the Bowdoin faculty signed a statement pledging "support to those of our students who nonviolently resist a war which repels their consciences and ours."

The statement was not merely a product of "young faculty militants"; eleven full professors signed it. And while several colleges and universities have issued declarations of amnesty to students jailed as draft resisters, the Bowdoin group becomes the first faculty majority willing to risk prosecution for its moral support of students trapped in the dilemma which the Johnson Administration has created for them.

OFF AND RUNNING

What Works for McCarthy

W. DAVID GARDNER

Mr. Gardner is a Massachusetts newspaper man and freelance writer.

Boston

One reason why Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy selected Worcester for his first major address in the Massachusetts primary campaign was that Joseph C. Casdin, the city's Mayor, had publicly endorsed him. At that time in February almost no one gave McCarthy a chance of winning Massachusetts' seventy-two delegates to the Democratic convention, and reporters covering the Worcester trip—well versed in the Bay State's Byzantine politics—speculated as to the Mayor's game. On the local level, to support Senator McCarthy in conservative Worcester was tantamount to committing political suicide. On the state level, Mayor Casdin was clearly defying the State Democratic Committee. And on the national level, backing Senator McCarthy would not help Worcester to obtain the federal favors that the city desperately needs.

On being questioned, Casdin said he was supporting Senator McCarthy as a "matter of conscience." When politicians make that sort of remark, reporters turn cynical—at least, they do so in Massachusetts where the typical politician, if he has a conscience at all, seldom follows it. Nevertheless, the reporters tended to accept the Mayor's explanation, because they could imagine no other. Casdin had nothing to gain and everything to lose.

In many ways, the people like Mayor Casdin who support Senator McCarthy's anti-war campaign in Massachusetts are even more interesting than the Senator himself. When McCarthy captured the Massachusetts delegation after President Johnson declined to enter his own name or to back a stand-in candidate, enthusiasm for McCarthy had been expected to peter out from lack of opposition and a clean contest. Exactly the opposite is happening. Senator McCarthy's supporters are more determined than ever, forming committees, sponsoring rallies, throwing art shows, canvassing voters door to door with increased vigor throughout the state. Indeed, they are working out their anti-war aggressions in activity that looks as much like therapy as campaign work.

McCarthy and his aides, coming from sparsely populated New Hampshire, were clearly surprised by the size of the Massachusetts crowds the Senator drew. At an afternoon rally in the Sidney Hill Country Club in suburban Boston, for instance, the Senator attracted some 2,000 persons. The great majority of them were suburban, middle-class housewives, many of whom had to hire baby sitters. A similar middle-class audience of 1,500 came to hear Senator McCarthy speak at Holy Cross College in Worcester. At both Holy Cross and the country club, the audiences were openly sympathetic to the Senator and his views against the war. The audiences responded to his now famous "low-key" style in a low-key manner—polite but firm applause without cheering and whistling.

McCarthy's most vocal support is centered in the state's colleges, among both students and faculty. An indication of the depth of this anti-war sentiment occurred at Smith, where more than one-half the 2,300-member student body went on a liquid-diet fast to demonstrate anti-war sentiment there. A leader of the fast at this women's college said its purpose was "to dispel the conception of dissenters as self-interested draft protesters."

The President's refusal to run himself or to sponsor a stand-in candidate in the primary offended many students. Several of them phrase their feeling as follows: The Administration complains that many student demonstrations and anti-draft activities are unpatriotic and illegal. The students, however, now feel that they have no other recourse since the President turned his back on the democratic process when he ducked the primary.

"No large number of people has moved across the line into active opposition to the war," McCarthy said in Massachusetts, "but I think people are moving much closer to that line, to a point where they could become outspoken against the war."

That statement is a leitmotif that runs through the Senator's campaign, and the middle-class make-up of his Massachusetts supporters indicates that he may be right—than anti-war sentiment in the state has moved from the professional radicals and is now entrenched in broad segments of the population. In a recent referendum on the war in Concord, Mass., a conservative Republican town, nearly 40 per cent of the voters opposed the war. There are more than 150 active McCarthy for President Committees in communities across the state and his aides in Boston say that the only communities that aren't now covered by their own committees or by regional committees are small communities in remote areas.

The Cape Ann Regional McCarthy for President Committee is typical of the committees around the state. Beginning with a handful of persons in Gloucester in early February, it has grown to cover a cluster of cities and towns in the North Shore area of Metropolitan Boston. The towns with well-established McCarthy for President Committees send organizers into towns where the going has been slow. Joseph E. Garland, chairman of the Regional Committee, says there are no political professionals involved in the regional effort. Garland himself, a writer has never before been active in politics.

Hatred of the war is what holds all the volunteers together and there have been surprises among the people who have come into the group (William Bundy's sister-in-law is active in the campaign in one town; a woman from the South who likes George Wallace is so strongly opposed to the war that she is campaigning for Mc arthy). It is impossible to type the volunteers—they come from different professional, ethnic and religious backgrounds. Youth is represented by a group of Brandeis students, who campaigned in New Hampshire. They are canvassing voters in a door-to-door drive and are bringing more “student power” from other campuses. On the other hand, a few volunteer workers are more than 70 years old.

The volunteer workers also cut across party lines. Some come from Republican backgrounds and admire Nelson Rockefeller, rightly or wrongly assuming that he will eventually take a dovish stand. As for Robert Kennedy, most had originally looked to him to lead the charge against the president and the war. When he at first balked at entering the primaries, they turned to McCarthy and now there is some resentment against the New York Senator and the Massachusetts politicians who remained aloof in the early days. Nevertheless, since most McCarthy supporters originally favored Kennedy, and since the war issue outweighs all other considerations, it seems likely that most McCarthy people in Massachusetts would be able to support Senator Kennedy if it comes to that.

Both the state and local McCarthy groups suffer somewhat from the absence of professional politicians. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, the Democratic Party leader in Massachusetts, was at first committed to neutrality in the primary, and most of the political professionals followed his lead. In addition, Paul G. Counihan, McCarthy's state campaign manager, observes that professional politicians seldom get involved in a political venture unless there are spoils to be divided among the victors. There are not likely to be any spoils in the McCarthy campaign. Lacking professional experience, some of the local McCarthy groups have been floundering. They are poorly financed; few have headquarters or public meeting places; they have no patronage to offer; many lack direction; some are little more than anti-war forums. But the important thing is that there are so many of them.

The dearth of professionals tells on the state level, too. Political naiveté runs through the organization. One handbook prepared by the state headquarters, for instance, discusses at great length the best methods of conducting successful cocktail parties, coffee meetings and cheese parties. (A helpful suggestion for throwing a cocktail party: “You should make sure that someone who really knows how to mix drinks is in charge of the bar and that you order enough ice.”) Tucked away in the back of the handbook, almost as an afterthought, is a section explaining how to register voters.

Robert Kennedy's advice to his supporters to assist McCarthy means that political professionals are suddenly available in Massachusetts, but the McCarthy campaigners feel now that they don't need them and are continuing along as they would have done if Robert Kennedy had stayed out of the race.

State campaign manager Paul Counihan and Stephen Boulton, executive director of the campaign, have been struggling to weld the community committees and the state headquarters into a political machine. They are confident that as his campaign picks up momentum, the efficiency of the organization will improve on all levels. There could be a problem here: as McCarthy picks up steam, he may find it more difficult to work out an amicable arrangement with Robert Kennedy.

Albany Times-Union (Ben Roth)

"Tell Me Again, Harry, About Those 1948 Polls"

The press has been an important factor in McCarthy's campaign. His exposure has been particularly good in Massachusetts, partly because of his campaigning in the Bay State and partly because the Boston television stations have sizable audiences in New Hampshire and devoted a great deal of time to his campaign there. His measured, low-key style wears well on television, particularly when he gets repeated exposure. He gets along with reporters, with whom he is candid and honest. He is accessible, mixes easily with the writers, and handles the inevitable inane question with aplomb. He obviously does not suffer from the press paranoia that plagues some of the other candidates.

McCarthy's often irreverent wit helps him. When he spoke at Holy Cross College, he compared the Johnson Administration with the Vatican, observing that he often detected "a hint of infallibility now and then in the Administration." He noted that the White House and the Defense Department often brought up the issue of heresy. "The real warning signal," he added, "will be when everyone in Washington begins speaking in Latin."

The largely Catholic audience roared and, in a way, the incident illustrated the changes that have been moving through the Catholic population in Massachusetts. A few years ago, such joking would have been thought near blasphemy in a state where old-line Irish politicians have been known to destroy other men's political futures by spreading the word that they had been seen eating meat on Fridays.

Among the Catholic voters of Massachusetts politicians are still often measured by the degree of their anti-Communist militancy. The Catholic population remains generally conservative on the Vietnam issue, but it has grown more relaxed about the Communist bugaboo. At Holy Cross, most of the faculty is against the war, although the editors of the student newspaper think that a majority of the students still support it. Nevertheless, some fifty students and faculty are working in a McCarthy for President Committee. The conservative militants on campus are working for George Wallace. There is no Johnson for President committee, despite the fact that Holy Cross's most powerful and influential graduate is Joseph Califano, President Johnson's top aide.

While it is interesting to see who supports McCarthy in Massachusetts, it is equally interesting to see who does not support him. Many of the militant New Left groups in the Boston area are dissatisfied with his moderate proposals to de-escalate the war. Thus, most draft-card burners, militant student groups and professional radicals are not supporting him. Most SDS chapters in the Boston area are opposed to McCarthy.

"We don't have much support from organized labor," McCarthy said in Massachusetts. The comment was an understatement. When President Johnson decided to avoid the Massachusetts primary, Salvatore Camelio, president of the State AFL-CIO, withdrew from the state delegation in protest over McCarthy's capture of the delegation. Three other state labor leaders likewise pulled out. Reports circulated that George Meany, a loyal Johnson man, had talked to the state labor leaders before they withdrew.

Also resigning from the delegation was House Speaker John W. McCormack. The speaker comes from a "safe" district in Boston and, while there had been some talk of his running as the President's stand-in, his chances of winning a state-wide race were remote. A defeat in the primary would have certainly stepped up the efforts already under way in Congress to replace the 78-year-old speaker.

Another who withdrew from the delegation was state Senate Pres. Maurice A. Donahue, whose gubernatorial aspirations would have received a tremendous boost if he could have gotten his name on the ballot as Johnson stand-in. Actually, Donahue had been approved for the role of ghost, and he had dusted off his favorite hawk speech. At the last minute, however, the President withdrew his support. Donahue then pulled out from the delegation, saying: "It would be senseless to engage in a campaign where there really is no contest." He neglected to mention that he faced a stiff primary fight in his home district. His opponent was John Fitzgerald, a young and attractive anti-war candidate who was wounded and decorated for bravery in Vietnam.

Most vociferous of all was state Sen. Joseph E. Ward of Fitchburg, who threatened to go to the Democratic convention and vote for President Johnson as "an act of civil disobedience," although the entire delegation would be committed by law to vote for McCarthy. When the deadline for withdrawing from the delegation came, however, Senator Ward quietly took his name off the ballot. He, too, faced a stiff fight in his home district. He was just one of scores of Democratic politicians who were left holding the bag when Johnson decided to avoid the primary. Many feel they were abandoned by the President.

In turn, the President must have felt abandoned by Sen. Edward Kennedy, who declined to run as a stand-in. The irony for Senator Kennedy now is that he supported the legislation that established the Presidential primary in the first place. This had been enacted with the idea of sewing up the entire Bay State delegation for Robert Kennedy.

Kennedy in Disneyland

PHIL KERBY

Los Angeles

Robert Kennedy's first campaign foray into California over the weekend of March 23 was an immense success. This was conceded in all quarters, and he left the state amid serious speculation by political leaders that he may indeed break the eighty-four-year-old dictum that an incumbent President cannot be toppled by his own party.

From the time he landed in San Francisco and swept through a series of appearances between there and Los Angeles, Kennedy was greeted by large and frenzied crowds. At the San Francisco airport, police had difficulty controlling a thousand people who surged around the Senator, and the scene was repeated the next day at the International Airport in Los Angeles, where several persons were knocked down in the rush toward Kennedy. His caravan required two hours to travel from the airport to the Old Plaza in downtown Los Angeles, where he spoke to a predominantly Mexican-American crowd of 5,000. Traffic was stalled in all directions leading to the Greek Theatre in Griffith Park, where Kennedy made his third appearance of the day in Los Angeles. Six thousand people crowded into the 4,500-seat outdoor arena, with an estimated 3,000 more outside; next day he drew a cheering crowd that police estimated at 20,000 at a State College campus in Los Angeles. It was here that Kennedy said, in answer to a question, that he would not reopen the Warren Commission investigation into his brother's assassination, if he were elected President. Later a wildly cheering audience of 5,000 Negroes jammed an intersection in the Watts ghetto to hear him speak.

On his California swing, Kennedy's theme was crisp and clear: close the gap between white and black, between rich and poor, between young and old—and end the war in Vietnam. As he entered the Central Valley, Kennedy said: "It is indecent for a man to have to work with his hands and with his back in the valleys of California with no hope of sending his sons to college."

Kennedy's ability to attract crowds and to stir them to sustained peaks of enthusiasm was evident at every appearance he made in California, but there were pockets of dissent. A small number of supporters of Sen. Eugene McCarthy met him at the Los Angeles airport, bearing placards reading "Stay clean with Gene," and he was heckled briefly by a cluster of the right-wing Young Ame-ans for Freedom. At the San Francisco airport, a few Peace and Freedom Party members distributed leaflets describing Kennedy as a synthetic peace candidate. Peace and Freedom leaders fear that many of their party's members under the magic age of 30 will in this time of defection, defect to Kennedy.

The Senator from New York predicted that if he wins the June 4th primary in California, capturing the state's 72 national convention delegates, "we will win in Chicago and we will in November." California Assembly speaker Jesse H. Unruh, who is directing Kennedy's California campaign, is confident that he can outrun both McCarthy and Johnson in the state, even though the two senators will divide the peace vote. And a decisive Kennedy win here would weaken the already shaky allegiance of party leaders to President Johnson across the country. The day Kennedy arrived in Los Angeles the latest Gallup poll reported that he was the choice of 44 per cent of the nation's Democrats for the Presidential nomination, with Johnson lagging four points behind. This deepened the pessimism that besets party regulars in the state.

Macpherson, Toronto Star

Kennedy came to California during a period of psychedelic confusion in the state's Democratic Party. A day earlier, Mayor Samuel W. Yorty of Los Angeles, just back from a New York chat with Richard Nixon, announced that he would not seek the Democratic nomination for the United States Senate. Yorty, who from his strategic post in Los Angeles has been urging an escalation of the war in Vietnam, offered a curious reason for his decision: "I want to tell the American people the truth about the peril to this country," he said. "I think as Mayor of the city of Los Angeles I can do it better than I can as a candidate."

Pro-Johnson (although the President is not sufficiently hawkish to suit the Mayor), but still more pro-Nixon, Yorty, who endorsed Nixon over John F. Kennedy in 1960, will likely support him again if he is nominated.

Yorty may foresee that a Nixon administration would call him to higher duty, and this may explain the unsolicited advice he has been giving Gov. Ronald Reagan. Yorty coupled his decision not to run with a statement urging Reagan to forget his Presidential aspirations, to concern himself solely with state problems and to promptly endorse Nixon. (Yorty has brushed aside similar advice in the past. One Los Angeles city councilman told him that "he had made a great mistake" when "he decided to concentrate his efforts on the problems of Southeast Asia rather than upon those of the city of Los Angeles.")

The Mayor and the Governor are friends, but not friendly enough for Reagan to suppress his own ambitions in deference to Yorty's presumed ambitions. Reagan, who is convinced that anything is possible in a country in which he could be elected governor of the largest state, has looked upon himself as the ideal compromise candidate to break a Nixon-Rockefeller deadlock in Miami. When Rockefeller made his unexpected contribution to this season of spectacular political surprises by refusing to enter the primaries, Reagan had to reassess his strategy. At this point, helping Nixon is not part of the Governor's reassessment.

Robert Kennedy's candidacy has produced no signs of unseemly defection in the McCarthy campaign. McCarthy's quiet manner, his avoidance of bombast and his obvious courage have evoked a protective loyalty from those around him. His attraction to California liberals is similar to the feeling that Adlai Stevenson aroused and for much the same reasons.

The same cannot be said of the stand-in Johnson slate led by Atty. Gen. Thomas C. Lynch. Many delegates who were loyalist before Kennedy took off are redefining the term to conform with their new political visions. State Sen. Al Song, Southern California Democratic party chairman, is on the pro-Johnson delegation, but he has announced he will work for Kennedy. Mrs. Song and the wives of four other state legislators on the Lynch slate have joined the New Yorker's delegation. Former Gov. Edmund G. Brown, who is supporting the President, concedes that ten to fifteen members of the Lynch delegation will switch to Kennedy if a bill to permit this, now pending, is passed by the legislature. The defections may be much greater than he anticipates.

The California Democratic Council, with 25,000 to 30,000 activists, is the main force behind McCarthy in the state. The CDC put together an anti-Johnson peace slate before McCarthy announced, and then adopted him to lead it into the June primary. Two former presidents of the CDC are supporting Kennedy. Alan Cranston, founding president of the organization, resigned from CDC two years ago when Simon Casady, then CDC president, publicly attacked the war and Johnson. Cranston, running for the Democratic nomination for the U.S. Senate, has now come out against the war, but he will not take sides in the primary battle among Johnson, Kennedy and McCarthy. Cranston said, "I respect what all three are doing." As the weeks roll on, the mood in California is likely to heat up a good bit beyond that tone of bland amiability.

Capsules of Salvation

THEODORE ROSZAK

Mr. Roszak, an associate professor of history, is chairman of the History of Western Culture Program at California State College, Hayward. He edited and contributed to The Dissenting Academy (Pantheon Books).

At the bohemian fringe of the disaffected youth culture, all roads lead to dope. The drug experience emerges persistently as the common denominator of the many protean forms this counter culture has assumed over the past decade or so. Correctly understood (which it seldom is), the drug experience participates significantly in youth's radical rejection of the parental society. Yet the frantic search for a narcotic nirvana can destroy many of the young, as well as all that is most valuable in their rebellion.

If one accepts the proposition that the counter culture is, essentially, an exploration of the politics of the nervous system, then drugs fall into place as one, but only one, possible way to conduct that exploration. It becomes a limited chemical means to a greater psychic end: the reformulation of the personality upon which social ideology and culture generally are ultimately based.

That was the spirit in which, at the turn of the century, figures like William James and Havelock Ellis experimented with hallucinogenic agents. The prospectus of these early experimenters—James using nitrous oxide and Ellis the newly discovered peyote (on which James was able to achieve only stomach cramps)—was highly enthusiastic with respect to the cultural possibilities that might flow from an investigation of hallucinatory experience. Ellis, reporting to the Smithsonian Institution in 1898 on his introduction to the "saturnalia for the specific senses," observed that:

If it should ever chance that the consumption of mescal becomes a habit, the favorite poet of the mescal drinker will certainly be Wordsworth. Not only the general attitude of Wordsworth, but many of his most memorable poems and phrases cannot—one is almost tempted to say—be appreciated in their full significance by one who has never been under the influence of mescal. On all these grounds it may be claimed that the artificial paradise of mescal, though less seductive, is safe and dignified beyond its peers.

James, who, as a pragmatist philosopher and behavioral psychologist, had a vested interest in the standard academic forms of cerebration, was even more candid in hailing the importance of the nonintellectual powers he had not only tapped directly through narcotics but had surveyed extensively in his ground-breaking study, The Varieties of Religious Experience:

... our normal waking consciousness, rational consciousness as we call it, is but one special type of consciousness; whilst all about it, parted from it by the filmiest of screens, there lie potential forms of consciousness entirely different. ... No account of the universe in its totality can be final which leaves these other forms of consciousness quite disregarded. ... They forbid a premature closing of our accounts with reality.

When, some fifty years later, Aldous Huxley and Aldous Watts undertook psychedelic experiments that were destined to have far greater social influence than those of Ellis and James, the investigations were still characterized by the same controlled samplings and restrained observations. Once again, the object was to gain a new, internal perspective on certain modes of consciousness and religious traditions that a narrowly positivist science has swept into an outsized pigeonhole labeled "mysticism"—meaning "incomprehensible," "meaningless."

The proposition that Ellis and James, Watts and Huxley were testing has always seemed to me wholly sensible. The province of science is the disciplined examination of human experience, then abnormal (or transnormal) states of consciousness must also constitute a field of scientific study. As James had contended, the mystics, by relating their insights to direct personal experience, would seem to qualify as rigorous empiricists. Why then should their experience and the knowledge that appears to flow from it be screened out by science as somehow illegitimate? Is perhaps the case that the mystics, in accepting the fullness of human experience, have been more truly scientific than the conventional scientist, who arbitrarily declares that only a limited range of consciousness deserves attention? Such a prejudice would seem all the more untenable now that artificial chemical agents provide discriminate access to these transnormal forms of consciousness. Why should they not be used as a kind of psychic depth charge with which to open up courses of perception that, given the entrenched cerebral habits of Western intelligence, have become severely log-jammed?

I doubt that anyone could have predicted what a wretched aftermath these pioneering experiments were to have. It is only by hindsight that we are now in a position to comment caustically upon them. But it is easy enough to see what went wrong.

Both Huxley and Watts drew the analogy between drugs and such exploratory devices as the microscope. The hallucinogens were to function as a lens through which the shadowy layers of consciousness could be studied. But the microscope in the hands of a child or the laboratory janitor provides nothing but a kind of barbarous and superficial fascination. Drugs can perhaps be made to yield significant knowledge at the command of a mature and cultivated mind, but the experience has, all of a sudden, been laid hold of by a generation of youngsters who are pathetically acultural and who have brought nothing to the experiment but a vacuous yearning. In adolescent rebellion, they have thrown out the corrupted culture of their elders and, along with that soiled bath water, the very body of the Western heritage. At best they do so in favor of exotic traditions they only marginally understand; at worst, in favor of an introspective chaos in which the seventeen or eighteen years of their own unformed life float like atoms in a void.

Some minds are too small and too young for such psychic adventures, and the failure to recognize this fact is the beginning of disaster. There is nothing whatever in common between a man of Huxley's experience and intellectual discipline sampling mescaline, and a 15-year-old tripper whiffing airplane glue until his brain turns to oatmeal. The prospect held forth by drug experimentation—that of consciousness expansion—has proved abortive at the level of disaffiliated adolescence. Dropped into amorphous and alienated personalities, dope has precisely the reverse effect: it diminishes consciousness by way of fixation. The whole of life comes to center despotically on one act, one mode of experience. Whether or not pot, acid and speed are addictive remains moot—largely because of the ambiguity of the term “addiction.” Are fingernails addictive? We all know people who bite them constantly and compulsively. Is chess addictive? There are players who will go without food or drink rather than abandon the board. Is Julie Andrews addictive? In London there is a lady who, incredibly, has seen every performance of The Sound of Music.

The Drug Life

What is obvious is that the drugs are a hangup which too many of the young can't shake. It is not that they have all become hopheads; it is rather that, at the bohemian fringe, they are trying strenuously to inflate dope to the size of an entire culture. The vice is typically American: start with a gimmick; end with a Weltanschauung. Madison Avenue's strategy of strategies: don't just sell them a new can opener; sell them a new way of life.

Here follows an example of how the dimensions of “expanded consciousness” envelop the hippest versions of the underground press. (In this case, an issue of the Southern California Oracle—but the point could be made with any number of other underground journals.) The art throughout is officially psychedelic: melting, soft-edged, bejeweled . . . not good but official. The lead article is an interview with Timothy Leary, on the topic (what else?) of LSD. The substance is slight and the ideas are garbled, but the tone is pontifical and the piece strings together all the right slogans.

Comes next a feature by a local “philosopher-ecologist” who has permitted the Oracle “to plug a tape recorder into his frontal lobe for a view of paradise as he perceives it.” It begins, “When I turned on once in Yosemite with 250 micrograms of acid. . . .” Then another interview, this time with a rock star (again, “a tape-recorded probe of his lobes”) about “How I Get High.” Next, the first of a new series on “Ecstatic Living” which is described as “insights gleaned from a three-year creativity study conducted in Mexico under the sponsorship of Sandoz Company, makers of LSD-25”—which is in about the same category as research in international relations under the sponsorship of the CIA. The subtitle is “Your Ecstatic Home—cheap ways of changing your home to reflect the changes in your consciousness.” It advises:

Everyone should invest in a little electric motor of the kind that revolves things from the ceiling. Then you can take a large tin can and puncture it with holes and cause it to revolve around a light bulb . . . it shines little bits of starlight all over the room. In addition . . . we might also have a little revolving stage of the kind you see in jewelry store windows. . . . Cover this with any visionary object. For a list of visionary objects, you can read Huxley's classic The Doors of Perception.

The science department reports on how not to catch hepatitis—a disease widespread among users of speed. (It comes from contaminated needles.) The tone of this piece is hip-avuncular:

. . . doing your thing doesn't have to include dumping bad Karma on your soul-brothers. Don't touch food or drink or prepare it, without first thoroughly washing your hands, especially if you've just been to the john. . . . You can even afford to get up tight about it, especially if your home is of the tribal kind.

My pretribal father used to phrase this piece of folk wisdom as “You wash up before you sit down at this table!” But I remember being about 5 years old at the time.

The issue closes with recommended reading (“books to expand your consciousness”), a page of ads for psychedelic posters, and an Art Nouveau back page of boy and girl in sexual congress below a curvaceous “LOVE.”

The letters columns of the underground weeklies are cluttered with new narcotic brews, some of them blood-curdling. Editorials blow up narcotics laws and the dodging police into the alpha and omega of politics. The advertising betrays the fact that the journals have grown progressively more dependent on a local hip economy, most of whose wares—clothing, light shows, rock music and its clubs, posters, electronic strobes, jewelry, buttons, bells, beads, black-light glasses, dope pipes and assorted “head equipment”—are designed to be perceived through a narcotic haze, or at any rate go a long way toward glamorizing dope, deepening the fascination or the need.

“Decadent” is the word used to describe such fastidious immersion in a single small idea and all its most trivial ramifications, such precious efforts to make the marginal part stand for the whole of culture. And decadence, unhappily, is the quality that a substantial segment of the youth culture is currently assuming.

Crime and Sanctity

If the narcotics hangup were no more than the symptom of cultural impoverishment, things would be bad enough. But one must complete the grim picture by adding the sweaty, often vicious and, in a few instances, even murderous relationships that inevitably grow up around any illegal trade. Money is still what it takes to survive in an urban environment, even if one is only eking out a subsistence. And dope, with its subsidiary merchandise, is what brings the money into the East Village and Haight-Ashbury. In a perceptive series on the Haight-Ashbury dope commerce written for The Washington Post (October 15 to 29, 1967), Nicholas Von Hoffman was forced to the unhappy conclusion that, whatever else they may take themselves to be, the hippies constitute “the biggest crime story since prohibition.” The account he has to offer is far from pretty. Even if the majority of flower children manage to steer clear of the most cynical and criminal aspects of the trade, their communities have nevertheless become a market increasingly dominated by entrepreneurial interests that have about as much concern for expanding consciousness as Al Capone had for arranging Dionysian festivals.

To be sure, the authorities with their single-minded determination to treat narcotics as a police problem, and the mass media with their incorrigible taste for simplification and sensation, are both to blame for turning the psychedelic curiosity of the young into ugly and furtive channels. But the young bear a primary responsibility for letting themselves be trapped in the vicious ambience that the dominant society has created. On their own terms, they are old enough to know better than to let themselves be driven into the same bag with drug merchandisers who are only the criminal caricature of the American business ethos, and who will scarcely be reformed by being given docile new populations to exploit.

Beyond this, it is no easy matter to pin the blame for the narcotics obsession. Dope has been touted, in the post-war period, since the days of the San Francisco beats, and by now the number of those who have added to its luster is legion. Still one figure—Timothy Leary—does stand out especially as the promoter, apologist and high priest of dope. When one asks how far dope can conceivably be pushed toward becoming a total and autonomous culture, Leary emerges as the chief strategist of that lamentable campaign.

Word has it that, as of the last six months or so, Leary no longer enjoys the highest repute among the hip young. Where fashions, jargon and personalities are concerned, the youth scene is as fickle as the garment trade—though who, besides the mass media, determines these comings and goings of favor is a mystery. Perhaps, it is in beat-hip bohemia as in show business: too much exposure hurts. And Leary, over the past two years, has invited lethal amounts of exposure, far more than he could service with his limited repertory of ideas.

Moreover, there has been more than a touch of fraudulence (though perhaps self-convinced fraudulence) about Leary in recent years. In December, 1965, still more the off-beat academic psychologist than the full-blown swami, Leary was caught smuggling 2 ounces of marijuana across the Mexican border. The sentence which still hangs over him for this innocuous transgression is absurdly severe: thirty years imprisonment and a $30,000 fine. With his academic career already washed up (he had been fired by Harvard in 1963) one can perhaps hardly blame Leary for grasping at the best legal straw available to him, namely, to draw the protective cloak of religious freedom over his inept violation of the narcotics law. Such interpretation of Leary's recent behavior may be too cynical, but the fact remains that, while he has been a much publicized pioneer in the field of psychedelic research for some five or six years, it is only since his arrest in 1965 that he has blossomed forth in any public way as a self-proclaimed "visionary prophet." The first "psychedelic celebration" of his League for Spiritual Discovery was held in September, 1966, within six months of the time when his lawyer proposed that Leary's narcotics conviction be reversed as a violation of religious freedom.

But even if Leary's psychedelic cult began as a legal gambit, it need not be contemptuously dismissed. Psychiatry recognizes a condition of mind called Ganser's syndrome—or the syndrome of approximate answers. It describes the behavior of people who seem to be faking insanity, but faking it so well that they eventually take on their insane role for keeps. In a sense, they calculatedly drive themselves mad. In Leary's case, "madness" has assumed the mantle of the divine, but it seems to involve the same process of systematically losing oneself in an eccentric identity. Whatever the explanation for the recent turn in Leary's career, the change has been of great significance for the development of our youth culture. For it is Leary who has managed to embed the younger generation's psychedelic fascination solidly in a religious context. The connection which far more gifted minds had discovered between the drug experience and visionary religion is finally being retailed by Leary to masses of teen-agers and college students.

Revolution through Nirvana

There is no way to tell whether Leary has turned on more boys and girls than novelist Ken Kesey, creator of the "acid test" during the early sixties. Both can claim a notorious success at the specialty act of organizing mass, public "trips." But Kesey's sessions were mainly fun and games: LSD served up in a heady brew of amplified rock bands, strobe lights, and free-form dance. The intention was, at best, aesthetic. Leary, on the other hand, preferred to come on during his LSD camp meetings with all the solemnity of the risen Christ, complete with white cotton pajamas, incense and the stigmata of his legal persecutions—though light and sound effects were still part of the act. (So were high admission prices: up to $4 per seat.) Doubtless the psychedelic fascination would have spread among the young, though more slowly, without the proselytizing of Kesey and Leary. But Leary, appearing at just the ripe moment and gaining access to thousands of adolescents, has been the figure primarily responsible for impressing upon vast numbers of young and somewhat addled minds (which do not easily hold more than one idea at a time) the primer-simple notion that LSD has "something" to do with religion. And it is that notion—even if imperfectly grasped—which makes the narcotics hangup of the young a great deal more than another naughty vice.

When the flaming youth of the twenties took heavily to bootleg liquor, it was in no position to reach for metaphysics to legitimize its bad habits. For the contemporary young, however, dope carries the justification of esoteric wisdom, and they defend its uses with pious fervor. Leary has taught them that getting turned on is the sacred rite of a new age. They know, if only vaguely, that somewhere behind the forbidden experience lie rich and exotic religious traditions, occult powers, salvation—which, of course, the adult society fails to understand, and indeed fears. By way of a mystic religiosity, Leary has succeeded in convincing vast numbers of the young that dope is "a sacrament that will put you in touch with the ancient 2-million-year-old wisdom inside you," that will help you "get back in tune with God's harmony," that will free you "to go on to the next stage, which is the evolutionary timelessness, the ancient reincarnation thing that we always carry inside."

But the promise of nirvana is not all. LSD also moves in mysterious ways to achieve the social revolution. When Leary is criticized, as he frequently is, for preaching political quietism, his critics are told that they overlook the fact that his pitch to the young makes ambitious political claims:

The last few years I've been advising everyone to become an ecstatic saint. If you become an ecstatic saint, you then become a social force. . . . The key to the psychedelic movement, the key to what's going on with the young people today, is individual freedom Liberals and left-wing people, Marxists, are opposed to this individual pursuit. . . . They're attempting to wash out these seed-nific energies. We do go into action on the political or social chessboard to defend our individual internal freedom. . . . We're trying to tell the youngsters that the psychedelic movement is nothing new. . . . The hippies and the acid heads and the new flower tribes are performing a classic function. . . . The empire becomes affluent, urbanized, completely hung-up in material things, and then the new underground movements spring up. . . . They're all subversive. They all preach a message of turn-on, tune-in, drop-out.

So, one is to believe, dosing on LSD and going underground is enough to transform society and reroute the course of history. At his psychedelic arcadia in Millbrook, N.Y., Leary is, despite all appearances to the contrary, in the vanguard of the revolution. "It will be an LSD country within fifteen years," he predicts. "Our Supreme Court will be smoking marijuana within fifteen years. It's inevitable, because the students in our best universities are doing it now. There'll be less interest in warfare, in power politics. You know, politics today is a disease—it's a real addiction."

Universe of Dope

The "psychedelic revolution," then, comes down to the simple syllogism: change the prevailing code of consciousness and you change the world; the use of dope ex opere operato changes the prevailing mode of consciousness; therefore, universalize dope and you change the world.

When the promise of so much gets tied into the opportunity for unlimited free sexuality—which is a basic aspect of Leary's cult—is it any wonder the alienated young go for it headlong? "CAN the World Do Without LSD?" asks a feature in The East Village Other. "Here's where those who have and those who have not had LSD part company—at least as far as knowing what the subject under discussion is Can a person be human without LSD? Or, let us say, without THE PSYCHEDELIC experience? The answer, as far as writer of this article can see, is a highly qualified, cautiously rendered, but emphatic, definitely NOT. BUT" (One breathes a sigh of relief for the qualifying "BUT." Perhaps after all, there is some special dispensation through which Socrates, Shakespeare, Montaigne, Tolstoy and the like may be granted their humanity.) "BUT, the psychedelic experience is not tied exclusively to LSD. There are at least five other effective psychedelic drugs." (No such luck.)

When the claims of psychedelia take on such proportions, one is surely justified in digging in one's heels and registering heated protest. But dope is not simply an excrescence that can be surgically removed from the youth culture by indignant rejection. Leary and his followers have succeeded in entrenching it within such a lore and mystique that it now seems the very essence of that politics of the nervous system in which the young are deeply involved. And this is ironic because one could make an excellent case that the revolution which Leary purports to be leading is pure illusion.

Cover design by Spain

"The East Village Other"

Viewed in wider context, the quest of the young for visionary adventures begins to look like the symptom of a much larger social development in which their rejected elders also participate. For the fact is that the whole of contemporary society is well on its way to becoming distressingly drug dependent. At a meeting of the World Psychiatric Association held in London during November, 1967, it was revealed that Great Britain, which is not nearly as advanced in this respect as America, consumed a "staggering total" of more than 43 million prescriptions for psychotropic drugs in a recent three-year period. And this total did not include the tranquilizers, anti-depressants and sedatives used in general and in mental hospitals or in private practice but only those dispensed under the National Health Service.

Speaking on the subject, Dr. William Sargent concluded that drugs were becoming the standard technique for dealing with anxiety and emotional disorder, largely replacing psychotherapy, psychoanalysis or, needless to say, any attempt to alter the environmental factors that generate the suffering. The largest single group in this increasingly drug-dependent population was identified, not as rebellious adolescents but as older women.

Thus, adjustments and functions that used to be left to the unaided human organism—sleeping, waking, relaxing, sexual potency, digestion, elimination—are being turned over to an expanding repertory of artificial concoctions. Old-fashioned organic processes are not measuring up to the demands of contemporary civilization; whatever it is that we are designing our environment for, it isn't the human being. But the most convenient way to meet such an unlivable state of affairs without thwarting "technological progress" is to patch up the organism with pharmacological bandages.

Happiness Pills

Within this framework, grass, acid and speed assume a different significance. If society is committed to solving its organic problems with chemical agencies, then why should the line be drawn at the so-called "consciousness expanders"? Why not a pill or a needle to provide temporary emotional and perceptual liberation? "Speed" is nothing but a slightly different form and dosage of benzedrine, which legions of harried students and fatigued executives take without qualms to ward off drowsiness. No question has been raised in any quarter about the professional use of LSD by therapists and researchers. In each case, the public objection and the legal authorities, I suspect, are reacting at least in part from an honest concern for the health hazard involved when the drugs are used without some knowledge and discipline. The drugs are potent and the concern is legitimate. Even the underground press has begun to spread the word that "speed kills." The objection to pot is, as many impeccably straight individuals and groups have already admitted, inconsistent in a society that allows free use of alcohol.

But if the spectrum of drugs on which our society is willing to become dependent has been interrupted at marijuana, LSD and the amphetamines, I think it is also because these substances are associated in the public mind with the aggressive bohemianism of the young. Unwilling to blame themselves for the alienation of their children, mother and father have decided to blame drugs. So dope becomes the convenient scapegoat for juvenile misbehavior. And the more banners the young fly for dope, the more hostile adult society becomes toward what is essentially an epiphenomenon of youthful rebellion.

In the last analysis, the psychedelic line on which the disaffected young have chosen to fight is false: there is nothing to be won or lost in the skirmish. It wasn't bootleg liquor that created the bohemianism of the "lost generation," and it isn't dope that has bred the beat-hip generation.

One begins to suspect the supposedly revolutionary character of the psychedelic crusade when one realizes that publications as squarely conservative as Life and Time, whose lead the disaffected young wouldn't follow three faltering steps in any other direction, were giving the psychedelics a glamorous build-up as far back as 1957. That was the year when Life produced its splashy and appetizing feature called "Seeking the Magic Mushroom." The authors were R. Gordon Wasson, a J. P. Morgan vice president, and his wife. The piece recounted the visionary adventures which they and a New York society photographer had had in 1955 among cultists in Mexico. The article, providing detailed illustrations and descriptions of the mushrooms, made all the familiar connections with occult and Oriental religions, and, bowing in the direction of William Blake's ecstatic verse, finished by assuring its readers "that the mushrooms make those visions available to a much larger number." Since then, the psychedelics have enjoyed a glowing reputation in Time-Life, except (significantly) where they have been mixed up with obstreperous bohemians.

Whatever its failings, the Luce press has sound instincts as to what the establishment can and can't assimilate. I suspect it shrewdly recognized that a nice, private thrill pill might soon come in handy as a means of maintaining some degree of emotional stability in the status quo. The young who take their psychedelic text from Huxley's Doors of Perception forget that in Brave New World the unbearable was made endurable by a visionary chemical called "soma"—the purpose of which was to produce "sane men, obedient men, stable in their contentment." Recently, when some young Englishmen launched a group whose purpose it is to study the psychotropic drugs and "methods of altering consciousness in general," and to liberalize the British narcotics law, they appropriated the name SOMA for the organization: Society of Mental Awareness. They are tempting fate.

In One-Dimensional Man, Herbert Marcuse coins the phrase "repressive desublimation" to remind his readers that the most up-to-date forms of totalitarianism are not based on brutal, across-the-board repression but on controlled and cleverly selective permissiveness:

Invalidating the cherished images of transcendence by incorporating them into its omnipresent daily reality, this society testifies to the extent to which insoluble conflicts are becoming manageable—to which tragedy and romance, archetypal dreams and anxieties are being made susceptible to technical solution and dissolution.

It is difficult to see why dope cannot be comprehended within such a program. History certainly suggests that the role of narcotic substance has been to tame and stabilize. DeQuincey, confessing his own vice in the 1820s (and at the same time hinting wickedly at the prevalence of opium eating among English aristocrats and artists), was convinced that addiction flourished among the long-suffering cotton-mill workers. While the role of dope in damping social unrest in early industrial England has not been extensively investigated, every historian of the period knows that it was common practice at the time for working mothers to start the habit in the cradle by dosing their hungry babies on laudanum ("mother's blessing," it was called).

Pot in the Sky

At the turn of the century and during the stress of industrialization, America passed through a fit of narcotics addiction that probably hasn't since been surpassed, on a national scale at any rate. The main agent then was the morphine one could, until the passage of the Harrison Narcotics Act, enjoy in most of the painkillers physicians openhandedly prescribed. Even if one turns back to the more artistic narcotics connoisseurs of the mid-19th century—like those who congregated around Theophile Gautier's Club des Hachischins—one is scarcely in the company of social revolutionaries. All the familiar visions appear in their reports—"the lilies of gold," "the myriad butterflies," "the fireworks display"—but as Baudelaire made clear, the "artificial paradise" was at bottom an escape "from the hopeless darkness of ordinary daily existence." The language is loftier, but the sentiment is what one would expect from any one of the bleary-eyed dock workers of Hong Kong who spend their meager wages "chasing the dragon." And yet, if narcotics consumption is the measure, then Hong Kong, rather than San Francisco, must be regarded as the world's most "turned-on city."

In the late 1950s, an English writer underwent a series of LSD sessions which were later written up and published under the pseudonym "Jane Dunlap" (Exploring Inner Space, 1958). Judging by her gushy, saccharine style, Miss Dunlap is the sort of writer whose creations ordinarily come blazing out of the pages of the Ladies Home Journal; but I fear that she is a great deal more typical of the ordinary user than either Aldous Huxley or Allen Ginsberg. If so, the chances seem slim that the psychedelic society for which Leary is crusading will qualify as a cultural renaissance.

Miss Dunlap had heard of LSD by way of the Wasson feature in Life—a magazine whose "many excellent articles" she has admired and collected since its very first issue. She volunteered for a run of psychedelic sessions at the local university and dictated reports of her revelations, which sound like an autistic collage of Jules Verne, Flash Gordon and Nick Kenney. One has the off-putting sense that Miss Dunlap is finding what she feels she is supposed to look for, and that the experience is falling into a Kitschy mold: "I saw the tiny grasses bend in prayer, the flowers dance in the breeze, and the trees lift their arms to God." The visionary adventure that was supposed to vault ordinary humanity to the heights of Blake and Wordsworth has been scaled down to the cultural level of Forest Lawn's plaster reproductions of Michelangelo's "David." And what could the most oppressive powers that be take exception to in a chemical that guides the Miss Dunlaps of the world to the consoling conclusion that "to one who accepts the God pull of reversed gravity and maintains a geological time sense, the future seems gloriously bright?"

The technological society might well accept into its arsenal of social controls methods of emotional release as sophisticated as LSD or pot. An occasional turn-on, a periodic orgy, a weekend freak-out . . . such private kicks pose no threat to the established order—provided that they don't become associated with disruptive forms of dissent. The brain stormers at RAND have already flirted with the notion of introducing tranquilizers and psychedelics into the most hideously repressive of situations—life in the post-attack fallout shelter—as a means of draining off the pressure of desperation.

Moreover, dope is already being widely used, though less obtrusively than by the bohemian young, by otherwise closely barbered citizens. Purged of its social nonconformity, it is becoming an integral part of swinging society—like wife swapping in suburbia, or group-grope parties among the Playboy junior executives and their wives. Within my own circle of acquaintances the number who indulge in discreet little trips—just for the fun of it—grows constantly.

What if the psychedelic crusaders had their way then, and American society could be turned on legally? No doubt the marijuana trade would immediately be taken over by the major cigarette companies—an improvement over leaving it in the hands of the Mafia. And surely the major pharmaceutical companies would move in on LSD. What then? Would the revolution have been achieved? Would we be, all of a sudden, living in a society of love, gentleness, innocence, freedom? "Better things for better living through chemistry" says one of the prominent hippie buttons, quoting E. I. DuPont. But the slogan isn't being used satirically. The kids mean it the way DuPont means it. The gadget-happy American used to be an international figure of fun because of his facile assumption that there was a mechanical solution to every human problem. It only took Timothy Leary and his ilk to formulate the proposition that personal salvation and the social revolution can be packed in a capsule.

AN END TO BARTER

NEW POLITICS OF CONVICTION

GRANT MCCONNELL

Mr. McConnell is chairman of the Department of Political Science, the University of Chicago. He is the author, among other books, of Private Power and American Democracy (Knopf).

Until recently, one of this country's major sources of national pride has been the quality of its political life. By contrast with the tumultuous and often downright bloody ways of foreigners, our pattern of politics here has been generally orderly and on the whole sensible and practical. Forgetting the period of the Civil War, we can claim that the results of our national elections, whatever their incidents of absurdity and general noisiness, have been accepted by the losers as a matter of course, and that sportsmanship has characterized the attitude of the winners. The national government has not suffered the turnover of regimes that has bedeviled other countries—in fact the term "regime" has an alien ring in this country—and there has been no succession of first, second, third, fourth and fifth "Republics." Here is but one republic, the Republic, and we all know what we mean when we pledge allegiance to it. And like "regime," "class struggle" and "ideology" are foreign terms and, we remain convinced, foreign experiences.

Looked at over the past two centuries, American politics may be characterized as a system designed and adapted to the settlement or adjustment of economic conflicts. That is not quite all there is to it but, in general, the great bulk of the work of government has been to deal with competing claims for the material goods of the world. That it would be so was specifically foreseen by that most perceptive of all American political thinkers, James Madison. In his most celebrated passage, he wrote that the great problem of government had been "faction," an evil which found its most common and durable source in the unequal distribution of property, which in turn created distinct interests in society—a landed interest, a manufacturing interest, a mercantile interest, a moneyed interest, and so on. In one degree or another this understanding of the problem of government has been shared by other thinkers, from Calhoun through Charles Beard and down to more recent times. In one degree or another most of us have believed that politics is a reflection of economics.

And to a considerable degree we have been right about American politics. The bulk of the important work of American Government has been economic: development of railroads, subsidies for this or that interest, regulation of competition, distribution of land, etc. The statement of one Senator to a freshman colleague near the turn of this century, "Young man, tariffs are the whole of politics; study them," was only an exaggeration of the reality. More recently, we have extended the work of government to other groups than those originally favored—to industrial workers—and now we are at least doing some thinking and talking about the poor. The "what" or "Politics, Who Gets What. . . ." has very largely been economic.

In recent years, however, a new wind seems to have been blowing in America. Our politics has been taking on a new note, marked by an attitude that at times can be characterized only as mean and hateful. The name calling we hear is not new; the manners of American politics in the 19th century were probably worse than those of today, and it wouldn't take much research to turn up evidence of attitudes toward FDR in his time quite as bitter as some of those now directed at LBJ. Not long ago some observers were proclaiming the breakdown of America in a final conflict of classes. Perhaps it is possible to recall that time with equanimity now, because we know the outcome: it wasn't a really fundamental class struggle and it didn't result in breakdown. But I doubt that we are justified in assuming from this that events are certain to turn out all right in the future.

Everyone is aware of the evidence. We are in the midst of a large war whose legitimacy and necessity are denied with passion by a very considerable segment of the American people. Large numbers of individuals, including some conspicuously excellent citizens, openly advocate courses of resistance to the war that go beyond the bounds of law. Many of the young, again conspicuously including a large number of the best, are heeding the call to resistance. Negroes—or black people, as militants now insist the correct term to be—increasingly scorn the ideal of integration and are groping for some formula of apartheid of their own. After the death and destruction of several long hot summers, we are preparing, on the testimony of the President himself, for more. While rumors fly as to the stocking of firearms, some public officials take actions seemingly calculated to aggravate the situation. Just recently the sheriff of Cook County, Ill., began enrolling gun enthusiasts in a vigilante gang.

Justifications are offered for all this activity. The society is corrupt from top to bottom; we are all alienated; it is time for direct action; we must fight back or "they" will take over. For both sides, liberals are the worst enemy.

It is tempting to perceive these discontents as the product of two issues, the war in Vietnam and the racial crisis. It is easy to demonstrate what a host of evils are either rooted in or made worse by the conflict in Southeast Asia. As for the rest of our difficulties, a great many seem to come down to questions of race. Certainly as a practical matter, we can formulate no better agenda than to deal effectively with these two topics.

However, if we seek to understand the full sweep of our situation, this reduction of the problem to two items is not adequate. Note that in the past external war has been a means of rallying the nation and of quieting signs of internal discord. This has been true even of some of our most unsavory wars, of which we have had rather a number. Vietnam is having quite the contrary effect. And the racial crisis, while more intense today than in the past century, has existed below the surface for longer than a century. Indeed, it is arguable that the eruption of great discord on matters of war and race represents a moral advance in America. But the point to be made here is that even on these two scores our present troubles arise from something additional.

A perspective can be gained on this point by looking at the style of politics developed by some of the less pre-occupying and less dramatic issues of the day. Look, for example, at the pattern of politics of what may be called the environmental issues. Consider the struggles to achieve clean air and water; consider also the bitterness of the fights over the protection of scenic and wilderness areas, the Redwoods, the Grand Canyon, and so on. Think also of the utter intransigence of the student leaders who demand "freedom" and "participation" on some campuses. What is at the root of this very general change?

We are certainly too close to the events to give more than a partial and tentative answer to this question. With that caution, my answer in brief is that we are just now beginning to confront the important problems of governing this country. The fact is, economics is no longer the single overriding issue of American political life.

One of the most interesting phenomena of the post-World War II period is the recent articulation in this country of a body of political doctrine that celebrates the American scheme of politics. This doctrine now seems to go by the name of "pluralism," a tag partly adopted by those who have formulated it and partly pinned on by their opponents. The term is borrowed from a now largely forgotten body of English and European thought and is misleading in some ways. Moreover, the doctrine by no means is to be regarded as a complete political theory. It has had, nevertheless, much popularity until quite recently. It is an important bit of evidence in its own right.

Perhaps the outstanding quality of American political life, as the pluralists see it, is pragmatism. American politics is not ideological. Its outstanding virtues are compromise and tolerance. Americans do not seek to murder one another with politics. When they get into political contests they do not insist that the losers be executed or exiled. At moments of succession, losers smile gamely and settle down to ordinary life—and are allowed to. After a noisy bit of verbal hair pulling, "deals" are quietly made—bargains in which nobody entirely loses, and which are subject to review and readjustment. Nobody ever gets all he wants and nobody is left without hope that next time he will do better.

This is in marked contrast with European politics. There they have had a real and bitter class struggle. There they had the Russian Revolution with all mass slaughter and hatreds unleashed. There they have had fascism, again with slaughter and hatred. And why? Because they have never learned the American attitude which looks not to utopia and the distant tomorrow but to the here and now. There has always been something millennial in European thinking. By contrast, Americans restrict themselves to what they can do now—maybe not something that will utterly transform our lives, but something practical and available. And, in the process, they have transformed their lives and left Europe behind.

The American lesson has been learned by virtually all segments of society. In fact, one of the best and earliest formulations came from organized labor. Samuel Gompers and his early colleagues in the AFL came to this outlook as a kind of revelation. One-time Marxists, driven to escape from Europe and still clinging for a while to the precepts of that doctrine, they eventually saw that, in America at least, great strides were possible if workers would simply concentrate on three matters: wages, hours and working conditions. By avoiding grandiose goals or "ultimate ends," by turning their backs on the class struggle, they could fit themselves into American life and in time come to enjoy a standard of living about which their European brothers could only dream.

Industrial relations in America are in some respects a paradigm of American political life. With parties free of ideology, directed simply to the winning of regular elections; with undisciplined legislatures devoting themselves to the trifling concerns of pork-barrel politics—yes, even playing relatively harmless games of boodle—American politics has lacked the sting and danger of politics elsewhere. Public affairs have not always been neat or even wholly admirable, but America has reaped the enormous benefit of domestic peace on a continental scale.

This leaves much to be said of pluralism as a doctrine, but it is the part that calls for our attention here. What is its validity? Within some limits, it has much. The seemingly chaotic and meaningless character of our political parties has given major benefits. The party system has been open to a variety of groups. Its failure to dominate legislatures has permitted a vast number of petty bargains that in sum have given satisfaction to elements that might otherwise have taken to building barricades in the streets. Perhaps most important, this general looseness and seeming triviality have allowed energetic entrepreneurs and workers the freedom and incentive to build an expanding economy while simply seeking their own individual, immediate and mundane ends. Not wasting too much time on the division of what goods there are, they have gone on to make so many more goods that nearly everybody gets more than he had before.

There are qualifications to this, of course. Some people are still poor. Moreover, American politics has not been quite as free from ideology and bitterness as I have just made out. In industrial relations, for example, there has been a good deal more class struggle than we like to remember, and it has been marked with genuine violence. What is important to note, however, is that where genuine battles have been fought, the issues have not been wages, hours or working conditions. Rather, the issue has been legitimacy of the unions—i.e., recognition. Once recognition has been won, strikes could occur (even with a bit of violence) without very great disturbance or danger to the political order. It is a remarkable fact that few people today can name the largest strike in American history, although it occurred only a few years ago. That steel strike of 1959 simply did not raise any fundamental issue.

The most impressive fact of this whole record is that the system has worked. America is a great success story in that such a vast and powerful nation has emerged from enormously diverse elements. But the next most striking fact is that the benefits which the system has allocated have largely been economic and material. These benefits have been the coins with which the acquiescence of different groups in the making of a nation has been bought. And with every passing year our common capacity to make this kind of payment has increased. It would seem obvious that Americans have been getting what they wanted.

And yet . . . something is false here and we all sense it. All history may be the history of class struggles—in America perhaps not of classes in the Marxist sense but of “classes” in much greater numbers and drawn on a much smaller scale. Nevertheless, we know intuitively that men care deeply about other things than material advantage. In other societies the record is plain that nonmaterial, even abstract issues have been the important ones. Nonmaterial values were strongly cherished in ancient Athens. Art occupied an important place in the life of Florence in its great period. Men have valued military glory. For centuries, religion was at the heart of political life. Important as the economic component of politics has always been, it is simply wrong to say that economics lies at the heart of all politics or that men in fact always and invariably place material values first.

Madison and Beard were on firm ground insofar as they assessed the reality of the political life of their own times and the times near to them. American politics has been largely about material things, and it has been arranged structurally so that this should be so. But in its preoccupation with economics America has been successful, enormously successful, perhaps dangerously successful. The figures on this success are beyond rational appreciation. Who can assign any real meaning to a GNP of $700 billion or $800 billion? Consider also the general calm that greets the current proposal for a negative income tax. This scheme asserts that the trouble with the poor is that they don't have enough money; the solution, accordingly, is to give them money. This notion, which not long ago would have shaken most Americans to their boots, occasions some controversy, but it is clear that as a nation we could afford it easily and nobody is deeply troubled by the idea.

The change implied here is not easy to grasp. To attempt to assess its importance, consider a passage J. M. Keynes wrote in the terrible year of 1930. It appears in an article entitled, “Economic Possibilities for our Grandchildren”:

I draw the conclusion that, assuming no important wars and no important increase in population, the economic problem may be solved, or be at least within sight of solution, within a hundred years. This means that the economic problem is not—if we look into the future—the permanent problem of the human race. . . . [This] is startling because, if instead of looking into the future, we look into the past we find that the economic problem, the struggle for subsistence, always has been hitherto the primary, most pressing problem of the human race . . . not only of the human race, but of the whole of the biological kingdom from the beginnings of life in its most primitive forms.

Thus we have been expressly evolved by nature—with all our impulses and deepest instincts—for the purpose of solving the economic problem. If the economic problem is solved, mankind will be deprived of its traditional purpose.

Will this be a benefit? If one believes at all in the real values of life, the prospect at least opens up the possibility of benefit. Yet I think with dread of the readjustment of the habits and instincts of the ordinary man, bred into him for countless generations, which he may be asked to discard within a few decades.

Thus for the first time since his creation man will be faced with his real, his permanent problem—how to use his freedom from pressing economic cares, how to occupy the leisure which science and compound interest will have won for him, to live wisely and agreeably and well.

Is it too much to say that we are beginning to see, at least in the United States, the realization of this prophecy? Poverty and hunger still stalk large parts of the world. Keynes's proviso—no major wars and no increase of population—has not been met, and as a result much of the earth is in a sorry economic condition and still has a sorry prospect. In America, nevertheless, the prophecy is visibly in the process of realization.

If this is true in any substantial degree, we are in trouble. It is marvelous and wonderful trouble if we look back to the depression days when Keynes chose to be so exasperating. But recall that Keynes warned of what we would be in for when the change came. He mentioned some of the prospective moral difficulties; there are also prospective political difficulties.

If we are on the way to solution of the economic problem, clearly economic matters will lose their former urgency. As Keynes pointed out, other preoccupations will rise to the surface, and these will be important ones—and important in an ultimate sense. We shall probably find, indeed we are already beginning to find, that they are more difficult to solve, politically less tractable.

Consider the advantages of dealing with an economic politics. Once a society is past the condition in which it must continually fear famine, once it is beyond a pervasive terror of economic failure, a wide range of bargains, deals and accommodations opens up. Men may compete with one another for the goods of the world, but they have almost endless room for settling their contests. As Gompers and his associates discovered, if one forgets ultimate things, immediate things become available. By ignoring shibboleths like "control of the means of production," workers can have better wages, hours and working conditions—and can have them now. If a union will not try to challenge the boss's ownership of his factory, it can get him to agree to a wage increase. The union leader asks for an increase of 50c an hour. The boss offers an increase of 10c. After some haggling, perhaps after a rather harmless strike, the two sides settle on 20c. Good fellowship is renewed; everybody is satisfied for a while. If the satisfaction passes, the process can be run through again. And the process works: it works quite beautifully.

But consider what happens when I begin to suspect that you are attacking my religion. If you seem to be trying to suppress my forms of worship on the ground that you think them immoral, I am going to resist you bitterly and there will be no compromise between us. As a moral person, I must lay things, perhaps even my life, on the line. And you do the same. That is a formula for the most savage kind of politics, the sort that led to centuries of really terrible warfare in the past. Remembering that history, the founding fathers carefully took religion out of politics and established the principle of religious toleration. We have done our contending about economics, and by comparison it has been mere squabbling. In a money fight, sooner or later, you sit down with your opponent and bargain; in a religious fight, you must destroy him.

To some degree, the same applies to most issues of principle, that is, to most issues that are not primarily economic. If, for example, you are a black man and concerned with human dignity, the time may come when you are prepared to kill or be killed. Or if you are white and determined to protect the purity of your women from the vilest of threats, you may do the same. If you are convinced that a given war is simple murder, you may defy the laws and spit on the flag. However, if you are a patriot of the elemental sort, you may hurl yourself upon the defilers of the flag.

These are extreme examples, and yet we see them before us today. But there is more to the potential change in political priorities than just these two appalling issues of war and race. Americans are beginning to have time and energy for other, less conspicuous issues. Conservation, for example, used to mean sensible care not to waste natural resources of wood, minerals, etc.—concern for the economic resources. Today it means the intangibles of scenery, wilderness, threatened species like the whooping crane. One of the great political phenomena of recent years is the rapid growth of the new conservation movement. Individuals in all walks of life and of all political allegiances are banding together in some parts of the country to defend and protect such values. Many of these individuals are good solid middle-class citizens, clean-cut and without beards (although some of the beards are joining up too). Yet they often behave without regard to the conventions and niceties of traditional American politics, tending to ignore the appeals to be reasonable and to make bargains. Last year, there was bitter resistance to a scheme to put a big dam in the Grand Canyon. The statement of a leading conservationist sums up the matter very precisely: "It's the Grand Canyon they are talking about!" Here no compromise is possible. For the moment that dam project is in abeyance, but if it is ever built in any form it will not be because the conservationists struck a bargain. For them, any appeal to compromise is without meaning, and while they may conceivably be defeated, they can hardly be expected to accept their defeat in a spirit of good fellowship. When the Grand Canyon is filled with a fluctuating reservoir, when the 2,000-year-old redwoods and the whooping crane are gone, something final will have happened, and nothing offered in return will pay for it.

If these and similar issues come in the future to be the preoccupying problems of politics and bring about a general change in the quality of political life, it still remains to be asked why haven't they been more conspicuous in the past. Part of the answer, the major part, is that hitherto we have simply found the economic and material problems more urgent. But why did they continue to be more urgent in the United States even past the time when most people had more than enough to eat? In different times and places in the nonaffluent past nonmaterial concerns have been thought more urgent. Probably much of the answer to this lies in the American commitment to equality; we have not been satisfied to relax our headlong rush for production and consumption of goods until most of the population among whom political power is diffused has had a substantial margin over sheer animal necessity.

But there is more to the answer than that. We have structured our political life as though economics were the substance of politics. We have framed things politically so as to treat nonmaterial problems as though they were economic, material and bargainable issues. The fiction works—up to a point. Thus we have been able to bargain with political counters of appointive jobs for immigrant ethnic groups and so in time have brought their members into full membership in our republic of producers and consumers. The process has worked far better than might have seemed possible if its basis had been made explicit in the beginning. But today we are having doubts that it will work with Negroes, our largest, oldest, and least assimilated ethnic group.

Beyond that, the general system of an economic politics is necessarily founded on some means of suppressing the nonmaterial and principled issues that can prove so divisive. We have found different ways to do just that—and have certainly paid a price in the inculcation among too many individuals of the belief that only material matters are serious. However, it is probably untrue that Americans at large are really committed to such belief. There is a tough, questioning spirit among Americans which belies the assertions of foreign critics that we are a wholly materialistic people. And the solution to this paradox of an at least partially nonmaterialistic people behaving politically as though life were wholly an economic matter goes back, I believe, to the fact that our political system has been devised to favor such behavior. Specifically, the pattern of decentralization and devolution of political life has on the whole offered better prospect of selfish and material than unselfish and nonmaterial rewards. In general, the tactics available to small communities are appropriate to small and immediate ends. These, in turn, are most probably, in the American culture at least, material and economic. With issues of principle, say social justice for men of all races, left in the hands of localities or private firms, what remains open is getting and spending. With so much political power defined into the hands of Arizona, the task of defending the Grand Canyon in all its natural and wasteful splendor is far more difficult than it would be if the decision were put up to the nation as a whole. The American people have a far smaller per capita money stake in damming the Canyon's potential kilowatts than do the people of Arizona.

But now we are rich beyond the dreams of yesterday. For many individuals, greater wealth has a sharply diminishing attraction. The large generation of college age has no memory of general depression. It is beginning to be free of "those pseudo-moral principles which have hag-ridden us for two hundred years, by which we have exalted some of the most distasteful of human qualities into the position of the highest virtues," once again to use the words of Keynes. And the division of America into a multitude of small constituencies as decreed in the political system which has served us so well in the past is also changing. Instead of the constituencies of states, towns and firms, we are perhaps being divided into opposing camps to contest values of a more fundamental sort. And just because the values are more fundamental, the quality of our political life may be becoming more tense, more bitter and more dangerous.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

It would be a mistake to leap to the conclusion that the quality of political life we may see in the future will be worse than what we have known so far. My own view is that probably in an ultimate sense it will be better. But I am sure it will be more difficult.

LETTERS (Continued from page 458)

prestige as the head of our country to request and receive time on television whenever he desires. (Letter from Senator Fulbright to Mr. Spivak, a copy of which the latter has sent to me.)

(2) Apparently after LBJ decided that a TV appearance was desirable, feelers came out of the White House in various directions. N.B.C. claims it simply acted faster than anyone else. (Variety.)

"It is clear to everyone in television that all the networks hold open invitations to the President and to his chief Cabinet officers, which the President can accept at short notice, as he did in the case of Meet The Press. That, I submit, is a command performance.

"What was meant by a 'controlled environment' is clear by full quotation from my column: 'Meet The Press is a controlled environment: limited questions by a limited number of reporters, with little power to press for answers. Senators, who don't have to be respectful to their news sources, would be more critical, responsible and knowledgeable interrogators.' Senator Fulbright made essentially the same points in his letter."

The Editors

Chessman

Sacramento, Calif.

DEAR SIR: Frank Donner's review of The Farther Shores of Politics [The Nation, March 11], while noting many of Mr. Thayer's errors and misstatements, accepts as fact the reference to Caryl Chessman as "this convicted murderer."

Chessman, whom I represented for twelve years, was never accused of murder. He was charged, convicted and executed under California's kidnapping statute, the so-called Little Lindbergh Law.

Regrettably, Mr. Donner lapses into further error in his next paragraph. Contrary to his statement, Chessman's guilt or innocence was—and is—very much an issue in the case.

Rosalie S. Asher

passing the nuclear buck

New York City

DEAR SIR: A telegram addressed to the President—urging him not to authorize the use of nuclear weapons in Vietnam—was answered from the Pentagon. This seems an odd procedure. It is widely assumed that only the President can make decisions about the use of nuclear weapons, either tactical or strategic, so why should the White House send such a telegram to the Pentagon for answer? . . .

For some time our media have been full of statements, from a wide variety of sources, urging that tactical nuclear weapons be used to bring "victory" in Vietnam. It might be supposed that a President determined not to use them would welcome a word from dissenters to strengthen him against the proponents. To have the White House appear to defer to the Pentagon is not reassuring.

Helen Mears

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Our Literary Anglo-Jewish Cousins

GERDA CHARLES

Miss Charles is a British novelist who edited Modern Jewish Stories (Prentice-Hall). Her latest novel is A Logical Girl (Knopf).

It was Jonathan Miller, one of the most brilliant of the younger Anglo-Jewish intellectuals (if not quite a writer pure) who declared every night during the long run of Beyond the Fringe that he wasn't a Jew but he was Jew-ish.

The statement, however sprightly, deserves consideration if only because a definition was tried for from the kind of acute, penetrating American angle seldom attempted in this country. Generally speaking the Anglo-Jewish writer and/or intellectual does not hold an endless, passionate and public dialogue with himself about the fact of his Jewishness. He is not nearly so committed, so interested, so unashamed of it as are his opposite numbers in America. The nerve of his Jewishness is there all right but for the most part lies quiet.

There are many well-documented reasons for this; most of them the result of the milder virtues of our society but equally a by-product of the tougher pressures of our class system. To the Anglo-Jewish writers (so newly arrived anyway) the act of creation is not only a marvel but a delicate marvel; not to be shaken or damaged by too heavy an insistence on where it comes from. Romantic about class, keen not to be included out, they have watched their step in a society where the confessional American qualities of curiosity and candor are not yet taken socially for granted. Similarly, the Jewish tradition of examination and argument has become somewhat muted in Britain—as against the impression one gets, reading some American-Jewish novels, of having stumbled into an updated version of 19th-century Talmudic discussion in a Lithuanian Yeshiva.

Considering that so much of the heat has been taken off the Jewishness of the Jewish writers in Britain, the fact that they have turned to their Jewish backgrounds as much as they have in their work is still a somehow unexplained mystery—as is the general Jewish renaissance in creative literature. It must be remembered that since Zangwill published Children of the Ghetto in 1892 there had hardly been any writing worth mentioning either by Jewish authors or about Anglo-Jewish life till, in 1958, the publication of The Bankrupts by Brian Glanville let loose, as if by a signal, the new wave—or small flood—which shows no sign of abating yet.

I call it a "small" flood since that is what it is. Though the phenomenon has been noticed, of course, it has had nothing like the impact which Jewish writing has had on the American scene. British critics, even eminent Jewish ones, on the national papers have preferred to seize on, say, the political or working-class content in Arnold Wesker's plays rather than the Jewishness. When a volume of short stories by Brian Glanville (in his other hat a well-known sporting journalist) was reviewed, it was his football stories which got all the attention, the Jewish stories which were largely ignored.

Mr. Glanville, it should be mentioned, is one of the very few authors who have taken the trouble to analyze the Jewish writers' situation here at all. The general—one can hardly call it disinterest but the general limpness—is sharply highlighted by the difference between such comparatively healthy and influential Jewish journals as Commentary or Midstream or Chicago Forum and their one pale reflection over here, the Jewish Quarterly. This little magazine, miraculously still alive after some fifteen years of struggling existence, attempted a couple of years ago a symposium (on the lines of the famous Commentary survey of intellectual-Jewish opinion) which elicited some eight or nine declarations of attitude from our writers revealing some interesting if slightly dispiriting information; not least the fact that the sparkier, more fashionable and younger the writer, the shorter the contribution. There was a faint feeling (some of the best-known opting out altogether) of really not wanting to be bothered thinking about themselves as Jews any more. They were unaffected by the kind of relentless curiosity, at once stern and tender, about their Jewishness which so consumes the Americans.

Of those who did bother, by far the longest, finest and most deeply felt contribution came from Alexander Baron. Yet Baron's best work is not to be found in his "Jewish" novels but in his very remarkable war books. Baron's position neatly crystallizes the dilemma of the Anglo-Jewish writer whose Jewish consciousness goes one way, while the most powerful forces at work in his creative imagination operate in quite another part of the forest; an altogether different situation from the American-Jewish writer whose most creative strengths seem to be intricately woven together (whether in hate or love really doesn't matter) with his Jewishness.

Perhaps I am being a little unfair both to Baron and to one or two of our younger writers who have made a valiant attempt to give, without love perhaps but certainly with honesty (indeed rather too many warts for some tastes), some truths about Anglo-Jewish life as they see it. Brian Glanville's specialty is the Jewish family, particularly, of course, the parents, whom he has presented with an accuracy tart enough to elicit sharp cries of angry pain from those like enough to feel the sting.

An interesting comparison can be made between Glanville's mothers in such novels as Diamond or that small masterpiece A Second Home and, say, Bruce Jay Friedman's Meg in A Mother's Kisses. If Glanville, exact, deadly, uncannily perceptive as he is, does not penetrate to quite the depth to which Friedman's wild and hilarious plunges take him, this is not because he does not see as far but because he dare not put it down. In England the present context of literary manners, whatever anyone might say, is still dominated by peculiarly British standards of what may or may not be revealed. Our newly permissive society has its own conventions still. The English may have cast off all restraints on the length of their hair or skirts, drawn away the last veils from their vocabulary, may criticize royalty with impunity and satirize their politicians beyond all the calls of duty, but they still turn their heads away in a kind of agony of shyness from the naked workings of temperament. The vast range of implications behind the phrase "personality problem" (which Americans—and Jews—understand at once) either bores or shocks them.

The imagination of another of our younger writers, Frederic Raphael, has been wounded somewhere along the line (probably by anti-Semitism encountered at school), by the inescapable fact of Jewish persecution. At least two of his novels, The Limits of Love and Lindmann attempt to cope not with the Nazi phenomenon direct but with its effects on the safe, English Jew. For a time it seemed that Raphael and Philip Roth were going to develop along parallel lines at least technically (both of them showing a penchant for long, long stretches of short, short lines of dialogue), but with each of their later books they have drawn steadily apart. If Raphael now has any affinity at all to any American novelist it is not with the Jews but the gentiles; O'Hara crossed with Auchincloss perhaps. Roth, courageously going outward beyond his own experience, has somehow lost grip; Raphael, withdrawing to a certain articulate and fortunate level, has become aristocratic but self-centered.

If our novelists have not as yet produced a name to conjure with, the same cannot be said of our dramatists. Any reference to the London theatre of the past decade will automatically ring up the names of Arnold Wesker and Harold Pinter, both of whom have managed to impress themselves in a way the novelists haven't on the contemporary British scene; though this may well be due to their initial good luck in hitting the kitchen sink note at the precise moment when it became the rage.

In terms of sheer numbers and prestige this is so contrary to the American situation that one finds it tempting, with so many names to flourish—apart from the other two there is Peter Shaffer (very stylish), Bernard Kops, Frank Marcus, and a great many more—to say that dramatically the British Jews have it over the Americans. Yet it is really not possible to say that we have one enormous and serious talent to compare with Arthur Miller either in quality or even, the enigmatic Pinter apart, in sheer status.

Two final differences impossible to discount between the two groups: first, the curious fact that apart from Raphael, Chaim Bermant (primarily a humorist) and Wolf Mankowitz (a restless, maverick, bridge figure who actually confesses to liking the Jews), hardly one Anglo-Jewish writer has had the benefit of a university education. Wesker, Pinter and Kops never set foot on a campus. Glanville was diverted into journalism at 18. Baron never got there. Insofar as a trained mind accustomed to deep digging is more helpful than an untrained mind, this matters.

The second even more significant fact is that of age. There is simply no comparable equivalent here at all of that marvelously fecund group of middle-aged, American high talent (to put it at its least) now in its full, ripe, rushing glory. We have no Bellow, no Malamud, no Salinger, no Mailer, not even a Shaw or a Wouk. No one on the English scene has yet created archetypal figures of the order of Holden Caulfield—or even Hyman Kaplan!

Richly conscious Jewishness being so thin on the ground here it is difficult not to relate this paucity to our lack of giants. Anglo-Jewish writers, where they concern themselves with the Jewish experience, do so still very much from the outside. They are interested either in what other people do to them or in themselves as individuals who happen to be Jews. What they do not, perhaps cannot, bring themselves to examine is the mystical element at the center of Jewish nature. They avert their eyes from the demands which might be made upon them should they concede to the idea of group destiny. The possibility of the "specialness" of the Jew which would include a special kind of responsibility, a special

Bills Past Due

A BILL OF RITES, A BILL OF WRONGS, A BILL OF GOODS. By Wright Morris. New American Library. 176 pp. $5.50.

PETER BEREK

Mr. Berek teaches English at Williams College.

Is it a measure of the sickness of our age that essays which take our temperature and find it feverish can seem so lacking in fresh insight? Do we nod because the patient needs no doctor to tell him where he hurts, or because the malady has weakened our capacity for feeling the shock of truth? Perhaps the patient is already dead. One of Wright Morris' better essays in A Bill of Rites, A Bill of Wrongs, A Bill of Goods is called "Reflections on the Death of the Reader." The reader is dead, says Morris, because he concerns himself with tracking reputations in the New York Review of Books instead of reading the books that journal is supposed to review. Having the dope—knowing Pritchett on Bellow, Mailer on McCarthy—is more important than the experience of reading imaginative literature, because the world cries out for communicable data. What happens, Morris asks, to Keats's belief in the holiness of the heart's affections and the truth of the imagination when the heart becomes an interchangeable part?

Wright Morris, after fourteen novels, all worthwhile, some of them excellent, tries to tell us how we are, not in fiction but in fact. If the death of the reader has stifled Morris' imagination, the loss is serious, all the more because Morris is a better diagnostician when he lies like a poet than when he tells the truths of the social scientist.

In his novels, Morris likes to take a small observed object, idea or phrase and let the imagination play with it. In Love Among the Cannibals, the gorgeous Greek kicks off her shoes before getting into bed, and Morris' metaphysical imagination turns the simple gesture into a metaphor for the novel's central act, brand of humility, appalls them. As a result, there is not one Anglo-Jewish writer who could have kept his unwilling eye long enough on the Jewish Why? to write The Fixer.

Greatly talented, elegant, showing every sign of developing that other American characteristic, sheer horsepower, our writers nevertheless have not as yet unloosed their gifts onto these larger, deeper questions which include the mystery, passion and pain at the heart of Jewish destiny.

"bolting." A garish American convertible stripped of everything portable by cheerful Mexican thieves tells us something about the metaphorical stripping the hero of the novel is undergoing, and also something about parking a convertible in Acapulco. But while there are vivid bits of observation in A Bill of Rites, most of the time the object observed is one with which we are all too familiar. A sight-seeing old lady overtipping a waiter is (as Morris himself says) a character from one of his novels come to life, and she tells us far more about growing old gracelessly than does the Dear Abby letter about drinking senior citizens he quotes in the essay, "Going Crazy in Miami." But more commonly, Morris finds himself trying to freshen Los Angeles, the ears of Mr. Johnson's beagles, or the resonant voice of the Senate Minority Leader reciting the Pledge of Allegiance on the Red Skelton show. He cites these in an essay called "Mom & Pop Art" to argue that the banalities of real life outdo the banalities of Pop art at their own game. But most of his book tries to turn phenomena equally prevalent and equally fatuous into metaphors for the Modern Condition. What, one asks, can such things stand for either sillier or (alas) more significant than themselves?

A world so bizarre that art can hardly imagine what to do with it is Morris' major subject in his book. He gazes upon the Vietnamese War, the space program, Haight-Ashbury, television commercials, Mr. McLuhan, Mr. Warhol, and to nobody's surprise he discovers selfishness, mindlessness and hopelessness. What can a man do? He can rage. A book written in anger is likely to suffer from the defects of anger—petulance, repetition, disorganization. These are certainly the vices of A Bill of Rites. An epigraph tells us, in Henry James's words, that the case was "magnificent for pitiless ferocity." But ferocity must exclude self-pity along with pity for abuses, and Morris hasn't done so. Morris also quotes T. S. Eliot on "The conscious impotence of rage/At human folly." Conscious impotence may be the only stance available to a serious writer today, but Morris' rage doesn't make for orderly social criticism.

"Of our rapidly diminishing natural resources one remains inexhaustible," says Morris: "our genius for coining the memorable word or phrase for things we do not like." Indeed, the rage of this gifted writer occasionally produces a passage of lively railing. "The American novel and the American adolescent," he says, "seem to emerge equally from the nursery and the attic." Marshall McLuhan "runs a rake through the bins of history and hastily assembles his own collage." The hucksters of the New Sensibility "specialize in gorging and upchucking. . . . It has been found that the mind can be emptied as easily, and to better effect, than the stomach." Of the inevitable day when the acidhead hippie passes 30 and ceases to be trustworthy: "It is interesting to speculate what will happen when he tunes in on his first dry martini, and experiences the strange, rocky euphoria of the cocktail hour. That will be new. . . . The full circle of this syndrome will be complete when the alcoholic hippy, put into dry dock, is treated with LSD to put him back on his feet." One hundred seventy pages of such writing is too much.

Before he became an autobiographical symbol, Norman Podhoretz wrote a famous essay in which he announced that one traditional function of the novel, "bringing the news" about the current scene, had now been assumed by essays and magazine articles. Morris makes that claim seem even more tenuous than it is. His novel, In Orbit, describes the coincidental joint passage through a freshwater college town of a motorcycle-riding young draft dodger and a tornado. As a commentary on the strange spinings of men and events as they orbit from where they were to where they are going, the novel is to A Bill of Rites as dinner at Julia Child's is to potluck at a diner. There are good jokes in the book—the helmeted and goggled cyclist is described as "a spaceman" by the half-witted farm lady he tries to rape—but the jokes also give the reader some cause for reflection about the problems of making sense of someone young, free and aimless. Reading In Orbit serves as a fresh reminder of what we have known all along: that the discipline of form gives to an artist's perceptions a fullness far exceeding anything available to a purveyor of information. Wright Morris implies this very point in A Bill of Rites, A Bill of Wrongs, A Bill of Goods; he ought to have acted accordingly. We readers may be weakened, but reports of our death are greatly exaggerated.

The Relevance of Nietzsche

JAMES GUTMANN

Mr. Gutmann is professor emeritus of philosophy at Columbia University. He has translated works of German philosophers and edited Marcus Aurelius' Meditations and Spinoza's Ethics.

Nietzsche's extraordinary relevance in the present juncture of affairs makes the publication of these four volumes a particularly notable occasion. Nietzsche's work as a whole has long seemed to me to be best understood as a study of the corrupting influence of human weakness and the possibilities of strength capable of elevating men beyond mankind's present limitations. In an age which gave lip service to Acton's dictum about power, while engaging in a ruthless scramble for social, economic and political power, the Nietzschean warning that weakness corrupts went largely unheeded. Recent events, including such phenomena as the struggle for black power and psychological investigations which Nietzsche anticipated, make these products of Walter Kaufmann's fresh and vigorous scholarship most welcome.

Ever since Kaufmann published his Nietzsche: Philosopher, Psychologist, Antichrist in 1950, he has been recognized as an authoritative interpreter of Nietzsche. The publication, in 1954, of The Portable Nietzsche with Kaufmann's versions of Thus Spoke Zarathustra, Twilight of the Idols, The Antichrist, Nietzsche contra Wagner and excerpts from other texts, plus the appearance during the past year of four additional volumes of translation and commentary, gives ample evidence of Professor Kaufmann's pre-eminence as Nietzsche scholar and interpreter for all who read Nietzsche in English. For these volumes are not only admirable translations but skillfully edited texts with helpful introductions, appropriate commentary and other pedagogical devices including a useful bibliography (in the Birth of Tragedy—Case of Wagner volume), all well designed for students and for a wider range of readers. There is no artificial attempt to secure uniformity of treatment which would have been most inappropriate in presenting an author who eschewed conventional modes of systematic philosophy.

(Continued on page 481)

France and the brain drain—

Russia and the brain pool—

FRANCE IN THE AGE OF THE SCIENTIFIC STATE By Robert Gilpin, Jr.

The author of American Scientists and Nuclear Weapons Policy examines France's leadership in the battle against United States and Russian scientific hegemony in Europe. He warns that if Europe remains disunited in its administration of scientific policy and continues to be "the main world importer of discoveries and exporter of brains," it may become steadily weaker in international affairs. Published for the Center of International Studies, Princeton University. $12.50

THE SOVIET ACADEMY OF SCIENCES AND THE COMMUNIST PARTY, 1927-1932 By Loren R. Graham

No other academy, university, or research foundation dominates the field of science in its country to the degree that the Soviet Academy does. This study describes the eventually successful efforts of the Communist Party to control the Academy of Sciences which before 1928 had not a single party member. "This book more than anything we have had before presents a clear picture of the social history of Soviet scientific organizations." — Derek de Solla Price, Studies of the Russian Institute, Columbia University. $6.50

Princeton
University Press
Princeton, N. J. 08540

Fragments of the Verse Play 'Venise sauvée'

by Simone Weil

Among the papers which Simone Weil left at her death in 1943 was the manuscript of a dramatic tragedy titled Venise sauvée, in three acts, composed partly in verse and partly in prose. She had not finished the play, though she had worked on it, with prolonged interruptions, during the last four years of her life, first at Vichy in the summer of 1940 immediately after the fall of France, and last in London the year she died. To say that the play is unfinished is not, however, to classify it as a fragment in the usual sense. In the case of Venise sauvée, Simone Weil filled in the as yet uncomposed parts with extensive notations showing what she intended to do, and also toward the middle and end of the play, in Acts II and III, she virtually completed the composition.

As her biographer, Jacques Cabaud, has shown, there was an increasing devotion in Simone Weil for the value of the work of art above almost all other human endeavors. She embodies her respect for beauty in the attitude of Jaffier, the central character of her play, and in the image of the city of Venice. The city is threatened by rapacious politics, represented in the characters of Pierre and of Renaud, most intensely in the latter, two of whose speeches are printed here—his dream of power and the subsequent collapse of that dream.

To purify politics, to humble force before the vision of beauty is the major theme of Simone Weil's play. The burden of this theme falls upon her character, Jaffier, whose nature leads him to surrender power and suffer the helplessness that follows from this surrender, for Simone Weil was always a realist about politics. There was no painless resolution for her in this realm.

1.
PIERRE

(to Jaffier)

*My friend, near to my heart, you are at the point of triumph.
This city's yours, tonight you will clasp her
With a mortal grip in which her whole body will obey you.
You will possess her. How thrilling to be the master!
You were born for that, to conquer, to command.
Tomorrow, friend, how sweet it will be to meet again.
You'll tell me of our victory, while we walk
This great city that will be ours entirely!
Ours, the two of us, my friend. Ah! I want tomorrow to be here.*

—ACT II, SCENE 4

2.
RENAUD

(to the mercenaries)

*See, at your feet, the city full of murmurs.
All that is yours, to do with as you please;
To kill at random, playfully, whom you wish.
Those who survive will owe you the light of day.
Tomorrow, the days following, each will step aside;
Before you the proudest of them will lower their eyes.
No one will dare oppose your desires.*

—ACT II, SCENE 9

3.
RENAUD

(before the prison)

*I could have governed a State great as the world.
I was born for that. My whole soul thirsted for it.
Not even for a single day did I possess my destiny.
What I dreamed—I will have done nothing to make it be.
My dream is finished; they're going to come to kill me now.
I carried in my heart, in secret, the kingdom of the world;
There is nothing more in me but emptiness; I am void.
There, in that prison, before dawn, in an instant
The two hands of a hangman will become my universe.
Why, why is that? I have no more strength. I am like ice.
All I wished for is going to vanish forever.*

—ACT III, SCENE 3

JAFFIER

(to the Secretary of the Council)

*Have pity on me on the ground at your knees,
Who yesterday held your fate in my hands,
I, who saved you. Yesterday, yesterday, you heard me;
Can my voice no longer reach beyond my lips?
No answer! I am nothing; all is deaf around me.
If I had wanted, the whole city now
Would hold its breath at the least word I said;
And you, you would have me for master. Oh! who, who held me back?*

—ACT III, SCENE 4

Note and Translations
by William Burford

Kaufmann presents Nietzsche as "not only a great thinker but also a fascinating human being of exceptional complexity and integrity." He views him as "one of the greatest German writers and philosophers of all time and one of the most interesting and influential Europeans of the nineteenth century." So regarded, he is a climactic figure in the great succession of post-Kantian thinkers, the special heir, however much he differs from them, of Hegel and of Schopenhauer. But Nietzsche can also be read as part of another tradition in which, as he himself acknowledges, he often seems more at home, and which includes Montaigne, Voltaire and Emerson. If I lean to this view it is, perhaps because of the influence of Ernst Cassirer, one of the most hospitable philosophic minds of our day who, in a conversation, told me he would have none of Nietzsche's speculations though he esteemed him as a man of letters.

Kaufmann by no means neglects this aspect of Nietzsche's eminence: indeed he constantly calls attention to it. Thus, in his introduction to The Will to Power, he asserts: "Nietzsche is Germany's greatest prose stylist, and his language is a delight at every turn like a poet's—more than that of all but the greatest poets." Whether or not one assents to this judgment, it should be noted that Kaufmann is not uncritical of Nietzsche as a stylist or, for that matter, as a philosopher. He writes that "much of The Birth of Tragedy is badly overwritten and murky," but adds that Nietzsche himself pointed this out. Commenting on the "Aftersong: From High Mountains," which concludes Beyond Good and Evil Kaufmann confesses that he does not admire the poem which to him seems sentimental. He adds, again with questionable hyperbole, that "Nietzsche did know loneliness as few men have ever known it."

As noted, Kaufmann wisely makes no attempt to secure uniformity in guiding his readers through these four volumes, but provides appropriate apparatus, brief introductions to each of the six works and hundreds of footnotes by way of running commentary. This mode of interpretation is facilitated by the fact that Nietzsche himself did not make use of footnotes, except in The Case of Wagner in which there were three. There is clear indication of changes which Nietzsche introduced into successive editions (particularly variations from the first edition of Beyond Good and Evil, which Kaufmann used for his translation). There are appendices with passages which Nietzsche cites from his own writings (in the Genealogy of Morals most of the aphorisms to which Nietzsche refers are provided and others besides), relevant selections from Nietzsche's correspondence, and in the case of Ecce Homo, for which Kaufmann wisely gives more comprehensive and detailed commentary than for any of the other works, previously untranslated variants in Nietzsche's drafts. All of this apparatus is offered with unpretentious tact and—with one possible exception—should interest general readers as well as students.

The possible exception is the supplementary material included in the volume of The Will to Power, consisting of eight facsimile pages of Nietzsche's Nachlass—the posthumously published selections from Nietzsche's notebooks which his editors assembled to form the work which has, ever since, caused confusion and special problems for Nietzsche scholars—together with an appendix giving Kaufmann's commentary on the facsimiles.

Here Kaufmann renews an attack which he made in a 1964 article, "Nietzsche in the Light of his Suppressed Manuscripts," criticizing the 3-volume edition of Nietzsche's works by Karl Schlechta. He argues that the alterations of Nietzsche's manuscripts made or approved by Nietzsche's sister and revealed by Schlechta when, after the Second World War, the Nietzsche archives were opened to scholars, are philosophically unimportant and probably have slight philological significance. When Schlechta first presented his findings they roused

By Friedrich Nietzsche

THE BIRTH OF TRAGEDY and THE CASE OF WAGNER. 223 pp. $1.65. BEYOND GOOD AND EVIL. 256 pp. $1.65. Both translated by Walter Kaufmann. Vintage Original paperbacks.

ON THE GENEALOGY OF MORALS and ECCE HOMO. Vintage Original paperback. 367 pp. $1.95. THE WILL TO POWER. Both translated by Walter Kaufmann and R. J. Hollingdale. Random House. 576 pp. $10.

special interest, in part because of the use which Nazi editors had made of the Nachlass. The matter is further complicated by the fact, as Kaufmann remarks, that "Schlechta's edition is less faithful to the manuscripts than the edition of 1911 (vols. XV and XVI of the revised Grossoktav edition), notwithstanding his explicit claims which have been widely taken on credit on both sides of the Atlantic."

Be all this as it may, Kaufmann is surely right in stating that the books Nietzsche "finished are his legacy and that his notebooks are of secondary interest." Though students should continue

Public welfare vs. poverty — the concept & the controversy

THE STRUGGLE FOR SOCIAL SECURITY 1900-1935

Roy Lubove

George Eastman House Collection

In this first over-all study of the evolution of the social security concept in the United States up to the New Deal, Mr. Lubove analyzes the violent controversy it ignited over fundamental issues of liberty, welfare, and the responsibilities of the state in a democratic society. In looking closely at the conflict—the debate over such issues as workmen's compensation and old-age pensions—this book provides a thorough examination of broad themes in the social history of 20th-century America, and a valuable clarification of the role of public and private institutions that has special relevance for today's anti-poverty struggles. Center for the Study of the History of Liberty in America. $6.95

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

to consult The Will to Power and see how Nietzsche used some of the notes assembled in it for his finished works and his discarding of others, it is hardly a book to be read and, in my opinion, the last to be recommended to the general reader. Beyond Good and Evil is probably the best introductory reading, to be followed by The Genealogy of Morals. Thus Spoke Zarathustra like The Will to Power illustrates the epigram which Kaufmann quotes from Hegel: "What is well-known is not necessarily known merely because it is well-known."

In translating On the Genealogy of Morals and The Will to Power Kaufmann had the collaboration of R. J. Hollingdale, author of an excellent biography, Nietzsche: The Man and His Philosophy, and translator of Thus Spoke Zarathustra in the Penguin series.

Nietzsche's thought and vision are increasingly relevant. His analyses of human weakness and his vision of the possibilities of human power, his awareness of the dissolution of traditional values of Christendom, his sense of urgency of a revaluation of traditional values, the almost apocalyptic anticipation of wars to come, make his writings singularly topical. Of course he has been foolishly held responsible for the conditions which he foresaw—much as physicians' diagnoses are blamed as being a cause of disease. He, the "Good European," the critic of Prussian nationalism, was bracketed with the saberrattling Treitschke during the First World War. When the Nazis attempted to claim him he had to be bowdlerized, among other reasons, because of his vigorous opposition to anti-Semitism.

There is an extraordinary photograph of Hitler on a visit to the Nietzsche archive. The Führer, scowling, is at the extreme left, separated as far as possible from a bust of the philosopher or, rather, one half of the statue which the photographer, with true symbolism, included in his frame. Readers of Kaufmann's volumes should be able to interpret the symbolism and recognize the significance of the photograph as a historical document.

Going "behind and beyond the facts" he detailed the day-to-day struggle of the New Mexican, first under the Spanish conquistadors, then the Mexicans, and finally the Americans. He saw that geography had indeed created a sort of "cultural isolation" where "literacy became the exception rather than the rule," where religion, music and fiestas became the cultural sustenance of the people. "In the march of imperialism," he wrote, "a people were forgotten, cast aside as the by-product of territorial aggrandizement."

The southwestern territories may be the fruits of American conquest; but for the Hispanic southwesterner, the Anglo conquest has come to be—to use a phrase coined by André Gide—"a fruit filled with bitter ashes," indeed "like those colocynths of the desert that grow in a parched and burning soil." And unfortunately the parched and burning soil produced only the most primitive kind of agricultural economy, as Dr. Sanchez discovered. This 16th-century agrarian mentality has left the New Mexicans "unprepared to act in their new environment." For as Dr. Sanchez pointed out:

"A populace, ignorant of modern ways, was thrown into a situation which would task the most enlightened societies. Centuries behind the times, without a democratic tradition, unaware of their rights and status, and incapable of voicing their views and feelings, they became cannon fodder for political guns."

By 1940, some New Mexicans had taken great strides forward, but for the most part social status simply reflected economic insufficiency. Furthermore, lack of education was a handicap "in the exercise of . . . political power." Things have improved only slightly since. In the southwest, the average number of school years completed by Spanish-speaking children is about seven years, while for the Anglo child it is about twelve. The disparity is still great. This educational hiatus is reflected further in the unemployment rate among the Spanish-speaking adults. And because he speaks a foreign language, the New Mexican has become a foreigner in his own country. Only recently, at the insistence of Senator Yarborough (D., Tex.), has bilingual education loomed as a reality.

But Dr. Sanchez saw the problem of his people as more than that of bilingualism; he saw it as one of cultures in conflict, necessitating massive federal aid and the education of Americans (particularly administrators) to the inherent problems of the New Mexicans. His vision did not take in direct political activism as a part of the solution, for he believed in the orderly process of social and economic evolution.

In a new preface to the reissue of For-

People of Sanchez

FORGOTTEN PEOPLE. By George I. Sanchez. Calvin Horn. 98 pp. $5.75.

PHILIP DARRAUGH ORTEGO

Mr. Ortego is a cultural linguist who teaches English language and literature at New Mexico State University.

In the publisher's introduction to the reissue of George I. Sanchez's definitive study of New Mexicans, Calvin Horn states: "It is a privilege to republish this long-standing New Mexico classic which 27 years ago dramatized the essence of the inherent problems of the people of northern New Mexico." And unfortunately Mr. Horn is right when he says: "It is sad to note that since the appearance of Forgotten People in 1940, little has changed in the condition of the northern New Mexican except the passage of time."

Underwritten by a Carnegie Corporation grant, Dr. Sanchez set out to study the plight of his people in rural New Mexico in those waning depression years of 1938 and 1939. His report of the economic, social and political conditions of Taos County, New Mexico, became the first edition of Forgotten People; the subsequent edition of 1940 was brought out by the University of New Mexico Press.

In those prewar days, the status of the Spanish-speaking New Mexican (a term which Dr. Sanchez prefers over the designation Spanish-American or Mexican-American) was pretty grim when measured with the Anglo socio-economic yardstick of the time. Then, as now, the Spanish-speaking New Mexican constituted more than half of the population of the state. And though descendants of Spanish colonials are a proud—one is almost too quick to say arrogant—people, the years of Anglo domination have reduced many of them to a pathetic level of economic peonism.

Dr. Sanchez declared his intent in the preface to the 1940 edition of his study: "to go behind and beyond the facts in an attempt to achieve subjective identification with the New Mexican and to give life to the facts and color to their portrayal." He did. And as a social philosopher he was right of course in his conclusion that "cold facts alone do not portray a society."

Of special interest to Nation readers is the publication of Gothic Politics in the Deep South: Stars of the New Confederacy, by Nation Washington correspondent Robert Sherrill (Grossman, $6.95). Several lengthy sections of the book first appeared in these pages. It is a study of the careers of seven Southern politicians: Leander Perez, Orval Faubus, George Smathers, James Eastland, Herman Tamadge, Strom Thurmond and George Wallace.

gotten People, Dr. Sanchez comments reluctantly:

In those distant younger days, though I did not ignore reality, I did harbor a modicum of optimism. Maybe, somehow, the forgotten people of my homeland would be remembered and redeemed. Maybe as the nation grew more affluent, and wiser perhaps, it would roll back the pages of history and pay the long overdue debt it incurred when it forced itself on my people. I had hopes, though very slim ones, that, at the very least, a repentant nation would help us lift ourselves by our bootstraps. Instead, it took away our boots! Where are our land grants, for example?

These are the land grants that were to be vouchsafed by the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo which transferred the southwestern territories from the Republic of Mexico to the United States and which the firebrand northern New Mexico leader, Reies Tijerina (el Tijere), with his diminishing Federal Alliance of Land Grants is trying desperately to reclaim now.

Dr. Sanchez concludes sadly: "For many of us, things are better than they once were. We eat better, we dress better, and we speak English without an accent. This is a good life. But, mine are still forgotten people."

Forgotten People is as relevant today as it was in 1940. It is one of the great books in the literature of the Southwest.

A Here and Now Hell

A CHANGE OF SKIN. By Carlos Fuentes. Translated by Sam Hileman. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 462 pp. $6.95.

ELMER BENDINER

Mr. Bendiner, writer and editor, is the author of The Bowery Man (Thomas Nelson).

To medieval man, as to fundamentalist preachers, hell was real but remote, waiting in an afterlife that made the sinner fear to die. Mid-century man, freed of myth, brings hell to life.

That is the particular horror of Carlos Fuentes' Inferno, passionately described in his latest novel, A Change of Skin. It is a hell of barbed wire and extermination ovens, napalm and corruption. Satan, in Fuentes' demonology, is power, wherever it is wielded: in Berlin, Washington, Moscow, or in the beds of sexual combat. Disenchantment is the food of hell's inhabitants, and romantic ideology the black mass.

The avenging angels are a band of pot-smoking, guitar-strumming youngsters in skintight pants. (No flower people, these.) Appropriately called the Monks, they hand down their judgments while fornicating in a Saturnalia that would revolt the demons of Hieronymus Bosch, although it may stir mere clinical interest among present-day readers.

Fuentes also differs from medieval explorers of hell in that he offers no clue to salvation. Or if he does, this wandering shade mistook it for another category of damnation. This is not impossible because Fuentes leads his readers through a tangled forest where symbols hang like Spanish moss and all the paths are quicksand.

The journey starts in a car driven by an architect who once planned the ovens for the Nazis while he mooned for his lost Jewish sweetheart. With him is an American Jewish woman, her Mexican husband who was once a promising romantic poet, and her husband's young Mexican mistress. They are bound from Mexico City to Veracruz during Holy Week.

Their lives are slowly pieced together in flashbacks that accumulate detail like a canvas on which a painter piles pigment until his figures seem like bas-reliefs. What at first appears to be romantic fiction—a poet and his bride on an Ionian island—turns slowly into something else. Sweet embraces become deadly duels and the bed turns into an arena. The Sudeten German student of architecture listens to Brahms, walks the ancient streets of Prague with his love, only to see her again in a death camp of his own design.

The poet who sacrifices women in the name of art—a pathetic, unfulfilled scholastic sort of art, at that—shares a Nazi-like guilt of cruelty in the name of a cause. And even the victims, however beautiful, turn unlovely at the end.

If this were not enough, a narrator, who cross-examines the characters and preaches to the reader, remorselessly

A Kane's-eye view of 'Europe's Other Half'

In this newest of his "A to Z" series, Bob Kane opens the curtain — wide: beds are frequently too narrow but bikinis are happily synonymous with beaches... Czechs can be bores but Poles perky... Americans and Russians are similarly gregarious, sensitive, fun-loving. Here it is — Romania's muraled monasteries, Hungary's still-great cuisine, Bulgaria's new Riviera, Yugoslavia's East-West mélange, Ulbricht's Berlin — a characteristically unvarnished Kane appraisal, from politics to packing, hotels to handicrafts, Moscow to the Moldau.

Covering 8 countries, EASTERN EUROPE A TO Z ($6.95) has just joined ASIA A TO Z ($5.75), AFRICA A TO Z, SOUTH AMERICA A TO Z, SOUTH PACIFIC A TO Z, and CANADA A TO Z ($4.95 each) at all book-sellers.

DOUBLEDAY

strips away whatever prettiness remains and lets the horror in. It is perhaps merciful that halfway through the book Fuentes stops the pretense that his characters are flesh and blood with whom a reader can identify. They become symbols like the skulls and skeletons that adorn the celebration of All Saints' Day in Fuentes' native Mexico.

Readers who expect a novel to be inhabited by people may at that point abandon hope and leave the book to those with a taste for modern miracle

THE SHOWER

In the steam of the shower that conquers the mirrors, your body drops its outlines to waver like a breath not taken between form and memory.

A moment before this flesh which now so easily abandons you bound me in love.

MICHELE MURRAY

plays and parables, magical portents and oracular mysteries.

A lesser writer than Fuentes following such a pattern might become ridiculous. And even Fuentes narrowly escapes that fate on occasion. Although his mysteries tantalize, his obscurities tend to irritate. Yet when his narrator becomes too explicit the prophet goes pedestrian. Those moments are awkward but they are only moments, however bad, and they pass. What saves the day for Fuentes is the intoxicating prose we have been led to expect from him. Here it is rendered from the Spanish into brilliant luxuriant English by Sam Hileman.

A Change of Skin can be—must be—read on many levels. As a philosophic plea for nihilism—if that is what it is—it is unimpressive. As social criticism it is devastating, but the shambles has been itemized before and the denial of even the tiniest light leaves a darkness one cannot see. There may be a kind of compassion, expressed most clearly for a manikin child born in the midst of a brothel's orgy, but pity is smothered in the sternness of Judgment Day.

As a new Old Testament prophet, however, Fuentes demands attention, and if the times call for an oracle to warn of doom, at least we have a voice that makes music when it cries in the wilderness.

Book Marks

THE SOPHOMORE. By Barry Spacks. Prentice-Hall. 207 pp. $4.95.

Spacks's hero is a runner; at 22 he is still a sophomore in college, has been trying to complete a paper on Aristotle and Plato for five weeks and likes to collect the last words of famous men. When the girl he's been living with lies to him and tells him she's pregnant, the sophomore guiltily leaves and accidentally meets his old roommate, an unhappily married college professor. The roommate and his wife return with the hero; naturally the roommate just barely does not make love to the girl friend, nor the sophomore with the roommate's wife. Until the runner becomes the coach, the track he follows is a never-ending circle. Luckily, Spacks's imagination is capable of a gentle self-irony that allows his characters to become more important than their problems; and though in his striving for a prose style he occasionally achieves the same faults for which he criticizes his characters—an arched mannerism that resembles wit but is only the absence of it—his honest feelings allow his novel to make a comment upon a quality of American middle-class life that is not solely restricted to those who comfortably nest within the groves of Academe.

HAIL, HERO! By John Weston. McKay. 215 pp. $4.50.

Mr. Weston's lyrical sensibility is on the side of the angels—that is, he is against war and hate and for youth and love; if his hero were the least bit attractive, he might have turned out a good propaganda novel. Instead this book about the day in a young boy's life when he sees his family for the first time in two years and is due to leave the next morning for boot camp because he has joined up, leaves one with the impression that the hawks are right: demonstrators are stupid, uppity kids. Karl, the hero, quotes some Shakespeare and knows Beowulf—so much for his brilliance; he has helped cripple his brother—so much for his sensitivity; he runs around his father's ranch in several different loin-cloths, or nude—so much for his love for freedom. His father, of course, is a brute; his mother is misunderstood and his crippled brother is going to pull through, while Karl goes off to war hoping to make his murderer love him. The real demonstrators and draft resisters on the contrary are circled by mortality and grow up; and the shedding of many of their obnoxious personal attitudes—so amply manifested in Karl—without the loss of their radical political sentiments is one of the most heroic things about them, worthy of one's respect; all Mr. Weston's hero commands is a vague sympathy—the kind we might feel for a sad buffoon.

PAXTON QUIGLEY'S HAD THE COURSE. By Stephen H. Yafa. Lippincott. 195 pp. $4.50.

Epithets from famous novels give impressive weight to insubstantial efforts; and the quote from Notes from the Underground that begins Mr. Yafa's first book at first seems only remotely concerned with this novel about an intelligent fraternity boy who, having affairs with three Bennington girls at the same time, is locked up in an attic by all of them and made to service them regularly every four hours. But, like a fraternity prank, the nature of the action quickly alters from cute to horrific, resulting in a small tragedy. The change, while it gives a certain interest to the novel—art imitating life—demands that the reader spend his time discovering the subject matter rather than the author's and his own points of view toward it—a definite weakness, but the only one in the book. Mr. Yafa is a writer of real talent and possesses an impressive and compassionate imagination; he has his own characters and prose style that at its best is neither cute nor mawkish. His achievement can be measured by the fact that, by the end of his lyrical narrative of first love and early squalor, Dostoevsky's prefacing remark seems more an accompaniment to Mr. Yafa's text than a gloss on it.

THEATRE

HAROLD CLURMAN

Joe Orton's Loot (Biltmore Theatre) was a hit in London and the winner of a critics' prize there three seasons ago. I have no very strong feelings about it. Its black humor did not offend me, its boldness provoked no great gusts of laughter in me. I came, I saw and I tried to understand why it left me very nearly indifferent.

It is a well-written play: its dialogue is fleet and spanking. Though its plot and technique are farcical, the play may be thought a satire. A couple of young men—one an undertaker's assistant, the other the son of a woman who has just died—have robbed a bank. They have hidden the booty in a wardrobe in the widower's home where the deceased is also lying in state. When a detective threatens to inspect the wardrobe the two culprits contrive to remove the loot by placing it in the coffin, having first wrapped the corpse in a blanket to make it look like a tailor's dummy and thrust it into the wardrobe. From this point the corpse—which has been undressed—is trundled back and forth, like a piece of troublesome luggage, in a series of imbrolios too frequent to enumerate.

Besides the youthful scamps and the stupidly brutal and corrupt sleuth from Scotland Yard, there is present a notorious killer who in the guise of a nurse has murdered the lady in the bundle as a first step toward marrying the widower, who would himself eventually be knocked off. At the final curtain it is arranged that the lethal lady will instead marry the undertaker's assistant who will probably fare no better than the other men whom she has wed.

The police are the butt of most of the jokes. Religion—especially the Catholic—is almost equally derided. Nor are love, sex, death spared mockery. The English, being a most respectful and respectable people, enjoy kicking over the traces in play. They make the best audiences for every sort of buffoonery, every "game" which permits them to loosen the braces of their etiquette. Hence the success of this play in London, where its whacky irreverence conveyed in smart speech meets with special appreciation.

Just as bedroom farce has almost disappeared from the stage because nowadays adultery is no longer of particular moment, so it seems to me that amorality can induce only a slight tremor of mirth in a time when a sense of morality has become more residual than real.

Loot makes the impression of having been written without any feeling at all; it seems disengaged even from the objects of its scorn. Orton's coldness leaves me cold. The horror in Pinter is cutting or funny because for all his air of detachment he is horrified. His jokes provide a mask to hide his hurt.

A further cause for my lack of response to Loot is the peculiar flaccidity in the production by Derek Goldby. Rapid-fire movement and delivery do not, as commonly supposed, make for pace. There is plenty of bustle in the show but little comic spirit. For all the dashing about the effect is one of inertia.

A capable cast—George Rose, Carole Shelley and others—ought to be hilarious, so the audience behaves as if they were. They aren't.

The extraordinarily fine company of the Vienna Burgtheater (Austria's national stage established as such in 1776) has opened a four-week season at the City Center. People interested in acting excellence should not fail to see at least one of the scheduled four productions. Theatre buffs will wish to see them all. For those who have no German, translations through earphones are supplied for a modest sum.

The first play given—a solid piece of writing and social observation—was Arthur Schnitzler's Professor Bernhardt, written in 1912. Schnitzler, best known here for Anatol and La Ronde (or "Roundelay"), composed either piquant or delicately mournful and always thoroughly civilized comedies and dramas reflecting the honeyed cynicism of Vienna's love life as the empire of which it was the capital waltzed to its extinction. But Professor Bernhardt is an altogether different sort of play. Fundamentally grim, it retains the grace of the gently melancholy smile characteristic of its author.

What is explored without heat or grimace is Austria's endemic anti-Semitism. Schnitzler was a doctor and Bernhardt concerns the scandal set in motion when the head of a hospital who happens to be a Jew refuses to allow a priest to administer extreme unction to a young girl about to die. Bernhardt's action is founded entirely on medical grounds: he maintains that the girl is unaware of her condition, is in fact living her last moments in a state of euphoria, hopeful of recovery. He wants her to pass away without the anguish which the sight of the priest would bring about. The girl does die immediately after she is informed that the priest has come to perform the final sacrament.

Due to various professional pressures within the hospital itself, in addition to the more or less declared anti-Semitism of certain factions within and around it, the incident becomes an "affair." Hitler and the consequences of the Anschluss are far in the future, but Schnitzler exposes the seeds from which they sprang.

There is no great strife or tragedy in the play—while sober its tone is generally light—however, Bernhardt is sentenced to prison for two months. On his release, he is reinstated in his position with the congratulations of most of his colleagues and the acclaim of his students. The play shows a great deal of Austrian society of the period (1910)—its manners, politics, charm, arrogance, constriction and self-deprecation.

The silken smooth acting is subdued, unemphatic, utterly convincing. This is a realism remarkable above all for its refinement. It is not psychological or soulfully profound in the Russian mode, nor distressed and turbulent as it occasionally is with us. It is a suave realism in which breeding, intelligence, a covert humor and genuine maturity are everywhere evident. It is "chamber music," with every actor in the cast playing like a master.

There is too a slight tinge of theatricality, an artful though never obtrusive exhibition of sheer skill—like a fragrance or a form of illumination which creates an aura the source of which we cannot detect. It is the very cream of Austrian craftsmanship, traditional and yet ever tasteful. Whether it can rise to the romantic heights of Schiller's Maria Stuart we have yet to see. But in the Schnitzler comedy, the company is supreme. I name no one in the large cast because all the actors stand on an equally high level according to the nature of their parts.

I love Chekhov's The Cherry Orchard too much to speak of the shortcomings of its production at the Lyceum by the A.P.A. Besides I have been spoiled in regard to this masterpiece because I first saw it staged by the "original" Moscow Art Theatre, with Stanislavsky as an unforgettable Gaev, and by several other Muscovite performances of a later date. The play is well nigh indestructible.

Though I have often discoursed—even ranted—about theatre art as an organism in which text and performance constitute the Play, I am tempted in this instance to reverse myself and say that if you have never seen The Cherry Orchard or only seen it once before (and that long ago) you will not be sorry to see it now. Chekhov's genius honestly treated—and one can credit its current presentation with honorable intentions at least—still shines through.

FILMS

ROBERT HATCH

The Producers is a trivial and largely unsuccessful slapstick comedy so complex as to plot and so stocked with only partly relevant incident that if I were to go into detail sufficient to make the action intelligible, it would take more space than the occasion warrants. So readers will have to accept much of what follows on faith—unless they care to check on me by seeing the picture themselves, a course I do not recommend.

Zero Mostel, playing a Broadway producer in decline, is given the larcenous idea of raising a great deal more money than he needs to produce a play, finding a script that is certain to flop, thus wiping out the backers' equity, and skipping the country with the balance of the kitty before the tax auditors catch up with him. Of course, if he intends to skip, there is no reason to put on a play of any sort; and again of course, anyone in show business knows you cannot raise money for an unspecified production (Mostel does it by being irresistible to lecherous old women). But plausibility is not a requirement of popular farce (Three Men on a Horse, The Captain's Paradise, Charley's Aunt). What is required is a steadily accelerating rhythm of belly laughs, and in this respect The Producers is worse than disappointing, it is frustrating to the point of physical distress. At least, I find two hours of aborted laughter a strain on the system.

Oddly, Mostel's great talent creates the discomfort. He is probably the great-

The Nation BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

- ☐ VIETNAM FOLLY
by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ THE FREE WORLD COLOSSUS: A critique of American Foreign Policy in the Cold War by David Horowitz (Hill & Wang, $6.95) $5.55
- ☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $3.95
- ☐ THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER by Ronald Sampson (Pantheon, $4.95) .. $3.95

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

4-8-68

est comic actor of the day, having combined a grotesque body and a demonic behavior with clear evidence of a brilliant and sophisticated mind to create numberless variations on the anomalies of human personality. If he were not in this film, there would be no reason to anticipate hilarity, but as it is he employs his prodigious energy to build the tension for one ecstatic explosion after another, only to have the climaxes misfire from some ineptitude of plot or inadequacy of supporting performance.

Thus, the play he finds, Springtime for Hitler, is marvelously promising, and its mad author, a still-fanatic subject of the Führer now raising pigeons on the lower East Side of New York, is played with splendid paranoia by Kenneth Mars. But when it is produced for the first-night audience, the show is an anticlimax. The opening scene, to be sure, is a very funny production number, its unrestrained bad taste kidding the corn of Broadway polish, but the following scene, when the theatre audience comes suddenly to life (thus destroying Mostel's con game), is so inane that the premise of the film collapses on the spot.

Thus also, Gene Wilder, who has the second major role as Mostel's co-conspirator, has been coached by Mel Brooks, author and director, in no response but petulance. Every time the camera switches from the fat man to the pale man, the laughter is snatched from your throat.

Lacking other inspiration (Mostel's tumbling of ready old ladies is not subject to much elaboration within the bounds of the most permissive taste), The Producers relies heavily on homosexuality. The theory is, presumably, that the sight of a man twitching his hips will infallibly knock a middle-class audience into the aisles. It used to be so—the anxious laughter booming hollowly through the house—but the dodge has been used too often of late to guarantee the old automatic response. And when flagrant mincing and eye-flapping is harped on as a major support of the jollification, the effect becomes mean, turning the theatre into a kind of bear pit. There is a homosexual way of being funny, but the assumption that it is inherently funny is as compassionate as milking laughs out of a cleft palate or a withered arm.

The last thing on earth that Zero Mostel needs for the display of his talents is a second-rate scenario. Next time, if he can't get a good script and a director who understands what he can say about the human species, he should come on screen as himself and improvise. Indeed, it's a good idea.

The book, Up the Junction, is a series of articles by Nell Dunn, most of which appeared first in the New Statesman, and which recorded the life she had found living and working with the factory girls of Battersea. The movie of Up the Junction centers on Miss Dunn, here called Polly and played by Susy Kendall, as a rich girl who has moved across the river from Chelsea to escape the hypocrisy of her parents' life and to share in the warm, colorful reality of the poor. She is no longer a writer (though the ghost of Miss Dunn is eerily suggested by passages in which Miss Kendall engages in what appears to be "observing"; that is, she abruptly turns catatonic and can be seen to "drink in" the atmosphere), and lord knows she is not interested in improving the conditions of the poor. She is an idiot (and this is rough on Miss Kendall, who is forced to say asinine things in a deeply thoughtful manner) who thinks that since the rich are miserable the poor must be having a ball. Watching her education at the hands of a van-driving boy friend is tedious at best, and infuriating if you know the savage, witty and heartbreaking documents from which the malarky is derived. A particularly irritating habit of the film is to derive "copy" from incidents in Miss Dunn's chronicles, but to pass them over without ever getting to the essence of what she was describing.

Otherwise, the picture is another in the current British working-class parade—filled with brutal detail but oddly polished and expensive looking. Are the "rock" bands up Clapham Junction way really that good, do the birds really wear their frippery with so much style, are the houses that clean and the boys that handsome (no bad teeth, no dandruff)? I begin to suspect that British film interests have built a Potemkin slum somewhere outside of London, for the use of directors interested in filming the lower depths under hygienic conditions. The director of this example was Peter Collinson.

Movies are booming in Eastern Europe, but that would be a poor reason to buy the product sight unseen. Something of the sort must have happened with I Even Met Happy Gypsies, a Yugoslav import that is first cousin to a Romany encampment at Radio City Music Hall. These gypsies, to be sure, play rough with knives and women and clomp about surrounded by great flocks of geese (they traffic in feathers) and up to their knees in mud. But it is still much ado about nonsense, crudely motivated, stiffly acted, morosely photographed and directed in a style of ill-connected short takes with mawkish regard for a steamy countryside. The bloodletting and lechery are punctuated by picturesque weddings, funerals and café scenes; there are gypsy fiddlers and a sultry singer who performs in a low register with much flinging of raven hair. One inexplicable scene has village maidens waltzing in couples on the mucky street while a man on a white horse curvets among them.

The hero, Bekim Fehmiu, much resembles Belmondo, and has capitalized on this good fortune by adopting some of the Frenchman's mannerisms. Even at second hand, it is instructive to see how Belmondo handles the ladies. Or so it seemed in the meagre context of Happy Gypsies.

PERSONALS

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: write Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 30 East 42 Street, N.Y.C. 10017.

"WELCOME TO THE LBJ RANCH". Uniquely hilarious record featuring L.B.J., Lady Bird, Bobby Kennedy, Rockefeller, Nixon, Dirksen, Goldwater, and Eisenhower. You will be delighted to hear speeches of these great men twisted into complete nonsense. Great for a party laugh. C.O.D. orders accepted, or rush $4.00 today to: Buerer, 2318 Sierra, Oakdale, California 95361.

BUTTONS, PEACE JEWELRY, POSTCARDS, POSTERS, psychedelia, etc. Unusual merchandise. Good service. Wholesale to all. 10c brings exciting free catalogue air mail. FREE SPEECH, INC., 28 St. Marks Place, N.Y.C. 10003

INTERESTED IN LIFE? Believe men should live each day to the fullest? So do humanists. For information write: Dept. N-1, American Humanist Association, 125 El Camino del Mar San Francisco, Calif. 94121.

FIGHT JUNK MAIL. Send it back at THEIR expense. Labels and instruction $1.00. Artichoke, P.O. Box 9123C, Bridgeport, Connecticut 06601

DISCOVER an intriguing, fun approach to meeting alert, literate Jewish singles. No computers used. For FREE analytical questionnaire write: Dept. N, OPERATION MAZELTOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036. (PL 7-3638)

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE

(Computerized Matching—All Ages)
"Let TEAM make you a team."

Write:

TEAM Project

245 East 30th Street
New York, N.Y. 10016, Phone 659-6020

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 4-8-68
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign Postage $2; Canadian Postage $1 per year extra)

Name.....

Address.....

City.....

State..... Zip No.....

Crossword Puzzle No. 1244

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Bat that should take care of both low and high pitches. (3,10)
- 10 One might think it old-fashioned in an honest Episcopalian. (3-4)
- 11 To some, it may sound like how to make pork better, but it has cordial connotation. (7)
- 12 Precipitate reaction, perhaps. (7)
- 13 One of Solomon's three thousand? (7)
- 14 In lieu of twists and ties. (7)
- 15 Fair, and not a frowner on birth, Gray recorded. (7)
- 16 We might look for them in business to get put wrongly to burial places. (7)
- 20 Act fast, if you want to catch who might be giving 8 to politicians. (3,4)
- 23 There are no such any more, said Edna St. Vincent Millay. (7)
- 24 It's rough around fifty to save anything! (7)
- 25 Very poor by comparison. (7)
- 26 Was Macbeth's tale-teller so? (7)
- 27 Wells Fargo bosses? Strange game, as strange as the answer! (5,8)

DOWN:

- 2 Certainly not a warlike theology. (7)
- 3 Temporary diminution of excitability. (7)
- 4 No longer valid as a permit. (7)

- 5 Leaves out. (7)
- 6 Marc Antoni was extremely inventive, it seems. (7)
- 7 Relative article, as a self-proclaimed sign of danger long ago. (7)
- 8 Paupers and papers might both appreciate them. (13)
- 9 Monkey all around this, after one going "pop"? You're likely to find one here at last! (8,5)
- 17 Everything in the examination should be tip-top. (7)
- 18 Managed the biggest office in some countries, putting things in order. (7)
- 19 Used to be rattled in the service! (7)
- 20 What a cleaver causes. (7)
- 21 Having an inclination to be acting like Don Quixote? (7)
- 22 It makes some tools fit, fit inside a red sort of container. (7)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1243

ACROSS: 1 Round steak; 6 Odds; 10 Ladybug; 11 Bravado; 12 Thin; 13 Coincident; 15 Vagrant; 16 Stilton; 17 Placates; 20 Sandman; 22 Oddfellows; 23 Knob; 25 Outwear; 26 Endorse; 27 Nude; 28 Persecuted.
DOWN: 1 Relative pronoun; 2 Undying; 3 Dabs; 4 Tugboat; 5 Albinos; 7 Dearest; 8 Shortening bread; 9 Parisians; 14 Parameter; 18 Audited; 19 Enlarge; 20 Sawyers; 21 Minaret; 24 Odic.

PUBLICATIONS

EDUCATIONAL CRITICISM. New, unusual views not found elsewhere!!! THE plus FREE bonus issue! Educational Research, Box 2703, G.P.O., New York City 10001

"Adventures of a Farm Boy" (non-fiction)—$2.00. Paul Burke, 201 S. 11 Avenue, Omaha, Nebraska 68131

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 111 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

THE FUTURIST, published bimonthly by World Future Society, reports scientists' forecasts for coming decades. Subscription: $5 yearly. Box 19285-N, Twentieth Street Station, Washington D.C. 20036.

'THE PRESS AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by

Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Fall issue of Columbia University Forum. It has already been selected for an anthology to be published by Atheneum this spring.

Single copies—15c

■ copies at 10c each

Orders over 25 at 7c per copy

THE NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

ART

WOULD YOU BELIEVE? EXCITING ORIGINAL woodcuts, etchings, lithos, $4.50 each. Subscription information: Graphic Circle, (N), 68 Fifth Avenue, New York City 10011

EDUCATIONAL

WE HAD A FOOTBALL TEAM, but they got interested in Plato. So much for football. Personal and academic freedom—for students who can hack it. Write Admissions N, Franconia College, Franconia, N.H. 03580.

TRAVEL

TOUR YUCATAN—July 8th, all expenses from New Orleans and return—12 unforgettable days —$400. MEXIVAC TOURS, P. O. Box 274, Lombard, Ill. 60148.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

TYPING WORRIES??? Expert Typing, Reasonable Rates. Manuscripts, doctoral and masters theses our specialty. Call (201) 667-5145

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74c ■ line (6 words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

"No, Lyndon Johnson is not insane; he is merely a common Southern precinct militarist, perfectly willing and certifiably able to use militarism for anything from winning votes to exploiting the pork barrel to, if need be, blowing up half the world in cornpone pique."

FREE with each NEW Subscription.
(Hardbound, retail price $5.00)

To The NATION 333 Sixth Ave. New York, N.Y. 10014

- ☐ I'll join the good fight for one year (48 issues). Enclosed is my check for $10. I understand you'll send me The Accidental President (FREE).
- ☐ I'll sign on for six months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6.

NAME

STREET

CITY STATE ZIP

The quote is from Robert Sherrill's
The Accidental President.

Never before, surely, have we had a President who so consistently misinformed the American people as President Johnson has, in leading the country and the world down a steepening trail to possible thermonuclear annihilation for all parties.

To welcome new readers we'll send new one-year subscribers a free copy of Robert Sherrill's remarkable study of the President that happened to us all by accident.

"Sherrill has written a provocative, challenging book with damaging statements of fact," reports the Saturday Review, concluding: "The analysis is sharp and tough, ■ befits the situation."

The book is being discussed across the country in reviews like these: "Sherrill's documentation is impressive The reader looks through ■ window usually barred except to members of the White House press corps or Washington insiders" (Ohio); " . . . a slugging summation of the American liberal's objections to L.B.J." (Virginia); " . . . a terrific haymaker right on the Presidential button" (Nebraska).

If you believe as we do, that documented work that pulls no punches is vital to democratic discourse on issues, why not subscribe now to The NATION and receive Robert Sherrill's The Accidental President as a free bonus from us? Mr. Sherrill is our Washington correspondent.

The good fight
is now in
THE NATION
—Why not
join now?

THE

NATION

BURLINGAME
APR 16 1968

LIBRARY

APRIL 15, 1968 35 cents

MARTIN LUTHER KING

"You have to weep for this country."

KENNETH CLARK

0-217887 PL-1449
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

classroom reality

Austin, Tex.

DEAR SIR: I have not read How Children Learn by John Holt, but Chandler Brossard's diatribe ["The Child's Style of Learning," The Nation, Mar. 11] about the "degrading" educational experience, "especially on the primary level," reveals an abysmal lack of acquaintance with pedagogical reality in this country. As an elementary schoolteacher, and a teacher of teachers, of forty-three years' experience, in one-room rural schools on through to graduate schools, here and abroad, I must state that Mr. Brossard is talking through his hat—and irresponsibly.

Maybe Mr. Holt is expert enough to be critical. I would want to know his credentials. Mr. Brossard, as "a novelist and author of a forthcoming book on Spain" offers not an iota of qualification for his condemnation of elementary schoolteachers and what goes on in classrooms.

I am tired of upstarts who tell us why Johnny can't read or, in this case, "why the child is systematically disengaged from his fragile dignity. . . ." We have empirical evidence that Johnny can and does read, avidly and extensively. Ask the book publishers, or just check the book stores and the libraries. . . .

George I. Sánchez

Mr. Brossard has taught at C. W. Post College and Fairleigh Dickinson. His ongoing interest in education has taken him to the experimental campus of the new State University College, Old Westbury, where he is associate professor in literature and social science.

Editors

Boeing

Seattle, Wash.

DEAR SIR: As an otherwise appreciative reader, I wish to correct the impression you seem to have of the Boeing Company as a war profiteer (an opinion I have noticed two or three times in recent issues).

The Boeing Company does the least defense work of all aerospace firms, that is, about 40 per cent of its sales for the past four years have been for the government.

Most of this 40 per cent is unconnected with the Vietnamese War. It includes such work as the Minuteman missile, the Saturn and the SRAM. The only work the Boeing Company does that is connected with the war is the Chinook helicopter, which is built by Vertol in Pennsylvania. The Chinook was conceived as a civilian helicopter, and was contracted for well before the Vietnamese build-up began.

As you see, the unfortunate opinions of Senators Jackson and Magnuson cannot be attributed to the location of the Boeing Company. Besides, Rep. Brock Adams, who comes from a district that is well described as all Boeing, is not exactly a flaming hawk.

C. I. Crawford abortion law

Beverly Hills, Calif.

DEAR SIR: Governor Reagan is not as blundering as you imply ["Humane Doctors: Inhumane Law," The Nation, Feb. 26]. The new California abortion law is so worded that, on maternal psychiatric grounds, it indirectly covers rubella (as you state) and any other deforming diseases—without naming them specifically. This broadly worded law is all that is needed—more specific listing of legal indications for abortion would be coercive to the physician and would be out of date much quicker than the previous 100-year-old "inhumane law."

Richard Thomas Barton, M.D.

EDITORIALS

MARTIN LUTHER KING

Within the shock of the murder of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. rests the additional shock of realizing that he was only 39 when the gunman found him. Dr. King emerged as the leader of his people's strength and dignity in Montgomery in 1956 (he was 27), and since then his has been the senior voice of moral integrity and humane determination in the United States. As Dr. Kenneth Clark said on the night of the slaying, "You have to weep for this country."

And it is by the grace of Dr. King's spirit that this whole country may mourn its loss. His generosity excluded no one, not the most complacent, not the most heedless, not the most bigoted, from the dream he had. He was a man capable of magnificent anger, but hate was not in him; he denounced the act, never the man. Hatred, indeed, was his single foe—both the hatred that steamed out of prejudice and the hatred which, in retaliation and frustration, the black people have been calling down on white society. Violence is now expected, but if Dr. King's spirit can live with us in the next few weeks it need not occur.

'Let Justice roll down like waters in a mighty stream,' said the Prophet Amos. He was seeking not consensus but the cleansing action of revolutionary change. America has made progress toward freedom, but measured against the goal the road ahead is still long and hard.

For many years, it was The Nation's privilege to publish Dr. King's annual report on civil rights, an address on the State of the Nation in the true sense of the phrase. The above quote comes from his article of March 15, 1965; it is typical of how his mind worked: Proud, unhampered by passion, perfectly understanding the size of the job to be done and utterly confident that men endowed with his spirit could do it.

The road is still long and hard, and this terrible killing, which could be motivated only by the malice of ignorance, makes it the more difficult to a degree no one can yet estimate.

But one thing is certain: we must march. We must march all together and in his name; violence is always irrelevant, in the context of Dr. King's life it is obscene. As the country knows, he had planned to enter Washington later this month at the head of a "Poor People's Crusade." That appointment must be kept—it is the solemn duty of the government to see that it is kept and that it goes forward in the spirit of magnanimous determination to let justice roll down that animated every action Dr. King took. And we should all be there, for now that Dr. King is slain, the title of his crusade takes on a different meaning: in his shadow, we are all "Poor People." Decency is all he ever asked of the country, and only by the decency of social justice and human respect can the country heal itself of this intolerable deed.

OCT 20
JAN 25

The President's Decision

Mr. Johnson made the decision we had repeatedly predicted he would make, and for the reason we had advanced—the logic of politics left him no alternative. The necessity was twofold: the war in Vietnam, for which he was primarily responsible in its phase of intervention with U.S. troops; and, as Ted Lewis pointed out in these pages (January 29), the fact that the Johnson personality itself had become a factor dividing the country and militating against his re-election. The news from Texas, as reported in the Dallas Morning News, that the war and his conduct of it had lost majority backing even in that most hawkish of states, must have been the iron that pierced Mr. Johnson's soul.

As for the President's personal make-up, it was hardly something that he could change, yet he could not but be aware that it had alienated a very large number—by all indications a majority—of his fellow citizens. Ironically, even after those traumatic moments when he suddenly announced his intention not to seek re-election, widespread skepticism persisted, and many people still are not wholly assured that he meant what he said. One of these, for example, is General Gavin, a soldier of distinguished achievement who has become wise in the ways of politics and business after his retirement from the Army. Rep. Wright Patman, a Johnson supporter, came on the air immediately after the speech to argue that the Democratic Party would never accept anyone but Mr. Johnson as its candidate. The President was not responsible for Mr. Patman's reaction, but it is worth noting that Mr. Patman did not take Mr. Johnson's solemn word as binding.

We do not read the statement that way; we take it at face value. The question that does trouble us is the validity of the policy change which the President coupled with his withdrawal. Had he not announced the latter, the former would have been of little consequence. One can see it in perspective by dismissing from one's mind the broadcast presentation and instead reading the text as it appeared in the early editions of the morning papers. This was the version the White House released to the press before the President went on the air, and it does not contain the withdrawal announcement. Without it, the gesture of de-escalation amounts to no more than a restriction of geographical area, which for the moment exempts most of the North Vietnamese population from bombing and in effect makes Hanoi and Haiphong open cities as long—and only as long—as that is the President's pleasure.

In every other respect the Administration's interpretation of history is reiterated without an iota of change: South Vietnam was invaded by North Vietnam, a total aggressor: the United States intervened, not in a civil war but to protect all Asia from the Red Chinese tyranny hovering over the continent; the Vietcong and the North Vietnamese are solely responsible for the devastation wrought by the Tet offensive, which was a failure for the enemy except that (one small concession) it did draw some ARVN forces back from the countryside into the cities. The lawfully elected government of South Vietnam was going to try harder, we would supply its forces with better weapons, and still another 13,500 American troops

IN THIS ISSUE

April 15, 1968

EDITORIALS

490

ARTICLES

494 No Longer a Sick Campaign

Ted Lewis

495 Poland: Anti-Semitism As Usual

Samuel L. Sharp

497 Counter Culture IV

The Future as Community

Theodore Roszak

503 Science for the Pentagon:

The Secret Thinkers

Michael T. Klare

504 Death Cheaters:

Not Gone but Frozen

Howard Junker

506 Harry Golden

507 Caucus for Reality:

The Asian Experts Discover Vietnam

Marilyn Blatt Young

BOOKS & THE ARTS

508 Who Won The Cold War

D. F. Fleming

509 The Archaic (poem)

David Ray

510 Freud and Reich

Paul Roazen

512 Nation Book Marks

Liam Lenihan

513 Music

Benjamin Boretz

515 Valmiki's Dance (poem)

Stanley Cooperman

516 Theatre

Harold Clurman

517 Films

Robert Hatch

519 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher

JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher

GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor

CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor

PHIL KENT

Executive Editor

ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor

HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 for Canadian postage; $2 for foreign postage.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION

Volume 206

No. 16

491

were being sent in. And the end: a "strong and confident and vigilant America" stands ready to make an honorable peace and to defend an "honored cause whatever the price, whatever the burden, whatever the sacrifice that duty may require." Except for the "duly elected" government of South Vietnam, it could all have been said two years ago.

Rumors of a response are coming in by short wave from North Vietnam as this is written. What position Hanoi will be found to have taken—dismissing the rodomontade which it will well understand is intended for domestic consumption and to protect Thieu and Ky from heart seizures—depends on many factors. How hard up are they militarily? What diplomatic pressures are being brought to bear by friendly nations and by U Thant and perhaps by the USSR? Do the North Vietnamese and the Vietcong feel that they have been a factor in Johnson's withdrawal and that they have thus gained a victory of sorts? Do they think he will be reasonable to deal with at the conference table—first, if he wishes to be; second, if he can defy extreme hawk sentiment at home? These are only samples of the parameters acting in a situation of this sort.

From Mr. Johnson's standpoint, only if he can come up with at least a cease-fire, or an armed truce like that in Korea, before the end of his term, can he count on the honorable place in history which is now the only thing left for him to seek. If Mr. Johnson's desire for peace has not become genuine, if by an "honorable" peace he does not mean one of mutual accommodation, he is victimizing all of us, but most of all himself.

Dissent and Politics

An argument which The Nation has consistently advanced finds vindication in the sequence of events culminating in the President's decision not to seek renomination. We have argued (the arguments were summarized in a talk by the editor on "Dissent and Politics" at the University of Michigan on March 28) that there can be no meaningful politics without dissent and no meaningful dissent without politics.

Politics is not a self-generating activity; it must be fueled by dissent. Politicians will repeat outmoded dogmas from one election to the next until—by pressure of strong, sustained dissenting opinion—they are finally forced to address themselves to new realities and new issues.

With dissent in eclipse throughout the cold-war years, a large measure of rot accumulated in the political system. Not surprisingly, therefore, there was no immediate political response when dissent over the war in Vietnam began to assume significant proportions. In anger and dismay, the efforts of the dissenters were redoubled; still there was no response. Then the rhetoric of protest became more vehement and the demonstrations more militant, as dissent "took to the streets." Still the same stolid brush-offs and stereotyped rejoinders. In despair, some of the protesters began to correlate the increased size of the demonstrations with the military escalations in Vietnam: the bigger the demonstrations, the more savage the escalations. Many participants in the growing resistance began to feel that the demonstrations were futile and that the political process had failed. Unnoticed, however, was the fact that public concern had deepened and the number of "converts"—in Congress, in the media, in mass organizations—had begun to increase. Even so, if anyone had suggested prior to January 1 that the protest movement might force the President to bow out, he would have been dismissed as a dreamer.

Yet the recent events are clearly a belated political response to the growing force and momentum of the protest movement. True, headlines have been a powerful catalyst—the Tet offensive, the gold drain, etc.—but events alone would not have produced the remarkable shift in opinion that has taken place since the early summer of 1967. The resistance (it is more that than it is a peace movement) can take major credit for what has happened. Again and again in these pages we have expressed admiration for the ingenuity and persistence of thousands of "concerned citizens" who, in default of political leadership and with virtually no organization, discovered—in many cases invented—unconventional means through which to give political expression to their feelings about the war. In volume, variety and inventiveness this movement has been quite without precedent: when the story is told in detail, it will constitute one of the most extraordinary chapters of our political history.

Ironically, this amazing demonstration of political vitality has been effected by a movement many elements of which professed to have abandoned all confidence in the political process! Yet the moment a means was found by which the mounting volume of disaffection could find political expression, the stalemate was broken. That means was the candidacy of Senator McCarthy. From then on, the accumulation of "unthinkable thoughts" rapidly set in motion a sequence of "impossible" events. At the moment, all that can be safely said is that the relationship between dissent and politics, between thought and action, is being re-established. But it is a good omen. Today as yesterday, thought without action is empty, just as action without thought is blind.

What Now?

The first duty of contenders for the Presidency—those now in the race and those who may enter—is to keep the Administration under constant pressure to seek a peaceful settlement of the war. The fact that the President has withdrawn from the race creates for him an opportunity to negotiate that is free of the suspicion that he might be using the negotiations for personal political advantage.

This is a net gain. But it would be a mistake to grant him carte blanche in the conduct of the war and the handling of whatever negotiations finally shape up. He is entitled to the "national unity" which he asserts as his paramount aim only if he seeks to unite the nation in pursuit of a peaceful settlement at the earliest possible date. That is what a clear majority clearly wants. If the President moves in this direction, he will need all the support he can get. If it comes to negotiations with the North Vietnamese and the National Liberation Front, the hawks will be standing invisibly behind our negotiations and making a difficult task next to impossible. The President will also have to stand firm against hawkish pressure from the Joint Chiefs. Also, our dear allies in South Vietnam are quite capable of trying to upset any negotiations that may be undertaken. In brief, the President expects too much if he expects that he should now be granted unrestricted freedom of action simply because he is not a candidate.

By retiring from the race, the President has focused a new and sharper light on all those who aspire to succeed him; these contenders will now be put to new tests of their fitness for the Presidency. "Running against Johnson" is out; the contenders must now address themselves to issues, to policy questions, and to their conception of what Presidential leadership entails. They must demonstrate courage and intelligence in criticizing the President should he hesitate to pursue a peaceful settlement, and in supporting him when he does. By removing himself as the target, the President has made all the contenders subject to a new and closer scrutiny. For it is quite likely that the President's successor will have to carry on any negotiations which may get under way between now and the end of the year. Which of the candidates, of both parties, would prove most reliable and skillful in pressing negotiations to a successful conclusion? Which man would be most likely to place such negotiations in jeopardy?

One of the windfall benefits of the President's decision is that it must place all the contenders on their mettle. At such a time, in such a situation, the public should look for qualities other than the ability, for example, to incite a frenzy among students. What the public must determine is which candidate best exemplifies the qualities essential to Presidential leadership—an extremely difficult and dangerous phase of our national history. These qualities, in some respects, are different from the ones that have applied in the past.

It is part of Mr. Johnson's personal tragedy that he has never understood what Presidential leadership entails in the context of the New Politics. In our view, Senator McCarthy's most notable contribution to the campaign to date consists in his clear specification of the nature of Presidential leadership today. As he sees it, a President must recognize the limitations of his power, precisely because so much power is vested in the office. He must not conduct a "personal" Presidency, of the type that President Johnson enforced, with results that are now painfully evident. He must not operate the Presidency in a conspiratorial manner, with emphasis on "secrecy" and intrigue; nor must he seek to manipulate (as opposed to rallying and leading) public opinion. On the contrary, he must be able to win and hold public trust and confidence through demonstrated personal and political integrity—i.e., the integrity of his conception of the office—and through his ability to communicate with the people. He must conduct an "open" Presidency, in which the people can participate. Before November, voters must engage in some hard thinking about the Presidency as an institution, and the executive qualities that it requires. President Johnson's misconception of the office, and the style of leadership it requires nowadays, makes it the more imperative that his successor should understand the role of the President in the setting of the New Politics.

The Chorus and Miss McCarthy

Chorus (Second stasimon, Oedipus, the King):

My lot be still to lead
The life of innocence and fly
Irreverence in word or deed

The press, like the Greek chorus, is the expression of vaguely opinionated norms. It seldom ventures, it seldom shows any but minute alterations. Now and then a Thespis comes out of it in the form of a Lippmann or a small-circulation periodical such as this one, but it usually turns out that Thespis was never really in the choric guild, that he has worn the outfit only to promote solidarity.

The choric nature of the press shows itself clearly in Presidential election years: the candidates it settles upon, the questions it asks those candidates. Thus Senator McCarthy is always asked if he will release his delegates to Senator Kennedy at the convention; but, oddly enough, Senator Kennedy is rarely asked if he will release his to Senator McCarthy. The press, on the whole, has settled them into roles: Senator McCarthy (to paraphrase Shaw) is to play horse to Senator Kennedy's Lady Godiva.

The erosive power of choric insistence was charmingly illustrated the other day by Senator McCarthy's marvelous 18-year-old daughter, Ellen. Asked again if it were true that it was she who'd suggested that her father run, she said: "In January, I was denying it, in February, I'd forgotten whether or not it was true. Now I'm admitting it."

The nice thing about press and chorus is that, except for personal safety, they have no long-term interests. Thus the press must be credited for reporting Miss McCarthy's contribution to what we can hope will be the popping of its own bubble.

RICHARD STERN

Act of Sanity

For the first time in three decades, California's Criminal Syndicalism Act, adopted during the red-scare era following World War I, was invoked in 1966. A Los Angeles man was indicted under the statute, which forbids teaching, advocating, aiding or abetting crimes of violence to effect political change or to change industrial ownership. The man's offense was to distribute Progressive Labor Party leaflets outside an inquest into the death of a Negro shot by a policeman. The leaflets said in part: "Revolution is necessary . . . Revolution means a complete overthrow of the system. No accommodation! No compromise!"

No act of violence was charged against the man, 24, a Negro and a former Mississippi civil rights worker. His attorneys, losing in the state courts, appealed to the federal district court. They argued that the law was so broad that it suppressed free speech. Agreeing with that contention, a three-judge panel unanimously held: "The assertion of doctrinal justification of criminal syndicalism, or of any other doctrine, however repulsive or unpatriotic, clearly falls within the protection of the First and Fourteenth Amendments, and such conduct may not be proscribed by statute." After a half-century of nonsense, the federal judges countered California's Syndicalism Act with an act of sanity.

NO LONGER A SICK CAMPAIGN

TED LEWIS

Mr. Lewis is head of the Washington bureau of the New York Daily News.

Washington

President Johnson's political exit removes from the campaign the man whom millions of thoughtful Americans strongly felt they could not endure for four more years. Now the nation is in a position to express its preferences among a group of Presidential candidates, any of whom (except George Wallace) it could "live with" through 1972. An immediate assessment of the impact of Johnson's withdrawal on the remaining Presidential aspirants in all parties would be witless and parochial. What is nationally vital and sublimely relevant is that his voluntary action has eliminated the deplorable "hate issue" from this year's campaign.

From now through the November election the partisan debate will be no longer sick but comparatively healthy. The fundamental issue of Johnson's image, a national calamity in itself, is gone. From this time on, it can be said hopefully, the country will no longer be obsessed by anti-Johnsonism, and can turn its attention to more profitable concerns.

This then is the gain that can be assessed without delay. It means for the Republican Party that it cannot expect "just any old candidate" to lure the votes of Democrats and independents who have been disillusioned, disgusted, or discouraged by the way Johnson has handled the Presidency. A constructive approach is now required of Richard M. Nixon—clear, specific alternatives to the controversial foreign and domestic policies of the present Administration.

The same return to normalcy in campaign procedure must similarly be followed by Robert F. Kennedy and Eugene McCarthy. They cannot continue to promise simply that they will lift the country out of the swamp of despair, an appeal for support aimed at attracting those millions of Democrats who are upset by Johnson's response to the war, inflation and slum unrest. Thus, in any count of blessings, the chief one is the elevation of the campaign to a more decent and substantive level. The personal involvement of so many millions has, as a result, already begun to be less emphatic. The youth movement, for example, must begin to lose its punch, because the political villain is no longer there to supply the anti-hero adrenalin that induces the crusade spirit.

While it lasted, this personal involvement of an unprecedented number of millions of Americans was an uncontrollable and incalculable force. It clearly was of such dimensions as to greatly disturb the President, convincing him that the popular will demanded de-escalation in Vietnam and that in order to change his policy effectively he would, at the same time, have to renounce second-term intentions. But it was a force which, while it might produce good, sprang from prejudices, coupled with deep frustrations and distrust of the President that fed on racial discord, on economic and sectional schisms. Its prime rallying point was not to achieve some goal; it was, rather, antipathy for the President, as a person.

It therefore follows that this force has now lost much of its reason for being. This change may not be immediately apparent, but it will become so during the summer and fall. The threat of riots in the streets, surpassing those ugly disturbances of a year ago, has diminished. The mere departure of the President will make it definitely less hazardous to travel to and from the convention auditorium in Chicago next August. So in a real sense, personal involvement in this campaign now becomes more constructive than destructive, less fiery and more tolerant.

Jensen-Sunday Telegraph, London (Ben Roth)

Any effort to analyze the effect of Johnson's retreat on the nomination chances of McCarthy and Kennedy must be hazardous. Each has already changed his political style. Each hopes that the President will remain neutral. Each must of necessity refrain from further hard thrusts at Johnson's conduct in office, both in connection with the critical problems at home and with those in Southeast Asia. Johnson has not changed the past by vacating the Presidency, but he is now a noncombatant and voters will want his critics to respect that aloofness.

So it can be confidently expected that what barbs are fired by the two candidates in his own party will be aimed at Hubert Humphrey in the climactic months before the convention. Humphrey's chances for the Presidential nomination look now to be exceedingly remote, but he must speak out politically as the chief Administration partisan orator. He will be tied to the past in a sense that Johnson now is not, and he will be thought fair game.

At this time of writing, the dust of the President's speech is far from settled. Victories in one or two primaries, New Hampshire and Wisconsin, do not hold much portent for McCarthy. Neither, for that matter, would Kennedy triumphs in Oregon, California and Indiana point unmistakably to his nomination. Too many unpredictable events are likely between now and late August. The present key issue of Vietnam would fade away should Hanoi show a disposition to negotiate. The crisis in the cities could turn on the basic issue of law and order rather than on more federal funds. The popularity polls could show McCarthy stronger than Kennedy in a race against Nixon, or Humphrey stronger than the other two Democrats.

There are political uncertainties for Nixon too. Nelson Rockefeller might suddenly find that events have worked to his advantage, producing a genuine grass-roots draft.

But what was once the foremost and most tragic issue of this election year has disappeared for good. The question of whether one likes or violently dislikes the personality of Lyndon Baines Johnson is not going to be the decisive factor.

POLAND: ANTI-SEMITISM AS USUAL

SAMUEL L. SHARP

Mr. Sharp is professor of international relations at The American University in Washington, D.C., and the author of Poland: White Eagle on a Red Field (Harvard University Press). He is currently in Germany on sabbatical leave.

To someone who spent thirty years of his life in Poland, the noises currently emanating from there have, somewhat perversely, the reassuring quality of the familiar. Whether it is "the Jews" or "the Zionists" who are being blamed for the unrest among young intellectuals and students, it all sounds, in a way, "normal." In the period between the World Wars a joke of sorts often heard in Poland was built around the statement that anything untoward was the fault of the Jews and the bicycle riders. The humor lay in the standard reaction to this statement: Why the bicycle riders? It was normal to blame the Jews, and apparently it still is. What puzzles and distresses many outsiders is that this should be so after the cataclysmic changes which have affected Poland in general, but most radically the once flourishing Jewish community there. How is it possible—many ask—that there should be virulent anti-Semitism in a country whose Jewish population has been reduced from more than 3 million to less than 30,000? Why do the authorities still find it convenient to cater more or less officially to anti-Semitism?

Such puzzlement betrays an ignorance of the psychology and sociology of prejudice. It is precisely the quasi-total success of Hitler's "solution" that exposes those who survived it or returned after it to an attitude of resentment which operates on various levels. On the lowest "zoological" level, the Germans were blamed for not living up to their reputation for thoroughness. Resentment was directed against those who would show up in their former haunts and attempt to reclaim property—a piece of real estate or merely a pair of candlesticks—that had somehow been "inherited" by Poles (not necessarily collaborators with the Nazis). On another level, anger was directed at the disproportionately large number of Jews in the apparatus of the new regime, including economic and cultural management. Why "so many" Jews were to be found in the postwar governing elite is obvious. Interwar Poland easily bred alienation, especially among the ethnic minorities, and there were indeed many Jews in the ranks of Poland's then illegal Communist Party. After World War II the bulk of the ethnically Polish intelligentsia was in exile or hostile to the new regime, and the apparatus had to be recruited from those available and willing to work.

Poles have somewhat strict standards as to what constitutes "too many" Jews. The peculiar circumstances of postwar Poland made the now tiny Jewish minority stick out even more than before. As a result of the expulsion of the Germans, extermination of the Jews and frontier changes which put the Ukrainians and Byelorussians within the borders of an enlarged USSR, post-1945 Poland was more homogeneously Polish (and technically more Catholic, too) than it had been before. This national homogeneity was one of the few things which the masses of the Polish population liked about the new regime. In a privately circulated report written after a visit to Poland in 1948, I suggested that under the specific circumstances of the country the position of its Jews, although on the surface not too bad, was precarious:

The maintaining of a distinctly separate cultural pattern and even separate political institutions by a group of some eighty thousand people in a strongly nationalistic country cannot, in my opinion, continue indefinitely. In this respect there is little "hope" beyond temporary survival. Genuine hopes of most Jews in Poland are connected, as they were before, with the possibility of leaving the country. . . . Should the possibilities of a regular and orderly emigration reappear, it is safe to assume that 70 per cent or more of the Polish Jews would choose to leave the country of haunting memories and precarious survival. . . . The hope of emigration is the only specific hope entertained by the majority of Polish Jews, i.e. by those who either do not want to lose their national and cultural identity or do not believe genuine assimilation possible. . . .

The prediction of the number of Jews who would want to leave the country proved to be almost perfectly accurate once the possibility of emigration reappeared after 1956. The last passage of the cited report also seems to have retained its validity twenty years later, not because of any particular insights on my part but because it addressed itself to the persistent dilemma of an ethnic minority in an environment of prejudice. Those who look for "reasons" to explain prejudice which is by definition irrational, forget that it has nothing to do with what its target group does or fails to do. In Poland after 1918, Jews were blamed when they stuck to their traditional ways—they were then called an alien element in the body politic; but they were also blamed when they tried to lose their Jewish identity and gain recognition as genuine Poles. Much of this attitude has survived, in spite of misleading appearances to the contrary and contrary to some recent official statements.

There has been something unreal about the surface vigor of social and cultural activities among the surviving Jews in postwar Poland; and an air of particular unreality to the appearance of special government solicitude for those activities. To mention just one example: the state support of a Jewish (Yiddish language) theatre directed by the famous actress Ida Kaminska, a theatre whose potential audiences are dead. A defector from Kaminska's troupe on the occasion of its recent visit to this country stated flatly that the theatre was kept alive "as a tourist attraction and an export that brings in a double income: money and propaganda" (Henryk Grynberg, in Midstream, March, 1948). However, the really poignant group is not the Jews who want to preserve their identity but the assimilated who consider themselves Communists first or Poles first. Their situation, especially in the higher ranks of the government, was at all times tinged with unreality; their very presence belied the only gift of the regime that was meaningful to the masses: a Polish Poland. Some were removed from power as "Stalinists," others are now being attacked as Zionists or as "rootless cosmopolitans" in a belated echo of Stalin's line.

The situation, in spite of the disturbing example set by developments in the Soviet Union, need not have become acute. In the current flush of interest in what the Czechs are doing, it may be forgotten that it was in Czech-

Pierre, Aux Ecoules, Paris (Ben Roth)
Gomulka and the Students

oslovakia that people were executed years ago as "Zionist spies." In Poland, even at the peak of Stalinism, extreme measures were rare. That, incidentally, is how Gomulka survived when his counterparts in other Eastern European countries went to the gallows. High officials of Jewish origin might have continued their precarious hold on leading positions in government, the national economy and in the universities had it not been for the intrusion of external factors which transformed a latent issue into an explosive one. In fact, there was a convergence of factors: the Arab-Israeli war and its repercussions in the Soviet bloc countries, the outbreak of student unrest which combined the global malaise of youth with specific local grievances, and the storm kicked up against this background of dissatisfaction by the intervention of the censors in the production of Dziady, a 19th-century piece of romantic grandiloquence by the poet Adam Mickiewicz, with anti-Muscovite digs which can be either understated or "escalated" by stress and intonation.

The June, 1967, war between Israel and the Arab states had called forth manifestations first of anxiety, then of relief and pride among the Jews in Poland (and elsewhere in the Soviet bloc countries). This would in itself cause no particular reaction were it not displayed in the face of an officially anti-Israeli stand taken by the Soviet Union and faithfully echoed by the Polish authorities. Much more disturbing than the feelings of pro-Zionist Jews has been the reaction of certain elements in the military leadership. As some Polish generals saw it, the Soviet Union was pouring more and better equipment down the Arab rat hole than was being made available to Warsaw Pact countries. To counteract such an attitude, it had to be denounced as "Zionist," although few if any Jews were involved in this phase of the action. The alleged assistance of West Germany to Israel was also dragged in, and it is always fairly safe to play on anti-German attitudes in Poland. In the process, the distinctions between "Zionists," "Jews" and "Neo-Nazis" were somehow blurred.

Beset by various problems, most of them of a structural nature and not capable of an easy solution even by brighter planners than those who run Poland, the regime is also in the throes of a struggle for political power and, apparently, for the succession to the ailing Gomulka. The less pressure a country of the Soviet bloc suffers from Moscow, the more "native" does the style of its internal political struggles tend to become. In Poland, therefore, something would definitely be missing if the Jewish issue were not pulled in. Though there is no direct connection between the repercussions of the six-day Arab-Israeli war and the current unrest among students and intellectuals, it was convenient to lump the two, because the first one may be claimed to involve the international position of Poland, and deviation from the government line on such issues can be easily classed as akin to treason.

In the struggle for power, Gomulka occupies the "centrist" position and it is therefore not surprising to see him resort to typical "centrist" tactics. Since he could not quite give the "Partisans" a free run with the Jewish issue, he decided to use an aspect of it himself—the plausible sounding attack on "Zionism" as an imperialist tool.

However, as study of the full text of his by now notorious speech to the party activists of Warsaw shows, he went beyond the "Zionist" aspects of the problem and raised the basic issue of what he described as the need on the part of Jewish citizens for a clear self-definition (samookręślenie) of their position in today's Poland. He described some Jews as being connected rationally and sentimentally with Israel rather than with Poland; he promised emigration passports to those who wished to go where their real loyalties lay. Gomulka specifically attacked the distinguished writer Antoni Slonimski for clinging to "cosmopolitan" attitudes, and stated rather ominously that people with such feelings and views should not be employed in areas where "national affirmation" is necessary. Slonimski is a fascinating case of a life-long attempt to legitimize the desire for a genuinely Polish identity. Though born to a father converted to Catholicism, Slonimski is also the grandson of Chaim Zelig Slonimski, editor and publisher of the first Hebrew weekly in Poland. He has in the past written some foolish things about Jews (Gomulka quoted at him an "anti-Semitic" piece he had written back in 1924), but he has also taken a very courageous stand on cultural freedom. To round out Slonimski's problems one must add a detail of not-frivolous meaning in Poland; an apparently vengeful Jehovah has endowed this son of a defector from the fold with a strikingly Semitic appearance. He is an ideal target.

This leads to the brunt of Gomulka's attack on some Jews—his statement that certain participants in the recent student disorders were "of Jewish origin or nationality" and the offspring of parents occupying responsible and even very high positions in the government. In Gomulka's somewhat obscure language, this has caused a "distorted interpretation of the slogan of struggle against Zionism." Yet, distorted or not, the procedure of visiting the sins of sons on their fathers has already extended to the removal from his top party and government position of an old and devoted Communist, Roman Zambrowski, born Reuben Nussbaum. Others will no doubt follow. What role the children of the privileged have played in the recent unrest we do not know, although by inference from other societies, East and West, it would not be surprising to find them among the leaders of a protest against the system. They most certainly were not agents of any CIA-Zionist-West German conspiracy. But it is quite possible that these sons and daughters of parents who had hoped to gain for their children a lasting and unquestioned place in the Poland of their choice have become converted to a militant Jewish and even Zionist identity by the evidence of stubborn rejection staring them in the face.

COUNTER CULTURE IV

THE FUTURE AS COMMUNITY

THEODORE ROSZAK

Mr. Roszak, an associate professor of history, is chairman of the History of Western Culture Program at California State College, Hayward. He edited and contributed to The Dissenting Academy (Pantheon Books).

A middle-aged man—a novelist and social critic—is watching several kids play a game of "down the river" in a busy city street. In particular, his eyes fall admiringly on a 17-year-old boy who has organized the game and who is his homosexual partner. The boy is a college dropout, a gifted social misfit in a society that cannot make place for his irrepressible, if tactless, honesty. But he knows how to organize a ball game and can lose himself gracefully in the spontaneous fun of the little community of players that has crystallized around him. And for that, especially, the man loves him. The game gathers pace, taking on the beauty of lively young bodies immersed in play. But then the shop owner whose wall has been appropriated for the game appears, and for no sensible reason, calls a cop to disperse the kids. The man does not, and the boy cannot, stand up to the cop's authority. The kids scatter. The boy turns on the man for having failed to challenge the cop, for having "betrayed natural society." Afraid that the boy will go sour-cynical, the man skillfully maneuvers their confrontation through tears, outrage, sardonic humor. And yet, the man himself is stricken with a shame and powerlessness that must be vented. That night he is scheduled to broadcast a social commentary over New York's listener-supported radio station. The subject he chooses is the traffic problem, and he enters an impassioned plea for outlawing the private automobile from the city and giving the streets back to the natural activities of play and leisure. He produces a practical proposal to that end.

The scene is from Paul Goodman's most recent novel, Making Do. Located in the middle of a work of fiction, the chapter is called "Banning the Cars from New York" and is a serious discussion of that issue. Surrounded by a cast of fictitious characters, the central figure of the novel, the middle-aged social critic, is pure autobiography. Thus, the scene, like the whole book, is a peculiar mix of the actual and the imaginary: in the small space of a single incident, it neatly distills much of what Paul Goodman is all about.

Focusing on a spontaneous and joyous human activity, the civic issue builds up from the problems of children. The wide-ranging social analysis is rooted in the thwarted animal needs of young bodies at play. The philanthropic care for society emerges from a man's physical love for a boy. The man and the boy in their confrontation relate as Gestalt therapist to patient, channeling their anger and frustration into a rough, immediate give and take aimed at producing tears and then humor. The man's political modus operandi is precise intellectual discourse via an independent radio station. The initial object of his practical proposal is the reclamation of the city, of a particular city—New York—in order that it might become a human community once again. And behind the contemporary scene there looms the Socratic paradigm: the wise citizen loitering in the agora to play mentor to a youth he loves body and soul, and in whom the future of the polis resides. So the incident ends with the bitter-sweet credo: "This I did with all my will and apparently indefatigably (but I will one day drop with weariness)—I invented a different practical world than this world that made no sense and took the heart out of me. Instead of resigning, I reacted, in moments of despair, by thinking up something else, and behaving as if this more pleasing landscape might indeed come to be the case."

Where and how does one begin to understand a figure as complex as Paul Goodman? Much of what the young, whose champion he has become, know about him derives from his essays and lectures in social criticism. But a novel is perhaps the best place to begin, for it is primarily as a novelist (and poet) that Goodman understands himself: a creative writer who cannot, however, exclude the torments of the real world from his imaginative excursions, and who in both his novels (Empire City, Making Do) has chosen the frustrated aspirations of youth in quest of education as his primary means of expression.

From his early background as poet and novelist, Goodman draws the visionary gift that distinguishes his style of social analysis. With this vision he has created the vivid images of a new society to which the young, in their desperate need to grow up sanely in an insane environment, have responded. An artist who sets himself to making a critique of social ills is bound to play the role of a utopian, an inventor of better worlds, who cannot, like the conventional sociologist, let the tyranny of established fact monopolize the discussion of human possibilities.

If Goodman's Communitas (his first major social statement, written in collaboration with his architect brother, Percival, in 1947) is the best study of city planning to appear in postwar America, it is not only because the critique insists on treating the problems of the city as part of the problems of the economy at large but mainly, I think, because the spirit of artistry hovers over the book from start to finish. It has wit, satirical bite, the power of imagery. Only a novelist could have depicted the impending idiocy of our postwar affluence as Goodman did in his projected "City of Efficient Consumption"—one colossal department store whose citizen-shoppers indulge, at the end of each year in a Walpurgis Night of riotous destruction which clears away the inventories and ungluts the economy.

The city emerges from the pages of Communitas not as a depersonalized amalgam of real estate values, traffic and utilities control, zoning legalities, etc., but as an arena of human drama: "a choreography of society in motion and in rest." Thus, the city becomes a background against which people loom large in their erratic, inventive search for organic and spiritual fulfillment—which is how Balzac saw Paris, Joyce saw Dublin, Dickens saw London. One realizes at once that, compared to human community as Goodman discusses it, "city planning" in modern society is a species of low-level gadgeteering. Lacking the utopian imagination Goodman brings to the subject, it creates no "city" and no "planning," but only bureaucratic tinkering within the disintegrating status quo.

'Those People Outside'

In the lethargy of postwar America, the utopian theorist inevitably finds his audience among the disaffiliated young. To be sure, the depth and complexity of Goodman's thought deserves an audience of greater maturity, but where is it to be found? In October, 1967, he was by some weird happenstance invited to address a conference of the National Security Industrial Association, representing the adult power structure of the warfare state and the rampant proliferation of technical prowess. Being responsible adults endowed lavishly with the power and treasure of the nation, the conferees should have taken Goodman's words to heart as serious matter for discussion, even though his proposal was that the association phase itself out of existence as rapidly as possible.

Of course they should have. But of course they didn't, as Goodman well knew they wouldn't. He did not speak to them or for them. And when he reached his conclusion—"We believe . . . that [your] way of life itself is unnecessary, ugly and un-American; . . . we cannot condone your present operations; they should be wiped off the slate"—he was greeted by shouts of "Who are we?" His answer: "We are I and those people outside." And who were the "people outside" for whom the country's leading social theorist spoke? They were a contingent of college students whom Goodman had invited to picket the auditorium during his presentation. Again and again Goodman bemoans the fact, but his force as a public voice derives in the end from his "crazy young allies." Whenever he speaks, one feels sure there is a contingent of the young somewhere nearby, already inscribing his words on a banner.

But it is not utopianism alone that has made Goodman the foremost tribune of the youthful counter culture. "Mad Ireland," Auden said, speaking of Yeats, "hurt him into poetry." So mad America hurt the would-be poet Goodman into political activism. His criticism, like that of C. Wright Mills, is shot through with the imperative need to "do something" about the mess at hand. His utopianism functions as the hypothesis of a true pragmatism, the beginning of a real project. This urgent effort to marry action to idea has not only won him the allegiance of young radicals but has served also as a highly important discipline upon the anti-intellectuality toward which they weaken. Youthful restiveness with talk and thought—the desire to get on with the picketing and demonstrating—is a reaction against the academicism of many social critics who, despite their own spleen, have been content to settle for a good analysis and some verbal sniping.

Goodman, in contrast, has been the example of an intellectual in whom both precise, even scholarly, thought and action can reside. He has shown that the balance can be held gracefully. (Those who want to meet Goodman at his academic best should turn to his Structure of Literature; 1954.) In an essay of the early 1960s on "The Ineffectuality of Some Intelligent People," Goodman coined the phrase "a practical syllogism" to illustrate the intellectual paralysis of the time. "I need an X," the critic says. And his analysis leads him to the conclusion, "Here is an X." Then take it, Goodman urges, and use it. Is it a "general strike for peace" we need? During such a strike in 1961, Goodman was on the street outside Random House, picketing his own publisher. Is it a new form of university we need? Goodman ends his critique of higher education in The Community of Scholars with the call for a mass defection from the universities and the establishment of new dissenting academies—a "something" that can be done now. The defection has since taken place, spilling over into the many "free universities" that are springing up, and Goodman was on hand at one of the best of them, San Francisco State's "Experimental College," to offer a year of his time in residence. Most recently, he has been among those who, like Dr. Spock, have been willing to place their own fortunes and sacred honor behind the student draft resisters. The contribution he has made by such activity is inestimable, for if the respect for intellect is to be preserved among the disaffiliated young, the job must be done by those intellectuals who have demonstrated that thought is not sheerly "academic," but the concomitant of principled action.

Revolution as Psychology

There is still another reason why Goodman has caught on among the young. As I tried to show in preceding essays, the counter culture provides a limited market for the Old Left ideologies with their final appeal to the metaphysics of the class conflict and their primary commitment to institutional reorganization. I suggested that youthful fascination with exotic religion and narcotics is a symptom of the quest for some new foundation that can support a program of radical social change. And so, sociology has yielded to psychology as the generative principle of revolution. Consciousness, not class, is now taken to be the root of social reality—hence the often absurd, but always intriguing exploration of mystical and psychedelic experience.

In 1951, well before he had made much of a mark as a social critic, Goodman contributed the lengthy theoretical section to Gestalt Therapy (co-written by Frederick Perls and Ralph Hefferline). It is probably among the least read of his writings, but it is surely one of his most important. For the ground of Goodman's style of thought lies as much in his work as a Gestalt therapist as in his novels. Gestalt psychiatry provides the skeletal structure of any "system" Goodman's thought possesses; it defines him clearly as "New Left" in his conception of human and social reality.

I claim no special authority on Gestalt, one of the more controversial schools of post-Freudian psychotherapy. Even Goodman loses much of his lucidity when writing on the subject—and he is by far the most accessible of the Gestaltists I have attempted. I can try, however, to draw out three major characteristics of the school which one finds echoed throughout Goodman's writing and which strike me as very much the kind of "first principles" toward which the counter culture is groping.

First, there is the mystical "wholism" which the therapy inherits from Gestalt theories of perception. For Gestaltists, perceptions are not piecemeal impressions printed by the "objective" world on the passive wax of the senses but patterned wholes that are created by a strange and beautiful collaboration between the perceiver and the perceived. Generalizing this rich insight to life as a whole, Gestalt therapists envision a purposive give and take between every organism and its environment which has the same inexplicable spontaneity and self-regulation as does the process of perception. Organism and environment are understood to be in a constant natural dialogue, an ongoing series of "creative adjustments" which make man at home in his body, his community, his natural habitat.

It is not the case, therefore, that the body need be made to function, that human beings need be made sociable, that nature need be made to support life. For the Gestaltist, individual and social neurosis sets in when the "organism/environment field" is split up by a psychic factionalism that isolates out from the ecological whole a unit of defensive consciousness that must be pitted against an "external" reality understood to be alien, intractable and in the end hostile.

The sign of this losing of faith in self-regulating processes is the construction of an alienated "self" which fearfully retreats from the "outside world" and progressively diminishes in size until it is felt as some manner of homunculus besieged within the skull, manipulating an unwieldy apparatus called its "body," feverishly devising strategies of defense and attack. At this point, instead of there being spontaneous adjustment—the "free interplay of the faculties"—a compulsive deliberateness sets out to control and conquer all that was originally merged in the unitary field: "others," "nature," "the body," "the passions," the "irrational." Health, which is properly a matter of letting the chips of life fall where they may, a trustful yielding to the needs and urges of body, community, nature, now becomes a matter of piecemeal cerebral organization—pills, dieting, authoritarian doctoring, etc. We come to wonder how life ever survived before there was a civilized brain to watch out for it.

Gestalt, then, finds the secret of health in the sub-intellective processes which, if left to their own ingenuity, take care of themselves. The peak moment of healthy functioning is the moment of "final contact" during which "the deliberateness, the sense of 'I,' spontaneously vanishes into the concern, and then boundaries are unimportant, for one contacts not a boundary but the touched, the known, the enjoyed, the made."

Making Politics Happen

Conversely, when the "wisdom of the body" and the self-regulation of symbiotic systems elude us, compulsive regimentation sets in, freezing up and paralyzing the organism, which then seems recalcitrant and stupid. (The major therapeutic technique of Gestalt, therefore, is an ingenious form of bodily exercise which aims at locating and thawing frozen organic energy.) It is easy enough to see how Gestalt's bad politics of the nervous system can be projected into the surrounding social system. Lose faith in the natural processes of body and emotion, and you quickly lose faith in human sociability. Everything must then be made to happen properly and supervised at every turning by "experts." The state becomes the domineering brain of the body politic, which is also taken to be recalcitrant and stupid. The resulting authoritarianism is, then, scarcely a problem that yields to a reshuffling of institutions or restructuring of social classes. That, most likely, leads only to a change of managerial personnel. The problem has a metaphysical origin, stemming from a misconception of nature and of man's role within it.

I think this Gestaltist conception of reality is true, but it is also fundamentally mysterious—by which I mean it is extremely difficult to find words that capture the elusiveness of the ideas. For one thing, when speaking of the Gestaltist "field," one's language must become transpersonal. Since it is the total ecological pattern, not the self, which the Gestaltists postulate as basic, one cannot speak of personal agencies which do this, or cause that. Rather one must imagine processes happening of their own accord, producing the numberless symbiotic patterns and balances called "nature," and among them that bio-socio-psychic pattern called human consciousness. Thus, Gestalt theory is, at last, a species of racism disguised rather clumsily as Western psychiatry. What is this "organism/environment field," after all, but Lao Tzu's Way? Goodman himself turns to the mystic tradition more than once to present a Gestalt idea. How do people lessen the pain of suffering? "By finally 'standing out of the way,' to quote the great formula of Tao. They disengage from their preconceptions of how it 'ought' to turn out. And into the 'fertile void,' thus formed, the solution comes flooding." Surely much of the charm which the young discover in Goodman's thinking derives from its subtle, underlying connection with the oriental mysticism that has engaged their enthusiasm in the postwar period.

Second, one of Goodman's most distinctive and refreshing traits as a social critic is his impish habit of arguing issues ad hominem. Unless you are on the receiving end of this tactic, it is an exciting new approach to public discussion. Here, for example, is Goodman commenting on John Kennedy's telltale predilection for words like "discipline," "sacrifice," "challenge."

It is the . . . moral Catholicism of the little boy who disciplines himself from masturbating and checks off his victorious days on the calendar. Masturbating proves you are weak and makes you weak. In this context, "challenge" is the kind of strenuous excitement possible to persons who, having given up their internal spontaneity, rally to an external demand. . . . The sense of duty does not seem to be [Kennedy] himself, but his submissive—and evasive—obedience to some grownups; one who is not convinced of his moral courage.

That is the intellectual counterpart of hitting below the belt, but, in fact, it summarizes Kennedy more accurately than could any analysis of policy or program. In any case, it is the sort of style one must expect a psychotherapist to bring to bear on public argument.

The significance of this "contextual method of argument," as the Gestaltists call it, is that it short-circuits a deal of intellectual banter that may be totally beside the point and at once personalizes the debate. It is a mode of intellectuality which brings into play the nonintellective substructure of thought and action. Goodman explains the technique in this way:

A merely "scientific" refutation by adducing contrary evidence is pointless, for [the opponent] does not experience that evidence with its proper weight. . . . Then the only useful method of argument is to bring into the picture the total context of the problem, including the conditions of experiencing it, the social milieu and the personal "defenses" of the observer. That is, to subject the opinion and his holding of it to a gestalt-analysis. . . . We are sensible that this is a development of the argument ad hominem, only much more offensive, for we not only call our opponent a rascal and therefore in error, but we also charitably assist him to mend his ways!

This is the principle underlying what one can easily mistake in much of Goodman's debate and writing for ■ callous kind of one-upmanship—which is what the technique does indeed degenerate into when inexperienced hands take it over. It is easy to see how appealing such a style would be to a generation that had grown dubious about the reliability of speech, and had already attuned itself to "hearing" the character hidden behind the inarticulate grunts and shrugs of James Dean and Marlon Brando. It was also bound to strike home with the New Left students, given their wise suspicion of the ideology mongering that has always characterized radical politics and their soulful search for personal honesty.

Goodman's special awareness of the sub-verbal level of speech—the significance not only of what is said but of how it is said—contributes to that unadorned, offhand speaking style which has proved so attractive to student audiences. Where the usual academic posture is stilted, remote, defensively masked in a narrow expertise, Goodman comes on as a whole and vulnerable man. Such honesty usually puts to shame Goodman's professorial and official interlocutors by calling into question at once the protective formalities and role playing of public debate.

On the other hand, an inevitable (but, I find, off-putting) adjunct of this psychologizing approach is the need to lay bare the secrets of one's own heart in the name of candor. On Goodman's part, such psychic disarmament has produced a great deal of confessional outpouring (his journal Five Years is a particularly painful example) as it has on the part of most of the beat-hip writers. Being a public figure in the counter culture means reserving very little that is private. This can lead to a winsome kind of innocence, I suppose, but it is an embarrassment to be sucked into other people's soul searching: do they want you to respond with praise? shock? pity? love? or disgraceful confessions of your own? Or are you just a sounding board? Certainly this shameless letting down of the hair accounts for the vulnerability of beat-hip bohemianism to sensationalizing publicity. But then it may be that the most strategic bastion of traditional values the counter culture is attacking is precisely the bourgeois Christian pride in a well-developed guilty conscience.

What Is Natural?

And finally, three, is the image of "human nature" that Gestalt offers when at last it must produce a therapeutic standard. Like every other monistic system Gestalt theory suffers from the lack of a satanic principle. Sooner or later, one must ask how the natural and healthful unity of the "organism/environment field" becomes undone. Which is to ask how nature can produce an "unnatural" state of affairs. One must give Goodman credit for having the uncommon courage to unfold the theory of his school ambitiously and honestly enough to show up its ultimate conundrum. Yet the terms "natural" and "unnatural," derived from the Gestalt system, are the key words in his critical vocabulary, and one cannot help wanting a clearer understanding of their import than he provides.

For example, Goodman's style of pacifism oscillates delicately between the poles "natural-unnatural." He approves of fist fights "because that's natural." On the other hand, "war is unnatural violence," because it does not

"liberate natural associations and release social inventiveness, but on the contrary reinforces the coercive and authoritarian establishment." So too, the nonviolence of "doctrinal pacifists is unnatural and even somewhat wicked" because it is "a spiteful stalling to exacerbate guilt. Anger is at least contactful; and it seems false not to let anger follow through and strike."

But starting out, as Gestalt does, from a primal unity which is spontaneously self-regulating, "nature" must be universal, comprehending whatever turns up, disease as well as health, disintegration as well as creation, war as well as fist fights. Therefore, what can the terms "natural" and "unnatural" possibly mean?

When Goodman at last faces this central paradox in Gestalt Therapy, his response is startlingly blunt:

"Human nature" is a potentiality. It can be known only as it has been actualized in achievement and history, and as it makes itself today.

The question may quite seriously be asked, by what criterion does one prefer to regard "human nature" as what is actual in the spontaneity of children, in the works of heroes, the culture of classic eras, the community of simple folk, the feeling of lovers, the sharp awareness and miraculous skill of some people in emergencies? Neurosis is also a response of human nature and is now epidemic and normal, and perhaps has a viable social future.

We cannot answer the question.

The evasion is strange, for the criterion is obvious enough. The behavior of children, heroes, lovers, "simple folk" and people in crisis is beautiful and ethically inspiring. It is, certainly for Goodman, the stuff of great art. The Gestalt criterion of health, like every criterion of health, is a moral-aesthetic one. Goodman the Gestalt therapist leads us back to Goodman the poet and novelist, searching for ■ notion of humanity around which he can weave the tensions of deep drama.

(Goodman's well-known "May Pamphlet" of 1945 contains a long discussion of what "natural" and "unnatural" mean, but adds no account of how primordial nature undoes and reverses itself so that some of its issue can legitimately be called "unnatural." The terms finally come down to being—as I argue here—Goodman's synonyms for "beautiful-ugly," "noble-base." If one objects that this lowers the terms to a nonscientific status, the reply, I think, should be that it actually raises them to a moral-aesthetic status. For after all, science is not everything, and in fact, is not very much at all when it comes to creating for oneself a creditable way of life.)

At the root of Goodman's thinking, then, is a mystical psychology whose conception of human nature sides aesthetically and ethically with the nonintellective spontaneity of children and primitives, artists and lovers, those who can lose themselves gracefully in the splendor of the moment. It is indeed one of the controversial glories of Gestalt that it has, against the entire psychiatric tradition since Freud's grim demand for conformity to a joyless conception of adulthood, asserted the nobility and healthiness of the child and the artist.

The childish feelings are important (Goodman says and puts the observation in italics) not as a past that must be undone, but as some of the most beautiful powers of adult life that must be recovered: spontaneity, imagination, directness of awareness and manipulation. . . . Maturity, precisely among those who claim to be concerned with "free personality," is conceived in the interest of an unnecessarily tight adjustment to a dubiously valuable workaday society, regimented to pay its debts and duties.

Gestalt of Community

Thus, well before either the beats or the hippies had begun to sabotage the middle-class American "reality principle," Goodman the Gestalt therapist was laying the theoretical foundation of the great dropout.

If there is some one concept in which all of Goodman's thinking centers, it is the ideal of community. Doubtless he would have been a communitarian anarchist even if he had not become a Gestalt therapist. Much of his anarchist writing and personal involvement in communitarian experiments (like Black Mountain College) pre-dates his work as a psychotherapist. But here too Gestalt has made its contribution, for it is one of the few schools of psychiatry that has been prepared to set society at large into the therapeutic scales and to find the way of the world wanting, a mad attack upon human potentialities. Gestalt holds out for the inherent sociability of the whole human being, including his sexual and even his aggressive needs:

When the aggressive drives are anti-social, it is that society is opposed to life and change (and love); then it will either be destroyed by life or it will involve life in a common ruin, make human life destroy society and itself.

For Goodman, the way out of this tragic impasse has been communitarian experiment, the effort to regain for man "the natural society" in which he can be freely sociable. So his two novels develop the adventures of small-scale bohemian communities in which people can be people, find love, fruitful strife and education. In the congested apathetic midst of imperial cities, Goodman turns his attention to such groping efforts to "make do" without the plenty and competitive business of contemporary life. He often observes that he is really more conservative than the most conservative, because he wants to turn the historical clock all the way back to the neolithic village. That has been the major mission of his utopian sociology: to decentralize and selectively scale down leviathan industrialism to the point that it can serve the ethos of a tribal village—including its sturdy agrarian virtues. (Saving the small farm and giving the urbanite an experience of the soil have long been two of Goodman's great campaigns.) That is pretty much what his major sociological treatises (Communitas and People or Personnel) are all about.

Goodman's communitarianism is his greatest and most directly appreciated contribution to contemporary youth culture. For the New Left, he has functioned as the foremost theoretician of "participative democracy," bringing again into lively discussion a tradition of anarchist thought that reaches back through Prince Kropotkin to Robert Owen. And in spirit, if not in scholarly reference, anarchist politics is the most hotly debated issue among the socially involved young—far more so than the Marxist tradition of socialism. Even the current infatuation of the New Left and black power with guerrilla warfare bears the anarchist imprint: war on a human scale with the chance for personal cunning, courage and decision.

So too, the shape that beat-hip bohemianism has taken owes much to Goodman's influence. The pseudo-Indian tribes that now camp in the cities, the psychedelic communities of the California hinterlands or the wilds of Colorado, the Diggers with their hazy ideas about free stores and cooperative farms—whatever their failings, these are all part of that utopian anarchist tradition which has always bravely refused to knuckle under to the proposition that life must be a compromise with Old Corruption.

The importance of this communitarian bent in the youth culture—especially at the bohemian fringe—is acknowledged to be great, but it is much misunderstood. How often has one heard old-line radicals condemn the bohemian young for the "irresponsibility" of their withdrawal into kooky communities of their own? They are advised to "grow up" and "be responsible"—by which is meant usually: give your energy to political action, help organize the slums or the agricultural laborers, plan political coalitions, register voters in Mississippi, join the Peace Corps, find a project, agitate, sit-in, come to the demonstration, subscribe to Dissent, Commentary, New Politics. Such activities are noble enough, but they are only episodic activities. Run them together as you will, they are not a way of life. And a way of life is what the young need to grow into, a style of maturity which may include political activity, but which also embraces the life needs: love, family, subsistence, companionship. Political action and organizing cannot even provide a full-time career for more than a handful of apparatchiks, let alone a pattern of life for an entire generation. What, then, do the disaffiliated young have to grow toward? What ideal of adulthood has the world to offer them that will take the place of the middle-class debauch they instinctively reject?

An intelligent compromise, perhaps—which is what most of the old radicals have settled for. A teaching position, a civil service job, work on a journal or a newspaper—something from 9 to 5 that brings in an income for home and family and leaves time for politicking outside. The trouble is that many of the young are too alienated even for the intelligent compromise, with its inevitable disciplines, its pinch of incense for the bourgeois conformities. How can the counter culture that began with Ginsberg's Howl finally comb its hair, set its alarm clock, and save its dissent for after hours?

And yet, if you are 25 and have exhausted the dilatory possibilities of college and parental support, you do want to "grow up" and "be responsible." That means you must put your hand to the political things that demand attention. But you have to "make do"—and SDS offers no long-term livelihood, nor does SNCC, nor CORE. And damned if you'll make that intelligent compromise! So how do you grow up?

The answer is that you make up a community of those you love and respect, where there can be enduring friendships, children and, by mutual aid, three meals a day scraped together by honorable and enjoyable labor. Nobody knows quite how it is to be done. There aren't any reliable models. The old radicals are no help, they talked about socializing whole economies, or launching third parties, or strengthening the unions, but not about building communities. (Except for Goodman, that is.) It will take a lot of experiment, using whatever examples come to hand: the life-way of Indian tribes, utopian precedents, the 17th-century Diggers, the French communities of work, the Israeli kibbutzim, the Hutterites. Maybe none of them will work, but where else is there to turn?

Among all the urgent tasks that need to be done in the next twenty minutes, there is one that needs doing for the next decade and the one after that: it is that the young, who have greater expectations of life than their elders and who are more intolerably sensitive to corruptions, should find an enduring mode of life that will guard those expect-tations and sensitivities. If the counter culture is to have a future that saves the best that is in it, these frenzied and often pathetic experiments in community will have to succeed. And who besides Goodman is offering such help in that direction?

From Making Do, the man considering the unhappy boy he loves:

For him—and not only for him—there was in our society No Exit. When he had asked his germane question, and fifteen experts on the dais did not know an answer for him. But with ingenuity he had hit on a painfully American answer, Do It Yourself. If there is no community for you, young man, young man, make it yourself.

SCIENCE FOR THE PENTAGON

THE SECRET THINKERS

MICHAEL T. KLARE

Mr. Klare, a staff member of the North American Congress on Latin America, edited the January special issue of Viet-Report, "The University at War."

While many American scientists, either as individuals or as members of organizations, are conspicuous protesters against the war in Vietnam, others are still knit intricately and deeply into the machinery of the military. The military-academic complex is still very much in being.

On February 12, an anonymous phone call to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee touched off nationwide rumors that the United States was preparing to use tactical nuclear weapons in Vietnam. The call was received by Carl Marcy, staff director of the committee, who later told the press that the caller suggested the committee should find out why Dr. Richard L. Garwin of Columbia University had been sent to Vietnam. Garwin was described in the call as "a tactical nuclear weapons expert."

The following day, public information officers at the Pentagon explained that Garwin and two associates had been sent to Southeast Asia to appraise "the effectiveness of new weapons," but that "the new weapons have no relationship to atomic or nuclear systems of any kind."

When the rumors had died down somewhat, the Pentagon indicated that Garwin had never reached Vietnam, the heavy fighting there having compelled him to visit Thailand instead. It was further revealed that Garwin was accompanied on the trip by Prof. Henry W. Kendall of M.I.T. and Dr. Julius P. Molnar of the Bell Telephone Laboratories. Kendall, like Garwin, is a theoretical physicist. As executive vice president of Bell Labs, Molnar has had considerable experience administering defense research projects, and has done work on nuclear warfare.

A colleague at Columbia, professor of physics Leon M. Lederman, told the campus newspaper that the Pentagon had sent Dr. Garwin to Asia to study the feasibility of installing "some electric gadgets" which could serve as "technical aids toward de-escalation."

The evidence now available would indicate that the trip was connected with the Pentagon's attempt to build an "anti-infiltration barrier" between North and South Vietnam. From various sources, it is known that scientists working on the barrier project describe it as a "de-escalation device" that would help bring about a negotiated settlement. The utility of such a barrier was questioned last month when Dr. George B. Kistiakowsky of Harvard University withdrew from the project. Kistiakowsky, a Russian-born chemist who worked on the World War II atomic bomb project, had been a scientific adviser to the Defense Department for more than a decade. Until his resignation, he had been an active member of the secret Pentagon committee that was working on the barrier. In a letter to John S. Foster, Jr., director of Defense Research and Engineering, Kistiakowsky is reported to have indicated that he first joined the barrier project because he hoped it would contribute to a de-escalation of the war, but that he had now become disillusioned concerning the Administration's intention to settle the war by negotiation.

Kistiakowsky and Garwin are both members of an elite group of scientists known as the Jason Division of the Institute for Defense Analysis (IDA), a defense-oriented "think-tank" which does classified research for government agencies. Jason consists of forty outstanding university scientists "who devote as much of their available time as possible to studies in the vanguard of the scientific aspects of defense problems," according to IDA literature.

Unlike the RAND Corporation, its best-known rival, IDA has no military patron, but is sponsored by a consortium of twelve leading universities, including M.I.T., Stanford, Columbia and the Universities of Michigan, California and Chicago.

Jason scholars meet each summer for a six-week defense "summer camp" at which they conduct research on special projects of interest to the Pentagon. In past summers, Jason members have worked on "knotty aspects of ballistic missile defense and exoatmospheric detonations," according to IDA's 1967 Annual Report. Recently, however, the Jason Division has been directed by the Pentagon to seek military solutions to the increasingly futile war in Vietnam. As a result, Jason scientists prepared papers on nighttime bombing missions and on other technical subjects.

In 1966, four Jason scholars prepared a secret report on the possible use of tactical nuclear weapons in Southeast Asia. This study, published in March, 1967, as IDA Report number HQ-66-5220, was conducted by Robert Gomer and S. Courtenay Wright of the University of Chicago, Freeman Dyson of the Institute for Advanced Study at Princeton, and Steven Weinberg of Harvard. It is possible that Professor Garwin was consulted on this project, thus leading to the February phone call.

According to IDA literature, the Jason Division's 1967 summer session, held in the Falmouth, Mass., intermediate school, was to have concentrated on scientific aspects of counterinsurgency, infiltration and guerrilla warfare. The meeting was so secret that the school's janitor had to receive a high security clearance in order to clean the building. It is entirely likely that details for the anti-infiltration barrier were worked out at this convocation.

Although its members often engage in individual projects, the main function of Jason is to coordinate university research on advanced weapons systems. Jason scholars work closely with the Advanced Research Projects Agency (ARPA), the Defense Department agency which sponsors most U.S. scientific research on advanced weapons. The deputy director of ARPA, Peter Franken, is a former Jason consultant.

Under its world-wide counterinsurgency program, "Project AGILE," ARPA maintains elaborate scientific facilities in Bangkok, Thailand, for research on "counter-guerrilla surveillance systems" and other exotic devices. The facility, known officially as the Joint Thai-U.S. Military Research and Development Center, is staffed by scientists from Stanford, Michigan and Cornell universities, and from the RAND Corporation. Many scientists connected with the center, including Richard Holbrook, its director, are former IDA members or consultants.

Work at the Bangkok center includes a project on infrared surveillance systems, originally developed at the University of Michigan. By using infrared detectors, ARPA officials hope to spot enemy guerrillas from the air, even through thick jungle cover, or at night. Another ARPA team, composed of scientists from the Stanford Research Institute, is seeking to develop portable radar and seismic equipment for use in locating insurgents on the ground. The proposed anti-infiltration barrier will undoubtedly make use of these devices. Presumably, Garwin and his associates spent their Asian visit conferring with researchers at the Bangkok facility.

The "electronic fence" between North and South Vietnam, proposed last fall by former Defense Secretary McNamara, will not be a physical barrier as such but rather a combination of detection equipment which could alert U.S. forces to the passage of enemy infiltrators. Making use of seismic or infrared "triggers," the barrier could also set off land mines or other explosive devices.

Ultimately, the "fence" becomes practicable only if North Vietnam agrees to a "Korean-type" solution to the war, the present objective of U.S. strategy. Such a scheme would compel the North Vietnamese to stay on "their" side of the fence, or risk continued U.S. bombing. In the South, meanwhile, the National Liberation Front would collapse when aid from the North was cut off, and a by then reduced U.S. force could slowly hunt down and destroy the insurgents. For the scientists working on the barrier—most of whom were trained in the arts of war gaming and deterrent strategies—such a scheme would seem eminently feasible.

But these attempts on the part of academic scientists to "rationalize" the Vietnamese War are doomed. Neither Lyndon B. Johnson nor Ho Chi Minh, nor the warring parties in the South, can be expected to carry out the roles assigned them in a computer simulation. The Hanoi government has made clear that it will not abandon the insurgents in the South as the price for an end to the bombing, and the recent Tet offensive has demonstrated that the National Liberation Front has extensive military capabilities of its own.

With the intensification of the war, and its expansion to Laos, it is doubtful that the planned anti-infiltration barrier, when completed, will be of any significant value to the U.S. command. The war, which has thus far defied all previous attempts at a purely military or technological solution, will probably survive this attempt as well.

DEATH CHEATERS

NOT GONE BUT FROZEN

HOWARD JUNKER

Mr. Junker, a frequent Nation contributor, is an associate editor of Newsweek.

Ed Hope, 47, is a brusque, stocky Phoenix wig maker who is involved in a finance corporation, a welding shop, and in freezing human bodies after they are "clinically dead." Hope's Cryocare Equipment Corp. has thus far built eight cryocapsules. "Remember," goes an ad in the February Cryonics Reports, "if you do not make arrangements for your cryonic suspension you will be buried or cremated when you are dead.") The latest, stainless steel cryocapsules sell for $4,865, with a monthly maintenance charge—for liquid nitrogen and supervision—of $50. At least four bodies have already been frozen, and the prophet of the cryonics movement, Robert C. W. Ettinger, 49, author of The Prospect of Immortality and a physics teacher at a Michigan community college, claims to have heard of, but not verified, the freezing of half a dozen more.

James H. Bedford, a 73-year-old retired psychology professor, was the first to be frozen—in Los Angeles, on January 12, 1967. Dr. Bedford died of cancer. He had hoped that one day a cure for his disease would be found and that he could be thawed, cured and thus restored to life. A paperback published this month tells of his freezing (We Froze the First Man, by Robert F. Nelson as told to Sandra Stanley). Another body now frozen is that of a 74-year-old Santa Barbara woman, Marie Phelps Sweet, who died of a heart attack last August. Her remains are stored in a Los Angeles mortuary. Dr. Bedford's body is at Cryocare in Phoenix, as are those of a Detroit man frozen some four months ago and a Los Angeles woman frozen at the end of February. Another Los Angeles woman, now dying of lung cancer, has declared her desire to be frozen. The Cryonics Society of California, says Pres. Robert F. Nelson, 31, "is on a twenty-four-hour alert. But she's still holding on." "It's a fact," boasted Ed Hope while attending the First Annual Cryonics Conference held recently at the New York Academy of Sciences, "business is picking up."

It is unlikely that reanimation of an entire body will ever be possible after freezing. Cells, which are mostly water, tend to rupture during the freezing-thawing process. Yet "freeze banks" already store human red blood cells, bone marrow cells, corneas and skin. The storage of complete organs is still impossible, although researchers have had some success in regaining partial function in cats' brains and various animal kidneys. Death is, by definition, irreversible, but every day the line separating life from death is blurred by the advances of medical science and biological research.

"Traditional interment simply guarantees oblivion," is the way Ettinger puts it. "Freezing at least offers a non-zero possibility of revival." And there are people who do want to take whatever chances there are, now. A Pennsylvania couple has sent Ed Hope tissue samples from their son who drowned last year. The parents anticipate that some day it will be possible to "regenerate" their boy, in much the same way, says Hope, "that a whole carrot can now be grown from a little piece of carrot."

For all its dim future, there is no doubt that freezing provides a more "cosmetic" kind of interment than mere embalment. Robert Nelson declares that Marie Sweet, frozen last August, "looks absolutely the same now as she did then." Nelson has a weekly opportunity to observe her body because it is not in a cryocapsule. It has been wrapped in tin foil, leaving the face exposed, placed in a casket and covered with dry ice. Once a week Nelson must help replenish the supply of dry ice.

Miss Sweet (she was married but retained her maiden name) was a pioneer member of the Life Extension Society, of the Cryonics Society of California and of about forty other messianic organizations, but when she died there was not enough money to buy a cryocapsule. In a 1964 letter to Ettinger she had written: "For the first time in my entire career, I yearn to be wealthy and free to endow an essential work . . . I want to see it happen—with all possible speed! Yet here I sit, more or less helpless to speed things up." Early last year she and her husband took out two $25 and one $10 memberships in the California Society, "to help out in attempts to keep the office going." Miss Sweet had also taken out a $3,000 life insurance policy, payable to the Life Extension Society, but the recommended policy to cover freezing and maintenance is $10,000. Ed Hope insists that he cannot afford to offer capsules "as a charity. You've got to keep the whole thing in ratio."

In April of last year, Miss Sweet's husband, Russ Le Croix Van Norden, suffered a heart attack, and preparations for his freezing were made. But after six weeks in the hospital, Van Norden recovered. "I struggled so hard to make sure everything was worked out," he said while sitting in the corridor during the recent New York conference, "that I pulled through." Van Norden, 75, looks like a slim, gentle Konrad Adenauer. A master craftsman, his hands are worn from years of working in wood, silver and wrought iron. His flannel shirt is frayed, his suit baggy. He refers to his wife as "an arrested entity whom I hope to recover, although I don't know when."

Van Norden bitterly misses his wife and is especially saddened because she died prematurely. "Why did she have to go then?" he asks. "These things aren't ready. They're still so crude." He began to weep in telling of a letter he would have to write, soon, explaining his wife's condition to a young Indian boy whom they had befriended while teaching painting as VISTA volunteers on an Oregon reservation. "When we left," Van Norden recalls, "there were 187 pictures in that school." President Johnson sent a citation, but the Van Nordens were not reimbursed for the $300 they had spent on oils and brushes for the children.

Because the Van Nordens were late in registering for social security—"my wife thought she would never get old"—reduced payments come in now. And Van Norden's small income as a craftsman is hardly enough to support himself, much less pay for his wife's maintenance. Lately, he has been waking up in the mornings with full-scale, dreamlike stories in his mind. He speaks them into a tape recorder, and while in New York, for the first time, he unsuccessfully tried to find an agent.

Ettinger appealed for funds for Miss Sweet last year. He admitted that the "circumstances of clinical death were unfavorable," since it had taken three days to make arrangements for the freezing. "In any case," Ettinger continued, "our public image, in my opinion, depends overwhelmingly on one factor only—are we or are we not freezing people? Everything else fades into a vague blur of tiresome argument; in the long run, I am convinced, the only thing that will matter is whether we are acting."

The Cryonics Society of Michigan, of which Ettinger is president, now has a van equipped and ready to go wherever, whenever the "clinical death" of a society member occurs. The New York and California societies hope to have vans by the end of the year. The California society has no telephone listed at present. The New York society is talking about establishing a foundation for cryonic research.

As for Van Norden, at 75 he is ready to be frozen when the time comes. But he would like to persist. He is trying to slow down, to rest his heart. "We have reasons for living into the 21st century," he says. "By then, war would be eliminated. The economy would be adjusted, wealth would be equitably distributed. And the dignity of man would be restored." Then Van Norden pauses, glances at his young listener, for whom the matter is slightly academic. And he says: "I'm still here, but now Marie is frozen."

HARRY GOLDEN

TOO often we have heard that the law cannot do it. No less an American presence than Dwight D. Eisenhower once told a press conference, "Laws cannot change the hearts of men."

Thomas Hobbes held that man's life is mean, nasty, brutish and short. He might have added that very little changes the hearts of men. Law certainly doesn't do so, but it does change practices.

Had you asked a Welsh miner or a New Hebrides sheepherder in 1832, "Do you want Catholics to vote?" his heart would have leaped in rage and fear. But the English Parliament enfranchised Catholics and the hearts of the Welshman and the New Hebridian resumed their steady pulse.

In North and South Carolina today Negroes work at "white men's jobs" in the textile mills. This did not come about by heart softening. It was caused by the Equal Opportunity Directive issued by President John F. Kennedy in 1963. Discrimination thereafter meant loss of government contracts. The plant superintendent called in the foremen and announced, "We are hiring three Negroes for the carding room tomorrow."

"The hell you are!" they said. "What about the toilets? What about the lunch room? What about the water fountains?"

"If we don't hire the three Negroes, we don't get a contract to provide 400,000 dozen pairs of socks for the Pentagon."

"Bring them in," said the suddenly warm-hearted workers.

Some years ago, Senator Eastland warned the then Attorney General Robert Kennedy, "We don't care what the Supreme Court rules. Their decision is the law of the case, not the law of the land. You want Negroes to vote?

Sue us for every Negro, every voting registrar in the South."

After talking it over with Burke Marshall, head of the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division, and John Doar, Robert Kennedy wrote a memo on a yellow pad which read, "Get the road maps and go."

Justice Department officers and FBI men walked down dusty roads in Mississippi, Alabama and Louisiana, stopping at tar-paper shacks, asking Negroes, "Did you try to register? What happened?"

They won their suits. Judge Minor Wisdom in ruling for the government in one of these suits said, "The wall of segregation must come down." They didn't need a thoracic specialist to change hearts, they needed only the law.

The victory is not complete, but Negroes vote in unprecedented numbers today. They did it all at once. There was nothing wrong with "gradualism"—it was a brilliant concept—except there was no such animal. Riots don't occur gradually—they explode all at once. If we are to put the cap on them, we can't do it gradually. Perhaps we shall have to rely on the law rather than on our charity or good will. And by law I mean not punitive legislation like anti-riot laws and more police or vigilantes. This will not work; it has never worked in the whole history of mankind. It must be progressive legislation, like open housing and legislation to open up jobs and education.

I do know that since the civil rights movement began in the early 1950s there hasn't been a single solitary voluntary act on the part of any Southern state. Whatever progress has been made was made through the pressure of the law.

The Asian Experts Discover Vietnam

MARILYN BLATT YOUNG

Mrs. Young is a student of Sino-American relations and author of a forthcoming book on American China policy at the turn of the century.

Philadelphia

In this strange political spring of 1968 anything can happen. Year after year, the Association for Asian Studies has been meeting at appointed cities around the United States and conducting its affairs as if no war were taking place in Vietnam. The only visible effect on the Association has been the inclusion of one or two panels dealing with Vietnamese history, and these seemed designed to skirt around the explosive topic of the war, though the subject often came up in the discussion period. Asian scholars have, of course, spoken out on the war in many voices, pitting their "expertise" against one another. But no one attempted to take advantage of the annual massed gathering of scholars for the double purpose of speaking out on the war and broadly re-examining the position of the profession itself.

This year it happened. Organized initially by a group of young graduate students at Harvard whose concern over the war and possible fate at the hands of their draft boards enlisted the support of their professors, a Vietnamese caucus was held on the second day of the conference, March 23. The meeting was completely dissociated from the Association itself, whose apolitical character was strictly respected. However, all those attending the caucus were registered members at the Philadelphia conference, a minimal guarantee of their legitimacy as "specialists."

Prior to the conference, the organizing committee solicited resolutions on the war from sixty institutions. In addition, the caucus was extremely well advertised at the conference itself and additional resolutions were earnestly sought, particularly from those who might be expected to have a pro-Administration position. For, somewhat to the consternation of the organizers, only one of the ten resolutions submitted to the committee saw any virtue whatever in the American position and even it, like the "Freedom House statement" asked for military de-escalation.

About 600 to 650 people showed up at the caucus meeting and, predictably, a few pro-Administration paranoiacs in the audience denounced the entire effort as a left-wing conspiracy. The first order of business was the distribution of a carefully worked out poll on the war which asked questions in four general categories: the purpose of the war, military strategy, negotiations and "general questions." The results were startling. Of the 350 to 375 people answering the poll, 91 per cent thought the Administration had not presented "an acceptable explanation that justifies its policies in Vietnam"; 81 per cent agreed that the United States had "already lost the war in terms of stated American objectives"; 50 per cent urged "immediate U.S. withdrawal" while 68 per cent supported "gradual and unilateral U.S. troop withdrawal under the umbrella of negotiations." Ninety-three per cent rejected the notion that a negotiated settlement leading to a Communist government in the South was "so inimical to our national interests that we should continue the war"; 86 per cent asked that the United States state its explicit willingness to negotiate directly with the NLF. An overwhelming majority feared that escalation increased the chances of war with China, 85 per cent felt that de-escalation required a change in administration and 83 per cent supported those individuals "who decide to refuse cooperation with the Selective Service System because they consider the war in Vietnam unjust and immoral."

In the voting on resolutions the feeling against the war was equally manifest. More than 70 per cent of those voting supported the two "moderate" resolutions which condemned escalation and the "policies which have led to such devastation in Vietnam" and urged that the government take "positive and unmistakable steps . . . to open negotiations . . . We further urge that it henceforth refrain generally from military intervention in revolutionary situations elsewhere." Only 18 per cent saw any merit in the resolution which urged that the Administration stress "our non-military effort to assist what has been called nation-building" in South Vietnam. The strongest of the four resolutions received 61 per cent of the vote. It called for a unilateral withdrawal "under the umbrella of negotiations," repudiation of the Administration which "has brought us to the brink of national disaster," and support for those who refuse induction on moral grounds. A preferential vote designed to determine which resolution most closely approximated the views of those voting resulted in a total of 47 per cent for the moderate resolution, 14 per cent for the least aggressive one and 39 per cent for the strongest.

Perhaps the most important overall result of the meeting was the decision to establish an inter-university student-faculty Committee of Concerned Asian Scholars, to carry on the discussion only barely begun during the caucus meeting. It was hoped that the dissatisfaction of many graduate students with their often silent professors would be dispelled. At the very least the profession may begin to experience the disturbing and exhilarating effects of its own, small, cultural revolution.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Who Won the Cold War?

AMERICA, RUSSIA AND THE COLD WAR, 1945-1966. By Walter LaFeber. John Wiley & Sons. 295 pp. $6.50. Paper $2.95.

THE RISE AND DECLINE OF THE COLD WAR. By Paul Seabury. Basic Books. 171 pp. $4.95.

D. F. FLEMING

Mr. Fleming's new work, The Origins and Consequences of World War I, will be published next fall by Doubleday. He is also the author of a 2-volume study, The Cold War And Its Origins, 1917-1960 (Doubleday), The United States And The World Court (Russell and Russell).

Paul Seabury, Provost of College IV of the University of California at Santa Cruz wrote The Rise and Decline of the Cold War, under the auspices of the Harvard Center for International Affairs. He fixes the beginning of the cold war in 1946 or 1947, "more precisely" at the Truman Doctrine message of March, 1947, but not "as an American declaration of ideological hostilities." The year 1947 was the "point of time when all the analytical features of this conflict suddenly were fused together."

Seabury finds that in Europe Soviet control of East and Central Europe after the war tended to be regarded as a new barbarian invasion; in the United States as a Free World vs. totalitarian-slave confrontation and as a balance of power struggle. These three concepts are discussed in separate chapters.

Placing the starting point of the cold war in 1946 or 1947 inevitably leaves the book without an explanation of the Russians being in the center of Europe in 1945. "A more determined stance of Western diplomacy during the war—especially after Hitler's attack on Russia in 1941—might have served notice to the Russian leadership to act more prudently." "All the main Continental powers except Russia were in rubble. . . ." "Indeed a case could be made (italics added) for the fact of . . . prudent—if strategically mistaken—strategic investment in East European territory as a buffer . . . ■ classical Russian habit. . . ."

These assumptions are belied by the compulsive facts that at Munich in 1938 the West opened wide Germany's path to the Soviet Union; that it fought a peripheral war for two years after June, 1941, during which Russia suffered devastation second to none; and relied on Russia to drive the main German armies (back to Berlin) until the end of the war.

Thereafter not even the threat of the atomic bomb or the offer of Marshall Plan aid could restore Western, capitalist control over East Europe. Behind the searing memories of World War II, also, lay the great Western invasions of Russia through this area in both World War I and the interventions of 1918 to 1920. On the other hand, it was natural for powerful forces of several kinds in the West to resent the main result of the war and to try to reverse it, but it could not be done.

These are the very harsh facts out of which the cold war grew. And what grew out of it? In an excellent chapter on containment, Seabury finds the ledgers of containment hard to read. Kennan's promise was ambivalent. It spoke of "two hypothetical yet mutually exclusive outcomes; either the 'break-up' or the 'mellowing' of Soviet power." For this and other reasons it was attacked from many quarters. Did it mean "either a belief in 'inexorable forces' or simply a heroic Micawberism"? In either case, it was more benign than the Communist strategy of liberation through class struggle and guerrilla wars. And, he believes, containment had "demonstrable success."

Yet questions remain. In his address on June 10, 1963, President Kennedy had recognized that "the two strongest powers are the two in the most danger of devastation," and "If we cannot now end our differences, at least we can help make the world safe for diversity." In 1951, Sen. Robert Taft had found extensive overseas commitments a symptom of incipient national decline, and he found the costs of establishing liberty throughout the world prohibitive and the effort self-defeating. At that time Arnold Toynbee still thought of a beneficent American "global imperium," but by 1961 he was saying: "America is today the leader of a world-wide anti-revolutionary movement in defense of vested interests. She now stands for what Rome stood for . . . inequality, injustice, and for the least happiness of the greatest number."

In his last chapter on Vietnam Seabury accepts our official version that we are defending "the commitment to support freedom," "against aggression," and "against the willful violence of an armed minority." The real problem is China. The very heterogeneous "societies and nations now imperiled by, or aligned against, Chinese expansionism and extremism" are too weak to defend themselves and all are menaced by "the state-as-fanatical movement." Therefore we must persevere, with unfanatical firmness, in patient application of limited counter force.

No evidence is cited of China's intention to overwhelm her small neighbors and there is no suggestion that in Vietnam a very brave people has been fighting for its independence for hundreds of years, first against the Chinese, then against the French and finally against us for some thirteen years. Yet in the book's last sentence a doubt does remain: "But the problem of American power as sole hegemonial guarantor of Asian peace remains unsolved."

It should be added that for the first time in our history this Asian doubt, admittedly the child of the Truman Doctrine, clearly threatens our entire future as a nation, from internal division and disruption, and from external defeat and isolation.

Walter LaFeber's America, Russia and the Cold War, 1945-1966, is a volume in the excellent series of books on American diplomatic history edited by Robert A. Divine and published by Wiley. LaFeber is professor of history at Cornell University.

His book is one of the best studies of the cold war. It is based on a 15-page topical bibliography, which not only lists hundreds of books but gives an indication of the contents of most of them. He has also used extensively the Baruch, Clayton, Dulles and Truman collections of papers. For many students the bibliography would be worth the price of the book.

It centers first on the period 1944 to 1946, portraying Washington's determination to use its "gigantic economic power" to promote throughout the world the Open-Door policy, which we had defended in China so long, to create room for our great industrial complex and prevent both future depressions and wars. This American view of the world was perforce accepted by Britain and France, but at the iron curtain it encountered "the terrible problem of how to open the Soviet empire without alienating the Soviets."

The author gives the details of Russia's frightful devastation and its great weakness, explains its urgent need to drain its European conquests, and records Stalin's refusal "to loosen his control of Eastern Europe (and) allow American political and economic power to flow into the area." This was unthinkable to Moscow also because of the driving compulsion of security considerations. "The Soviet peoples and leaders alike viewed almost everything in their lives through the memories of the horrors that struck from 1941 to 1945." The Germans would recover quickly, said Stalin: "Give them twelve to fifteen years. . . ."

Unavoidably the Soviet and American objectives collided in East Europe. Throughout the summer and autumn of 1945, the United States tried to weaken Soviet control of Poland "by using relief materials and equipment badly needed by the Poles to force Poland to accept, as the State Department said, 'a policy of equal opportunity for us in trade, investments and access to sources of information'; and the failure of the attempt "left an enduring mark on post war American policy." Then atomic diplomacy was tried in East Europe, with no better results.

LaFeber places the declarations of the cold war in early 1946. First came Stalin's speech on February 9, which opened with the Marxist explanation of world wars, monopoly capitalism fighting for markets and raw materials, though he did distinguish sharply between the two World Wars. Then he credited Russia's victory in World War II to the Communist Party, which had built the heavy industries first (a claim hard to deny); laid down goals for the future, including more consumers' goods; and called for three or more Five-Year Plans to organize "a new mighty upsurge of national economy."

LaFeber says this speech made a profound impression in Washington. It was even called the declaration of World War III. But why should it have been so regarded? It was an election speech, necessarily geared to the home audience. It celebrated Russia's victory accurately enough, and it was "spoken in a conversational tone and without bombast," wrote Brooks Atkinson to The New York Times.

Churchill's iron curtain speech at Fulton on March 5, 1946, proposing "that the Anglo-Americans, outside the United Nations and with the support of atomic weaponry . . . create 'a unity in Europe from which no nation in Europe should be permanently outcast,'" was regarded by Stalin as a threat to his control of East Europe, "a set-up for war, a call for war on the Soviet Union." From that time the Soviet hold on East Europe tightened constantly. The iron curtain was firmly bolted down.

Then a landslide Republican victory in the Congressional elections of 1946 made it seem necessary to "scare hell out of the country" in the Truman Doctrine

THE ARCHAIC

If something is archaic

all edges have been rounded presumably by the sea and yet total obliteration must not have become wholly accomplished, or set in—like a wind over mountains.

Some trace of the old life

*must be left,
some evidence that this white stone was once a lion's leg or the base of an intricate temple.*

If that life does not lead us back in some vain effort, retracking our own steps as we go toward the mountain

then this something we have found in its desolation is not truly archaic. To be archaic is to exist

in a state of transition between a silent life and a whispering death: even our own bodies when we stop and listen closely seem to be giving off some aura of the genuinely archaic

DAVID RAY

address, in order to take over Britain's imperial responsibilities in Greece. George Kennan "objected bitterly" to sending military aid to countries on the borders of Russia and broke with Acheson over the issue, before "the terrible price" of Truman's anti-Communist rhetoric at home led to the screening of all federal employees, as "Truman stood paralyzed" while the ground was "carefully ploughed around him for the weeds of McCarthyism."

Our decision to revive Germany quickly and to make sure that Italy and France did not go Communist led on rapidly to the Marshall Plan, which was inevitably rejected by Russia for East Europe as a form of Western take-over, and the rival Molotov plan, involving a large return flow of economic strength from Russia, was hammered out in July, 1947. In late September, at a Cominform meeting Zhdanov announced "the rebirth of the 'two-camp' view of the world." Somewhat strangely, from my view, the author regards this speech as one "that ranks next only to Stalin's February 9, 1946, address as a call to Cold War."

Yet Zhdanov's urging for liberationist activity in the whole underdeveloped world, and Cominform orders for strikes and disruptive activity in Italy and France, certainly stepped up the cold war, while we arranged new alignments for the Western world in the Rio Pact and NATO.

In the interacting dynamism of the cold war, chronology is of crucial importance, since an action on a later date could not have led to an earlier one. A lack of strict attention to chronology falsifies many accounts of the cold war, but not in this book. LaFeber's chronology is very conscientious.

He tells the story of the cold war down through 1966 responsibly and accurately. He follows its disastrous extension into Vietnam, where in early 1965 the American-Vietnamese effort was at "the point of total collapse" when the Pleiku raid of February 7 touched off our already prepared bombing of North Vietnam.

A significant new thread in the book is the role of theologian Reinhold Niebuhr in the cold war. As "perhaps the most formative contemporary influence on American liberalism," his "remarkable series of books and lectures" about man's sinful nature and the "egoistic corruption in all human virtue" gave standing to his explanation of the cold war, that "Communism was at once the worst and most aggressive of societies." The ideological assumptions which he so systematically formulated led even Kennan to term him "the father of us all."

By September, 1948, Niebuhr was declaring in Life that "for peace we must risk war." "We will have to stand at every point in our far-flung lines." Anyway, the Soviets were weaker and would not fight. "These views underlay the foreign policy planks of both parties."

However, by 1952 Niebuhr was moderating. He was acknowledging that the rearming of Germany was "too precipitate and too indifferent" to European feelings. He wondered if we could solve our problem simply "by the expansion of our economy." He feared extending the cold war to Asia and abhorred "the budding American imperium." We had lost ground among the neutrals who had become "virtual allies of Communism."

Twenty years into the cold war era, says LaFeber on his last page, "the unchecked and concentrated power (at home) which Niebuhr had so feared was becoming real, and was, to an important extent, the ironic result of the justifications which he and others had provided for American foreign policy in the 1940's and 1960's." In early 1967, "Niebuhr condemned the American involvement in Vietnam in the strongest terms."

Evidently it was much easier to help start a great world power struggle than to stop it or to deal with its consequences.

LaFeber's excellent narrative makes it quite clear that the United States lost the cold war in its main theatre and is now deeply mired in its Asiatic extension. Unable to accept the main result of World War II. Soviet and Communist control of East Europe, we sought by varied pressures to recover this area as part of our economic living space. The attempt failed. Soviet nerves held, but we did solidify West Europe for our way of life.

Then in Vietnam our cold war against China, and for control of Southeast Asia, aroused the moral repugnance of the great majority of the peoples of the world. They concluded that we placed power and profit above the right of the Vietnamese people to independence and even to existence. Our shocking conduct in Vietnam sucked a revolving half million of our youth into its jungles; throttled down the Great Society that might have stopped the deadly decay in our ghetto cities, and among our rural poor; divided our people and reduced a great portion of them—especially the youth—to despair about the validity of our political system, after the great majority of us had voted for President Johnson in 1964 as the nonescalator in Asia.

In early 1968 even West Europe is turning its back on us, looking eastward; our finances are fragile, after decades of cold war deficits in our international balances; our internal problems are truly desperate, and there is no future for the American people until our leaders quit trying to control the world, and make the American dream valid once more, here at home.

There is no other way in which we can assure our continuity as a nation—really threatened for the first time—and recover a respected role in the world.

Freud and Reich

REICH SPEAKS OF FREUD. Edited by Mary Higgins and Chester M. Raphael. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 296 pp. $5.95.

PAUL ROAZEN

Mr. Roazen is the author of the recently published Freud: Political and Social Thought (Knopf) and teaches political theory at Harvard.

Freud is unquestionably one of the greatest psychologists of all time, and he has done as much as anyone to revolutionize the ways in which we think about ourselves. His pupils have had a powerful impact on our cultural life, our psychiatry, so it is particularly interesting to us to understand what being close to the master meant to them.

For those in his immediate circle, Freud was an inspiring teacher, on the model of a Greek philosopher or a great rabbi. It is tempting to look back to those early days of psychoanalysis as a heroic era, even admitting the possibility of romanticizing the past. Today psychoanalysis as a field is incapable of attracting people as original and, it should be said, as undisciplined, as half a century ago.

Reich combined lasting psychological contributions with farfetched speculations. In the area of his contributions, psychoanalysis owes him an enduring debt for the development of its technique and theory. He was the first to recognize the inevitability of a patient's hostile resistances to treatment, and the first to spot the therapeutic usefulness of making such resistances a subject of investigation by patient and analyst. Reich also helped to shift the focus of attention from symptoms and verbal communications to character structure and non-verbal means of expression. Moreover, in terms of building bridges between psychoanalysis and the social sciences, he was one of the few early analysts to think about the possibility of ameliorating human suffering and evading totalitarianism through changes in family structure. Reich's emphasis on liberating human instincts was notable enough for Freud to have written Civilization and Its Discontents against him.

The latter part of Reich's life, however, is much more controversial. After divorcing his first wife, a former patient, Reich gradually drifted away from the mainstream of psychoanalysis. Without the moorings of friends and colleagues, he found himself beleaguered and alone. Although reputable schools such as A. S. Neill's Summerhill have been founded on his principles, Reich allowed himself to become the leader of a new cult. Persecuted by American government officials for his therapy based on orgone energy theory, Reich finally died in a federal prison.

History gets written partly by accident. Ernest Jones, Freud's official biographer, lived the longest of Freud's first generation of students, and most of what we know of that whole circle of people comes from Jones's version of events. On the whole, Jones wrote an expanded account of Freud's own conception of himself, ignoring the standpoint of pupils—such as Reich—struggling to fulfill themselves. Yet to understand Freud fully, one must explore more honestly his relation to his pupils. Reich Speaks of Freud is important because it sheds light on precisely that aspect of Freud's mind and character which Jones most conspicuously fails to interpret.

This book will undoubtedly seem a strange concoction. Like last year's Freud-Bullitt book on Wilson, its author speaks to us from beyond the grave. Much the most interesting part of it consists of tape-recorded interviews which Dr. Kurt Eissler conducted in 1952 on behalf of the Freud archives. Eissler had the foresight to interview the surviving early analysts about their contact with Freud. He never could have guessed, however, that this interview would get into print uncensored, since the archives has been so cautious about material in its possession as to make the innocuous as well as the purely private inaccessible to inspection for the next fifty or a hundred years. Characteristically, the Freud family refused to permit some quite harmless letters from Freud to Reich to be included in this book.

These interviews between Eissler and Reich will remain an important source of raw materials for all serious students of psychoanalysis. It is mainly gossip, to be sure, but what seems gossip to one generation may be history to the next. Life has of course its trivial chatter whose distortions are justifiably suspect. But with Freud, as with any important historical subject, our standards of possible relevance must be broad.

Amidst some of Reich's hyperbolic exaggerations, one finds here pungent descriptions of Freud's courage, his intellectuality, his Jewishness, his marriage, as well as his inner harshness and lack of interest in saving the world. Perhaps most moving is Reich's account of the contrast between Freud's sparkle and zest for living in 1919, and his gradual withdrawal and resignation after he was stricken with cancer in 1923.

Reich had his personal falling out with Freud. Like others, Reich expected a kind of attention and consideration from his teacher which Freud was increasingly unable and unwilling to provide. And the more Reich wanted him to be a social reformer, the more Freud kept his distance on the grounds of the neutrality of science.

By 1952 Reich no longer considered himself a psychoanalyst. As he grew emancipated from Freud's influence, Reich became aware that his own theory of genitality was not all to be found in Freud's early writings. Yet to the end of Reich's life he remained deeply identified with his former teacher. Unlike later followers of Freud who weakened the radical aspects of his work and junked the libido theory, Reich chose the early Freud to identify with, Freud the heretic, who wrote and thought shocking things. So we find Reich, like Freud, struggling to prevent his basic concepts from being "diluted." The revolutionary in Freud remained Reich's model.

Crisis in black

and white

and other urgent reading on this most agonizing American dilemma

"There can be no higher priority for national action and no higher claim on the national conscience."—from the report of the President's Commission on Civil Disorders

Cities in a Race with Time

By JEANNE R. LOWE. "Deserves the widest possible audience." — Mayor John V. Lindsay, front page, N. Y. Times Book Review Cloth $10; forthcoming Vintage Books (paper) $2.95

The Negro in Twentieth Century America

Edited by JOHN HOPE FRANKLIN & ISIDORE STARR. A unique reader on the civil-rights struggle. Vintage Books (paper) $2.45

The New Radicals

A Report with Documents By PAUL JACOBS & SAUL LANDAU. A survey of the protest movements of the 60's. Cloth $6.95; Vintage Books (paper) $1.95

The Death and Life of Great American Cities

By JANE JACOBS. "One of the most remarkable books ever written about the city."—William H. Whyte. Cloth $7.95; Vintage Books (paper) $1.95

Who Speaks For the Negro?

By ROBERT PENN WARREN. Revealing interviews with Negro leaders. Cloth $5.95; Vintage Books (paper) $1.95

La Vida

A Puerto Rican Family in the Culture of Poverty — San Juan and New York By OSCAR LEWIS. Winner of the 1967 National Book Award. Cloth $10; Vintage Books (paper) $2.95

Crisis in Black and White

By CHARLES E. SILBERMAN. "An exciting and meaningful book... must reading for all Americans." — Whitney Young. Cloth $5.95; Vintage Books (paper) $1.95

Rebellion in Newark

Official Violence and Ghetto Response By TOM HAYDEN. What really happened in Newark. Cloth $3.95; Vintage Books (paper) $1.65

Culture Against Man

By JULES HENRY. A penetrating critique of American society by a noted anthropologist. Cloth $7.95; Vintage Books (paper) $2.45

Prelude to Riot

A View of Urban America from the Bottom By PAUL JACOBS. An explosive, well-documented exposé of the urban ills that led to the Watts riots. Cloth $5.95; forthcoming Vintage Books (paper) $1.95

Two-Factor Theory

The Economics of Reality By LOUIS O. KELSO & PATRICIA HETTER. Recommends private ownership of productive capital by every American family to solve the poverty problem. Cloth $4.95

Desegregation and the Law

The Meaning and Effect of the School Segregation Cases By A. P. BLAUSTEIN and C. C. FERGUSON, JR. "Brilliant proof that case study can be dramatic as well as edifying." — Saturday Review Vintage Books (paper) $1.95

Crisis Now

By GEN. JAMES M. GAVIN. A distinguished soldier, diplomat and business leader offers realistic remedies for the complex problems of contemporary urban life. Cloth $4.95

The Great Society Reader

The Failure of American Liberalism Edited by MARVIN E. GETTLEMAN & DAVID MERMELSTEIN. Writings by prominent supporters and critics of LBJ's "Great Society" program. Cloth $8.95; Vintage Books (paper) $2.45

Black Power

The Politics of Liberation in America By STOKELY CARMICHAEL & CHARLES V. HAMILTON. Why "Black Power" may be our last hope of averting racial war. Cloth $5.95; Vintage Books (paper) $1.95

Profile of the School Dropout

Edited by DANIEL SCHREIBER. A reader on America's major educational problem. Cloth $6.95; Vintage Books (paper) $1.95

Growing Up Absurd

By PAUL GOODMAN. The hard-hitting analysis of American society that became the bible for a generation of rebels. Cloth $4.95; Vintage Books (paper) $1.45.

Now at your bookstore
RANDOM HOUSE

In terms of its structure, Reich Speaks of Freud belongs to the category of the non-book. Publishers are increasingly offering for sale undigested collections of material. Here, in addition to the valuable interviews with Eissler, are miscellaneous collections of Reich's correspondence and a few snatches from his writings. The editors have not properly integrated this material for the general reader. On the other hand, this book will be appreciated by those who need no such introduction and who would relish uncensored contact with one of Freud's most brilliant if erratic pupils.

the main enemies were not the guards (they were generally humane) but the frightful cold, the constant hunger, the back-breaking labor. There, bread was the staff of life, and if a man found himself unable to work his bread ration was cut so severely that he starved—and died.

One brief note of criticism. The camp story trails off at the end, and might have profited from better editing. And there are numerous misspellings in both novellas.

Nation Book Marks

LIAM LENIHAN

Mr. Lenihan, a former newspaper man, is now a free-lance writer.

NO LAUGHING MATTER. By Angus Wilson. The Viking Press. 496 pp. $6.95.

Angus Wilson's report on the decline of middle-class English life is more than a family novel which recounts the fortunes of the six Matthews children and their shabby-genteel parents over the span of half a century; it is a shrewd and compassionate appraisal of social and political England from its sunny, easy days of greatness to its twilight hours at Suez.

Hundreds of characters and incidents crowd the canvas, yet Wilson manages to juggle them all with consummate skill, and the relationships are all sharply drawn. Throughout the narrative, we hear the background noises of history: marching Welsh miners; the angry voices on the Left, discordant and disunited; the tramp of Mosleyite jackboots in the streets; the drawing-room chatter of appeasement; the German refugees crowding in. Wilson peppers his novel with odd bits of one of the characters' fiction and diaries, and even uses the play format on numerous occasions to give edge to his story, a technique which may disconcert some readers.

No Laughing Matter is often uproariously funny. But the subject is as serious as the title implies. And Wilson is always in full control of his material even when he dawdles or plays games.

FROM BEGINNING TO END. By Jozsef Lengyel. Translated from the Hungarian by Ilona Duczynska. Prentice-Hall. 138 pp. $4.95.

Jozsef Lengyel is introduced as one of Eastern Europe's most distinguished contemporary writers. A Hungarian, he took an active part in the famous Bela Kun uprising of 1919, fled to Austria when the Communist regime collapsed, and later went to Moscow. He was a victim of the Stalinist purges of the late thirties and spent the next eighteen years in prison, labor camps and Siberian exile. Lengyel was released in 1955 and returned to Hungary.

His book consists of two novellas and tells of the author's experiences both as a labor-camp inmate and, later, as a "free" exile. The camp document is the more absorbing story. Without self-pity, Lengyel depicts a brutalizing life where

ONE VERY HOT DAY. By David Halberstam. Houghton Mifflin Co. 216 pp. $4.95.

David Halberstam, who won the Pulitzer Prize for his coverage of the war in Vietnam, makes a valiant effort to evoke the Vietnamese scene in a novel. Some of it is vivid: the emasculating envelope of heat, the sullen villages emptied of their men, the sudden ambush sprung by an unseen foe. Halberstam is writing here about that old and very different war in Vietnam when Diem was President and the American presence was restricted to "advisers." The story line is simple. A company of South Vietnamese officers and men go on a routine patrol through the Mekong Delta. They are accompanied by two American advisers, both of them officers and professionals. The company walks into a guerrilla ambush and, in the ensuing firefight, it suffers heavy casualties. One of the Americans is killed. The guerrillas slip away.

Halberstam writes about the war in an impersonal and detached manner. He never preaches and has no ax to grind. His characterization is poor, but what does come across is the image of a soldiery unwilling to fight and unable to comprehend why the Americans are there.

GIRLS IN THEIR MARRIED BLISS. By Edna O'Brien. Simon & Schuster. 191 pp. $4.95.

Edna O'Brien can be uproariously funny and joyously randy. Yet something is lacking in her novels which makes the end result never wholly satisfying.

Her present book picks up the saga of Kate and Baba, the convent school dropouts who prowled through the pages of The Country Girls and The Lonely Girl in search of sex and Mr. Right. In London now, both girls have landed their quarry, yet are restless. Kate is married to the man who had jilted her in Dublin and is the mother of a small boy. But she is shut away in a gray, gloomy house in the country, and nature and silence are too much for her. She drifts aimlessly into an alliance of sorts with a married man.

Baba has found her Moneybags, a

Consider the alternative...

THE DRAFT?

A report against conscription, prepared for the Peace Education Division, American Friends Service Committee.

$3.50; paper $1.25

at bookstores everywhere

HILL & WANG

141 Fifth Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10010

loutish Irish hick who has made good in a big way and who clothes her expensively. But he is a sad sack between the sheets and Baba has a brief fling with a drummer who gets her with child. In the end, calculating Baba resolves her difficulty. She faces down her angry husband and blackmails him into accepting the drummer's child as his own.

Poor masochistic Kate has no such easy out but must walk the plank for her sins. Her affair ends but so does her marriage. Her husband carries her small son off to Fiji forever and Kate enters a private clinic and has herself sterilized. This drastic act of irrational atonement is explained by Kate after the operation as an effort to "eliminate the risk of making the same mistake again." But hasn't she ever heard of contraceptives?

One must finally agree with the critic who said that Miss O'Brien's gifts as a writer are larger than the uses she puts them to.

THE FLOOD. By J. M. G. LeClézio. Translated from the French by Peter Green. Atheneum. 300 pp. $5.95.

MUSIC/ Benjamin Boretz

The function of public entertainment that serious music used incidentally to fulfill, but which has not been carried on by recent work—especially since the disappearance of "expressionist" surface—has now again begun to be taken up by some composers who know enough of current compositional developments to make use of whatever immediate and novel "effects" these can generate, without at the same time committing themselves to the "unpopular" necessity of dealing with the compositional implications of such "effects." These composers—quite legitimately for their ends—juxtapose "all kinds" of events, associations and projective media, in the sure knowledge that few people have any specific idea about what makes a succession of sonic phenomena "a piece," but do enjoy obvious variety and what they can immediately perceive as "characteristic" and "different," in addition to the simple titillations of outrageousness and incongruity. That this should be the public's "modern" music is wholly understandable: its first-performance availability, its "romantic" posture, its perpetual variety, mixed-media or otherwise, and its overt renunciation of conceptual or perpetual complexity commend it to popular favor.

And the new "entertainments" that result are by no means necessarily unsophisticated or overtly "anti-intellectual" in their surfaces, which often invoke

The story of this opaque and irritating novel by a young French writer takes place during twelve days in the life of François Besson, who has quit his teaching post and come back to live with his parents in a dilapidated house near the center of a provincial town. Besson listens to the playback of a tape recorder, lists the names of cars whizzing by his window, goes out for a meeting with girl friend and leaves her for some casual sex with a redheaded woman he picks up.

He sets fire to his room, wanders the streets lonely and hungry, enters a church and goes to confession, begs on the street in a mood of self-imposed penance and, gripped by a nighttime fear, wantonly kills an unknown person. On the last day, he takes a bus into the country, alights and walks toward the seashore. There, stretched out on a bed of pebbles, he gazes up at the hot sun until he is blinded.

As if this were not sufficiently unattractive, the author also supplies a weird, hallucinatory vision of a world slowly frozen into stillness in a lengthy 43-page introduction.

associations with quite "advanced" and "serious" literary or pre-existing musical contexts. Thus, for example, Luciano Berio has used texts by Cummings and Joyce in his works, and equally distinguished literary names have appeared elsewhere. And the musical vocabularies invoked as referential "sounds" include the whole range of contemporary musical phenomena, from literally "pop" to those customarily associated with "difficult" work.

However the point is that such material is present for recognition in general rather than to function specifically, with characteristics of detail that are crucial to the perception of the "point" involved. In entertainment, their "point" is merely their identities, not their content, so that nothing problematic or not immediately recognizable is generated out of them, and no effort of discernment is required beyond noticing their presence, which (like the "classical" references in Britten et al.) communicates a sense of "cultural" sophistication to their listeners—a major aspect of the "entertainment" objective.

Of course, new musical contexts cannot be created in this way, since it is the familiarity of the juxtaposed elements that is crucial to their usefulness in this medium. The difference between music where the identity of the reference is the whole point, and where the reference is a functional aspect of the composi-

NEW DIRECTIONS

BOOKS

Edward Dahlberg

THE EDWARD DAHLBERG READER. An anthology of excerpts from his major books, and letters.

$6.50; Paper, $3.25

Robert Duncan

BENDING THE BOW. All his poetry since Roots and Branches.

$5; Paper, $2.25

Thomas Merton

CABLES TO THE ACE. A long poem with striking irony.

$3.75; Paper, $1.25

Yukio Mishima

CONFESSIONS OF A MASK. The development of a homosexual—told without sensationalism or self pity.

Paper, $1.85

New Directions 20

An anthology of new writing. "... the standard is universally high."—Publishers' Weekly. $5; Paper $1.95

George Oppen

OF BEING NUMEROUS. A new collection of poetry by the author of This in Which. $4.25; Paper, $1.45

Ezra Pound

LITERARY ESSAYS. Edited, with an introduction, by T. S. Eliot.

Paper, $3.25

Kenneth Rexroth

COLLECTED SHORTER POEMS. "Like Whitman, Rexroth is a poet of cosmic consciousness..."—Stephen Stephanchev (The New Leader).

$7.50; Paper, $2.25

Gary Snyder

THE BACK COUNTRY. "Poems full of spice, fire, movement and joy."—Richard Eberhart. $4; Paper, $1.25

Send for Complete Catalog

NEW DIRECTIONS
333 6th Ave.,
N.Y. 10014

tional surface that articulates a special structural characteristic is most evident in the comparison of, say, marching-band quotations literally invoked by Ives with no apparent contextual relevance, and the quite unliteral marching band in Wozzeck, the "classical" references in Stravinsky, or the jazz surfaces of Babbitt's All Set. But the presence of such surface characteristics in the latter works undoubtedly explains why they have been more usable as entertainment than have works by the same composers in which such features do not appear. Under these conditions, the quick and happy acceptance of the new entertainments as the contemporary "thing" by journalists and—especially—by composers whose earlier work retained a conventional "symphonic" surface designed to evoke public identification with the "real" and "profound" music of the past, is not only wholly understandable but sociologically probably quite healthy in that it may relieve a public frustration with new music that has prevailed now for fifty years or more.

But from my point of view, the advantages for serious composition that this development represents are even more significant. For the esoteric researches of serious composers into the deepest issues of musical structure have encountered some very difficult socio-cultural going because of the schizoid-making requirement that they also fulfill the popular function so desperately desired even by some of their well-wishers. If the music of Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner could fill these two roles simultaneously because the surfaces they generated in the conjoining of functional events could have all kinds of popularly interesting attributes imputed to them, this—by no apparent design or change of attitude on the parts of composers themselves—no longer appeared to happen with music since, say, Schoenberg and Webern. Therefore, if the current "specialization" of "serious" composition into the public's music on the one hand, and the musician's music on the other, removes that public frustration, it might also remove the public's resentment at the failure of the "other" kind of composer to produce a consumable commodity. And such a composer should be relieved of any lingering guilt at not behaving in this public-spirited way. Furthermore, by acknowledging his position as a pure researcher into music-structural phenomena, as a seeker after intellectual discovery in company with workers in other creative disciplines, he might now direct his appeals for moral support more realistically to colleagues in his own and these other domains, and—for the other kind of support—to those public and university agencies committed to the value of intellectual activity for its intellectual virtues independent of its ultimate "applied" public value.

The most positive evidence supporting this position is the fact that the striking success experienced by university-based new-music performance groups (especially the group at Columbia) in generating and sustaining their own, numerically considerable, audiences for "difficult" contemporary music has proved to be largely nontransferrable to the "regular" musical province. Those who have attempted this transfer have, it would appear, mistaken the conditions which this success has signalled. One aspect of the misapprehension has been the immediate proliferation of new-music activity which, although it has produced some excellent performances of new and "classic" 20th-century works (notably by the Contemporary Chamber Ensemble under Arthur Weisberg, in residence at Rutgers), has also disclosed the sparseness of qualified performers and public response available in the regular concert-going world, and has thus threatened to fragment and weaken internally a vigorous, self-sustaining activity. At the same time, the obviously quite successful attempt to revive yet again the International Society for Contemporary Music (due largely to the extraordinary efforts of the composer Henry Weinberg), which has traditionally been the composers' own performance activity, is a highly encouraging development.

But the seriousness of the confusion has perhaps been most evident in the new series, "The New Image of Sound" given at Hunter College under the direction of Eric Salzman, which has made the most sustained and strenuous effort to expand the audience for "difficult" music by presenting it in company with "entertainment," as just one facet of a huge, happy diversity. The result, in effect, has been that each entire piece of such music has assumed the generalized mere-identity function in the context of the whole "entertainment" concert that "advanced"-sounding fragments have in the context of a single "entertainment" piece. This calls into operation a musical Gresham's Law whereby the qualities of all pieces presented are reduced to the terms of the least demanding and problematic.

The difficulty that arises therefore is not only a simple one of public approval but also a falsification of the basis on which such approval is solicited. For the diversity of serious-compositional approaches, of which I have spoken here often and fondly, must not be taken to mean an identification of "serious" and "popular," as it has evidently been understood in the most generous of spirits by the Hunter series. As Milton Babbitt has pointed out, the criterion which distinguishes "serious" from "popular" music is the degree of "determinacy" with which the precise characteristics of every aspect of every detail of a serious work is essential to its "identity." In contrast, "popular music" retains its "germane characteristics" even when most aspects have been altered. Perhaps this may seem to define what is to be regarded as "serious" to begin with, but whatever one calls it, the distinction among musical kinds not cotenable in a single frame of perceptual or conceptual reference seems to me unmistakable.

Thus the earnest and imaginative efforts made in "The New Image of Sound" and elsewhere to bridge this gap by surrounding "difficult" with "fun" music and thus assist in propagating the former has, in the main, given it the same chance for appropriate consideration as what we regard as a "Beethoven Quartet" would have if presented as part of the half-time activity at a football game. Even Stravinsky was not entirely equal to his encounters with Ringling Brothers and Billy Rose, and whether composers serve themselves or are served well by these incongruous juxtapositions is a question for them, their well-intentioned supporters and the serious musical public to consider carefully.

In invoking "The New Image of Sound" as an exemplar of a difficult problem, I don't at all wish to overlook its really interesting individual accomplishments. Thus, while it is not clear how the technical competence of a performance contributes to the theatrical effectiveness generated by Mr. Salzman's own Verses and Cantos (a montage of diverse musical—instrumental and vocal—verbal and visual modes of presenta-

The Nation BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

- ☐ VIETNAM FOLLY
by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ THE FREE WORLD COLOSSUS: A critique of American Foreign Policy in the Cold War by David Horowitz (Hill & Wang, $6.95) $5.56
- ☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by Meyer A. Zelligs (Viking, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $3.95
- ☐ THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER by Ronald Sampson (Pantheon, $4.95) .. $3.95

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

4-15-68

tion into a kind of perceptual quodlibet in a correspondingly expansive time framework) and in Berio's Laborintus II (a compendium of emotive theatrical gestures in the abstract, where the absence of generating context, musical or dramatic, underlines the mechanics of "effect" in a frequently amusing way), nevertheless the vocalists, notably the soprano Barbara Smith Conrad, and instrumental ensemble—a "university" group from Juilliard—seemed notably accomplished, and are potentially a valuable addition to new-music performance resources.

Milton Babbitt's highly subtle, complex and intricate Philomel, scheduled for this concert, was postponed; thus the full impact of the mixed-category idea was not felt until the second concert, which alternated performances by the extraordinary Composers String Quartet (Matthew Raimondi, Anahid Ajemian, Bernard Zaslav, Seymour Barab), a unique virtuoso ensemble in all the relevant musical senses, and the remarkably proficient Contemporary Chamber Players of the University of Illinois. Now the String Quartet of Henry Weinberg that opened the concert is perhaps a model of the kind of composition whose notable virtues as music and thought are available only to the most attentive study and audition. In fact, it is music of a kind particularly difficult to talk about (let alone adjectiveize journalistically); for once having described some composer (or composition) as the exemplar of a given approach, the later developments of that approach, however inherently original, manifest themselves in internal ways almost impossible to distinguish verbally from the works one happened to describe first. Thus the Weinberg Quartet, beneath a surface deceptively simple but lucent and subtly varied in sonority and articulation throughout, presents some highly interesting and original ideas, particularly in the relations of events having various senses of "equivalence" in terms of varying time-spans. One might say that the time-span and its particular subdivisions become articulate, foreground elements of the musical discourse. It (along with the more recent Cantus Comemorabilis) is unquestionably the work of a significantly accomplished and remarkably mature composer.

The other quartet on the concert, Ben Johnston's Second (Microtonal), was a serious attempt to construct a sense of ensemble continuity and development, one of whose principal means of discrimination is pitch variation by intervals smaller than the conventionally minimum unit in Western music. The work does achieve a remarkable sense of continuousness in unfolding, and a high degree of ensemble cohesion, but the tendency of the conditioned ear to reintegrate pitches to the tempered scale

VALMIKI'S DANCE

*I can feel it boiling in my hands, energy: the energy
to grab you by the roots of your breath and shake crazy dreams
from your glands,
sunlight
turning all the oceans of the world into laughter and steam.*

*Look: my hoofprint on your throat is stronger than any death;
I will saddle a wild goat and ride him to the ends of your face;
I will fill that broken cave,
your hate, with what "our time" demands:
a bloated unicorn, sweating
in a green wind.*

STANLEY COOPERMAN

—except where apparent variants of "the same pitch" are either directly adjacent or actually juxtaposed—is a powerful block to the successful perception of the work's content at minimal acquaintance—a difficulty that was perhaps intensified by the directness of the compositional surface in other respects.

However, the piece that most suffered by being placed in company with the entertainment works on the program was the Antiphony IV of Kenneth Gaburo, because its sonorous context was much more immediately comparable to theirs: the "mixed-media" use of instruments, taped voice and pure electronics. Antiphony IV seemed to represent a genuine effort to generate ensemble music out of a mixture of synthesized and "performed" (instrumental, recorded-vocal) characteristics, all electronically projected (by miking, in the case of the "live" performers). In this performance, marred though it was by electronic-technical imperfections, many interesting and original details were evident on the work's surface, so that one feels impelled to explore the work more deeply.

Otherwise, the distorted-pop-song "conceit" of Salvatore Martirano's Ballad presented a rather one-dimensional though consistently clever and diverting "post-Webern" disposition of popular music qualities, associating with the tradition of L'Histoire du soldat, etc., but concentrating rather too broadly and directly on its gag and caricaturistic vocal effects to produce a compositional identity comparable to Martirano's previous works. One missed the toughness of musical mind and invention of his Shakespearean Rag, particularly the tight control of succession that make the verbal "gags" which it, too, projects an integral compositional resource.

Whereas the broad scale of the Martirano tended to obscure the subtleties of the other works on the program, the final Suite for 2 pianos and tape by Lejaren Hiller simply trivialized everything with its perfectly executed and hugely sustained musical nonsense-vaudeville, a manifestation of high skill in the manipulation of musical and electronic materials for popular amusement.

The most recent concert in the Hunter series was quite different. It consisted of an entire program given by the Contemporary Chamber Players of the University of Chicago (directed by Ralph Shapey and evidently the most distinguished of the Rockefeller Foundation-supported university ensembles). This superiority was manifest not only in the unusual clarity and security of the performances but in the consistent seriousness and high quality of the music programmed. Shapey's own Partita for Violin and 13 Players (performed by the accomplished violinist Esther Glazer) was particularly interesting as an indication of the recent direction of his work toward finely elaborated details, remarkably restrained and subtly configured surfaces, and, in general, toward music of a more impressively controlled and mature kind of diversity than the previous, broadly "striking" works.

Charles Dodge's Folia for large chamber ensemble had already been heard at Tanglewood (for which it was commis-

Are You A Slow Reader?

A noted publisher in Chicago reports there is a simple technique of rapid reading which should enable you to increase your reading speed and yet retain much more. Most people do not realize how much they could increase their pleasure, success and income by reading faster and more accurately.

According to this publisher, most people, regardless of their present reading skill, can use this simple technique to improve their reading ability to a remarkable degree. Whether reading stories, books, technical matter, it becomes possible to read sentences at a glance and entire pages in seconds with this method.

To acquaint the readers of this publication with the easy-to-follow rules for developing rapid reading skill, the company has printed full details of its interesting self-training method in a new booklet, "How to Read Faster and Retain More" mailed free to anyone who requests it. No obligation. Send your name, address, and zip code to: Reading, 835 Diversey Parkway, Dept. 533-514, Chicago, Ill. 60614. A postcard will do.

sioned by the Fromm Foundation) and at the Columbia Group's concerts. It reveals a considerable compositional capacity at the beginning of its development, especially in its projection of structural associations into distinct and imaginative sonorous configurations.

Of the other works on the Chicago program, John MacIvor Perkin's Music for 13 Players seemed so concentrated on its alternations of sharply differentiated modes of surface continuity that it sacrificed some of the pitch-articulate cogency that projected a much more genuinely distinctive sound-and-continuity-quality in the earlier Caprice for piano. And Richard Wernick's Haiku of Bashō, sung by the increasingly impressive soprano Neva Pilgrim, also generated a variety of "effective" sound-patterns (assisted by tape-recorded and spatially manipulated characteristics) without producing the individuality of sonority and context generated in Wernick's earlier String Quartet.

But it seems beyond question that this, and the Wolpe program given by the same ensemble the following evening, were among the most considerable new-music performances of this season, in terms of highly adequate representation of significant music not previously available here. And it seems equally clear that the Chicago ensemble has developed, under Shapey's direction, up to the level of our most accomplished and responsible university ensembles.

A subsequent column will report on recent compositions and performances of new music heard on some of the already established New York series.

THEATRE

HAROLD CLURMAN

From Café La Mama, one of the first and best-known of the off-Off-Broadway theatre ventures, Paul Foster's Tom Paine comes to Stage 73, a little playhouse at 321 East 73rd Street.

The play has been given in London and in other European cities, where it attracted critical attention. Because very few such productions are seen in Western Europe, they strike spectators in that part of the world with considerable force. Their appeal is that of the pioneer, they open new channels of dramatic expression. Though such enterprises have been with us for some time, they are still relatively unknown to the general play-going public. Despite the general spottiness of their achievements, they deserve better acquaintance.

Tom Paine is a sort of stage poem on the subject of the brilliant and unfortunate author of The Crisis and The Age of Reason, whose catchword "These are the times that try men's souls" is more familiar to us than his writing. The play does not bring Paine's political history any closer to those unfamiliar with it and does not really seek to do so. It has another aim.

The only concrete information offered is that Paine, who contributed significantly to fortifying the moral sinew of the American colonists, died in shameful neglect and obloquy among the people he helped liberate from English rule.

Tom Paine consists of short "expressionist" scenes, couched in grotesque or semi-burlesque imagery and coarse contemporary language, interspersed with improvisations by the cast on topical political themes. Every key fact or sentiment is embodied in some striking piece of stage action—acrobatic, dancelike, fantastic. Now and again there emerges a verbal flare, a phrase or an expletive which strikes home. But on the whole only the scenic metaphors maintain our interest.

Tom O'Horgan's direction creates the salient features of the evening. Paine is viewed as a split personality, part exalted prophet, part wretched alcoholic: two actors, one carrying the other back to back in a tortured crawl, demonstrate this ambivalence. During his French sojourn, Paine was condemned to death by the Convention for having urged clemency for Louis XVI: Paine crouches in his dungeon, tormented by nightmare horror of his expected execution. Then occurs the most brilliant moment of the evening: shadowy figures are seen sharpening knives (the guillotine!) from which sparks crackle and spurt in the dark. Not all of O'Horgan's visual inventions are as successful as these but they are all potentially illuminating; nearly all testify to his imagination.

The actors are none of them equipped for the tasks set for them: they haven't the training in movement, voice or speech to make their efforts better than valiant attempts at ambitious designs beyond their craft capacities. In Grotowski's theatre in Poland, at the Theatre on the Balustrade and similar units in Czechoslovakia, the actors have for years worked together daily with their directors. Whether or not the content of their results has substantial value, their execution is so thorough that one always beholds them with pleasure. Stanislavsky has been complemented by extraordinary gymnastics. The ensuing dynamics convey the sense of a new aesthetics and a new man in the making.

Our theatre rebels are not in a position—through background, opportunity, time, remuneration or subsidy—to bring their intentions to fruition. But in their reaching toward fresh effects they reveal something more than their technical inadequacy.

Such efforts as those by Paul Foster and Tom O'Horgan (sustained in this case by Kevin O'Connor whose tormented countenance is exactly right for the role of Tom Paine) express much more clearly than any specific ideology the desire to smash through the mediocre complacency of America's routine social and theatrical life. Unlike the English, they are driven to fashion out of their disaffection not the outcries or laughter of rage so much as chants of renewed hope, forms of enthusiasm and assertion.

To succeed, the rebel must attain mastery. Very few not already acquainted with Tom Paine will learn much about him from the Foster-O'Horgan play; but more discouragingly, no one not already inclined to echo the discontent and insurgency will be moved to acclaim these brave apostrophes of protest. I cannot therefore applaud their show as a finished and satisfying production, though I acknowledge the genuineness of the need it implies. It is a worthy thing to "experiment," but it is not enough.

Those who wish to change the world (if only the world of the theatre) must not merely be more determined but shrewder, wiser, more knowledgeable than those who occupy the seats of power. One must possess more than a pure heart and good will: one must acquire arms—of the brain, the body and the spirit.

For a time, while I was watching the unfolding of Tennessee Williams' The Seven Descents of Myrtle (Ethel Barrymore Theatre), I believed he might be on the track of a sound notion. But as the play proceeded to its moment of truth I realized that my expectation was to be deceived; at the end I was not simply disappointed, I was sore.

Myrtle, a good-natured, unlettered "chorine" in some bedraggled floor show in a Memphis dive, is approached by someone named Lot, a man of delicate appearance, genteel manners and literate accent. She is truly taken with him: in no time at all he proposes marriage and she gratefully accepts.

He brings her to his home in the backwoods country on the Mississippi which he shares with "Chicken," his half-brother. Chicken is the son of a low-lived dame of partly black ancestry. He is Lot's very opposite: rough, gruff, physically powerful, instinctive. He is the rude earth with all its sustaining vitality: Lot is dying of tuberculosis, impotent and hopelessly under the spell of his (now deceased) super-refined mother. Lot despises Chicken, but has kept him in the house because in his moribund condition he depends on his services.

In order to induce Chicken to stay on in the home Lot's mother has bequeathed to him, Lot has signed a paper leaving the house to Chicken upon Lot's imminent death. But when he returns from Memphis, Lot wants to get the paper away from Chicken. Chicken in turn fears that Lot's marriage may invalidate his claim to the house. He isn't sure that Lot has really married Myrtle and he wants to inspect the marriage license, which he believes bogus. Lot orders Myrtle to get Chicken drunk in order to steal the paper he gave Chicken; Chicken in turn asks Myrtle to get the marriage license from Lot.

All this may have social connotations. It suggests a parable of the South in conflict between the sickly "royal" blood of the past and the new vigor of the partly black power of the present. For my part, I supposed Williams was designing a more pertinent pattern in which the two men's struggle for mastery involved their using a guileless woman as a mere tool, with no feeling at all for her humanity. But no! What happens is that poor Myrtle is too innocent and helpless in the face of the realities which confront her (to begin with, she was unaware that Lot was fatally ill) to cope with Chicken, about whose very existence she has not been apprised. She is also horrified to discover that the home to which she had been brought is frequently and immediately threatened by flood. Lot calls Myrtle a whore because he fails in his plan to use her to bilk Chicken, to whose virility he believes she has succumbed. And so she has, out of the need for his strength and protection. Then Williams has Chicken say that nothing is real, true or important except the successful sexual union of a man and woman.

This statement (entirely out of character) is more a Williams fixation than a true thought. But it doesn't matter that I do not consider the doctrine—perhaps a D. H. Lawrence heritage—sane; it does matter than even in this regard the play offers an absurd premise. On the one hand we have a man already nearly dead (he does die at the final curtain) and on the other a tumescent husky (with the additional blessing of black origin) full of sperm and altogether competent to deal with the challenge of his environment. It is no contest. Either something basic has been deleted from the play or Williams, momentarily we pray, has lost his dramatic marbles.

For two acts his dialogue is lamently vivid, graceful, streaked with pungent humor. Thus, though the play is rather long (it has the shape of a novella) I was never bored until I realized that it was going to end in a conceptual bog and a narrative non sequitur.

Estelle Parsons plays Myrtle with a sharp sense of characterization and earthy charm, but the part and play being overextended, her performance barely escapes monotony. A good actress, Miss

Parsons had better see to it that she is not trapped by her ability to portray the vulnerability of the sweetly simple-minded American woman and so be enticed by frequent invitations to do it again and again and again in dire descent.

The DMZ Cabaret, in the back room of Forlini's, a saloon at Broadway and 111th Street, is a group that is optimistic by virtue of its youthful energy but committed to pessimism by sober reflection. From the program notes: "The DMZ program will change continuously. . . . Thus, as today's problems such as the war in Vietnam, the draft, racial tension and the 1968 elections become history, new songs, sketches and poems will be added to deal with tomorrow's problems: the war in Thailand, the draft riots, civil war in America, and the 1969 elections." Or perhaps the ingratiating vinegar sting comes from the fact that, while the faces on stage are young, the heads behind the scenes are turning gray. In any case, you can bet that DMZ is being shaken up as this is written, for on the night that I was there the morbid prospect of LBJ's reelection brooded over the festivities.

Every town in America big enough to boast a bus line ought to support at least one such acid concert (New York should have a dozen DMZs). It is put together with minimum fuss (no sets, no costumes, a few hats) and the maximum wit available, which is to say that it is dependably but not invariably lacerating. It is always very fast. The room is absurdly small, the tables jammed into your knees (ventilation surprisingly good) and the performers talk and sing straight into your beer. Not "togetherness" exactly, but you had better be with it.

Riverside Productions, which puts on the show, is a group of writers and actors associated with Columbia University, around the corner. Isaiah Sheffer, who staged it, and Eric Bentley, who wrote more of the skits than anyone else, both teach there. So does Albert Bermel, who contributed a surgical song and dance on the Policemen's Benevolent Association. As might be expected, Mr. Bentley has brought those contemptuous Germans, Brecht and Biermann into the skirmish; Jules Feiffer has written portraits that resemble the enbottled tragedians of his serial cartoons. There is a poem by Robert Lowell, a sketch by Eve Merriam.

The cast is Josephine Lemmo, James Antonio and Tony Harrison, with Bruce Kirle at the piano. They study drama at Columbia, work Off-Broadway and perform here as though raised from their cradles to upset the appletart. Backers, writers and actors, the whole DMZ project contrives to make a satirical revue look as easy as a walk in Central Park. It is a superior illusion. R. H.

FILMS

ROBERT HATCH

Jean-Luc Godard is preoccupied by the interlaced realities and pretensions of life and theatre. He tries to cope, not very profoundly, I think, with these ambiguities in his narrative films and earns a name for obscurity. In the case of La Chinoise it is a pity, for the social and political concerns of the picture are ambiguous enough, and Godard's "layering" of meaning is a distraction (it isn't worth fiddling much with conventional production illusions to convey the notion that art and action are mutually reflecting phenomena).

Ignoring, then, the Genet-related epistemology, the subject at hand is an ideology-induced "trip" experienced by a small group of Paris university students during a summer fortnight. They have been loaned an apartment by the wealthy parents of one of them and proceed to turn these elegant quarters into a cell of Mao Tse-tung's Cultural Revolution. Their short-wave radio is tuned to Peking, Red Guard posters cover the walls, the shelves are crammed with the Quotations from Chairman Mao and extracts from it are written large above the fireplace and between the windows. Like all religious converts, these zealots out-Chinese the Chinese; like most rebels from tyranny, they subject themselves to a tyranny of emancipation. They would shut down (blow up) the intolerably doctrinaire university, and they hurl doctrine at one another from morning to night, betraying in their incoercible lectures the mannerisms of their erstwhile academic lecturers.

These young people are appealing just

The Best Way To Get

THE
NATION

THE NATION 4-15-68
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign Postage $2; Canadian Postage $1 per year extra)

Name.....

Address

City

State Zip No.....

PERSONALS

Searching?

It's not enough to just "know thyself." COM/PAIR, the "people-matching-people" of Princeton speed your research. It's a way to meet a truly interesting match. National, international clients. $10.00 fee payable when you return questionnaire. Request free questionnaire from COM/PAIR Systems N 194 Nassau, Princeton, N.J.

COM/PAIR SYSTEMS, Inc., Dept. H
194 Nassau St., Princeton, N.J. 08540

© Copyright 1966 COM/PAIR Systems Inc.

DISCOVER an intriguing, fun approach to meeting alert, literate Jewish singles. No computers used. For FREE analytical questionnaire write: Dept. N, OPERATION MAZELTOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036. (PL 7-3638)

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE

(Computerized Matching—All Ages)
"Let TEAM make you a team."

Write:

TEAM Project
245 East 30th Street
New York, N.Y. 10016, Phone 889-6020

INTERESTED IN LIFE? Believe men should live each day to the fullest? So do humanists. For information write: Dept. N-1, American Humanist Association, 125 El Camino del Mar, San Francisco, Calif. 94121.

SALASACAN WALL-HANGINGS — Tapestries hand-woven by the Salasacan Indians of the Andes. Moderately priced. (C.D.Project). Write: ANDEAN, Box 472, Cuenca, Ecuador.

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: write Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 111 East 42 Street, N.Y.C. 10017.

BUTTONS, PEACE JEWELRY, POSTCARDS, POSTERS, psychedelia, etc. Unusual merchandise. Good service. Wholesale to all. 10c brings exciting free catalogue air mail. FREE SPEECH, INC., 28 St. Marks Place, N.Y.C. 10003

IF YOU ARE over 30, if you live in the N.Y.C. area, and if you are occasionally lonesome or bored, let us help you find intelligent, interesting companionship. Write TWOgether Associates, Dept. 16, 111 East 57 Street, N.Y.C. 10022

YOU CAN BE A CITIZEN DIPLOMAT TO RUSSIA THE "GLASSBORO WAY"

For details write:

CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS

Dept. N 4/15, 10 W. 46 St., NYC 10036

or Telephone: (212) LT 1-8113

FIGHT JUNK MAIL. Send it back at THEIR expense. Labels and instruction $1.00. Artichoke, P.O. Box 9123C, Bridgeport, Connecticut 06601

SNOOPY FOR PRESIDENT—249 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/51, 50/55, 125/10 and 1,000/75. Free catalogue to all. Free sample to stores. A Big Little Store, 1671 Washington, San Francisco, 94109

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

because they care so deeply and know so little. And Godard's craftsmanship—his affinity for bold color, his mathematically elegant sets, the laboratory shine of his meticulous lens, his gift for implying relationships with unstressed gestures—induces in the viewer a mood of aesthetic indulgence.

But ignorance implemented by fanaticism in a closed system becomes more than a game for children. It isn't only that those who know nothing fear nothing but that they are capable of anything. In the later stages of the film, I am not certain how much of what happens is intended as action and how much as acting out. It doesn't much matter: the point is that these young moralists, abstracted for a time from a society which they mistrust in any case, finding themselves free to create a total community out of uneasy love for each other and unquestioning adoration of a revolutionary movement reduced to slogans, lose any sense of who they are and where they are. The little red book becomes their peyote and the Long March leads down the boulevards.

Godard works with young people as though he liked being with them, and they must like him, for they let down their guards as though he were not around. I wish he would curb his impulse to interview them: the revelatory monologue has become a present cliché and it stultifies the camera. But when they are working with and on one another, these boys and girls are extraordinarily real—vulnerable, honorable and frightening. They see themselves, and perhaps they are, the heirs, heroes and executioners of the Age of Confusion.

Psych-Out has arrived in the neighborhood theatres very opportunely to Theodore Roszak's Nation series on the counter culture, particularly to his comments on the media's sensationalized understanding of the movement. The film's approach is as much sentimental as it is sensational, but in any case the coin rings false. Psych-Out is not about hippie values but about Hollywood values. Item: the heroine, played by Susan Strasberg, is stone deaf—a certain trigger of the ASPCA impulse in family audiences. Item: the three hippie heroes, one of them afloat on LSD, are surrounded by three times that many sadistic hoods in a Los Angeles car dump; but it turns out that the flower boys are also karate choppers and they offer five minutes of the most inspiring passive resistance since Spencer Tracy dropped off the train at Black Rock. Item: the "evil guru" of the film (Dean Stockwell) gives his life to save that of the girl whose dream of love he had previously tried to destroy with bad vibrations. It was a far, far better thing. . . .

I have no expert knowledge of the hippie scene but I frequent sections of New York where its members are present in large numbers, and the cast of this movie doesn't look authentic to me. It took me back to the westerns of my childhood, wherein young registrants at Central Casting were fitted out in fringed buckskin and brown paint and told to make like the implacable Cheyennes. They looked self-conscious then and they look self-conscious now. The dialogue of the film, particularly in the early passages, is especially estranging; it seems to have been composed less to communicate than to provide a glossary of hip terminology.

Psych-Out attempts to convey the sensory dislocations of the "consciousness expanding" drugs. It doesn't work, and I suspect it cannot work on the screen for the reason that movies have always used special effects to indicate emotional stress, and the psychedelic aberrations look merely like more of the same. We are shown the metaphors of confusion and terror, but in no sense do we get behind the eyes and into the mind of the tripper. A girl narrowly escapes death in a fire that consumes her brother; a moment later the drug "hits" her and as she flees the scene it seems to her that objects in her path spontaneously burst into flame. That is the most elaborate "psychedelic" episode in the film, and it could have been used any time in the past thirty years for precisely the effect it has here. Similarly, the dissolution of traffic into a phantasmagoria of light and sound and the transformation of friendly faces into masks of horror can be traced back at least to Dr. Caligari. Whatever the subjective experiences of the user, the effects of LSD film as madness, an old topic for screen melodrama.

Obedient to present custom, Psych-Out includes scenes of erotic undress. It strikes me that this development may cause a hiring crisis similar to the one that hit Hollywood when, with the advent of sound, it was found that such figures of desperate romance as John Gilbert spoke in bird calls. Most actresses in their 20s and 30s can strip to advantage, but the actors are not so fortunate. Few of them possess the necessary musculature, and their naked limbs take on a distressing resemblance to linked sausage. Stunt men could readily be employed for such scenes, since faces are not at issue; but the audience would soon catch on, and the psychological drawbacks would be significant. It is one thing to hire someone to double on horseback for a cowboy who cannot ride, but the public cannot be expected to respond well to a lover who employs a double in bed. It is a reflection on American society that by and large, the Continental male stars make a much better showing in their birthday suits. We need more calisthenics or less nudity.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1245

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Like spinach? You'll have to stop other business to show it! (7)
- 5 and 29 across Bad children who are, involve little expense in attaining angelic behavior. (4-3-7)
- 9 What James Francis Edward Stuart did when Old? (7)
- 10 Leading to the basement, perhaps, describing those not present? (7)
- 11 It shows how old a shiner is on New Year's Day! (5)
- 12, 15 and 17 down What you might make light of, to consider the humorist's bluster! (9)
- 13 It separates a couple of articles in a girl's make-up. (5)
- 14 What some Englishmen of legal standing might do? (7)
- 16 Scrambled eggs and this? (Caught the hard way, perhaps.) (7)
- 18 Fretted about the deal, perhaps, being in the red. (7)
- 21 Constrains by force. (7)
- 24 and 2 down When winter comes, play like this. (5,3,4)
- 26 The way things are done with bribery? (3)
- 30 Those who grease platters? (7)
- 31 By a nose? That's what makes things saucy! (7)

DOWN:

- 1 Seasons for pelts? (7)

- 3 Katisha was such a daughter-in-law. (5)
- 4 How the Big D is decked? (7)
- 5 See 6 down
- 6 and 5 down Clinked in "Libiamo" in "La Traviata"? Or is it just how you see it? (5,7)
- 7 and 27 across It should use nothing but bird shot. (7,5)
- 8 In a way, not any in one of the revolution should be traditionally clever. (7)
- 15 and 17 See 12 across
- 18 The grounds are rather shaky to our boys. (7)
- 19 Ruthy? (7)
- 20 Reputedly just like many dry spots. (7)
- 21 Uppermost courses of a wall imply struggles on even terms. (7)
- 22 An opening crack. (7)
- 23 Unguents, not "U" in the service. (4,3)
- 25 Pleating. (5)
- 27 and 28 In the navy would one be less than a martinet, but just as narrow-minded? (5,7)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1244

ACROSS: 1 Die Fledermaus; 10 One-step; 11 Curacao; 12 Trigger; 13 Proverb; 14 Instead; 15 Science; 16 Upturns; 20 Fat cats; 23 Islands; 24 Salvage; 25 Needier; 26 Idiotic; 27 Stage managers. DOWN: 2 Irenics; 3 Fatigue; 4 Expired; 5 Excepts; 6 Marconi; 7 Unclean; 8 Contributions; 9 Cobbler's bench; 17 Tallest; 18 Ranking; 19 Sistrum; 20 Fission; 21 Tilting; 22 Adapter.

TRAVEL

TOUR YUCATAN—July 8th, all expenses from New Orleans and return—12 unforgettable days —$400. MEXIVAC TOURS, P. O. Box 274, Lombard, Ill. 60148.

ART

ORIGINAL SIGNED GRAPHICS

Beckmann
Campendonck
Heckel
and other German Expressionists

Catalogue on request

Weingarten & Co.

40 West 56th Street, New York City 10019

WOULD YOU BELIEVE? EXCITING ORIGINAL woodcuts, etchings, lithos, $4.50 each. Subscription information: Graphic Circle, (N), 68 Fifth Avenue, New York City 10011

EDUCATIONAL

ARTHUR MORGAN SCHOOL, Burnsville 5, N.C. Grades 7, 8 and 9. Co-educational, Quaker-related, informal. Work-study program.

PUBLICATIONS

FROM PEKING & HANOI: Mao Tse-tung's "Quotations" & "On People's War," both famous little red books for $1.00. Ho-Chi-Minh's "Prison Diary," 75c. Subscription to Peking Review, 52 weeks, air, $4.00. Subscription to Vietnam Courier, 26 weeks, $5.00. Payment with order to CHINA BOOKS, Dept. N, 2929-24th St., San Francisco 94110. FREE CATALOG.

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

THE FUTURIST, published bimonthly by World Future Society, reports scientists' forecasts for coming decades. Subscription: $5 yearly. Box 19285-N, Twentieth Street Station, Washington D.C. 20036.

"Adventures of a Farm Boy" (non-fiction)—$2.00. Paul Burke, 201 S. 32 Avenue, Omaha, Nebraska 68131

DIRECTORY TO RADICAL PERIODICALS. Runs gamut of radical spectrum. $1.00. Alpine, Dept. 4, 1304 Geddes, Ann Arbor, Michigan 48104

'THE PRESS AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by

Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Fall issue of Columbia University Forum. It has already been selected for an anthology to be published by Atheneum this spring.

Single copies—15c

25 copies at 10c each

Orders over 25 at 7c per copy

THE NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Before LBJ's big "surprise," what were our readers reading?

The announcement of President Johnson's decision not to run for re-election drew eight-column headlines in the New York Times. Were YOU surprised? Not if you had been reading The NATION—not even the timing would have surprised you.

Let's go back to November 28, 1966, to a NATION editorial entitled "A Look Ahead":

"It would seem quite possible that the President may not be a candidate for re-election in 1968—not necessarily because of ill health, although that remains a possibility, but because he had decided to bow out rather than undertake a political campaign in which the odds were not in his favor. On more than one occasion Mr. Johnson has demonstrated what his friends might call political prudence; his enemies would call it political cowardice. Witness his failure to come to the aid of Governor Brown in California. . . . By present indications Mr. Johnson has passed the zenith of his popularity. . . . It is no longer a question of the Great Society but of maintaining any social progress at all. In such a relatively static situation a President can hope for little good will. As for past achievements, political gratitude is proverbially short-lived. . . . If he did resign himself to fate, he would in all likelihood do so late in the game and without advance notice."

In an editorial January 29, 1968:

"The tragedy of the situation is that if Mr. Johnson is re-nominated and re-elected . . . the result will not settle the issue of Johnson. The divisions cut too deeply, the distrust cannot be overcome, confidence cannot be restored. The country would still be divided."

Still later, in "An Appeal to the President" (March 11, 1968):

"The fact is—and now it must be obvious even to President Johnson—that he himself is the divisive issue in the country, and matters have reached a pass where nothing he can say or do will change the situation."

In this same editorial we urged him not to seek renomination "for the good of the country."

On March 25:

"The idea may have sounded quixotic; in reality it was, and is a sober political proposal. . . . The national crisis is mirrored by the personal crisis Lyndon B. Johnson faces in an election year. . . . But there is a way out of both stalemates (the war and the election); he could decide not to seek re-election and thus create the circumstances which make it possible to negotiate a settlement. . . . If the President withdraws, his action would have been relatively selfless, and he would have the satisfaction of knowing that he had given his party a chance to unite under new leadership and perhaps even to go on to win the election. History will look on him more benignly, and his pride will suffer less, if he decided to follow the example of President Truman and not seek re-election."

In another editorial in the issue of March 25:

"The campaign may well shape up as a repeat of the 1952 campaign in which Kefauver's remarkable showing in the primaries was a factor in President Truman's decision not to seek re-election."

They were prepared for it

NATION readers expect the unexpected, because they are truly informed—not merely titillated by the latest dicta of the prophets and pollsters.

That's what gives extra bite to what appears in our 103-year-old weekly journal. That's what gives us our unique record of calling major developments in advance—from the disaster we saw breeding in Vietnam even before the Geneva Accords of 1954, to the tragedy of the Bay of Pigs in 1961, to President Johnson's abdication of the opportunity to run for a second full term in 1968.

To The NATION, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014

- ☐ I'll join the good fight for one year (48 issues). Enclosed is my check for $10. I understand you'll send me FREE The Accidental President, the best-seller by Robert Sherrill, The NATION's Washington correspondent (hardbound, retail price $5).
- ☐ I'll sign on for six months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6.

(Add $1 postage for Canada, $2 foreign)

Name

Street

City State Zip

N 4-15

The good fight is now in

THE NATION

--why not join now?

NEW UNIVERSITIES CONFERENCE

THE NATION

APRIL 22, 1968 35 cents

Beale Street And Points North

MEMPHIS IS ALSO AMERICA PAT WATTERS

NIGHT WALK IN HARLEM BENNETT KRAEMER

ELEVEN HOURS IN CHICAGO FREDERICK C. STERN

Moscow's Wayward Satellites

ALEXANDER WERTH

Truth and Nat Turner: An Exchange

WILLIAM STYRON and HERBERT APTHEKER

The Legitimacy of Black Revolution

JULIAN MAYFIELD on TRUMAN NELSON

HOWARD UNIVERSITY UNIVERSITY SERIALS
WASHINGTON D C 20001

10-72

LETTERS

McCarthy country

Worcester, Mass.

DEAR SIR: W. David Gardner's reporting is factual regarding the impact of Senator McCarthy in Massachusetts ["What Works for McCarthy," The Nation, Apr. 8]. Since the Senator's "moral" victory in New Hampshire and his massive victory in Wisconsin, McCarthy support in the central Massachusetts area has grown in spite of the Kennedy candidacy. We are all anxiously, but hopefully, awaiting the results of the Indiana primary. A McCarthy victory there would likely cause a reassessment of Senator McCarthy's stature as a potential winner by the professional politicians, who are as yet uncommitted. It is my feeling that Senator Kennedy has, over the years, antagonized many of these "grass roots" politicians and may find his steam roller stalled if he does not have a decisive victory in Indiana.

Joseph C. Casdin, Mayor

analogy

Princeton, N.J.

DEAR SIR: Arno Mayer's comparison of Vietnam and Greece ["Vietnam Analogy: Greece Not Munich," The Nation, Mar. 25] is both interesting and illuminating. I think it can be argued, however, that he dismisses the Munich analogy too quickly. Munich, as Dean Rusk never tires of telling us, is a symbol of appeasement; but the question is who appeased whom and why? In general terms, Munich was an attempt on the part of a conservative, rigidly anti-Communist government to cooperate with Fascist Germany in an attempt to bolster Western defenses against communism. As in Vietnam, fear of communism overrode all other considerations in shaping Western policy. The lesson of Munich which Mr. Rusk seems incapable of perceiving is that a nation must choose its allies as well as its enemies.

Edward Schneier

DuBois memorial

Pittsfield, Mass.

DEAR SIR: The Berkshire Eagle comes in for more credit than is its due in your April 1 issue [editorial, "Red Hunting Beyond the Grave"]. While we have supported the proposed memorial to W.E.B. DuBois editorially, the campaign for the memorial was spearheaded not by us but by Prof. Edmund W. Gordon of Yeshiva University and Walter Wilson of East Chatham, N. Y., and the W.E.B. DuBois Memorial Committee, of which they are chairmen. The seventy-six-member committee, incidentally, includes such notables as Reinhold Niebuhr, William L. Shirer, Roy Wilkins, Norman Rockwell and Sidney Poitier, to mention only a few.

Lawrence K. Miller, Editor

Canadian peace action

Regina, Sask.

DEAR SIR: The Regina Vietnam Action Committee is interested in compiling a list of the names and addresses of Canadian peace groups, Vietnam Action groups, etc. We are doing this with a view to coordinating some Canada-wide peace action in the near future. . . . We would be willing to supply the file, once compiled, to the groups which have responded. Please send replies to: Mrs. N. L. Crane, Vietnam Action Committee, 3222 Robinson St., Regina, Sask.

EDITORIALS

A First Memorial

Universities and institutions of all sorts have begun to set up chairs of learning and other memorials to Dr. King—which is as it should be. But The Nation proposes a memorial to Dr. King, John F. Kennedy and all the other victims of sniper bullets, which would be at the same time a test of the temper of opinion in the Congress and a measure of whatever insight still remains in that body, namely that it pass the gun-control bill that has been pending before the Senate Judiciary Committee these many months.

By a weird bit of irony, the Senate Judiciary Committee met Thursday, April 4, with that peerless Southern statesman, James O. Eastland, in the chair. Pending before the committee is the so-called safe-streets bill. The only hope for getting the gun-control bill onto the floor was to work something out with "Jungle Jim," as he is sometimes irreverently called in the Senate office bars and cloakrooms. So the proponents of the bill hit upon the idea of attaching it to the safe-streets bill.

The committee was in session from 3 P.M. to 6 P.M. The panel defeated, 9 to 4, a proposal to ban interstate sales of firearms to individuals. The best that could be extracted from the sixteen members was a 6-to-6 tie vote to combine gun control with safe streets. The committee adjourned, and an hour later Dr. King was shot to death.

The situation was then altered. On Saturday, the committee voted 9 to 7 to attach gun control to safe streets; evidently, in the eyes of the committee members, the situation was not altered as drastically as one might have expected. Moreover, to win even this tactical victory, the proponents had to agree that rifles and shotguns should be exempted. Obviously Dr. King could not have been hit at any such distance with a hand gun, but those in favor of regulation were ready to do anything to get the bill to the floor. Now that it has been reported out, the rifles and shotguns will be put back and other amendments added, since the bill is farcical without their inclusion.

Also by coincidence, the principal opponent of the legislation, the National Rifle Association, was meeting in Boston April 6 to 11. The position of the association has always been that guns do not kill people, people kill people. This is a truism, but it is also a fact that at 200 yards a rifle is a big help. This is no concern of the association, however, and predictably it will do what it has done in the past—get out a tremendous barrage of letters to members of Congress. The NRA, characterized by the Congressional Quarterly as "the biggest lobbying group in Washington, employing more people than any other single pressure group," is said to be capable of getting something like a million gun-defending letters in the mail within seventy-two hours. The effect of such an inundation in an election year does not require description.

By a third coincidence, the National Board for the Promotion of Rifle Practice, an adjunct of the Department of Defense, is meeting to decide what its policy should be. Many people are under the impression that the tie-in of this board with the civilian marksmanship program has been terminated, but actually all that has happened is that the board's funds were cut back to something like $100,000, and the board has been looking forward to a chance to get the appropriation restored to a more generous level. Of the twenty-three members of the board, a majority are big wheels in the National Rifle Association—ex-presidents, et al. Eight of the twenty-three board members are military personnel—colonels, generals, retired officers; every one of the eight is also a member of NRA. The board is shortly to decide on a stand. That should be interesting.

With perhaps one or two exceptions, there is no country in the world that would tolerate the opportunity-to-kill situation that exists in this country. Gunnar Myrdal, interviewed in Sweden by The Washington Post after Dr. King's death, said: "Psychopaths . . . think they can win an honored position by assassinating some public figure. . . . I am all against your gun laws." The American position, of course, carries over from the frontier business of eradicating Indians and like varmints. But we are still the greatest buyers of domestic and foreign arms in the world. After every war, or when NATO, for instance, modernizes its armament, the surplus is eagerly bought up in the United States. The domestic arms race parallels the international arms race.

There are few if any limitations on the sale of lethal weapons or precautionary measures in connection with such sales. According to the April 9 New York Daily News, the 30.06 Remington pump rifle that killed Dr. King was purchased at a Birmingham, Ala., gun shop four days before the shooting. The dealer clearly remembers the buyer, but there was no requirement that his fingerprints should be taken and his identity established. He took the weapon and vanished.

There are few open-and-shut propositions, but we see this as one of them. We have a Kennedy Airport and talk has started that Newark should be renamed King Airport. These are appropriate gestures, but the most practical memorial to Dr. King—and to Kennedy—would be a tight gun-control bill, passed immediately.

Insulation of the Presidency

After his speech of withdrawal and the assassination of Dr. King the President had a rough week. One can hardly imagine the pressures and tensions he has experienced. But considerations of sympathy for one so afflicted—after all, most of his trials he has brought on himself—should not preclude critical comment. Things can get still worse.

Is it possible that the modern Presidency insulates the incumbent against the kind of information and intelligence that he must receive to run his office effectively? He is thoroughly and continually briefed, but what is the quality of the intelligence he receives, and who determines what gets through to him? We know—the CIA has confessed as much—that he got a load

IN THIS ISSUE

April 22, 1968

EDITORIALS

522

ARTICLES

- 526 Eastern Europe:
Moscow's Wayward Satellites
Alexander Werth
- Beale Street and Points North:
529 Memphis Is Also America
Pat Watters
- 531 Night Walk in Harlem
Bennett Kremen
- 533 Eleven Hours in Chicago
Frederick C. Stern
- 535 New Universities Conference:
The Dilemmas of Resistance
Norman Birnbaum
- 538 Ohio: Politics After Johnson
Gene I. Maeroff

BOOKS & THE ARTS

- 541 The Legitimacy of
Black Revolution
Julian Mayfield
- 543 Truth & Nat Turner:
An Exchange
*Herbert Aptheker
and William Styron*
- 547 Book Without a Label
Gren Whittman
- 548 Poems of a Japanese Sojourn
Richard Eberhart
- 549 Art
Max Kozloff
- 551 Crossword Puzzle
Frank W. Lewis

Publisher JAMES J. STORROW JR.	Associate Publisher GIFFORD FELLIPS
Editor CAREY McWILLIAMS	Associate Editor PHIL KERRY
Executive Editor ROBERT HATCH	Literary Editor HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 for Canadian postage; $2 for foreign postage.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information in Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Vol. 206

No. 17

of bad intelligence prior to the Tet offensive. We know too that his predecessor was wantonly misled at the time of the Bay of Pigs, and there are many less glaring, but still serious, lapses of this kind. Are there nonconductors impeding the flow of accurate information into the White House?

Reviewing the situation in the past two years, one cannot avoid the conclusion that (a) the President is erroneously briefed; (b) that he is not briefed on the right subjects at the right time; (c) that his contacts—the people who see him and have a chance to influence him for his own and the country's good—are far too limited and too much of one mind; or (d) that he gets valid information but elects to ignore it, or draws the wrong conclusions from the right data.

A prime example was Mr. Johnson's reference in his State of the Union message to "a certain restlessness" in the country. We were appalled by this grotesque understatement and commented on the dangers of such complacency in an editorial of the same title (January 29). John Gardner warned Mr. Johnson in December that the country was in perilous shape: Johnson did not listen and Mr. Gardner departed. Mayor Lindsay was another who commented on the President's failure to reflect any sort of acute concern regarding the situation in the cities. We summed up the message as "a sad speech in a troubled time."

Then when the report of the President's own commission on civil disorders reached him, he did not focus attention on it, did not have the commissioners in to discuss it, did not make an event of it. The newspapers for the most part were far more perceptive—with no help from the President. On the contrary, he rushed off to Puerto Rico, then sulked for a time, then finally said that the report would receive "careful study." The commission, composed entirely of moderates, had stressed in the strongest possible terms the urgency of the situation; the President's failure to respond was therefore a factor contributing to the rising tension. The particular spark that set off the disorders of April 4 to 9 no one could have foreseen, but that there would be some sort of ignition everybody foresaw—except, apparently, President Johnson.

When the riot occurred in Memphis, Mr. Johnson's reaction did not differ essentially from that of Mayor Henry Loeb (see article p. 529 this issue). On that day the President made two speeches and also issued a statement, all stressing in essence the need for "law and order." He spoke, but he was unresponsive as far as the essentials of the situation were concerned. He seems not to have had the slightest vital contact with the elements and forces that were actually at work.

A somewhat parallel situation occurred at Mrs. Johnson's luncheon for well-behaved, well-fed ladies at which Eartha Kitt shocked everyone with her outburst. Mrs. Johnson, the most well-meaning of women, had tears in her eyes when she replied to Miss Kitt, and in a somewhat apologetic tone pointed out that she had never had Miss Kitt's experiences and had, so to speak, been insulated from these intolerable aspects of American reality. Mrs. Johnson's responsibilities are limited; the President's, on the contrary, are unlimited. It is downright terrifying if he is misinformed or in any way impeded from getting the information which will enable him to correct old mistakes and avoid new ones. If that is the situation, he still has eight months to go on blundering in the dark.

How About Lindsay?

To the political amateur and professional alike, even to the average voter who pays woefully little serious attention to politics, '68 has been a phenomenal year. The never-to-be-conceived could happen, and did, and the future may hold more such surprises: McCarthy entering with excessive personal modesty, winning a victory, and deciding that maybe he will make it at Chicago; Kennedy jumping in with a lame excuse for his delay, but, once in, missing not a single political trick; the President taking himself out of the race in an action of which few considered him capable; the assassination of Dr. King, an event that could have profound political consequences; and the end is not yet. But note that almost all of this is on the Democratic side—only Romney's withdrawal and Rockefeller's statement made headlines for the Republicans. But there may be some surprises in store for the Republicans too.

Only a short time ago Nixon seemed a shoo-in; now, according to the Harris poll, he is in trouble. The extent of this trouble is measured by a number of indications: the growing liberal-moderate Republican interest in McCarthy (there is practically no interest of this kind in Kennedy); the statements of Sens. Mark Hatfield and George Aiken that they just might vote for a Democratic peace candidate; the renewed rumbles that Rockefeller might get into the race.

And he should, but in any case he should get off the fence. We would like to see him in it if only to find out what he really thinks about Vietnam, where one of his foreign policy advisers, Henry Kissinger, has apparently been playing an interesting behind-the-scenes role. Then there is the factor of Lieut. Gen. James Gavin's announcement of support for Rockefeller, after which Rockefeller assumed a posture of complete passivity. Gavin has too many valuable insights, gained from an extraordinarily varied series of roles—military, diplomatic and business—to be wasted. If Rockefeller is not going to run, Gavin, an independent who can move in any direction, could prove immensely useful to another candidate—Senator McCarthy, for instance. As adviser to the next President, he could speed up the tortuous process of making peace in Vietnam, which President Johnson can initiate but probably not complete in his remaining tenure.

If Mr. Rockefeller chooses to stay out, then it seems to us that he should consider encouraging or sponsoring Mayor John V. Lindsay of New York who, if backed by the New York delegation, might create a lot of excitement at Miami. Consider these facts:

(1) Lindsay has a superb record on the two key domestic issues—the racial situation and the crisis of the cities; and we know where he stands on Vietnam.

(2) He was a key figure on the President's commission on civil disorders and had a lot to do with the tone and tenor of the report and with the fact that it was submitted unanimously in the end.

(3) He is the spokesman, nationally, and recognized as such, for the cities, and for the new constituencies that are forming around the three intertwined issues of race, cities and war in Southeast Asia.

(4) He has a style of political leadership attuned to the times. He knows, perhaps better than any other Republican, the intolerable conditions and urgent needs of the cities—which is where the Republicans must pick up sizable blocks of votes if they are to have a chance to win.

(5) He has exceptional poise and courage, and both show on television. Contrast his manner of surveying a crisis situation with that adopted by Mayor Daley of Chicago. Daley calls for his helicopter and views the scene from above the battle; Lindsay walks the streets and talks with the people. It is dangerous, but effective. That is what it takes to be mayor of a great city in turbulent times.

The Nation's most ardent desire is to see both a Democratic and a Republican candidate, either of whom could restore its lost prestige to the Presidency and who could tackle with adequate intelligence the malign forces that divide us. Lindsay's name should by all means go before the delegates at Miami.

Winds of Oregon

It's a topsy-turvy primary election season in Oregon. Some weather-beaten veterans of the Wednesday noon-hour Portland State College peace vigil are switching from McCarthy to Kennedy, believing that RFK has the better chance to win. Some members of the local jet set are deserting Kennedy for McCarthy, on the ground that glamour is less exciting than courage. Liberal Republicans in significant numbers are changing their registration to Democrat so that they can vote for McCarthy. Conservative Republicans, in perhaps lesser numbers, are registering Democratic to bolster Robert Duncan, who is opposing Sen. Wayne Morse, the target of Oregon rightists, Meanyish labor leaders and Administration wheels.

Duncan, roughed up in 1966 by Mark Hatfield—who is emerging as one of the clearer peace voices in the Senate—was an unabashed hawk two years ago. Indeed support of LBJ's Vietnamese policy was his abiding issue. Today he has dropped the war to the bottom rung of the issues ladder; when he does speak on the subject, it is to establish himself as a deeply troubled man who prays for a way out. (This posture has left the peace people cold.)

The local AFL-CIO has swung its paper strength behind Duncan, giving observers outside the state the false impression that Oregon labor has abandoned Morse. But Morse has the emphatic support of the powerful building trades unions; the ILWU (Longshoremens), who are the potent political force in one of the state's key counties; and the Teamsters, who can do a better job of mobilizing membership than anyone else in the labor movement.

It is too soon to measure the effect of Johnson's departure on these vagrant tugs and pressures, but Oregon politics are not about to turn lethargic.

More on Spain

Our editorial in the April 8 issue, "Put Spain on the Agenda NOW," was by no means the last word on this matter for those who value the good name of the United States and object to seeing Treasury funds poured out for useless—if not nefarious—ends. Since 1953, we have been buttressing Franco's increasingly shaky regime with billions of American dollars, expended on four Spanish-American bases and accounting in some measure for the precarious status of American currency. The original pact ran for ten years, then was extended for another five. In September it comes up again for renewal. This time it should be scrapped—with the happy possibility that Franco would fall in the process.

With its usual gall, the Franco gang is preparing to raise the price for a renewal of the pact covering the bases, or at least shows a resolve to keep it where it is. In what was billed as a major foreign-policy speech, foreign minister Fernando María Castiella y Máiz told the Cortés (the Franco simulation of a parliament) that the presence of a reinforced Soviet fleet in the Mediterranean has greatly increased the strategic value of the Spanish coasts and is "forcing" Spain to "reconsider very carefully all present and future military commitments. . . . In truth, we have been on the verge of becoming unwillingly the field for maneuver for the Western forces, each day more crowded in the limited European space." Apparently Spain wants to be fully integrated in the Western defense system—in a sense taking the place of France—and means to be well paid for its good will. To make us quake the more, Castiella added a vague threat of Spanish neutralism.

The kind of country that Spain is under the Franco regime is shown by a dispatch from Madrid by Tad Szulc in the April 3 New York Times. Marcelino Camacho Abad, a labor leader on trial with twelve others for his role in the Madrid riot of January 27, 1967, had already been imprisoned for fourteen months, and now that he had a courtroom audience insisted on answering questions in his own way. The judge threatened him with expulsion for contempt if he did more than answer "yes" or "no." The dispute ended with Camacho being dragged out of the courtroom, shouting: "This is a dictatorship that is drowning. Long live liberty!" Thereupon the courtroom broke into chants of "liberty! liberty!" and all except the newsmen were hustled out.

The expulsion of an obstreperous defendant is sometimes resorted to in normal trial procedure, but the proceedings are not resumed until order has been restored and the defendant is back in the dock. In Franco's Spain they do it differently: at the afternoon session not only was Camacho absent from the court but the press was also barred. The Fascist judge was outdoing the Star Chamber proceedings of the Tudors and Stuarts in the 16th and 17th centuries.

When this sort of thing occurs in a Communist country, howls of outrage emanate from some intellectual groups in America. They now have a chance to protest against a prolongation of the American "defense" pact with a nation where intellectual freedom is penalized more severely than in most Communist countries.

MOSCOW'S WAYWARD SATELLITES

ALEXANDER WERTH

Paris

I have always had an ambiguous attitude toward the Czechs. Common sense and "realism" are excellent qualities in their own way, but they are not always easy to admire. Yet I am perfectly ready to admit that, but for these qualities, the Czechs could never have survived. They are placed right in the middle of Europe and surrounded by more or less hostile neighbors—Germans and Hungarians in the first place, but also the Poles who, at the time of Munich, did not hesitate to grab Teschen from them, with Hitler's blessing. For centuries they formed part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, managing somehow to flourish economically, and in the 19th and early 20th century even developed an admirable national culture of their own. They produced Dvorak and Smetana in music, The Good Soldier Schweik and the novels of Kafka (though written in German) in literature, to mention only the world famous.

As one of the great beneficiaries of the Versailles Peace Treaty, the Czechs became the favorite proteges of France, in the 1920s the greatest military power on the Continent; and, of all the French "satellites," they established the most solid and lasting Western-type parliamentary democracy, under the leadership of truly great men like Thomas Masaryk and Eduard Benes.

Then came the great Munich betrayal, and six months later, Czechoslovakia was occupied by the Nazis. There were pathetic street demonstrations in Prague at the time of Munich, but after the entry of Hitler's troops and Gestapo in March, 1939, the Czechs, though bitter and angry, adapted themselves as best they could to the occupation, while Slovakia became an "independent" country under a quisling government.

There was nothing much the Czechs ("those Pygmies who have come to Europe, God knows from where," as Goering said) could do. With a Vichy-like sense of self-preservation, they by and large "collaborated." The Czech working class produced equipment for the Wehrmacht; in contrast to Poland and the occupied areas of the Soviet Union, no strong resistance movement arose in Bohemia and Moravia. True, the fiendish Nazi Gauleiter Heydrich was assassinated, and the little town of Lidice was burned to the ground, most of its inhabitants being massacred. But Lidice was an isolated case, though it has become a symbol of "Czech Resistance." In the Soviet Union, particularly in Byelorussia, there were hundreds of "Lidices," and the Russians made less political capital out of them than did the Czechs out of Lidice.

I remember that during the war the Czech Communist leaders in Moscow—Gottwald, Kopecky, Cepicka and the rest—complained bitterly of the "weakness" of the Czech resistance, blaming ex-President Benes, then head of the Czechoslovak government-in-exile in London, for not giving it more encouragement. The Slovaks were more "romantic" and in the fall of 1944, when the Red Army entered Slovakia, they built up a strong resistance movement—which, however, ended only in tragedy. The Czechs scarcely budged. When Benes returned to Prague after the complete defeat of Germany, he looked out over the baroque palaces and churches of the beautiful city from the heights of Hradschin and remarked: "Wonderful to think that, of all the great cities of Central and Eastern Europe, Prague is the only one to have fully survived. Berlin, Warsaw, Budapest, Vienna, Dresden, Kiev and hundreds of others are, more or less, in ruins, but not Prague!"

Between 1945 and February, 1948, there came a transition period when Czechoslovakia seemed the perfect show window of East-West coexistence. But at the height of the cold war, Stalin and the Czech Communists engineered their February, 1948, coup. The toughest Stalinists took over; and Benes, now an old and very sick man, reluctantly accepted the change of regime.

Some of my most unpleasant experiences of those years arose from visits to Czechoslovakia in 1949 and 1950. Because during those years I also frequently visited Tito's Yugoslavia, I was persona non grata in Prague. Reconciling themselves to their evil fate of being—for how long no one could say—nothing but a Russian satellite, the Czechs became even more Stalinist than the Moscow Stalinists. Significantly, I was first attacked as a "notorious British snooper," not by Pravda but by the Prague Rude Pravo; it was only after that, that a certain Krushinsky, the Pravda correspondent in Prague, denounced me in similar terms in the Moscow paper. There was much heehawing about it in the British Foreign Office.

Then, two years later, I was named, along with Richard Crossman, Konni Zilliacus and dozens of others, as a "British Intelligence and Zionist spy" at the Slansky trial, as a result of which my old friend Otto Katz (alias André Simone) was hanged along with several others. It was Katz who had first attacked me in Rude Pravo three years earlier. In Prague, between 1948 and 1952, people were arrested by the thousands and sent to the uranium mines. Of all the gigantic statues of Stalin erected in the satellite countries, the one put up in Prague was the most gigantic. (I am told that it is still there, but that Stalin's head has recently been replaced by Lenin's! There are virtues of economy in the rigorous conventions of Communist official art.)

Among satellite countries, Czechoslovakia (apart from the special case of East Germany) was by far the slowest to de-Stalinize itself. Yugoslavia had been the first to break free in 1948; in 1956, soon after the 20th Party Congress in Moscow, Poland and Hungary also rebelled. Gomulka, a "national Communist," took the place of the Stalinists in Warsaw, and Khrushchev, afraid to send troops, accepted the change. In Hungary, the more violent rebellion was suppressed by Russian tanks in Budapest;

but even so, there was a change of regime. Instead of Stalinists like Rakosi and Gerö, the "national Communist" Kadar (previously imprisoned, like Gomulka) took over.

Czechoslovakia alone did not move. After Gottwald's death, first the wholly reliable Zapotocky, and then the equally reliable Antonin Novotny headed the Czech Communist regime. Romania, meantime, was becoming more and more emancipated from Soviet tutelage. So, in the last ten years, the East European countries could be classified as "loyal" to Russia in the following order: East Germany, Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria, Hungary, Poland, Romania, Yugoslavia—the last two being virtually emancipated.

There is one point that here needs stressing: all these countries except Yugoslavia are members of the Warsaw Pact, the Eastern equivalent of NATO, but of these Poland and Czechoslovakia, together with Russia, are most directly affected by the "German Menace." The new Czechoslovak leader, the young Alexander Dubcek, has assured the Russians with the greatest power of conviction at his command that, whatever internal reforms the Czechs undertook, there could be no question of Czechoslovakia dropping out of the military alliance with Russia (which is precisely what Imre Nagy of Hungary threatened to do in 1956, shortly before he was shot). Poland will also hold firm, Gomulka having emphatically stated that the very existence of his country depends on the Russian alliance, the sole real guarantor, among other things, of the Oder-Neisse frontier with Germany.

Gomulka's recent very tough and near-Stalinist speech ascribed (as the Russians were careful never to do) the intellectual ferment in Poland partly to "Zionist" influences and to the "disloyalty to Poland" of the numerous Jews among the restless intellectuals. (See "Poland: Anti-Semitism as Usual," by Samuel L. Sharp, The Nation, April 15.)

Now, one must distinguish between Poland and Czechoslovakia in an important respect. In Poland, there is a strong anti-Russian tradition; in Czechoslovakia, there is practically none, even though the very harsh Stalinist regime which existed there, especially between 1948 and at least 1960, is not a happy memory. Both the Czechs and the Poles know at heart that the Russian military alliance is essential to their survival, with West Germany only waiting for the opportunity to reconquer the Sudetenland, as well as Poland's "western territories." But just because of this difference of traditional attitudes toward Russia in the two countries, Moscow has found it necessary in the last few months to be much tougher with the Poles than with the Czechs. It looks upon a possible change of regime in Poland, where the czarna reakcja (the "black reaction") and the Catholic Church are still powerful, as a very great danger. A liberalization of Czechoslovakia, though regrettable from the Soviet viewpoint, is not dangerous.

Illingworth, Punch: Ben Roth

A particularly significant conversation took place in Prague on March 21 at the meeting of the presidium of the Communist Central Committee between President Novotny and one of his principal "liberal" enemies, Cernik:

NOVOTNY: If they dare, let the Party and the Parliament disavow me!

CERNIK: We shall dare to disavow you if you do not submit to our will.

The point is that Cernik had just returned from Moscow, where the Soviet leaders had given Novotny's enemies a free hand to set up a more liberal regime. There followed the Dresden conference of the various Communist parties—a meeting called by the Russians to consider, among other things, the latest developments in Czechoslovakia. What Dubcek's statement amounted to was that Czechoslovakia would remain a faithful member of the Warsaw Pact, but that its internal affairs, in which the Communists would continue to play the leading part, were the Czechs' own business. The alternative for the Russians was to send their tanks into Prague, as they had done in Budapest in 1956; but this had obvious disadvantages and was much less necessary than in the case of Budapest, where Imre Nagy had declared himself in favor of an Austrian-like neutrality for Hungary.

The most important question is how the ferment in both Poland and Czechoslovakia got started. I have not the slightest doubt that, in both cases, the revolt was led by the intellectuals. And, in the case of Czechoslovakia, this revolt spread to a large part of the Communist Party itself. The Czechs may be the world's most cautious people, but even the Czech Communists knew that the real Achilles heel of the Soviet Union is its cultural and ideological policy—something against which practically the entire Soviet intelligentsia (running into many millions) is in discreet, though genuine, revolt. Like the Czech and Polish intellectuals, millions of thoughtful Russians long for greater freedom of expression, for great creative freedom, for a severe limitation, if not abolition, of censorship, for a de-bureaucratization of the arts, literature and even journalism.

The tragedy in Russia is that its Writers' Union, in contrast to parallel organizations in Poland and Czechoslovakia, which are strongholds of liberalism, is today still the most powerful citadel of Stalinism. If there were relatively "liberal" periods under Khrushchev (there were also some particularly vile ones, as that marked by the hounding of Pasternak), things have been going from bad to worse under Brezhnev and M. A. Suslov, the Savonarola-like "ideological chief" of the Politburo. The consequence has been such events as the Siniavsky-Daniel trial, the even worse Solzhenitsyn case, whereby one of Russia's greatest writers was practically buried alive, not a line of his having been published since 1963. These oppressions enjoyed the approval of Konstantin Fedin, head of the Writers' Union, and a former "liberal." Since then there have been more and more trials of writers. Even if one or two of the defendants may have fallen into a CIA-NTS trap (the NTS is an anti-Soviet emigre organization in Munich), most of them had nothing whatsoever to do with either the CIA or the NTS. An atmosphere of extreme orthodoxy and intolerance now oppresses the whole literary life of Russia, even the most "liberal" magazines, Novy Mir and Yunost, having become almost as unreadable as the rest, and the "page of humor" in Literary Gazette being about as funny as a farewell oration at a Presbyterian funeral—and this in the country of Gogol, Saltykov-Shchedrin, Chekhov, Zoshchenko, and Ilf and Petrov!

It is generally assumed in Moscow (correctly, I believe) that Kosygin strongly opposes this victimization of the writers, but that he had to throw them to the wolves on the understanding that the Stalinists would strictly not interfere in economic affairs or foreign policy. Putting two and two together, it seems clear that it was thanks to Kosygin's influence that the enemies of Novotny (the man whom Brezhnev twice tried to rescue) were given leave to end the near-Stalinist regime in Czechoslovakia.

That Brezhnev is furious about what has happened is evident from his diatribe against the intellectuals on March 29—a speech in which he threatened the "renegades" and those guilty of "ideological immaturity" with all kinds of punishments. Quite a few people—rightly or, let us hope, wrongly—have interpreted this Brezhnev outburst as a threat to initiate a Stalin-like purge against the intellectuals, with labor camps and all. It is no less significant that Suslov refused to attend the Dresden meeting, which in effect okayed the changes in Czechoslovakia. I foresee a period of acute tension in the Soviet leadership between the "liberals" under Kosygin and the crypto-Stalinists under Brezhnev and Suslov. Almost the entire young generation of Russians is on Kosygin's side, but the establishment, particularly the literary establishment, is still largely Stalinist. If (God forbid!) they win, I can see fearful pressure being brought on Prague; if the "liberals" win, the nightmare in which all the better Russian writers have lived for the last few years will at last come to an end. Thus, the change of regime in Prague may mark the beginning of something very good—or of something very fearful. My own (admittedly optimistic) forecast is that we shall soon see the last of Suslov.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

BEALE STREET AND POINTS NORTH

Memphis Is Also America

PAT WATTERS

Mr. Watters is Director of Information, the Southern Regional Council. He is co-author, with Reese Cleghorn, of Climbing Jacob's Ladder (Harcourt, Brace & World), a recent study of Negro voting.

His movement, his life were Southern; but Memphis, where he died, symbolized more than the South. Its racial crisis of 1968 and its murderous failure were those of all America. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., went there during the fifth week of a garbage workers' strike that had built into a civil rights movement and a dangerous crisis. The Memphis Negro community had not developed much of a civil rights movement during the early 1960s. So the movement that did come in 1968 capsuled into a few swift weeks the decade's history of white America's failure to respond to the nonviolence of Dr. King, and black America's recoil into despair and a violence of desperation.

The Southern Regional Council, a biracial human relations organization in Atlanta, had warned of the dangers of Memphis in two reports, one a week before the so-called riot there, the other a week before the assassination of Dr. King. They were by J. Edwin Stanfield of the Council staff whose reporting from Memphis is the basis for the account that follows.

The strike began on February 12 over a grievance of twenty-two sewer workers. Thirteen hundred Negroes, most of them garbage workers, walked out. Some, but not all, were members of Memphis Local 1733 of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFL-CIO). The union demanded better pay and working conditions, city recognition of the union and a system of dues checkoffs. The entire crisis hinged on the question of union recognition. Mayor Henry Loeb, one of those rightist-tending, know-nothing, wealthy businessmen-turned-politicians, who have emerged in important public offices across the South in the wake of the Goldwater movement, personable and certainly not of the old racist demagogue breed, had refused to budge on the point. (He was still refusing even after the assassination, as the Memphis Central Labor Council and the Tennessee Council on Human Relations, a private organization, demanded his resignation.) He contended that unions of city employees were illegal, on the basis of an obiter dictum in a state supreme court decision of several years ago.

Negro leaders, including most ministers, began rather routine support of the strike, and became increasingly incensed over the intransigence of the Mayor in negotiations, and the ineffectiveness of the City Council. On February 23, the Council evaded taking a public stand in favor of union recognition, and Negroes hastily organized a march on the downtown section in protest. City police in large numbers—Negroes said too large—accompanied the march. When some marchers laid hands on a police car that some claimed had run over a woman's foot, officers cut loose with mace up and down the line of non-violent demonstrators, spraying it into faces at close range, using it as punishment rather than a deterrent.

The use of mace rather than clubs or shotguns was a mark of a generally enlightened policy of Police Commissioner Frank Holloman. But the performance of his men reflected a general problem in the country, an inability to control police forces shot through with their own tendencies to racism and hysteria. Police and military over-reaction to Negro protest and turmoil has become common; the keepers of order become themselves causes of disorder.

The police action in Memphis, the affront to the leaders—to men of God and to the people—was the unifying factor. From then on Memphis had a movement, a peaceful but deeply indignant one.

The issues of the strike were broadened to a protest against general conditions for Negroes, not unlike those in cities across the land—police brutality, unfit housing, lack of jobs, low wages, discrimination in schools. These, as Dr. King later noted, were the new national issues of Negro protest, economic at base, the focal point of the Poor People's Campaign. But the main issue in Memphis was dignity. Again and again, preachers, union leaders and others demanded dignity, deplored the indignity of the misused mace, of the Mayor's paternalistic treatment of negotiators, his failure even to understand the symbolic importance of union recognition for men whose legacy was the powerlessness of plantation laborers.

The Negro ministers were in charge through the rest of the fateful campaign; the mood was close to that of the early civil rights struggle—nonviolent, firm but patient, willing to work within traditional institutions. And until the assassination of Dr. King, this was the predominant mood among Negroes in the South. No major riot had occurred in a Southern city. The adherents of black power waited in the wings in Memphis; as across the South since 1966, the mood of black power had hovered but not taken over.

Young militants told the ministers to try their non-violence; they would wait and act only when it was apparent nonviolence would accomplish nothing. And the ministers passed on the threat of this to the whites with whom they vainly sought accommodation, the ministers speaking their own anger and indignation, saying how their faith in nonviolence was shaking, how they might eventually have to "go fishing," leaving the field to the young militants.

The impasse and growing tension of the strike continued for five weeks before Dr. King came in. One evidence of white support heartened the Negroes; white unions gave money and on one day 500 white union members marched in support of the strike. There was talk that the nucleus of a real coalition between labor rank and file and the Negro movement was at last at hand.

But except for the unusual (in the South, unprecedented) solidarity of labor, there was no meaningful action from any level of white leadership or society to resolve what all should have recognized as a deadly dangerous situation. Some white churches made feeble, futile gestures. The two newspapers, both part of the Scripps-Howard chain, were regarded by Negroes as chief agents of indignity. They flatly supported the Mayor and disparaged the strikers with such devices as a cartoon showing a fat Negro man sitting on a garbage can with wavy lines indicating a bad odor; it was titled, "Threat of Anarchy." Businessmen, admittedly hurt by a Negro boycott, either kept hands off or encouraged the Mayor. One of the biggest businessmen said unionization of public employees had to be stopped before it spread to police and firemen. The City Council, recently reorganized to be more powerful, failed to support the strike even verbally.

When it became known that Dr. King would come on the scene, with the inevitable escalation of emotions, an attempt at nonbinding mediation was made. It fell apart almost immediately. Union representatives quit after three meetings, saying representatives of the city had admitted that they were not authorized to agree on any issue. Similarly, Negro leaders had almost ceased talking with the Mayor, who continuously urged discussions with no apparent intention to do anything but talk.

It was into this impasse that Dr. King walked on March 28. He had been asked; it was typical that he left the crucial planning of his Poor People's Campaign to engage in this Southern sortie. Tension built before the march started. Dr. King was late. There were rumors of police brutality to high school students. Militants were on hand.

As the march of at least 5,000 got under way non-violently, some young people, probably no more than fifty, took to the sidewalks and broke store windows. Leaders stopped the march just before police ordered it ended. Dr. King was whisked away; police violence took over. It was probably not possible for officers to apprehend the window breakers and allow the march to continue. But police, by most accounts, discriminated not at all between the vandals and the nonviolent in their clubbings and beatings. They shot and killed one youth, accused of looting, injured nearly sixty Negroes, and arrested 280. Four thousand National Guardsmen came in, and a nightly curfew was enforced. Network television routinely reported that no Negro could be on the streets without a reason. It sounded like South Africa.

Other national reaction was not unlike that of white Memphis. Almost uniformly, indeed almost as a conditioned reflex, the press emphasized the window breaking rather than the weeks of white Memphis' failure, and stressed implications for violence in Dr. King's planned march on Washington. Not the Memphis Press-Scimitar or Commercial Appeal but The New York Times commented that the effect of Dr. King's Memphis march was to "solidify white sentiment against the strikers," and said: "Dr. King must by now realize that his descent on Washington is likely to prove even more counter-productive." Eugene Patterson, editor of The Atlanta Constitution and a member of the United States Commission on Civil Rights, wrote: "Dr. King offers the best hope of keeping the smoke now heating in the ghettos from springing into fire. But in trying to recall the riotous element to the banner of non-violence, the outbreak of violence becomes his failure—and his problem, as well as America's, and particularly the Negro's." Alongside his column was a cartoon showing a diminutive Dr. King in the hands of a Frankenstein monster labeled "Mob Fever."

(Such admonitions against the Poor People's March, common to Negroes as well as white people of good intention and small understanding, overlooked, as did white Memphis, the issue of dignity. They failed to see the desperation which compelled the march. Winifred Green of the American Friends Service Committee, who helped recruit marchers from Alabama, described the very many who were ready to go: "They don't think of things being made worse. They know things can't be any worse for them. And they don't know anything else to do.")

The President of the United States, in his first reaction to Memphis, said: "I want to again assure you that the resources of your government stand behind local law enforcement agencies to the full extent of our constitutional authority. Mindless violence—destroying what we have all worked so hard to build—will never be tolerated in America." Of the same pattern had been Johnson's lukewarm, if not antagonistic, response to the urgent report of his National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, and his withdrawal of opposition to a riot-control bill to punish interstate travelers who contribute to violence.

The Southern Regional Council had warned before the March 28 violence that those in positions of power "never seemed to grasp the reality of the situation, its danger, or its promise. . . ." The comment seemed applicable to all of America.

The outpouring of grief and guilt and bathos after the assassination, coming from such an officialdom, a press, a society, and coming so soon after the similar meaningless mourning of President Kennedy, had to be called obscene. The appropriate response would be action—in Memphis, a just settlement of the garbage strike; in Washington, all the white sympathizers joining in the Poor People's March; in Congress, a full, not token, program to meet the needs of poverty and to eliminate institutionalized racism. Ending the war in Vietnam would have to be a corollary, morally related action.

In Atlanta, Prof. Finley C. Campbell of Morehouse College, whose influence helped prevent violence in student demonstrations immediately after the assassination, said students were full of "confusion, dread, ambivalence." They could be led either way. Some would follow Dr. King's methods and his Southern Christian Leadership Conference; others would go with Stokely Carmichael's SNCC. Congress' immediate response would be the "last chance" for traditional nonviolent methods in the South.

Negro colleges in the South seemed the likely focal points for whatever came of protest and demands for racial justice in the aftermath of the assassination. Ferment had already spread across the campuses before Dr. King's death, in part responding to the situation where protest over discrimination in education in Orangeburg, S.C., had resulted in the needless killing of three students by state police. (One hopeful note was widespread response to the assassination from white students across the South.) The "young intellectuals" to whom C. Wright Mills hearkened, who had mainly dropped out of the civil rights movement after the sit-ins, might be heard from again.

Their tone would reflect a new era. During a march of students of the Atlanta University complex the day after the assassination, a Negro youth looked up to see Atlanta Police Chief Herbert Jenkins, noted for his liberal influence in the Riot Commission, riding by. The young man pointed a finger at the chief, and said, "You're going to pay the price for this." The chief said nothing. A Negro Atlantan in his car said sadly a few minutes later, "Do you know who that kid was? One of the nine who desegregated Atlanta schools back in 1961." An era had begun and ended in the South in the young man's history, with the beginning and end of the career of Dr. King, the two not unconnected.

The "last-chance" hope or dream or myth was still feebly alive. But manifest across America was the kind of blindness that afflicted white Memphis. For America, in its white power centers, in the generality of its white society, never really saw Dr. King, never heard him. It had, in the words of his widow, "questioned his integrity, maligned his motives, and distorted his views." But more frightening than that, it had been so fascinated with the potential for violence in his nonviolent demonstrations that it could never focus on the issues.

But there had always been hope, with Dr. King alive, that somehow his philosophy might prevail, that his followers, particularly Negro Southerners, might somehow alter American society, might miraculously reestablish in it a civilized decency. Now he was dead. The kind of chasm that already seemed unbridgeable between black and white in the North, would, it seemed inevitable, now become wide in the South. The erosive, deteriorating effect of the King assassination, like that of President Kennedy, would be at work in the months and years to come. It had never been reasonable to expect one Negro leader, or his Negro followers, to transform white America. Maybe at last white America would come to know this. It would be the beginning of understanding what Martin Luther King was talking about.

Night Walk in Harlem

BENNETT KREMEN

Mr. Kremen, a free-lance writer, is a former teacher and social worker in East Harlem.

When the news hit that Martin Luther King had been shot dead, my friends and neighbors living in a white area far downtown from the convulsions they imagined going on in Harlem were shocked and dismayed. But for many, sympathy soon gave way to a fear more intense than they had ever shown before, even in times of great rioting. The long-expected bloodletting of masses of whites had certainly arrived—or so the sentiment went as many phones in the neighborhood began to ring with suburban mothers calling their children in town, urging caution and carefully locked windows, or offering invitations for a weekend in the safety of Queens or Westchester.

"This time they're really going to do it!" one friend's mother insisted, adding: "It's like shooting their President. Imagine what a lot of whites would've done if a Negro shot Kennedy?"

I heard many others echoing this woman's fears, and finally had to remind myself that the Negroes are a minority not too stupid to respect the vastness and effectiveness of white power, regardless of misleading impressions to the contrary manufactured by the easy rhetoric of the H. Rap Browns and the dangerous susceptibility to fearing the Negro that white men suffer from. And then I understood what creates that classical, but irrational white man's nightmare of the stereotyped Negro, too crazed or stupid to fear death, crawling in through a window with a knife in his teeth and murder in his heart: As my friend's mother had recognized, crimes like the murder of Martin Luther King or persistent abuses like the white man's easy tolerance of Negro misery invite bloody retaliations.

But despite ghetto riots, Negro retaliation has never really come off. When I decided to go up to Harlem to do an article on the night after King's murder, I had to argue this point in order to convince those who loved me that I wouldn't come back in a coffin. Had they ever seen Negroes rioting other than on television?, I asked them. Had they known many people maimed or injured by Negroes other than in muggings, which always has been the recourse of the disorganized poor? Had there ever been a Negro riot that truly spread into a white neighborhood? Finally I asked whose homes are gutted in a Negro riot and who usually suffers and dies.

Nevertheless, at ten that night before I left for East 96th Street, Harlem's dramatic boundary abruptly separating its slums from Manhattan's posh East Side, I tried to reassure myself that no major bloodshed would occur up there. I based this assumption on the observation that since Harlem's riot in 1964, which set the style of those that followed in other cities, no neighborhood where severe violence had exploded experienced in another season more violence of equal magnitude. The fact that both Pittsburgh's and Washington's black belt were put to the torch and looted for the first time fit into this pattern, while on the riot-wise West Side of Chicago, the only area in the North where Dr. King organized peaceful but passionate battles, a striking exception occurred.

Armed with this knowledge, I managed to keep my apprehensions in check as I arrived on 96th Street, where I'd planned to hail a cab to drive me through central Harlem. The first thing I noticed was unusual calm on the street and a police barricade in front of a jewelry store with its protective grating half torn off. This was Friday night; on Thursday night scores of shops such as this one had been vandalized throughout the area and nearly eighty looters had been arrested by morning—all this being evidence of disorder that was mild when compared with those the nation is rapidly getting accustomed to.

After trying for a futile half hour to get a cab that would take me up past 96th, I decided to board a bus rather than walk through the dark streets that in their strange stillness now seemed suddenly sinister and threatening, even though as a teacher and social worker in East Harlem I'd often walked them at night. Thus I realized that despite myself I, like my friends, expected some unknown catastrophe. With relief I got on a nearly empty bus, and after getting change from the young Negro driver, took a seat next to a woman who kept her eyes from me even though I must have been an oddity; I was the only white person in sight, heading straight toward 125th Street and Lenox Avenue, toward the inevitable eye of the hurricane whenever Harlem breaks loose. Only a block away, on 125th and Seventh Avenue, Fidel Castro played host to Nikita Khrushchev. And on this same corner, Marcus Garvey, the originator of Black Nationalism, and his heir, Malcolm X, used to speak from soap boxes; and here also three and a half years ago was the scene of the first large-scale riot in a Northern city since Dr. King initiated the protests of the civil rights movement.

When our bus shot past 108th Street, one coming from the opposite direction pulled to a screeching stop. Its driver opened his window and shouted:

"Hey, this is it baby!"

"Yeah," our driver shouted back. "And I'm goin' home—fast."

When our driver barreled on through the almost deserted streets, the grave faces of the black people sitting near me, which were so profoundly saddened that day, turned deeply anxious. And then, for the first time, it became clear that not only white people feel fear when potential violence hovers in the streets. The lady next to me was now looking into my eyes:

"What did he say mister?"

"I'll ask him."

The driver looked worried, and when I spoke to him, rather than get angry, he seemed glad to share his concern.

"It's just the feelin'. It's been buildin' all night."

"But why should you worry? You're all black people on the bus. I'll get off."

"Don't be silly, man—it's not you. Those bottles ain't got eyes. And some of those kids ain't got any brains. They hit buses and don't care who's in 'em!"

When I returned to my seat as we passed 116th, where fire engines at the ready were parked on the barricaded street, others than just the woman next to me were listening for news from the driver.

"He said there might be a little trouble, but he'd swing around it." The fear I saw now in the eyes of those lifelong residents of Harlem was pronounced. And I felt obliged, as inappropriate as it seemed, to offer these people advice because I, not they, had experienced similar hectic nights when I covered the riots last summer in Spanish Harlem.

"If bottles fly, lie down on the floor; and, ma'am, take off your glasses." The woman next to me immediately removed her glasses, and I could see gratitude on her face not because I seemed knowledgeable but because I was a man—and it didn't matter what color—being helpful to a woman alone at a tense moment.

But it grew even more tense as we noticed the flashing lights up ahead at 125th Street and the dozens of cops, some of them in khaki army helmets, trotting up Lenox Avenue. When we finally approached the crucial intersection, our fear grew severe as we spotted at least a hundred teen-agers fleeing down the avenue, some of them dodging across Lenox to avoid the cops now hurrying toward the corner. Our driver sped on, stopping only for a Negro employee of the bus line, who was flagging him down. The man leaped through the door and called out:

"Get her out of here: they're flingin' bottles at the cops." The driver threw a wild left turn, racing the bus three blocks off course.

"Ladies and gentleman," he announced. "This is no longer the Lenox Number One. You're on the Number Three—the scenic route." No one smiled until faces loosened with relief as the flashing red lights quickly receded behind us. And again, by seeing this with my own eyes and not relying on the inadvertent distortions of the media, I was enlightened. For I realized that the mayhem that goes on in the ghettos is what gets glaringly dramatized, while the feelings and actions of most Negroes, like those that surrounded me on the bus, are often ignored—not by design, perhaps, but because of limitation of time on television and of space in the papers. Thus the image of the crazed black man, heedless of death and with murder in his heart, gets priority on television screens and feeds already believing minds of white America.

When I came back down Lenox on a southbound bus, I soon noticed that the earlier bottle-throwing incident had been an isolated one and that calm prevailed on 125th Street, which now looked like the main artery of a city seized by a foreign army. Hundreds of pale-faced policemen lined the streets for blocks in each direction. With qualms, I decided to get off the bus and walk through the heart of it all. Also getting off the bus were two bright-looking, well-mannered teen-agers obviously coming down to the center of their neighborhood to get a closer look at the excitement. And when they saw me heading for the door, too, they stared at me with surprise and curiosity. When I smiled at them, they smiled back, and we were soon walking together toward 125th.

"You know," one of them said to me after we'd talked awhile, "they always shoot people who try to help—Lincoln, Kennedy, Malcolm X, Dr. King—I couldn't sleep last night thinking about it."

"Do a lot of these young guys down here keeping the cops up tight think about things the way you do?"

"Lot of them are just after a rep. But some do. They're all mixed together. Hey, do you know the cops loot too."

Some guys who were in the last one in '64 watched them doing it in a jewelry store."

"That's right," I said, grateful for his confidence. "Everybody loots when there's chaos, don't they?"

"Yeah—why don't they say that?"

When we passed a large cluster of husky cops standing on Seventh Avenue, the youth I was talking to leaned toward me and whispered:

"You can't just go up against 'em. They got the fire power!" This statement, showing no ignorance at all of the strength possessed by white America, made me wonder if the death and pain suffered during a major riot leaves those elements in a community that tend toward violence with a bitter memory that, thus far, has kept them from taking to the streets again—or in the future, perhaps, will prevent them from exploding in the expected manner. The young man I had been speaking with, like young men everywhere, was not about to admit defeat so easily. Before we parted, he said:

"The Muslims are organized and could take those coppers. But they don't believe in riots—yet!"

On 125th, as I walked alone now among curious adults and gangs of peaceful but restless teen-agers outnumbered by the cops watching every movement on the street, I noticed few people staring at me. Those who did showed me no hostility. Perhaps I was taken for a plain-clothes policeman or a simple-minded nut. But even on side streets, away from the center of Harlem, people said nothing to me, and some even looked at me with interest. Only in the subway station when I was back on 96th Street and heading home did I see and hear something that reminded me of one of the things ghetto riots are really about.

A tough-looking white man holding an ugly wound in his arm was leaning against a wall surrounded by cops.

"Three of 'em tried to rob me!"

"Are you sure it was just a robbery?"

"Yeah—they went right for my wallet."

"Could you give us a description?"

"Are you kiddin'!" The man stared angrily at the policemen: "All them jigaboos look alike!"

Eleven Hours in Chicago

FREDERICK C. STERN

Mr. Stern is a member of the English faculty at the University of Illinois in Chicago.

A diary of eleven hours in Chicago, on the day after the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

7:10 A.M. On the suburban train to Chicago there is not much that is unusual, except that a friend and I, who usually chat, seem to have little to say to each other. I read the paper, as always, Dr. King's face on the front page, and fall asleep, as always. I think, off and on: how shall I handle my classes? Impossible to talk about inductive and deductive reasoning—just impossible.

8:30. No one is on the English Department floor, where I have my office, except a secretary. I sit at my desk, looking through anthologies which might contain some of King's words. The "I have a Dream" speech seems wrong. It would seem almost patronizing to read it now. The "Letter from a Southern Prison" strikes the right note for me. I hope it will work for my students. It is, as was the man, militant, profound, not apologetic for non-violence but emphasizing the need for justice. He will not blame the robbed for fending off the robbers.

9:00. I read a large portion of the letter to my first class. There are two black students. They sit and listen, impassive. The more than a dozen white students sit and listen, impassive. I invite discussion, point to the brilliance of King's rhetoric. No response. We talk, in the remaining time, about some writing problems. Impossible. I become aware, suddenly, that for the first time since the quarter began two weeks ago, the two black students have chosen seats next to each other. For the first time, also, they are in the last row of the classroom.

10:00. I am back in my office, for my office hour. Two students, white, come in to write make-up themes. One of them writes about the danger of civil war if "the Negroes resort to violence." That white fear will be the bane of the day for me. Not peace with justice—just the cool peace of death.

10:50. On the way to my second class, one of the leading faculty activists calls to me that classes will be suspended from noon on, and that we'll have a memorial service of some sort, don't know what yet.

11:00. Only one of the two black students in this class is here. I read the "Letter from a Southern Prison" again and invite comment. One white girl asks what can she do. She is a moderate; she understands why Dr. King says he is disappointed in the white moderates, but what can she do? I decide to come on strong. I talk of white responsibility for restructuring white society. Some 350 years of oppression; too late for love and friendship; maybe that was possible five years ago. Reverse national priorities: $76 billion for the cities, not $38 billion for the war. The girl keeps saying but what can I do? I talk action now. We can counterpicket the white pickets who try to prevent school integration and we will be attacked and vilified. We can take some heat on our own bodies, as King did. We have to straighten out white society, our own society. But what can I do, she says. I have no more answers. I guess she wants me to tell her to be nice to black people. And yet, I am unfair. Her puzzlement is genuine—and tragic. Another student talks about why the neighborhood where he used to live before they took it over is now a jungle. A blond girl, Scandinavian name, answers him. We did it, she says, and we must understand. Another girl: "You can't understand unless you've been discriminated against. I'm Jewish, and we have a beach house and they call us kike there." The comparison's very pallor shows its meaninglessness. And yet, she's trying—but the equivalence is so feeble as to belie real understanding, or determination to make changes. I am glad when the bell rings. Had it gone on much longer, we might all have descended to brotherly love, letting the racist society stand.

12:00. The large outdoor amphitheatre is filling rapidly, but almost exclusively with white students. The speech making begins. Love. Don't desecrate his name with violence. We must stand together. More well-intentioned men saying more well-intentioned things, but the wrong things to the wrong people from the wrong mouths. How dare we who are white tell blacks to keep their cool? Even the storm troopers let the women wail. Another faculty activist and I exchange a few words. What can we do, how change or stop this travesty? A third friend comes up, asking if we've seen Mike Royko's column in the Daily News. He lays it on the line. We killed him, we are guilty, we bear the blame. Royko at his best. We decide to try to get it read, but how? None of us wants to participate in this service. A black student comes walking along the top edge of the amphitheatre. "Wrong meeting," he shouts, "wrong meeting!" The black students are having their own, black only, meeting at two o'clock. One of the ministers present glances briefly at the Royko column and agrees to read it. We feel a little better, but not much. Suddenly we notice some commotion just outside the stadium. With a burst, one of the white left-wing students runs out of the amphitheatre. He is followed by others. "Come on, we've got no choice," one of them shouts. The three of us head in the same direction.

12:30 P.M. When we get to the Halsted Street side of the campus the crunch is on. Black students, several hundreds, are lined up opposite city riot police. Cops wearing light-blue crash helmets, their billy clubs in their hands, are lined up across the street, blocking the courtyard exit from the school. No one is sure just how they got there. The whites in the black crowd are few, but about 100 yards back, on a second-floor balcony and in the relative safety of the school itself, white faces number in the hundreds. One black kid looks over his shoulder: "Look at 'em, waiting for the fun." His mouth twists: "They sure gonna see some busted ass—theirs." A black girl is working herself up. Natural hair-do, large dangling earrings, high cheek bones, gaunt face. Hysterical and angry. She starts a long scream: "How come they won't even let us have a memorial meeting out here? They can't treat me like shit because I'm a black womaaaaan!" The anger is spreading. It is in us all, the cops' very presence an insult to black pride, to white shame. Some are saying, let's go back in; others are saying, hell, no, let's move across. I ask one of my black students if she knows how this got started. Well, she says, we heard there was a memorial over at Roosevelt and we went over there; they only had a squad car here then. When we came back, they were here. A girl in red slacks is shouting: "Where's our white support? Where's our white support? They wouldn't do this if we had some white support!" We three look at the few other faculty people, the small number of white students out there facing it. She's right. Her white support is back there on the balcony—being itself. The word goes out that the cops came on their own, the chancellor didn't call them. He apparently requests that they leave. They do, as suddenly as they appeared. The kids are a little triumphant, but mostly still angry.

1:15. I go to my office for a minute and when I come back out the campus seems dead. A few white kids are hurrying to get out. I hear a big fellow laugh to his girl: "Man, great, we get a half day off." She smiles and rubs her thigh on his as they walk out of the gate, arm in arm.

1:45. Coming out of the subway at Randolph and Dearborn is startling. The Loop is dead. It looks like early Sunday morning. I stop for coffee. A man next to me at the counter tells his neighbor: "They smashed all of Field's windows." "Goddamn savages," is the reply. It's not even true. There was one broken window.

2:00. The buses are running very irregularly. A man next to me, waiting, wearing an engineer's union button on his cap, talks to me. "Yeah," I say, "pretty tight town." "Damn right," he replies, "I should of taken my little .25 along. Them monkeys better not fuck with me." He grimaces: "This ain't no assassination. That's Kennedy and like that, not some goddamn nigger preacher. He wasn't so much." Then, with a confidential hand to the mouth and a chuckle, as if he's about to tell me a dirty joke: "I wouldn't give a damn if they sent 'em all back to Africa." I tell him that "they" have been here a lot longer than most of us, haven't they? "Well, yeah, but you can't civilize 'em. Looka Deetroit."

2:15. The bus comes and we are separated. As I look out the window, I have a memory, an epiphany. I remember, visually, the streets of Vienna, where I was a kid. July 25, 1934, when Chancellor Dollfuss was killed by a Nazi band. I learned all the facts later. Then I only knew that the city was changed, dominated suddenly by policemen carrying rifles, some of them in steel helmets, no more genial smiles for children. Now it is Chicago, thirty-four years later. The policemen are wearing their light-blue riot helmets. I see open holsters. The troops have been called in. Hurray, America! You have achieved the stage of Europe on the way to the holocaust!

4:00. They're closing the clinic, the little technician who is cleaning my teeth tells me. Perhaps we'd better quit. The subway to the South Side is not running any more. There is panic in the hum of drills, the hurried closing of instrument cases.

4:10. I get on the bus to Michigan and Randolph, so I can get my train home. I'm a little anxious now, not sure the trains are running. Headlines on the afternoon papers: "4,000 Guardsmen to Chicago"; "Shapiro Calls in Guard." Michigan Avenue traffic is almost at a standstill. The dead feeling of two hours ago is passed now, as offices pour out worried whites and a few blacks. Tight-faced women scream at cabs which do not stop for them. Men clutch their attaché cases with white knuckles, shrug harder into well-cut suits. Home, home! The tiger is at the gate! It begins to get to me, as for the first time that day I become a little concerned about my wife, who teaches in an all-black school. I get off the bus two blocks early; it is faster to walk. A tall, drunk, scar-faced black man in overalls staggering down the middle of the sidewalk, gets a polite and wide berth. I hurry into the station and call home, and then call a friend, and am told that he is out taking pictures with the National Guard, a break for his photographic career. I wish him luck and think that whitey gets his cut from everything. I am being unfair to him, I know, and I know that this whitey might try to cut himself in, too, given the chance.

5:00. My train is leaving. There is a lot of kidding about not sitting on the side of the train facing the street. We go right through the South Side. I chat politely with the black lady sitting next to me.

5:40. We are through the South Side now, out in whitey country. "Hegwish" the conductor calls. I saw no sign of trouble during the trip, only oddly deserted streets.

Even 63rd Street, where there is always action, seemed dead, only two cars on the street. Someone gets on the train with a late edition: "Fires on West Side." Soon I'll be back home, where there seems to have been no trouble, our suburban black Mayor perhaps making the difference. But whitey runs back to whitey's hole, glad to have it. What should I do, go burn a store on Madison Street? Get my head whupped, by cops or kids, on 47th Street? I see train friend of this morning and we nod.

6:10. Home in my white suburb. Chicago's West Side is on fire. Baltimore, Pittsburgh, Washington. On TV the soldiers march, and white men and acceptable black men twist their mouths to counsel peace, cool it. King's killer is still at large, hidden in the bosom of his killing people. My country, 'tis of thee.

NEW UNIVERSITIES CONFERENCE

THE DILEMMAS OF RESISTANCE

NORMAN BIRNBAUM

Mr. Birnbaum, founding editor of the New Left Review (London) and now professor of sociology at the New School for Social Research (New York), will become professor of sociology at Amherst College next fall. Mr. Birnbaum is the author of Theory of Industrial Society, soon to be published by Trinity College Press.

American universities are a power in the land. The demand for an educated labor force has drawn more than a third of the youth between 18 and 21 into some form of higher education. In a society increasingly dominated by scientific and social technology, the universities are knowledge factories whose "production" of research is indispensable to the economy and the state. The professors are affluent, respected and not infrequently influential. Compared with their opposite numbers in Europe, American universities offer diverse opportunities for those of diverse interests and talents; some, at least, are experimenting with higher education itself. Finally, the expenditure for higher education is rising. The universities' demand may be insatiable, but they cannot complain of public neglect. In the circumstances, it is striking that a pervasive malaise, a sense that a new beginning must be made, has seized a growing segment of the student body, undergraduates and graduate students (or the apprentice professors) and even a large number of the professors.

That malaise accounted, in great part, for the Chicago convocation late in March of a "New Universities Conference." The setting was the commodious, indeed elegant new conference center of the University of Chicago—an academic Hilton, located right on the rim of the nation's worst black ghetto. The contrast heightened the unease of some about their position within the university. Most of the participants were young and extremely serious. Some 350 of us attended from about eighty-five institutions, including a very vocal group of undergraduates who explained that they had come precisely because no one had invited them. The open invitation to the conference had been addressed to professors and graduate students, and the latter comprised by far the largest single bloc. There was a sizable number of junior teachers, but surprisingly few associate or full professors, their absence being the result in part of accidents of publicity and planning. Had more come, the conference might have been different; in the event, those older university teachers who were present found the experience both chastening and exhilarating.

The meeting was organized, essentially, by academic veterans of what has been termed "the movement"—that stream or cluster of radical causes, groups and actions which has been so prominent a feature of American life since the beginning of this decade. Civil rights, work in the Northern ghettos, the campaign against the war and resistance to the draft have activated large numbers of students and teachers. Time passes and many of these students have grown up, or have at least begun to do so. (One professor of economics who spoke at the conference publicly lamented the golden days of his youth—in 1961.) They find themselves appreciably older than the students now active in groups like Students for a Democratic Society. They also sense that, despite "the movement's" greatest academic triumph, the Berkeley revolt of 1964, despite the undercurrent of doubt and experimentation in official American higher education, their immediate university environments remain the same. "The movement," though it is largely composed of teachers and students, has been more effective outside than inside the academy. That was the point of departure of the call to the conference, which declared that the convenors wished to express their radical devotion to a changing American society in their entire lives—and, above all, to end the split between their radical and academic persons. As the course of the conference showed, this was easier said than done.

Those who organized the conference fell into three uneasily allied groups. There were Chicagoans around Richard Flacks, who teaches sociology at the University of Chicago. Michigan contributed a group of graduate students previously active in the "Radical Education Project," which had issued a steady stream of documents and reports and even convened some conferences, but which had succeeded in educating in radicalism only those who were already so educated. Finally, a New York City group organized by John McDermott included some younger teachers from the metropolitan universities. I'd offered to join that group, but was told that at 42 I might be too old. I was allowed (with Noam Chomsky, Conor Cruise O'Brien, Louis Kampf, Howard Zinn and others) to sign the conference call.

The organizers had neither a clear nor agreed conception of what they wanted. Some wished to consolidate the outside political activities of like-minded university radicals. Others had vague notions of forming a union which would one day make university presidents tremble. The conference itself was divided, principally, between those who wished to use the university as a base for radical activities in the outside world, and those who wished to radicalize the university itself. Not surprisingly, the younger participants were generally found on the former side of the argument, and the older ones (already committed to academic careers) on the latter. These fronts were not entirely solid. The group from the Chicago national headquarters of Students for a Democratic Society, and some SDS leaders from elsewhere, insisted on the importance of the universities and education in the new American society.

The conflict expressed itself at the outset in contrasting keynote speeches by Staughton Lynd and Richard Flacks. Lynd, with impeccable activist credentials, was himself fresh from genteel dismissal at Yale and a rather less genteel case of breach of contract by the State University system in Illinois. He had won the case with the backing of colleagues across the nation, but his rejection of the academy was impassioned. He spoke of his father, one of the great American sociologists of the century, who ended his career at Columbia in isolation and despair of spirit, amid colleagues incapable of joining him in a critical and relevant social science. The younger Lynd concluded that radical professors faced an inescapable contradiction: their radicalism would in the end isolate and injure them in their professional careers, and both their radicalism and their professionalism would suffer. As radicals, they had to learn to regard teaching not as a vocation but as a job like any other. They had to realize that reality lay outside the universities.

Flacks, however, urged that the universities in their present and future social functions offered large opportunities for radical activity, that the activism of the new student generation was directly related to educational experiences, and that university radicalism could develop into a permanent force in American politics. He did not deal with an issue that troubled many—the separation between thought and scholarship and action. At the very end of the conference, Louis Kampf of M.I.T. had some illuminating things to say on this point, not least that critical scholarship and thought are also forms of action, and not unimportant ones. The weight of these dilemmas, real and imagined, lay heavily on the consciences of the participants; indeed, conscience was at times more in evidence at the conference than was anything else.

After the opening, the group dispersed into commissions, workshops and innumerable separate sessions, to reunite two days later for the final controversies (which were precisely the ones on which we opened). The atmosphere was engagingly direct; the younger participants seemed to delight in conveying to the older ones, enmeshed in their professorial status whether they liked it or not, that they were unwitting agents of oppression. Typewriters and duplicating machines worked overtime: critiques, manifestoes, proposals, and even a scheme for a new university were written and distributed on the spot. My impression was that those who called for action, who denounced academicism in the most pejorative fashion, did so in elaborately academic ways. The student who said that the writing (and, of course, reading) of books ought to stop, so that the revolution might commence, was able to cite sources when pressed. Much was made of the fact that Marx never taught at a university, although the debate on whether he had learned anything as a student struck a few of us as excessive.

The themes discussed at the conference included the general position of the universities in society, the intrusion of the familiar "military-industrial complex" (President Eisenhower's outstanding contribution to New Left thought) on the universities, problems of radical research and publication, a possible defensive network for radical teachers in professional jeopardy, and the current structure of the universities. Oddly, questions of this last sort, and about the quality and meaning of the education available in universities, did not receive the attention they merited. After all, millions of young people do undertake, or endure, higher education. The universities, in the current terminology, are agencies of socialization. If their structures are bureaucratic and hierarchical, if despite what liberal and radical professors may teach, their institutions induce conformism, then radicals could do a good deal worse than concentrate on the reform of the universities. If, further, the content and methods of American teaching and scholarship are dictated by social necessities alien to humane purposes, teachers and scholars must begin a radical examination of their own professionalism. These issues have been felt rather acutely by those of us who believe that radicalism begins at home, where society impinges directly on the quality and direction of our work. We were surprised that at the conference many of our students, and some of our colleagues, thought that the universities were beyond redemption, that our presently inactive colleagues are sure to refuse to join any effort at radical reform, and that university radicals have no choice but to abandon the universities to their fate.

The younger conference participants were almost totally ignorant of university tradition. Their ignorance is characteristically American; the radicals who are now tearing up the Eastern and Western European universities have different historical perspectives. Our younger students and teachers are so convinced that the universities are doomed that they do not bother to acquire any knowledge of their past. Perhaps I should say that they would have different views if they knew more history—at any rate, that universities sometimes oppose the constituted powers, that the traditions of academic freedom have deep historical roots, that knowledge itself is a potentially libertarian social force; these are assertions which surprised many at the conference.

However limited its vision, the diversity and depth of dissent in the universities as manifested at the conference was impressive: direct political dissent, activity against the war, efforts to resist the impingement of Selective Service and war contracting on the academy, struggles with authoritarian and repressive administrations. It was impressive to see assembled in one place so many student and teacher veterans of such campaigns. What struck me particularly, not least because of its present aimlessness, was the depth of dissatisfaction with the university's structures and educational practices. Here, without always knowing it, the university radicals make common cause with embattled humanists like William Arrowsmith or critical scientists like Eric Ashby. They would no doubt repudiate Arrowsmith as "apolitical" and in the same breath complain that the meaninglessness of academic curricula makes sullen conformists of students who could otherwise be enlisted in some great critical enterprise of the mind. I wonder whether some among the New American Left are American political traditionalists, disdainful of critical reflection, insistent only on action. If so, that would explain the curiously denigrating view of universities and their works held by some of those within them—a leftish parody of a rightish conviction.

In fact, of course, a good deal of the recent wave of student activism is due to education. The offspring of conventional middle-class families were exposed to literary modernism, which turned middle-class convention upside down; to social criticism, and to some teachers who live by values other than those their students had known at home. Many professors in graduate school are indeed uninterested in liberal education (they would not know either liberalism or education should they encounter them), but these are not the men who daily teach undergraduates. Meanwhile, the very debilities of the university have had their own educational effect upon the young. The rhetoric of liberal education, combined with the reality of IBM-style academic administration and contractual research, is pedagogically effective precisely because the students ask when rhetoric can become real.

There are countries like France where university teachers are organized into unions and constitute a political force of some importance in their societies. It may be too late for American university teachers and their graduate student apprentices to follow that example. In France itself, Jacobin radicalism is giving way to technocratic elitism, as Jacobin eloquence is being replaced by the more prosaic cadences of economists and jurists working on state planning. In our own country, too, new elites move in upon the universities. Indeed, statements of educational purpose by figures like Clark Kerr and James Perkins testify to the influence and persuasiveness of the advocates of the post-liberal university. Liberal education is dead and the multiversity has succeeded it. Or has it, quite? A multiversity can work only when those assigned to coglike functions in its machinery refrain from thinking. Thought means trouble. That happened at Berkeley, in episodic if dramatic fashion. The conference may well be the sign that a new university radicalism, this time turned upon the universities themselves, is about to take coherent and national form.

In the end, at Chicago, the adults triumphed. At the final plenary session, a resolution was offered, declaring that only students could change the universities, that nothing could be hoped for from the professors. This provoked a violent counterattack by those of us who were horrified on two counts. We were aghast at a state of affairs in which students could with some plausibility make such charges against their teachers; equally, we were dismayed that the students did not see that we too were tied to the system, that not intractable weaknesses of character make men worry about tenure, but ordinary material concerns of the sort our students would honor in a trade unionist.

In effect, the younger radicals both underestimate and overestimate their teachers. They underestimate the teachers when they think of them as hopelessly bound to routine; they overestimate the teachers because they expect them all to engage in heroic repudiation of routine. What they do not see is that the point is to change the routine. Bert Brecht once said, pity the land that needs heroes. Similarly, a university system that demands constant moral heroism of its teachers is in terrible shape. The universities serve too many masters. University tradition itself has been ignored. The younger radicals polemicize against false conceptions of objectivity when what they ought to criticize is an insufficient objectivity, an unbecoming proximity to the agencies of power.

Finding allies instead among the powerless is not easy, but there are ways in which it can be done. Even the much-maligned Clark Kerr has suggested one of them—the founding in the slums of urban equivalents for the 19th-century land-grant universities. It has been objected that this, too, would ally the universities with power, by extending their capacity to educate for social climbing to selected recruits from the underclass, without changing the conditions which produce the underclass. True, perhaps, but the view that the universities alone must spearhead America's social revolution, if it comes, is dubious in the best of circumstances. What can be asked of the universities is that they keep open unfashionable options, that they educate for an uncertain future instead of training for an exaggeratedly immediate present. The notion of the "production" of manpower, with neat allocations of personnel between elite, sub-elite, and subordinate sectors of the new educated class, has a superficial rationality. Upon examination, it is absurd. Universities geared to the needs of this decade, in itself a monstrous perversion of the notion of contemporaneity, will be obsolete in the next. One of the disturbing features of the conference was that so many young radicals shared the same philosophy of history as, let us say, the directors of the NASA.

A long and wearisome debate on continuing the work of the conference, inevitably, concluded it. (The predictable telegrams of greeting were sent to the dissenting students and teachers of Warsaw and Prague, to the Vietnamese universities and to Howard University.) Electoral procedures unimaginable by any political scientist were devised and as promptly dropped. It was realized in the end that the task of the continuing committee was not to radicalize the universities but to see whether anyone else wished to do so. Some thirty-five persons, from Cambridge to Berkeley with most of the regions between represented, were formed into the committee. An office will be established in Chicago and a newsletter published there, a program will be drawn up in New York. More important, regional and local conferences will be organized.

It is difficult to make specific predictions as to what will follow, but clearly, something has moved. Most important of all, perhaps, the radical teachers found enough self-respect (and, in the face of attack, self-possession) to assert their simple right to exist as adults and as teachers. The organization to be formed will be an organization of teachers and apprentice teachers, and its modes of collaboration and coexistence with student groups will have to be worked out. In other words, the suggestion that we all apply for probationary membership in the student movement was not followed.

There is certainly enough to do. The generalized impulse to criticism, innovation and change which affects the more reflective in America has much to occupy it in the American university. Its structures are bureaucratic, hierarchical or paternalistic. It does not know what to teach or how to teach it. It retreats in absurdly detached academicism or advances compulsively to an exaggerated contemporaneity. It is either totally out of the world or so with it that it cannot find anything critical to say. The scientists do not speak to humanists, the technologists disdain both, the social scientists confront a humanity they are incapable of apprehending. The relationship of teacher to student is entirely disturbed. If we give them what they want, we deny the traditions which (ever so obscurely) sustain us. If we give them what we want, we suffer the guilty conviction that our wants are not really our own, but dictated by senseless professional routines and implacable academic powers. Until we liberate ourselves, we can hardly liberate our students. If we allow them to liberate us, we will not be ourselves. In the circumstances, a truly radical critique of the universities may involve more than radical teachers in action. It may even lead to that most radical of activities—thought.

OHIO: POLITICS AFTER JOHNSON

GENE I. MAEROFF

Mr. Maeroff is assistant city editor of the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Cleveland

Should Ohio's John J. Gilligan be elected to the U. S. Senate, he will have to be excused if he erects within his office a shrine to Lyndon B. Johnson. Gilligan, a long-time foe of LBJ's policy on Vietnam, is not especially fond of the President, but had it not been for Mr. Johnson's by now famous speech, Gilligan's chances of snatching the Democratic nomination from Frank J. Lausche would have been far less than they are today.

The President gave Gilligan the opening he needed to extricate his campaign from the corner into which he had talked it. Just when organized labor, which constitutes Gilligan's staunchest support, was beginning to grumble about his opposition to the war, the Administration softened its position. And at a time when Gilligan's sympathies for Robert F. Kennedy were irking those who thought his allegiance should be to the President, the New York Senator became a forerunner and not an apostate.

All of a sudden, the urbane intellectual who favors disengagement from Vietnam has a fresh lease on his political life. Not that the entire picture has changed.

The name of Frank J. Lausche, 72, still is quickly recognized by Ohioans who elected him governor five times before sending him to the Senate. And Gilligan, 47, still is only a six-term Cincinnati councilman and former teacher of modern literature and poetry (at Xavier University), who is campaigning for his first state-wide office.

But Gilligan in the Senate would mean another voice in behalf of dissent. And the President himself has accorded new respect to dissenters. In turn, Gilligan's election would remove from the Senate the man who—along with Thomas Dodd of Connecticut—rose to the defense of Dean Rusk during the recent hearings on Vietnam by the Foreign Relations Committee. "Teamwork" is what Lausche says he wants in this country, with every man, woman and child presenting a united front behind the nation's Vietnamese policy. To follow any other course, Lausche insists, is to serve in the ranks of Ho Chi Minh.

A winner of the Silver Star for gallantry at Okinawa, Gilligan dismisses U.S. military victory in Vietnam as an impossible objective. During his lone term in Congress (he was defeated in 1966 by Robert A. Taft, Jr.), Gilligan was one of those who signed the statement calling for a moratorium on the bombing of the North. "Lausche's simplistic views of foreign policy are frightening," Gilligan said in a private interview for The Nation, "but he finds that such views go down well at home. In Cleveland's ethnic neighborhoods he still talks about liberating the satellite nations of Eastern Europe. The man is not talking about the real world. This is irresponsible claptrap."

Frank Lausche, chairman of the Senate's subcommittee on Far Eastern Affairs, once flew with the highest of the hawks. But he reaped a harvest of headlines last summer when he declared the United States should stop bombing North Vietnam and a few weeks later urged that the issue of Vietnam be submitted to the United Nations. By the time President Johnson made his announcement of the bombing pause, Lausche had returned to his position opposing any cessation in bombing because of the Tet offensive and the precariousness of U. S. troops in northern outposts. From the start, Gilligan has been against the bombing.

The only reason Lausche has ever favored ceasing the bombing is because he thinks it will give the United States a chance to demonstrate to the world the insincerity of Ho Chi Minh. If Ho refuses to negotiate it will prove that he does not want peace. Furthermore, argues Lausche, it will show the errors of their ways to those Americans who have urged the President to stop the bombing.

As for the UN, Lausche would just as soon let the international body have the responsibility and ensuing headaches of trying to police a difficult situation. Gilligan views it another way. He thinks the escape for the United States is through political negotiations because "the illusion of a military victory being just around the corner is not what we went over there for in the first place." He feels the bombing cessation will be a vital first step in getting North Vietnam and the major powers to believe the United States really seeks peace.

Gilligan wants the United States to define its future role in the Far East. "We had better start marking some limits and reduce the situation to reality, ending our Holy War against communism," he says. "The question this nation must ask itself is whether it intends to be a police force for the world. If we decide that's what we want, it will be expensive. It will mean bringing our boys home in boxes for a long time to come." The Senate has defaulted, Gilligan believes, in its obligation to lay down policy guidelines for Vietnam and all of Asia. With an end to the bombing of the North, he wants a gradual reduction of field operations in the South.

Up until the President's announcement, Lausche had condemned peace demonstrators and called for an end to dissent. He has made a fetish of the idea that Americans must demonstrate a unity of thought on the war. He dismissed the Foreign Relations Committee hearings as a service to the enemy. He wonders how much it would help American morale if Hanoi conducted similar open hearings. Finally, he says "demonstrations by long-haired, dirty-faced, so-called intellectuals" are causing the death and injury of American fighting men in Vietnam.

Before he announced that he would not seek re-nomination Lyndon Johnson was in dire need of friends. Even so, Lausche's position—which should have been a comfort—led to no evident campaign support from the President. Johnson had been keeping away from the battle and the specter of the Administration was thrust into it only once—to the advantage of Gilligan.

George L. P. Weaver, an assistant U. S. Secretary of Labor, was quoted by the Associated Press as saying in Columbus recently: "Lausche is the man you imposed on us [the Administration]. I feel I can say the Administration will do anything it can to help Gilligan win the Democratic nomination in the May 7 primary." In a fluster of embarrassment, Weaver insisted the next day that he had been misquoted and the Administration quickly asserted its neutrality. Gilligan says he has not sought support from the Administration and does not expect to receive any. As matters have developed, Lyndon Johnson now has much larger concerns than getting embroiled in a primary election in Ohio.

Any move by the Democratic forces to oust Lausche would be understandable, however, in light of the Senator's conservative voting record, a constant exacerbation to Democratic officials. Only the Southerners have exceeded Lausche in their readiness to break with the party line. Most recently, the Ohio Senator was the co-sponsor with Strom Thurmond of the anti-riot amendment to the civil rights bill. Gilligan, in contrast, is a solid liberal who can be counted on—as he proved in the 89th Congress—to support party measures in behalf of health, welfare, education, civil rights and cities. He was so loyal, in fact, that his detractors accuse him of being a rubber stamp.

Had Johnson not withdrawn from the Presidential race, there is a chance he might eventually have given his endorsement in the primary to Lausche. The Senator, after all, was his unabashed backer and Gilligan was not. But now Lausche has been robbed of that possible advantage. So far as Kennedy is concerned, Lausche thinks he was biding his candidacy for the proper time and that he and Eugene J. McCarthy intended to work in tandem to "batter" the President throughout the primaries. Lausche will not be a delegate to the Democratic convention, but his early response to LBJ's withdrawal was the wish that Johnson might change his mind or be drafted.

Gilligan, though, applauded Kennedy's entry into the race. He saw the move as a challenge to Johnson that bore much the same legitimacy as his own candidacy against Lausche. Gilligan says he considers it unhealthy for a party not to have the issues thrashed out in public. For that reason, he wishes that Nelson Rockefeller had maintained active opposition to Richard M. Nixon. Regardless of whether Gilligan actually comes out and endorses Kennedy, he has already done so by implication. He says he shares Kennedy's concern about the problems confronting America; he agrees with Kennedy's order of priorities, and he approved of Kennedy's decision to go over Johnson's head and take the issues to the people.

Pursuing the argument, Gilligan maintains that voters asked to select between Lausche and a Republican (this year it will be Ohio Attorney General William Saxbe) would be denied a meaningful choice. Ohio's Democratic State Executive Committee accepted this reasoning and, in an unprecedented move against an incumbent, endorsed Gilligan even before he had officially announced his candidacy. Delegates from almost every urban area in Ohio backed him; opposition to the endorsement came from the rural areas.

Organized labor, too, came out early for Gilligan, Ohio's AFL-CIO endorsing a candidate in a primary election for the first time. Labor promised at least $100,000 for voter education and registration drives. Before Johnson's withdrawal there were rumors that labor was becoming disenchanted with Gilligan and that the funds might begin to run dry. But now that Gilligan's feelings on the war and Kennedy have become more of an asset, he has much less reason to fear a slash in funds.

Lausche says the labor bosses have opposed him during his entire career and it was no surprise to him that labor's backing should go to his opponent. He even refused to attend a session at which the labor leaders were going to listen to his views before making up their minds. Lausche said they had already decided their course and the meeting was a sham. Actually, labor broke with Lausche in 1958 when he endorsed Ohio's ill-fated right-to-work law. Labor has never forgiven him and he showed no contrition when a year later he backed legislation to bar unions from picketing. Gilligan in 1958 accepted the chairmanship of the Southwestern Ohio drive to defeat right to work. He has frequently reaffirmed his belief in the need for unions and he has accused Lausche of betraying the workingman in favor of big business.

It appeared for a time that Gilligan was going to have to pay for his marriage with labor, by guarding his words in public. Now, however, Ohio AFL-CIO leaders who like Johnson and dislike soft talk on Vietnam may no longer be able to exact accommodation from Gilligan. Though his private views all along have made him a peace candidate, he has not been able to achieve the McCarthy-esque aura that might have brought out Ohio's huge college population. As a result, straight-haired coeds have not appeared in droves to lick his envelopes and young men in sneakers have not been pressing doorbells in his behalf. With the change in Vietnam and in the Presidential race it has become easier for Gilligan to tell his fellow Ohioans that "we have to have the stomach to see something happen we may not like—even if it means a few nations going down the pike in the other direction."

But Lyndon Johnson or no Lyndon Johnson, how do you tell this to some first-generation Slovak or Hungarian on Cleveland's Southeast Side? Frank Lausche does not. He says he does not understand "the wisdom of draft card burners and peace demonstrators." He says that "anyone who calls patriotism old-fashioned might as well say that courage and work and service are old-fashioned." He asks "how long a nation can endure if its leading citizens unjustly and falsely condemn that nation as being the perpetrator of wrongs."

Even if every Ohioan were suddenly to turn hawkish, if organized labor were willing to bury the hatchet in the cause of victory in Vietnam, Lausche would still have a problem. The state's large Negro vote may turn against him. Last fall, when Carl B. Stokes ran in the primaries against Ralph S. Locher for mayor of Cleveland, Lausche let it be known that he favored the incumbent over the challenger. That was perhaps understandable enough, for Locher was Lausche's political heir in Cleveland, but when Stokes took the primary, Lausche lost the power of speech for the balance of the campaign, never once giving his blessing to the Negro Democrat who was running against Republican Seth C. Taft.

Stokes has not forgotten and neither have his backers. A large Gilligan advertisement had prominent place in a recent issue of the Call-Post, Ohio's largest weekly Negro newspaper. Directly above it, in the news columns, was an article that in its lead identified Lausche as "the man who has voted against every major step forward in civil rights legislation. . . ." Many Negro pastors in Cleveland have banded into a Clergy Citizens Committee for Gilligan. The co-chairman is the minister of Carl Stokes's church and the secretary is Stokes's assistant city law director.

Negroes are coming of age politically and the city itself as a unit of government is increasingly unwilling to continue to play poor relative to rural interests. If these attitudes are translated into votes, Gilligan will be the beneficiary. Even when the war is over in Vietnam, Gilligan does not foresee an immediate end to urban woes. He expects parsimonious Congressmen to find "other excuses" for failing to pump dollars into the cities. Gilligan is a champion of mass transit and as a Congressman supported creation of the Department of Housing and Urban Development.

Lausche, though a former mayor of Cleveland, has somehow taken on the rural attitude toward urban legislation. He broke with his party last year to try to cut in half the $40 million rent supplements bill. He offered an unsuccessful amendment to hold down the spending over the three-year funding period for education expenditures. He voted against model cities legislation and went along with the War on Poverty only after trying to reduce some segments of it. However, he supported legislation to curb pollution and voted for the anti-rat program.

But, somehow, the voters in Cleveland, Toledo, Columbus, Cincinnati and Ohio's other big cities have either not heard about Lausche's voting record or have been willing to overlook it. To many Ohioans, Frank Lausche is still the made-it-himself man—one of ten children of Slovenian immigrants who played the violin and toyed with a professional baseball career before becoming the white-haired Senator who crosses syntax with statesmen. He is the indomitable maverick who always seems to have every-one against him—except the people.

That, then, is what Gilligan faces. Charm will go only so far with western Ohio farmers; wit carries just so much authority with Akron tire builders. Ohio's Democratic organization has yearned for years to dump Lausche but could not muster the guts or the candidate. Now, Gilligan who should be the underdog is finding that Lausche has appropriated that role and is seeking the sympathy vote. Lausche bemoans the labor bosses who have rejected him and the party chiefs who have turned on him. When the votes are counted the night of May 7, Ohio's Democrats may find they will have to fall back into line behind Lausche for another six years.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Legitimacy of Black Revolution

THE RIGHT OF REVOLUTION. By Truman Nelson. Beacon Press. 148 pp. $4.95. Paper $1.75.

JULIAN MAYFIELD

Mr. Mayfield is a novelist and journalist who worked as an aide to President Nkrumah in Ghana after his active support of the Robert F. Williams self-defense movement in Monroe, N.C. Presently a Junior Fellow of The Society for the Humanities at Cornell University where he conducts a seminar in race relations, he will join the faculty of the Schweitzer Program in the Humanities in September, 1968, at New York University.

I find it hard as hell to talk to any white American nowadays. It isn't just because of the fashionable hate-whitey posture, for which there is more than enough justification. Moreover my travels have carried me far afield, and I manage to keep up a lively dialogue with several Europeans and even a friendship or two. Among the latter is an Englishman whose family fortune is based in South Africa and the Portuguese colonies. He told me recently that he and his forebears had made a very good living by exploiting my African cousins, and that he intended to go on exploiting them until they got enough brains and organization and hardware to shoot him out, at which point he intended to make as graceful an exit as possible.

My English friend understands that all his privileges and prerogatives, his "culture" and "civilization" and "education" are sustained by an infra-structure of force and violence which to survive must keep down a black revolution in Africa. Being a certain kind of Englishman, he is not concerned with being liked or loved or even understood by other Englishmen, much less Africans. He would not be caught dead with the tag "humanitarian" or "liberal," but he has enough sense of history to have taught his children that when the revolution comes they should either split the scene (get out) or use their guns against their fellow whites, not for the blacks, but in their own self-interest.

Now, this simple reality, so clearly understood by an English reactionary, seems to elude the best of white Americans, and that is why it is such a pain to talk to most of them. From comfortable suburbia, they cannot begin to grasp the revolutionary conclusion arrived at daily by more and more young black men and women in the inner colonies just a few miles away. Why is this, for some of these middle-aged whites were once committed to liberal ideals, and some of them were even red radicals? Certainly a large part of the answer is that it is not 1933 again, the economy is not in a state of near collapse, 17 million men are not looking for work, white men are not selling apples on the street corner and veterans are not threatening to march on Washington. The national sickness is not now everywhere in evidence as it was then: therefore the national will of the richest nation the world has ever known will not be mobilized to make war on the national sickness. To most whites it is only they, those people, the blacks, who admittedly have justified grievances, who are causing the trouble, and they are in a minority. So when blacks take up arms to bring about a violent shift in the control of power in an otherwise orderly and prosperous society, they are not only nuts but suicidal. Suddenly, liberal white suburbia becomes terribly aware of its whiteness, and ponders which way it will point its rifle in the inevitable racial war. "What shall we do?" the liberals ask the few black friends they have left, and those black friends can't answer because they don't know which way they shall point their guns.

The articles presented in this section were written before the assassination of Martin Luther King. The lesson of his life and his death might be seen as an offering to all Americans to struggle together to repair the nation's wrongs against the black community, toward which end discussion of all aspects of the question can only be a service. Editors

Enter here the unwelcome intrusion of the New England historian-novelist Truman Nelson. In his lucid writing and analysis of our present condition, he comes through with a simple answer which, paraphrased, is loud and clear: "You take sides with the revolution, not only because it is manifestly justified, not only because the black revolution is the natural outgrowth of the deepest traditions of your own revolution but out of your own self-interest, for as much as we hate violence, we hate more the accumulated wrongs and injustices against black Americans, and the sooner we right those wrongs, even if it takes a revolution to do it, the happier and healthier the nation will be."

I say that Nelson's intrusion into the discussion is unwelcome because he succeeds in making nearly everybody uncomfortable. He was a genuine friend of Malcolm X and has a steady rapport with Robert F. Williams, but, not knowing this, the young black militants can't quite tune in on him because he is white, but does not fit into any neat little white mold, being neither a conscience-stricken liberal, a reformer, nor a leather-brained orthodoxist.

The whites have even more difficulty with Nelson: the color of his skin and his Yankee twang identify him as one of their own, but they can't quite place him. For one thing, he is a damned nuisance. He never ceases to remind them that the nation (at least the New England part of it) was founded by loud, uncouth men audacious enough to question laws they had not made and a government in which they had no voice: raucous men who took for granted their right to take pot shots at Englishmen in red uniforms who represented authority which did not serve their needs, and for which they no longer had respect. He reminds them that respectable clergymen lent money and arms to John Brown to ride into Kansas where he shot down pro-slavery law enforcement officers and other duly elected officials, and then gave him a good dinner when he got safely back to New England. Truman Nelson is that bearded pest in our midst who reminds us that there was a time, not so long ago, when men put morality and principle above the law of the land, and that these men were the best minds in the land—Thoreau and Garrison, Theodore Parker and Frederick Douglass.

White Americans do not like to be reminded of their revolution and the spirit which motivated the abolitionists. It is enough to drill their young children in catechisms about George Washington, Paul Revere, and teach them a Longfellow poem or two. The business of the United States today is to put down revolution everywhere in the world. (Dean Rusk, in his recent, reluctant appearance before the Senate, made this clear, although he did not elucidate anything else.)

But any talk of revolution at home is intolerable, and even some tired liberals are prepared to join with the Establishment by putting it down with modern weapons of destruction. They aren't as honest as my English friend or the idolized William Faulkner who declared that in a crisis he would defy the federal government and shoot down black people in the street. No, with one hand they attempt to water down the fires of rebellion in the ghetto because they deplore violence and really don't want to see a lot of blacks killed (they are terribly concerned with our welfare), while with the other hand they grasp their foreheads and prepare to act out the logic of their whiteness in the awful event of a racial confrontation.

In his new book, The Right of Revolution, Truman Nelson points out what every black revolutionary already knows: that the war is already raging, and that it is not of the black man's making. "There is an irrational tyranny in the land," he begins. "From our very beginning we have been carrying on a war of violence and suppression against the black people we brought here. . . . This war is still going on against them, carried on day by day by our special repressive forces organized as 'law enforcement agencies' or 'riot police' or 'tactical patrol forces.' We have so many of these in the black communities that when its citizens make contact with the State, with us, it is always under the watchful eyes, or the flailing clubs, of police. They occupy the black ghettos like white mercenaries in a country under colonial oppression."

This is not particularly original; nearly everybody in or near the white power structure, from LBJ to HHH to RFK, has been told this by his investigators. What is refreshing is that Nelson does not shrink from pointing out the obvious consequences of the state of war waged against the black communities. Not for Nelson the liberal dodges: We must do something about this. More civil rights bills. More money to the ghettos. More self-help programs. What is required, argues Nelson, is that some white men recognize that black men, having sought freedom through U.S. institutions for 200 years and failed, have the right to revolution; that, in the language of the Declaration of Independence, "to secure these rights (Life, Liberty and the Pursuit of Happiness) whenever any form of Government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the Right of the People to alter or abolish it, and to institute new Government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their Safety and Happiness."

The Right of Revolution is not a long book filled with a reasoned, documented, objective analysis of the causes of our second Civil War. It is behind the cloak of academic objectivity that white America has been able to hide its Eldridge Cleaver, 32, spent nine years in California prisons for crimes of violence. He started to write in prison, became an editor of Ramparts magazine and, after his release, recently published Soul on Ice, a collection of essays of personal experience and social and literary criticism. He also became minister of information for the Black Panther party. According to a report in The New York Times of April 8, Cleaver had been wounded and arrested on April 7, and his parole revoked in a violent encounter between the police and a Black Panther group in West Oakland, Calif. Ramparts and Frank E. Taylor, Cleaver's editor at McGraw-Hill, made separate appeals to the California and federal authorities for the protection of the writer. Similar appeals were signed by Susan Sontag, Lawrence Ferlinghetti, Warren Hinckle III and Christopher Lehmann-Haupt.

Following is a quote from Soul on Ice by Eldridge Cleaver:

The young whites know that the colored people of the world, Afro-Americans included, do not seek revenge for their suffering. They seek the same things the white rebel wants: an end to war and exploitation. Black and white, the young rebels are free people, free in a way that Americans have never been before in the history of their country. And they are outraged.

There is in America today a generation of white youth that is truly worthy of a black man's respect, and this is a rare event in the foul annals of American history. From the beginning of the contact between blacks and whites, there has been very little reason for a black man to respect a white, with such exceptions as John Brown and others lesser known. But respect commands itself and it can neither be given nor withheld when it is due. If a man like Malcolm X could change and repudiate racism, if I myself and other former Muslims can change, if young whites can change, then there is hope for America The sins of the fathers are visited upon the heads of the children—but only if the children continue in the evil deeds of the fathers.

racism for so long. Inevitably this "objective" method has always left the white reader (and not a few blacks) with the conclusion that there must be "something wrong with them, the blacks, that they have allowed themselves to sink into such degradation. After all, we made it up the ladder."

Nelson's book is a passionate defense and exposition of the right of black men to attempt by all possible means to change the basic institutions which oppress and degrade them. It is a virile work by a learned historian so steeped in American revolutionary traditions and practice that he does not need academic bric-a-brac to support his thesis.

At every speaking engagement those of us who defend the black man's right to revolution are reminded, by white and black liberals, that black men only constitute a tenth of the population and that we are asking for certain annihilation. The white revolutionary is in double trouble because the young black militant always points out that, "I'm sorry, man, but when the shooting comes, I won't be able to distinguish you from anybody else, so what is your position going to be," while the whites in the audience charge him with being a provocateur with suspect motives. (After all, he is white, over 30 and never had it so good.) Nelson's reply in The Right of Revolution calls attention to the fact that you cannot live in a thoroughly diseased community without becoming infected yourself, no matter how antiseptic your surroundings:

. . . I am sick at heart . . . that the whole testament of libertarian ideas and promises I was told to live by and defend with my life has been a pious fraud. I look upon our gross corruption of the rights of man, the ground rules that are supposed to order my daily existence here, and know that to accept this corruption is committing a sin against my own senses, against the light that is in me. If I accept, without daily rising anger, the present, past and future disparities in the human condition, I realize I am committing the greatest of sins, that of hypocrisy, which blinds a man to his own failings and gives him a false idea of his position and purpose in the world.

The language is passionate, for that is Truman Nelson the New Englander, attempting to live by the best moral precepts of his ancestors (he knows they were far from angels and some of their precepts were deplorable) but I submit that this is not the sickly moralizing of the liberal who already knows in his heart where he will stand when the stuff hits the fan. For one thing, Nelson does not protest that he is worried about the fate of black Americans. He has enough respect for us to believe that we are no more or less suicidal than any other people, and that we are students enough of recent European history to realize that passivity will not stay the hand of the executioner. Rather he knows that we know that we must make it so costly and dangerous for the executioner that he will be forced to think of alternative final solutions.

Nelson is concerned with the state of his own salvation and that of the larger North American community. He knows that some thinking white Americans must recognize in their own traditions the legitimacy of black revolution, and act on that recognition, or nothing that is worth saving in this civilization will survive. There is no real similarity between Nelson and my English reactionary friend mentioned earlier. For one thing Nelson is neither cynical nor rich—he is in fact by our material considerations a poor white, despite his many accomplishments. Being twice over 30 he ought to have given up this revolutionary business long ago and found a comfortable little niche for himself somewhere. Instead, he has produced books like The Sin of the Prophet, The Passion of the Brook and Torture of Mothers (the last a damning exposure of the real causes of the Harlem rebellion of 1964).

I first heard of Truman Nelson in 1962 when he wrote a brilliant introductory essay to Negroes With Guns by Robert F. Williams, the black leader who had been driven into exile as a result of his militant defense of the black community in the riots of August, 1961, in Monroe, N.C. We who were there did not fully realize it then, but our real objective was to take power from the racist government of Union County. In his essay, Nelson quoted Dr. Martin Luther King's famous paraphrase from Gandhi: "We will match your capacity to endure suffering with our capacity to endure suffering. We will meet physical force with soul force."

Nelson was outraged, for he understood that Williams had been acting in the best tradition of John Brown and the white and black abolitionists who followed him to the attack on Harper's Ferry, there to be vilified and hanged. Wrote Nelson: "No, I say, an everlasting No! to this. Two hundred years of appeal by accumulative suffering to the hearts of racists is enough, enough, enough! The American Negro is not a downtrodden Hindu, a palpitating mass of ingrained and inborn submission to being put in his place, a citizen of a land so impoverished and barren that a lifetime of abject starvation is the common lot, a land where living is so hard that men want a God so they can hate him.

"The American Negro is a citizen in a rich land, with a citizen's rights and duty to resist; resist all attempts to deprive him of its manifold blessings. Why should he be urged to go through this Hinduizing to regain the rights he already had in 1776? He was here then, you know, and he fought alongside the rest of us out of the same revolutionary morality, for the same revolutionary rights now re-emphasized in the Fourteenth Amendment."

If I were a white man I would search out the works of Truman Nelson and try to digest them carefully; and, if I could find my children who despise me for the lie I have been living, I would urge his spirit upon them in an attempt to prove to them that there was one white American left, over 30, who had not dropped out of our libertarian ideals. But, of course, I am not white, and I can no longer be sure how you people think or what you will do. All I do know is that Nelson is one of the few white historians I would want my kids to read.

Truth & Nat Turner: An Exchange

HERBERT APTHEKER

Mr. Aptheker is the director of the American Institute for Marxist Studies and a member of the National Committee of the U.S. Communist Party. He is the author of American Negro Slave Revolts (International), A Documentary History of the Negro People (Citadel) and Nat Turner's Slave Rebellion (Humanities Press).

New York City

DEAR SIR: Questioned concerning the historicity of his novel, The Confessions of Nat Turner, William Styron has offered several substantive replies and has encased these in ad hominem attacks upon me.

According to The New York Times, Mr. Styron, in speaking of my writings, said that they do not "convince me or any other responsible historian," and that "neither I nor anyone else in the field of history has any respect" for Aptheker. Mr. Styron added that in criticizing the novel, "Aptheker is grinding his ideological ax."

The attacks upon my person and my professional reputation constituted, I was told by an attorney, libel on their face; but, this attorney added, Communists in the United States cannot realistically hope for success in libel prosecutions. Perhaps Mr. Styron—or his attorneys—know this and possibly his boldness is thus explained. Rather strenuous efforts on my part to get The New York Times to print a reply from me have all failed.

I must note that it is news that Mr. Styron is a historian; it is sensational news that he now may speak for the historical profession.

Mr. Styron replied to some of the substantive points made concerning the distortions in his novel in The New York Times stories of February 1 and 11. Among other statements, the reader was told that (1) Styron "had failed to mention that Turner had had a wife [because] this was lacking in contemporary evidence and that, in any case 'marriage during slavery was a travesty.'" (2) He had shown Turner as being taught to read and write by a benevolent white master rather than by Negroes because "this was an option on my part," lacking any other indications." (3) "To a contention by Herbert Aptheker, the American Communist historian, that the use of Negroes to help crush the Turner rebellion was 'inconceivable,' Mr. Styron cited the analogy of some convicts' refusing to join in prison riots."

The October 16, 1967 issue of The Nation presented two views of William Styron's novel, The Confessions of Nat Turner: a review by Shaun O'Connell and a note on the historical accuracy of the work by Herbert Aptheker. The essay by Mr. Aptheker touched off a continuing controversy, to which both Mr. Aptheker and Mr. Styron address themselves in the letters which follow.

William Styron states that he knew the reference to Turner's wife which appears in an 1861 essay by Thomas Wentworth Higginson, "but I really can't accept a word-of-mouth reference put down thirty years after the fact." But, of course, Mr. Styron put down a contrary view, 136 years after the fact! Furthermore, Mr. Styron did not do all his homework, or he would have discovered the article, "The Family of Nat Turner," by a member thereof, Mrs. Lucy Mae Turner, appearing in the Negro History Bulletin for March, 1955. This is a detailed description of Turner's wife and two children, all separately sold off after the revolt. It contains photographs of Turner's son and daughter-in-law and their child. Nat Turner's son, Gilbert, became a well-known and respected artisan of Zanesville, Ohio, and died there about a decade before the birth of Styron.

As to having a benevolent white master teach Nat Turner to read and write, it is germane here to note that Mr. Styron, in the Times account (of February 11) is quoted as making a point that the authenticity of Turner's "Confessions" of 1831 was not questioned. I found one of the few extant copies of this original "Confessions" back in 1935 in Richmond; I affirmed and briefly argued its authenticity in a work completed in 1936. The "Confessions"—in full and verbatim—together with the defense of its authenticity, appear in my book, Nat Turner's Slave Rebellion, published eighteen months before Mr. Styron's work.

It is necessary to point to the authenticity of the "Confessions" because in it the court-appointed interrogator of Turner specifically states, of Turner's ability to read and write: "It was taught him by his parents" (p. 147 of my book, italics added). Thus, Styron certainly had opposite "indications" but chose the "option" which he did choose and made of this a significant aspect of his work.

Concerning the use of armed black slaves by the masters in Virginia in 1831 to crush Turner's rebellion. I did say that this was inconceivable and hold to that word. But the main thing I said was that it was untrue and that, furthermore, never in the history of slavery in the United States were black slaves armed by their masters for slave-suppressing duties. One who reads Styron's novel and sees the pages devoted to detailed description of black fighting black and recalls that it is this "fact" that finally, in the novel, breaks Turner (but historically the data show he never was morally broken) will understand the full dimensions of this perversion of reality.

Mr. Styron, not being able to deny that, contrary to his novel, blacks did not suppress blacks in the Turner revolt, concentrates on my opinion that this was inconceivable. He offers the analogy of convicts who refrain from participating in prison riots. But, of course, plantations were not penitentiaries—nor were they concentration camps, to use the simile of Styron's mentor, Prof. Stanley Elkins—and slaves were not convicts. Further, of course, not participating is much different from being given the physical means and then actually suppressing.

I have hitherto not felt free to quote from letters written to me by Mr. Styron: his libelous attacks, however, remove such restraints on my part. It may be interesting for others to learn that Styron wrote me—quite out of the blue—on March 9, 1961, saying that he had been reading my American Negro Slave Revolts and found it "an admirable book." He added: "I have made much use of it in laying the ground-work for a new novel I am writing, based on Nat Turner's revolt." Then he asked to see the manuscript copy of my earlier study of Turner's rebellion.

Five days later I mailed that manuscript to Mr. Styron; he acknowledged its receipt on March 18. On March 27, he had finished with it and mailed the manuscript back with a 500-word letter, saying: "I found it a most persuasive and meaningful work, and I think it will prove to be of great value in terms of my own rendition of the man and the insurrection." Mr. Styron continued: "It was a tremendous drama in our history, with great repercussions, and so far as I know you are the only one who has fully analyzed the event with respect to its ultimate effect upon the South and, for that matter, the happenings of the following thirty years."

William Styron Replies

WILLIAM STYRON

Mr. Styron is the author of Lie Down in Darkness (Modern Library), The Long March (Vintage), Set This House on Fire and The Confessions of Nat Turner (both Random House).

Roxbury, Conn.

DEAR SIR: Since I don't believe that history, once interpreted, remains impervious to new insights or that I should not be able to accept the wisdom which often evolves from a new understanding of the past, I think that I can explain the "fulness" of 1961 and the "denunciations" of 1968 with little strain at all. We all have letters in our dusty files. I have been told that it is unlawful to quote from them in print without first obtaining the writer's permission, as Mr. Aptheker has failed to do with mine, so I won't follow suit; however, a letter was written to me in 1964 by Mr. Aptheker himself, who sought to solicit my favor in allowing him to use lines from the letter he has just quoted as part of the publicity which was to accompany the publication of his book on Nat Turner. Mr. Aptheker seems to have as good a nose as any bourgeois writer for the opportune plug. At any rate, I refused—I think politely—not because I am adverse to helping a fellow writer along, nor because I did not believe that some of the praise I had set down in my correspondence did not hold true (some of it still does today) but because the fulsomeness which Mr. Aptheker attributes to me was indeed fulsome, especially in the light of the fact that after several years, most of his historical insights no longer appeared to me valid. Exciting new investigations into the nature and effect of American slavery had become available to me, and were persuasive, and I had reread what scanty material existed on Nat Turner's revolt.

While it was true that, in regard to Mr. Aptheker's book on slave revolts, I had "made much use of it in laying the groundwork for a new novel" (for "much" read "some" though I might add that his chapter on Nat Turner is, generally speaking, a very competent job and can be read today as a primer on the revolt), I felt no longer that the entire work was "an admirable book"; I saw it to be, rather, tendentious, stonily ideological and filled with "evidence" about the prevalence of slave rebelliousness which now appeared to be dubious in the extreme. As for the other book—the thesis on Nat Turner, which I had read in manuscript—I remembered little about it; but three years after reading it and after having absorbed the work of historians keener and wiser than Mr. Aptheker, I could hardly say to him that what I wrote in a letter in 1961 now struck me as wildly ridiculous without perhaps bruising Mr. Aptheker's feelings. It is a tribute to the soundness of the law regarding the unauthorized publication of letters that it was designed with the knowledge that personal correspondence as such, being an intimate affair even among strangers, may flatter or please or enrage but it is almost never objective testimony to human feelings and their sovereign changeableness and hence comprises unworthy evidence.

After describing some of his experiences and feelings while at the scene of the insurrection, Mr. Styron concluded by saying that he was sure my work "will be of great value to me, and I am grateful to you for allowing me to read it."

From these statements and evaluations in 1961 to those of the author of a best-seller today there is a considerable gap. Perhaps the fulsomeness of 1961 is as strained as the denunciations of 1968. At any rate, the reader has both before him; maybe even Mr. Styron can no longer explain them.

Now then, to the more important point of "denunciations." Mr. Aptheker seems to forget that the question of the "historicity" of my book first began in a Nation review [Oct. 16, 1967] by Mr. Aptheker himself—an attack which I didn't feel was necessarily ad hominem but was certainly based on matters substantive. At any rate, I regret that some of the statements I made in a telephone interview with The New York Times came out the way they did in print. For one thing, I did not refer to myself as a "historian" but as a student of history, and I feel myself as qualified to use that phrase as Mr. Aptheker.

I have also long been aware of the fact that Communists, as Mr. Aptheker points out, cannot realistically hope for success in libel actions, and I find this deplorable; for Mr. Aptheker to imply that I knowingly took advantage of such a situation in order to besmirch his reputation is as underhanded a slander as the one he imputes to me. Anyone who has been concerned with Negro history knows that Mr. Aptheker was making pioneer efforts in the field when few other scholars bothered to concern themselves with this important and difficult subject, and he should receive due credit for his early endeavor. I may or may not have said in my interview with the Times that "neither I nor anyone else in the field of history has any respect" for Aptheker, I do not think I did, but if that is the case I owe him an apology. What I would say now without fear of libel is that Mr. Aptheker's rigorously doctrinaire and simplistic notions about the nature of Negro slavery have since rendered his theories suspect in the eyes of practically all of the reputable scholars presently working in the field.

In writing The Confessions of Nat Turner I at no time pretended that my narrative was an exact transcription of historical events; had perfect accuracy been my aim I would have written a work of history rather than a novel, one of the advantages of which is its ability to allow a certain free play to the imagination. I stated all this in a preface to the book, and also clearly implied that not only were there some places where the dictates of art caused me to depart from the actuality (such as it can be tenuously known) but large areas where all was quite frankly pure invention. Mr. Aptheker's somber insistence that each departure from "fact" (and how little we know about facts!) represents a sinister distortion on my part has had the sad effect of leading a few of the gullible and naive to construe the book as a "racist" tract. This is too bad, because the book is neither racist nor a tract but a novel, an essay of the imagination where the necessities of always questionable "fact" often become subsumed into a larger truth.

The greatest Marxist literary critic, Georg Lukacs, has written in The Historical Novel: "The deeper and more genuinely historical a writer's knowledge of the period, the more freely will he be able to move about inside his subject and the less tied he will feel to individual historical data. . . . Every really original writer who portrays a new outlook upon a certain field has to contend with the prejudices of his readers. The image which the public has of any familiar historical figure need not necessarily be a false one. Indeed, with the growth of a real historical sense and of real historical knowledge it becomes more and more accurate. But even this correct image may in certain circumstances be a hindrance to the writer who wishes to reproduce the spirit of an age faithfully and authentically. It would require a particularly happy accident for all the well-known and attested actions of a familiar historical figure to correspond to the purposes of literature." The truth of this statement is even more compelling when applied not to a Bonaparte or a Cardinal Richelieu or a John Brown, who left in their wake a litter of documents to encumber the creative imagination, but to a Nat Turner, who bequeathed only his fragmentary, enigmatic "Confessions," taken down in a backwoods jail cell by a white man whose own reliability as an amanuensis must be questioned.

As for the matter of Nat Turner's wife, I find it odd that a scholar who professes to the scrupulosity that Mr. Aptheker does, should accept either Higginson's testimony thirty years later or an article written a full century and a quarter after the event by a "descendant." I did do my homework on this question, since it was Mr. Aptheker himself who sent me the essay in the Negro History Bulletin, but I was not convinced by the evidence; it seemed to me as lacking in substance as those queer screeds in genealogical journals which purport to prove that the writer was descended from the bastard offspring of Ulysses S. Grant. Do we have to accept the authenticity of something merely because it has attained the sanctity of print?

There is not a shred of contemporary

The View From the Barrio

Lisa Redfield Peattie

Live through the wrenching experience of social change with people caught up in their own industrial and social revolution.

In the words of its author, this new book's "theme is that of Venezuela—an underdeveloped society with a developed country's technology." Lisa Peattie explored that theme for two and a half years as a member of a project helping to plan a new industrial city.

She lived in a "barrio" (neighborhood) in Ciudad Guayana, a recently founded central Venezuelan city—observing life there from a social anthropologist's perspective and, just as important, fully participating in it as a concerned individual. The result of her experience is a warm, human, and brilliantly insightful book about the effect of social change on the people who are living through it.

You can read it as a personal story of one neighborhood in one city, as a description of planned change in one country, or as a generalized ethnography of urbanization and economic changes in the developing countries.

On any level the essence of The View from the Barrio is the same. It is a one-of-a-kind story of people whose way of life is undergoing a fundamental transformation. Because of this, the book will make compelling reading not only for social scientists and urban planners, but for all readers who put high value on the richness of human experience.

$6.95

The UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN PRESS
ANN ARBOR

evidence—not a hint, not a single statement either in the original “Confessions” or in the few newspaper accounts—to show that Nat Turner had a wife; putting Lukacs’ flexible theory aside, I might have given the fictional Nat a wife had she been mentioned even fleetingly in the original sources, but no such figure existed. She remains to me as illusory and as insubstantial as those dozens of “great-grandchildren” of Nat who, since the publication of The Confessions of Nat Turner, have written to me from all parts of the country, each of them claiming proof of kin. Had Nat Turner been able to spawn so many descendants he would have had no time for an insurrection, though surely he would have gained renown as the most philoprogenitive American in history.

Mr. Aptheker completely misread the account in The New York Times concerning the statement I made about the authenticity of the original “Confessions.” I have never questioned their authenticity, whatever semantic emphasis is placed on that word; I am convinced that a white lawyer named Thomas Gray visited Nat Turner in his jail cell a few days before the trial and execution, and after some hours of interrogation wrote the 5,000-word document which both Mr. Aptheker and I have been able to examine. What I do question—and what apparently Mr. Aptheker takes as gospel truth, revealing more faith in the probity of a Southern white lawyer than I do—is the accuracy of the “Confessions,” the overall fidelity to the circumstances of Nat’s life and career which Gray maintained during the course of what must have been, considering the hysteria of the moment, an exceedingly difficult and prickly interview.

The entire pedantic, impossibly elevated and formal tone of the “Confessions” makes me believe that they were not recorded with “little or no variation” from Nat’s words, as Gray states in his prologue; and so how much during that tense encounter was subtly bent and twisted by the interrogator? Gray was a man of his time, a Southern racist, and as a functionary of the Commonwealth it may well have been to his advantage (and in spite of his disclaimer to the contrary) to distort many things that the helpless prisoner told him, to add things, to leave things out.

None of the many angry critics who have attacked my Nat Turner on “racist” grounds have faulted me, for instance, for diverging broadly from the original “Confessions” when, totally without historical support, I caused Nat to invent a difficult strategy whereby he would capture the county seat and proceed to refuge in the Dismal Swamp. There is no mention of such a plan in the “Confessions” yet it is hard to believe that Nat did not have some such scheme and that

Gray did not worm this information out of Nat; the eventual plan finally divulged by Nat was doubtless considered an unfit subject for advertisement or propagation. If presumably my critics can accept this elaborate but totally imaginary feat of strategy—which demonstrates the power of organization that Nat must truly have possessed—they display much less honesty in not being able to accept relatively minor divergences on my part from the original “Confessions,” complaining for instance that the fact that I caused Nat to be taught and reared by a benevolent white master rather than by his parents, as he told Gray, demonstrates the tendentious “racism” of my work—and to this point in a moment.

But let me quote again from Lukacs who, in a brilliant essay in which he erects a bridge between the social insights of Marx and European historical literature, says: “What matters in the novel is fidelity in the reproduction of the material foundations of the life of a given period, its manners and the feelings and thoughts deriving from these. This means that the novel is much more closely bound to the specifically historical, individual moments of a period, than is drama. But this never means being tied to particular historical facts. On the contrary, the novelist must be at liberty to treat these as he likes, if he is to reproduce the much more complex and ramifying totality with historical faithfulness. From the standpoint of the historical novel, too, it is always a matter of chance whether an actual historical fact, character or story will lend itself to the particular method by which a great novelist conveys his historical faithfulness.”

Certainly it was just this and no subtle trickery that dictated my choice of the fictional means by which Nat was educated and reared. Those who have attacked the book on this point have of course seen in such a choice the specter of benevolent paternalism; once again the Negro and his hard-won abilities are willfully by-passed in favor of an image of white superiority, white supremacy. As one critic, Mike Thelwell, writes in a long essay in a forthcoming issue of The Massachusetts Review:

This is the Golden Age of Southern Chivalry, and what is being reconstructed for us is the enlightened benevolence of the “Old Dominion” version of slavery, surely the least oppressive serfdom in mankind’s history. This only applies, as Mr. Styron is careful to indicate, to slaves fortunate enough to be owned by the enlightened gentry; it is the poor white overseers, and small landowners who made the lot of slaves unendurable. Surely we have some right to expect serious novelists in 1967 to eschew this kind of fanciful nonsense? Especially if we know that it is precisely on these large Virginia plantations that the most degrading and debasing form of slavery was developed. Even as early as the 1830s . . . these enlightened aristocrats had begun converting their plantations to breeding farms. . . .

Aside from the fact that careful research by honest investigators has turned up practically no evidence at all of breeding farms ever existing (surely we should expect essayists in The Massachusetts Review to abandon this Mandingo nonsense?) it remains clear that almost nothing is known of Nat Turner’s childhood and upbringing, and also that “enlightened benevolence” did in truth, alas, exist. Chance dictated my setting Nat in this environment—not to frustrate Mr. Thelwell’s and Mr. Aptheker’s metaphysical fantasy of our hero as an amalgamated black Paul Bunyan and Daniel Boone—a superslave battling against Simon Legree stereotypes of degradation and debasement—but to create an irony which, I suppose, is lost on minds incapable of making an ironic connection: in this case, that slavery in its most bestial form was terrible enough but that it was precisely this enlightened benevolence which in the end ameliorated nothing, instilled a false hope, brought Nat to disaster, and constituted a betrayal at least as cruel as the nightmare of captivity in the Deep South. It was for this reason—“to reproduce the much more complex and ramifying totality with historical faithfulness”—that I chose to have Nat reared in relatively pleasant circumstances by a kindly master, and I could not care less if this fails to correspond to anyone else’s vision of the possibilities or the reality.

At a large gathering in New Haven some time ago, a young Negro wearing the appurtenances of a Black Muslim (and accompanied by a pretty white girl) got up and asked me why I had written such a racist book? Why had I perverted history? Why had I, among other things, set down the impossible scene of armed Negro slaves aiding their master in repelling the insurgents? Why, above all, did I perpetuate the mendacious cliché of the black man being hopelessly hung up on white women? He then paraphrased some lines from Mr. Aptheker’s Nation review of Nat Turner to support his depositions. “Man, it’s a pity,” he said as he sat down beside the admiring blonde, “that LeRoi Jones didn’t write your book,” thereby underscoring a certain obvious pathos.

I made an evasive reply, I believe, since I was a beginner at countering punches at the book, then. I did not explain, as I might now, that neither he nor I nor Herbert Aptheker could in fact ever say that it was inconceivable, much less untrue (how does Mr. Aptheker know it's untrue?) that armed Negro slaves might, at their master's behest or even voluntarily, rise to defend the only homes they had ever known. I would say now that to me such an eventuality was logically and eminently conceivable, that my guess was as good as the young man's or better—that he was black and I was white but I knew more about the institution of American Negro slavery than he did—and that unless he could offer proof to the contrary I would stand by the choices which, as a novelist, I had made.

I might also say now that I had "perpetuated" the stereotype of the black man's hang-up on white females because I feel it was—quite probably—true; that maybe he himself had such a hang-up and that unless the absurd and puerile hypocrisy ceased, unless Negro males stopped holding hands with them, adoring them, hating them, molesting them, screwing them, marrying them, rejecting them, mocking them, painting them, being involved with them in whatever manner (obviously anyone who wants to believe I am a racist can take these words out of context to justify his viewpoint)—I would insist that my own historical insight was as true as anyone's, Nat's fateful impulse valid then as now, and that Nat Turner was hung up on Margaret Whitehead, bashing her brains out because of the same hatred and love and despair that make Americans today as then all hopelessly hung up—black and white—one with the other, wedded inseparably by the error and madness of history. I expect now that I would explain that I felt no need whatever to apologize for any liberty I took with the "facts" concerning a man who still, to me, whatever the fictional transmutations, was a figure of tragic magnitude and nobility.

"Truth of passions, verisimilitude of feelings in imagined circumstances," writes Lukacs, quoting Pushkin, "that is what our mind demands of the dramatic writer." And Lukacs concludes: "The writer's historical fidelity consists in the faithful artistic reproduction of the great collision, the great crises and turning-points of history. To express this historical conception in an adequate artistic form the writer may treat individual facts with as much license as he likes, for mere fidelity to the facts of history without this connection is utterly valueless."

Book Without a Label

FURROWS. By Charlie Cobb. Flute Publications, Tougaloo, Miss. (Distributed by SNCC). 59 pp. $3.

GREN WHITMAN

Mr. Whitman is an organizer for the Inter-Faith Peace Mission in Baltimore, and was a SNCC volunteer and staff member from 1964 to 1966.

Furrows is only the label that's been put on this book of poems to satisfy U.S. copyright laws. A book without a label isn't really a book, according to the copyright people, so Charlie Cobb has tacked a label on his book, saying O.K., call it Furrows, one label's just as good as another. Or as bad.

But to the people for whom he wrote his poems, Cobb said: "There is no title to this book. It is not finished. It begins in struggle and ends in struggle, with interludes of peace woven through the fabric of words and photographs. When black America's struggle is finished, when black children will look in a mirror and see a symbol of resistance, a symbol of beauty, blessed by the color of their skin and the strength of their heritage, then this book will be finished."

In January, 1966, Cobb wrote a report for SNCC about the Poor People's Conference held in Mount Beulah, Miss., a meeting of black Mississippi plantation workers. He said that the meeting was "three days of talking to let out lifetimes of denial. To understand that what they needed was not going to be given them. To plan how to take."

The people had been waiting for a six-month demonstration food distribution program promised by the federal government. Two months before, in November, the state of Mississippi had received $1.6 million to cover the costs of distributing $24 million worth of surplus food. "To date," Cobb wrote, "none of the food [had] been distributed and the winter [was] half over." The people weren't interested in a sixmonthdemonstrationfooddistributionprogram. It was food they needed.

Most of his report was quotes.

Voice: "At night we lay down so worried so bad 'bout what we gonna feed our children the next morning, we can't rest at night. 'Cause I can't. Lay over an' work my pillow with tears 'bout my little children. Git up the next morning an' wonder where I'm gonna get my next meal from for my children."

Voice: "I believe in the Bible myself, but when you say 'Lord I'm hungry, give me some food,' you might as well say 'Lord I'm starving, let me die quick-ly.'"

Voice: "If we gonna take it, I wanna carl oglesby's yankees and cowboys

WITH ex-SDS president Carl Oglesby writing essays like short stories for us, this is no time not to have a subscription to the Guardian, America's foremost independent radical weekly. Oglesby's two part essay is a masterful analysis of Cowboy Lyndon Johnson's "de-Kennedyization" of Yank Kennedy, and an irresistible call for a new, happier, harder-hitting American radicalism.

The articles appear in the issues of April 13 and 20, which means you probably can't buy them on the newsstand. What you can do is get them free by clipping and mailing the coupon below, with or without your order for a subscription.

Guardian independent radical newsweekly

Also featured in these editions:

- Eldridge Cleaver's two-part account of recent developments in the Black Panther-PFP coalition on the West Coast.
- Wilfred Burchett's report from Phnom Penh on North Vietnam's response to the "peace offensive"

Send today for your subscription and/or your copies of Carl Oglesby's study of the Cowboys versus the Yankees.

I would like:

- ☐ Two free Guardians with the Oglesby piece.
☐ 10-week trial subscription at $1.
☐ One-year regular subscription at $7.
☐ One-year student subscription at $3.50 (include name of school)

My remittance is enclosed (add $1.50 for Canada, Lat. America, $2 elsewhere).

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____ Zip _____

Guardian

197 E. 4th St., New York, N.Y. 10009

Guardian independent radical newsweekly

take it. You can call that radical, extreme, or whatever you want, an' I don't give a damn about that. I wanna know who is ready. Is you mad enough to stay 'till we get that 24 million?"

The people had been talking about moving onto the deserted Greenville (Miss.) Air Force Base, moving into the empty barracks so much better than their own shacks or tents, asking the U.S. Government to fly the surplus food they weren't getting to the base. They'd unload it, they said.

And move on they did, about forty of them. Stokelyed up a fire in one of the empty barracks. Put up a sign—THIS IS OUR HOME. PLEASE KNOCK BEFORE ENTERING.

Lieutenant Colonel Andrews of the Mississippi Air National Guard, about half an hour later, knocked. "You are trespassing on government property," the Colonel said. The people gave him a leaflet explaining why they were there—demanding food, jobs, job training, income, land. "My only concern is with this building," said Colonel Andrews.

Thirty hours later, Major General Puryear and 150 air policemen marched up to the barracks and knocked. Heads.

"All the people expelled from the base began an 8-mile walk back to town along the highway," Cobb wrote. One of the photographs in his book is one Cobb took as the people were being knocked off the air base. A hurt woman. Not physically hurt—how many different ways can a person hurt?—hurt by that blurred line of flat-hatted Air Force cops standing behind her, who would presently be riding back to Greenville after they'd "secured" the deserted barracks. Riding, the air cops would pass her and her companions walking that long, cold 8 miles back to town. Hungry. (At least when you're busted you get fed.)

O.K. The poems.

From "L.A.—The Order of Things":

*It is you who feels the pain
for ■ burning supermarket and cannot hear the cries
of a hungry child.*

Cobb doesn't like capital letters because they remind him too much of supermarketowners, or anyone else you have to call "cap'n mister boss mansir." And he doesn't like too many periods, either, because periods say this is ended, done, go on to something else, and Cobb's folks aren't finished yet.

Says a man standing in his black with his together black and in the flickering fire red

*white bled black dead night?
You gave me the bottle and taught me
to empty its burning inside my body. I gave it back.
Stuffed
with the rags you made me wear Kerosened
with my sweat
Lit with the match
of your oppression
Burning baby burning i feel the fire burn baby burn feeling froggy got got to leap.*

Another poem:

Mekonsippi #1

*Yeah
the mississippi
runs into the mekong get the boat at harlem sail red rivers
black seas or walk from cotton to rice
from cement to silt Vietnam
and Amsterdam*

*avenues of whitey's wars Mekonsippi
the 17th isn't parallel doesn't divide*

Cobb was in Vietnam last spring as an investigator for Bertrand Russell's war crimes tribunal, that judgment ignored just as hungry Americans are ignored. Having collected evidence here, Cobb was collecting more evidence in Vietnam.

To Vietnam

*carpet cover many floors where i come from but none kiss the sky.
i have never known before fields that filled the hungry i have never stood free to sun, to son.
wind has never sung song of nation in my black face.*

I haven't seen anything else Cobb wrote about Vietnam, but his book tells exactly what he saw. He's seen the same things here—crimes against peace, crimes against humanity. Sammy Young shot through his head in Alabama by an Esso gas station attendant because he wanted to use the men's room—"for we the fools/who want/a place to/piss in peace/Can only find the alley."

Cobb in Vietnam, thinking about "Jimmy Lee Jackson shot/by a cop/protecting Alabama/as he'd been taught/And as he'd always seen/the country protect itself."

"So cry not just (says Cobb in a poem dated April, 1965) for jackson or reeb/schwerner, goodman/or chaney/or lee/cry for all mothers/with shovels/digging at hovels/looking for their dead."

Poems of a Japanese Sojourn

THE HEART'S GARDEN/THE GARDEN'S HEART. By Kenneth Rexroth. Pym-Randall Press. 47 pp. $4.

RICHARD EBERHART

Mr. Eberhart, who teaches at Dartmouth, won the Pulitzer Prize for poetry in 1966. His most recent book is Thirty One Sonnets. A new book of poems, Shifts of Being, will be published this year by Oxford University Press.

Kenneth Rexroth's new book comprises ten short philosophical poems concerning his Japanese sojourn last spring. These poems are unnumbered, vary from 2 to 6 pages in length, are written in his characteristic, mainly three-beat line without rhyme, and the poems are separated by calligraphic symbols taking up a page each.

Rexroth's is the best kind of meditative poetry. Except for explicit Oriental references these poems could have been written in San Francisco. They are of a piece with his serene philosophic poems of the last quarter century. Many years ago he studied the Orient and made comments on India, China and Japan not unlike those in this book. Rexroth, one of the most civilized internationalists, is at home in Eastern as well as Western conceptions of life, death and fate. Some painterly qualities remain from a style earlier than his long achieved serene poem of philosophical equilibrium.

In the thirties he wrote wild poems, nervous and surreal. He wrote explosive poems as late as the death of Thomas, but in general Rexroth has settled down to the universal validity of stating simple and deep truths in a natural way.

In reading Rexroth we are not excited by Hopkins turns and tricks nor by Howlishness. The river of Li Po, Tu Fu or Wang Wei is the same river he sees.

It has been flowing a long time. He contemplates the Buddha, Krishna. The hawk and the butterfly are ever the same, also "The contemplative mysteries/Of the garden to five/Remarkably beautiful/Young women." "The water of life runs/Quick through dry reeds." "Far/Away the Himalayas/Guard the world from all trouble."

ART / Max Kozloff

Compared to our knowledge of Austen and Arnold, Thackeray, Dickens, Scott, Shelley, or Ruskin, we know appreciatively little about their contemporaries in English painting. Or rather, we used to know little. Patient, slow-mounting research, exemplified in many recent studies, has now culminated in a grand portmanteau exhibition, "Romantic Art in Britain, 1760-1860," shortly to conclude its stay at the Philadelphia Museum. (Detroit's Institute of Arts was co-ordinator.) The giants of this period, Blake, Constable and Turner, are scanted in the show—reasonably—in order to reveal the broad generative span, and the fullest reaches of their tradition. It is a record of a civilization, a cornucopia of sentiment, backing into the modern age not so much by the surface of its Victorian propriety as by the inner tricklings of its emotion, and the reluctant modulations of its form.

Of a spectacle so detailed in its disorderliness, the greatest temptation is to find for it some apt formulas or token generalization. Thus, for instance, subject may be subsumed by mode. Fuselli's pity and terror, Wright of Derby's scientific or industrial genre, Stubbs's slick or terrified horses, the water-color views of Cotman, Girtin and Prout, the religio-historical-erotic scenes of Haydon and Etty, the anecdotal social panoramas of Frith, and finally, the moralistic Gothic revivalism of the Pre-Raphaelites: all these may be thought to declaim or to converse, to generalize or to specify. The attitudes they render may be heroic or domestic; the nature they portray may instruct or delight. It is a matter of scenario and syntax far more than of philosophy and sentience that engages the attention.

Unfortunately, these polarities do not sufficiently distinguish the Britishness of these painters. For such characteristics are to be found everywhere in the art sponsored by the 19th-century bourgeoisie, proud of its new-found economic power, and eager to see recorded visual homilies of its family life, historical pageants flattering to its upward sense of nationalism, or fantasies projec-

Rexroth sees the eternal in the instant eternal symbols in existential realizations. It is the poetry of the calm of flowing waters. His is a deeply satisfying, profoundly philosophic poetry of world realization. No need to shout. No need to praise. His is the art to accept the vastness of life and give us his pure sense of it, serene, open.

ting a yearning for a simpler and more Arcadian, or more exotic and colorful existence than that of the increasingly routinized present. The duality of the art that mirrored these aspirations was a common phenomenon throughout Europe, and as problematical as it sounds. For, as Geraldine Pelles writes, "idealism seeks to harmonize contradictory qualities in one form, which realism pretends merely to record in their multiplicity."

The intermediate and overlapping stage between idealism and realism is what we call Romanticism. Into the dilemma of reconciling various set norms with limitlessly differential observation, the Romantics injected their note of commitment to feeling—feeling as the point of origin, and the communication of feeling as the operative function of the work of art. Often, however, it seems that the discovery of the self, with its cult of genius, and its heightened, confessional exploration of the passions of the artist, is largely a psychic coloring passing through the representational patterns of the early century. Only when the pattern no longer seems adequate to the burden of his feelings and his values does he attempt to convert means into ends and surmount a pictorial convention with a new stylistic equivalent of his impulse. The accelerated capacity for such change, marked by the increased self-consciousness of the artist, is the distinguishing feature of Romanticism.

It is precisely this that seems absent from the British Romantic painters, even as their work is replete with the iconographical paraphernalia of Romanticism. They may be completely caught up with the historicity of their subjects, but they do not see themselves as playing a potential historical role. There is no overarching artistic principle that they must fight for, no real competing ideologies of the past or for the future. Many among them are embittered, hermetic, or frustrated, but they do not visualize their plight as a modern malaise. Their sense of the present is engaged with the narrative or illustrational techniques that give experience a comforting vicariousness; they are rarely so absorbed in their experience as to be obliged to remake it. The latter might have induced some sense of privateness, let alone immediacy into this art. Yet, with the exception of the extraordinary Samuel Palmer, this painting, whether it chanced to find a market or not, is a public, even a popular one. Landseer, the most celebrated and meretricious painter of his era, does not alter in kind, only in degree, the rhetorical strategies of his fellow artists.

All the intensity, curiosity and religiosity which greet us in this art do not result in a seriousness which can question itself. Rather, it is tooled—as the most advanced division of labor and rationalized technology of its day was tooled—to find material extensions of the visible world. It can manipulate or moralize, but it cannot reorder that world because it has no radical political or aesthetic premise upon which to act. That is why, if the most indigenous feature of the British Romantic painters is the level on which they are dedicated to service the informational and sentimental needs of a vast audience, there are no Goyas or Daumiers among them. England was too comparatively liberal a context to nourish upheaval. Even the Pre-Raphaelites, so populist in subject, but elitist in attitude, and so reactionary in their view of the industrial revolution, are merely endorsing

The Nation BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

- ☐ VIETNAM FOLLY
by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ THE FREE WORLD COLOSSUS: A critique of American Foreign Policy in the Cold War by David Horowitz (Hill & Wang, $6.95) $5.55
- ☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $3.96
- ☐ THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER by Ronald Sampson (Pantheon, $4.95) .. $3.95

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014.

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

4-22-68

TRAVEL

TOUR YUCATAN—July 8th, all expenses from New Orleans and return—12 unforgettable days —$400. MEXIVAC TOURS, P. O. Box 274, Lombard, Ill. 60148.

PERSONALS

YOU CAN BE A CITIZEN DIPLOMAT TO RUSSIA THE "GLASSBORO WAY"

For details write:

CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS
Dept. N/22, 10 W. 44 St., NYC 10036
or Telephone: (212) LT 1-8113

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE

(Computerized Matching—All Ages)
"Let TEAM make you a team."

Write:

TEAM Project
245 East 30th Street
New York, N.Y. 10016, Phone 889-6020

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: write Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 30 East 42 Street, N.Y.C. 10017.

INTERESTED IN LIFE? Believe men should live each day to the fullest? So do humanists. For information write: Dept. N-1, American Humanist Association, 125 El Camino del Mar, San Francisco, Calif. 94121.

DISCOVER a fun way of meeting interesting, alert Jewish singles. For FREE analytical questionnaire write: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036

SNOOPY FOR PRESIDENT—249 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/$1, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Free catalogue to all. Free sample to stores. A Big-Little Store, 1671 Washington, San Francisco, 94109

BUTTONS, PEACE JEWELRY, POSTCARDS, POSTERS, psychedelia, etc. Unusual merchandise. Good service. Wholesale to all. 10c brings exciting free catalogue air mail. FREE SPEECH, INC., 18 St. Marks Place, N.Y.C. 10003

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 4-22-68
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10011

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign Postage $2; Canadian Postage $1 per year extra)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

wide-spread anxieties about the dehumanization of the early machine age. If you criticized society, you still had no need to stand outside it. For Victorian imperial England had not gone through the convulsions of contemporary France, and could not give rise in its art to anger, irony, despair, or even any fundamental alienation. Only two works in the present show reflect any direct consciousness of bleak social conditions. The first, George Frederick Watts's "The Irish Famine," is a feeble, dim-colored family group reminiscent of the theme of the "Rest On the Flight To Egypt." The other, Henry Wallis' quite haunting painting of a dead stone breaker, takes its cue from the social perorations of Carlyle.

But neither dissidence nor humanitarian conscience were required to give creative tension to Romantic painting. It was rather, the externalized personal encounter of the individual with the demands of his own imagination, that imbued it with life. No matter with what zeal the artists in this exhibition pursue the possibilities of naturalistic representation, few give or would have wished to give evidence of that personal encounter. Nor is it any more apparent in the visionary extravaganzas of Francis Danby or John Martin. This does not at all mean that the frozen gestures of pathos or ardor are stereotypes imposed by a philistine patronage. On the contrary, it implies a natural participation of the artist in a well-knit community of hopes, aspirations and myths, all the more remarkable since neither the Grand Style nor any fixed dynastic structure could offer a consistent program for artistic endeavor. There is no more license in this work, no more unbridled and genuine exhibition of self, than is calculable in the energetic and repressed culture that called it into being. British differs from French Romantic art by its greater façade of diffidence, its unawakened age, and by the apparent continuity of its perceptions between artist and audience through which portrayal itself easily yields communication.

It would also appear to differ from the French, pictorially. Nowhere is this more evident than in the lack of "body" in this painting. Despite a virtuoso handling of the medium, one observes throughout a thinness of density, whether in the buoyancy of certain images or the glassiness of certain surfaces. And while this obviously does not preclude many airy effects or a spontaneous lightness of touch, it is foreign to a sensuous response to the substance of paint itself. On the contrary, in view of the sophisticated illusionism desired and achieved, a marked impasto would have been an intrusive factor—would have clogged the transparency of the observation. Diaphanous or crystalline matrices of space dominate the exhibition. Bonnington, with his wind-swept bravura skies is perhaps the major exception—the Bonnington who had been trained and worked most of his short life in France. As for Constable, his handling does take on weight rather in the fascinating bouffant manner of cotton candy gaining bulk. Turner strives to impart tangibility to translucence itself. The impact of the water-color tradition had been to identify this aerial sensibility with light, and the transmission to landscape of an almost obsessive luminosity could early express a longing for the Infinite on one hand, and a microscopic freshness of texture by about mid-19th-century, on the other. With the Pre-Raphaelites, it is curious to see images as minute as blades of grass raise ridges on the otherwise uninflected surface. This preciousness could even go so far as Palmer's magnificent fetishism, when he describes one of his surfaces as "all sprinkled and showered with a thousand pretty eyes, and buds . . . and blossoms, gemm'd with dew" (quoted by Nicholas Pevsner).

The terminal stretches of the show register an icily controlled and color-heightened pictorial topography whose expressive force is quite at variance with the banality of its subject matter. The torrent of such craftsmanship in Ford Madox Brown's "The Pretty Baa-Lams" has stupefying brilliance. And John Brett's velvet and marbelized "The Val d'Aosta" is a landscape so weirdly sun-dappled that it could have been conceived by Alfred Hitchcock. No less uncanny is the clinical luridness of John Everett Millais' "The Rescue," firemen and children bathed in the cerise reflections of an unseen flame. But it is in the exasperated finish and fanatical spirituality of Palmer's mask in the "Portrait of the Artist as Christ" that a virtual Romanticism turns into an actual one. The hyperacuity of vision in Victorian art here engulfs the mundane care in work, the story-book approach to experience, and stares you down with a wide-eyed gaze of revelation.

For a labor of scholarship that must have equalled some of the doggedness of their subjects, the catalogue by Allen Staley and Frederick Cummings deserves commendation from all historians. Their punctiliousness has not resulted in lifting British Romantic art into any unexpectedly higher stature. But its knolls and crevices, moors and crags are better displayed than at any time previously. It is a bucolic, rolling terrain, for the most part, whose respectable if cloying horizontality is occasionally rent by an exalted height.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1246

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 and 25 down Gets exposed to the elements on journeys and puts a seal on one's sash. (7-6)
- 5 Looks threatening! (6)
- 10 Fruit? Go back inside to find out where the porcelain is coming from. (7)
- 11 Shed blood after a struggle, but sounded cheerful! (7)
- 12 and 15 down The best 2 down isn't likely to be circular. (5-5,4)
- 13 Do they remember such things as hour-glasses? (3,6)
- 14 Made of cedar, proved itself in the heat, perhaps. (5)
- 16 Only skelter's helter-skelter—and somewhat hawkish. (8)
- 19 One might have to give it if challenged; one does it along with playing "gossip." (7)
- 22 In the spring, alternatively, one might expect to see the urban leader. (5)
- 24 The locations of high-level jobs? (9)
- 26 Diamond and pearl, of sorts. (5)
- 28 And these might be included in 26, also—at least they have an inclination to be so. (7)
- 29 Even a regular habit might be. (7)
- 30 Those who do might soon expect to be in 29. (7)
- 31 The way one might consent to write about the craft of the Owl and the Pussy-cat descriptively? (3-5)

DOWN:

- 1 Rife? It might be out of control. (8)
- 2 Weapon, alternatively protection against weapons? (5)

- 3 In an old-fashioned way, called about the middle of the month. (Or do they appear almost twice daily?) (4,5)
- 4 A German city is otherwise coming up with the ordinary type. (7)
- 6 Dog of Germanic or Gibraltar-like extraction. (5)
- 7 The college of Wellington? (9)
- 8 Count the reason for calling one this? (It's peculiarly unhappy at first!) (6)
- 9 One of these is not necessarily rubber, though there might be such an association with a health movement. (6)
- 17 Sending forgiveness in so doing? (9)
- 18 Obviously a new person in the class. (8)
- 20 Responsible for the blowing of Danny Kaye's ill wind? (6)
- 21 Placed inside the wrong side outside, causing an argument? (7)
- 23 A thin strip held by the Southern Pacific Railroad? (6)
- 25 See 1 across
- 27 Having a tendency towards lying? (6)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1245

ACROSS: 1 Potherb; 5 and 29 Good-for-nothing; 9 Pretend; 10 Areaway; 11 Epact; 12, 15 and 17 Gasconade; 13 Anita; 14 Solicit; 16 Snagged; 18 Repined; 21 Coerced; 24 and 2 down After the Fall; 26 Sop; 30 Salvagers; 31 Soy bean. DOWN: 1 Peppers; 3 Elect; 4 Bedight; 6 and 5 down Opera glasses; 7 and 27 across Fowling piece; 8 Reynard; 18 Reasons; 19 Pitiful; 20 Deserts; 21 Copings; 22 Crevice; 23 Sten gun; 25 Ruche; 27 and 28 Petty officer.

PUBLICATIONS

OUR GENERATION

Largest circulation Quarterly of dissent in Canada and of the New Left in North America—

Analyzes, Reports, Reviews, Theorizes:

- the movement for educational university reform
- the black power and human rights
- the peace and anti-Vietnam war
- the anti-poverty and community organizing
- the Quebec independence movement
- tactics and strategy of New Left in Canada and U.S.A.

Sample issue: $1.50

Subscriptions: $5.00 (4 issues)

3837 St.-Laurent Blvd., Montreal 18, Canada

THE FUTURIST, published bimonthly by World Future Society, reports scientists' forecasts for coming decades. Subscription: $5 yearly. Box 19285-N, Twentieth Street Station, Washington D.C. 20036.

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

"Adventures of a Farm Boy" (non-fiction)—$2.00. Paul Burke, 201 S. 32 Avenue, Omaha, Nebraska 68131

THE CONSCIENCE OF A RADICAL by Scott Nearing is a book you should read. Have it sent postpaid for $2 clothbound, or in paper at $1, from Social Science Institute, Harborside, Maine 04642.

'THE PRESS AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by

Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Fall issue of Columbia University Forum. It has already been selected for an anthology to be published by Atheneum this spring.

Single copies—15c

25 copies at 10c each

Orders over 25 at 7c per copy

THE NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

EDUCATIONAL

WE HAD A FOOTBALL TEAM, but they got interested in Plato. So much for football. Personal and academic freedom—for students who can hack it. Write Admissions N, Franconia College, Franconia, N.H. 03580.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
242-8400

THE NATION

a weekly journal which has believed for 103 years that the quality of our national discourse shapes the quality of our national life—and that that discourse becomes more vital, not less, in time of national crisis—

offers FREE with each NEW full year subscription your choice of the following books:

LBJ LAMPOONED: Cartoon Criticism of
Lyndon B. Johnson, intro. by Jules Feiffer ☐

BITTER GREETINGS: The Scandal of the Military Draft, by NATION contributor
Jean Carper ☐

THE ACCIDENTAL PRESIDENT,
by NATION Washington correspondent Robert Sherrill ☐

THE LOGIC OF WITHDRAWAL,
by NATION contributor Howard Zinn ☐

THE FERVENT YEARS: The Story of the Group Theatre of the 30s with a new chapter on Postwar Theatre, by NATION drama critic
Harold Clurman ☐

THE DESTRUCTION OF CALIFORNIA,
by NATION contributor Raymond F. Dasmann ☐

SCIENCE AND HUMAN VALUES,
by NATION contributor J. Bronowski ☐

AIR WAR: VIETNAM,
by Frank Harvey ☐

UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED,
by NATION contributor Ralph Nader ☐

THE NEW STUDENT LEFT,
ed. by Mitchell Cohen and Dennis Hale ☐

FREE MEN AND FREE MARKETS—
Proposed: A Guaranteed Income,
by NATION contributor Robert Theobald ☐

Clip and send this coupon to:
The NATION, 333 6th Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014.

☐ I'll join you for the year (48 issues). Enclosed is $10. I've checked the book I want.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6.
(Add $1 postage for Canada, $2 foreign)

Name

Street

City State Zip

N4-22

The good fight
is now in

THE NATION
—Why not
join now?

TRUDEAU OF CANADA C. W. GONICK

THE NATION

APRIL 29, 1968 35 cents

BURLINGAME
APR 29 1968
LIBRARY

HUBERT HUMPHREY: SPEAKING IN TONGUES

ROBERT G. SHERAILL

El Paso Dialogue

The Rhetoric of Revenge

ELROY BODE

Underground Press

Living Rich on the Hippie THOMAS PEPPER

GEORGE P. ELLIOTT on William Gass

THUMAN NELSON on W.E.B. DuBois

MICHAEL HAMBURGER on Keith Douglas

CHANDLER BROSSARD on Art and Ritual

5-21118 PLS-1449
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

NEWSPAPER

LETTERS

revolt in Taiwan

Durham, N.C.

DEAR SIRs: My own, more limited knowledge of the subject indicates that Marilyn Young's "Formosa: Solidarity of Gloom" [The Nation, Mar. 4] is an accurate and a perceptive description of the current plight of intellectuals in Taiwan. . . . I must dissent, however, from her inference that the conditions which she describes are likely to produce some kind of explosion which will undermine or perhaps even destroy the present regime in Taiwan.

The future of Taiwan will be determined for the most part not by its intelligentsia but rather by the loyalties of its 600,000-man army, its peasants, who comprise the vast majority of the population, and the economically powerful leaders of the Taiwanese business community. Like Mrs. Young, I spent the last months of 1966 and the early part of 1967 in Taiwan. . . . I became much involved with persons having considerable knowledge of conditions in Chiang Kai-shek's army, and I heard from them nothing which made me feel that any part of that army would support the kind of insurrection Mrs. Young seems to have in mind. As for the peasants, undoubtedly they are unhappy about high taxes, as well as corruption and extortion . . . but my own, admittedly limited, observations suggest that an effective program of land reforms and rising living standards in the countryside have made the Taiwanese peasantry much less discontented and rebellious than are the peasants in many other Asian countries.

Conversations with a close friend of more than ten years' standing who happens to be one of the most important of the younger leaders of the Taiwanese business community indicate that, although this community shares many of the grievances which the intelligentsia have with respect to the Nationalist regime, its members are too preoccupied with enriching themselves to assume the leadership of or perhaps even take part in any movement aimed at overthrowing the present government.

Donald C. Gillin
Department of History, Duke University

Hanover, N.H.

DEAR SIRs: I must agree with Professor Gillin that the potential for revolution in Taiwan is low at the moment. Two events might change this: a severe economic depression and/or a sloppy transition period at the time of Chiang Kai-shek's death. In a crisis, American policy could have a decisive impact, and my article was written in the hope, however dim, of influencing that policy.

Marilyn Young

UN reporter

Oradell, N.J.

DEAR SIRs: The editorial by Anne Tuckerman ["Once More, With Blood," The Nation, Apr. 8] was welcome reading. It gave a temperate, succinct account of both sides of the tangled Arab-Israeli dispute now being discussed by the UN Security Council.

B. Ruben

Jesse Newlon

DEAR SIRs: To supplement the Newlon Papers in the University of Denver Library, and for a biography, we seek correspondence and reminiscences concerning Jesse Homer Newlon (1882-1941), influential figure in the Progressive Education movement as Denver school superintendent (1920-27) and professor of educational administration, Teachers College, Columbia University (1927-41).

Theodore R. Crane, Charles Angeletti
History Department,
University of Denver, Denver, Colo. 80210

EDITORIALS

'Shoot To Kill!'—Daley

On April 15, Dick Gregory called a news conference in Chicago to announce that he was dropping plans for demonstrations at the Democratic National Convention, because in view of the temper of the Negroes and the "ethnic groups" there was no way to insure against civil violence on a scale heretofore unknown in this country. Gregory, a man of proved personal courage, wanted none of this blood on his conscience. His action was that of a responsible public citizen.

On that very same day, Mayor Richard J. Daley, appearing on television in an angry, blustering mood, directed his police chief to issue a written order to the force to shoot any future arsonists and looters. In the case of arsonists, the police were to "shoot to kill," the individual officer thereby constituting himself judge, jury and executioner on the spot. In the case of looters, the Mayor ordered the police to shoot only to "maim or cripple"; he evidently has an exaggerated idea of the accuracy of hand guns under riot conditions.

The contrast between Daley, the mayor of a great city, and Gregory, a comedian by profession but also a formidable public citizen, could hardly be sharper. It is a juxtaposition that should make the average citizen think. It has certainly had that effect on some un-average citizens, like Mayor Lindsay of New York. It is always dismaying when a powerful public official makes a fool of himself—viciously foolish in this instance—and it is reassuring when he gets a bad press, as Daley did.

The fact is that from any practical standpoint, Daley does not know what he is talking about. No doubt, he is quaking lest disorder during the Democratic convention should redound to his personal discredit and damage the Democratic nominee, whoever he may be. But if that is what is eating him, he should have learned something from the series of riots that followed the assassination of Dr. King. Cyrus R. Vance, at one time Deputy Secretary of Defense, is also an expert on riots and street fighting. He was present throughout the fighting in Detroit last summer and issued a sharply critical report on the handling of that situation, and on April 5 when rioting broke out in the national capital he was called in immediately as a special assistant to Mayor Walter E. Washington. "We learn from each incident," Vance said, comparing the two situations. Daley learns nothing; he just blusters.

Violence begets violence. In the Detroit disorders more than thirty people were killed, almost all of them Negroes. In Washington, with Negroes making up 60 per cent of the population, the situation was potentially worse but the death toll there was limited to ten, of which seven were clearly linked to rioting. It was a big outbreak, with more than 900 fires, all in the ghetto as usual, and more than 6,000 persons arrested. But less than thirty shots were fired. "We applied here the lessons we learned in Detroit," Vance summed it up. His technique is to handle riots with "the minimum use of force."

With a minimum use of force there should be coupled a maximum display of force before violence, arson and looting get under way. There are many other considerations. Business Week (April 13) has an informative summary of what has been learned to date; it should be read by all public officials and especially by hotheads like Richard J. Daley.

It is a multifaceted problem. Consider the human aspect. When, as in Newark, ill-trained police and National Guardsmen, many of them hardly more than boys, are let loose to engage in saturation shooting (often at one another) and generally undisciplined conduct, there are unnecessary and inexcusable casualties. On the day of the Daley outburst, a funeral was being held for a 19-year-old Negro divinity student who had been killed as a looter by the Trenton police the week before. Trenton civil rights officials have affidavits from witnesses who say that the youth was trying to prevent disorder.

The rights of the owners of property are secondary but by no means to be neglected. It is true that there is no justification for victimizing shopkeepers in ghetto neighborhoods (even though some of them may have been overcharging or swindling their customers). To defend the robbing or even exploiting of shopkeepers smacks of the same type of reasoning as Mayor Daley's diatribe. But looting can be kept to a minimum by the methods proved by previous experience, and without either killing people or allowing pillage to go unpunished.

The larger problem is not how to cope with riots but how to cure the complex of social diseases of which riots are only a symptom. Gregory spoke along that line at the Yale senior class dinner during his fast in protest against the Vietnamese War. "As far as I am concerned," Gregory said, "the number-one problem confronting this country today is not the problem of air pollution but the problem of moral pollution. You young kids who are going out to face the world . . . are going to have to face this problem like no Americans have ever had to face it. . . . Don't get me wrong. I am not here asking you to do a damn thing for colored folks [but] you are going to have to deal with this problem. . . . You'll have to understand it. You will have to become a little more honest than we have been."

Honesty is a skill more difficult to learn than the gunning down of fleeing looters, but the one builds a society while the other spreads a jungle.

War and Peace and Money

The stock market has been reflecting the wistful desire of the American people for peace, but the rise in prices and volume during the week of April 8 was more a financial knee jerk than a rational response. For one thing, peace is not in sight. Even if Johnson, Rusk and Rostow turned overnight into apostles of reason and good will, they would have to reckon with the rulers of Thailand, South Korea and South Vietnam, all committed to victory or everlasting slaughter. Unless, at some crucial juncture, the United States threatens to withdraw its air power and other assistance from these perpetual hawks, Johnson's successor will be halfway through his term before the major fighting can be stopped.

Still, the war will end sometime, and then what? Leav-

IN THIS ISSUE

April 29, 1968

EDITORIALS

554

ARTICLES

- 557 El Paso Dialogue:
The Rhetoric of Revenge
Elroy Bode
- 560 Trudeau of Canada:
A Man To Hold Quebec
C.W. Gonick
- 564 Hubert Humphrey: Speaking in Tongues
Robert G. Sherrill
- 569 Underground Press:
Growing Rich on the Hippie
Thomas Pepper
- 572 Harry Golden

BOOKS & THE ARTS

- 573 Stretched on the Rack of the Midwest
George P. Elliott
- 573 A Glimpse of e.e. cummings
(poem)
David Ignatow
- 574 A Life Style of Conscience
Truman Nelson
- 575 The Ritual of Originality
Chandler Brossard
- 576 A Hero and a Poet
Michael Hamburger
- 578 Art
Max Kozloff
- 578 Ghost Story of ■
New Hampshire Graveyard
(poem)
Dorothy Gilbert
- 580 Theatre
Harold Clurman
- 581 A Burned-Out Engine on the Southeast Expressway (poem)
Ruth Whitman
- 582 Films
Robert Hatch
- 583 Crossword Puzzle
Frank W. Lewis

Publisher	Associate Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.	GIFFORD PHILLIPS
Editor	Associate Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS	PHIL KERBY
Executive Editor	Literary Editor
ROBERT HATCH	HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY STODN.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014, Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 for Canadian postage; $2 for foreign postage.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

NATION

Volume 206

No. 18

ing aside the really tough jobs, such as making the ghetto warrens fit for human habitation, consider just one third-level transition which at modest expense could produce great benefits within a single existing sector of technology. At the March convention of the Institute of Electrical and Electronics Engineers, Dr. Alan R. Kahn, a professor of anesthesiology at the University of Illinois School of Medicine, pointed out that important contributions can be made to public health programs by the application of defense-oriented electronics. He added, however, that for bureaucratic, legislative and financial reasons, and given the mores of the free-enterprise system, it is difficult to beat swords into plowshares.

Aside from a special situation like this, a general difficulty is the sheer magnitude of the funds involved and the vested interests that have got control of the key jobs and political power. The annual defense budget is about $80 billion, but that is only the current expenditure. In the Pacific Historical Review (November, 1967) of the University of California, James L. Clayton, an assistant professor of history at the University of Utah, has a dismaying article on "The Impact of the Cold War on the Economies of California and Utah, 1946-1965." He selected two different states to avoid giving a one-sided picture, California, of course, gets most of the work: from 1951 through 1965 the Department of Defense gave that swollen state $67.2 billion in prime defense contracts (and that was before the peak of spending for Vietnam). Some of the money left the state in subcontracting but some came in by the same route; by all indications, the bulk of it stayed in the aptly named Golden State. Certainly the $20 billion in research and development contracts did. More than $50 billion in defense spending has been concentrated in Los Angeles County alone, with an overflow into neighboring Orange County, which increased manufacturing employment there more than tenfold since 1950.

California's universities, think tanks and industries picked up $4.5 billion just in R&D funds in fiscal 1965. If the Defense Department and NASA research funds alone were sharply curtailed, not to speak of Vietnam, Ph.D.s would be jumping out of windows.

Clayton suggests that defense spending may have been "the single most important economic and demographic factor in the history of the Far West during the last two decades." Since all parts of the country are financially intertwined, it is scarcely possible to think of sharp cutbacks without great danger to the whole system. Even when the war ends—and in the doubtful event that Congress will then be willing to divert to useful purposes a substantial part of the $30 billion a year being poured into that rat-hole—it will be years before much of a start can be made on eradicating the slums, educating the uneducated, and providing jobs for people who never had any (and who, in point of harsh fact, are not needed in the free-enterprise economy).

The people who bought more than 20 million shares of stock on a single day—and during the week of April 8 drove the Dow-Jones industrial average up 40 points—must have been living in that dream world which, more than once, has dominated the Street which is supposed to be the canniest of them all.

Politics, New Style

Like children learning to swim—making terrified splashes and taking in mouthfuls of water—the politicians are trying to learn to keep their heads above the new political environment in which they find themselves. It is difficult, but if democracy is to work, both the people and the politicians must make the adjustment.

As soon as Kennedy entered the lists, there was a spate of old-style, old-politics speculation about moves to "stop Kennedy." Part of this effort, beyond any doubt, was the attempt at St. Louis to get the Democratic Governors to erect a roadblock in a hurry. It was engineered by Gov. John Connally, who is slated to be Mr. Humphrey's running mate on the stand-in-for-LBJ ticket. But the Governors balked. As Tom Wicker put it, they showed a not unnatural disinclination to lay their heads on the block. Instead, taking a much more comfortable position, they declined to "stop or promote" any candidate. Most of them will show up at the convention as favorite sons. In theory, of course everyone is in favor of "open" conventions, but these are a rarity in practice. This one, however, promises to be more open than usual—a good thing in itself.

The underlying movement is suggested by Gov. Richard Hughes of New Jersey—that the primaries, the polls and the campaigns will "tell the people something." By present indications, they will. The freer the delegates are to act, once they get the message, the better will be the future outlook for American politics. That future also takes on a rosier hue because young voters, and young people not yet old enough to vote, are trying to tell the politicians something. No less than 40 per cent of the 21-to-29 age group are independents. Parties mean virtually nothing to these future majorities. They vote for men and issues. In this sense, a freer style of politics is emerging.

The GOP, despite its fixation on the past, cannot resist the gravitational pull of the massive new bodies in political space. F. Clifton White, a national political strategist who has been serving as a paid consultant to the California Republican delegation, predicts that Nixon will not make it on the first ballot. Sen. Thruston Morton says the same. White foresees an "open pragmatic affair," which is probably going a bit far, but it could be more open than anybody thought possible a while ago. Parties, if they wish to survive, must nowadays learn to respond to voter preferences; hence it behooves the delegates to ascertain what the voters are thinking, by contrast with the time when only the delegates had seen or known the candidates.

These changes, wrought largely by television, should dissipate some of the political idiocies of the past, such as the "balanced ticket"—Al Smith and a Dixiecrat (who remembers Joseph T. Robinson?), Franklin D. Roosevelt and John Nance Garner, JFK and LBJ, etc. When sectionalism was a key factor, this kind of balancing made some sense, but it was never a good idea, for it produced weak or unfit Vice Presidential candidates. LBJ was an "accidental" President who did not expect to be nominated for Vice President. Truman was another ticket balancer, and the notion that he was a great President, or even a very good one, is dissipating. His greatest accomplishment was following Churchill blindly into the cold war.

Nowadays we need in effect four Presidents—the two men best qualified for the Presidency in both parties. That would be an improvement on the worn routines, gimmicks, dodges and maneuvers of the old politics, and it might turn out to be a vital improvement in times so perilous. Without such a change, the New Politics is only the old in a new dress. Whether the change can be effected is a test of the parties, the voters and the ethos of this country, now approaching its second centennial.

Postscript to an Article

Journalism is, or should be, a cooperative, ongoing endeavor. One publication—by luck or diligence—turns up a piece of a story, which prompts some other publication to do some fresh digging, and this in turn adds a bit more to the story; over a period of time the full facts are disclosed. As a case in point, The Nation on January 22 carried an article entitled "Restaurant Workers: The Thumb in Labor's Soup" by Burton Hall, which dealt with some of the odd activities of Restaurant Workers Local 11 in New York City and of Fred Ferrara, the $500-a-week president of the union. Predictably, we received indignant protests from Mr. Ferrara and from Harold L. Luxemburg, attorney for the local, which we published (March 11) along with a rejoinder from Burton Hall. Then, on March 22, a high official of Local 11 was indicted for perjury involving suspected misuse of the union's funds.

Still more recently, The Wall Street Journal (April 12) ran a three-column story captioned: "Restaurant Union Under Fire: New York City Local Is Suspected of Ties with Mafia and Misuse of Welfare Funds," which pounced on Local 11 with still more disclosures. One or two further reports of this kind, with a little cooperation from local, state and federal officials, should make it possible for the members of Local 11 to have a union which is run by and for the rank and file.

We are, of course, pleased to have had a hand in setting this disclosure process in motion. But what concerns us about this, as about any number of similar instances, is that so often it falls to the lot of small-circulation publications, seriously handicapped by lack of staff and funds, to initiate investigations of this sort. Why is it, for example, that the New York dailies are apparently the last to learn—or the last to report—such stories?

The Reservoir

Los Angeles

Violence erupted in 125 American cities after the assassination of Martin Luther King. But Los Angeles, a city with a black population of 350,000 and racked by racial upheaval in 1965, was quiet. It did not just happen that way; it was planned, and it was planned by the community's black leadership on the night Dr. King died.

The black leaders assembled quickly. There were Christian clergymen and nonbelievers, conservative businessmen and revolutionaries, adults and youths, but they had one thing in common: they were all determined that violence was not the answer to violence.

Had the meeting that night been an event in isolation, it might not have been able to keep the tense ghetto under strict discipline. The critical period was the preceding year, during which a series of meetings had taken place among blacks of divergent views. They had discussed their differences, and they had come to the conclusion that persons and organizations of varying philosophies could work together against discrimination. They agreed that the acquisition of power through unity and sophisticated political organization could lead to revolutionary reform without such change being accompanied by bloodshed.

Moderates and militants alike among the black leadership of Los Angeles decline to predict that violence will not occur. They say that if the dominant whites fail to respond with imagination and action to the elementary needs of the minority, Los Angeles could be the 126th city in the nation's headlines. There is still time, and among the blacks there is still a reservoir of good will—strange as that may seem after Dr. King's death. But time is getting short and the reservoir is not bottomless.

EL PASO DIALOGUE

THE RHETORIC OF REVENGE

ELROY BODE

Mr. Bode, who teaches in El Paso, has contributed to the Texas Quarterly, Texas Observer, Redbook and other publications. He is the author also of Texas Sketchbook.

El Paso

On April 6—as paratroopers stood guard in Washington, Chicago streets went up in flames and the body of Martin Luther King lay in state—comedian Dick Gregory and Harry Edwards, until recently assistant professor of sociology at San Jose State College (see "San Jose: the Bullhorn Message" by James Brann, The Nation, November 6, 1967) and now completing work for his Ph.D. at Cornell, arrived at the University of Texas at El Paso for the first Black Student Conference ever held in the Southwest. One hundred and fifty black students and interested whites from universities in Texas, Arizona and New Mexico had gathered to discuss the problems of black students and to hear the two controversial Negro leaders.

The conference ended peacefully, but there seemed no doubt that, as far as Gregory and Edwards were concerned, the situation is now so bad that blacks will have to resort to revolution.

That first day of meetings depressed me. For two hours

I listened to Edwards, leader of the Negro boycott of the Olympic games, give an "off-the-cuff chat," and, if you're white, Edwards can depress you immensely. He can convince you that a way of life is passing; that communication between the races is finished—at least for the present; that the racial impasse is so great that destruction of the country's existing institutions is the only solution that militant young blacks will settle for. And yet, by making the white listener begin to despair over the prospects of a sane and peaceful future, Edwards can also make him understand what it has meant to be a Negro living in the United States for the past 300 years. He makes you squirm by letting you feel how it is to be on the receiving end of racial hate.

Here, on a single April weekend, in a rush of events, the personal struggle to overcome whatever prejudices one had inherited from one's past did not seem to matter any more. Apparently, there was no further need in race relations for persons of "good will"—either white or black. To black power leaders and followers the new logic was stunningly simple: black was right and white was wrong. Rap Brown and Stokely Carmichael had been saying it, and now Harry Edwards was saying it, and it seemed that students at the conference were ready to begin saying it. For as we walked out the door of Magoffin Auditorium after the final meeting, we were as separate as two races could be. We did not speak, and there was a cool margin of space between us as we passed in the aisles. Trust, hope, patience, reasonableness—the old virtues which used to characterize human beings as they struggled toward improvement—had suddenly gone out of style.

Thus it was Edwards, not Gregory, who finally set the tone of the conference, who, as one white listener remarked, "lambasted the white devils, yet in doing so sounded exactly like a white Southern racist talking about Negroes." Edwards came across in his talks as a very effective hater; a knowledgeable, articulate and intelligent speaker who did not mind misusing facts in order to make his points; a demagogue.

Dick Gregory, looking deceptively mild on the forty-fourth day of his fast, gave vent to bitterness and anger. Yet he seemed approachable, reasonable. "I love being a revolutionary," he said in his talk, but in stating this he gave the impression that it was revolution, and revolution only, that he wanted—a change from the present white-dominated system. In contrast, when Edwards spoke of revolution it seemed that what he was really talking about was revenge.

The conference had begun routinely enough. Alex Sutton, chairman of the United Afro-American student organization at UTEP which was co-sponsoring the conference with the student association, made the opening address. Speaking of the black student in college, Sutton made a point that was stressed throughout the conference: all black students, not just black athletes, must achieve recognition on the campus. The black athlete is no longer the hero of the blacks, he said.

While the delegates went into discussion groups, El Paso newsmen got their first look at Edwards, who had by then arrived and called a news conference in the student union building. Harvey Pendleton, the UTEP student who introduced the visitor, immediately set reporters' teeth on edge by brusquely announcing: "You will address Mr. Edwards as Professor Edwards, not by 'Harry' or any other name."

Edwards, dressed in a tan suit, black turtle-neck sweater, dark glasses and black cap, sat at the end of a long conference table and rifled out his statements. "Americans have buried their last Martin Luther King," he said. "From now on it's going to be a life for a life, a head for a head, a leader for a leader. . . . You can forget about non-violence."

He said that all minority groups in this country are victims of white "cracker" oppression and should form a united front to put the whites out. "All minority groups are fighting the same enemy."

A representative of the Mexican press asked about the Olympic games boycott. Edwards replied: "We are not interested in trying to scuttle the games; we are interested in the survival of the black race." He referred to Negro athletes who were going to the games as "Olympic niggers." He said that "every major college is a white nationalist institution; all black athletes catch hell." (Although it has been rumored that Negro athletes at UTEP are told not to date white coeds if they wish to keep their athletic scholarships, no specific charge of racial discrimination has yet been made against UTEP—the school that won the 1966 NCAA basketball championship with five starting Negro players.)

During the afternoon session of the conference, panelists spoke on Afro-American contributions to the arts. Edwards talked briefly—just long enough to set down Jesse Owens, Joe Louis and Willie Mays as being Uncle Toms and to denounce the Olympic games as a "racist political platform." (Edwards himself was a track and basketball star while an undergraduate at San Jose State.)

Ann Holder, the only white panelist, spoke on the need of young blacks in the United States to "reflect their changing society" through the dance. She felt that Anglo-Saxons have forgotten how to dance. Lucy Edwards, an El Paso lawyer, traced Negro contributions to literature; and Dr. Eugene Grigsby, professor of art at Arizona State University, told how necessary it was now for black artists to "show the black how beautiful he is."

Then Dick Gregory, who had been sitting on a stool and listening to the speakers, sidled over for his turn at the microphone and gave a masterful performance. Using his soft, rich voice like a velvet cane, he casually rapped the audience's sensibilities, conscience and funny bone as he attacked The System—the white-controlled power structure which, he said, has made blacks ("nig-gahs," in his word) scapegoats of society. "I don't hate white people, ba-by," he said; "I hate their sys-tem."

He said he hoped whites would watch the coming black revolution on their television sets. As they watch, Gregory said, they should be reading a copy of the Declaration of Independence—"the part which states that whenever a government becomes destructive of people's inalienable rights, it's the right of the people to destroy that nation."

(In fact, the preamble to the Declaration speaks of abolishing governments, which is not the same thing as destroying nations.)

Gregory pointed out the inconsistent views that white Americans take toward the matter of violence. According to the whites, Gregory said, it is all right for the United States—in the name of justice—to burn and destroy in a country 12,000 miles away; yet to these same whites it is not all right for black people—in the name of justice—to commit acts of violence here at home. “Why, ba-by, if the whites were suddenly put where the black people are now, they wouldn’t stand for it; they’d burn this country down in an hour.”

Gregory spoke of Martin Luther King: “He led a beautiful army”; and of today’s young black people: “They do not have hungry stomachs, as their parents did thirty years ago; they have hungry minds.” And he became eloquent when he asked that his visitors “please understand nature.” Drawing a parallel between forgotten, neglected black people in ghettos and “dirty, oily rags,” Gregory said that if you put these rags in a closet and went away and forgot them, one hot summer day you would get spontaneous combustion. “And it won’t matter if you stand there with a gun or put a tank outside the closet door: that closet is still going to catch on fire. Nature reacts,” he said.

The disturbing thing about Harry Edwards’ “off-the-cuff chat” Saturday night was that when he was right in evaluating men and events, he seemed absolutely right—and when he was wrong he seemed absolutely wrong. He appeared to be both brilliant and blind, and thus very much like a young Samson, capable of pulling the temple of American society down upon himself (and his people) as well as upon the white Philistines.

According to Edwards, “Lynch’em Baines Johnson is a racist devil because he once shook hands with Senator Eastland of Mississippi.” “Dishonorable Hubert H. Humphrey” is a racist devil because he once shook hands with “Ax-Handle Maddox” of Georgia. He condemned Lincoln, Washington and Jefferson as “racists.”

Yet Edwards was on solid ground whenever he described the problems and fears of black people in the United States. “Blacks have been excluded from everything meaningful in this white-structured society,” he said. “They have been forced to behave in a superhuman way—afraid or unwilling even to admit that their real feelings exist.”

However, the familiar American picture of the “laughing, patient, giggling black man scratching his head” has changed, he said, and he went on to stress that “we must make the philosophical concept of black spread around the world. . . . We have no stake in a Negro past; we must think in terms of a black future—or there will be no future for anyone.”

The message that Edwards got across to the students was that “the older generation, both black and white, is too corrupt to bring about any change. . . . There is no way to vote our way out, or march our way out, or sing our way out of this problem.” Edwards mentioned that Rap Brown is 24, Stokely Carmichael 26, and that he is

25. “The young have not yet been corrupted by the system—a system that neither has the desire or the capacity to deal with the problems of 30 million black people.”

In his closing remarks Edwards said: “Whites cannot get into the black community any more; if there are whites who want to help, they must go into their own communities now because the white folks are the trouble, not the black.” He said that black students must make readers of future history books realize that a “very frustrated, very lonely generation of black students passed this way.”

The conference ended, unexpectedly, on Saturday night instead of lasting through Sunday noon. Dr. Ted Windt, the white faculty adviser of the UTEP Afro-American group, had been scheduled to speak on “The Rhetoric of Revolutions,” but due to the hostile mood created by Edwards’ final speech he decided that in the best interests of the conference he should cancel.

It is too soon to judge what the real effects of the conference will be. At least two members of the Afro-American organization have resigned in protest against the anti-white stance taken by the group after the conference ended. On the other hand, seven black athletes—including Bob Beamon, who holds the world’s indoor record in the broad jump—issued a statement of their intention not to participate in a track meet scheduled to be held at Provo, Utah, during the Easter weekend.

And there is this to consider: Despite the despair felt by whites and the hostility shown by most blacks at the conference, nothing burned in El Paso the night after

Abu, The Tribune (London): Ben Roth

Harry Edwards and Dick Gregory spoke. Perhaps the most convincing argument that Dr. Windt, a self-styled nonviolent revolutionary, can present to UTEP officials in requesting future black student conferences is that words are better than fire. "This meeting was a microcosm reflecting the mood of the nation as a whole," says Dr. Windt. "And no matter how repugnant this kind of open display of black feeling is to white people and to the white power structure, as long as it is a genuine expression of pent-up hate and frustration, then it is desirable."

TRUDEAU OF CANADA

A MAN TO HOLD QUEBEC

C. W. GONICK

Mr. Gonick is editor of Canadian Dimension and assistant professor of economics at the University of Manitoba, Winnipeg.

Winnipeg

One hundred years after Confederation, Canada finds itself a painfully divided society. The most bitter and explosive division is racial—between the two founding peoples of modern Canada, the French and the English. The other major division, less crystallized but equally profound, involves Canada's very survival as a nation independent of the United States. These issues have erupted before in Canada's brief history, but not since the days before Confederation has the future of the country seemed so uncertain.

In this context of crisis the April leadership convention of the Liberal Party elected a new leader of the Liberal Party and a new Prime Minister of Canada—Pierre Elliot Trudeau. The election was occasioned by the resignation of Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson.

Trudeau's name will not be familiar to many Americans; indeed, a month before the election it was known to only a small minority of Canadians. This meteorlike rise to the Prime Ministership can be explained partly by Trudeau's incredible electoral appeal—he is a man of wit, intellect and culture. He possesses remarkable powers of communication. His casual, detached, dispassionate manner, his grace, gaiety and modernity offered Canadians the kind of political leadership they seem to have been yearning for through the 1960s.

But the Trudeau phenomenon can be only partly defined in terms of image and style. Norman Mailer once wrote (erringly, I believe) of John F. Kennedy: "In this time of crisis he is able to perform the indispensable psychic act of a leader; he takes our national anxieties, so long buried, and releases them to the surface where they belong." Pierre Elliot Trudeau was chosen Prime Minister of Canada because it was believed that he alone could confront the issue of national unity head-on and bring about an accommodation between the French and the English within the existing federal political structure.

The Canadian obsession with national unity and the

Dr. Windt feels that both whites and blacks need to have the courage to love. "White Americans just don't know 'how it is.' They ask, in effect, 'Why don't Negroes love us? Look at what we've done for them—all those civil rights bills we've passed.' Well, blacks cannot be expected to love us because—let's face it—we have never loved them. It's as Dick Gregory said, whites have taught blacks how to hate, and the blacks have learned their lesson well. . . . We must love them, and ask that they have the courage to love us despite—despite our own past acts of violence against them. It's our only hope."

meaning of the term in its Canadian context is not widely understood in the United States. It goes back to the time of the British conquest of New France (Canada) in 1763. The British conquerors expected that the small colony of Catholic Frenchmen would easily be absorbed into Protestant-English North America, thus losing its separate identity. That this did not occur can be attributed to the fact that the British rulers found their authority being challenged by immigrants from the United States and overseas. To defeat the liberal republican sentiments of the new arrivals, the British were forced to seek an alliance with the conservative French-Canadian elite. The price of French-Canadian support was legal recognition of the French fact in Canada, the bolstering of the Catholic Church, retention of French civil law and the old system of feudal tenure, and of course official use of the French language. Well into the 19th century, the French-Canadian community was still the largest language and cultural group in Canada. These agreements guaranteed its survival.

But with the conquest, Canada became attached to the British imperial trading system rather than to France, and the shift destroyed the French merchants of Montreal. The decline of French merchants, civil servants and soldiers meant that the predominant French population became an almost strictly rural community rooted in the past. All economic activity except agriculture was controlled by English-Canadians and foreigners. French Canada survived as a separate society by a collective withdrawal into the past and by deliberate measures to minimize external influence. Only the French-Canadian elite had any contact with English Canada and the central government in Ottawa. The bulk of the French population was concentrated in the province of Quebec, where they comprised the overwhelming majority; those brave enough to venture outside of Quebec were gradually absorbed into English-Canadian society. French Canada was ghettoized inside Quebec.

The power elite within French-Canadian society has always been the Catholic Church and the political oligarchy in Quebec City. Together they made whatever deals were necessary to maintain their own positions of influence and wealth. Quebec politicians used the French-Canadian survival mentality as a tool for retarding social and economic progress. No other group in Canada has suffered such extremes of poverty and illiteracy; no other provincial government has been so consistently corrupt and unresponsive to the needs of its constituents; no other government has cooperated so closely with business to destroy the trade union movement. In all of this the Church was a strategic ally of the state. So long as Church and state could keep Quebec in the 17th century their paternalistic, irresponsible rule was safe.

Quebec entered the 20th century after World War II. The spread of industrialization produced the inevitable exodus from the countryside. The mass media, especially television, brought the ordinary French-Canadian in contact with the outside world. The gross contradiction between the new economic base and the traditional political and cultural structure made the demands for internal change irresistible. The fascistic Union Nationale government was finally defeated in 1960, and a reform-minded Liberal government took office. It inaugurated what has become known as The Quiet Revolution.

The Quiet Revolution meant many things—the modernization of public administration, the elimination of pork-barrel politics, the introduction of new welfare programs. But above all it has meant the spread of education and the creation of a new class of young French-Canadians who believed that they now have the skills and the training to manage their own affairs. They demanded a place for themselves in industry and government. It soon became obvious that the French-Canadian sector of the economy was too narrow to absorb them; the Quiet Revolution had to become more aggressive, to move into fields long monopolized by English-speaking Canadians and foreigners.

Other currents influenced the tone of Quebec politics. With the disintegration of the old protective umbrella of rural isolationism, and with the weakening hold of the Catholic Church, there developed a closer identification between Quebec and Canada as a whole. French-Canadian survival seemed to depend more than ever on the government of Quebec. Without the massive presence of the state in everyday affairs, it was genuinely felt, French Canada would be swallowed up by the surrounding North American homogeneity.

Events outside of Canada also made an impact. French-Canadian intellectuals saw former colonies gaining their independence and taking their places in the United Nations. They wondered why Quebec too should not invoke the doctrine of self-determination and seek fuller or even complete self-government. Still imbued with many of the complexes of a conquered people, bitterly resenting the forced conscription in two World Wars and the continuing overbearing presence of les Anglais, French-Canadian nationalism took on a new order of importance.

The slogan of the Quiet Revolution became Maître Chez Nous (master of our own house) and the Quebec government program began to reflect this surge of nationalism. Quebec Hydro was nationalized. This act had some economic justification, but its popularity was more likely based on the new job opportunities it provided French-Canadians. The Quebec government withdrew from federal schemes for provincial welfare and took full local control of such projects. But the Liberal government of Quebec was not moving ahead fast enough for some tastes, and various separatist groupings popped up, one of them terrorist. Due largely to its own arrogance, the Liberal government was defeated in 1966 and replaced by the Union Nationale. Further social progress came to a standstill, but the Union Nationale government, like its predecessor, demanded more and more fiscal authority and the right to move into areas long monopolized by the central government. The Quebec government is asking for a special status for Quebec. Insisting that Quebec is not a province like all the others but the homeland of the French-Canadian nation, the Union Nationale and with it the Quebec Liberal Party and the major journals of opinion, demand jurisdictions for Quebec that are not allowed other provinces.

These demands are generally unacceptable to English-Canadians. The existence of a distinct French-Canadian society comprising 30 per cent of the total population is simply not recognized outside of Quebec. Most English-Canadians regard French-Canadians as just one of many ethnic groups, like the Ukrainians, Germans and Italians, and do not see why French-Canadians should be treated differently from these other minorities. Neither do they see why Quebec should be granted powers not available to other provincial governments. The novelist Hugh MacLennan once described French and English Canada as two solitudes. French-Canadians may regard Quebec City, not Ottawa, as their national capital; they do not understand and they resent English Canada but they are very well aware of its existence; it is all too present in their everyday affairs. But for English-Canadians there is only one Canada, one nation, one national government. They are not aware of French Canada as a distinct nation; they will not recognize it and they insist that it is some kind of hoax being perpetuated by power-hungry politicians. Until the terror bombings in the early 1960s, Quebec was regarded by English-Canadians, if at all, as their own native museum.

The now infamous Vive Québec Libre speech of Charles de Gaulle focused international attention on Quebec's struggle for autonomy. But the most decisive event of recent months occurred when René Levesque, one of the chief architects of the Quiet Revolution, left the Quebec Liberal Party and began organizing his own sovereignty movement. Levesque became convinced that English Canada was not going to give a special status to Quebec; or alternatively, that by the time a special status for Quebec had evolved, French Canada would have disappeared.

Until Levesque's defection, the separatist movement lacked credibility, but Levesque is unquestionably the single most popular political figure in Quebec. Over the years, as journalist, broadcaster and politician he has been the champion of the working class. It was Levesque who led the opposition against Maurice Duplessis and his Union Nationale government; in office, it was Levesque who pushed through the nationalization of Quebec Hydro, who won for public employees the right to strike, and it was Levesque who led the campaign to sweep out the graft in provincial politics.

If anyone can sell separatism it is Levesque. Only a few months have passed since the inception of his organization. But he has already surpassed all of his rivals and has absorbed most of them. It will not be easy for Levesque to persuade the Quebecois to follow him; colonial attitudes run deep, and traditional French-Canadian timidity will not predispose these people to radical solutions. Aside from his own popularity, however, Levesque does have some political advantages. Unlike the other separatist leaders, he appeals to reason as well as to emotion. His solution is not couched in the language of separatism, a word that still scares most French-Canadians. French-Canadians are nationalists but most of them are afraid of the economic effect of isolation. Levesque avoids the use of the term "separatism" and talks instead of "sovereignty" and creating a common market with English Canada. He insists that, however much English Canada would oppose "a sovereign Quebec," it would not be in its economic interests to reject a common-market arrangement.

With Levesque and his cohorts out of the Quebec Liberal Party, that party has already turned to the Right. There is today no party of the Left in Quebec politics, an opening which Levesque expects to fill. His party will be one of social reform as well as of sovereignty and the vast poverty of Quebec should no doubt add to his electoral appeal. Levesque is desperately trying to avoid the label of a Quebec Fidel Castro. He knows that an aroused United States would only jeopardize his chances of winning electoral office. This explains his moderate tones in interviews on American TV and in American magazines. He is quiet about Vietnam and eager to point out that American property rights in Quebec would be guaranteed. (When I suggested that this sounded very much like a banana republic, he was understandably irate.)

Levesque expects 25 per cent of the electorate to vote for him in the next provincial election, and within five years he expects a solid majority. A referendum on Quebec independence would then follow. Levesque's obvious impact among the Quebecois has pushed the provincial premier (Daniel Johnson) further and further in the demands he is making of Ottawa.

It is no coincidence that at this precise moment Pierre Elliot Trudeau was approached to run as a candidate for the Prime Ministership of Canada. Trudeau had joined the Liberal Party only in 1965. He ran for Parliament (interestingly enough in a posh English-speaking Montreal constituency) and within months was elevated to the post of Minister of Justice.

Trudeau is a 47-year-old bachelor, son of a wealthy Montreal oil merchant. Until the age of 30, he was a roaming student and world-wide adventurer, known as much for his pranks and athletic exploits (he is an accomplished skier, boxer, high diver, swimmer, canoeist) as for his intellect. Trudeau returned to Canada in 1950 and founded the magazine Cité Libre. Its circulation was scarcely more than 1,000 copies a month, but it had a profound influence on Quebec intellectuals in their battle against the Union Nationale regime of Maurice Duplessis. In the 1960s Trudeau taught constitutional law at the University of Montreal.

Trudeau was among those Canadians who actively worked against Canada's acceptance of American nuclear weapons. In 1963 he wrote for Cité Libre a brilliantly cutting article condemning Mr. Pearson and the Liberal Party (then in opposition) for revising their position on this issue. The article noted that the U. S. State Department had decided that Prime Minister Diefenbaker had to go; he had defied the United States once too often. He was selling wheat to China and dealing with Cuba. During the Cuban missile crisis he had had the gall to wait three days before placing Canadian squadrons on the alert. He was blatantly hostile to Washington, if only in speech and in token actions. To quote Mr. Trudeau:

The circumstances were such that the blow had to come from the Pentagon and that Mr. Pearson had to betray the programme of his party, as well as the principles with which he had consistently identified himself.

The bagmen promised that funds would be forthcoming.

The polls showed that a pro-nuclear party would not lose votes.

Power beckoned to Mr. Pearson.

He had nothing to lose but honor.

He lost it.

His whole party lost it, too.

Two years later, Trudeau had joined this "spineless Liberal herd," as he had then described them. Could it then be said of him, as he said of them: "There is not one single man remaining in the Party for whom principle means more than power"? Perhaps; but there is another, more generous explanation.

By 1965 it had become clear that French-Canadian political leaders and intellectuals were not content with liberal democracy, not satisfied with making Quebec a province like all the others. In 1962 an election had occurred in which Maitre Chez Nous was the only slogan of importance. In 1963 the Liberation Front of Quebec mounted a reign of terror in Montreal. Daniel Johnson was soon calling for "the alliance of two communities with equal rights to self-determination." The Liberal premier, Jean Lesage, declared that "Canada was in its hour of decision," and René Levesque that "there must be a new Canada within five years or Quebec will quit Confederation."

Pierre Elliot Trudeau was alarmed by this nationalist aggressiveness. He condemns all nationalisms as reactionary. Above all else, he is a man who believes in balance. In the 1950s he fought against the authoritarianism of Duplessis. What was important was not so much the direction of reform, but democracy per se. At the same time, he supported provincial autonomy against the inroads of the federal government in education and welfare, matters reserved by the Canadian Constitution for the provincial authorities. "In 1965," he said in his first post-victory press conference, "we decided to exert pressure at the opposite end of the scale—we believed that Quebec nationalism had led to all sorts of excesses, notably separatism."

Trudeau believes fervently in a federalist political structure. He has argued that it permits Quebec to do all that is necessary to preserve French-Canadian culture in North America. It already gives the provinces jurisdiction over education, social and labor legislation, property and civil rights, the administration of justice and natural resources. "Special status" for Quebec or a "sovereign" Quebec may be to the advantage of certain privileged groups, Trudeau has argued, but it would have a disastrous effect on the standard of living of the working people, would condemn the French-Canadians outside Quebec to complete cultural absorption, and would ossify the French language and culture in Quebec.

It was for this reason that he joined the Liberal Party, despite his previous criticisms. He was always the ideological dilettante, and his career has shown him to be much more the political pragmatist than the radical. It was with great ease, therefore, that he could give up his flirtation with socialism. Federalism was in danger, and as he himself has written: "In spite of everything it [the Liberal Party] advocated an open federal system, and that was what attracted me to it."

To preserve the federal system, Trudeau understands what he must do. He must persuade French-Canadians that Canada is their homeland, Ottawa their capital. Whether his program can succeed is another matter. It focuses upon linguistic rights of French-Canadians outside Quebec—offering them public school instruction in the French language and bilingualizing the public offices and legislatures in Ottawa and the provinces. These linguistic rights, he hopes, will make it possible for French-Canadians to participate in Canada as French Canadians, regardless of where they live.

Even if English Canada can be persuaded to offer these concessions, however, the viability of French Canada outside Quebec is open to question. It seems highly unlikely that a minority culture and language can survive within small enclaves. Unless it becomes thoroughly embedded in the general environment so that French is spoken by everyone, there will be little incentive for families of French-Canadian descent to maintain their cultural and linguistic ties. To the contrary, the incentives to become fully absorbed in the majority culture will remain overwhelming.

One other drawback to Trudeau's campaign is that he is almost unknown in Quebec. As Prime Minister, he will be in a good position to promote himself and his ideas, but he will need help. As of now he has no organizational base in Quebec; even the Quebec Liberal Party opposes his program. He will either have to work over the heads of the provincial party or engineer an internal revolt.

Ultimately, the social conflict will boil down to a struggle between Trudeau and René Levesque. Trudeau was chosen Prime Minister because it was felt that he alone could and would confront Quebec, call its bluff and force French-Canadian nationalists to withdraw. The odds that he will succeed are not particularly good.

Aside from efforts to maintain the federal political structure, what will a Trudeau government do? Any

Jones, The Telegram (Toronto): Ben Roth

Pierre Elliot Trudeau

Prime Minister who is leader of the Liberal Party operates under severe restraints. The Liberal Party attracts a wide spectrum of the popular vote, but it is the party of big business. In fact, Trudeau would never have been elected leader had he not received support from certain key establishment figures within the party. Such support was necessary, however, to counter Trudeau's radical and unconventional image, not his views. If anything, Trudeau's politics can be described as conservative. He has announced that the recently passed medicare program will be the last universal welfare scheme; that he would place a means test on all future welfare programs; that what is supremely important is increasing per capita income; that he rejects the massive Carter report on taxation which calls for a capital gains tax, the removal of depletion allowances and various other tax privileges now enjoyed by special interest groups. Only in the area of civil liberties—divorce and abortion laws and the like—can Trudeau be called a liberal.

To those on the Canadian Left, what is most disturbing about Trudeau are his views on Canada's relationship to the United States. Of all the candidates for the leadership, and there were some that had always enjoyed close business associations with giant American corporations, Trudeau was the one most eager for a closer, economic, political and military relationship with the United States. He has said that it is his intention to pull Canadian troops out of NATO and concentrate Canadian military spending on a continent-wide system of defense with the United States. This would probably mean Canadian participation in the anti-ballistic-missile system. He has said almost nothing about Vietnam and repudiates any policy that would stop the flow of arms from Canada to the United States for use in Southeast Asia. He repeatedly emphasizes Canada's dependence on the United States, which leads him to conclude that Canada must do nothing to antagonize its neighbor.

Trudeau specifically rejects economic nationalism. He has refused to endorse the Watkins report on foreign ownership, an important study commissioned by the government one year ago. The Watkins report called attention to some of the enormous costs of foreign ownership and especially to its infringements on Canadian political sovereignty. It advocates a minimum legislative program whose purpose is not to reduce foreign ownership but to better insure that it serves Canadian national interests. Like every other candidate in the leadership role, Trudeau insisted that American subsidiaries must act as good corporate citizens of Canada, and along with the others, he refused to discuss how this was to come about. At best, he may agree with the Watkins report recommendation that foreign subsidiaries should supply more information about their operations.

The new Prime Minister's accommodating attitude to the United States is entirely consistent with his views on federalism. In the Canadian context federalism has meant strong provincial governments and a weak central government. Trudeau favors this arrangement and is convinced that even greater provincial autonomy will naturally evolve. While federalist structures may have their attractions, they can hardly be said to provide a political instrument that can deal effectively with foreign economic and political domination. A strong central government, on the other hand, is incompatible with Quebec's demands for greater autonomy—unless Quebec is granted special status or becomes an associate state. The latter arrangement would permit two strong central governments, one in Ottawa and one in Quebec City. Trudeau will have none of this. Fortunately for him, the problem of American economic and political domination is not uppermost in his mind.

It is hard to summarize the Trudeau phenomenon. I can do no better than to quote the dean of Canadian political science, Prof. Paul Fox:

There is nothing more attractive to a Liberal—in fact, to all Canadians—than to be titillated into voting for a radical when deep down they are comforted by the assurance that he is a conservative. It is Canada's answer to the dilemma of democratic politics.

HUBERT HUMPHREY

SPEAKING IN TONGUES

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Washington

On May 22, 1965, at the very hour when President Johnson was meeting with military advisers in the White House to discuss the merits of blockading the coast of South Vietnam, Hubert Horatio Humphrey was in New York City being inducted as a full-scale, bona fide member of the Girl Scouts. At the conclusion of that ceremony he rubbed his hands together and exclaimed, "Well, gee! I'm just delighted. Just wait until I get back to Washington and tell the President about this!"

To many liberals who would like to think that Humphrey is a different kind of political creature from Lyndon Baines Johnson, the booted and spurred wheeler-dealer, such episodes are treasured like pressed flower petals between the pages of their Book of the Hours. This, they say, is the great old Hubert they once knew and relied on. A changed man now, they lament, "a hatchet man," as The Progressive magazine put it; "the betrayer of the liberal movement," in the indignant words of Alfred Kazin and Irving Howe. But wiser men, or wlier men, know better. "What nonsense it is," said UN Ambassador Arthur Goldberg, "to suggest that my old friend Hubert Humphrey has changed."

He has not changed at all, and he is deceptively plain. He lives in his own elm-lined, homogenized world. His idea of attaining dignity was illustrated a month after he became Vice President when he gave a fraternity house the nickle-plated nickelodeon that had been part of his household furniture. His mastery of that most typically American humor, the self-deprecating wisecrack (Friend: "Hey, Hubert, you're becoming a myth!" Humphrey: "Yeah, ■ myth-fit"), has increased under the adversity of office. "Daniel Webster [he likes to say] refused this high honor, saying, 'I do not propose to be buried until I'm really dead and in a coffin.' But not Hubert Humphrey."

Humphrey has always been ■ jolly, decent sort of fellow; he has always stood for a reasonably fixed code of fair play (although he has broken that code at several important junctions in his life, occasions which won him wide acknowledgment as a "practical" politician). It pains him to see anybody hungry or homeless, and he hopes that someday the government can do something to relieve such destitution—after it has first beaten back communism around the world. He laments the fact that Negroes are killed or otherwise mistreated, but he thinks the government has gone about as far as it should go in legislating civil rights. He believes that sanity lies in disarmament, but only from a "position of strength." In short, Hubert Humphrey is a good, an authentic American.

In some of his responses to life, he is soft and pliable almost to the point of womanliness, and some of his remarks seem to indicate that he sees himself in this way. "I'm Lyndon Johnson's Eleanor Roosevelt," he once said to delegates of an American Newspaper Guild convention. "She used to get out and see and tell her great husband what was going on in the country. That's what I do for the President." On several other occasions he has likened the President-Vice President relationship to a "marriage with no divorce" and himself to the "wife." During the period when Johnson was going through the rigmarole of "looking" for a running mate in 1964, he frequently consulted with Humphrey, who recalls it in these romantic terms: "He discussed every move and thought with me as if nothing could interest me less personally. It's like a guy calling the girl next door—who he knows is madly in love with him—to ask the phone number of the newest broad in town."

Johnson once said of Humphrey that "he gets a lot of emotion into his work. . . . Hubert can cry pretty good over something." Indeed he can. He weeps easily. His close friends, who would prefer that he not be under the domination of Lyndon Johnson, insist that he cries more commonly these days than ever, one friend explaining "he's being torn apart." But tears have always been readily available, for both unimportant and tragic occasions, and for little disappointments and peeves. He wept in 1956 when he was by-passed for the Vice Presidential nomination by the Democratic National Convention. He wept at his campaign headquarters on the night in 1960 when it was clear that John F. Kennedy had just drubbed him in the West Virginia primary. On a recent tour of Asia, he became so overwrought while touring a hospital where GIs from Vietnam were being treated that the reporters were asked not to follow him. Shortly after returning from a tour of Europe, he spoke to a group of Jewish women in Atlanta, and in the midst of his speech he announced, "My heart is just broken because the press shows Europe the wrong side of this country." And he began to weep. Tears come just as fast, however, for no reason other than that the day has been exhausting. It is not rare for him to end a difficult newspaper interview with sobs.

While this softer side of Humphrey appeals to many people, it irritates others because it contrasts sharply with certain policies he supports, such as the war in Vietnam. Alfred Kazin very likely had the tearful Humphrey in mind when he angrily accused him of engaging in militant behavior "to prove your masculinity."

The weeping hawk also offends an old friend like Murray Kempton, to whom the Vice President is now not only beyond mercy but also beneath contempt as a political antagonist:

It is cruel and inhuman to picket Hubert Humphrey, to get up and leave the room when he rises to speak, to slip, as two young people did, into a hotel to cry "murderer" at him. It is even cruel and inhuman to comment upon him with polite detachment. For the Vice President of the United States bleeds from the smallest pebble shied his way by the feeblest wrist. An admonitory pat can break a bone.

While it is easy to feel disgust for Humphrey, it is difficult to be angry with him. After a political party meeting in Minneapolis, at which Humphrey presided, Ben Du-Bois, who used to be national secretary of the Independent Bankers Association, went to Humphrey and said: "You conducted yourself very undemocratically and terribly at this meeting. Furthermore, Hubert, you talk too goddamn much." Hubert shook his hand, gripped him on the shoulder and said, "Ben, you're absolutely right." Humphrey's long-time political foe, former Minnesota Governor Elmer Benson, said he once criticized Humphrey harshly in public, "and after the meeting he came over and shook hands with me and said: 'Elmer, I want to thank you very much for calling my attention to it.' That's his style—the guy is fantastic. How can you argue with a man who agrees with you?"

In 1929, just before the market crash, Humphrey's father took him from their home in Doland, S. Dak., to the University of Minnesota for his first abortive try at a college education, and let him out of the Model A with the advice: "Good-bye. Good luck. Grow up." In a sometimes appealing way, Humphrey never did. He is still the friendly fat kid on the block. The time-honored test of politicians, brought to a climax in the career of Richard Nixon ("Would you buy a used car from this man?"), is passed easily by Humphrey. And if the next morning your HHH used car refused to start, Hubert would cheerfully drive across town to give you a shove, and he would do it in such swell style that instead of fussing about being cheated you would drive off saying nice things about the neighborliness of that pudgy huckster.

In his four years as Mayor of Minneapolis Humphrey made 4,000 speeches, or an average of nearly three a day, counting Sundays. During his fifteen years in the Senate he introduced nearly 1,500 bills and resolutions—a fantastic total for any man. He babbles and exhorts and overextends himself and demeans himself to make even ■ most simple point. Rather proudly, Humphrey admits that he talks too much, and he puts it down to “glands,” but one may be tempted to attribute it instead to a hangover from the old days when he was ■ know-it-all kid entertaining the yokels in his dad’s drug stores in Doland and Huron, S. Dak., and later in haranguing the Minneapolis Jaycees. Glib, arrogant, everlastingly front and center, Humphrey at first repelled and offended Washington (“I had looked forward to meeting Humphrey,” one White House official recalls of those early days, “but my first impression of him was terrible. He was all blather. He bragged endlessly about being Mayor. He acted like he had come to Washington to take over”), and to Humphrey’s credit, he knew it. Until he crusted over this side of his character and began to be accepted, he was miserable. But the crust has for several years now been wearing rather thin.

When he first came to Washington Humphrey was described by one writer as “too cocky, too slick, too shallow, too ambitious, a brain-picker rather than a scholar, clever without being wise.” He improved with age; he is no longer too cocky or too slick. He is more of a brain-picker than ever, but what politician in Washington isn’t? As for his shallowness, this is a treacherous measure of any man, and especially is it a treacherous measure of Humphrey. He is shallow, in that he spreads himself too thin, over too many topics. But all these thin layers are laminated into a rather imposing depth. In a typical week during his Senate career, Humphrey took the floor to discuss—among many other topics—the migratory bird-hunting stamp, the armed forces chess tourney, dairy reports, disaster loans, disarmament, domestic economy, price supports, consumer problems, trade development, antitrust laws, the public debt, the North African policy, the trickery of Richard Nixon, the stupidity of Harold Stassen, passports, French politics, international civil aviation, Lithuanian independence, captive nations, the wildflowers of the Northwest, and the need for more office space. He can talk with journeyman information on just about any topic of importance now before Washington, and this has been true during most of the past two decades. His memory does it. It is a vacuum file cabinet. When he was in pharmacy school, before going to work in his father’s drug store during the depression, he learned by heart all the drugs, all their Latin names, all the prescribed dosages listed in the druggists’ Pharmacopaeia. It was a feat comparable to memorizing all the words and definitions in an abridged dictionary.

Twenty years ago one of his aides was quoted as saying of him: “The trouble with Humphrey is he never takes time out. He’s never alone with himself. If the guy would only sit down with himself and say, ‘What am I all about?’ But he’s afraid to ask himself that question.” He still is.

Not even the men who know Humphrey best can agree on his depth or on his endurance. Even from those who praise him for his broad grasp of topics one often detects a questioning note. Sen. J. William Fulbright, who sat with Humphrey for years on the Foreign Relations Committee and was in his social group, draws back cautiously a moment after beginning his praise:

Hubert could talk on any subject at any length. He had sympathy for everybody. He was interested in everything—and everything equally. He was fun to have around. He was friendly as a pup. Everybody in the Senate tried to accommodate him—if it was convenient. [Here Fulbright paused reflectively.] I don’t remember his being terribly effective. I don’t remember his name being associated with anything much, unless perhaps it was civil rights. [How about disarmament?] Oh, he was interested in that for ■ while, but then he seemed to drop it.

The seas of his Senatorial rhetoric were often so choppy that it was hard to take a sounding. Emphasizing evangelism over logic, his speeches in the Senate were regularly larded with references to the “spirit of the Lord” and “a heavenly reward” and scriptural quotes. After he ascended to the Vice Presidency his speech writers usually forced him to restrain himself from neo-fundamentalisms. Not for him are the agricultural intellectualisms of ■ Henry Wallace. “The ever-normal granary” and such concepts are for hayseed philosophers, not for Humphrey; he copes with food and farm problems, as he does with most problems, on a tearful, emotional level. The foreign aid-supported wheat program he has touted since coming to Washington has brought millions of dollars to his region, but he has seldom talked about it in those terms. Usually, in his holiness style, he has approached it as a chance for a greedy America to repent of its sins and feed the starvin’ heathen. “I say we are immoral!” (This is from one of his early speeches, January 5, 1950, but the tone was constant throughout most of his Senate career.) “We are almost anti-Christian! We ought to get down on our knees and pray to God to forgive us for our sins, for here on the Eastern coast of our land are Liberty ships, 10,000-ton freighters, loaded with wheat which the Commodity Credit Corporation has purchased, and the wheat is rotting. The wheat is stored up, and here are people in India dying of hunger, with the Communists on top of them, with their government almost tottering. And what are we doing? . . .” Etc. Later he admitted he might have been wrong about the wheat rotting—but he felt that that was a liberty not to be held against a good sermon—and he did not retract his judgment of our sins, as in fact he was right in not doing. The appeals to send U.S. farm surpluses to India and Pakistan were the first step toward the Food for Peace program, which today accounts for half of all nonmilitary foreign aid.

And yet, here again, there is no stability to Humphrey’s view. Very often stressing that hunger breeds communism, he will nevertheless agree with people who hold just the opposite. On June 6, 1956, he was touting in the Senate

"...NOW, CHIEF...?"

Ivey: Ben Roth

an article co-authored by Walter Rostow (then with M.I.T., now chief hawk in Lyndon Johnson's birdhouse) which took the position that it is a "serious misconception" that "revolt and protest are the result of hunger and poverty, and that relieving hunger and reducing poverty will therefore reduce revolutionary pressure."

On the point of his changeability, no one can speak with more knowledge (and with more tolerance) than Sen. Joseph Clark of Pennsylvania, the charming, urbane cynic who looked upon Humphrey as "a kind of father confessor" from the day Clark entered the Senate in 1956 until Humphrey left it in 1964. Sometimes it seems that just about every politician in Washington likes ol' Hubert, but few of them are his intimate friends; Clark is among the few. Thinking back to their days together in the Senate, Clark has had this to say:

Hubert was very good, you know—and I say this not in a critical sense—Hubert's been very good about riding two or three horses at once. He was able to keep his ins with Lyndon and even some Southerners without, to my way of thinking, sacrificing his inherent liberalism or infringing in any way on my loyalty to him. Paul [Douglas] was a little suspicious of Hubert—Paul's a real Calvinist, and he felt (I didn't) that Hubert was trying too much to be all things to all people. Hubert was the leader [of the liberal coterie]. He was the guy we had to look to. He was the Whip. Sure, he was riding two or three horses, but we knew it. I realize that it's easy enough to take Hubert apart, but when you compare him to the present Whip he looks pretty good. Now, because he touches bases in a lot of places where the rest of us couldn't touch base, I think he had a pretty realistic appraisal of the art of the possible. . . .

Clark recalled that a month or two before the Democratic convention in 1964 he had a "long heart-to-heart talk with him. We were riding down from the capitol to the White House in a taxicab, and I let him have it good and hard. I said, 'I just don't think you ought to do it. You'll get yourself in a bind where you can't be yourself. Your future is in the Senate, and from the Senate possibly to the Presidency. God knows you know how I love you, but I think if you take the Vice Presidency you're just going to become a prisoner.' And he said, 'Joe, I don't care anything about being Vice President.' I believed him at the time, but of course it wasn't true. He was dying to get it." (How gullible can friends be? Everyone in Washington—except Clark, apparently—knew he was sweating to get the nomination.)

When asked if he thought the things Humphrey was saying as Vice President reflect his inner feelings, Clark responded:

"No. Maybe he's kidding himself. He has a pretty good capacity for self-delusion, self-deception. We all do. Hubert more than most."

Why would Humphrey tell him, a close friend, that he had no desire for the Vice Presidency when he obviously did covet it?

"When he was talking to me he didn't want it. When he was talking to Lyndon, he sure as hell did. Kinda like a chameleon—sometimes green, sometimes brown."

Isn't that a disastrous thing to say about a friend?

"Depends on whether you're a Calvinist or not," said Clark, smiling. "I don't know—guess I'm a little more tolerant. I'd even kid him about it. He'd just laugh. And say, 'Oh, Joe.'"

The Senate is an "oh, Joe" place. But outside the Senate many—accustomed to a different ethic and a different criterion for what is possible and perhaps even accustomed to different synonyms for friendly chameleons—are more critical of Humphrey.

In the 1966 gubernatorial campaign in Minnesota, Humphrey returned to his home grounds to help the Democratic-Farmer-Labor candidate. He went on a hedge-hopping air trip with A. M. Keith, and wherever they stopped a local dignitary would come aboard and Humphrey would welcome him and ask about his family, and at some point in the conversation Humphrey would ask him what church he belonged to. If he said, "I'm a Methodist," Humphrey would smile joyfully and say, "I'm a Methodist, too." If at the next stop the reply was "Episcopalian," then Humphrey (who is a Congregationalist) would respond, "Well, that's what I am. Glad to meet another!" He told Baptists he was a Baptist, Lutherans he was a Lutheran, etc. Keith finally took Humphrey aside and said: "Gosh, Hubert, you're going to get caught up on this. You can't tell everybody you belong to their church." Humphrey seemed to be actually puzzled. "Why not?" he asked, "I'm a Christian."

He has spent his mature life proving that he believes that the faith of a politician, like that of a Christian, covers almost all splinter concepts. He wobbles in so many directions that he has been called an opportunist. For this he has a fast answer: "What's wrong with taking advantage of the opportunities?"

Humphrey's sail has always been set to catch the slightest change in the wind. At the 1944 Democratic National Convention he was a rabid booster of Henry Wallace as Vice Presidential candidate. The Washington Post gave this picture: "Few who watched the Democratic convention closely will ever forget the sight of Humphrey and Barney Allen, a Red River Valley farmer, their clothes half torn off their backs and their voices gone, racing through the Chicago stadium carrying an American flag and a Wallace banner, begging and pleading with the delegates to support their man." Wallace's outlook changed very little in the next few years, but the policy of the United States became much sterner toward communism, and therefore by 1946 it was prudent for a politically ambitious young man, which Humphrey certainly was, to shed some of his old friendships and alliances. Humphrey dumped Wallace, calling him "totally irresponsible," and by 1948 was denouncing him as ■ fellow traveler.

Those who admire Humphrey as an opportunist will often praise him in disastrously friendly ways, as did columnist George Sokolsky in 1956 when he wrote, to defend Humphrey against the "radical" designation: "He is an educated man who apparently finds it possible to compromise with his knowledge and training for political advantage."

He will talk for just about any group on just about any topic, and most of his speeches support the description Johnson gave of him as "a man who prepares for a solid, thought-provoking speech by taking a deep breath." His windiness has created an encyclopedia of apocryphal tales very easy to believe; like the time a group of volunteer advisers met with him, only to be drowned in a ninety-minute monologue, so they picked up their hats, said it was obvious he didn't think he needed any advice, and quit. He has an endless catalogue of shibboleths and personal clichés, and his comments on any of the code topics are totally predictable. If he is to address a farm group, for example, he will inevitably tell of how he and his father used to vaccinate hogs during the depression. But questions relating to immediate problems, such as parity, he dodges. As a campaign orator Humphrey not only avoids even a momentary hard position, much less a permanently precise position, on any major issue; he also defends his wishy-washiness with the argument that to be forthright "would be to prove that I'm totally incompetent to handle the job." For this kind of attitude, he has been praised by Republican leader Everett Dirksen as "the professional's professional . . . the modern liberal."

The complexities of Humphrey's ethics were never more accurately muddled than in his statement to an AFL convention in Cincinnati in 1948: "Not one labor leader has asked me to sell my soul for anything I don't believe in."

The subsequent years have proved in a startling way, however, the ease with which Humphrey believes in things—as in his wavering on civil rights, and the shifting of his sympathies between labor and management as his ambitions mounted. Nothing has made his beliefs so ephemeral as the Vice Presidency. In June, 1964, Humphrey, a close student of Latin American affairs, publicly upbraided Assistant Secretary of State Thomas A. Mann for his hard line. Speaking sympathetically of Latin efforts to throw off dictatorships, Humphrey scolded Mann and other officials in this country who might be "tempted to return to less venturesome, more conventional goals, to place less emphasis on reform and more on working with the established groups to minimize political instability." Humphrey cast his sympathies with reform rather than with stability, and he warned that "We may not be able to prevent the emergence of juntas, but we can and should distinguish between dictators and democrats."

Almost exactly one year later Humphrey was privately defending Mann's hard line in support of the right wing in the Dominican Republic; and in arguments with his old friends in Americans for Democratic Action he was insisting that we had no choice but to send Marines in to establish a military dictatorship and oust the liberals.

Between the two positions, of course, Humphrey had been sworn in as Vice President.

While Humphrey has sometimes been caught lying, he has generally avoided falling into the credibility gap; his serious problem is the intelligibility gap. He says so many conflicting things, or he says the same thing in so many conflicting ways, that frequently he simply does not make sense. In 1967, for example, after visiting Japanese Premier Sato in Tokyo, Humphrey later said he hadn't mentioned the Okinawa question in their conversation. Sato, on the other hand, remembered clearly that Humphrey had told him President Johnson would be willing to discuss the future status of Okinawa. On another topic, Humphrey said he told Sato that Japan should "assume more political and economic responsibility in Asia; but Sato recalled no such admonition. Very likely neither was lying; Sato was merely a victim of the Humphrey silly-putty pronouncements that cannot hold a shape.

Sato's mistake was that, whatever he thought he heard Humphrey say or not say, he took it seriously. U.S. newsmen have learned that this is, if not dangerous, at least a waste of time. Not long ago, for instance, Humphrey announced, "I haven't met a hawk in the government." Since the statement was so obviously inaccurate, no responsible member of the Washington press corps tried to decipher what he meant, nor did they feel they were being misled. It was just Humphrey worshiping existence with his tongue; it was a kind of holiness seizure as the spirit took possession of him and his lips and tongue began to move; it was pure glossolalia. And it is nothing new. Speaking to a group of foreign students eleven years ago, Humphrey ignored Franklin Roosevelt's Good Neighbor Policy and his various European treaties; ignored Woodrow Wilson's Latin American policy expressed in the invasions of Santo Domingo and Haiti and his invasion of Vera Cruz and northern Mexico, not to mention his World War I and postwar negotiations with the European powers; ignored also Theodore Roosevelt's stomping about in Asia, advocating either an Open Door or a Busted Door policy, and in the Caribbean. In short, Humphrey discarded all U.S. diplomacy and world-power maneuvering of the past to tell these students: "We have only had since 1945 to put together a foreign policy. Other countries have had centuries. But until World War II we had no world responsibilities."

Humphrey's concept of international dealings is, to say the least, stunning. Addressing the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce in 1966, Humphrey explained: "Foreign policy is really domestic policy with its hat on." Or to a union convention in Washington in 1966: "Vietnam today is as close to the United States as London was in 1940."

He easily slips his moorings and becomes that most dangerous object, an unlighted hulk. His ways are dark and uncharted, especially in foreign affairs, about which he cares most and knows least. Jack Richardson captured perfectly this wandering side of Humphrey in an interview he recounted in Esquire:

The first direct question I asked then was the possibility of a UN role in Vietnam and, as if in wonder himself, he answered that UN officials, after just tidying up their organization's financial condition, were not anxious to become directly embroiled in a war.

"And also," he went on, "that would put Russia on the spot officially. Now that wouldn't be good for anyone."

I wondered aloud that this was an odd position for the UN to take, since the purpose of its founding had been precisely that there should be in the world a mediating agency to such international troubles. Humphrey looked away at this and with some sadness—perhaps for the simplicity of my remark—murmured, "That's true," and somehow shifted the subject to the safety standards of American automobiles.

Safe worlds, safe cars—as Fulbright noticed, he is interested in everything equally, and so he sees nothing wrong in wandering back and forth across all borders in the same conversation, almost in the same breath, although that is not to say in the same thought.

When Humphrey was in South Korea in 1966 as the President's envoy he told officials in that country: "As long as there is one American soldier on the line of the border, the demarcation line, the whole and the entire power of the United States of America is committed to the security and defense of Korea. Korea today is as strong as the United States and Korea put together. America today is as strong as the United States and Korea put together." Even as diplomatic hyperbole, it was pretty hard to swallow; as a statement for practical application, it would have to be described as just short of crackpot. It fits into the pattern that was best demonstrated within one ten-day period in December, 1967, when he changed from hard line, "Wherever freedom is threatened in the world," to soft line, "We have no interest in becoming policeman to the world," to hard line, "Let those who think we are insincere in our position in Vietnam think twice before acting on that mistake," to soft line, "We seek only to permit self-determination, and if that means Communist rule, that is something we can accept."

Both the saving feature and the disaster of such remarks stem from the same point: five minutes after he has made them Humphrey could probably not remember what he had said. A couple of years ago Saul Pett, the Associated Press writer, had a long talk with the Vice President, during which Pett asked if he intended to try for the Presidency in 1972. Humphrey's eyes filled with tears, Pett recounted, as he got to his feet and grandly proclaimed: "It is entirely possible and probable that Hubert Humphrey [he likes to refer to himself in the third person] may not want to be President despite what some people think. But one thing I know. I want to be sure that my granddaughter will be able to read in her history books that" . . . etc., etc. By the time he had finished his oration tears were all over the place and he was shading his eyes. Pett, somewhat taken aback by this explosion of emotion, spoke to one of Humphrey's closest friends about it the next day. The friend said it wasn't uncommon. Pett asked if Humphrey had meant what he said about not wanting to be President, and the Humphreyphile replied: "I don't doubt at all that Hubert meant and felt what he said as of the moment. But I wouldn't count on it."

It is not irresponsibility or hypocrisy. Humphrey is a very responsible and an intensely sincere guy. He just happens to be unstable. He wishes everyone so much good that he is quite capable of promising everything to everyone, and as a consequence one side gets misled and hurt. It is lying in a way, but it is Humphrey's way, so it is not quite lying.

UNDERGROUND PRESS

GROWING RICH ON THE HIPPIE

THOMAS PEPPER

Mr. Pepper, a former reporter on the Winston-Salem Journal, is now studying Japanese at Columbia University, on a Carnegie Corporation grant.

The underground press has come of age. It is no longer underground and it isn't much of a press, but it does have fanfare—lots of it. In issue after issue in different cities around the country, underground editors proclaim that what they represent is the wave of the future, and that the future will be significantly better because of what they represent. As Allan Katzman, an editor of New York's East Village Other, told a correspondent for the ("establishment") San Francisco Chronicle, "America now finds itself split into two camps, two life cycles. A cultural evolution is taking place that will sweep the grey-haired masters into the garbage heap. Wisdom and time are on the side of youth." In similar vein, when Open City of Los Angeles announced a "national" edition last September, it explained in an editorial: "We feel that it is time that each of the groups now in revolt against an increasingly monolithic social system learns that it has much more in common with the other groups than it previously knew. Perhaps this way the separate, isolated rebellions which the Establishment finds comparatively easy to put down could be joined into one truly effective social and political uprising."

This self-generated excitement was made semi-official

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

last month when Newsweek and The Wall Street Journal ran survey stories. Both reported increasing circulation and increasing financial success for underground papers, and both elicited the customary hyperbolic quotes from the subjects of any such feature stories. Peter Werbe, co-editor of Detroit's The Fifth Estate, assured Newsweek readers that success would not spoil the underground press. "I still view it as the first step in the guerrilla movement," the 27-year-old Werbe allowed. "Here we can begin to question the legitimacy of the System." Another underground editor, Marvin Garson, predicted: "It's going to get bigger all the time. There are going to be more and more papers that will give people coverage they're not getting—and will never get—from the daily papers."

Adding substance to such predictions is the appearance of at least two underground news agencies, roughly comparable to the Associated Press and United Press International of the regular world. One, the Underground Press Syndicate (UPS), is a kind of cooperative that permits some sixty papers to reprint one another's stories with a credit line attached. The other, Liberation News Service (LNS), sells its news articles, reviews and essays to subscribers for $180 a year. Based in Washington, LNS has recently advanced beyond the mails and introduced tele-type machines.

Estimates of the number of underground papers and readers vary widely. The Wall Street Journal counted "more than 50," Newsweek "more than 150"; Marshall Bloom, an LNS executive, told The New York Times that nearly 200 underground papers had begun publication in the last two years. On the other hand, Bloom told The Nation that LNS services some 280 publications, of which 125 were "underground" in a general sense, some eighty were "peace" papers, and the rest were college papers not controlled by an administration. Readership estimates vary from 333,000 (by The Wall Street Journal) to 4.6 million (by Bloom). Right now, with the whole underground movement in flux, no figure could be accurate for long.

What do these papers print, and what needs do they fulfill? Are they what they say they are? And are they affecting anyone, particularly their declared enemies, the established press and in turn established society?

In a real sense, the underground papers have brought home to everyone the fact that regular metropolitan dailies do not communicate with subcultures—those small, identifiable groups who remain interested in affairs too local even for a city paper. Instead, the metropolitan papers write for a mass audience, which to them means a middle-class audience, or at least an audience that is presumed to have middle-class mores. When big-city dailies do single out small, identifiable groups, they are careful not to upset existing social rankings. Whether in gossip columns, food recipes, feature stories, or in the moral tone of editorials, local "out groups" have learned not to expect much from their city desks. There are exceptions but, as often as not, attempts to include such "out-groups" are artificial, as in the "zone" editions that alter a few pages, or superficial, as in the coverage of sacraments like obituaries and high school sports.

The callousness of standardized news coverage has long been apparent to its victims—such groups as Bible Belt Southerners (who are pre-middle class), poor Negroes and unassimilated, ethnic white Northerners. Hence the vitality of ethnic radio stations which publicize the stories, the events, the songs and the concerns of America's subcultures, and which counterbalance the mass appeal of big papers by an exclusive appeal to special interests. The suburban newspapers—including all their drivels—fulfill an identical need for yet another subculture. By its success, the underground press has brought all these facts into the open, to a point where "intellectuals" are now aware of them, and to a point where an ordinary, predictable communications gap is transformed into big news—or as some people put it, into a sign of "sickness" in American society.

One should give credit where credit is due: By making both a financial and a cultural hit with their appeal to a rich and identifiable market, the underground papers have awakened virtually all concerned to a real deficiency in American newspaper journalism. But that is about all the underground press has done. It has certainly not improved the quality of journalism.

Indeed, the underground press has become a kind of suburban press all its own—a suburban press for the hippie and dropout set. The three basic commodities in today's underground newspaper—the advertising, the calendar of events and the artistic and political commentary—all have a parallel in the suburban press. Because the mores of the two audiences are different, the content of the ads, the calendars and the commentaries is different too; in the underground papers, the ads are vulgar, the calendars refer to love-ins rather than Little League, and the commentaries are critical and left wing rather than laudatory and conservative. But the difference between the underground and the suburban press is entirely one of content. The functions of both—to entertain and reinforce their audience—are the same. Suburban and underground editors give virtually the same justification for one-sided, sometimes polemical journalism—that the overwhelming influence of big-city dailies must be countered, and can be countered only if other voices are heard alone, crying in the wilderness with all their purity. Underground papers, like their suburban cousins, give readers what they want to read; they are a great new business, and far from representing a fundamental critique of American society, are actually full-fledged participants in it.

The formula for success in the journalistic underground was invented by The Village Voice, a tabloid with offices in Greenwich Village. Started in 1955, the Voice didn't turn a profit, according to a Wall Street Journal story, until 1963. Today, profit figures are withheld—probably because they are so large. Even before 1963, the secret to whatever appeal the Voice had was its technique of always outdoing the rest of the New York press: It stood to the left of the regular press politically, and to the imaginative side artistically. These were not difficult tasks, and there was an eager audience in those New Yorkers who—from a sense of duty or from a vested interest—feel permanently and gnawingly dissatisfied with American public life. With the demise of the New York Herald Tribune, the Voice has found it even easier to attract local readers who search for alternatives to reading only The New York Times. The Voice, a weekly, does not run news as such. It has sections devoted to reviews of music, movies, theatre, books and the press, and it regularly carries as filler material announcements that don't make the regular papers. In a typical issue, the Voice will run three or four long, personal, sometimes narcissistic commentaries on recent social or political events, with considerable emphasis on the abstract issues or moral principles thought to be relevant, and very little on the technical or bureaucratic aspects of fitting means to ends. The Voice prints a prodigious quantity of advertising, including retail shops, entertainment, books, off-beat fashions and classifieds. For the audience involved, the ads are informative and useful; they unquestionably pull well for the advertisers. Apart from everything else, the Voice is chic, as essential a piece of equipment to some New Yorkers as the Trib used to be to others.

The Voice's formula—always feed the reader something that outdoes the regular, local press—has now been copied throughout the country. The content may have changed—the Voice now seems conservative by comparison with some of the later entrants to the field—but the process and the significance remain the same. Like their innovative “enemies” in the business world, their avowed “enemies” in the established press, and their dominant ancestor, The Village Voice, today's underground papers are meeting previously latent consumer needs, catering uncritically to the tastes of their consumers, and prospering from a shrewd analysis of the contemporary leisure-time market. The Berkeley Barb, the East Village Other, and the Los Angeles Free Press led the way in classified ads, for example, by opening their columns to advertisers soliciting sex partners, nude models and drugs. The demand for similar papers has snowballed. In every case, the local appeal of ads and calendars is mixed with the national appeal of underground revolt. Helped along by low operating costs, permissive court decisions on pornography, and the fortunate coincidence that today's social rebels happen to be sons and daughters of relatively wealthy parents, the underground papers have flourished by making themselves useful to a select group of advertisers.

Local conditions do produce some substantive differences. In Los Angeles, a relatively new paper, the Underground, has attacked the Free Press for making an “in” thing of sick sex and drugs.” In North Carolina, the Anvil shuns vulgarity and tries, in a somewhat tortured way, to present serious political and economic analysis. But because of the overwhelming sameness in most underground papers, the best of them all probably wouldn't qualify as “underground” today. It is the Pittsburgh Point, a well-produced weekly, whose response to the modern world is more than an outraged scream. Its political reporting, while reflecting concern about war, race and moral principles, is also strikingly detached. In covering a conference on organizing the poor, for example, the Point managed to take some shots at the participants without feeling obliged to disagree with their overall aims. In other words, the Point noticed a nuance or two that its more frenzied counterparts could hardly afford to describe. After quoting speaker Nicholas Von Hoffmann complaining about “wasted oratory” in community organization, Point editor Charles C. Robb wrote: “Von Hoffmann wasted some oratory himself in a long, rambling talk that was half ad lib, half read from scribbled notes.” Later in the same article, Robb described one panelist as “the Negro grocer from Homewood who has become the loudest established black militant in the city.” The Point also declared its preferences in last November's county election, but did not feel called upon to blame a conspiracy for their subsequent defeat.

Surprising as it might seem from the tone of the underground press, its writers are not the only people unhappy with the accomplishments of America's regular papers. There are plenty of critics—Irving Kristol, James Reston and McGeorge Bundy among them—who offer publishers both critiques and suggested reforms. And while the underground press may not realize it, the deficiencies of regular newspapers are only partly ideological. After all, the practices of the big-city papers, like those of the underground papers, make good economic sense. There is a limit to what can be done, and papers tend naturally to their most obvious, short-range tasks and stick naturally to traditional ways of doing things. Only the most ethically minded publishers seek quality for its own sake, whether in coverage of foreign affairs, city hall, or subcultures. And even among these publishers, an economic constraint will establish an outer limit to what is possible. Ironically, the most visible force for reform of big-city papers is neither the serious critics nor the underground critics but the new, slick city magazines. These magazines have demonstrated, by their own success, that the nouveau riche want and will buy more stimulating artistic commentary than is provided by the daily papers. Lately, the papers have been following suit.

Ron Cobb: From the Underground Press Syndicate

The underground papers are not a quality press because they pander to their readers with a dexterity befitting the establishment papers they criticize so bitterly. In their own pages, instead of stimulating political and social discussion worthy of the society they say they seek, the underground papers offer nothing more than a stylized theory of protest. Indeed, by the definitions it now prescribes, the underground movement not only requires protest as an end in itself; it depends on protest. For without a dogged concentration on perpetual antagonism, some people might admit to improvements, "sell-out," and leave the movement. Then where would the underground papers be and what would they write about? This theme of "selling out" is a new and a hip variant of an old and inadequate form of social protest—one that was rejected both by the incremental reformers of civics-book America and by the professional revolutionaries of Russia, China and Africa, all of whom realized, sooner or later, that some positive program is needed to translate general goals into concrete benefits.

Instead of bringing much needed reforms to the established press, the underground papers have inspired their rich, fat, corporate enemies to enter the underground market themselves, and thus to cash in on yet another fad. This bears out the verdict of the London Economist, which wrote some nineteen months ago that "much of the new left's judgement of contemporary society is based on aesthetic rather than political or even moral criteria." It is helpful to separate the life style of the underground subculture from its claim to superior morality and from the specific political ideas buried beneath the psychedelic art work. One can then see that with an unholy mess like the Vietnamese War to provide a base for indignation, it has been all too easy for the movement to condemn everybody else. If things are less simple from now on—with equally moral politicians disagreeing over policies and judgments and hunches—the underground press may find that a tone of outrage, supplemented by ads for beads and uninhibited roommates, will not hold its profitable audience together.

HARRY GOLDEN

ON Thursday evening I was in Blacksburg, Va., scheduled to debate Sen. J. Strom Thurmond of South Carolina in the auditorium of Virginia Polytechnic Institute. I was in an anteroom waiting for the debate to get under way when one of the student sponsors came in and told me that Martin Luther King had been shot in Memphis. Our debate nevertheless began, but was shortly interrupted by the dean of the school who told the assembled students that Martin Luther King was dead.

The student body at VPI is all white, but no Negro audience could have been more shocked by the news. I heard groans of despair. The dean then asked me if I would say a few words about Dr. King since I had known him well.

I said, "It is a sad day for the world and a sadder day for Americans. Like Pope John, Dr. Martin Luther King proved to all of us that Christianity has its uses. He borrowed an idea from Gandhi and transformed that idea of nonviolence into an American and Christian tradition. When Pope John died, however, he did not leave a vacuum, an ominous vacuum that may be filled not with love and brotherhood but hate and terror."

I finished. The students were still too shocked to know whether to applaud the sentiments or not. As they fidgeted, Senator Thurmond, who once ran for President on the Dixiecrat ticket, rose and said, "I disagree with Mr.

Golden's estimate of Dr. King. He was an agitator, an outside agitator, bent on stirring people up, making everybody dissatisfied."

Then we went on with the debate. Senator Thurmond urged the answer to our problems was law and order and I said the answer was law and justice. He said the federal government was too big, that it encroached on the sovereign rights of the states, and I argued there hasn't been a sovereign state since 1789 when all of the original thirteen ratified the Constitution. I said everyone in South Carolina talks against big government except when they cash their federal checks for farm subsidies, school luncheons, social security and the like. South Carolina is a federal preserve, like Yellowstone National Park. The students applauded our arguments in equal measure.

Before I left the next morning, I learned that a group of the students had asked the president of the institution if they might lower the flag to half-mast. The president said the flag was lowered only by federal proclamation. The students thanked him and went out and lowered the flag anyway. As I was leaving the campus, I saw they had also lowered the state flag of Virginia to half-mast.

If they can lower the flag for Martin Luther King in a state which once closed its schools rather than integrate them, maybe his life wasn't in vain. Dr. King's life was too short, but maybe it made ours fuller. I hope so.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Stretched on the Rack of the Midwest

IN THE HEART OF THE HEART OF THE COUNTRY: And Other Stories. By William Gass. Harper & Row. 206 pp. $4.95.

GEORGE P. ELLIOTT

Mr. Elliott is the author most recently of In the World (Viking).

William Gass's first novel, Omensetter's Luck, was as good, in my opinion, as it was cracked up to be, and his first collection of stories, In the Heart of the Heart of the Country, is better yet. His fiction is new in the sense that any good art is new, being fresh and alive. But it is also "new" in the local sense of "the new novel"—up-to-the-minute Susan Sontag modernistic new, nouveau roman and all that jazz.

Such was interest ■ I have been able to generate in most of the "new" novels I have read, especially Robbe-Grillet's, has been technical: by and large, they have struck me as being pretentious, puny stuff. Perhaps this is because I am illiterate in the matter of phenomenology: not only am I unable to read Husserl and Heidegger and their epigoni, I can't even get through Hegel. And "new" fiction, I keep hearing, is phenomenological. But an article of the faith I live by holds that, to be autonomous and excellent, a work of literature must embody its own philosophy if it has one: if it demands the reader's knowledge of a philosophy exterior to itself, then it will be at best minor—parasitic, commentary, decorative. Gass's fiction may be phenomenological as all get out, and if phenomenology is what you want, more power to you. Myself, I like his stories because they are interesting as narrative and verbal constructs and because at their best they say something strange and worth listening to about the world.

In all five of these stories, Gass has modified Robbe-Grillet's technique for representing the contents and motions of a highly abnormal mind; but then Gass has put this technical facility to the service of what seems to me a worthy fictional end—not "new" but not old exactly either and certainly not old-fashioned: just literary, human. The essence of this technique is fictionally to present everything as it impinges on the quite abnormal mind of a person who is in a peculiar, unstable relationship with the other persons in his world, with social institutions, even with beasts and inanimate objects. The least impressive of these five stories, "Icicles," is in the third person; the other four, all in the first person singular, take you much further into the consciousness of the central character, the aim of all Gass's fiction.

Now there is, I believe, ■ natural reluctance in many or most readers against coming very close to or going very far into the mind of another when that mind is as peculiar as all five of these are, and a considerable part of the job of ■ writer of such fiction is to overcome this reluctance. In the two middling stories in this book, "Mrs. Mean" and "In the Heart of the Heart of the Country," Gass accomplishes this by the rather easy strategy of presenting a character of much sensitivity and intelligence being stretched on the rack of Midwest small-town neighbors and customs. The title story, in fact, reads rather like the ruminations of one of the more bilious contributors to the New York Review of Books if he had been condemned for a long stretch in such a town, well past his breaking point. It is not that in actuality such towns are not living graveyards—I came from one and they are. It is just that they have been literarily stereotyped almost beyond the possibility of serious use—as, at the other end of the scale, Paris has been used too often as the city to which the sensitive young intellectual from the killing provinces flees for his life.

"The Pederson Kid" is a good notch above these two (please understand that it is a high standard by which I am judging these stories, the highest). In this long story, long enough to be labeled a novella, that nonform. Gass takes you into the consciousness of a normal-seeming boy, but then subjects him to such extreme experiences, emotional, moral, physical, that you have little difficulty believing in his disappearance into a deranged state of mind, and are willing to sympathize with him as he goes off into it. My only reservation about the story is that Gass makes it impossible for you to know exactly what happens at the end. To me as reader, it matters whether the boy actually kills the others or only thinks they have been killed by somebody (he is not clear by whom), and I resent the author's obscuring this knowledge from me. If he wanted me to feel a literary confusion equivalent to the boy's confusion about what was what, he succeeded. But instead of deepening my empathy with the character (or teaching me some sort of phenomenological lesson?), it turned me against the author for trickery.

Identity is the issue common to all these stories, and Gass's investigation of the minds of people who are uncertain or confused about their identities is powerfully carried out; this is especially successful in "The Pederson Kid." My only serious complaint is that Gass seems, a little, to be trying to call my identity into question too, and this I consider an illegitimate literary endeavor; in my own person, I resist it.

The masterpiece of these stories, in my opinion, is the shortest, "Order of Insects." It consists of ■ housewife's strange reflections on the insect bodies that keep appearing in the house that she and her family are renting, her relation to them, to all those others, to her role in the world. The tone is lyrical; the story is a dramatic monologue, and the effect is poetic. It is one of the best stories I have ever read, as well as one of the oddest.

For in it, as not always in the others, the language is wholly successful. "The Pederson Kid" is the most narrative of the five, and in it the language is plainest, up to the point where the narrator

A GLIMPSE OF e. e. cummings

The reading was over and he stood against the rear wall, head up, keeping a smile, being talked to. One more chore for the money and he could have been enjoying it for the challenge to the self his smile protected. A girl student spoke to his face. He nodded and in a moment answered quietly and quickly in a high pitched voice. Was it this vocal weakness he meant to shield as the self, because it was so awkward in him? He meant nothing more after that but to listen, to nod and smile at each body in turn taking a stand before him. I hung about watching and studying his face for the poems being written there at that moment and found it weary but alert, aged and loving defiance.

DAVID IGNATOW

alters into madness. The title story is hardly narrative at all, and its language is highly stylized. Gass turns out, in all his fiction, splendid sentences by the dozen; but rather too often, as in the title story, he falls into an obtrusively iambic rhythm which leads a plodding life of its own, neither taking the reader into the character's mind particularly nor taking him anywhere else either. But in "Order of Insects" everything comes together magically, and the reader rides the poetic prose with the character to a region where he has never been before and wants to go again—I've read the story three times already and look forward to reading it many more.

A footnote: Four of these five stories were published first in provincial little magazines, MSS, Accent (which "discovered" Gass over a decade ago), Perspective, and The Minnesota Review. The next time you hear someone sneer at little magazines, kick him.

to conduct it as he thought he should.

He went back to Atlanta in a mood of personal defeat. Then his renewal, that of a genius, erupted in a whole new concept to make Atlanta and the Negro Land Grant Colleges centers of black power as effective as were the white colleges in preparing their students for a ruling class. Black people would be given back their history, their destiny, in a continuous flow of raw data and published studies. His plan was accepted, and then without notice he was dropped from Atlanta again, at age 76, without a pension or savings. He went back to the NAACP, which dropped him again—a further humiliation and defeat.

He did not know that he was a great revolutionary. He did not know that when they first got rid of him at Atlanta his accumulating studies of American domestic imperialism were laying bare the total system of the suppression of his race. He did not know when they edged him out of Crisis that his unremitting probing and whipping of his people could have brought them, during capitalism's crisis of the thirties to their revolutionary flash point. Nor did he know that when he went back to Atlanta and began his grand design to unify the black intellectual community that he was as dangerous as Karl Marx.

He did not know that by serving his country with his conscience he had become one of its greatest enemies—not until he was indicted and tried as a criminal for his work in the peace movement in the fifties. He did not know until they took away his passport that in his travels and Pan African Conferences he had been organizing a vast section of the world revolution. It was in his years of exile in his own country, suspected of being a foreign agent, shut off from contact with the world in which he had had a life of conspicuous achievement ("The colored children ceased to hear my name") that he wrote this great soliloquy and finally understood what had happened to him.

Its publishers have not done DuBois or his book a service by featuring Herbert Aptheker so prominently as its "editor." This implies that the book had to be worked over to such a degree that its editor deserved "billing," or that it is a compilation of scattered pieces which needed to be pulled together. It goes against the remark in the editor's preface that "it is published as Dr. DuBois wrote it: changes have been few and only of a technical nature—completing a name, and the like." Why then mention the editor at all? Or why enjoin his name on a major literary document as personal and candid as this one?

Technically, it is not as DuBois wrote it, or left it, at his death in

A Life Style of Conscience

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF W.E.B. DUBOIS. International Publishers. 448 pp. $10.

TRUMAN NELSON

Mr. Nelson's latest book is The Right to Revolution (Beacon).

The autobiography of DuBois is not really his history but what he called it, a "Soliloquy." It is the forged ore of his life, honed to a cutting edge. It is a tool that can be passed, effectively, impersonally, from hand to hand. The tone is collective: it is of the organizer, the mover and shaker of millions, the genius lovingly immersed in the mass. It records self-evident achievements, excellences, concepts which place him in the small company of the world's greatest men, and defeats and humiliations that make him one with the rest of us, inching our way along. He was, above all, a creator of great syntheses in the world of ideas. His own personality was a synthesis of what the black man could be in this country after a bloody war in which his shackles were struck off.

In the year of his birth, 1868, the freedmen of the South got the vote. In the little New England town where he was born there was a pride among the people that they had helped put down a wicked rebellion and thereby freed 4 million slaves. They wanted the black DuBois to succeed as proof that smashing the slave owner's rebellion was right; that it "paid off," that the slaves had been, all along, the worthy poor, waiting to be uplifted. The white community did for him what they seem unable to do now—they let him form his life for what he wanted to do; to help bring about the unification of the disrupted soul of man in a country whose natural resources could provide hope and sustenance for the wretched of the earth. Without financial resources, he managed to win his way through Fisk University, Harvard and the University of Berlin, to become "the most conspicuously trained young Negro of my day."

He felt that sociology was the greatest of human sciences and that his life work should be "to watch and measure the history and development of a great race" and gather scientific proof that neither color nor race determined the capacity of man to advance; in short, proof that the truth could make man free. He hit his stride at Atlanta University where he formed cadres of scholars to discover the relations of cause and effect among living persons, with the accuracy of first-rate historians working in areas of time-fixed facts.

Their studies revealed that the twenty years from 1890 to 1910 were more crucial to their race than the Reconstruction era. While European nations had exploited colonies far away, American imperialism had fastened its grip on the black South and set up a quasi-colonialism. As the blacks, released by emancipation, were coming with terrifying speed to their full intellectual powers, lynchings began to occur at the rate of five a week, laws were passed to disenfranchise and Jim Crow the black people "legally," and Southern state governments became openly racist and punitive.

The blacks were thrust back into a "helot" role, segregated, unskilled and unlearned. Booker T. Washington was given almost unlimited power and became the black mask for total white suppression. DuBois was outraged by this and forsook his scholarly detachment to attack Washington personally with the formation of a black resistance group called the Niagara Movement. It was soon made clear that DuBois, and his studies and his militancy would make it impossible for Atlanta to receive adequate financial support.

DuBois left and went with the NAACP, which he had helped to found, as the editor of a new periodical The Crisis. For twenty-four years he wielded an instrument of propaganda which created, almost single-handedly, a black intelligentsia and mass black awareness. Then, inexplicably to him, he was not allowed Ghana in 1963. According to the preface, the manuscript was "rescued from Accra, after the military coup of early 1966." I happened to be in Accra in 1965 as a guest of Mrs. DuBois when she lent me a carbon copy. It was just as DuBois had assembled it; it is still in my possession and it begins: "I was born by a golden river and in the shadow of two great hills, five years after the Emancipation Proclamation, which began the freeing of the American Negro slaves." This section in the Autobiography comes into view on page 61, after some descriptions of DuBois' journeying abroad.

The carbon bears a very significant opening inscription: "Dedicated to the Dead: My Great Grandfather, James DuBois, My Grandfather, Alexander DuBois, My Parents, Alfred DuBois and Mary Burghardt, My Children, Burghardt Gomer DuBois, Yolande DuBois, My First Wife, Nina Gomer DuBois." Thus this work begins, and ends with a great unifying span of an apostrophe to the dead. "Let then the dreams of the Dead rebuke the Blind who think that what is will be forever and teach them that what was worth living for must live again, and that which merited death must stay dead. Teach us Forever Dead, there is no Dream but Deed, there is no Deed but Memory."

DuBois lived the last years of his life like a great virtuoso playing a Bach chaconne, with a faultless and accelerating rhythm which had to drive on, unslackening, to its imminent end. Every note had to be struck with accuracy; he had no more time to make mistakes, revisions or corrections. These are the untouched words of a 90-year-old man squaring himself with death, and expecting it every day from a heart beating against impossible odds. His writing is unbelievably strong and young, without self-pity and vibrant with righteous anger. He could not include everything. He barely touches on his peaks as a great writer, a great historian, the father of Pan Africanism.

But no one book could contain him, nor could any institution. He was too big for them and for his own country. At the end he felt that only a Communist revolution could contain him and use him as the embodiment of black millions fighting to be free. He should be judged as a whole new cosmogony of ideas and momentum, of concepts rising and whirling in space, sometimes fusing, sometimes falling, but always radiating power and light and emitting lines of divergence which encompass the world and the world's people.

The Ritual of Originality

CHANDLER BROSSARD

Mr. Brossard's current work is The Spanish Scene (Viking). His novels are Who Walk in Darkness (New Directions), The Bold Saboteurs (Farrar, Straus) and The Double View (Dial). He is an associate professor at the State University College, Old Westbury, N.Y.

Most art is about art, most music about music, most sculpture about, yes, sculpture. The principle behind this is simple and paralyzing: to be truly original—or unique—is to exist outside the stabilizing context of tradition and society, that is, shared reality, which, by community necessity, is the only reality, and to have such an existence is to be insane or demonic. In other words, not to be. Since this is so, what rituals have been devised (agreed upon, really) to satisfy, or rationalize, one's presumed need to be original, or insane, or alienated? Exactly that: the ritual (or pseudo art form) of originality—alienation. And the beauty of this ritual is that the participant in it actually never leaves his comfortable position of averageness and unoriginality.

In current literature this ritual has its set styles, tones, poses, voices, flora and fauna, terrains and outcomes. Also, its dialogue between author and publisher. Conspiracy would be an exacter word; they conspire (within the ritual) to present ritual as a reality (in the phenomenology of contemporary emptiness this is a jewel). The author projects himself into a pseudo vision, the publisher projects himself into a pseudo convert role, and the latest round in the ritual is launched and published. The language the publisher employs, or has been assigned by the set piece art form within the ritual, is ageless and unvarying, as are all approved and functioning recitations.

Allow me to quote from the jackets of four recent novels—The Free-Lance Pallbearers, by Ishmael Reed; The Answer, by Jeremy Larnier; The Creep, by Jeffrey Frank; The Disciple, by Clark Brown. About Frank: "Readers will be caught by the overwhelming conviction. . . . Bartholomew is a silent, anguished soul. . . ." Reed: "This electrifying first novel zooms American readers off to a land they have never heard of." Larnier: "Caught up in a carnival of sensual powers. . . . An epochal literary experience . . . down corridors of madness. . . ." Brown: "Highly original . . . careens from Paris to Madrid . . . startling . . .

BOOKS worth collecting

THREE CENTURIES OF SOUTHWESTERN HISTORY

FORGOTTEN PEOPLE

By Dr. George I. Sanchez

$5.75

SOLDIERS OF THE CROSS

Notes on the Ecclesiastical History of New Mexico

By Most Rev. J. B. Salpointe, D.D.

$7.50

PROSE SKETCHES AND POEMS

Written in the Western Country

By Albert Pike

Edited by Dr. David J. Weber

$7.50

Send for free catalog

CALVIN HORN PUBLISHER, INC.

BOX 4204

ALBUQUERQUE

NEW MEXICO 87106

formerly

HORN & WALLACE PUBLISHERS, INC.

an intense drama . . . remarkably fresh . . . a coruscating reflection . . ."

These books exemplify a rampant and by now pathological literary ritual that reveals, not the death of God (which is the presumptuous implication) but the death of man (that is, the writer). Here is the alienated young man, too sensitive for his environment, searching his soul for the interior voyage, i.e., man in search of his real self and innocence. Nothing of the kind, of course, is taking place. It is a game being played by dead men in a cultural cemetery playing at being dead men in a cultural cemetery.

Other, and better established, practitioners come to mind. J. P. Donleavy as revealed in A Singular Man; Jack Kerouac in all of his productions; Saul Bellow in Dangling Man and The Adventures of Augie March. The difference between these authors and the four new ones is not in any way substantive but more a matter of better technique and literary sophistication. Bellow is a particularly rich example. His ritual is a reworking of the authentic visions, and "trips," of three true alienated adventurers, Kafka, Céline and Dostoevsky. And this takes an awesome internalizing of ritual. To make a ritual, within a ritual, of another's sensibility and style and absurdism is almost an art in itself, just as gifted transvestism sometimes does achieve a weird, though inorganic, breakthrough.

Each of the authors has an act: his topical story within the main non-story. Larner's, for instance, involves a young man in a hip scene—a university town—whose real non-hipness the witness "escapes" by way of an ecstatic drug experience directed by a swami much cut after Timothy Leary. Frank's act involves a young man who becomes dehumanized by the all too human city of New York. He searches for women who will lead him "somewhere." Reed's bit projects a young Kafka-boppy Negro into the very familiar wacky street world of the wacky street Negro. He too is looking for a woman to lead him.

Each author employs the standard language of his literary ritual, a language that is not a true language (as newspaper language is truly something that comes out of a machine) but a substitute for one allowing the author himself (assuming he has a language or identity of his own) never to have to appear, which is the way a real ritual is always played. (Did the ancient Greeks ever have to hear the street-corner voices of those automatized personages in the dramas? And if they did, did they, being the shrewd citizens they were, realize there was no connection at all so why bother to get upset?) Herewith some thoroughly representative samples. Larner: "She was all set now I knew, and my blood flowed back, and my guts unclenched, and I gave, at last, what I had come to give her." Reed: "I live in HARRY SAM. HARRY SAM is something else. A bit not-to-be-believed out-of-sight, sometimes referred to as O-BOP-SHE-BANG or KLANG-A-LANG-ADING-DONG." And Frank: "He dreaded going into the streets again, and seeing all the other faces and hearing voices with them, and actually all humanity assembled for him to detest. . . . But loneliness was still the most desperate of words."

As is the case with the many other writers engaged in the same pseudo fiction project, Larner, Frank, Reed and Brown inadvertently employ the same nonfictional antagonist to work against their protagonist: environmental boredom. Not ideas, not ideologies, not existential conflict. The resonance set up between the antagonist and the protagonist—a tension that is central to any real fiction—in such "novels" as these is lacking in any depth or possibility. The grass is greener is hardly a dynamic concept. It is peevish and tangential to go into the shoddy technology of their production, their novelistic-craft ineptness. This school of ritualized alienation and "outness," like a lot of action painting, allows of an unconscionable flaccidity. Nay, encourages it, because this undiscipline contributes to the illusion of real wild imagination. The older, more successful workers in the field have at least conquered this seduction.

Such books, both recent and past, make shatteringly clear the difference between ritual and myth. The first is a formalized emptiness whose purpose is to rationalize disengagement and death. The other is an extension and merging of man's fantasies with his pragmatic position.

Now, one has to ask: what has become of fiction, true fiction? Has it been eliminated or almost totally destroyed by the ritual and its organizers? Is there a "market" for it? What are the ingredients, or requirements, of a fictional experience that can at the same time be unique and universal, relevant to the person having it and reflecting an authentic response to his time and place? Has metaphor become a vagabond in a ghost town?

Certainly, our humanity ultimately is not tenable without this metaphor. But the trans-cultural experience, or the transcendental projection, threatens entrenched schemata and must therefore be denied in order that "life," as one is allowed to know it, continue. Can man leap through this logic, give the lie to the mirror, or would the leap carry him into dreaded infinity, into his dreaded infinite self?

Camus' proposition as stated in "The Myth of Sisyphus" that man's central philosophical problem is suicide is unreal and exists in the tradition of art being about art. If we are not more than we seem to be, then suicide is pompous and a joke.

A Hero and a Poet

COLLECTED POEMS. By Keith Douglas. Edited by John Waller, G. S. Fraser and J. C. Hall. With an introduction by Edmund Blunden. 164 pp.

ALAMEIN TO ZEM ZEM. By Keith Douglas. With an introduction by Lawrence Durrell. 164 pp. Both Chilmark Press. $4.95 each.

MICHAEL HAMBURGER

Mr. Hamburger, poet, critic and translator of German poetry, has published many books here and in England. He is one of the translators of the just published Poems for People Who Don't Read Poems by Hans Magnus Enzensberger (Atheneum).

Thanks, in part, to the advocacy of Ted Hughes, the work of Keith Douglas has at last come into its own, and Douglas is now widely regarded as the most remarkable of the young British poets who died in the Second World War. One reason is that Sidney Keyes, whose fame at one time eclipsed that of Douglas, was too young, and was killed too soon, to write "war poems" proper; and both Keyes and Alun Lewis responded far less positively and vividly to the experience of war, because of literary and personal preoccupations difficult to reconcile with a soldier's life. Alun Lewis was Douglas' senior by five years, and Keyes was only two years younger than Douglas; but Douglas was far in advance of his years, not only in literary skill but in a maturity and assurance attested even in the undergraduate poems which he contributed to the anthology Eight Oxford Poets, published in 1941. The Collected Poems include work written well before that time, beginning with the poem "Mummers" written at the age of 14.

In the ten years between that first poem and the last—Douglas was killed in June, 1944, at the age of 24—his painter's eye for significant detail and his keen intelligence gave him a range of awareness that was to serve him well as a war poet. By the age of 20 he had shed most of the literariness characteristic of the British poets of his generation, and could write in a natural speaking voice, as in the poem "Canoe" of 1940, even when his themes were metaphysical. Above all, the persistent premonition that he would die in the war gave him an adventurousness, a determination to be equal to that experience, and a curiosity about places, people and skills that are equally striking in his prose account of the North African campaign, Alamein to Zem Zem.

In this he emerges as an exceptionally brave and efficient officer who never ceased to be a poet: "To say that I thought of the Battle of Alamein as an ordeal sounds pompous: but I did think of it as an important test, which I was interested in passing. I observed these battles partly as an exhibition—that is to say that I went through them a little like a visitor from the country going to a great show, or like a child in a factory—a child sees the brightness and efficiency of steel machines and endless belts slapping round and round, without caring or knowing what it is all there for. When I could order my thoughts I looked for more significant things than appearances: I still looked—I cannot avoid it—for something decorative, poetic or dramatic. . . . I never lost the certainty that the experience of battle was something I must have."

That balance between involvement and detachment is as characteristic of Douglas as the way in which he combined ironic observation with a search for "more significant things than appearances." His poem "Aristocrats" reads like a satirical exposure of upper-class British attitudes carried over from civilian life into the business of war:

*The noble horse with courage in his eye clean in the bone, looks up at a shellburst:
away fly the images of the shires
but he puts the pipe back in his mouth.*

*Peter was unfortunately killed by an 88:
it took his legs away, he died in the ambulance.*

*I saw him crawling on the sand; he said
It's most unfair, they've shot my foot off.*

How can I live among this gentle obsolescent breed of heroes, and not weep?

*Unicorns, almost,
for they are falling into two legends in which their stupidity and chivalry are celebrated. Each, fool and hero, will be an immortal.*

The complex irony and pathos of that poem, and of all Douglas' work that came out of the war, make him the one British poet of the Second World War who can bear comparison with those of the First World War, with Owen, Sassoon and Isaac Rosenberg, whom Douglas especially admired. The very detachment of the poem shows that Douglas himself was very much a product of prewar upper-class England, with all the virtues and gallantry of that "obsolescent breed of heroes," but without the stupidity that could take its code for granted. The satire turns out to be a true celebration of that breed, just because Douglas' intelligence told him that the breed was obsolescent; and because Douglas was writing out of a quarrel, not with others but with himself.

Not the least of Douglas' virtues as a poet and prose writer was a moral one which he owed to his upbringing—a passionate truthfulness. This truthfulness was nourished by an awareness of what was going on outside Britain, an awareness of the general implications of the war. Douglas himself made this point in a letter appended to the Collected Poems, his reply to strictures on his irregular and jagged prosody, which Douglas defended as "significant speech," as distinct from song or rhetoric:

I don't know if you have come across the word Bullshit—it is an army word and signifies humbug and unnecessary detail. It symbolizes what I think must be got rid of—the mass of irrelevancies, of "attitudes," "approaches," propaganda, ivory towers, etc., that stands between us and our problems and what we have to do about them. To write about the themes which have been concerning me lately in lyric and abstract form would be immense bullshitting. . . . I suppose I reflect the cynicism and the careful absence of expectation (it is not quite the same thing as apathy) with which I view the world. . . . I never tried to write about war . . . until I had experienced it.

What Douglas called his "cynicism" there is defined in the same letter, when he says "to admit any hope of a better world is criminally foolish, as foolish as it is to stop working for it." That very toughness, combined with the compassion that made Douglas withdraw from battle at times to take wounded men back to safety in his tank, distinguishes Douglas' response to the realities of war.

The new volume of Collected Poems makes a few significant additions to the contents of the collection published in 1951 by Poetry London; and they are now presented in roughly chronological order. A number of Douglas' drawings have been added. Apart from Lawrence Durrell's Introduction, Alamein to Zem Zem is based on the Poetry London edition of 1946, which also included color plates, omitted from the new edition, as well as a selection of Douglas' later poems. The earlier editions have long been out of print; but it was Tambimuttu of Poetry London who published Douglas' work both in his periodical of that name and in book form long before it was

Ready in April, 1968

Edited by Stuart Levine and Nancy Lurie

LC:67-24839 Cloth — 12.00

Illustrations, Map, Photographs

The American Indian—his public and private life—his past and present—city and reservation life—by American Studies and Anthropology scholars.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Stuart Levine

The Survival of Indian Identity

THE BACKGROUND

Nancy Oestreich Lurie

Historical Background

Elizabeth Clark Rosenthal

Culture and the American Indian Community

CURRENT TENDENCIES

Shirley Hill Witt

Nationalistic Trends Among

American Indians

Robert K. Thomas

Pan-Indianism

CASES IN POINT

Harriet J. Kupferer

The Isolated Eastern Cherokee

Carol K. Rachlin

Tight Shoe Night: Oklahoma

Indians Today

James A. Clifton

Factional Conflict and the Indian Community: The Prairie Potawatomi Case

Ann Fischer

History and Current Status of the Houma Indians

Deward E. Walker, Jr.

Some Limitations of the Renaissance Concept in Acculturation: The Nez Perce Case

Rosalie and Murray Wax

Indian Education For What?

Henry F. Dobyns

Therapeutic Experience of Responsible Democracy

APPENDIX

Nancy Oestreich Lurie

An American Indian Renaissance?

BIBLIOGRAPHY INDEX

EVERETT/EDWARDS, Inc.

133 SOUTH PECAN AVENUE

DELAND, FLORIDA 32720

PUBLISHERS OF SIGNIFICANT, EDUCATIONAL BOOKS

THE CENTENNIAL REVIEW

VOL. XII, No. 2 SPRING 1968

NORMAN RICH

Peace-Making and Peace-Keeping in Historical Perspective

PAUL M. LAPORTE

Art and Alienation

HARVEY GROSS

Henry Adams' Broken Neck

WILLIAM W. HEIST

Myth and Folklore
in the Lives of Irish Saints

OAKLEY C. JOHNSON

New Orleans Story

JOHN W. HANSON

The American Faith in African Education

Subscription Rates:

$1.00 for single copies

$3.00 a year (4 issues);

$5.00 for two years

Available from bookstores or from

110 Morrill Hall

Michigan State University

E. Lansing, Mich. 48823

THE IMPACT OF THE AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY—on the current economic situation—gold price, interest rates, taxes, dollar purchasing power, security values—will be discussed at the First General Conference on the Automobile Question.

Write:

Max Carasso, Organizing Chairman
P.O. Box 1162, G.P.O.
New York, N.Y. 10001

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION

4-29-68

333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign Postage $2; Canadian Postage $1 per year extra)

Name

Address

City

State..... Zip No.....

generally recognized and acclaimed. Both he and the editors of the new volumes—all of whom were personally associated with Douglas and devoted to his work—deserve the gratitude of his new readers. Not only war poems like "Gallantry," "How To Kill" and "On a Return from Egypt," but love poems like "The Knife" and the metaphysical poem "Time Eating" are among the very best poems written in English during the war, quite apart from the circumstances of Douglas' youth and his death in action. Alamein to Zem Zem, too, retains its dual interest and importance as a record of war in the desert and as an account of one exceptional man's response to the experience of modern warfare.

ART

MAX KOZLOFF

We are in the process, these days, of reassimilating what had once been known as the artistic "machine." In the 19th century everyone knew that the "machine" was a gigantic painting in heroic style, generally of academic or Salon origin, a history picture, official, sometimes a mural, and always a rhetorical demonstration of the artist's engagement with ideas, and the exposition of his skill. The word, of course, is derogatory; it seizes upon the mechanism and pretentiousness which were the features of many, but by no means all, the works of art which have since then aspired to grandeur. Twentieth-century artists have generally been unable to work on this scale without some fundamental irony or displacement of energy. The earlier prizing loose of conservative government patronage from what came to be an alienated art intelligentsia had much to do with this. But more importantly there has prevailed a suspicion of public emotions, and a mistrust of ideology and propaganda that virtually eliminated the monumental as an artistic genre of our times. Now, all this seems to be evaporating, and one witnesses the reintroduction of an art of mammoth dimensions, if not altogether symphonic orchestration.

The 1930s may yet come to seem a predecessor for this development. For just as artists of the sixties are skimming the glossier surfaces and campy glamour from the moderne artifacts of that decade, they are also emulating the formats in which some of the artists of that time attempted a call to arms. Lest we forget, it was the period not only of Busby Berkeley and the Radio City Music Hall but of the WPA project and the Mexican muralists. Rivera at Detroit painted his vision of the proletariat in herculean labor on the automobile assembly line, and Robert Delaunay constructed his hall of concentric circles for the Paris railroad pavilion of 1937, a work now briefly at the Metropolitan Museum, where it looks fantastically au courant. Whether or not these efforts were "machines," their subject could not have been other than the machine itself, for nothing has as yet competed with technology as the single most life-shaping factor in the existence of modern man. That modern art has pre-occupied itself with this central theme, making it into a new "history," was evident in the thirties, when Meyer Schapiro wrote (in the Marxist Quarterly):

Léger decomposes the elements of machines into Cubist abstractions or assimilates living things to the typical rigid shapes of machines; the Dadaists improvise a whimsical burlesque with robots or reconstructed men; in Holland the neo-plasticists construct their works of quasi-architectural units; in Germany the Constructivist-Suprematist forms ape the drawings and models of the machine designer, rather than the machines themselves. And the Futurists, in distinction from all of these, try to recapture the phenomenal aspects of moving mechanisms, of energy and speed.

Here was an iconography of grandeur, and it was inevitable that it should summon up at least once the vestiges of the 19th-century "machine" tradition in new emblems of optimism. Moreover, the "collectivist" imagery of this revival made it psychologically permissible to commit oneself to overt social content and inflate the scale of a pictorial tradition long skeptical of, or frustrated in, any communication with the masses.

The one contemporary exception to this rule, although it was also the most

GHOST STORY OF A NEW HAMPSHIRE GRAVEYARD

*The old ghost
Among the stones
Has cold feet
And a bitter heart;
He cannot see colors.
Sadness and anger
Rise out of the ground:
His children are neighbors
Buried nearby,
Such little ones!
They are not lambs.
They are fireflies and mosquitoes
Of unusual fierceness,
And in his cold brain
They bite and burn.*

DOROTHY GILBERT

seminal and premonitory of its class, was the "Guernica" by Picasso. While it summarized, synthesized and passed on all that late Cubism could represent as a master style, it indicted a historical incident, the first aerial bombardment of an undefended civilian population. It would have been merely a reactionary gesture to castigate the demonism of the machine. But it was a cry of prophetic outrage, as much political as it was aesthetic, to see in "Guernica" the lethal imminence of a technology through which man would seek to destroy himself. And now we have our own like document, a picture that whether consciously or not, replies to the "Guernica" across the years, and befits us as the defiant older work would never have chosen to do. I refer to James Rosenquist's "F-111" on loan in the Metropolitan Museum.

In the literature of guilt, the Picasso may be taken as an example of warning, the Rosenquist as a token of complicity. "Guernica," though referring to an actual event, aspires to timelessness (a far more accurate index of the monumental than largeness of scale). And though, too, it is executed only in black, white and gray, it is optimistic in the sense that the work of any great reformer is optimistic. But "F-111," which maximizes the political implications of Pop art, has become an instant period piece. For though it diffuses montages a series of artifacts rather than reconstructs an event, it is journalistic in conception. And while it is gorgeously technicolor in palette, it could not be more bleak in outlook.

This mural has elicited bitter controversy since its completion in 1965. One confronts a 10-foot high frieze of panels, canvas and aluminum, that sprawls awkwardly for 86 feet around the corners of the room. Without special emphasis other than that caused by a provisional installation and the spectator's choice of vantage, there unfolds, left to right, in front of the silhouette backdrop of the life-size jet, a track hurdle, an angel food cake crowned by a heavy-treaded tire, light bulbs, one of which is cracked open, the grinning head of a little blond girl in a hair dryer, an atomic mushroom cloud topped by a beach umbrella, a burst of air bubbles above the hood of a scuba diver, and a mass of wriggling canned spaghetti, now behind the nose lance of the plane. Impossible to ingest in one glance, the painting also seems intellectually ambivalent and disruptive.

But though its compositional sense is additive and piecemeal, it exhibits a definite program, and eventually amounts to a kind of inventory of apocalypse. Threaded across the sleek fuselage of what has been touted as the most devastating war machine of the age, are out-sized images of the consumer culture that are its smiling, sportive counterparts. The levels on which this billboard panorama can be "read" are multiply disturbing in their own right. Magnified, outward projecting, cajoling, these gargantuan if banal objects lose their social distance and flatten us aggressively, not with the artist's own rhetoric but in the highway idiom we ourselves have sanctioned. Cause and effect are scrambled in this tableau which abrasively transmits good news into bad. It is as if the hypocritical cheeriness of our affluence, to which we have grown defensively impervious, has been frozen by the flash bulbs in flagrante delicto. Few will disagree with this "message"; but many have objected to its over-accessibility, confusing received ideas, or even liberal clichés, with the work of art which alludes to them.

For the imaginative processes that operate here are uniquely metaphorical, and in the end, even poetic, in the manner of surrealism. On a secondary level, for example, the general content is implicit in specific sensations: the section of cake reveals a shaft like that of the atomic blast, as does also the cloud of bubbles, even further suggesting the gulp of air of the bomb, of the vacuum of the bulb cracked open, as well as the drier and the jet intake. This gulp, in turn, is one of the bases of Rosenquist's meaning. Speaking of the wallpaper roller patterns superimposed on the F-111's tail, he said (in a Partisan Review interview conducted by G. R. Swenson in 1965): "You walk outside of your apartment into what used to be open air and all of a sudden feel that it has become solid with radioactivity and other undesirable elements. So I used a wallpaper roller with hard artificial flowers to hang in the atmosphere like a veil." This not so paranoid vision of an atmosphere and a nature that is chemically changed shoots alarmingly through the mural. (Its oscillation between urban and rural, still-life and landscape configurations, is to the point.) The cake is impaled with little pennants advertising its synthetically injected vitamins: the Day-Glo green of the grass behind the drier is like some awful cosmetic spray visited upon a lawn; and the umbrella frivolously blankets a massive fallout. One can choke to death in this brand-new ersatz cleanliness.

Despite the unevenness of its double meanings, "F-111" imputes to American civilization all the directedness of life on a conveyor belt, an accelerating arsenal of productiveness beamed toward a goal the artist himself has described as "some blinding light." (Picasso, too, was concerned with a glaring light, but

TICKETS NOW ON SALE
AT BOX OFFICE OR BY MAIL

THE 6½ HOUR,
TWO-PART
PRODUCTION OF
LEO TOLSTOY'S

WAR and PEACE

PRESENTED BY THE WALTER READE
ORGANIZATION AND SATRA
IN COLOR • STEREOPHONIC SOUND •
70MM WIDE SCREEN •
RELEASED BY CONTINENTAL

SHOWN IN TWO PARTS, EACH AT A SEPARATE PERFORMANCE. YOU
CAN SEE PART I AND PART II ON SAME DAY—OR ON DIFFERENT DAYS.

All matinee and evening performances:
ORCH. & LOGE $7.50. FRONT BALC. $6.50.
REAR BALC. $5.50. Price of ticket includes admission to both parts. Performances daily at 2 and 8 PM.

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

If you cannot decide when purchasing tickets the date you wish to see Part I, you can obtain a special Exchange Coupon, which will be redeemed for a Part I reserved seat ticket, in advance, at the box office or by mail.

MAY

SUNDAY	MONDAY	TUESDAY	WEDNESDAY	THURSDAY	FRIDAY	SATURDAY
			1	2	3	4
5	6	7	8	9	10	11
12	13	14	15	16	17	18
19	20	21	22	23	24	25
26	27	28	29	30	31

TICKETS MAY BE CHARGED TO DINER'S CLUB, CARTE BLANCHE, AMERICAN EXPRESS.

THE DeMille A WALTER READE
47th St. & 7th Ave. CO 5-8430
THEATRE

how differently!) To think as Rosenquist does of the picture as "being shoveled into a boiler" is to gain a greater understanding of his similes, not merely in their Magrittean sense but in terms of their current destination. The Firestone tread (how much more evocative of his aim than "Goodrich," which would have suggested a rather different idea) becomes an inhuman chevron of brutality. The bulbs, "glowing . . . but not turned on," provide a luminous key, a pretty incandescence. In the convex drier is the distorted reflection of a fighter pilot or astronaut. "AIR FORCE" is posted across the atomic explosion, and finally the intestinal spaghetti, swishing in its thin red gruel, turns gray and is bordered by the terminal blank aluminum panels that bounce off the light of the gallery. The whole is an anti-epic, replete with jump-cuts and zoom shots, that retails in false and fearful splendor the magnitude of our involuted values. It is indeed a vengeful machine.

Yet, part of the paradox of this work lies in its own involvement with the very complex it incriminates. It would have been too blatant for this Pop artist to have depicted real violence, but it was not too compromising to derive sensuous benefits from the conditions and materials he abhors as a human being. No matter how ironically structured, Pop art's acceptance of high-powered commercial routines has no choice but to be ambivalent, if not parodistic, as a rhetorical device. The issue is never more crucial than in this picture which purports to give an "antidote" to, rather than a mere reflection of, our ways. Those who have accused it of formal inadequacy exaggerate wildly, for if anything, Rosenquist has sacrificed a good deal of political effectiveness in order to enhance the work's artistic potentialities. Though it is now considerably more overpainted and labored than when I remember it in the studio, the mural is still a tour de force of chromatic brilliance and painterly felicity. The filtered oil and acrylic transparencies of the plane's midriff are an example, while "F-111's" lush and indulgent sensitivity to textures has, in addition, a sensory éclat hard to match. But to the extent that we respond to these features, the more specious, or at least suspect, becomes the tone of the work. By the attractiveness of its form, we may be robbed of some of our wrath at the horror of its subject. That coherent balance of form and content possessed by Picasso is no longer possible to a Rosenquist who seriously imagined selling his work in fragments, as souvenirs of a polyglot enterprise.

Of course it may convincingly be argued that our situation does not permit the holistic verities and evident symbolism that could be tapped by Picasso. By all indications, Rosenquist's exploration of the moral underbelly of our society was forced to reveal the proportion of his and our half-damning participation in it. (Something of the same can be said for the gratuitous scale and physical vacancy—so typically American—of much recent abstract art.) Yet it is part of the general perplexity that we share feelings of powerlessness and disjunction in an automated world while still partly wanting to react to its terrible and alluring myth of our own potency. How do most Americans feel about the portentous and yet ludicrously inadequate performance of the first operational F-111s? Like Godard's latest color films, Rosenquist's Magrittean poetics detonate some very contemporary unease, even as they verify the hollowness of the machine tradition.

THEATRE / Harold Clurman

One of the merits of Mart Crowley's The Boys in the Band (Theatre Four: 424 West 55 Street) is that without stars it presents "all-star" acting and direction. The author is new to the stage (he has previously been active in television and film) and Robert Moore, directing his first New York production, has long been an actor. We are confronted with newcomers whose initial essay on the local boards is a hit.

The "boys" of the title are all or almost all homosexual. None of them is a Gide or a Proust or even a Baron de Charlus. Such types, like all superior personages, are rarely dealt with by our dramatists. The boys in the band are for the most part a sorry lot: some of them show a definite nastiness, mitigated in certain cases by wit. Much of the play is funny, although one cannot always be sure whether the laughter it provokes is caused by surprise, malice or the casualness of the pervasive obscenity.

Still we need not be overpunctilious about these points. There is a sufficient Manhattan sophistication and literacy in the proceedings to give the piece a value beyond its camp qualities. Its picture offers little depth but considerable surface skill. What emerges in the end, as so frequently in such instances, is a fundamental sentimentality. But it is clear: Mart Crowley has ability and if he can apply it on a wider scale he may come to write some good comedies.

There is little "plot." Michael, one of the boys, struggling, under psychoanalysis, with his Catholic upbringing and his deviation, is giving a birthday party for a Jewish friend, addicted to several vices apart from his basic peculiarity. Invited to the party are a married college instructor, who brings along his lover, an unabashed or screaming queer (always good for yaks), a serious-minded and sad young man who is Michael's lover, a self-effacing Negro and a male whore brought by the flagrant fag as a gift for the guest of honor.

"Suspense" is created by the unexpected and momentarily embarrassing arrival of Michael's former college chum. At first Michael cautions his guests not to shock the "square" visitor. But as the party progresses and any attempt to conceal its character becomes impossible, Michael insists on proving to the intruder that he too is an urning. Michael fails because it is unequivocally apparent that the victim of the evening's charade loves his wife even though he may have been obliged to repress his tendency to inversion. This humiliates Michael who breaks down in a fit of hysterical self-reproach.

"If we could only not hate ourselves," Michael weeps. Though this outcry may be extended to the bulk of mankind it does not make the play profound, moving or "psychological." What it possesses is a smooth veneer skillfully applied in a vein now become fashionable.

Returning to the uniformly excellent

The Nation BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

- ☐ VIETNAM FOLLY
by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ THE FREE WORLD COLOSSUS: A critique of American Foreign Policy in the Cold War by David Horowitz (Hill & Wang, $6.95) $5.55
- ☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $3.95
- ☐ THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER by Ronald Sampson (Pantheon, $4.95) .. $3.95

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

4-29-68

acting, particular commendation is due Laurence Luckinbill as the college teacher, to Leonard Frey as the viciously intelligent birthday boy, to Frederick Combs as the quiet one in the band, and to Kenneth Nelson as Michael.

Robert Moore deserves much credit as director for shrewdness in casting and for the balance between honesty of portraiture and theatrical effectiveness. There are only two "slips" in this regard: when he makes the most effeminate of the boys (well done by Cliff Gorman) become moon-eyed and mushy to indicate genuine feeling, and when he overstresses the "straight" visitor's tension and pain in the struggle with his ambivalence.

George M!, a musical with book by Michael Stewart, John and Fran Pascal, music and lyrics by Cohan himself, revised by his daughter Mary, fits the Palace Theatre—the once renowned house of vaudeville—perfectly. The show is brash, loud, fast.

I repeat: Loud and Fast! Everything—including the ever-changing settings—moves with literally breathless speed. (The management would be well advised to have its understudies ready to go on at all times and to keep a heart specialist in constant attendance.) The song Mary is slowed down a bit, but only to suit the singer's need. I left the theatre with little exhilaration but with considerable admiration for the proficiency of Joe Layton, the director-choreographer.

Pace saves the show. There is not much to it in the way of writing or even melody. The Cohan songs (very agreeable in themselves) are stylized to accord with the general production method of rapid and raucous speech and movement. The Cohan combination of breeziness and nonchalance is replaced by bounce and bombast. There are also some facile parodies of quaint old-time dance routines.

Though the "story" begins in 1878 and runs through 1937—with lots and lots of the "original" tunes—the tone is Broadway 1968, the New York of today, hustling, bustling, brutal. Its nostalgia is noisy. In consonance with the production, which is conditioned by the circumstances of the street outside, the audience whoops it up with bravos and applause like mad, or at least it did when I saw the entertainment at its first matinee, packed with show folk who are always vociferous appreciators.

Joel Grey, who hasn't the slightest resemblance in appearance, tone or manner to Cohan, is an agile and gifted performer who was cast closer to "type," that is, to the possibilities of a genuine characterization in Cabaret. Frail and lithe, he sets the pace. A number of hoofers and dancers (Gene Castle, Harvey Evans) follow suit. Bernadette Peters has the right face and feel for Cohan's sister Josie. A black "brat" Susan Batson is a cute comedienne, and Jacqueline Alloway (in a number of "bits") possesses the sumptuous allure of an old-fashioned show girl. Still the evening is Layton's. But the real star is the prefabricated audience. It makes the evening whatever it seems or aims so hectically to be.

The Negro Ensemble Company's third production of the season is devoted to Wole Soyinka's Kongi's Harvest, a play about an African country called "Isma." It concerns the conflict between a deposed and provisionally imprisoned traditional ruler, devoted to the old ways, hence "reactionary," and a maniacally malevolent dictator bent on progress. Slight as the situation is, Soyinka has made it suffice to suggest the terror and the comedy in such crazy communities where the complex vocabulary and devices of more advanced societies are scrambled with the cunning and symbolism of the primitive.

The dictator has his brain trust, a shabby, confused and disputatious board whom Kongi keeps sequestered and famished while they work out such intellectual problems as the use and justification of slogans. The dictator's chief henchman and spy is called the Organizing Secretary, smooth of tongue, cynical and sneaky, at once boasting and pusillanimous.

The heir to the old ruler's throne is the man in the middle. Though somewhat alien to the old, he is emotionally loyal; distrustful of and disgusted by the cruel duplicity of the new regime, he is committed to little but compromise. As a result he conducts a life of sensual self-indulgence in the seething underworld.

The patriarch of the old order, surrounded by a gaggle of wives, is tenacious of his ancient dignity and code with a certain abidingly sly skepticism, which is at times characteristic of conservatives who no longer credit their inherited beliefs but still despise the pretensions of the new. Looming around them are the appurtenances of the recently imposed industrialism, while in the underbrush we sense the hot beat of the jungle, always threatening to erupt in grotesque and bloody acts.

The alternation of mood from savage horror to grim irony is the most interesting feature of the play. Soyinka's dialogue reveals traces of the divergent aspects of the scene: it is deviously mocking, at moments richly poetic, stiffly or overelaborately eloquent, as if he were translating from a language not his own into another which is also foreign to him. The general texture of the writing—which does not always seem to fit in the actors' "mouths"—while occasionally rough is always savorful.

The cast—Douglas Turner, Robert Hooks and the others—acquits itself well. Simple but stirring dances were arranged by Louis Johnson. In these, the women whose skins glisten with a satin glow, move with a power that is more than muscular, while the men stomp and shudder with a demonic discipline which is not machine made. Jeanne Button's costumes combine colors of the forest with deliberate notes of an absurd contemporaneity.

The evening offers a wide range of substance and sensation for the mentally alert theatregoer.

RUTH WHITMAN

A BURNED-OUT ENGINE ON THE SOUTHEAST EXPRESSWAY

My pretty seagreen manslaying automobile raced lightly up the long hill, scarcely grazing the macadam.

Her heart purred under her hood, the even hum of all her joints played fugue and counterpoint—until she missed a beat:

She drove delicately, trying to hold back the first rasps of disaster. The pistons were out of time, something was dragging *under the tailpipe. A wheel had gone soft.

The dry clashing of injured bearings.
Jammed in mid-course,*

*her slain parts clattered, then stopped.
I climbed out of the car, pale and empty, feeling in my belly—like sudden old age—
the ruined dry engine.*

FILMS / Robert Hatch

The fact of insanity, as it works on the relationships of characters whom we agree to call sane, is a valid, and very ancient, ingredient of drama. But when the insane are made themselves the focus, it strikes me as a way of using sensation to evade commitment. Theatre—however elevated, fantastic or gross—is about how we live now (or used to live or will live tomorrow), and madness is a removal from life. An audience can relate to lunacy only by extending objective pity, and that response has no dramatic context.

I say this remembering that the gradations of mental imbalance are infinite and that the impossibility of defining insanity is a legal platitude. Further, neurosis, often in extreme forms, is common fare of the theatre—it is an element in the make-up of this or that character with which one must cope. But when no explanation can be given for a character's action except that he is insane, there is no way to cope. The proceedings may be eventful but they will not be dramatic, rather desperate antics to stimulate the jaded and frighten the young. Accordingly, I do not greatly admire the current films of two most eminent directors.

To take the more severe preoccupation with insanity first, I supposed for almost the whole of Bergman's Hour of the Wolf that it was the husband (Max von Sydow) who was mad, but toward the end it became clear that his wife (Liv Ullmann) was also deranged. Since the picture is based exclusively on his diary and her account of what occurred, there is no way of knowing what is real, what is distorted and what is utter illusion. It seems safe to say that the two were living in solitude on one of the Frisian Islands before he disappeared, but was there also a house party in a nearby castle; and, if so, how eccentric were the guests? Presumably they did not give a puppet show with live homunculi, and presumably an old lady did not take off her face with her hat (Bergman really wrings the grue out of that whimsy), but otherwise, who can say? And who can say whether the man killed a boy in a fit of homosexual rage or encountered on the beach a woman who displayed a bruised right breast? And who can really care? In such a setup, anything is possible, everything is enigmatic and nothing is significant. It is mere spookery.

I think, also, it is time to stop saying: "Oh, but what a marvelous actor is Max von Sydow—so strong, so sensitive, so suffering." In fact, he gives every sign of being a badly spoiled actor (no wonder), who is almost completely inert, trusting to get by on his protruding cheekbones and Bergman's melodramatic lighting. I am weary of the very sight of him.

The heroine of Luis Bunuel's Belle de Jour is also deranged. I am not referring to the fact that, a woman frigid with her husband, she is under a compulsion to work afternoons (hence her pseudonym) in a whorehouse, but to her collapse in moments of stress into a catatonic state in which she suffers episodes of masochistic atonement. This unhappy woman (Catherine Deneuve) does indeed have periods of reason, and her madness is relevant to the behavior of the other characters, so the situation is by no means as extreme as with Bergman's creeper.

My problem with Bunuel's film is that I find it unserious overall and most interesting in detail. At its conclusion, the husband (Jean Sorel) has been blinded and totally paralyzed by gunshots from his wife's ferocious young gangster customer (Pierre Clementi, with Lon Chaney teeth). He knows the "truth," and she knows he knows it, but he cannot show whether or not he forgives her. She will go on nursing him through the years, with this "thing" between them. Coming after preoccupations with Lesbianism, sadism, masochism, masturbation, incestuous necrophilia and the abuse of children (to say nothing—because I do not know—of what the Chinese client may have had in his lacquer box) this ending is not only a naive contrivance in the O. Henry manner but its moral reference is dubious when applied to a woman who can find gratification only in commercial union with sexual freaks (she has but one approximately normal customer out of the lot) and who falls into trances in which she imagines herself whipped by coachmen and violated with a broken wine bottle.

The acting is fine. Miss Deneuve totters on the edge of lunacy with poignant conviction—her approach to the brothel makes you sweat. Genevieve Page is superb as the chic Lesbian madam. Michael Piccoli has an unusually interesting part and plays it with quiet relish and understanding. He is an elegant from the age of reason and the sadistic heart of the film. But such are the circumstances of his victims that he can indulge his lust for mental cruelty with complete moral logic. Sadists rarely have so fair a field, but his wickedness is familiar and chilling far beyond the gothic excesses of the heroine's fantasies.

I liked also the fact that, whereas Miss Deneuve's earlier hallucinations had involved an elegant carriage in which she or her tormentors were riding, in the final dream it drives past empty: there is to be no more solace in fancied punishment; the madness may continue but the pain will be real. This does a good deal to wipe the smug patness from the closing tableau.

Finally, the picture is luxurious in its appointments and handsomely peopled, and this gives a memorable sweetness to the decay. As always, Bunuel has a sure instinct for the suppurations of the soul. In this picture, though, he carries it to the sentimental fallacy of a greater fascination with the sores than with the souls. Except that she needs to be raped daily, the heroine is a dull girl.

PUBLICATIONS

OUR GENERATION

Largest circulation Quarterly of dissent in Canada and of the New Left in North America—

Analyzes, Reports, Reviews, Theorizes:

- the movement for educational university reform
- the black power and human rights
- the peace and anti-Vietnam war
- the anti-poverty and community organizing
- the Quebec independence movement
- tactics and strategy of New Left in Canada and U.S.A.

Sample issue: $1.50

Subscriptions: $5.00 ■ Issues

3837 St.-Laurent Blvd., Montreal 18, Canada

YOU SHOULD KNOW CANADA BETTER!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION
Editor: C. W. Gonick

Leading forum of Canadian opinion. Independent and lively.

Send $4.00 for a trial year's subscription—8 Big Issues

Write:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1411
Winnipeg, Canada

GROUP NOW FORMING

to publish a new National Weekly Journal of Opinion: Jewish-oriented on the order of The Nation, New Republic and Commonweal. Location: New York City.

Seeks writers and complete staff.
Cooperative venture on profit-sharing basis.

Send full details to:

P.O. Box 703, Harrisburg, Pa. 17103

THE FUTURIST, published bimonthly by World Future Society, reports scientists' forecasts for coming decades. Subscription: $5 yearly. Box 19285-N, Twentieth Street Station, Washington D.C. 20036.

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

FROM PEKING & HANOI: Mao Tse-tung's "Quotations" & "On People's War" both famous little red books for $1.00. Ho-Chi-Minh's "Prison Diary," 75c. Subscription to Peking Review, 52 weeks, air, $4.00. Subscription to Vietnam Courier, 26 weeks, $5.00. Payment with order to CHINA BOOKS, Dept. N, 2929-24th St., San Francisco 94110. FREE CATALOG.

BUY YOUR BOOKS THROUGH THE NATION

Crossword Puzzle No. 1247

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 and 23 down. One who holystones the captain's area, or just several of the hands involved? (6,2,6)
- 5 This might make the way even for one who picks and chooses. (6)
- 10 A bovine type might, like a famous soprano. (5)
- 11 Reel in your hose, perhaps—they might point out the best way way to land.
- 12 Quietly waiting for one to be treated?
- 13 and 14 What's on the end of the line and rod? The honest salesman shouldn't use it. (4,3,6)
- 15 In quite a long time the image will be an apparition. (7)
- 18 Come to pieces, but certainly not in the manner of a bolero-maker. (7)
- 21 A composition in G wasn't likely to yield the sounds of the strings. (6)
- 24 Passes on the story of demonology? (7)
- 26 Wrestle out of it, or suffer when it's oppressive? (7)
- 27 Coming from U.S.A., sure to make the outfit in June! (9)
- 28 Is such humor indelicate or bad form? (5)
- 29 Said to give an appearance of smiling?
- 30 Real study spot in the Mediterranean.

DOWN:

- 1 If you want to make a pot, you might follow this. (6)
- 2 Where a ring is part of the overhead? (4,5)

- 3 Water or air, perhaps, in your heating appliance. (7)
- 4 Where one might find at least two hands doing sentry duty? (2,5)
- 6 Take back a measure. (7)
- 7 The sort of cad, it appears, to make pronouncements. (5)
- 8 One might pay it without the middle edge! (8)
- 9 Blue? An apparant lack of know-how if you are! (6)
- 16 The somewhat airy type strike a match with a few! (9)
- 17 Commercially hydrochloric. (8)
- 19 A half-dozen tricks might make you catch something. (7)
- 20 Possibly an 8 down who has no home of his own. (6)
- 21 Tortoise-like defense? (7)
- 22 Certainly not the latest retort. (7)
- 25 Certainly not against such a day as May 8, 1945, when put to the test. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1246

ACROSS: 1 and 25 down Weather-strips; 5 Scowls; 10 Limoges; 11 Warbled; 12 and 15 down First-class mail; 13 Old timers; 14 Raced; 16 Kestrels; 19 Pass-word; 22 Mayor; 24 Positions; 26 Types; 28 Italics; 29 Uniform; 30 Enlist; 31 Pea-green. DOWN: 1 Wildfire; 2 Armor; 3 High tides; 4 Rostock; 6 Corgi; 7 Welles-ley; 8 Sadist; 9 Swedes; 17 Remitting; 18 Freshman; 20 Oboist; 21 Dispute; 23 Spline; 27 Prone.

PERSONALS

YOU CAN BE A CITIZEN DIPLOMAT TO RUSSIA
THE "GLASSBORO WAY"

For details write:

CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS

Dept. N/29, 10 W. 41 St., NYC 10036

or Telephone: (212) LT 1-8113

SNOOPY FOR PRESIDENT—249 other under-ground buttons. 1/25c, 5/$1, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Free catalogue to all. Free sample to stores. Big-Little Store, 1671 Washington, San Francisco, 94109

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: write Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 44 East 42 Street, N.Y.C. 10017.

BUTTONS, PEACE JEWELRY, POSTCARDS, POSTERS, psychedelia, etc. Unusual merchandise. Good service. Wholesale to all. 10c brings exciting free catalogue air mail. FREE SPEECH, INC., 28 St. Marks Place, N.Y.C. 10003

INTERESTED IN LIFE? Believe men should live each day to the fullest? So do humanists. For information write: Dept. N-1, American Humanist Association, 111 Camino del Mar, San Francisco, Calif. 94121.

DISCOVER a fun way of meeting interesting, alert Jewish singles. For FREE analytical questionnaire write: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 350 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036

OLD COPIES OF THE NATION available. Write: Box 30, Northport, Long Island, N.Y. 11768

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE

(Computerized Matching—All Ages)
"Let TEAM make you a team."

Write:

TEAM Project

245 East 30th Street

New York, N.Y. 10016, Phone NR 4-7000

TRAVEL

TOUR YUCATAN—July 8th, all expenses from New Orleans and return—12 unforgettable days —$400. MEXICAN TOURS, P. O. Box 274, Lombard, Ill. 60148.

EDUCATIONAL

ARTHUR MORGAN SCHOOL, Burnsville 5, N.C. Grades 7, 8 and 9. Co-educational, Quaker-related, informal. Work-study program.

WORKER WANTED

INTERESTED IN KEEPING BUSY AND AIDING A GOOD CAUSE? Needed for part-time clerical assignment, small liberal publication. Duties include: Work with mailing house, keeping records, and occasional manuscript typing. Salary secondary. For further information write: Box 609, c/o The Nation.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALGONQUIN 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) a line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
212-512-1000

‘Thank you, Mr. Clurman!’

To Harold Clurman the theatre has never been escape but a closer embrace of the stuff of life and what binds man to his brother. Perhaps that's why he has just been awarded the Sang Prize for the Fine Arts—if so Mr. Clurman helped write the terms of the prize by convincing us that that is what the theatre is about. Anyway, that's why he's drama critic for The NATION.

If you've ever wondered what makes his views on theatre so roundly convincing and solid in humane concerns, read his book THE FERVENT YEARS. It's an unvarnished account of his work in building the Group Theatre of 1931-41.

His book on the Group Theatre is FREE with each NEW subscription.

To The NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll try you for 1 year (48 issues). Enclosed is $10. I understand you'll send me FREE Harold Clurman's THE FERVENT YEARS.

☐ I'll sign on for 6 months. Enclosed is $6.

(Add $1 postage for Canada, $2 Foreign)

Name

Street

City State Zip

N 4-29

Here is how Mr. Clurman describes the Group production of Clifford Odets' Waiting for Lefty:

"Our youth had found its voice. It was a call to join the good fight for a greater measure of life in a world free of economic fear, falsehood, and craven servitude to stupidity and greed. 'Strike!' was Lefty's message, not alone for a few extra pennies of wages or for shorter hours of work, strike for greater dignity, strike for a bolder humanity, strike for the full stature of man."

We'll send THE FERVENT YEARS to you FREE if you subscribe to The NATION today.

"Mr. Clurman writes brilliantly of these high-minded young idealists (the average age was twenty-seven) who banded together, faced economic difficulties and endured discomfort, even poverty, to study Stanislavsky's method and produce unusual worthwhile plays . . . THE FERVENT YEARS is full of humor and insight; a brilliant, important book. Thank you, Mr. Clurman!"

The New Yorker

The good fight
is now in

THE NATION
—Why not
join now?

BURLINGAME
MAY 6 1968
LIBRARY

WASHINGTON, LIKE IT IS FAITH BERRY

THE NATION

MAY 6, 1968 35 cents

West Germany

YOUNG REBELS, OLD FEARS

CHRISTEL KOPPEL and DAGMAR SCHULTZ

'No Ordinary Light'

REFLECTIONS ON NONVIOLENCE

JOAN V. BONDURANT

THE SCRUTABLE EAST

Giap, Chou and the Willies

JONATHAN MIRSKY

DWIGHT H. PERKINS on Myrdal's 'Asian Drama'

ENNETH LAMOTT on The Survivors of Hiroshima

YN YOUNG, KENNETH REXROTH, NORMAN J. GALLO

Y ANDREW MILLER, KEY P. YANG, ALJAZ AHMAD

Ten Poems by Ho Chi Minh

5-21-68
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
CA 94010

LETTERS

Rx for the country

Stamford, Conn.

DEAR SIR: I read the excerpts of editorials on the back cover of the April 15 Nation to my wife, the ones which show you predicted President Johnson's decision not to run in '68.

"Who knows," she said, "maybe he reads The Nation and took the hint."

Would that all the leaders of this country could read The Nation and take many of your hints and suggestions! It would be a far better country in many respects.

Joel M. Berns

AID and politics

Rio de Janeiro

DEAR SIR: Howard J. Wiarda's essay in your Feb. 19 issue ["The Dominican Fuse"] was in general an excellent analysis of the Dominican political scene vis-à-vis the Alliance for Progress. However, his statement, "The goal of promoting social change . . . has been abandoned," glosses over important social and democratic achievements that have been registered in recent years. I speak of the Office of Community Development's program which employs hundreds of young and intensely nationalistic Dominicans, some of whom participated in the 1965 revolution on the side of the Constitutionalists. I served as an instructor and consultant for the Office of Community Development from April, 1964, through October, 1966.

In passing, Mr. Wiarda refers to the office: "Thus while the United States is practically sovereign in some areas (such as the Dominican Office of Community Development), it can do little more than make suggestions in others." Professor Wiarda could have put the finger on almost any other Dominican agency and his assumption would be unquestioned. It is evident that he did not explore the objectives of or the three-dimensional realities achieved by the Dominican development program. Indeed, the office would be an ideal paradigm for strengthening the other half of his argument. As the director of the office, Mr. Fiore Marra has consistently followed and exercised an autonomous and independent, if sometimes peremptory, leadership of the office's activities, agreeing to Yankee assistance on his terms.

American Peace Corps volunteers would do well to follow the skilled example of the typical office field worker, who lives and works in the rural communities motivating grass-root community action. . . . I mention here only a few of the socio-economic accomplishments realized in the last three years. As of Jan. 1, 1967: farm to market roads, over 200 km; irrigation canals, 30 km; classrooms constructed, 200; potable water systems, 20; latrines, 1,000 units.

Nearly 70,000 farmers have volunteered their labor on 2,000 self-help, community improvement activities. The office field workers have fostered the organization of hundreds of local groups of leaders. In addition, several farmers' associations have been encouraged to improve and increase their crop yields by the provision of easy credit loans.

The Alianza has sponsored a winner for a change. Implicit in Wiarda's spurious assumption is a condemnation of the Agency for International Development's economic and technical assistance. By inference and omission he has done a disservice to both AID's and the Office of Community Development's serious attempts to cooperate meaningfully

(Continued on page 601)

EDITORIALS

The New Danger

By taking himself out of the 1968 race, and by starting (or appearing to start) negotiations with Hanoi, President Johnson has, as one reporter put it, de-escalated and dis-jointed the normal political combat which would otherwise have been the order of the day. But the United States, from the earliest days of the cold war and before we bogged ourselves down in Southeast Asia, has insisted on deeds, not words, in negotiations.

Johnson's one deed, aside from removing himself from what had become a well-nigh hopeless political contest, was to concentrate the bombing in a smaller area, and so to intensify it strategically. Hanoi could scarcely be expected to respond with the outstretched hand which Secretary Clifford seems to think would have been a proper quid pro quo. Hanoi replied only that it would negotiate for a complete cessation of the bombing, and named two locations acceptable to it. It then turned out that the President's offer to negotiate any place, any time, was subject to the rule of reason cited by Clifford—who is apparently functioning as the President's counselor-at-law as well as his Secretary of Defense. But "reasonable," which can have a very broad and obstructive meaning, was a qualification which the President had not inserted in any of his reiterated pleas for negotiation.

Yet this tergiversation, obvious as it is when one looks at the record, is not obvious to the front-page-headline reader, and it therefore puts the peace candidates in an awkward position. The Vietnamese issues remain as dangerous as ever, and as much an obstacle to domestic tranquillity, but criticism of the President becomes difficult.

Nixon, of course, is delighted. Wrapping himself in his drip-dry, spot-proof mantle of self-righteousness, he has proclaimed a moratorium on criticism. It is his sacred bipartisan duty to remain silent while Mr. Johnson wrangles with Hanoi. Governor Rockefeller, while by political instinct less mealy-mouthed than Nixon, has not enlightened us as to his views. It is the Democrats who have the problem.

Robert Kennedy has fired a cautious shot or two from safe cover. Hubert Humphrey is working out a strategy under which he will be the loyal, experienced junior partner in the Johnson-Humphrey Administration, yet no longer one who supported the Vietnamese War as ardently as appeared to be the case only a few weeks ago. Only Senator McCarthy, with his usual courage and candor, has rejected the moratorium on criticism out of hand. He intends to keep on discussing the issue until it becomes clear that the Administration has changed its policy and is ready for real negotiation, one in which both sides must be prepared to yield something in order to achieve peace.

Not only that, but he has gone far afield, viewing Vietnam as only part of a larger complex. He asked: why not negotiate in Warsaw, and ultimately consider recognizing Communist Cuba and Communist China? The North Atlantic Treaty Organization might as well be scrapped. We paid ransom to retrieve Castro's prisoners after the Bay of Pigs; such transactions are distasteful, but is there any other way to get back the crew of the Pueblo?

By such common-sense statesmanship and appeal to reason, McCarthy has at least partially pierced the armor in which the President encased himself by his speech of withdrawal. In McCarthy's own words, the continued heavy bombing in the chosen area, the sending of more troops to Vietnam, and the call-up of additional reservists (some of whom have gone on TV to protest), "taken together can only discourage us as to what our first purpose was and also encourage us to continue the effort on through the campaign."

So speaks McCarthy, clearly and candidly on this issue as on others. In terms of votes, it is probably a standoff. The political decency it bespeaks, and the respect for the electorate, are admirable, but in politics good works are not always rewarded.

The New Answer

The best defense is an offense, the generals tell us, and it is as often true in politics as in war. In the foreseeable future of the Vietnamese confusion, the critics of the President will be at a disadvantage to the extent that their criticism is merely negative—and the more so because in the negotiations, whenever they do finally convene, Hanoi is going to be as tough as Washington, and to the average American our negotiators will seem reasonable by contrast. But much can be done to counter this lopsided view, inherent in the nature of nationalism, by constructive pressure on the Johnson-Humphrey Administration.

This can take several forms. Former New York City Councilman Paul O'Dwyer, who is seeking the Democratic nomination for U.S. Senator, has been calling on the President to propose a cease-fire in Vietnam to provide a favorable atmosphere for peace negotiations. Mr. O'Dwyer, joined by Senator McCarthy, also called for the resignation of Secretary Rusk. That would show the Administration's determination to achieve peace, but for that very reason is not likely to occur.

But the best tactic of all—for which major credit must be given to Mayor Lindsay of New York—is to shift the emphasis from Vietnam to the crisis of the cities. In an angry speech to Harvard students on April 20, Lindsay said white America is "not getting the message" of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, of which he is vice chairman. Nor is it getting the message of the murder of Dr. King. Great is the grief at the death of a martyr, but it rises to a sharp peak and dies away. Some sentiment remains, but action is what is needed.

Thus to shift the focus of attack to the cities is by no means to abandon the issue of Vietnam, for as long as fighting continues there, effective action in the acute problem areas of America will remain impossible. Lindsay's insight is that pressure can still be placed on the Administration to deal honestly with America, but pressure in an area where critics need have no fear of "spoiling" progress by injudicious suggestions, complaints or demands.

Mayor Lindsay spoke scornfully of "vague calls . . . and slogans," directing his fire, according to his aides, not

IN THIS ISSUE

May 6, 1968

EDITORIALS

586

ARTICLES

589 The Capital Scene:

Washington, Like It Is

Faith Berry

592 "No Ordinary Light":

Reflections on Nonviolence

Joan V. Bondurant

596 West Germany:

Young Rebels, Old Fears

Christel Koppel
and Dagmar Schultz

600 New Zealand Conference:

Peace, Power and Politics in Asia

C. P. Fitzgerald

BOOKS & THE ARTS

602 Some Daughters of China Marilyn Blatt Young

603 Problems of the Soft Societies Dwight H. Perkins

604 Community of Death and Guilt

Kenneth Lamott

605 Burchett's North Korea

Key P. Yang

606 From "Prison Diary" (poems)

Ho Chi Minh

607 Two Poems of Pakistan

Aijaz Ahmad

608 Giap, Chou and the Willies

Jonathan Mirsky

610 Haiku and Religion

Kenneth Rexroth

612 The Lady Wrote It Down

Roy Andrew Miller

613 Book Marks

Norman J. Gallo

615 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher

JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher

GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor

CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor

PHIL KATZ

Executive Editor

ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor

HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014, Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 for Canadian postage; $2 for foreign postage.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 206

No. 19

only against the President but Robert Kennedy and Gene McCarthy as well. In the last case, the criticism is the least justified: the trouble is that McCarthy's quiet manner does not convince Negroes, who are accustomed to the lost eloquence and religious appeal of Dr. King, or to the call to arms of Rap Brown and Stokely Carmichael. McCarthy, though his campaign for the nomination is going well, must convince the mass of Negro voters that he is their man, if he expects to be elected. He must counter the negativism of Richard Nixon, who under the incongruous color of honesty, in effect tells the Negroes that they will get nothing this time around. The ghettos are certainly not going to be rebuilt or eliminated in a day, but if some of that $30 billion a year which is being spent for murder, rapine and corruption in Vietnam and Thailand were diverted to the ghettos, the first cracks might be seen in the walls of poverty.

The politics of the situation is generally unfavorable. There may be a tax hike which, in an election year, will create still more problems about spending for welfare. Taxes will be raised to keep the war going and to hold the line on the dollar and on inflation, but the price Congressman Mills and his crowd will demand is no increase in the social services most urgently needed.

The American Society of Newspaper Editors reacted coldly to Governor Rockefeller's proposals for a big spending program for the cities. The speech was badly written for a speaker of Rockefeller's style, but its gist was sound. The Administration's record, on the other hand, is wide open to attack. After the Newark outbreak Rockefeller visited Johnson quietly and urged a meeting of top leaders to avert further manslaughter. Johnson did nothing, and Detroit exploded. Now preparations for the coming summer are mainly military—beefing up the National Guard and federal troops to contain mobs in the streets.

The task of the Democratic candidates is twofold. They must keep hammering away at dilatory Administration tactics in negotiations with Hanoi. And they must demand substantive action against the outrage of the cities. They can probably best accomplish the first by being implacable in their demands for the second.

Landmark for the Seamen

In our issue of January 30, 1967, Dorian J. Fliegel ("Curran's NMU: Headquarters vs. the Men at Sea") explained in some detail how it is that Joseph Curran, now in his thirtieth year in office, is the only president the National Maritime Union has ever had. The explanation is quite simple: qualification rules have restricted national officers to some 355 of the union's 50,000 members. A group of dissidents, one of whom was severely mauled some months ago near union headquarters "by persons unknown," obtained reprints of the article and they were widely circulated among the membership. These same dissidents also induced the Secretary of Labor to bring proceedings under the Landrum-Griffin Act to set aside the 1966 election, charging fraud.

Last week Judge Constance Baker Motley, of the Federal District Court in New York, ruled that the 1966 election was illegal. To the union's argument that it was necessary to restrict high office to a coterie of members because of their vast maritime experience, Judge Motley laconically observed that many of the national officers of the powerful seamen's union had not sailed on vessels in twenty-five or thirty years. The decision has been correctly characterized as "a landmark" in the uphill struggle of the seamen to achieve a structure of democratic trade unionism. We cannot refrain from noting, in closing the record on still another case in which The Nation has exposed undemocratic trade union practices (see "Postscript to an Article," April 29), that throughout the cold war Joe Curran's NMU has been devoted to a truculent and knee-jerk variety of "anti-communism." Redbaiting may not be the last refuge of scoundrels but in the labor movement it is the first and favorite refuge of labor leaders who run autocratically controlled unions.

It Was the Sheep This Time

About 80 miles southwest of Salt Lake City, the Army Materiel Command operates the Dugway Proving Ground for field tests in chemical and bacteriological warfare. It is one of thirteen associated facilities scattered over the United States engaged in CBR (R standing for radiological) warfare research. At dusk on March 13, Dugway ran a "routine" test involving a high-speed airplane which dispensed 320 gallons of a "persistent chemical nerve agent" in aerosol form, from a height of 150 feet. It also shot off some shells containing the same stuff and burned 160 gallons of it in a disposal pit.

The altitude being so low, and the wind apparently blowing in a safe direction, the Dugway staff foresaw no hazard in their experiment—especially as their proving ground encompasses 850,000 acres, an area larger than Rhode Island. But there are such phenomena as updrafts and changes of wind direction aloft; at any rate, the next day the sheep in Skull Valley, some 27 miles to the west, began dying. They kept on dying to a total of some 6,400, entailing a loss to the owners of about $300,000. There were no casualties among the human beings in the sparsely settled area, although the two veterinarians who performed autopsies on some of the carcasses, and one herdsman, experienced passing illness which might have been caused by the poison that killed the sheep.

The first reaction at Dugway, with its 500 military and 1,400 civilian personnel, was one of incredulity; the base then became secretive and defensive. However, when Brig. Gen. William W. Stone arrived from Washington, he said: "We're in the position of being highly suspect until we can prove otherwise." Now the matter is no longer in doubt. In a telegram to Sen. Frank E. Moss of Utah, the U.S. Public Health Service states that "tests have isolated a compound in snow, water, sheep blood, sheep liver tissue and in grass taken from sheep's stomachs which is identical to that agent supplied by the Army. . . ."

The physiological effects produced by nerve gases are well known. Cholinesterase, a chemical produced by the body, regulates the passage of nerve impulses from one neuron to the next over a junction or synapse. An anticholinesterase agent will disable nerve action and cause death. According to a report to the House Committee on Science and Astronautics, gases or aerosols containing such an agent "create casualties before their presence can be detected by human senses. Less than a minute of exposure is lethal. As gases, they travel via the lungs, although a liquid droplet will penetrate the skin. . . . Symptoms begin with respiratory troubles, salivation and perspiration, vomiting, cramps, involuntary eliminating, and leading through convulsions to death."

Medical World News (April 12) describes the burial of the sheep carcasses by small bulldozers supplied by Dugway, and quotes a doctor at a small hospital in the area: "The sheep's troubles are over. Now I'd start worrying about people." Another doctor says, "We should bear in mind that with a slight amount of misdirected contaminant, there could be a massive human disaster."

Daryl E. Lembke of the Los Angeles Times asked Dr. Mortimer Rothenberg, scientific director of a staff of 450 Dugway chemists, bacteriologists, engineers and other technicians, whether he wasn't disturbed to be working with chemicals and bacteria that could wipe out the human race. Dr. Rothenberg's answer was that the Russians are experimenting with such materials.

That, of course, is the standard attitude of the scientists and engineers of all militarily advanced nations, except for those we-won't-go individuals belonging to the Society for Social Responsibility in Science and a few other such groups. The Nation commented editorially on this dilemma only a few days before the sheep disaster (March 11, "Passing the Biological Buck"). Perhaps the American Association for the Advancement of Science, the National Academy of Sciences and the National Research Council will now speed up their deliberations in this field (relative to U.S. chemical-biological warfare in Vietnam), with a view to ultimate international control of agents which may be as dangerous to the survival of the human race as nuclear-armed missiles.

Fed Up with Reagan

In this season of political surprises, another shock may be in the offing, this time in California. Without benefit of publicity, an organization known as the Reagan Recall Committee is quietly gathering signatures to force Gov. Ronald Reagan into a recall election. The committee claims to have collected 200,000 names on recall petitions, and is confident of obtaining the required 780,000 by the July 31 deadline.

Most political prophets say the petition drive has little chance of success, but they said the same thing about the Peace and Freedom Party in California, which not only qualified for the ballot but had some 39,000 signatures to spare. For what it is worth, we predict that Governor Reagan would survive a recall campaign, but if it became obvious at the time of the Republican National Convention that he was being forced into an election, that fact would hamper his Presidential maneuvering in Miami.

THE CAPITAL SCENE

WASHINGTON, LIKE IT IS

FAITH BERRY

Miss Berry is a free-lance writer who for the past three years has been contributing from abroad to American and foreign publications. She is now living in Washington, D.C.

Washington

"This city is turnin' on," a college student told an audience of some fifty at a recent panel discussion in the nation's capital—"and we're not turnin' off and droppin' out either." The issue was how students view the war and the draft. Speaking for four other similar sounding participants, the youth told listeners that the panelists were symbols of a new era for Washington:

The number-one city doesn't speak for us on the war, the draft, or the war in the cities—the number-one city can't even vote for itself, to represent what to speak for. So we, the new generation will speak for ourselves. . . . And we will change this city into a new symbol—one where it's at—where you tell it like it is . . . and if you want to, you can do your thing.

Parts of Washington have been looking like where it's at to do your thing for about a year—against the war and the draft, in the arts and the university, on the racial front, in the ghetto, in life styles—with the main emphasis on creating alternatives: creating them for the existing system, creating what doesn't exist, and trying to substitute for what already does. The capital, for all else it includes, has five large universities, a 65 per cent black population, and the seat of government ten minutes from the Pentagon. And now it's swinging—between being a happening, a disaster area, and occasionally a citadel of hope. It's changing, especially for the young who seek change most.

Last December, a fund-raising book fair was held by some twenty Washington organizations for a Like It Is Bookshop—due to open as soon as a site is found—with books, magazines, pamphlets not obtainable elsewhere in town; with lectures and debates presented supposedly to tell it like it is on issues ranging from mid-Center to the far Left. The book fair was held at the Institute for Policy Studies, Washington's independent research center that has for its main purpose an effort to help create alternatives. Since opening in 1963, it has been a supporter of do your thing when that could hardly be done in many places in Washington. The institute's research has been not only on how to end the cold war, the war in Vietnam, and war everywhere else but on an analysis of new social and cultural experiments, concepts in education and public policy especially pertinent to the little federal district that, now more than ever, seems to be trying to govern the world.

Also opening new possibilities are some Are-You-Running-With-Me-Jesus? churches in town, a few of which have made the church about the only part of the Establishment some people don't want to hammer away at. The church has been able to keep going through almost 2,000 years of crisis, and these churches in Washington might be showing how it's done. One, St. Stephens and the Incarnation, with interracial, international membership in a city which not so long ago had no interracial neighborhoods, offered at this year's Lenten services, guest speakers delivering Tell It Like It Is Sermons. This church also had H. Rap Brown last year after the Cambridge rebellion, telling it his way. With a minister (Rev. William Wendt) whom some have called "Christ in the 20th Century," the St. Stephens basement has been the scene of be-ins, learn-ins, love-ins, art exhibits, poetry readings, "soul sessions," anti-war, anti-draft organization meetings, African tribal dances, discussions on civil rights legislation, puppet shows and lectures on topics from LSD to germ warfare.

The Lincoln Memorial Temple, where Stokely Carmichael has spoken, gave its parish hall over to public planning sessions for the Pentagon march. Two recently opened coffeehouses, The Iguana and Through the Gate, featuring weekend jazz, folk-rock, poetry readings, plays and art exhibits, are in the basements of churches. Another church coffeehouse, The Mustard Seed, open since last fall, gives an average of 100 hippies a free meal every night. Poetry readings, chess and music are also on the program; a few marijuana takers and LSD trippers have come in, been welcomed, but invited to come back in another condition.

The ghetto is where it's at for more than half of the city's black population. It's where the bloc tenements, the blues and the soul food are—where many are still living where they were forced to live when the city had Jim Crow restrictions. The new emphasis in Washington, as elsewhere, is on black cultural identity, unity and do your thing in new arts and culture centers. Last June, Colin Carew, a former SNCC staffer and once an architecture student, organized The New Thing Center for Art and Architecture. "Some white Washingtonians thought it was for practicing karate in the front and storing guns in the back," Carew, who started the project with a staff of four, tells when he explains The New Thing. The center wasn't preparing riots; if anything, it was preventing them. It organized to tap the creative talent of children and teenagers in the ghetto, and at the same time, to develop black cultural identity. "We're open to any kid off the block, but it happens most of the kids off the block are black," says Carew. The center started in a dry-cleaning plant renovated for classes in drawing, painting, dance and creative writing. With an OEO grant and funds from private donations, it was able to move to a nearby four-story house, adding enough space to accommodate some 250 of the young between the ages of 2 and 20, five days a week. Local jazz musicians were sponsored in weekly concert at a nearby church. Alleys were cleared out for play space.

A group of local architects was organized to draw up designs for building in the neighborhood. Last fall the staff enlarged to include the New Thing Flick Company, teaching photography and film making. In September, space will again be added for about fifty participants in what Carew calls "a place for cats and chicks to come who don't dig school—and don't go—for the hard-core dropouts and the unwed mothers." This is to be the New Thing High School, non-accredited, without grades or diplomas.

In another ghetto area, a group of residents, The Cardozo Area Arts Committee, started in 1966 a center for adult education, The New School of Afro-American Thought. It opened to tell about black culture to both blacks and whites, but now is telling it only to blacks. The initial effort for the school opening was led by a young poet with funds raised from the sale of neighborhood art projects. It was here last December that Stokely Carmichael called together the first meeting of representatives from some twenty civil rights organizations to form a Black United Front. The school began as the first tuition-free institution in Washington to concentrate on the past of blacks taught by blacks—open to the public for classes and exhibits on the history of Africa, of black Americans dating from slavery, of the development of spirituals, jazz, blues, through present-day contributions in the arts and literature. There were and still are jazz workshops, an art gallery, foreign language classes, and a high school remedial program. Annual membership has been $1, and some 350 students have been enrolled. The school recently made plans to move to larger quarters, still has many of the same courses, but the emphasis is now much more militant. Whites, accused by New School associates of "spying, coming in out of curiosity, walking around like the school was a museum, and not being able to contribute to a common black experience," are no longer given membership or, except in rare circumstances, permitted in the building.

Over issues arising from increasing black militancy, Howard, the nation's largest predominantly black university, was recently closed to most of the student body for four days. Some 1,000 undergraduates, until the school was reopened, took over running the campus from parking lot to switchboard—posting signs that temporarily renamed the institution "Black University." It had been closed because students protested the dismissal of thirty-nine undergraduates who had disrupted a Charter Day affair by reading a charter proposing that the school be "re-established"—"to meet the needs of the world's oppressed peoples . . . and renamed Sterling Brown University," after the poet-folklorist who was once a professor there.

At two other local universities, students stressing black cultural identity have organized groups officially recognized on their campuses—last fall The Organization of African and Afro-American Students began at American University, and The Black Student Union at George Washington.

Another campus activity that's do your thing for a couple of hundred students—besides sex, drugs, organizing against the war, and burning mock draft cards—has been teaching at student-led Free Universities. The movement started later here than in other places, but since beginning last fall on the Georgetown campus with some eighty courses, and at American University with twenty-one, plus learn-ins, it has made Washington one of the Free University centers of the nation. Typical courses: "Acid, Grass, and Zen," "Problems in Guerrilla Warfare," "Appreciation of Wine," "Black People—The Indelible Immigrants" and "The Establishment Press." Student-led forums open to the public have also been held with visiting professors lecturing on Vietnam, Southeast Asia, pacifism and conscientious objection. Foreign students have held seminars on their own countries, and free courses have been given in foreign languages.

Identifying Mark of the New Thing Center
Drawn by one of the Children

Off the campus, freedom means doing your thing about what the year-old Washington Free Press on the cover of a recent issue termed "mindless middle-class moralism." One alternative is the Washington Free Community—first discussed last December by some like-minded Washingtonians at the (now defunct) Ambassador Psychedelic Theater. For a growing subculture which first began appearing last summer (and now gets more obvious as the weather turns warmer), the Community is as "free" as Washington can be on $2 a day, room and board.

With the help of two young local architects, the partnership of Michels-Fields, the Free Community began officially renting in early spring. Occupants live in three renovated, sparsely furnished houses of eight to ten rooms each, at a monthly cost of approximately $25 per person. Three other such houses with Free Community-oriented tenants were renting before the Community was organized. Food and vegetables have been bought through farmers' markets; staples and canned goods at discount prices through one already existing co-op store. This costs another $30 monthly. Additional housing, located by a Free Community Housing Exchange and assessed by Michels-Fields, is being renovated by a Free Community Co-op Housing Renovation Committee. A job exchange seeks temporary employment for Community tenants; three Community stores sell clothing, jewelry, pottery and leather goods of those whose living is made from handicrafts. The nearby (Virginia) Twin Oaks Farm, where several Community members now live, is to be a source of Community food, and a co-op child-care center is also planned.

Some local residents, though not living co-op, support the effort. A student at the Institute for Policy Studies is a chief organizer. The institute visiting lecturer, Paul Goodman, who has been advancing such proposals for years, telling us we were all growing up absurd, also approves. The Washington Society of the Parents of Flower Children and The Citizens of the Georgetown Community don't approve. Shrieks have been heard about the psychedelic shops on Wisconsin Avenue and M Street, and how Washington Free Community is turning part of the city into a hippie colony—something like the way Dupont Circle Park looked last summer, with a mélange of everything from drugs to folk-rock. Community people, calling themselves not hippies but "free men," have established Interface, their own citizens' association for keeping a dialogue going with citizens' committees, parents, clergy, police and youth; they meet at The Mustard Seed. Also planned is a Community "Indoor Park," with an information center, coffeehouse, bookstore (reportedly, The Like It Is Bookshop) and craft shops.

Supporting the Community idea and, as a part of it, also creating jobs, are the Washington Free Press, the underground alternative to the local papers, and the Liberation News Service, started last summer to feed information to the national underground press; they are assisted by Insurgent Printing and Graphics. [See "Underground Press: Growing Rich on the Hippie" by Thomas Pepper, The Nation, April 29.] Last January, these three joined Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), the Washington Mobilization Committee To End the War in Vietnam, and the Washington area Committee for The Resistance, in a three-story town-house headquarters now named The Liberated Zone. In addition to its regular activities, the Zone has supported student demonstrations in front of the Selective Service, and protests against the increasing number of Washington-based defense research agencies and defense industries. The alliance also recently organized The Washington Draft Resistance Union for work among high school students. The Washington Mobilization Committee To End the War in Vietnam, in contact with some twelve peace groups in the city, has been publicizing all local anti-war activities in a Mobilizer newsletter. The main hallway of the office headquarters, which in February showed an "Eyemaker of New York" collage collection of war photos superimposed on Madison Avenue Americana, has been converted into a Free Community art gallery.

Another Community counterpart, but on the scene almost a year before the co-ops began, is a theatre of protest for experimental American plays—The American Playground—organized when a former San Francisco Actors' Workshop co-director, Marc Estrin, settled in Washington. Joining forces with lawyer-playwright Edward De Grazia, other Washingtonians who put up money, and a cineast-guerrilla theatre experimentalist from Ohio, Estrin has been overseeing Institute for Policy Studies workshops in acting, dance, cinematography and guerrilla theatre. The group plans to begin working publicly in June in a former firehouse turned 200-seat theatre. Plans include occasionally getting the audience into the act; an underground film subscription is scheduled. The experiments have been heralded as being done nowhere else—although Jerzy Grotowski's Polish Theater Lab and Richard Schechner's Workshop might be guessed to have a few of the same acting techniques.

'NO ORDINARY LIGHT'

REFLECTIONS ON NONVIOLENCE

JOAN V. BONDURANT

Professor Bondurant is a member of the political science faculty and a research political scientist with the Institute of International Studies at the University of California. She is the author of Conquest of Violence: The Gandhian Philosophy of Conflict (revised paperback edition), University of California Press.

Half the world away from Memphis, Tenn., some twenty years ago, a heartsick Prime Minister, himself a noted freedom fighter, put into words the sorrow of a nation: "The light has gone out of our lives," Nehru broadcast to the Indian people, "and there is darkness everywhere."

Mahatma Gandhi was dead. His body had taken three bullets, fired point-blank by a young Brahman. At his trial the assassin described his profound frustration "so long as the Gandhian method was in the ascendance." Without Gandhi, he argued, Indians could be free to retaliate. Through the use of direct and unrestrained action, "Indian politics could become practical," and those who practiced such politics could grow powerful.

Estrin, who has called guerrilla theatre "the most communicative nonviolent means of protest being used today as an art form," has already been out doing exercises with Playground workshop performers in rehearsed street happenings and guerrilla theatre at indoor events, both for special occasions and in support of anti-draft and anti-war demonstrations: last Hiroshima Day, at the Pentagon; in front of the Justice Department; inside President Johnson's church (dressed as worshipers and handing out leaflets during a sermon); showing up at conferences and meetings, satirizing issues and political leaders; at the formal reopening of Ford's Theatre on the street with a mock scene of MacBird meeting John Wilkes Booth; and during the recent speech of a Presidential candidate, staging a funeral march to represent their idea, presumably, of the death of electoral politics, overturning a coffin of campaign buttons and a crumpled American flag.

Playground costumes and materials have been original and authentic, if sometimes looking as though provided by the Salvation Army. An ad in the Washington Free Press on March 27 might explain where some come from in an emergency:

This is not a joke. The Guerrilla Theatre urgently needs pajamas for its next surprise attack, preferably black. Bring them to the Washington Free Press office . . . or call . . . and we'll pick them up. If you have only one pair, sleep naked.

Alternatives have been found to as much as possible in the nation's capital—except as yet there are no tell it like it is postcards to send the folks back home.

A man dedicated to the proposition that violence could be restrained even during the heated conduct of overt conflict (providing that those who fought persevered in the fashioning of new and creative techniques) had been slain by a simple act of extreme violence. After the initial shock, questions came hard and fast. Had violence indeed won the victory? Wherein lay the instruments to power? Who could best wield them? And power for what? The end-means problem had never been more dramatically posed.

Twenty years later the news from Memphis has confronted Americans with similar questions. That the context is so very different has its own significance, but there is much to be learned by taking a steady look—not only at the similarities but also at the contrasts. For today, through another act of simple, extreme violence a fearless American, dedicated to struggle without violence, lies dead. And the questions are still with us.

How is it possible that in the twenty years between the death of Gandhi and the death of Dr. King the basic questions about nonviolence have not been answered? One may begin by suggesting that the truly fundamental questions have seldom been asked. To contemporary America the posing of such questions, and the shifting of focus which that necessitates, has now become imperative. For those who believe, as did Gandhi's assassin, that power can come through retaliation are promoting "confrontations" in our streets, seeking the repression which such action elicits in the hope that by building upon the reaction to such repression they can generate power which, they say, is to be used to effect political and social change. Let them—and those who would follow them—learn from the experience of others that such methods fail of any constructive purpose. Let them not misread either the immediate outpouring of emotion (which always follows in the wake of the murder of respected leaders), or the destructive acts of those who, with slight capacity for restraint, join the burning and looting and rioting.

The failure of Gandhi's assassin and of those who sought to pursue the line of reasoning which led up to his act was foretold by Nehru as he continued to ponder and amend his words—even as he spoke them—to the bereaved India of 1948. He said that the light had gone out, Nehru reflected, "and yet I was wrong":

For the light that shone in this country was no ordinary light. The light that has illumined this country for these many years will illumine [it] for many more . . . and the world will see it and it will give solace to innumerable hearts. For that light represented the living truth, and the eternal man was with us with his eternal truth reminding us of the right path, drawing us from error, taking this ancient country to freedom.

Nehru, himself instrumental in forging a revolution, had often chafed under the restraints laid upon him by Gandhi. Yet he was later to describe Gandhi as the greatest revolutionary of all time. Here, then, was a statement about leadership, and I shall return to that central question of what is required of the leader who would use methods which are not violent, and the different but also significant demands placed upon those who would follow such a leader.

Gandhi was dead, but the ideas which underlie the technique he had first evolved during his twenty years in the subjugated lands of Africa, and which continued to develop during the struggle for Indian independence, and in the cause of removing social disabilities which bound millions of Indians—this body of ideas and some notion of the technique did not die. That there might be an alternative to violent means for conducting conflict echoed around the world and gave hope to others. It was to such a consideration that the young Martin Luther King was drawn as he entered upon his own leadership of conflict without violence.

During the winter of 1955 the Montgomery bus boycott eloquently opened an era of direct nonviolent action in the American civil rights movement. The constructive surge of those initial months gave every indication that nonviolent techniques would continue to be imaginatively applied. The determination with which Dr. King launched that movement, the spontaneous momentum it gained, and the support aroused throughout the country gave reason to hope that sustained experience would lead to refinement of techniques. ". . . the boycott movement has brought something new into the lives of the Negroes of Montgomery," wrote L. D. Reddick (in Dissent, Spring, 1956). "They would be loath to give it up. Whenever the boycott ends, it will be missed."

In those days one dared ask whether lessons from the struggle for civil rights in this country could be used in the search for, and refinement of, techniques for conducting disputes constructively on the international level. It seemed then that few would deny the need to find and advance new methods of conflict. But the promise of Montgomery has yet to be fulfilled even at home. Destructively oriented means accompanied the challenge to leadership; impatience (which Gandhi labeled a form of violence) became the overriding consideration. The objective of integration—so well started toward realization in the Deep South, where Dr. King had moved with sure instinct to effect change through insisting upon legal rights—rapidly eroded as the cry for power took on a racist tenor in the cities of the North. "We shall overcome—some day" seemed no longer enough. The desire for instant remedies was translated into the repeated angry demand: "Freedom now!" Those who seemed neither to understand nor to care what is required for effecting change, when the nature of that change is profound, listened to the counsels of those prepared to use any means. Threat, fear, guilt and overt violence came to be understood as the effective instruments of change.

It is here that the argument must be joined and the seldom raised questions posed. We all know that immediate change can be effected through violence. Political power does indeed "grow out of the barrel of a gun," as Mao Tse-tung, the master strategist of guerrilla warfare, has instructed every Communist to "grasp as truth." But the significant questions remain: To what purpose? What happens to objectives when unrestrained violence becomes the chosen instrument of change? And, above all else, how are basic values to be defended or promoted with the use of means selectively violent?

The argument shifts from means to ends and back again where now it has come to rest on questions about the adequacy of nonviolence. For nonviolence all too often constitutes violence in symbolic form. At times, and with some, it is consciously designed as such; with others, unconsciously sustained. Gandhi came to understand the danger inherent in such unawareness. And in his persistent efforts to fashion alternatives to violence he learned to avoid pitfalls which, in these days, trap many an American as he unwittingly practices his "nonviolent" action. The field of nonviolent action is cluttered with debris, the residue from experiences poorly conceived and having no solid foundation.

Gandhi, who devoted the better part of his life to experiments in the nonviolent conduct of conflict, was also the first to urge that experimentation should be continued. No one was more aware than he of the ease with which nonviolence could be corrupted into violence. In the end he placed his reliance principally upon the leader's carefully trained and tested purity of motive and the followers' equally tested capacity to accept discipline and the suffering so often entailed. If, as some argue, only a man of Gandhi's stature could be such a leader, then the prospects for continued use of nonviolent techniques would indeed be dim. But the technique Gandhi developed was not confined to abstention from violence. He called it Satyagraha (literally, the grasping for and holding onto truth). An analysis of the many Satyagraha campaigns conducted in India during Gandhi's lifetime—led not only by Gandhi himself but also by others—leads to the inescapable conclusion that the technique can be understood, and learned and used by others.*

One of the disappointments in the American civil rights movement is that it failed to exploit and refine the Gandhian technique. That it can be analyzed, communicated and learned does not mean, of course, that anyone can emerge as an effective leader of Satyagraha once he understands the technique. A rare combination of qualities is requisite for such a leader: keenness and openness of mind, the capacity to understand human error and human potential (a capacity which, with imaginative insight, makes possible the building of bridges between antagonists), patience as well as drive, so that solutions to profoundly complex conflicts can be worked through toward a synthesis which embraces the felt needs of former opponents as well as the needs and objectives of the Satyagrahis themselves.

Conflict will always be with us; yet the instruments of violence become increasingly more dangerous. Among the obstacles placed in the way of getting on with the task of constructing alternatives, perhaps the most obstinate—and certainly the most obfuscating—is the popular use of those tactics characterized by symbolic violence.

Those who consciously set out with violent intent and destructive objective to prosecute their action through means which are not physically violent may be said to engage in symbolic violence in the sense that they substitute one form of action for another. Such "nonviolent" or symbolically violent acts have the contrived significance of violence once removed. There is another form of symbolic violence: symbolic in the psychoanalytic sense which describes behavior as arising from the unconscious, conditioned by personal history. Violence symbolized in this sense may well represent an unconscious wish (to be violent), a counterwish (to be nonviolent) or even both at once. There are indeed those who, attached to the ideals of nonviolence, nevertheless engage unwittingly in destructive acts.

The individual who uses symbolic violence but who believes that he is using no violence may be entirely unaware of the substitute nature of his behavior. Self-righteousness readily attaches to the actions of such persons through a failure to examine personal motives or to appreciate its effect in the objective circumstance. Yet others gain a feeling of self-righteousness through explicit use of the alleged guilt of the adversary. They set out to disclose

* For examples of Satyagraha campaigns in contrasting settings and with varying objectives, together with an analysis of Satyagraha in action, one may consult Joan V. Bondurant, Conquest of Violence: The Gandhian Philosophy of Conflict (revised edition, 1967), University of California Press.

David Myers, Evening News (London): Ben Roth
The Longer Shadows Fall from the Lofty Mountains—Virgil

this guilt and to use it in prosecuting their "nonviolent" attacks. When a group is actively engaged in displaying the guilt of others, while at the same time demonstrating its own guiltlessness, the mechanism suggests psychological projecting. To use guilt in a situation of conflict is to exacerbate the conflict. Gandhi was quite clear on this. "We must refrain from crying 'shame, shame' to anybody, we must not use coercion to persuade other people to adopt our way. We must guarantee to them the same freedom we claim for ourselves."

If the results are intended to be constructive, the use of symbol requires a high degree of awareness. This is one of many aspects of nonviolence which require further exploration, understanding and refinement.

How, then, are we to cope with our present predicament? Can we press further the significant experiments which Gandhi began? It was in the application of some of Gandhi's methods that a distinguished American met violent death in Memphis. If we fail now to ask the significant questions, we fail to render him the credit appropriate to his achievements.

The dedicated leader of activist Americans may well be caught up in a set of contradictions. A British activist acquainted with both violent and nonviolent revolution has written that "so long as you totally reject the use of violence in any form as a means to any end, you can see clearly, feel purely, know where you stand." Ethel Mannin, whose experience stemmed from the Spanish Civil War but continued through an intimate association with the Indian struggle, has pointed out that the moment one reneges from this position to accept the principles of violence in, for example, the interest of a "just" war or a "modified pacifism," the "ambiguity sets in." It is then that one becomes ethically lost. "'The ceremony of innocence is drowned.'"

To those who insist upon acting out their understandable anger over undeniable grievances through confrontations in the streets, as well as to others who wait and watch in order to exploit such retaliation for their own purposes, one can only say: If you succeed in undermining hard-won values through the default which arises from unawareness or by failure to learn the hard lessons of history, then violence has indeed won the victory.

Those who seek purposeful retaliation in the streets are also those who denounce the more disciplined violence of the "Establishment": police brutality—often so terribly real—has now become a slogan; judgmental placards condemning action taken in defense of the freedom of other men (mistakenly or not) disclose the acute hostility entertained by those who proclaim their love for all. The point here does not focus upon the entertainment of anger and hostility—that is to be expected, especially from those seized of genuine and profound grievance. The point, rather, is how the anger is to be channeled. Effective management of the feelings is the task and the test of leadership. Refusal to manipulate high emotion on the part of followers is where the effective leader begins. The commitment of those who accept the leadership of such a man begins with an acceptance of the need to learn how to contain impulsive action in the knowledge that it could well be destructive of value and purpose alike.

In the heat of action one can readily forget that within every organization lies some authority. The "power structure" (now a term of intense opprobrium) is just that because, without political structure, man could not handle violence. The state, with its monopoly over violence, arose not by accident but through design. Therein lies the meaning not simply of order in human affairs but essentially of law. The genuine anarchist seeks to eliminate the state and its institutions in order to eliminate violence. Anarchism has always failed because those who genuinely profess it have been able to offer no substitute for violence to control social chaos. The irony is that anarchists have had to resort to violence in their abortive attempts to overthrow the power structure—the very institutions designed through long experience to contain, if not eliminate, violence.

The Gandhian experiments advanced a technique and approach to the conduct of conflict well beyond what many Americans appear to recognize. Perhaps the most remarkable of Gandhi's achievements was his ability to effect revolutionary change without destroying basic values. If we are to contribute to the advance of such a technique—especially to adapt it to our own time and place—we must begin by acknowledging a need to build on what is already known, to refine technique and to develop a truly adequate alternative. A three-point program is indicated:

(1) Re-evaluate the means-ends continuum as expressed in action (never losing sight of the need to preserve basic values); (2) analyze the failures and pitfalls of symbolic violence so that the program for providing support and concern for all involved in the conflict (including the opponent) can be clearly devised in given conflict situations; and (3) distinguish the ideologue from the problem solver so that the effort will not be perverted by those committed to a political and social philosophy which holds that the course of change is predetermined (and the individual can therefore readily be reduced to a pawn in the irrevocable march of history).

Those now taken up with problems of change, and especially those who are in the process of making a commitment or choosing their leaders, are urged to consider this: "The community of the great demonstration . . . strengthens not only the individual but it also unites and helps in creating esprit de corps. . ." The man who comes to a "mass meeting doubting and hesitating leaves it confirmed in his mind that he has become a member of a community." These words were written some years ago by ■ master manipulator of masses for the purpose of effecting rapid change in a challenge to the existing power structure. They can be read—should one have the inclination—on page 716 of Hitler's Mein Kampf. Appeals such as this can be found in the writings of totalitarian leaders, whether Left or Right.

If, before acting, one were fully to reflect upon the nature of change, however urgent its need; and if, before acting, he were to consider how best to effect the desired reversal in social response, however grievous the injustice; he might do well to juxtapose to the above the following insight by one who, considerably removed from the "unhesitating" crowd, observed (in 1938) that "No common cause can issue from rationalization by which men persuade themselves and not their opponents." (Edward W. Strong, in a lecture delivered before the Philosophical Union, University of California.)

The first test of a constructive movement in social protest is an evaluation of its tone and tactics. Does the movement seek a genuine solution? When questions of choice are forced upon an opponent, is the stress thus generated fully recognized? Is the effort one of support and reassurance to the opponent whose change of habit and behavior is so much desired? To what degree has the encounter established (or suppressed) communication? Has the method embraced an adequate process of inquiry? In what way is the force generated through nonviolent action directed into creative channels—creative, that is, in terms of the overall situation (including the integration of the opponent and his felt needs)?

The conduct of conflict is demanding and complex, and every area of knowledge which man has acquired should be adapted to the development of techniques of force which are not violent. Until we have faced such major questions about conflict and have endeavored to build the framework to support the action, we are in no position to conclude that our hard-won values have become unworthy of us or that our institutions are worthless. To forge the means whereby conflict can be waged constructively, it may well be necessary to become receptive to the exciting technology of our day. If we can devise tools to match those of the well-equipped men of violence—disciplined in a time-honored mode of conducting conflict—then we might be relieved from the threat posed by desperate and defeatist moves of yet others who fight in our streets with so little restraint.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

The brave of heart and the keen of mind have yet to work effectively to fashion weapons equal to the task of adequately opposing violence with stratagems and instruments of constructive force. Until we have something to put in their place, we attack and deride the disciplined military (on the international field) or the corps of police (on the domestic scene) only at our peril.

The warning is clear that widespread alienation can be the most pronounced outcome of change demanded with such considered hostility as that, for example, of "hate whitey" campaigns. The murder in Memphis provides sad and telling evidence. If we take this lesson to heart, then Martin Luther King will have taught us something even through his death.

WEST GERMANY

YOUNG REBELS, OLD FEARS

CHRISTEL KOPPEL and DAGMAR SCHULTZ

Mrs. Koppel and Miss Schultz have both studied at the Free University of West Berlin and are both at present doctoral students at the University of Wisconsin.

Bombs thrown into U.S. Information Center! Greek Embassy besieged! Attempted assassination against Vice President Humphrey! The Mayor of Berlin resigns! (civil war in Berlin?) High school students sweep Germany with violent demonstrations! Windows of newspaper offices broken by students! (Red terror or Fascist revival? Will Bonn take the course of Weimar?)

Such were the headlines and such the fears of West Berliners and West Germans when revolutionary student fervor took over the universities. The more organized, the more radical and, in recent times, the more violent the activities of Germany's New Left have become, the more exaggerated has been the reaction of those who have seen quiescence as the citizen's prime obligation. No more quiescence for Germany! The students have declared protest to be the duty of a critical citizen and the population has responded with an uproar that well matches the students' agitation.

In the last two years the German student movement has grown into an active, influential New Left which has become the only opposition to the Bonn government. This comparatively new phenomenon has its center in Berlin, which has become the focus of student unrest by reason of its unique economic and political history, and specifically because of its Free University.

The history of the Free University divides into three stages. In 1948, a small group of politically motivated professors and students left the famous Humboldt University in East Berlin and founded the Free University in West Berlin. This action was a protest against the authoritarianism experienced in East Berlin, an echo, though from a different ideology, of the Nazi era. However, the desire of this group for academic autonomy and freedom of opinion was soon lost in a preoccupation with the cold war that produced a general reluctance to criticize the German Government and German society.

In the mid-fifties, students became more and more the apolitical citizens of a welfare state. Sociologist Ludwig von Friedeburg wrote of that period: "Publications which present a more thorough and deeper examination of political questions are read only by a minority . . . whereas Reader's Digest finds a wide circulation among the students."

In the early sixties, the war in Vietnam and the proposal of emergency laws to suspend democratic procedures in time of crisis, produced a new upsurge of political activity. The United States' foreign policy and its handling of a rapidly intensifying racial problem disillusioned the students, who had closely associated democratic ideals with American practices.

The progressive character of the Free University, especially the participatory role of the students and the banning of traditionalist and fencing fraternities, was drastic enough to evoke suspicion and criticism. Accordingly, many professors turned down offers from the FU and some of the reforms were compromised in order to establish a prestigious faculty. Furthermore, rapid expansion reduced contact between students and faculty and the influence of the students decreased gradually.

However, from 1948, student political activity had been encouraged by a city that remembered the lack of critical spirit exhibited under the Third Reich. As long as a minority of students were so engaged, and as long as their orientation was anti-Communist as well as anti-Fascist, such behavior was acceptable. The students found support from the Berlin public and press when, after the construction of the wall, they helped fellow students and their families get from East to West Berlin through tunnels, across barbed wire, and by means of forged passports. When the president of the university expelled several students from the student village for possession of explosives, the population and the press were dismayed.

This attitude was not destined to last. The power struggle between faculty and students had sharpened by 1965, and the students became convinced that protest should not be sustained by activist organizations alone, that all students should concern themselves with political issues. The faculty, functioning simultaneously as the administration, was unwilling to accept any criticism which questioned their authority, be it from outsiders, students or instructors.

With the expansion of industry, moreover, the demands for academically trained personnel rapidly increased, and the pressures on the FU administration were passed on to the students, who rebelled against the concept of an "academic factory." In the summer of 1966, two of the overcrowded departments decided to introduce time limits for degrees. (This year, when the decision was challenged by the students, a high court in Berlin declared time limits illegal because they violated the constitution of the Free University.)

The growing institutionalization of the university was just one cause of political unrest among the students. As they were becoming concerned about their role as academics, the escalation of the Vietnamese War turned them into critical citizens. The students were no longer willing to accept the existent three-way social division which assigned to them the role of apolitical students, alongside quiescent citizens, and subject to the decisions of professional politicians. And as they confronted the power structure of the university, the students came to realize that their radical demands were not supported by the press or, as a consequence, by any large part of the population.

The city has always had a lively interest in the FU: it existed, in the prevailing view, to demonstrate to the East Germans the function of a university in the "Free World." The students, however, were developing their own ideas about freedom and how to work for it.

The change in political attitude found its first public expression when, in 1964, liberal-to-left-wing student organizations received a plurality in the election of the FU student government. The public, inspired by the Berlin daily press, 70 per cent of which is dominated by the conservative Springer empire, reacted with an outcry against "Communist infiltrators."

The last few years have witnessed almost continuous anti-Vietnamese War protests by students and like-minded citizens. A march of 10,000 people supported the October, 1967 Mobilization in Washington. In April, 1967, Hubert Humphrey was met by 2,000 hostile students, some of whom were arrested and charged with "planning an attempt on the life of the Vice President"—with smoke bombs and pudding.

On June 2, 1967, however, came the climax of student rebellion. The events of that day exposed undemocratic procedures of the government and had a dramatic effect on previously apolitical West German students. The Shah of Iran encountered in front of the Berlin opera house 2,000 demonstrators who were protesting against the dictator and the hospitality extended to him by the West German Government. A clash between students and police ended with the death of a student, Benno Ohnesorg who, participating in a demonstration for the first time, was shot by a policeman.

During the following days Berlin was in a state of emergency, press and the university administration strongly approving the actions of the city government and the police. Heinrich Albertz, in a hasty statement which was to be one of his last acts as the city's Mayor, denounced the students as "rowdies" and blamed them for Ohnesorg's death.

Senate, police and press released one-sided information about the event, calling it "terrorization of the city by several hundred idlers," and the police union denounced the students as a minority of "hysterical notorious noise-makers," an opinion shared by the majority of the population. The students responded with attempts to engage the local citizenry in informal sidewalk debates.

In all major West German university cities, students, writers, professors and trade unions expressed their solidarity with the students of West Berlin. Ohnesorg was the "coincidental victim of a planned attempt to suppress an extra-parliamentary opposition," said Hans-Joachim Haubold, chairman of the Federation of German Student Organizations. This federation, as well as several individual student groups, demanded a thorough investigation of police and government officials and their possible removal from their posts. Three months later Mayor Albertz was forced by his party to resign and with him the Senator of the Interior and the police chief, but this did not lead to a city government more sympathetic to the students.

Rudi Dutschke, the dark-haired, intense leader of the student movement who made the cover of the German news magazine Der Spiegel, is one of the most vocal theoreticians of the left-wing SDS (Socialist German Student Federation). Immediately after Ohnesorg's funeral more than 4,000 students held a congress in Hannover on "University and Democracy," analyzing the events of June 2 and trying to find the spark to inflame all West Germany's students. Dutschke called for action centers in all West German universities to provoke politicization in university and society.

In November, 1967, radicalization of the students was channeled by the foundation in West Berlin of the "Critical University," in imitation of the American Free Universities. Out of 240 tenured professors of the FU, fifty officially supported the Critical University (CU), whose main goals reflect the ideas of SDS:

- Public enlightenment concerning political goals and interests of the student movement, the political and economic situation of West Germany and West Berlin and the preparation of unified actions with democratic-minded workers and high school students.

- Preparation for resistance against future emergency actions, abuse of the constitution, and police terror.

- A campaign for the critical evaluation of Germany's attitude toward liberation movements in the Third World and their destruction by the American power elite, to be carried out in the universities and among the general population, including Americans stationed in West Berlin.

The CU, with participation of interested high school students, as well as blue- and white-collar workers, is supposed to develop into a component of an extra-parliamentary, anti-authoritarian opposition. It plans to prepare public hearings and tribunals (the first one to be against the Springer press monopoly), and to establish a documentation center exposing the abuse of science for inhuman, destructive purposes.

Besides these new forms of public instruction, the CU

Juhl, P.I.B. (Copenhagen): Ben Roth

conducts colloquia, discussion groups and seminars (no traditional lectures!) dealing with topics which formerly have been avoided or distorted, such as: "Economic Crisis and Social Policy in West Berlin"; "Natural Sciences and Mathematics" (to determine dangers inherent in the apolitical attitude of natural sciences); "Medicine Without Humanity" (to examine experiments with human guinea pigs during and after the Third Reich). Other topics are: "Democratization of the Schools," "Sexuality and Domination," "The Function of Intelligence and Science in the Vietnam War and in the Imperialist 'Development Policy,'" "The Model of Cuba and the Future of Latin America."

At least twenty-five of the thirty-three West German universities have now followed the Berlin example and organized critical universities or at least critical lecture series. The general agreement is that university and society must be reformed, if necessary through revolution.

The movement, at least as far as SDS is concerned, is essentially based upon theories of Marx, Mao and Herbert Marcuse. "Our minimal program is the maintenance of the bourgeois democracy, our maximal condition the transformation of the capitalist countries into Socialist ones," explained former SDS chairman Reimut Reiche.

Students see the parliamentary opposition as an integral part of the establishment which represents the "authoritarian, repressive, established society" of the Federal Republic of Germany. They identify themselves with an extra-parliamentary opposition whose objectives are, according to Dutschke, "to aim toward a system of direct democracy, that is, of a democracy of councils [patterned after workers councils] which allows people to elect and vote out their temporary representatives as they deem it necessary on the basis of a critical consciousness toward any form of power."

The method to be used is a "long march" through the whole system of institutions—the family, schools, universities, vocational schools, factories. The politicization of other parts of the population is, according to Dutschke, more feasible in Berlin than in other cities because of the tense situation of its work force, the outmoded structure of industry, the superannuation of the population, and the dependence on outside subsidies.

The students realize, however, that the role they can play in mobilizing workers is at present fairly limited. "We lost contact with the working masses long ago," said Reiche. This fact is more understandable if one considers that only 5 per cent of the students come from working-class families and probably not all of these are involved in radical political activities. Another reason for the lack of communication might be the academic high rhetoric typical of German intellectuals. It is hoped that eventually the unification of workers and students in form of councils will bring up the question of dual government. The short-term goal is to instill in the workers a consciousness of their political and economic situation and to fulfill supporting functions in strikes.

The immediate impact of the movement cannot be denied. Though it has been criticized for a lack of concrete goals, its direct influence on the development of certain national issues, such as the proposed Emergency Laws, East-West German relations and news media monopolies, has been acknowledged. The greatest criticism has been brought against the more violent tactics of the movement. Dutschke has himself said that a systematic provocation with tomatoes or stones is absurd and can only be understood as an initial form of true argumentation. Violent force is an inherent factor of power and therefore, according to him, has to be answered with demonstrative and provocative counterforce. The form counterforce must take is determined by the form of argument. However, SDS believes that terrorist force, though feasible in certain developing countries, is no longer necessary in the metropolis.

But in Germany, as elsewhere, there seems to be a willingness to see revolutionary methods of the Left and particularly of students as the beginning of metropolitan guerrilla warfare and of a new oppressive authoritarianism. Berlin students have been criticized for irrationally seeking their image of a future world in the developing countries. Liberals, who resent the cynicism and contempt directed against them by the "rebels," eagerly point out the naiveté of this ideology and at the same time, along with conservatives, compare methods of the radicals to those of the Hitler Youth.

SDS chairmen Frank and Karl Dietrich Wolff have explained the parallel drawn with movements in the developing countries as not being a simple identity of interests. "Political struggle never is solely based on existing subjective interests; at least as important is the consciousness of the objectively necessary liberation from domination and force, whether we are dealing with Bolivia, Spain or Germany."

The creation of this consciousness is the goal of the first stage of the societal transformation. The second stage envisioned is to establish a mass base of undergraduates, workers and high school students. The agitation of workers is to be initiated in stagnant and declining industries—Berlin providing a good starting point for this campaign.

Only after this mass base has been assured can a new Socialist party be formed.

Within the universities the spreading movement calling for student participation and university reform will definitely have a strong voice in reform planning and enactment this year. A government commission on higher education is at present working on wide-scale structural changes in the university system.

On the whole, the student movement has caught Germany by surprise and has left its marks within the universities as well as outside. One indication is the flood of publicity, including numerous pamphlets, books and articles, as well as constant news coverage. As Professor Habermas said recently in a lecture at the University of Wisconsin, the German students lack national issues as big as the war in Vietnam and the civil rights movement which split the population, and they often have to construct issues to mobilize fellow students.

Although violence has been declared by the leaders to be "counterrevolutionary," they approve of it as being at least an answer to violent suppression. This ideology has increasingly given occasion to the widespread reproach that the students intentionally provoke the other side to brutality so as to reveal the latent fascism of government and citizens.

The most recent events have brought about a clear split between the Left and the Right in the population, press and government. Encouraged by the Berlin example, even high school students have gone into the streets. In February, West Germans were stunned by a wave of violent demonstrations which flooded the country. The protests of 12-to-18-year-old students against the increase of transportation fares soon changed to a demand for participation in decision making at school. In one city the uprising went so far as to found an "Anti-High School," which, led by university students on a voluntary basis, offers mainly discussion on sexual taboos and sexual aberrations. Sex is still a taboo subject in German schools.

The same month, preceding the planned Springer tribunal, a film was shown to 800 students at the FU on how to make Molotov cocktails; it ended, provocatively, with a picture of the Springer building in Berlin. That night several windows of Springer distribution offices were broken with stones. Springer, after having been accused of his Nazi past, now presented himself as the martyr, comparing his broken windows to those of the Jewish stores destroyed by Nazis in the "Kristallnacht" of 1938. Most of the liberal students disassociated themselves from the violent tactics, realizing that a Socialist revolution is not feasible in Germany at this time, and that violence results in the loss of popular support for student demands.

Tension pervaded Berlin until the city government at the last minute authorized an anti-Vietnamese War demonstration on February 18 to prevent another bloody clash between students and police. Carrying red flags and Che Guevara posters, 10,000 people, including 4,000 students and visitors from European countries and the United States, marched on the U.S. Army Headquarters.

The Mayor immediately called for a counter-demonstration for "peace and freedom," in support of the United States. It was sponsored by most of the unions and, being scheduled on a workday, drew 150,000 people. Some Berliners took this opportunity to express their indignation in ways which were too drastic even for the authorities: banners demanding concentration camps for students and claiming, "Under Adolf this would not have happened," had to be removed. A few citizens believed they had fulfilled their democratic duty by beating up anyone with long hair, a beard or rimless glasses.

The past few weeks have seen an overall escalation of conflict in Germany, caused by the shooting of SDS leader Rudi Dutschke by an admirer of Hitler, said to have been inspired to the act by the murder of Martin Luther King, Jr. The students reacted with violence, making the Springer press empire their immediate target. They attacked its buildings and distribution network and blamed Springer for the climate of intense anti-communism and hostility toward the student Left which they claimed led to the Dutschke shooting. Using Molotov cocktails and the force of numbers, the students tried to block distribution of Springer papers, ransacked several editorial offices, and burned out some delivery trucks.

This carrying of the conflict to the streets has led to a widely expressed fear that Bonn is going the way of Weimar, and many false analogies to the street fighting of that earlier period have been drawn. In fact, the confrontation so far has been entirely between the students and the police, rather than between Left and Right; the only organized Right, the NPD, has avoided any open clash, perhaps because of upcoming elections. Police brutality has brought support for the students from some parts of the population and even from government officials. On the other hand, support from the East German Government, publicly expressed during the riots, could backfire against the students.

The recent flare-ups could lead, on the positive side, to greater government vigilance against monopolization of the mass media by concerns as large as Springer, and could lead to a new spirit of dynamism within the Social Democratic Party and a possible breakup of the coalition government. This might restore true parliamentary opposition in Germany. On the negative side, the recent rioting might give just the impetus which the government needs to pass the Emergency Laws. Fear of this is expressed in the fact that the students have now switched from emphasizing Springer to concentrating on opposing the Emergency Laws. Another negative consequence is that rioting might help the neo-Nazi NPD gain votes in the upcoming elections.

With the lack of a radical Socialist party in West Germany, the country needs a new Left and it can only be hoped that the present movement will not further aid the reactionaries and thus improve the chances of the ultra-right-wing NPD (National Democratic Party of Germany). If Berlin accepts the notion that students are nothing but "terrorists," then indeed there will be a great danger of radicalization of the Right. But if the New Left succeeds in defining concrete goals, planning effective strategies, and increasing its support among the general population, it may become a truly influential force with which any parliamentary government will have to reckon.

Peace, Power and Politics in Asia

C. P. FITZGERALD

Mr. FitzGerald teaches Far Eastern history at Australian National University. He is the author most recently of Concise History of East Asia (Praeger).

Wellington

In the first week of April a conference was held in Wellington, New Zealand, under the title of this article. It was subtitled a "National Conference on Vietnam, SEATO and Political Stability in Asia." "Asia," to New Zealanders as to Australians, tends to mean east Asia, and in particular Southeast Asia. As the conference coincided in dates very closely with the Ministerial Council of the South East Asia Treaty Organization (SEATO), held just up the street in the New Zealand Parliament House, it was widely supposed that the Peace, Power and Politics conference had been called as a counter demonstration. This is not really the case. The PPP organizers had planned to get their conference together when they had raised the necessary money—a factor at first highly conjectural, and certainly not to be equated with a narrow timetable. A group of young New Zealanders were the prime movers in this enterprise, and their outstanding success invites a reconsideration of many current ideas about their country and its standing in the modern world.

New Zealand has long been known and admired as a pioneer of the welfare state, the almost too perfect example of a propertied democracy, the country where race relations with a non-European indigenous minority, the Maoris, were regulated on a basis of democracy, equal civil rights and general tolerance. New Zealanders themselves are the first to question some of these assumptions, entering caveats against excessive praise. They point out that New Zealand, whether under a Labour or National Party government, has been conservative in its approach to wider questions of world affairs, has tended to shelter under the wing of the old British Empire, to which idea many of its citizens remain very firmly, if sentimentally, attached. There has been, they will say, an unwillingness, almost an ostrichlike refusal, to face the hard facts of the south west Pacific area in modern times. Great Britain's decision to withdraw from Asia east of Suez, and its concurrent attempts to enter the European Common Market (even if these latter have so far failed) have created for the first time serious doubts about this traditional attitude, which no longer seems founded on strategic realities or economic certainties.

It is against this background of growing unease and doubt that the PPP conference must be evaluated. The sponsors, a small group with no political platform, were aided by the co-sponsorship of the Committee on Vietnam, a body which united people of varying opinions who believe the war in Vietnam to be neither politic nor just. As New Zealand's commitment to that war is very small (about 500 men of the armed forces), this movement cannot be said to have had the stimulus of deep national involvement in the war behind it. The PPP sponsors decided to set a registration fee of $10, a not trifling sum for young people to raise. Four hundred registrations were hoped for but it was thought that the figure might be as low as 200. With great courage, and not a little faith, the committee of sponsors decided to go ahead, nonetheless, with invitations to a number of well-known people overseas, in America, Europe, India and Australia, whose fares to New Zealand the conference would pay. Just how the bills might be met was somewhat uncertain.

At this point the Minister for Finance, Mr. Muldoon, gave the sponsors a great lift, though that was not his intention, by refusing foreign exchange for these overseas fares. The facts were made public, and the result, apart from a valuable free advertisement for the conference, was that many New Zealanders with overseas funds at their disposal offered to contribute to the fares, which were thus easily met. At the same time, the main organizer of the conference, Mr. Alister Taylor, was dismissed from his post at the New Zealand Broadcasting Commission for his PPP activity. Because of the publicity and protest resulting from this action, the NZBC retracted its decision, but Mr. Taylor took the position that he was now too busy and refused reinstatement. Meanwhile, registration mounted rapidly to a final astonishing figure of more than 13,000. Finance was no longer a problem. The conference having thus demonstrated that it had wide public support and interest, the press gave it fair and excellent coverage.

All this occasioned no little surprise and even shock among the more conservative elements of society. When the conference proved that it could pack one of the largest halls in Wellington on a weekend of perfect late summer weather, not likely to be experienced again for six months or more, the wonder grew. This audience was made up perhaps more than half of young people—university students, recent graduates and men and women under 30. It was entirely orderly, with no demonstrations, or street marches, no exhibitions of emotional reaction to the matters under discussion; but showing a vast majority support for the views of the principal speakers who, each in his way, was critical of the involvement in the Vietnamese War, and urged a new approach to the problems of Southeast Asia. It was demonstrated conclusively that New Zealanders, and in particular the younger generation, were no longer willing to accept old formulas and wanted, above all, information and an outline of alternative policies. In this expectation they were satisfied by Mr. Krishna Menon, who gave the opening address, and stressed the difference in approach between Indians, and other Asians, and the Western peoples. Well-known New Zealand academics, and some from Australia also, supported the theme that the policy of the existing governments in Australia, New Zealand and the United States seemed bankrupt and unable to supply any expectation of a satisfactory solution. Two speakers from the United States, neither of whom is an American citizen, but both long-term residents of the country, Felix Greene and Prof. Conor Cruise O'Brien, gave somewhat varying interpretations of the movement of opinion in the United States, and its possible outcome on policy toward Vietnam and in the forthcoming Presidential election.

On landing at Wellington, Professor O'Brien declared to the press that he did not believe President Johnson would stand for re-election, and that if he did, he would not win. This was on Saturday, March 30. When, allowing for New Zealand time, this prophecy was dramatically confirmed on Monday, April 1, before noon, he found himself obliged to recast the speech he had prepared to take account of his own prescience. It was to be expected that in a conference where most of the attendants were opposed to participation in the war, and almost all were hoping for guidance toward an alternative solution other than ultimate military victory, the news would be evaluated at a level of significance perhaps higher than it deserved. The governments of Australia and of New Zealand were assiduous in playing down the importance of the President's declarations, but these efforts were to some extent modified by press reports of the world-wide reaction. It may be said that in New Zealand, as in Australia, informed opinion, and wider circles also, are beginning to realize that President Johnson's declarations mark a turning point in the history of Western relations with Southeast Asia, and that his decision not to seek re-election gives these declarations a stamp of finality which previous bombing pauses and other endeavors have lacked. Professor O'Brien, to be sure, quoted General Sherman, including the vital final clause—"and if elected I will not serve"—which, as he pointed out, was thus far absent from the declaration by President Johnson.

The conference in Wellington—known locally as "the other conference"—thus had the good fortune to be held at a date which coincided with this major declaration of policy. Speaker after speaker had for three days demonstrated that policy in major matters was not in fact made in Wellington or Canberra but in Washington, and that no real change in the attitudes of the governments of Australia or New Zealand could be expected under these circumstances until a change occurred in the United States. When the unexpected event actually took place, the majority of delegates and participants were almost at a loss; they had taken far too little account of the movement of opinion within the United States, a movement played down in their local papers and almost ignored as unseemly by their national governments. The preoccupation with political attitudes rather than with economic forces was demonstrated by the very slight attention that had been paid to the possible effects on the stability of the dollar and the world price of gold of any full adherence to the still further escalation attributed to the advice of General Westmoreland. It may be that the people of New Zealand, as of Australia, are poorly informed about Southeast Asian realities; it can be seen that they are also very little acquainted with the true state of American opinion and its often rapid changes.

What was accomplished by this conference? It showed that the people of New Zealand, especially the younger generation, are interested in and uneasy about their national policies; that they seek more, and different, information than is provided in their daily papers; that they are worried by the possible hostile response of Asia to their limited commitment in the Vietnamese War, and now uncertain as to their security in a changing world. These manifestations of public opinion, impressive though they may be in terms of packed halls and full registrations, are likely to impress politicians only if they are translated into voting patterns. One reason for the full attendance and the devoted contribution of services by hundreds of young students can be found in the widespread belief that both political parties are unrealistic in their approach to world affairs, and offer little promise of changing their policies to meet a new situation. The young may be too enthusiastic and cherish unreal aspirations, but the elderly are all too obviously without new ideas or comprehension of what goes on in the world. They are complacent without giving any evidence of being wise. In these circumstances, they deserved a kick, and in the polite New Zealand way, they certainly received one.

LETTERS (Continued from page 586)

in a joint effort for the social and economic advancement of the marginal Dominican farmer and his family.

Conrad Wilkinson

Amherst, Mass.

DEAR SIR: Mr. Wilkinson's report on his own activities can hardly be taken as the observations of an unbiased witness; there is also an element of self-righteous defensiveness about his comments. His attempt to employ the jargon of social science ("paradigm," "three-dimensional realities") makes much of his communication incoherent. Substantively, the argument that the United States was practically sovereign in Mr. Wilkinson's Office of Community Development . . . is in fact supported by all of his superiors in USAID. The figures he cites are disputed by authorities less biased than he, and my own and others' studies of the apolitical farmers' groups he mentions conclude that they are about as effective as the pacification program in Vietnam.

I am all in favor of Mr. Wilkinson's building of latrines and other limited construction projects, but he—and we—should not be deluded into thinking that this will significantly change the social and political infrastructure of the Dominican Republic, or that it has anything to do with modernization or nation building. . . . No one would dispute that the Dominican marginal farmer and his family need help, but his status will not be improved by the kind of inane, typically AID rhetoric Mr. Wilkinson employs or by the vacuous programs in which AID is often engaged. Given enough U.S. money, the projects carried out by Mr. Wilkinson are relatively easy; the point of the article, however, was that in the much more difficult realm of political development, AID and the U.S. Government generally have abdicated. AID projects are being carried out in a political vacuum and are bound ultimately to be irrelevant, meaningless and probably self-defeating. While the United States is largely standing still, the people of the Dominican Republic and of other developing nations are undergoing radicalization of revolutionary proportions. This clearly has important—and probably catastrophic—implications for U.S. foreign policy.

Howard J. Wiarda

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Some Daughters of China

A MORTAL FLOWER. By Han Suyin. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 413 pp. $6.95.

A DAUGHTER OF HAN. By Ida Pruitt, from the story told her by Ning Lao T'ai-t'ai. Stanford University Press (Re-issue). 249 pp. $7.50. Paper $2.95.

MEMORIES FOR A CHINESE GRAND-DAUGHTER. By Stuart and Roma Gelder. Stein & Day. 286 pp. $6.95.

MARILYN BLATT YOUNG

Mrs. Young is the author of a forthcoming book on American China policy.

It is strange that China remains so unknown despite all the travel books, analyses and pictures. Unknown not just in its "closed" present but in its wide-open past, through which Westerners walked with such illusions of assurance and mastery. We think of China always as vast, though it is not much larger than the United States which is merely big. No doubt China's millions make the difference. One could feel in control of China intellectually, when its millions could be dismissed as passive, blank-faced and empty-minded. That is not so easy now. Perhaps for the first time we are being forced to meet Chinese, all Chinese (not just the more or less familiar intellectual), face to face. Someday this may be true of Vietnam as well. Then the "crypto-racism" described by James Thomson in his illuminating Atlantic article on the operations of the State Department will perhaps suffer a defeat. It is easier to annihilate those we do not know; easier to hate too, though with sufficient effort both are possible.

These three very different books do not hand us China on a platter ready to be digested. Instead they expose aspects of China to us, and the job of assimilating what they teach remains our own. Each in its own way complicates our vision, delays judgment, forces a kind of agnosticism—even humility. China is going her own way. Understand her if you can. Manipulation is impossible.

Han Suyin complains, with a bitterness that marks her entire book, that Americans insist on possessing China. "With hysterical passion, with an ecstasy of hatred akin to love, the American experts on China seek to document China for themselves." So too does Dr. Han, but she is half Chinese and the triumph of China has made it possible for her to be whole again, after a lifetime of pain. The revolution was a "Last Judgment" enabling her, among other things, to rediscover her father. He remained in China after 1948 and she, alone of his children, returned and knew that she had, after all, been "right" to love him.

The second volume of Dr. Han's autobiography covers the years 1928 to 1938. Interspersed with direct personal memory are great hunks of Chinese history summarized in a direct and assertive style. She adds little to our knowledge of the events she describes (from the revolution of 1911 to the Long March). Her interpretation is close to that of mainland historians today though she generally avoids using the tedious vocabulary of Marxist historiography. What is valuable about her account is not the ex post facto admiration of Mao or fury at Japanese depredations but her descriptions of how it was then when she was a 15-year-old secretary at Peking Union Medical College, a freshman at Yenching University, a pre-med student in Belgium. For all her pride and patriotism, Dr. Han is at the same time a literary craftsman of skill and immense honesty. She does not pretend to a heroism she did not yet have, to convictions that would only come later. Thus major events in recent Chinese history are directly reflected and we learn, with a renewed sense of shock, how much of ordinary life can go on within earshot of cataclysm.

Because she is Eurasian, Dr. Han can take us directly into the half-mad world of the Westerner in pre-revolutionary China, its restaurants and dance halls, its brothels and summer resorts, its universities and its offices. She sees all this from the tormented perspective of a half-caste, who earns better money (for the same work) than a Chinese but less than a Westerner. Dr. Han perfectly captures the very cruel essence of her situation in a moving description of the day she took the entrance examination for Yenching University. In European dress, smoking a cigarette, she is worlds away from the Chinese girls around her. Yet it is to belong to their world that she struggles against her Belgian mother, her Eurasian friends and European lovers. The particular world of a Christian university in China is beautifully depicted. As in the first volume, Dr. Han captures a past world and lashes it with historical rage and present pride.

During the two years she worked as a secretary in Peking Medical College Han Suyin often substituted for other secretaries when they fell ill. So, at one point, she took dictation from Ida Pruitt. Some years later Miss Pruitt took dictation from Ning Lao T'ai-t'ai (Mrs. Ning), a vigorous and powerful old lady whose tales of ghosts and demons, of emperors and beggars enveloped Miss Pruitt three times a week for two years. Mrs. Ning ended up by telling, in vast detail, the story of her own life (she was born in 1867), from a protected childhood in Chefoo, through utmost penury, to her relatively comfortable old age, threatened, as the book ends in 1938, by the Japanese.

In Daughter of Han Mrs. Ning speaks directly to us, and the exact description of her life's experiences must stand for that of millions, even hundreds of mil-

Many timid politicians will say that . . . it is "not practical" to call for immediate withdrawal from Vietnam. But in a democracy, the politicians are not the only ones who determine what is realistic. If enough of us citizens demand something, it becomes practical for politicians to recognize how we feel . . . If we are to get out of Vietnam without a nuclear disaster, we have to make the President realize how strong is our insistence. He must see that we will not be satisfied with peace feelers or peace promises. We want peace itself. . . . Who are the real lawbreakers? The protestors—or those who have sent one-half million Americans round the world to fight in violation of the United Nations Charter, without a declaration of war? Those who advise our young men not to go? Or those who order them to commit atrocities against the people of Vietnam? History will make the final judgment.

From Dr. Spock on Vietnam (Dell, paper, 75c) by Dr. Benjamin Spock and Mitchell Zimmerman. A strong and wonderfully simple history of our involvement in Vietnam, and an impassioned plea for its quick end by the eminent author of the best-selling book on child care. Dr. Spock is under indictment for conspiracy in counseling young men of draft age against serving in the war in Vietnam.

lions, like her. There is almost no end to what we can learn from Mrs. Ning. She tells of the life of the street, the neighborhood, the servant's special knowledge of Chinese officials and foreign missionaries. We feel her terrible anguish when her "opium sot" of a husband finally succeeds in selling her daughter. We understand her uneasiness when she must move out of the city of her birth.

Perhaps for the first time we are given a direct insight into what the revolution of 1911 was probably like for the majority of Chinese. Mrs. Ning describes how policemen caught men on the street and cut their queues. That is all. Of Yuan Shik-k'ai, of Sun Yat-sen, not a word. Later we discover that Mrs. Ning believes the old Empress Dowager lost the "great seal" when she fled Peking during the Boxer Rebellion of 1900. Perhaps, she muses, the Japanese found it. "If the Japanese got it they will have the Mandate of Heaven and we should listen to our new masters." Her granddaughter, missionary educated and now a teacher in Peking (an old maid at 35 despite all Mrs. Ning's considerable efforts to marry her off) insists that this is not so. The Japanese must be driven out of China and she, Su Teh, herself slips out of Peking to join the guerrillas. But, Mrs. Ning complains, how can her granddaughter be right? "How can people govern a land? Always there has been a Son of Heaven who is the father and the mother of the people." Mrs. Ning dismisses with contempt her granddaughter's notion that "marriage is not necessary to working for the country." "That," she remarks, "is new talk. We all know that the family is more important than anything else."

To be sure, the new talk triumphed and the nature of the society which emerged has become, as Dr. Han rightly notes, an obsession for Americans. In 1960 the Gelders, who had worked as wartime correspondents in Chungking, returned to China to see how things were going; in 1962 they received permission to check on progress in Tibet and, in 1966, they once more traveled in China, taking the revolution's temperature. Each trip produced, not unnaturally, a book.

Until 1966 the Gelders felt fairly well at home with the revolution. They had seen China in the bad old prerevolutionary days and, as they tell us without much elaboration, it was very bad indeed. Who could quibble with a movement that replaced a diet of tree bark with one of rice, however rationed, or replaced national humiliation and despair with pride and hope? But the Chinese revolution has been unkind to its friends. It refuses to stop. Just as one is about to take one's ease in the incredible material achievements of the Communists, generously forgiving them for the peccadillo of the collapse of the Great Leap, they turn round to do something new, something unaccountable.

The Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution is the latest burden Mao has laid upon those of us who wish to praise him. The Gelders struggle manfully with it, concluding, without much evidence, that it is all an effort on Mao's part to weed out those who are not absolutely behind him so that China may be firmly united in the face of increasing external pressure. While tolerant of this goal, the Gelders are appalled at what it seems to involve—the mass religious worship of Mao, the petty persecution of Christians long deprived of any power to harm the state, the harassment which has driven good men like the novelist Lau Shaw to suicide. Disgusted and bewildered, the Gelders do not hesitate to argue fiercely with those they interview and the value of their report lies in these vigorous interviews.

The Gelders spoke with Ch'en Yi, Lau Shaw, Madame Sun Yat-sen and a host of ordinary citizens, students, night soil collectors, commune farmers. They sat in on discussions with small groups of workers on selected texts from the Quotations of Mao Tse-tung. One of their most illuminating discussions was with a young student, herself the daughter of a professor and thus class tainted. When asked if she thinks she is destiny-bound to become an "anti-Socialist monster," the girl says No, but acknowledges her own class consciousness. "I can't help it," she explains. "If you come from an educated family you can't feel equal with a peasant or worker just by saying to yourself that equality is a good thing." That is what the cultural revolution is all about, the alteration not merely of political and economic arrangements but of the people themselves: "What we have to do is produce a new man."

Ch'en Yi similarly harps on this almost classical utopian objective of transformation. The entire cultural revolution is an effort to "close the gap between mental and manual labor," and to make absolutely certain that "there is no intellectual or privileged aristocracy which will become the governing bureaucracy of China." (Those interested in a deeper understanding of the cultural revolution would be well advised to read K. S. Karol's brilliant, China, The Other Communism, as well as his article in the March Ramparts.) However, the Gelders' report remains worth reading for its illustrative material and for the considerable pleasure of traveling once more with its forthright authors.

Problems of the Soft Societies

ASIAN DRAMA: An Inquiry into the Poverty of Nations. By Gunnar Myrdal. Pantheon Books (with Twentieth Century Fund). 3 Vols. $25. Paper $8.50.

DWIGHT H. PERKINS

Mr. Perkins is an associate professor of Modern China Studies and economics at Harvard and the author of books and articles about China.

For two decades or more, numerous scholars and foundations have urged economists, sociologists and political scientists to get together for a combined attack on the barriers to an understanding of the process of modernization and economic growth. Unmindful of these urgings, economists have gone on refining analytical tools used in selecting projects for investment, political scientists have studied the evolution of political parties, and sociologists and anthropologists have concerned themselves with family and clan organizations and structures. Gunnar Myrdal's Asian Drama is a major exception to this more general picture. Not only does Myrdal relate social and political institutions and attitudes to the problem of achieving economic growth; he also demonstrates a commendable sense of the historical origins of these institutions and attitudes.

The central theme of this three-volume work begins with an analysis of the difficult economic situation in which the nations of South and Southeast Asia find themselves today. Stagnant export markets and inadequate inflows of foreign aid and private foreign investment have seriously restricted development programs in the area. The lack of foreign exchange has in turn led these countries to institute a variety of discretionary controls over the economy. Because these are "soft" societies, the controls have further hindered development and fostered corruption.

In the long run, Myrdal acknowledges, industrialization will be the vehicle that carries the region into the modern world, but only in the very long run. Meanwhile, there are untapped resources already in the region which could be used to accelerate the development process. In fact, if these resources aren't so tapped, the countries of the area may never get to the modern industrialized society. The principal resource Myrdal has in mind are the people of the region. There is no surplus of labor in India or elsewhere in the sense that more and better labor could not achieve significant increases in output. But the labor force in the region is underutilized because of social institutions that perpetuate negative attitudes toward work, among other things. The only way to make full use of the existing work force, therefore, is to break down these social barriers. Real land reform would be a major step in that direction. More and higher quality primary education may prove even more important. Such education would not only raise the quality of rural labor but would also contribute to the breaking up of the existing hierarchical systems of political and social control that are so inimical to progress.

Given the monumental political problem of making these changes in a short period of time, it is not surprising that Myrdal is generally pessimistic about future economic prospects in the region. Although one can agree with many of the individual points made in Asian Drama and also with the way in which Myrdal relates them to one another, it is not clear from evidence internal to this book that the case for pessimism is fully justified. Part of the problem is that the book is much too long and its style wordy and repetitive, making it difficult to grasp the argument in its entirety.

The more serious problem has to do with relating what Myrdal has to say with the actual economic performance in South and Southeast Asia over the past decade. Thailand, Malaysia, and to a lesser degree the Philippines, have all grown rapidly over this period (5 or 6 per cent per year). So has Pakistan. Progress in Vietnam, Indonesia, Burma and Ceylon has been slow or nonexistent, but it is much easier to attribute these failures to political turmoil and governments interested in almost everything except economic growth. Social factors, to be sure, have played a major role in the economic failures of these latter countries (principally communal antagonisms), but not so much the hierarchical caste structures upon which Myrdal places such great emphasis.

As Myrdal himself indicates, "to say that this book is mainly about India with numerous and systematic attempts at comparisons with other countries in South Asia would not be far from the mark." By any reasonable standard, this is a very good book about India and, for India, emphasis on the obstacles to significant progress may well be justified. To treat the rest of the area as being different from India in degree, but not in kind, is less satisfactory.

Per capita income in such countries as Thailand, the Philippines and Ceylon is half again the level of India, and Malaysia's income is three times that of India. Where Indian exports make up only about 5 per cent of its national product, in these other nations the percentage is several times that figure. The literacy rate in most of Southeast Asia is double or more that of India. There is nothing comparable to the Indian caste system elsewhere in the region, and land tenancy is a rather different phenomenon in countries with large areas of virgin land, as is the case in much of Southeast Asia.

It is not that these Southeast Asian countries lack problems. In fact their problems are of a kind that should be analyzed in a general social-political-economic framework. But the Indian social-economic model is largely irrelevant to much of the rest of the region, based as it is on severe foreign exchange restrictions and a very rigid caste-based social structure. Myrdal, of course, mentions the differences that I have pointed out. But generally these differences are used to highlight how difficult the situation is in India, leaving the reader with the impression that the situation is similarly bad in Thailand or the Philippines, only less so. This approach makes about as much sense as comparing these same countries with Japan (present or past) and saying that the situation in Southeast Asia is similar to, but not quite as favorable for development, as that in Japan.

The two approaches together would still leave the reader wondering where in a range between a 3 and 10 per cent rate of growth in national product these countries are likely to fall and why.

The most interesting sections of the book are those where Myrdal traces the origins and nature of attitudes toward socialism and planning in the region, and how these attitudes and the institutions they have fostered have become related to the traditional social and political structure. This relationship in turn has often led to aims in conflict with the goal of modernization. The point that industrialization will not solve the employment problem for many decades to come is also well taken. Perhaps most refreshing is Myrdal's critical use of statistics, an unfortunately rare event among analyses of this region.

Asian Drama marks an important step forward in our knowledge of the modernization process in India, and there is much that can be learned from it about Southeast Asia as well. Most significantly, these three volumes contain one of the first successful attempts to combine the tools of several of the social sciences (together with history) in an attack on the central issue of modernization.

Community of Death and Guilt

DEATH IN LIFE: Survivors of Hiroshima. By Robert Jay Lifton. Random House. 594 pp. $10.

KENNETH LAMOTT

Mr. Lamott is a novelist who was born in Japan and served on the secretariat of the Far Eastern Commission.

Hibakusha is a new word in an ancient language, a word coined to describe the survivors of the bombing of Hiroshima. About 160,000 of the persons who were exposed to the atomic bomb survive. Of these hibakusha (the word literally means "explosion-affected person") some 90,000 still live in Hiroshima city, another 35,000 in Hiroshima prefecture, while 30,000 others have migrated elsewhere in Japan. (Also included in the official category of hibakusha are those who entered an area 2,000 meters from the hypocenter within fourteen days of the explosion, those who came in close contact with victims—as in disposing of their bodies—and infants in utero whose mothers were hibakusha.) There is, however, a certain amount of slippage in the statistics; like light-skinned Negroes escaping from the Deep South, some of the victims who are unmarked by keloids or other physical stigmata quietly pass over the line into the general population.

Robert Jay Lifton's absorbing study of the psychological condition of the hibakusha provided an answer to a question that had puzzled me ever since, soon after the end of the war, I had visited the remains of Hiroshima and also had several occasions to drive through the southeastern wards of Tokyo, where 100,000 had been killed by the fire storms of the night of March 9-10, 1945. As Masuo Kato observed in his book The Lost War, that night's work by our B-29s constituted the greatest single disaster in the history of the human race up to that time. Perhaps motivated by local chauvinism—I was born and reared in Tokyo—I have been inclined to argue that, for either the victims or the survivors, there was little to choose between fire storms such as destroyed Tokyo (and Dresden) and an atomic holocaust. Dr. Lifton's thesis does not refute my argument entirely (the survivors of the Nagasaki atom bombing have reacted quite similarly to the victims of conventional bombing); the point, however, is that the destruction of Hiroshima was an experience entirely different in quality from anything the world had known to that time.

As Dr. Lifton, who is a research professor in psychiatry at Yale, writes: "A striking feature of the Hiroshima environment is the communal reinforcement of guilt—the creation of a 'guilty community' in which self-condemnation is 'in the air.'" As was the case with the population of the German death camps, the hibakusha have been marked by the imprint of death, and like the Muselmänner, anonymous, faceless and supremely apathetic, life has become to many of them a counterfeit and death the only reality.

Dr. Lifton traces this psychological mechanism in the following terms: I almost died; I should have died; I did die; or at least I am not really alive; or if I am alive, it is impure of me to be so; anything I do which affirms life is also impure and an insult to the dead, who alone are pure; and by living as if dead, I take the place of the dead and give them life.

This in essence is the theme that emerged from interviews with seventy-five hibakusha. As a corollary to this proposition, Dr. Lifton observed that the death-tainted have become suspect to the non-hibakusha majority, a threat and an enemy and at last an inferior breed like the burakumin or Eta, who for centuries have comprised the untouchable caste of Japanese society. "The keloid," as Dr. Lifton puts it, "then comes closer to the pre-Christian meaning of the stigma as a mark or brand for slaves and criminals. . . ."

There has been then, on the one hand, the creation of a guilt-ridden community of the death-tainted, and on the other, the reinforcement of the guilt by the non-tainted Japanese who will even argue that job discrimination against hibakusha is not unreasonable, just as "good Germans" have argued that discrimination against Jews was not entirely unreasonable, and "good Americans" still argue that discrimination against Negroes is not unreasonable. (Americans have even played the hibakusha game; several years ago Time magazine drew an invidious comparison between Hiroshima—"the only city in the world that advertises its past misery"—and Nagasaki—"a monument to forgiveness.")

Yet Hiroshima is not all guilt and self-pity. Among the individuals who emerged as leaders of the hibakusha are some extraordinary human beings: a city official responsible for heroic feats of reorganization; a physicist at the university who, like his American colleagues, "knew sin" even though he was on the receiving end of the bomb; a Buddhist priest who was praying when the bomb exploded and has felt himself possessed of a special mission, a call to life; and, most striking of all, a souvenir vendor who calls himself A-Bomb Victim Number One but who, possessing "largesse and human skills," has performed prodigies of good works on behalf of the hibakusha.

In the end, though, the dominant impression left by Death in Life is of massive damage to both the communal and the individual psyche, damage which manifests itself in queer and unexpected ways. There was, for example, strong resentment among the hibakusha over the inscription on the Hiroshima cenotaph, which reads

Rest in peace.

The mistake shall not be repeated.

It seems clear enough, simple, straightforward, and appropriate to the occasion it commemorates. Nevertheless, it was attacked by hibakusha who felt that they themselves were being blamed. The trouble, as Dr. Lifton analyzes it, "is that it made public and permanent the hibakusha's own unconscious self-accusation, his conviction that his 'mistake' in remaining alive was the cause of atomic bomb deaths." In a somewhat similar vein, the so-called "Hiroshima maidens" were criticized for having ventured beyond the seemingly quietude more appropriate to victims.

The phenomenon of the guilty victim is of course not unique to Hiroshima and the atom bomb experience. Examples can be found in "normal" cities both on psychiatrists' couches and in police stations; in particular, examples can be found in our city ghettos. The portrait of Hiroshima that emerges from Death in Life, however, is of an entire community in which the mass consciousness of guilt and self-pity combined has been raised to a Dostoevskian level.

Dr. Lifton concludes: "In every age man faces a pervasive theme which defies his engagement and yet must be engaged. In Freud's day it was sexuality and moralism. Now it is unlimited technological violence and absurd death. We do well to name the threat and to analyze its components. But our need is to go further, to create new psychic and social forms to enable us to reclaim not only our technologies, but our very imaginations, in the service of the continuity of life."

Burchett's North Korea

AGAIN KOREA. By Wilfred Burchett. International Publishers. 188 pp. $5.95.

KEY P. YANG

Mr. Yang is a specialist on Korea at the Library of Congress. He is the author of many works on Korean history and North Korean affairs.

Wilfred Burchett is an unusual traveler who might be called a searcher for the soul of wars. He spent more than two and a half years from June, 1951 to February, 1954 at Kaesong-Panmunjom, where truce negotiations to terminate the Korean War took place. From there he went directly to Vietnam, arriving at the beginning of the historic battle of Dien-bienphu. From Vietnam he revisited North Korea last spring, to attend the 1967 May Day celebration. Again Korea is the author's account of his impressions of his second visit.

Burchett, an Australian, who was a correspondent in Korea for Ce Soir during the Korean armistice talks, arranges his views under three categories: (1) His reminiscences of the war in Korea and the Panmunjom truce negotiations. (2) Comparison of South Korea and South Vietnam with North Korea and North Vietnam. (3) North Korea's independent posture in domestic and international fields, and economic reconstruction under the leadership of Kim Il-song, Premier of North Korea.

The question, who first invaded whom, is one of the determining factors distinguishing international warfare from internal conflict. Burchett, a recipient of the Medal of the Order of the Presidium of North Korea, concludes that Syngman Rhee's troops launched the attack first across the 38th Parallel. He cites as proof the North Korean allegation that it was from Kaesong (then in South Korea) that the main attack was first launched, and that President Truman had already ordered U. S. air and sea forces to give the South Korean Government troops cover and support several hours before the UN Security Council had actually met.

Burchett's arguments contrast with I. F. Stone's assertion that North Korea might very well have first attacked South Korea, although Stone maintained as fact that Rhee was agitating for war, and international intrigues to command hostilities were plotted by the U.S. prior to the actual armed conflict. Stone, an American journalist, and one of the outspoken critics of American policy in the Korean War, has written perhaps the most controversial work on the cause of the war in his 1952 book, The Hidden History of the Korean War (Monthly Review Press).

Burchett's description of his personal experience during the truce negotiations at Panmunjom might be considered as

(Continued on page 608)

Ho Chi Minh: From 'Prison Diary'

HARD IS THE ROAD OF LIFE

*Having climbed over steep mountains and high peaks,
How should I expect on the plains to meet greater danger?
In the mountains, I met the tiger and came out unscathed:
On the plains, I encountered men, and was thrown into prison.*

In 1942, at age 52, Ho Chi Minh, now Chief of State of North Vietnam, was arrested in South China, accused of being a spy. For fourteen months, bound in leg irons, he was shifted from jail to jail. Throughout he kept a diary written in poetry. Following is a selection from Prison Diary, translated from the Chinese by Aileen Palmer and available in paperback from China Books and Periodicals.

THE FLUTE OF THE FELLOW-PRISONER

*Suddenly a flute sounds a nostalgic note:
Sadly the music rises, its tune is close to sobbing:
Over a thousand miles, across mountains and rivers,
Journey's an aching grief. We seem to see a woman Climbing a far off tower to watch for someone's return.*

MOONLIGHT

*For prisoners, there is no alcohol nor flowers,
But the night is so lovely, how can we celebrate it?
I go to the air-hole and stare up at the moon,
And through the air-hole the moon smiles at the poet.*

ON THE ROAD

*Although they have tightly bound my arms and legs,
All over the mountain I hear the songs of birds,
And the forest is filled with the perfume of spring-flowers.
Who can prevent me from freely enjoying these,
Which take from the long journey a little of its loneliness?*

ON THE WAY TO NANNING

*The supple rope has now been replaced with iron fetters.
At every step they jingle as though I wore jade rings.
In spite of being a prisoner, accused of being a spy,
I move with all the dignity of an ancient government official!*

RESTRICTIONS

*To live without freedom is a truly wretched state.
Even the calls of nature are governed by restrictions!
When the door is opened, the belly is not ready to ease itself.
When the call of nature is pressing, the door remains shut.*

SLEEPLESS NIGHTS

*Through the endless nights, when sleep refuses to come,
I write more than a hundred poems on prison life.
At the end of each quatrain, I put down my brush,
And through the prison bars look up at the free sky.*

ON READING 'ANTHOLOGY OF A THOUSAND POETS'

*The ancients used to like to sing about natural beauty:
Snow and flowers, moon and wind, mists, mountains and rivers.
Today we should make poems including iron and steel,
And the poet also should know to lead an attack.*

AUTUMN NIGHT

*In front of the gate, the guard stands with his rifle.
Above, untidy clouds are carrying away the moon.
The bed-bugs are swarming round like army-tanks on manoeuvres,
While the mosquitoes form squadrons, attacking like fighter-planes.
My heart travels a thousand li towards my native land.
My dream intertwines with sadness like a skein of a thousand threads.
Innocent, I have now endured a whole year in prison.
Using my tears for ink, I turn my thoughts into verses.*

AFTER PRISON A WALK IN THE MOUNTAINS

*The clouds embrace the peaks, the peaks embrace the clouds,
The river below shines like a mirror, spotless and clean.
On the crest of the Western Mountains, my heart stirs as I wander Looking towards the Southern sky and dreaming of old friends.*

Two Poems of Pakistan by Aijaz Ahmad

I Read A Report On How To Preserve Elements Of Local Culture While Reforming Modern Education In Pakistan, Prepared By A Team Of Experts, Sponsored By The Ford Foundation, And Submitted Simultaneously To The American Agency For International Development And The Commission On Education Appointed By The President Of Pakistan. Thereafter, I Reflect Upon What I Have Read, And Write The Following Poem.

*Asia! Your Asia! It is A sham museum masterpiece
Slung around my neck. A Counterfeit three-penny opera.
A mock-heroic pygmalion.
I encounter it and blush.*

*From Kipling to Santha
Rama Rau, you have sent Numerous observers to scratch
The soul and surface of Asia.
And now these experts who Don't even know how to despise.*

*Your Asia is a glazed,
Unreflecting mirror
And I fail once more
To see, in it, my face.*

NEW YEAR'S EVE, 1965

*"The city is yellow with rancor."
St. John Perse*

The streets of Lahore, charged like electric wires with popular songs hung in the mist, are damp and dreary like the night of my insomnia. The dying year wraps itself around the wind like so many sailors knotted in the belly of a high mast. Morning will bring tidings of new arrivals, as the fresh news of yet another ship embarking in the port. Meanwhile, all the voices of my city are voices of silence, waiting, muted in a fatigued terror.

*City! O city! Let peace be on your streets. I have given the best years of my life to you and your women. There lingers now, in the odors of my flesh, the smell of past loves and a taste of dying.
This year, even as it passes and is about to merge with the remembrance of those who have left a scent on my life, clings to me as flesh to the bone, and does not let go. Let this year be as a flower with no tendrils, and make of my body the test and testament of my nearness, my love and loss.*

Let this night not go unavailed, nor this year unmourned. Memory is often imprecise, like the lost smell of roses half-forgotten or remembered only in relation to other things, or as the strong autumn wind reeling across thin reeds; never hard and realisable like the yellow foliage in the hedge, or as the sproutless acacia beyond. So, let the writing be of words and, after that, our exile

a most useful and timely revelation of what can be expected—offering perhaps even an actual rehearsal scenario—in the about to begin talks between the United States and North Vietnam. There are certainly differences in depth and width between the two situations, but there are at the same time many similarities. Vietnam and Korea have traversed much the same historical and political paths, and Burchett emphasizes that the two countries have learned immensely from each other in fighting a United States caught in a disadvantageous position. It is conceivable that North Vietnam will utilize every North Korean experience and tactic in the truce negotiations with the United States which are described in this book.

Burchett discloses the reason behind North Korean activities in war preparedness during the past few years, saying that "if [North] Vietnam fell, the [North] Koreans believe that the full force of U. S. power and that of her Asian partners would be turned against them." This same theme of fear of war on the part of North Korea is touched upon by Burchett in an article called "Revisiting Korea" which appeared in the North Korean monthly publication Korea Today, where he states that "the whole country has been transformed into a fortress and armed forces are in a high state of preparedness."

One wonders, now that this source of danger has been somewhat lessened by President Johnson's recent announcement of efforts to de-escalate the war in Vietnam, whether North Korea might take a different view of the United States. Although it is still too early to judge, past indications do not warrant hope for any changes so long as U.S. forces remain in South Korea. There is also evidence that North Korea will probably not relax its war tension policy because of its emphasis on the need for reunifying Korea "within the life of the present generation" (Korea Today).

The author's analysis of the past, present and future courses of North Korean policy is based on Kim Il-song's thesis called Juche (Chuch'e) which combines nationalism, self-identity, self-reliance and self-defense. The development of Juche represents North Korea's apparent determination to establish its own national identity, despite pressures to conform to the Communist bloc political image. Juche was formally promulgated in 1955 by Kim Il-song; since then it has become the motivating force behind the development of the North Korean economy and cultural life, as well as in the conduct of its foreign affairs. Perhaps most important of all, it has been used to instill energy and pride in the North Korean people. A clear understanding of this approach, in theory and in actual practice, is vital in envisaging the future of Korea. The author has devoted an entire chapter to this subject, and he asserts that Juche is a doctrine "which eminently fits the Korean psychology," although "it is difficult for some socialist states to understand and endorse." This concept of Juche is found in both South Korea and South Vietnam and creates a feeling of affinity with their fellow countrymen in the North. Juche, with its inherent anti-foreign overtones, could result eventually in a shift in the balance of political direction in East Asia.

Finally, Burchett depicts North Korea as a land of milk and honey; concluding that "no country in history has moved so far so fast in all fields of developments." However, information available from other sources reveals that North Korea is certainly not a utopia or a dreamland for workers. It is still struggling against odds to meet basic needs, including a regular bowl of rice.

What the author illustrates as economic achievements are not new. It is known that North Korea can produce electric locomotives, that it even exports lathes and tractors, and that in per capita income North Korea reportedly occupies the sixth place in East Asian countries. What the author fails to indicate is how the people actually live and how they express themselves. He seems content to state only that "people work with great intensity."

Burchett makes clear that certain attitudes can be anticipated: (1) Economic forms will be changed to meet the second edition of war expected by North Korea by transforming the whole country into an "impregnable fortress." (2) The present cooperative farm system made up of individually owned lands will eventually be replaced by the state farm, a cooperatively cultivated farm owned by the state. (3) Finally, total Proletarianization of the entire working populace is the ultimate goal.

There is a Korean proverb to the effect that no trial is complete unless the opposite side is presented. Whatever his motivation and within the limitations of his highly subjective view, Burchett has provided us with information that could help lead eventually to more objective dealing with North Korea and North Vietnam. Regretfully, the author's anti-American overtones and obviously one-sided sympathy for North Korea, coupled with the absence of on-the-scene knowledge of the South, may lead to an adverse reaction to this book. But it depicts the other side as it appeared to one reporter, and I would recommend it not only to students of East Asian affairs but to all hawks and doves who are searching for clues for the solution of problems in contemporary East Asian politics.

Giap, Chou and the Willies

BIG VICTORY, GREAT TASK. By General Vo Nguyen Giap. Frederick A. Praeger. 120 pp. $4.50.

CHOU EN-LAI: China's Gray Eminence. By Hsu Kai-yü. Doubleday & Co. 294 pp. $5.95.

JONATHAN MIRSKY

Mr. Mirsky teaches at Dartmouth College and New York University.

Chou En-lai and Vo Nguyen Giap attract a good deal of respect in the West, although for different reasons. Chou, the Premier of the People's Republic of China, has had a remarkable career. Born into a well-to-do family, he received a good Middle School education, studied in Japan (or, actually, went to Japan to study, spending his time thinking about post-1911 China), and lived in Paris after the First World War, where he came under radical influence. Committed to communism, Chou returned to China. There, during the Communist-KMT coalition of the mid-twenties, he served for a period at Chiang Kai-shek's military academy (where Ho Chi Minh could also be found). Later, after the bloody break with the KMT in 1927, he participated in the inter-party disputes about urban or peasant revolution (his views are indistinct), survived the Long March, the Second World War and, now, the Cultural Revolution. Somehow, even in the very jaws of his enemies, Chou En-lai's person and integrity remain intact.

Among those who know him, Chou stirs affectionate responses, especially in women, who regard him as handsome, urbane and sophisticated. This is a response which women reserve for few political leaders. Chou En-lai would probably be a success striding down Fifth Avenue, if not on St. Patrick's Day, certainly marching in a Mobilization.

General Giap, on the other hand, is almost unknown as a personality. He seems slight and unsparkling in his photographs, and very few visitors to Hanoi get to see him. But as the victor of Dien-bienphu, and North Vietnam's Minister of Defense, he commands everyone's respect and probably gave General Westmoreland the willies.

Several years ago Hsu Kai-yü, ■ professor at San Francisco State, compiled a volume of his translations of modern Chinese poetry. In it he showed a lively literary style of his own. It is accordingly sad to read this tepid biography of Chou En-lai whom Professor Hsu plainly holds in considerable regard. (Also, it is shocking that he should have allowed the expression, "The God of revolution and the demon of bloodshed," to be used as a final chapter heading and in the blurb; since it does not fit Professor Hsu's own description and stems from one notoriously erratic individual, it seems to be an epithet to avoid.)

Commendably, the author's intent is to make Chou come alive. To this end he employs several dozen (mostly anonymous) informants who claim to have been intimate with Chou En-lai at various times. Unfortunately, the result is an overstraining of the reader's credulity. Not only are there verbatim conversations of forty years ago but descriptions of minute actions as well, such as "... we'll talk about it again tomorrow," Chou En-lai said, glancing at his watch" (1924), or "... the slight flush on Chou's face ..." (1928). The book is shot through with this kind of thing, so that while welcoming the information which Professor Hsu has so painstakingly compiled from his sources (many documentary as well) we resist what we tend to believe already: that Chou En-lai is a human being. Biography is a marvelous art, but we must believe in it. Even auto-biography which falters toward total recall disengages the reader.

Professor Hsu, in his eagerness to show Chou's central importance, virtually removes everyone else from the stage:

"The only person who has remained in the forefront of the Chinese Communist movement, from the beginning, until today, is Chou En-lai."

"Chou built the Party elite ... long before Mao emerged. ..."

"All the key systems that the Communist Party set up from ... the 1920's to ... today, Chou organized."

"... He built the Red Army elite."

"As chief architect of Peking's foreign policy ..."

"Chou is the only one in the CCP top echelon who can understand and lead China's youth and intelligentsia."

What makes us smile is that if the name Mao Tse-tung were substituted we would say the cult of personality was working overtime. It is easy to make Professor Hsu's case if you mention Mao only fifty times (in almost 300 pages), and deal with the founding of the CCP as a French phenomenon, skimp Mao's development as theoretician, and end the volume with a fanciful "day in the life of Chou En-lai." The evidence for the almost solitary importance of Chou is not sufficient to support such a thesis, although Professor Hsu is quite right in stressing Chou's supreme ability to survive. But Mao hasn't done too badly himself and he has been running the show for more than thirty years.

From a literary standpoint Giap's Big Victory, Great Task rates low marks. David Schoenbrun's excellent introduction is correct in describing its tone as polemical Chinese style. This is disturbing because North Vietnamese officials don't actually speak in this weird manner ("pirates," "running dogs," "lackey," "puppets," "heroic people's army") as I have found on a number of occasions—as opposed to the Chinese who distressingly do.

Never mind. We want to know what Giap thinks, and the message comes through the static. The book, which is overpriced at $4.50 for 120 pages of large print, is a series of statements by Giap on the course of the war serialized in Hanoi during September, 1967.

Giap's central point—for Americans, anyway—is that the war is being fought in the South, by southerners, under southern leadership. I counted the words "southern people" and "southern battlefields" eighteen times in 4 pages alone. What does it matter: doesn't he do this to delude us into thinking Hanoi isn't in charge? I think not. These messages are designed to be read all over Vietnam. They must give the NLF cadres ■ tremendous awareness of their importance.

Of almost equal weight is Giap's stress on the basic inability of the Americans to win, despite their planes, equipment and large forces. He starts with an uncompromising moral line: "The United States imperialists are in a difficult stalemate not because they lack troops, but because their war of aggression is unjust." But he is far too practical to leave it at that. Giap knows there are quarrels in Washington about the escalation, and he knows at the root of the quarrels lies the fear of a long war, a fear of "upsetting political, economic, and social life in the United States." Because of this "the ratio of United States expeditionary troops actually engaged in combat will continue to be low. This is a bitter fact, a weakness, and a major difficulty for the United States imperialist aggressors."

But the Americans continue because they have faith in their technological supremacy. "They believe that the adversary's backbone is its armed forces and that if they can defeat these they can end the war." Naturally, Giap thinks the will to win, the ideology and the éclat of the Vietnamese are the critical factors, and that coupled with support from "the socialist camp" and the "isolation" of the United States, the American defeat is inevitable. Unlike American leaders he is careful to offer no timetable, and says repeatedly that things are going to get worse before they get better.

Accordingly, he anticipates more American troops and foresees the possibility that Washington may "send infantry troops to the North." Up to this page, 18 from the end, General Giap underscores the importance of the Vietnamese going it alone. But an invasion would change things. An invasion "would be attacking the mainland of a member country of the socialist camp. In this enlarged war the United States imperialists would meet with incalculably serious consequences." General Giap must be talking about China, which en-

"Monumental...Brilliant..."*

WHITE OVER BLACK

American Attitudes Toward the Negro, 1550-1812

Winthrop D. Jordan

"In seeking out the origins, meaning and explanation of Negro debasement in America, Mr. Jordan has tackled one of the most abstruse, subtle, tangled, controversial and certainly one of the most important problems in American history. It has tripped many scholars ... The author has put simple solutions and flashy theories aside and brought to his task a patience, skepticism, thoroughness and humility commensurate with the vast undertaking. He combines these qualities with imagination and insight. The result is a massive and learned work that stands ■ the most informed and impressive pronouncement on the subject yet made."

—C. VANN WOODWARD,
New York Times Book Review

"A monumental work of scholarship, brilliant in conception and execution, humane, convincing, informed by warmth and wit, illuminating..."
—Publishers' Weekly $12.50

Published for the Institute of Early American History and Culture.

At all bookstores or

UNC PRESS

THE UNIVERSITY OF
NORTH CAROLINA PRESS

Chapel Hill, North Carolina 27514

tered the Korean War under the same circumstances after first warning Washington in what now seem to have been unmistakable terms. In Laos, a North Vietnamese diplomat told me in December that he "supposed" the Chinese would enter Vietnam in the event of an invasion, and the Chinese told me in Nepal that they would regard an invasion of the North as intolerable.

Vo Nguyen Giap sees the present struggle as "an important contribution to the common struggle for peace, national independence, democracy, and socialism waged by progressive people throughout the world." The Hanoi diplomat in Laos disabused me at once of any illusions on their part about the American peace movement, remarking that "It is very good for America that you struggle against your government," although he added, sincerely I think, that the Vietnamese appreciated such efforts. Giap, however, is right. What do you suppose life would be like in America if the NLF and Hanoi surrendered tomorrow?

ligious experience of Zenism but Basho's own very odd and very refined personality. The translator of Basho sets himself the task of solving a whole set of telescoping conundrums, like Chinese boxes, in intercultural transmission.

Nobuyuki Yuasa and Cid Corman take two radically different roads to attempt to follow Basho's travel diary in English. Neither succeeds, but then, neither fails as much as most translators. Nobuyuki Yuasa, like almost all Japanese translators, expands and explains in translating. This is usually disastrous. In his case it is done with dignity and taste and by and large is illuminating, not degrading.

Corman adopts an extraordinary language, bearing some resemblance to his own poetry and those poets associated with his magazine Origins. It does not mimic Japanese syntax but it does try to mimic Basho's own psychological syntax and the tone of a decoratively scrawled notebook. Corman's haiku are something else—Zen mondos with a vengeance. Many of them have half the syllables of the Japanese originals and resemble nothing so much as lines taken at random from a radically dissociated Robert Creeley. This is not always successful, but sometimes it is, and it is certainly one way to avoid lapsing into sentimentality. Or does it substitute a new, hip sentimentality? My principal objection is the excessive use of Japanese words and expletives. If you're going to translate, translate, don't duck. Corman gives the Japanese text in Chinese-Japanese characters on facing pages. Nobuyuki Yuasa gives just English. I would suggest that any future edition of Corman give the romaji—transliteration into the Western alphabet. The prosody of haiku is totally unknown to almost all haiku devotees in the West and bears exhaustive study, especially by those amateurs who think all you have to do is string together an imagist whimsy in seventeen syllables.

A book which is, perhaps, more important and interesting than the Basho translations is Ichiro Hori's Folk Religion in Japan. Ludwig Wittgenstein always spoke of doing philosophy—"what do we actually do when we do philosophy?" Altogether too few people ask this question of religion, least of all of the major religions of the civilized nations. Questions like this are left to the anthropologists and ethnologists. Descriptions of what actually goes on are abundant for every primitive people. Islam, Judaism, Christianity, Buddhism are almost always described in terms of what their theologians say about them. This is a kind of hallucination of documents and may have little indeed to do with what happens in a Polish village synagogue, a church lost in the Abruzzi mountains,

Haiku and Religion

BACK ROADS TO FAR TOWNS. Oku-No-Hosomichi. By Matsuo Basho. Translated by Cid Corman and Kamaike Susumu. Grossman Publishers. 175 pp. Illustrated. $8.50.

THE NARROW ROAD TO THE DEEP NORTH AND OTHER TRAVEL SKETCHES. By Matsuo Basho. Translated by Nobuyuki Yuasa. Penguin Books. 167 pp. Illustrated. $1.75 paper.

FOLK RELIGION IN JAPAN: Continuity and Change. By Ichiro Hori. Edited by Joseph M. Kitagawa and Alan L. Miller. University of Chicago Press. 278 pp. $7.

KENNETH REXROTH

Mr. Rexroth, a frequent Nation contributor, is the author most recently of The Heart's Garden/The Garden's Heart (Pym-Randall Press).

It would be most difficult to conjure up a better example of the ambiguity of Japanese, and in fact all Far Eastern, verse when read in a Western cultural context and syntactic structure, than the comparison of these two translations of the same work. Basho's travel journals are rather telegraphic jottings of prose, each short section culminating in one or more haiku. A number of these are standard classics, haiku known to every Japanese school child, which have been translated by any number of Westerners. Any teacher who wished to make up a little collection of them and then use these two books as basic texts would have a wonderful source book in the problems of translation, or in the nature of poetic utterance. In addition, considering the sensibility, or lack of it, of most translators of haiku, Western or Japanese, you'd have a perfect study of progressive vulgarization—a built-in scale of aesthetic values.

This is the first problem. Like *ukiyo*e prints, with the possible exception of Kiyonaga and Sharaku, the seventeen-syllable haiku is a decadent form as such.

The great age of Japanese poetry, in fact of art and literature generally, ended with the Ashikaga period in the 15th century. From 1500 of the Christian era the entire country was convulsed with continuous warfare. From 1615 to the opening of Japan to the West the de facto cultural and administrative capital was Yedo, modern Tokyo, and the arts become progressively more decorative, sentimental and insentient, under the influence of the taste of the growing middle class. The haiku of Basho, the prints of Hiroshige and Hokusai, are very definitely bourgeois art, which doubtless accounts for their great popularity with Midwest housewives. Similarly, in recent years, most Japanese have come to regard Zen Buddhism, the sect that most influenced the major haiku poets, as "Buddhism for Westerners." Certainly a tradition which can admit to its canon of "greatest poems," a monstrosity of sentimentality like "Led to the flower viewing by his nurse, the little blind boy," runs the danger of being totally assimilated to the flower arrangement and tea ceremony classes on which female American exurbanites waste their husbands' money.

This is the great problem. When Basho writes them the depth, precision and lack of sentimentality redeem the haiku from decadence and elevate his best to major works of art. But can the form and sensibility of a genuinely significant poet like Basho be made aesthetically worthy of respect in English translation? This has in fact practically never occurred. Almost all translations of haiku are pernicious corrupters of taste, as can be studied at leisure in the resulting horrors, the native American "haiku." Basho presents still another problem. In addition to a sensibility that can be so easily transformed into gross sentimentality, he is peculiarly cryptic. Many of his haiku are as puzzling to Japanese as they are to Western scholars and resemble Zen mondos; but lurking behind their mystery is not the ultimate empirical re-or the temple of Marichi, patroness of prostitutes in Kyoto's Gion District.

Nowhere is it more important to understand what people do when they do their religion than in Japan. The person who thinks he can use D. T. Suzuki or Alan Watts as Baedekers to the actual practice of Japanese Buddhism is due for quite a shock when he visits Japan. The theories have as little to do with what happens as the works of St. Thomas Aquinas have to do with the folk religion of the peasants in Aquino.

In recent years there has grown up an

Probably few Americans will see a film made for the Bertrand Russell "American War Crime Trials" propaganda extravaganza in Stockholm last autumn. One would expect to dismiss it as blatant Communist propaganda, too, but it doesn't work quite like that. . . . Every inch of the [seventeen-minute] film was made by Western non-Communist newsmen working for our television, magazine or newspaper services. And the film is a heartbreaker, so appalling as to defy total mental recall by a professional reporter. It shows American and South Vietnamese soldiers torturing, beating, mutilating Viet Cong and suspected Viet Cong prisoners; others, dead, are dragged off triumphantly behind tanks and amtracs. Villages, of course, are razed and burned; babies are left dying—also burned; and there isn't a sound from the screen. . . .

Many of us in America, at least men of my generation, can still clearly recall those early terrible newsreels made in Greece and Yugoslavia and Germany itself during the Hitler era. Now, one such newsreel exists which shows American atrocities in Vietnam. Every American would be disbelieving and aghast at seeing the film for himself. Of course, no one has really known—just as surely as many Germans did not know—but I am telling you all, now, that the film exists, that the pictures were made by non-Communist newsmen, and that ignorance will be no excuse or defense when the film finally surfaces in this country . . . as it assuredly will.

From David Douglas Duncan's introduction to I Protest! (Signet, paper, $1). An extraordinary pictorial record of U.S. Marines under fire at Khesanh, taken within the combat zone in February of this year by a veteran combat photographer who also produced Picasso's Picassos and The Kremlin, among other works.

immense literature of folk religion in Japanese, but Ichiro Hori's book is the most comprehensive work to get into English in a very long time, and it is certainly the most comprehending. Much of the writing on this subject in English has been tendentious and misleading, notably Ruth Benedict's Sword and Chrysanthemum, written during the Second World War, but still used by American students. Actually the best books were written during the fashion for things Japanese—of which the again fashionable art nouveau was a reflection—around the beginning of the century, Percival Lowell's Occult Japan, or the eccentric and sentimental writings of Lafcadio Hearn. They may verge on travel brochures, but they are about actual practice amongst people who never heard of the Lankavatara Sutra.

In no modern nation is folk religion more important than it is in Japan. This is the whole secret of Japanese culture. The Japanese themselves like to talk about what enthusiastic Westernizers they are and Japanese scholars write books about Chinese, Indian, Central Asian and even Bactrian Greek influences. In fact everything that comes from outside is digested and absorbed and turned into something completely Japanese, whether it is an electric sign on the Ginza, or a Kabuki play with the same plot as Medea.

The great virtue of Ichiro Hori's book is that it traces the shaping and transforming influences of the living folk religion from prehistoric antiquity and the practices of Northeast Asian shamans and shamanesses down to the proletarian religions which have proliferated since the Japanese defeat and occupation. A modern cult which takes off from Nichiren Buddhism becomes much more comprehensible when understood as a new expression of an always abiding common religious life; but so too does the esoteric Buddhism of the period of the great Japanese literary classics, or the Zen of the post-feudal age.

Cultures die if this folk response to the crises and mysteries of life is obliterated by an invading culture. Pitt-Rivers long ago pointed out that the people of the Pacific Islands were dying of anomie—namelessness—because Western culture had robbed them of their responses to life. There was certainly plenty of anomie abroad in the ashes of Tokyo, Nagasaki and Hiroshima—as can be studied in the hopeless novels of Osamu Dasai—but the common people were able to regain a sense of control in religious practices that went back to prehistoric Japan.

The only fault I have to find with Ichiro Hori's book is that its descriptions are too verbal and abstract. He could have done with a bit of the travelogue,

Geoffrey Wagner

ON THE WISDOM OF WORDS

Geoffrey Wagner, author of more than twenty books and Consultant to Hayakawa's Language in Thought and Action, comes to the defense of words. In the face of mounting McLuhanism, political doubletalk, and unthink, he believes that language is still an important form of human communication. This vivacious, learned book is his standard, his call to arms.

ON THE WISDOM OF WORDS has the entertaining yet fundamentally serious quality of Games People Play. It will appeal to a wide range of word-lovers who view the future of the word with much misgiving. $6.75

Van Nostrand

120 Alexander Street
Princeton, N.J. 08540

objective description of Lowell's Occult Japan, and with plenty of illustrations. It is hard for a person who has never been to Japan to visualize exactly what the people are doing when they do folk religion. He tells you about it but he does not present it in sensory, objective terms. However, as an introduction to the loftiest speculations of Japanese Buddhist metaphysics, or as a guide to a walking tour of Japanese rural temples and festivals, the book is invaluable.

The Lady Wrote It Down

THE PILLOW BOOK OF SEI SHONAGON. Translated and edited by Ivan Morris. 2 Vols. $20. Columbia University Press.

ROY ANDREW MILLER

Mr. Miller is chairman of the Department of East and South Asian Languages and Literature at Yale. He has written and translated a number of books on Japanese culture, art and religion, of which the most recent is The Japanese Language (University of Chicago Press).

The Makura no sōshi is a classical Japanese text ascribed to a 10th-century author known as "Sei Shōnagon"; the original is part literary miscellany, part diary, and part poetaster's commonplace book, with over three hundred sections arranged in more or less random order, without respect to subject matter. In its present form (and that now translated with great distinction and sensitivity by Ivan Morris) the text is an accumulation from many different times and hands, a mountain of accretions which has built up around what was probably a fairly small late-10th-century nucleus.

There is some slight reason for attributing that nucleus to a Heian court lady, but little or nothing is really known about her, and her name has not survived. ("Sei" is an abbreviation for an aristocratic clan name; "Shōnagon" is a court title; but we know the actual names of very few of the Heian literary ladies.) What she actually wrote down, whoever she was, was probably a roughly classified listing of names of places, bridges, mountains, flowers and the like. The names were selected because they (or the things they stood for) were somehow exceptional, interesting or famous, or sometimes simply because they were difficult to write or remember. Such lists were handy for writing one's own poems or for criticizing the poems of others, virtually the only two productive activities of the Heian court.

We know from other sources that the entire year during which the text nucleus of the Makura no sōshi was probably first drafted saw famine and disaster throughout Japan—but such problems made no impression on the text or on its author. Men and women dropped dead from starvation in the streets only a few yards from the carefully guarded royal enclosure where a handful of Japanese aristocrats sat and exchanged poems, and drew up private lists of commonplaces.

Professor Morris has translated one of the more conflated vulgate versions of the received text, plus fragments from other text traditions, so that his "Pillow Book" is even more catholic in content than any single Japanese version published to date. But for all its tortuous textual history, the Makura no sōshi is an impressive monument of Japanese aristocratic taste, artistic sensibility and aesthetic prejudice; and Professor Morris' translation is equally impressive, painstaking and refreshingly literate.

His methodology and theory of translation are heavily in debt to the work of the late Arthur Waley. This is intended to be a major compliment. He shows himself more than capable of working with great credit within the demanding canons of a noble Bloomsbury tradition—as rigid as any the Heian nobility enforced against themselves, but infinitely more fruitful and rewarding.

Sir George Sansom once asked of Arthur Waley's translation of the Genji monogatari, "is it ungrateful to add that perhaps it does more than justice to the original—not because of any shortcomings in [the original], but because modern English is incomparably richer, stronger, more various and supple than Heian Japanese?" Sir George's perceptive query has great relevance for Morris' new translation. The "Sei Shōnagon" of Morris' translation moves in a world "incomparably richer, stronger, more various and supple" than that of Heian Japan or that of the text, and his translation endows her with such grace, wit and sophistication as to leave the poor painted Heian nobles, with their blackened teeth and absurd posturings, crawling about on the straw mats in their ill-lit, uncomfortable and absurdly cold palaces; quite out of it.

In this text, particularly in the sections closest to Heian life in time and feeling, there are largely lifeless lists and canons of aesthetic prejudice and conduct: this is proper, that is not; this is suitable, that is not; some things are simply not done, some things by all means must be done. But in these proscriptions the author was not giving expression to her personal likes or tastes as an individual; she was only recording, on behalf of her class, the way things are (or should be). Neither her motivation nor her goal was essentially aesthetic, much less literary. She was more interested in honing a keen double-edged blade of social regimentation for her class: get it all down and on record in case you can arrange to have someone get caught with his taste down, and then you can use it against him; besides, writing it all down will help you to remember it yourself.

Morris has recast and restated these essentially sterile strictures (many of them not without their depressing similarities to Hindu caste law), refracting them in the process against the personality of a "Sei Shōnagon." Heian Japanese, with its abhorrence of the personal pronoun and its almost total innocence of voice in the verb, makes it possible for the translator to take great though completely legal liberties in the form of the personification of what are in the original impersonal statements. Arthur Waley's great contribution to Western studies of early Japanese literature was to show how exciting these possibilities of personification might be when fully exploited; and Morris now brings the technique to its ripe fruition. The "Sei Shōnagon" of his translation, who charms us by her insistence upon what "I enjoy," what "I like to see," and what "I find unattractive," is essentially a human figure, not from the Heian but from our own "richer, stronger, more various and supple world." She gives expression to an individuality, and exercises a modern, Westernized personality, in a way that the several different people who at different times wrote the original text would have found quite as incomprehensible as they would find, if they could be confronted with it across time and history, the always elegant and engaging English prose of Professor Morris' translation itself.

The translation appears in a Columbia University series. Most of the titles exclude all scholarly annotation or other evidence of the process by which the translator arrived at his version: this is apparently along the same lines of reasoning by which the Victorians thought most highly of children and family life but could not endure any overt reference to the physical processes by which they had to be brought into the world. Professor Morris has most wisely chosen not to go along with Columbia University Press's hangup in this connection, and gives us a second volume of notes and miscellaneous apparatus, in addition to and of even greater length than the translation itself, and of at least equal interest and value.

Book Marks

NORMAN J. GALLO

Mr. Gallo has lived in the Far East for three years. He is currently writing a novel about the Far East.

CADRES, BUREAUCRACY, AND POLITICAL POWER IN COMMUNIST CHINA. By A. Doak Barnett. Columbia University Press. 563 pp. $12.

Based on intensive interviews of Chinese who have defected from the mainland, this is a detailed analysis of the organization and operation of Communist China's governmental structure. The study ranges from the central government in Peking to the local governments of the communes and brigades and indicates that despite recent turmoil, the regime has achieved centralization of power in an unprecedented manner.

CHINA AND THE WEST. By Wolfgang Franke. Translated by R. A. Wilson. University of South Carolina Press. 165 pp. $5.95.

An illuminating account of the Chinese-Western relationship by a German scholar who lived in China from 1937 to 1950. Franke feels that out of the bloodshed and misunderstanding characterizing the relationship from the early 16th century, a synthesis must be established between the two civilizations as the only way in which peace can even become conceivable in the world.

CRISIS NOW. By James M. Gavin. In collaboration with Arthur T. Hadley. Random House. 184 pp. $4.95.

A distinguished military leader and business executive outlines the twin crises facing the American people today: Vietnam and the dangerous situation in the urban areas. He views U.S. involvement in the two World Wars as having taken on the appearance of a morality play; but its entrapment in Vietnam speaks more of a tragedy from which it cannot extricate itself without "some cost, some pain." He states that the initiative for dealing with the urban revolution rests with the President and recommends that the equivalent of a domestic National Security Council be created for the task.

U.S. POLICY AND THE SECURITY OF ASIA. By Fred Greene. McGraw-Hill Book Co. 429 pp. $9.95.

A comprehensive review of U.S. policy in its relationship with a vast, heterogeneous and complex continent, arguing that the U.S. presence must remain strong in Asia. To fulfil this mission, the author believes that presence must be a military one; however, the military approach must be a foundation for a political settlement with China at some future date.

THE RED GUARD. By Hans Granqvist. Translated by Erik J. Friis. Frederick Praeger. 159 pp. $5.95.

A Swedish correspondent's view that Mao's final goal in the Cultural Revolution is the creation of a completely egalitarian society in which no group can place itself higher than the masses.

VIETNAM FOLLY. By Senator Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser. The National Press. 664 pp. $8.95.

A record of how the United States became involved in the Vietnamese War by one of the two Senators who voted against the Gulf of Tonkin resolution in 1964, and a most persuasive argument that the hearts and minds of the Vietnamese people cannot be won with bombs, grenades and napalm. The book quotes a statement of Thomas Reed (U.S. House Speaker in the 1890s): "The best government of which any is capable is a government they establish for themselves. With all its faults, with all its imperfections, it is much better than the best government established for them even by wiser men."

A SHORT HISTORY OF CHINESE COMMUNISM. By Franklin W. Houn. Prentice-Hall. 245 pp. $5.95.

The main strength of this volume is that the author, a former Chinese Nationalist official, is equally facile with both Chinese and English source material. It is a concise and well documented narrative causing one to realize that the Chinese civil war, in varying degrees, existed for over a period of two decades and, in some of its aspects, bears similarities to the Vietnamese conflict.

HOW COMMUNIST CHINA NEGOTIATES. By Arthur Lall. Columbia University Press. 291 pp. $7.95.

A former Indian Ambassador to the United Nations analyzes the methods and the nature of Chinese Communist diplomacy with emphasis on the 1961-62 Laos Conference. China's diplomacy is viewed in the context of its theory of international relations.

CHINA: THE OTHER COMMUNISM. By K. S. Karol. Translated by Tom Bais-tow. Hill and Wang. 474 pp. $7.95.

Karol took a four-month trip through China in 1965. In this work he compares its form of communism with that

DOW CORPORATION

Doesn't

CARE about PEOPLE

On May 8, 1968 in Midland, Michigan, Dow Chemical Corporation will hold its annual stockholders meeting.

Many persons in that meeting are going to press Dow to drop its Napalm contract. In order to focus national attention on Dow we need a massive demonstration in Midland.

Join us in Ann Arbor on Tuesday evening, May 7, at 8:00 p.m. for a large meeting at The First Methodist Church, 120 S. State Street. We will then go on to Midland, Wednesday morning, May 8.

For more information contact:

Ann Arbor—

Mrs. Barbara Fuller

(313) 663-0473

New York City—

Rev. Richard R. Fernandez

(212) 870-2283, 870-2020

THE ACTION IS SPONSORED BY CLERGY AND LAYMEN CONCERNED ABOUT VIETNAM

Clergy and Laymen
Concerned About Vietnam
475 Riverside Drive
New York City, New York 10027

COUNT ME IN

name

address

city, state.....

zip phone.....

☐ I cannot come but this is a contribution toward the cost.

of the Soviet Union, revealing the distinct and profound differences between them. He concludes that Chinese communism in many respects has reached a stature equal to that of the Soviet Union and that it will play an important role in the history of our time.

THAILAND: THE WAR THAT IS, THE WAR THAT WILL BE. By Louis E. Lomax. Random House. 175 pp. $4.95. Paper $1.95.

U.S. policy and involvement in Thailand is indicted strongly in this work. As one female Thai Communist told Lomax: "If an American general were in charge of the Communist insurgents in Thailand, he would have us immediately start a major conflict here; his reasoning would be that this would give America a war on two fronts. . . . It would be much more to our way of thinking to plunge you into a war in Thailand on the day you sign an armistice in Vietnam . . . we cannot match American firepower, but we can drive you insane and make you spend yourselves broke."

WOMEN IN MODERN CHINA. By Helen Foster Snow. Mouton & Co. (The Netherlands). 264 pp. $6. (Distributed by Humanities Press.)

A fascinating and absorbing account of some Chinese women who have played and, in some cases, continue to play major roles in their country's affairs, it contains rare photographs of the Soong sisters in their youth. They are known today as Madame Sun Yat-sen, Madame Chiang Kai-shek and Madame H. H. Kung.

ENEMIES AND FRIENDS: The United Front in Chinese Communist History. By Lyman P. Van Slyke. Stanford University Press. 330 pp. $8.50.

An intriguing thesis that the United Front concept after 1935 became an integral part of Chinese Communist doctrine and is an inseparable aspect of its present and future policy as long as Mao Tse-tung remains its leader. Written as entertainingly as a historical novel, but without any loss of its quality as a serious and first-rate academic work.

THE EAST IS RED. By Maslyn Williams. William Morrow and Co. 266 pp. $5.50.

A sensitive and perceptive analysis of a visit to Communist China by an Australian journalist. Williams' strongest impression was that the Chinese Communists feel war between them and the United States is inevitable.

ANATOMY OF CHINA. Revised edition. By Dick Wilson. Weybright and Talley. 327 pp. $8.50.

In addition to a six-year stay in Hong Kong, Wilson visited several parts of China in 1964. It is this British journalist's view that, paradoxically, possession of the hydrogen bomb will end China's diplomatic isolation.

STORM OVER ASIA. By Robert Karr McCabe. The New American Library. 225 pp. $5.50.

Fast-paced, smoothly flowing impressions of Southeast Asia by a former Newsweek correspondent, who disagrees with present U.S. policy in Vietnam. He also gives a keen insight into the current situations of Thailand, Burma and the other nations of Southeast Asia.

ASIAN DIARY. By Charlotte Y. Salisbury. Charles Scribner's Sons. 158 pp. $4.95.

An informal, personal record of a trip through the Far East in 1966, refreshingly told by the American wife of Harrison Salisbury of The New York Times.

NEGOTIATING WITH THE CHINESE COMMUNISTS: The United States Experience, 1953-1967. By Kenneth T. Young. McGraw-Hill Book Co. 461 pp. $10.95.

In his faithful recording of the diplomatic contacts between the United States and Communist China over a period of fourteen years, Young finds that relations between both countries are marked by a "love-hate syndrome" and that, despite only infinitesimal progress, it is essential that contacts between them be maintained and continued. It is interesting to note that the views of Young, an American diplomat who negotiated with the Red Chinese, coincide with those of Franke, a German professor who lived thirteen years within China. Both feel that China can no longer remain isolated and that it will play an immense role in future international events.

VIETNAM TRIANGLE: Moscow/Peking/Hanoi. By Donald S. Zagoria. Pergamon. 286 pp. $6.95. Paper $1.75.

An awkward attempt to view the policies of the major forces involved in Vietnam. The title is misleading and confusing in that the book actually deals with a five-sided interpretation of policies followed by Moscow, Peking, Washington, Hanoi and the National Liberation Front. While it is informative, Vietnam Triangle gives the impression of being put together in a contrived and piecemeal fashion.

THE CHINA WHITE PAPER, August 1949. Originally Issued by the Department of State as "United States Relations with China, With Special Reference to the Period 1944-1949." With a New Introduction by Lyman P. Van Slyke. Stanford University Press. 1079 pp. $15. Paper, 2 Vols. $5.95.

Issued by the State Department under the direction of the then Secretary of State Dean Acheson, this work presents the case why the United States did not become involved in the Chinese Civil War. The introduction compares the situation of China in 1949 with that of Vietnam today.

EDUCATIONAL

WHO NEEDS IT? Independent study? Personal freedom? A chance to help make a new kind of college work? If you need it, write Admissions N, Franconia College, Franconia, N.H. 03580.

ART

KATHE KOLLWITZ. Extensive selection original signed graphics. Fully guaranteed. Information write: Box 608, c/o The Nation.

PERSONALS

DISCOVER a fun way of meeting interesting, alert Jewish singles. For FREE analytical questionnaire write: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036

SNOOPY FOR PRESIDENT—249 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/$1, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Free catalogue to all. Free sample to stores. A Big-Little Store, 1671 Washington, San Francisco, 94109

BUTTONS, PEACE JEWELRY, POSTCARDS, POSTERS, psychedelia, etc. Unusual merchandise. Good service. Wholesale to all. 10c brings exciting free catalogue air mail. FREE SPEECH, INC., 28 St. Marks Place, N.Y.C. 10003

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE

(Computerized Matching—All Ages)
"Let TEAM make you a team."

Write:

TEAM Project

15 East 30th Street
New York, N.Y. 10016, Phone 875-6730

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: write Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 30 East 42 Street, N.Y.C. 10017.

INTERESTED IN LIFE? Believe men should live each day to the fullest? So do humanists. For information write: Dept. N-1, American Humanist Association, 125 El Camino del Mar, San Francisco, Calif. 94121.

SALASACAN WALL-HANGINGS — Tapestries hand-woven by the Salasacan Indians of the Andes. Moderately priced. (C.D.Project). Write: ANDEAN, Box 472, Cuenca, Ecuador.

SINGLE? Between 35 and 100? Social club for Left-Wingers. Houseparties. Write name, address, phone, age. No other information. Box 610, c/o The Nation.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Crossword Puzzle No. 1248

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Evidently a queen isn't quite on top of things. (6)
- 5 Continued the addition with something blown around. (7)
- 10 Getting ready by taking the cover off ahead of time? (9)
- 11 School of trout? (5)
- 12 and 20 across Apple-eaters suggest being indulgent to the little pests! (7, 5)
- 13 The type of gambler one takes in, in the north, possibly? (3-4)
- 14 Is it drink that brought the big champion down? (5)
- 16 One would expect to find a rather unattractive railing with it. (9)
- 18 Stray evidence or water might have been. (9)
- 20 See 12 across
- 22 Certainly not the end of the thoroughbred, as a way to reduce. (7)
- 24 Is the human engagement out of commission? (7)
- 26 Is one in place of the harp worn on the head? (5)
- 27 One who maneuvers to make the C.I.A. intact? (9)
- 28 They pose a problem for the outgoing type, perhaps. (7)
- 29 See 5 down

DOWN:

- 2 and 3 Hurry to a place of literary confinement—it should make the sentence go by faster. (5, 7)

- 4 Two derogatory terms for the possible date of coffee? (4-5)
- 5 and 29 Correct, and very conservative! (5-6)
- 6 Like the chief head of 18. (7)
- 7 I'd the most trouble with one who really isn't a Stanislavski follower! (9)
- 8 Upset and angered, possibly. (7)
- 9 Acts like your girl Friday when she hits the bar! (6)
- 15 How to bring a worker into the country certainly isn't trivial. (9)
- 17 Go with me, as they once said, for ready reference. (4, 5)
- 18 It's nice to scramble eggs on. (7)
- 19 Not so you can notice it! (7)
- 20 It's not mine to talk about! (7)
- 21 People such as Gert can certainly hold their beer. (6)
- 23 We might be placed under quite a bit of symbolism, when it comes to forgetfulness. (5)
- 25 Similarly, a favor. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1247

ACROSS: 1 and 23 Rubber of bridge; 5 Grader; 10 Calve; 11 Windsocks; 12 Patient; 13 and 14 Bait and switch; 15 Eidolon; 18 Unravel; 21 Twangs; 24 Imparts; 26 Swelter; 27 Trouseau; 28 Broad; 29 Cheese; 30 Concrete. DOWN: 1 Recipe; 2 Bell tower; 3 Element; 4 On watch; 6 Rescind; 7 Dicta; 8 Resident; 9 Unable; 16 Light-some; 17 Muratic; 19 Viruses; 20 Lessee; 21 Testudo; 22 Alembic; 25 Prove.

PUBLICATIONS

THE SMITH/8
Epochal Issue—192 pages
The best issue ■ ■ ■ "little" magazine.

Featuring: Tramontane, an apocalyptic novella by E. S. Rock; How Our Day Begon, ■ personal memoir by James T. Farrell; Stones, ■ great narrative poem by Taliaferro; The Parent Wheel, ■ sharp play by Speer; and the Uncertainties of Van Brunt.

Also: Four short stories by other Smith discoveries, last poems by the late David Cornel DeJong, reports on Our Dark Leaders, the LSD Cultural Revolution, the All-Time Be-In and the Viet Cong in Our Public Schools. And more, in the superbly designed, book-size Smith/8.

At your bookstore, or from

THE SMITH, 15 Park Row, N.Y.C. 10038

OUR GENERATION

Largest circulation Quarterly of dissent in Canada and of the New Left in North America—

Analyzes, Reports, Reviews, Theorizes:

- the movement for educational university reform
- the black power and human rights
- the peace and anti-Vietnam war
- the anti-poverty and community organizing
- the Quebec independence movement
- tactics and strategy of New Left in Canada and U.S.A.

Sample issue: $1.50

Subscriptions: $5.00 (4 issues)

3837 St.-Laurent Blvd., Montreal 18, Canada

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

WORLD DEMOCRACY by Bin Dir Woor, Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 7th Ave., N.Y.C. Bin Dir Woor says that he hopes to visit your town, to pray for the sick and the dying and the sin sick and the unhappy dead, to bless children and to promote World Democracy.

THE FUTURIST, published bimonthly by World Future Society, reports scientists' forecasts for coming decades. Subscription: $5 yearly. Box 19285-N, Twentieth Street Station, Washington D.C. 20036.

THE CONSCIENCE OF A RADICAL

By Scott Nearing

A book you should read.

Have it sent postpaid for $2 clothbound or paperback at $1.

Social Science Institute
Harborside Maine ■■■■

FREE PAPERBACK LISTS. Write, inquire how thousands save! Paperbacks, hardbounds, records. New York Book, 48 West 43rd Street, N.Y.C. 10036

GROUP NOW FORMING

to publish a new National Weekly Journal of Opinion: Jewish-oriented on the order of The Nation, New Republic and Commonwealth. Location: New York City.

Seeks writers and complete staff.
Cooperative venture on profit-sharing basis.

Send full details to:
P.O. Box 703, Harrisburg, Pa. 17103

BUY YOUR BOOKS THROUGH THE NATION

Congratulations, gentle reader, on these three important awards;

Richard Gott won a citation from the Overseas Press Club last week for the best magazine article of 1967 on Latin America, for his "Report from Bolivia: Guevara, Debray and the CIA," a factual exploration of the politics of despair as upheld by U.S. arms in a feudal land.

Earlier our Harold Clurman, drama critic for The NATION, gained the first Sang Prize for Critics of the Fine Arts from Knox College, Galesburg, Ohio. A distinguished panel (Guthrie, Inge, Holbrook, Mielziner) praised his work for "compassion, elegance of style and talent of communicating to the reader his subtlest impressions and judgments."

Julius Novick won special mention in the Sang Awards. His book, "Beyond Broadway: The Quest for Permanent Theatre," will be published this month.

Any one of these books
FREE to each NEW
1-year subscriber.

☐ THE FERVENT YEARS: Story of the Group Theatre of the thirties with a new chapter on Postwar Theatre, by NATION drama critic Harold Clurman.

☐ SCIENCE AND HUMAN VALUES, by NATION contributor J. Bronowski.

☐ THE WAR IN VIETNAM, prepared by the staff of the Senate Republican Policy Committee.

☐ IN THE NAME OF AMERICA, a study on war crimes commissioned and published by the Clergy and Laymen Concerned About Vietnam.

Clip and send this coupon to:
The NATION, 333 6th Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014.

☐ I'll join you for the year (48 issues). Enclosed is $10. I've checked the book I want.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6.
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Pan-America; $2 foreign)

Name

Street

City State Zip

N5-6

Congratulations are due you, the kind of reader these writers write for, in The NATION. You and they make possible the good fight in America, as it's waged in our pages, in politics and the arts. Together you create the civilized discourse which is our goal and which we think becomes more vital, not less, in time of national doubt and crisis.

The good fight
is now in
THE NATION
—Why not
join now?

BERKELEY INTEGRATES MAY 13, 1968

THE

NATION

MAY 13, 1968 35 cents

BURLINGAME
MAY 14 1968
LIBRARY

Campus Under Siege

WHY STUDENTS SEIZE POWER

LOUIS S. LEVINE

Requiem for the Great Society

MARION DECKMAN

Editing a Think Tank

The Profit and Loss of Herman Kahn

H. L. NIEBURG

JOSE YULESIAK on Updike's 'Couples'

JULIAN MAYFIELD on Cleaver's 'Soul On Ice'

JOHN REIGHT on Galbraith's 'Triumph'

0-21-1000 PLS-1449
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
CA 94010

AFER NEWSPAPER

LETTERS

war and the Peace Corps

Buffalo, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: Mr. Berreman's attempt to sound a death knell for the Peace Corps ["The Peace Corps: A Dream Betrayed," The Nation, Feb. 26] seems to be more of a function of his anti-war prejudice than a fair appraisal of the Peace Corps. His argument seems to be: The United States is engaged in an evil war; therefore, anything constructive we attempt is hypocritical and doomed to failure. I would suggest, for example, that the orphans in Chitre, Panama (where my brother is a PCV) are finding new rewards through learning athletics, dancing and singing, despite the Vietnamese War which they—and most people with whom PCVs work—neither know nor care about . . .

Thomas T. Frantz, Asst. Professor of Education
State University of New York at Buffalo

Greensboro, N.C.

DEAR SIR: I am a returned Peace Corps Volunteer from the Dominican Republic and also worked in the Peace Corps Headquarters in Washington. I was quoted twice in Mr. Berreman's article and was, hence, very interested in what he had to say—both about me and the Peace Corps.

Of particular interest were Berreman's cases of volunteers who have tried to speak out against U.S. foreign policy while still serving overseas. The pressures and efforts to discredit such free speech were great and even extended to the petition of 800 ex-volunteers that Berreman mentioned. Peace Corps officials threatened to fire those returned volunteers who were working for the Peace Corps administration and wanted to sign. The Director of Public Affairs was successful in planting a completely false story in The Baltimore Sun. Mr. Vaughn's remark, as quoted by Berreman, that the petition ". . . was done by outsiders . . ." could not be less true. In fact, I organized that petition while still working for the Peace Corps in Washington.

Dr. Berreman later describes the Peace Corps in the Dominican Republic ". . . as a sugar-coating, and a thin one at that, for the bitter pill of U.S. foreign policy." He used this description to support his contention that the Peace Corps acts as a diversionary device for U.S. foreign policy. I was a volunteer in Santo Domingo in April, 1965, and can personally attest to the contrary. . . . Not only did the revolutionary Dominicans consider us on their side but Dean Rusk agreed with them. There are fairly well-substantiated reports that Rusk threatened to pull all of us out of the Dominican Republic if we continued to verbally and actually consort with and support "the enemy." We continued and he didn't . . .

I must also take issue with Berreman's rather liberal interpretation of some statements that I made while I was still working for the Peace Corps in Washington. It is not only that he completely misquoted some remarks that I made at Berkeley in 1966 but invented some as well. I did not say that ". . . protest activity is not really a genuine service. The Peace Corps offers active participation in things that are really happening." Nor did I say that the ". . . electric climate on the Berkeley campus was phony, amateurish and superficial." I did say that "There exists an electric climate here at Berkeley and one of which I am proud to be a part this week. Carrying picket signs and taking LSD trips may be activity, but it is minus involvement. Much of it is phony, amateurish and superficial. Participation these days means more than membership, means more than carrying signs or wordy protests. It means VISTA, Civil Rights, and Peace Corps—sharing the lives of the poor and the outcasts."

In Berreman's use of an article that I wrote for The
(Continued on page 636)

EDITORIALS

Humphrey and Rockefeller

We welcome Governor Rockefeller's belated announcement. Again and again we have expressed concern about the Republican Party. We should like to see two strong parties, each capable of producing Presidents worthy of those qualities of greatness which the American people possess, and at least mitigating their failures of character and intellect. From this standpoint, Nixon would be an appalling nominee. The national sin of hypocrisy, which racism has laid bare, is personified in his fork-tongued approach to every issue. His support befits the man. He has curried favor with the local and state chairmen, who by and large do not represent the rank and file. And if they did, the GOP is a minority party which Nixon could not rejuvenate or bring back to a position of influence. Nor could he contribute to a meaningful campaign. Rockefeller can; that is one reason for cheer.

Vice President Humphrey's announcement surprised no one, nor was his statement other than what might have been predicted. The same may be said of the ensuing comments, for Hubert is known to all, and disliked by none who have had personal contact with him. But the point about Hubert is that he is a stand-in for the Johnson Administration. It is a liability that nothing he can say or do will obliterate. The views of those who set out to dump Johnson—and dumped him—call for dumping Humphrey too.

We have never gone along with the notion that Hubert "betrayed" any principle of his or that he was Johnson's toady. When he went along with Johnson on the Vietnamese War, when he approved the bombing of North Vietnam, and in everything he has done and left undone, he was himself. All talk about the "old Hubert" is myth making. There is not an old Hubert nor a new one. Humphrey emerged from his early political background in Minnesota with a deep mind-set on the question of communism, a term far too broadly construed, by him and others, and one arousing ludicrously exaggerated apprehension. He was one of the Senators principally responsible for the Communist Control Act of 1954 [see "A Can of Worms" by Carey McWilliams, The Nation, August 28, 1954]. His record is perfectly consistent, and the way in which he attacked Kennedy's "no more Vietnams" statement is a measure of that consistency. He would indeed fight "communism" in Guatemala, in Greece, or any other place.

Today he finds himself the candidate of Big Labor and of a section of Big Business, of bosses like Mayor Daley of Chicago and the Dixiecrats. The Democratic opposition to Johnson, on the other hand, must hold him personally responsible for Johnson's policies and their consequences. Humphrey is a loyal man, but he did not back the President out of a sense of tormented loyalty. Humphrey spoke out of his own convictions.

Aside from this crucial factor, we doubt whether he has, or the American people will feel he has, the stature required in an American President. He is too facile. He talks too much. He radiates good will and it is genuine, but the Presidency requires strong, not necessarily agreeable, qualities. Humphrey is intelligent, yes; profound, no. Today, when the Presidency has become an excessively omnivorous office, the qualities of the man who occupies it become of the utmost importance. In our judgment Mr. Humphrey lacks the qualities needed.

The Chaos at Columbia

The scenes of chaos, injury and destruction at Columbia University are a striking illustration of what happens when institutions of this kind forfeit public confidence in the legitimacy—in the classical political sense—on which their authority rests. In such cases, the various elements that make up its constituency, so to speak, then lose confidence in the decision-making process, and minorities within these elements feel no obligation to respect it. Dialogue gives way to a struggle for power which, before it is resolved, usually terminates in violence of one degree or another.

At Columbia, the administration has for a long time simply been "out of touch"—with student opinion, with faculty opinion, with the mood of the city, the state, the nation and the world. It has proceeded on the assumption that although the university is in New York City it has no special relation or responsibility toward the community of Harlem. It has, not entirely figuratively, "walled itself off" from the surrounding ghetto. Perched like a fortress on Morningside Heights, the university has been separated from Harlem by a strip of park. It has been a kind of moat, a barrier, a means of keeping poverty at a discreet distance.

The decision to go ahead with plans to build a gym in a section of this park was wrong in principle; it is, after all, a public park. But it was administrative lunacy to proceed with these plans over the opposition of the Harlem community and against the convictions expressed on the campus. However, the administration has been similarly arrogant for years in its relationships with those who live in the surrounding area, where the university has extensive real estate holdings. It has dealt with the tenants in these buildings—Negroes and whites alike—with lofty unconcern for their wishes, their needs and their welfare.

Prof. Marvin Harris has accused President Grayson Kirk, and with aptness, "of not having spoken to anyone under 30 since he was under 30." When administrations with public responsibilities fail to sense and respond to changing moods based on changing realities, the risk is always great that they will forfeit the compact of confidence which is their only valid mandate. In the long run, people of independent mind (a type which universities necessarily foster) will not respect rules or decisions which they had no part in making; and they will certainly not show respect in such situations when they sense that what they think about them is of no concern to those who wield authority.

In all the recent turmoil, Dr. Kirk has been (or has appeared to be) remote; he has not spoken directly to the students. He has dealt with them as an administrator of

IN THIS ISSUE

May 13, 1968

EDITORIALS

618

ARTICLES

- 622 Campus Under Siege:
Why Students Seize Power

Louis S. Levine

- 625 Letter from Cape Town:
Telling It in Afrikaans

Stanley Meisler

- 627 Requiem for the Great Society

Mason Drukman

- 629 Auditing a Think Tank:
The Profit and Loss of Herman Kahn

H. L. Nieburg

- 632 Integration in Berkeley:
The City That Went to School

Ray and Betty Halpern

BOOKS & THE ARTS

- 637 Coupling and Uncoupling Jose Yglesias
638 The New Mainstream Julian Mayfield
640 An Economist at Play John Bright
641 The Same the World Over Edward T. Gargan
642 Sting-a-Ling-a-Ling Sean Cronin
644 Book Marks Sara Blackburn
644 Television John Horn
645 Films Robert Hatch
645 At a Dance (poem) David Ignatow
647 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Publisher	Associate Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.	GIFFORD PHILLIPS
Editor	Associate Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS	PHIL KENNY
Executive Editor	Literary Editor
ROBERT HATCH	HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Pan America; $2 for foreign postage.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information in Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 206

No. 20

occupied territory might deal with the natives. Rather like the Johnson Administration, Dr. Kirk has been given a harsh, but deserved, lesson in the limitations of insensitive power.

The question of legitimacy is the key question in the complex of issues underlying the tragedy at Columbia. That some of the student activists, bemused by a mystique of guerrilla warfare, seized "hostages" (who were later released) and engaged in other acts which had no discernible relevance to "confrontation" politics à la Herbert Marcuse, is, in the context, a minor issue. That the administration felt compelled to call in the police is tantamount to a confession of incompetence. An administration that is aware of what goes on in today's world, and makes the adjustments which such an awareness suggests, will not need to fall back on the authority of the blackjack and the boot, or to cause the arrest of nearly a thousand of its students.

Voice of the Students

If media broadcasters are searching for models, they would do well to emulate the young men who manned Columbia University's student radio station WKCR around the clock for the duration of the week-long demonstrations. Whatever its views of the issues and tactics, the public needed clear definitions of the positions taken and honest accounts of the events as they occurred.

The staff of WKCR exhibited a fairness which puts to shame the standards of the mass media, and provided a shining contrast to the coverage given by professional commentators. WKCR presented the substantive issues, gave all parties involved a voice, checked all information carefully before making it public—and never lied. Not even during the long night of the police "bust" did the staff allow the outrage, which they later expressed editorially, to distort their information or to alter the clean and literate lines of their objective handling of all views. All sorts of lessons will be drawn from this dismaying event; one of the first that their seniors should study is this example of youthful dedication to truth for the whole community.

Exit Arthur Goldberg

The lot of a U.S. representative to the United Nations is not a happy one, and Arthur Goldberg's departure from that post had been expected for some time. In resigning as head of the U.S. Mission last month, Ambassador Goldberg (or as he preferred to be called, Justice Goldberg) gave no clear public explanation for the timing of his decision. He said that he thought he could better serve the cause of peace as a private citizen and that he was taking advantage of the President's offer to members of his Cabinet, on the day when he announced that he would not seek another term, to accept their resignations now if they so desired. Beyond that somewhat bland statement, it was rumored that Mr. Goldberg had left in anger after protesting the decision to stage the largest U.S. underground nuclear explosion on the opening day of the UN debates on the nonproliferation treaty—a coincidence which he held would prejudice and even sabotage the American presentation of the draft treaty.

Whatever the reason or reasons, it is not difficult to assess the frustrations which beset the Ambassador during the three years of his mandate, and which eventually must have piled up to an unbearable level. Arthur Goldberg came to the United Nations in July, 1965, with hopes which were soon to be revealed as misconceptions, not only of his own role vis-à-vis the international organization but of the role—or rather lack of role—assigned to the UN by present American policy.

Actually, within the limited framework of his functions, those of an Ambassador and not of an Under Secretary of State, Justice Goldberg was able to use his considerable skill to advantage. He showed it especially in prolonged negotiations with the Soviet Union, first on the Kashmir crisis (which erupted soon after he took office), then on the space treaty, and finally last summer in drafting formulas for cease-fire resolutions on the Middle East. In all these areas, the agreements between the American and Soviet delegations which emerged were due to common interests between Washington and Moscow and not to discussions in United Nations corridors or chambers. Yet, from all accounts, Mr. Goldberg's talents as a negotiator transformed vague consensus to precise language and forged decisions which might otherwise have been left up in the air.

In other cases, however, Mr. Goldberg was to discover that international negotiations are very different from labor relations. The interests of both companies and unions are best served by the signing of a contract, whereas national governments may well desire to register opposition to other governments as a matter of policy. This applies, among other cases, to the war in Vietnam and the search for a political settlement in the Middle East.

It has been said many times that Mr. Goldberg disagreed with the Vietnam policies of President Johnson and Secretary Rusk. When he consented to leave the Supreme Court, Mr. Goldberg sincerely believed—or had been led to believe—that he would be able to help promote a negotiated settlement of the Vietnamese conflict through the United Nations. But when on January 31, 1966, he was able at last to obtain from President Johnson a decision that the question of Vietnam be put on the agenda of the Security Council, the White House announced simultaneously the resumption of the bombings of North Vietnam and thus destroyed the credibility of the peace move.

All further utilization of the United Nations by the United States assumed this ambivalent—not to say hypocritical—character: all the speeches of Ambassador Goldberg asking rhetorical questions (and reciprocal concessions) of Hanoi in order to "explore" the possibilities of opening negotiations were echoed by pronouncements from Washington to the effect that American forces would remain in Vietnam until aggression by the North was terminated. The United States Government used the UN not to search for a settlement of the war but for propaganda purposes, both at home and abroad (a tactic which it shares with many other powers). Mr. Goldberg played his part with apparent satisfaction, but it must have become increasingly evident to him that the UN peace button was pressed by the Administration more often than not as a gimmick. For instance, when the Pueblo was seized, the United States submitted that question to the Security Council concurrently with its calling up of reserves, only to neglect the Council the next day in favor of direct talks with North Korea. Secretary General U Thant's proposals on Vietnam, which Mr. Goldberg favored, were turned down or ignored by Washington. And when the big change came on March 31, and President Johnson dropped his conditions for a partial cessation of bombing, the UN was not in the picture and neither was Ambassador Goldberg. The President had looked elsewhere for his team of negotiators, and the United Nations was not involved even in the exasperating search for a suitable site for preliminary talks.

This, for Arthur Goldberg, must have signified the end of his usefulness. He had had to battle the State Department—on whose side he was supposed to be—in order to present views palatable to the majority of the international community. He had had to take personal abuse from Arab delegates, who accused him of bending U.S. Middle East policy to Zionist aims, although he took pains to reflect meticulously the almost balanced stand of Washington.

Like Adlai Stevenson, also a "prestige" appointee from outside the diplomatic ranks, Arthur Goldberg misjudged the scope of his job and his influence. Both men were the victims of an inherent contradiction of U.S. policy, which seeks to create an image of internationalism and flexibility in the United Nations, while largely ignoring the world organization and pursuing nationalistic aims, in peace as in war. It was Mr. Goldberg's image which became blurred, and he left to seek a new focus.

ANNE TUCKERMAN

Poor Poor and Rich Rich

If the Poor People's Campaign needed documentation to support their demands, it has been abundantly provided, and from irrefutable sources. There is first of all the Citizens Crusade Against Poverty, a twenty-five-member panel of distinguished public figures, their staff work financed by foundation money and with Walter Reuther in the top spot. Highlights: four-fifths of the population are more affluent than any other people in history, but the nation is disgraced by the fact that the other fifth lives in abject poverty. The report pinpoints 256 "hunger counties," and proves that the term is no more than soberly descriptive.

It proposes specific remedies: food for the needy, with distribution not administered by the Department of Agriculture—which, according to Robert Kennedy, has failed to reach 80 per cent of the poor and "in the face of overwhelming need returned more than $200 million in available funds to the Treasury, money that should have gone to feed these people." The report strikes hard at subsidies for rich farmers, an area in which the Department of Agriculture seems to be much more effective than it is in feeding the hungry. In 1967 alone, nine large landowners received a total of more than $14 million from one or a combination of farm programs "designed to encourage, promote and strengthen the family farm"!

If more evidence is needed, it is provided in The People Left Behind, a report of the President's National Advisory Commission on Rural Poverty, just released. This details the plight of 14 million rural poor, including 3 million rural adults classified as illiterates (whites, incidentally, outnumber nonwhites). These outcasts are piled up in rural areas, waiting, many of them, to move into the cities and add to what we call the "urban poor."

The urban poor and the rural poor are basically alike in that both groups live more or less outside the market economy, and also outside the political economy: politics is mostly about who gets what, or doesn't. One reason why affluent America largely ignores them is that they are not organized to make noise—to demand, for instance, subsidies of the kind we bestow on corporate farms, the aerospace industry, the military contractors.

They are not heard, they are not seen. The Poor People's Campaign proposes to bring them to the national capital and there give them a forum, coverage, exposure, so that affluent America, and the politicians representing it, cannot avert their eyes and ears. That project was Martin Luther King's legacy to his country, and the Reverend Abernathy and his colleagues are carrying on what he would have done.

To bring the poor within the market economy, they must be given jobs; accordingly, an intensive public relations campaign has been mounted to make the poor feel that private industry is girding itself to give them work. With its usual acute sense of realism, The Wall Street Journal has disposed of this illusion. To be sure, many dedicated citizens in positions of influence are on committees organized for this task, and some of them are working at it; but hardly a dent would be made in the plight of the jobless if all the efforts now proposed were to prove successful. The Johnson-Humphrey Administration has plans for subsidizing business to hire and train some 500,000 men and women over a three-year period, with a goal of 100,000 during the next year. The 500,000 total averages out to about 3,500 per year in each of fifty cities. This falls absurdly short of the need. Washington's quota is 2,000 jobs; estimates of the capital city's hard-core unemployed vary from 8,000 to 12,000. That is as of now, but the rural poor are still seeping in and will probably keep pace with such employment as the government is able to generate with expensive subsidies.

The whole basis of this campaign is dubious. Business is out to make money, and when it needs people it hires and trains them at its own expense. If the problem is to be solved, it will probably end up with public works and with the government as the "employer of last resort."

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

Across the tracks and up the hill from all this misery, Fortune, the unofficial organ of big business, comes out in the May issue with some interesting statistics. To be a millionaire nowadays is, among the really rich, almost to bear the stigma of poverty. The present mark of success is to be a "centimillionaire"—you don't belong unless you are worth at least a hundred million, and from that entrance fee the elite go on up into the $1 billion to $1.5 billion class, J. Paul Getty and Howard Hughes being in that enviable position. The astronomical gap between the really rich and the really poor is discussed in the same issue by Max Ways in "The Dynamite in Rising Expectations." The affluent society that American capitalism has wrought in the sixties may be more dangerous to the unrocked boat than the collapse of the economy in the thirties. The Poor People's March will be a long time passing the reviewing stand of the American dilemma.

CAMPUS UNDER SIEGE

WHY STUDENTS SEIZE POWER

LOUIS S. LEVINE

Mr. Levine, professor of psychology at San Francisco State College (on leave), is at present associate director for research of the Center for Research and Education in American Liberties at Columbia University and Teachers College, and director of research for the Division of Rehabilitation Services, Department of Psychiatry, Harlem Hospital.

Early in the morning of April 30, the week-long siege of Columbia University was ended. Police recaptured the five buildings held by activists, mostly students. More than 700 arrests were reported and approximately 150 persons were injured. Classes remained suspended and the division between students and administration widened.

The use of the police has intensified anti-administration attitudes. Many members of the faculty, previously aloof from the fray, are at this point highly critical of their administration. An official faculty committee composed of eight distinguished senior scholars and two junior members of the instructional staff was appointed to meet with representatives of the trustees, administration and students for the purpose of returning the university to operations as close to normal as possible.

As the substantive issues of this confrontation—the building of a gymnasium on a largely granite-covered little park used by the community, and the university's participation in the activities of the Institute for Defense Analysis—did not represent the beginning of the conflict, neither did the clearance of the buildings represent its end. True, the advantage of being able to command overwhelming force was demonstrated, but it is unlikely that this physical display will either resolve or limit the eventual outcome of the Columbia crisis.

As I write, the future course of the Columbia upheaval is in doubt, but the issues of war and peace present in this confrontation between students and college administration have been evident across the country in past campus crises, and they will increasingly become focal points of contention as the issues themselves intensify and as student militancy correspondingly increases. The following impressions, though expressed in general terms, derive from specific student-university confrontations that have occurred at various schools in the recent past.

The most significant point, which is not perceived by most faculties, administrations and boards of trustees or regents is simply that students possess a great deal of power. If a very small percentage of students decides to employ that power, they can bring any academic institution to a halt. Further, there is in most communities a committed nonstudent minority which will line up with the students if the situation reaches crisis proportions. Given this fact of student power, and putting aside the issues of the means employed or the ends toward which the power is directed, several questions seem particularly relevant. Can university trustees, administrations and faculties be made to understand the degree of actual power that a small minority of students can mobilize? Must colleges and universities undergo crisis situations in order to develop appropriate policies and procedures for handling student-university confrontations? What issues complicate the resolution of campus crises?

It is possible that the degree of actual power that a minority of students can mobilize is underestimated or misperceived simply because students have not so behaved in the past. Although this may be partially true as far as the post-World War II population of students is concerned, a more inclusive explanation would have to cover several additional points. A critical consideration is that faculty, administration and students do not form monolithic groups. There seems to be a tendency on the part of all parties to a campus confrontation to perceive and treat one another as if they were homogeneous. Administrators or professors define their roles according to traditional functions; this role definition is one which increases numbers of students concerned with Vietnam, the racial issue, and the economic and political scene reject as inappropriate and unrelated to their lives. Within that portion of the student population which may be termed disenchanted but not alienated, there are those committed to changing the system by working within it, those concerned with retribution for past and present wrongs, and those committed to revolution. These students are intellectually alert, highly critical, and ever ready to condemn the "Establishment." Faculty and administrators who see themselves as the dispensers of knowledge and the stimulators of rational inquiry, and who value a sense of detachment from the hurly-burly of the market place, lump the dissenters into such groups as "poor students," "neurotics," "undisciplined people" or "anarchists." They all fail to fit the old mold of the "good" (read docile) student.

The difficulties of changing one's style of perception are matched by the difficulties of changing one's style of professional life. Many faculty who have endeavored to reach the activists have done so in their own particular intellectual fashion and within their own role perceptions, and this has often resulted in considerable frustration. To these professors, the students may appear to lack knowledge or a capacity for logical thinking and rational analysis. Further, if the faculty member or administrative official has contact with a member or members of a black student group, he may extrapolate his observations of those students to the members of Students for a Democratic Society, or vice versa, thus failing to differentiate among the dissenting groups. There is often an additional failure to see that many segments of opinion exist within each of the groups, in which case opinions as to who the students are and what they are tend to be both inaccurate and inadequate.

One of the serious misperceptions of dissenting students, at least at the leadership level, is the extent of their distrust of faculty and administration, and their disenchantment, to varying degrees, with conventional dialogue as a means to social change. This point was recently made by a high school student at a conference on "Students and Society" sponsored by the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions, who stated that "dialogue assumes a common set of assumptions and goals; and in their absence, dialogue is only a way of avoiding change."

Although the range of student activist groups is wide and the differences between the objectives, tactics and rhetoric of black and white organizations are marked, they share a considerable interest in revolutionary strategy. Professors, on the other hand, even those in the relevant fields which have brought them into contact with the history of revolutionary events, have not had either experience in or knowledge of the tactics of confrontation. Many faculty and administrators think of dissenting students in terms of the 1963-64 civil rights movement; they now should be studying the writings of Frantz Fanon, Mao Tse-tung and Che Guevara.

The failure on the part of the faculty and the administration to appreciate the actual power which a small minority of students can mobilize leads directly to the need to formulate in advance procedures for negotiation whereby disputes can be resolved before they become actual showdowns. As long as a college president and his immediate supportive administrative staff believe that their students will never become militant, laying siege to buildings, disrupting classrooms, or holding administrative officers hostage, they are not likely to think seriously how they should respond to such uprisings. And yet the "business as usual" mechanisms of the university or college are poorly adapted to rapid decision making. Part of the reflective posture of the academic world is to "carefully study" problems that require either faculty recommendations or administrative decisions. The diversity among student groups is probably exceeded only by the divisions within any faculty. Hence, it is indeed a rare occasion when a faculty expresses its overwhelming support of a given position, as was the case at Berkeley in December, 1964, or at San Francisco State in December, 1967. But in both of these instances one important issue served to unify the faculty: groups outside the university were pressing to fragment or limit the traditional prerogatives of the institution. Often on occasions of direct clash between student opinion and administrative policy, the faculty has lacked an apparatus for making its opinions known or its influence felt. Depending upon the matter at hand, faculty organization ranges from small units such as departments to the total faculty which is convened on special occasions for either academic or ceremonial purposes but which rarely operates as a legislative entity. Frequently, the pattern is for representative groups such as academic councils or senates to advise and counsel the administration. In its turn, the administration is often either restricted in fact, or believes itself restricted by the policies, procedures and past decisions of the board of regents or trustees. In this situation, the speed and cogency of the president's decision, when attempting to deal with a student confrontation, may be dependent not only upon his capacity to comprehend the nature of the situation—and of course on his courage—but also on his perception of his own relationship to his trustees.

Waite, The Sun (London)

Student activist groups that press for confrontation are well aware that the prolongation of actual disruption of the campus produces pressures that polarize the position of trustees, administration, faculty, students and members of the community. Student militants have learned well the dynamics of conflict. They understand that the initial or precipitating incidents either can be restricted or can be fanned out to include a host of related or unrelated grievances, and they can choose the method most advantageous to them. The militants will generally be quite clear about what constitutes the substance of their grievances and the tactics to be employed in pressing for confrontation. In some instances those confrontations, which place the administration in the most untenable position, may appear to be entirely tactical from the observer's frame of reference, but the militant's objective is to make clear the repressive and oppressive forces which a university can exert, usually through the local police, and this constitutes an end in itself because it can broaden the constituency of the militant groups. In this connection, the militants understand the distinctions between the political and mediator roles which may be performed on their behalf by sympathetic members of the faculty. The mediating efforts of the moderate or liberal, well-intentioned faculty interventionists may be summarily dismissed because they constitute an obstacle to violent confrontation.

Of the issues complicating the resolution of campus crises, some of the thorniest relate to the subsequent treatment of students who have disrupted the university. Although various patterns of faculty and student advisory boards and councils exist within many institutions, the actual responsibility for disciplinary action resides with the president, who may or may not be restricted by the trustees in the delegation of this authority to disciplinary committees composed of faculty, students and administrative staff.

Militant groups recognize that no matter what stipulations or concessions are offered, they must inevitably hold out to the extent possible for total amnesty for all participants. At this point the nature of the conflict moves from substantive grievances into disputes over the operation of the university and past administrative decisions and procedures. And at this point, faculties and administrations that have been capriciously indifferent to the attitudes of students in the past will cite polls of students indicating that the majority supports punitive action against the dissenters. The hard-line, law and order position will be taken up by certain intellectuals on the faculty, the "jocks" and the trustees. Their rhetoric varies from the position that concession to the demands of the minority encourages further rebellion to the simple wish of the "jocks" and "freddies" to have a legitimized chance to demonstrate their masculinity.

When the crisis approaches its peak, the president must formulate a plan to punish the offenders. The initial difficulty at this stage is to define the offender. If the criterion is to be a legal one and judged by the courts, what evidence is available to prosecute, and can actions such as suspension be taken by the university prior to court judgment without prejudicing the cases? If the definition is to be made within the university, the offense must still be specified. Is the student who enters a classroom while a lecture is going on and politely asks the instructor for permission to make a one-minute announcement guilty of "interfering with the normal processes of the university"? If the president takes a "soft" position, he risks the wrath not only of his board of trustees but also of many members of his student body, faculty and the community. This is an amount of pressure and force which few administrators are strong enough to resist.

The issue often requires a long-range perspective, wherein the president finds his position utterly untenable. Will a university that has failed to respond to the needs and interests of a significant minority of its students serve its own interests by taking a "hard line"? If outside police are called in and charges filed, the president has publicly acknowledged his incompetence and the incompetence of his institution to deal with its own students. If he does not, and the crisis is prolonged, there is a vivid possibility, particularly in urban centers and specifically when the issues relate to race or peace, that community support will flow in to assist the student activists. And if such outside assistance does come and violence occurs, the president will then be subject to the criticisms of those who equate law and order with justice.

The president who does call in outside force to clear a building or put down a demonstration violates the intellectual conscience of many within the academic community who may be sympathetic to the students' cause though in disagreement with their methods. The academic community—or at least a segment of it—will see the use of outside force as representing a failure in the power of reason, intellectual persuasion and open dialogue. Sensitive to such concerns, the administration may call upon its faculty or some representative group or council for advice and may also ask for the consultative assistance of the local police. The territorial integrity of the university will usually be respected by the police who will, in effect, wait for the call, although they may take preliminary steps such as establishing command posts, communication centers, and drawing up their own strategies for dealing with the disturbance. But in the end, the critical decision of whether to call the police onto the campus and in force rests with the president. Given a disturbance that forces this question, one course of action will bring a president about as much criticism as another—he will not only lose either way but in most instances he will be unable even to lose gracefully.

The prolongation of siege states due to bickering over degrees of punishment can well be viewed as an effort to save dying institutions by knocking off the students who represent forces of change. Whether these changes are undesirable or offensive to some, or even if the ultimate judgment of history proves them wrong, to deny the presence of such social forces is to deny reality and thereby divert the university from one of its major endeavors.

What then is the reality? Or, more accurately, what are some of the realities reflected in the campus crises? The first and most obvious to everyone except the do-business-as-usual folks of the university and non-university world is that significant changes are occurring in a society which is being torn apart by its racism, its pursuit of an unpopular war, and its bureaucratic breakdown. The committed youth are not dropouts, but they see their professors as "copouts," who are often anti-ideological, and view dialogue as a convenient way to forestall action. Above all, the youth want action. They do not want to be patronized, lectured to, or ritualistically listened to; they want to be heard and they want a fast response. Lacking it, they will act, whether wisely or unwisely; they will use the power they have and, ultimately, they will move the university closer to what it should be—not a sheltered community of scholars detached from a dying world but rather a community of individuals seeking the truths that will, in fact as well as in words, set men free.

TELLING IT IN AFRIKAANS

STANLEY MEISLER

Mr. Meisler, Africa correspondent of the Los Angeles Times, is a frequent contributor to The Nation.

Complete apartheid reigns at the winery of fictional Jock Silberstein: white wine is bottled by colored girls in white uniforms while red wine is bottled by white girls in brown uniforms. Jock Silberstein is a creation of Etienne Leroux, an Afrikaner novelist who explores sex, evil and decadence, and sometimes treats Afrikaners and apartheid with mocking irony. By doing so, Leroux and André P. Brink, another Afrikaner novelist who is like him, desert the traditional way of the pastoral, patriotic and puritanical Afrikaans novel. The Afrikaner literary set in South Africa likes to describe the new novels of Leroux and Brink as "the renaissance in Afrikaans prose." That's overblowing it, but the novels do have significance, for politics as well as art.

Afrikaner nationalists have long looked on their language, which comes from 17th-century Dutch, as more than a means of expression; to them, it is an end in itself. Using Afrikaans glorifies nationalism. Extreme nationalist Afrikaners, convinced that Leroux and Brink use it in a way that soils Afrikaner nationalism, now condemn the two writers as traitors to their culture.

After the Boer War, Afrikaners, descendants of the early Dutch settlers, tried to avenge the humiliation and indignities of their defeat by intensifying their belief in the worth of their own culture. They removed their sons from the Boy Scouts and put them into the Voortrekkers. They patronized Afrikaner banks, attended weekly meetings of the Afrikaans cultural society, voted for a political party, the Nationalist Party, that preached the need to keep Afrikaner culture pure and isolated. They became a people who, according to one conceit, lived in a house that had mirrors instead of windows.

Afrikaans became the second official language, replacing Dutch. Afrikaners founded the first Afrikaans newspaper, translated the Bible into Afrikaans, wrote textbooks in Afrikaans, and began teaching their children in Afrikaans at school.

Novelists who wrote in the language were patriots more than artists, and their work showed it. They glorified Afrikanerdom and the Boer War, dwelt on rural and village life, and wrote heroic sagas with unsullied Afrikaner heroes.

Leroux and Brink reacted against this when they began writing in the early 1960s. They wrote in Afrikaans not because it was patriotic to do so but because it was their native language and therefore the best means of expressing their feelings and ideas. Calling themselves the sestigers (Afrikaans for "the men of the sixties"), Leroux and Brink were influenced more by the literary fashions of Europe and America than by the glory of the Boer War.

This new approach, especially its frankness about sex, shocked an Afrikaner society dominated by the Calvinist

Dutch Reformed Church, a society that bans, under its obscenity laws, publications like Playboy or Valley of the Dolls. Leroux and Brink have stepped very carefully. Their sex scenes, in fact, seem tame by any standard except that of the Afrikaners.

South Africa also bans books which the government deems politically offensive. Leroux and Brink have not written any diatribes against apartheid. Their publishers, Human and Rousseau of Cape Town, insist that they are nonpolitical writers. Yet that is true only up to a point for, like almost everything else in South Africa, their books cannot help reflecting some aspect of race and politics. Leroux and Brink, however, deal with these matters in special, undogmatic and quiet ways.

So far, only two of their novels have been translated into English. The first and most important is Leroux's Seven Days at the Silbersteins, published in Afrikaans in 1962 and in English in the United States last year. In tones of symbolism and decadence that recall Thomas Mann's The Magic Mountain, the novel is a story of a fall from innocence. The family of a young Afrikaner, Henry Van Eeden, engage him to marry Salome, a daughter of the Silbersteins, wealthy Jewish owners of a Cape vineyard. He had never met the girl when he arrives at Welgevonden, the Silberstein estate, to spend seven days with his designated in-laws.

In the first six days, he experiences six dances: of the rich, the artists and the farmers, then a wild integrated masquerade, a dance of the intellectuals, and a Walpurgisnacht. By then, he has begun to experience his fall: "the loss of grace, the birth of consciousness, the twilight state of realization, the curse of reason." On the final day, he meets Salome.

The fourth day is devoted to apartheid, a subject that Leroux treats with his special irony. At night, the Silbersteins stage their wild, frenzied, multiracial masquerade for Henry, a party followed by rioting and fire in the native village of the plantation. It takes Henry's future father-in-law, Jock Silberstein, until noon of the next day to restore order. Henry then joins the dance of the intellectuals who, unaware of any disorder, are concerned with less real aspects of apartheid. "Tell me, Doctor, if an albino is born of native parents, could you describe someone like him as a native?" a journalist asks a social anthropologist.

The second novel is Brink's The Ambassador (1963). Greatly inferior to Leroux's book, it reads like an exercise by a college student who has read too much in James Joyce and fills his notebooks with streams of consciousness. It is trite and wooden. The book's faults as a novel, however, are related to its significance as a breakthrough in Afrikaans writing. Brink has made a studied attempt to get away from the old Afrikaans prose and write a modern novel. His hero is a stolid, solid Afrikaner cliché, South Africa's ambassador to France, who succumbs to love in Paris and, at 56, discovers that, ach, he has never really lived before. Sex is celebrated and adherence to South African duty is ridiculed. This is old stuff, but not in Afrikaans.

The significance of the new Afrikaans writing may be more political than literary. From an artistic view, Leroux, though not Brink, can probably join English writers like Alan Paton and Nadine Gordimer on any list of distinguished South African novelists. Non-Afrikaans readers will be better able to judge this in the next year or so when the rest of Leroux's novels are translated into English. From a political view, however, the significance is clearer. Writers like Leroux and Brink reflect and intensify the forces in South Africa that are pushing the white supremacist Afrikaner out of his isolation and into a modern world.

In fact, a public controversy over Seven Days at the Silbersteins first made the rest of South Africa aware that there were splits among white Afrikaners; that all did not think alike. In 1964, the South African Academy of Arts and Sciences, an organization of distinguished Afrikaners, awarded its annual Hertzog Literary Prize to Leroux for the novel. This enraged extreme nationalists in the academy. They protested publicly and spent the next three years trying to take over the academy's governing committee.

The extremists failed, but their battle caught public attention. South Africans noticed that extreme and liberal Afrikaners were fighting also over other issues. Newspapers began to call one group the verkrampies or "the cramped, constricted ones," and the other the verligtes or "the enlightened ones." The fight between verligtes and verkrampies, the most significant political development in South Africa in a decade, was brought into the light. South Africans suddenly realized that new ideas and fresh doubts had infiltrated some of the thinking of a small group of the dominant white Afrikaners.

In the last twenty years, two forces have cracked the monolithic isolation and dourness of Afrikanerdom. The first is urbanization. The Boers have come to the cities and been caught in all the traps of industrial society. This has made the Afrikaner more educated, more sophisticated, more aware of the rest of the world. A few Afrikaners have become capitalists and industrial managers and been forced to face the contradictions of a policy of apartheid in an industrialized economy.

The second force is success. After twenty years of control over South Africa and of defiance of the United Nations, the Afrikaner nationalist hardly feels the need any more to shore up his inner strength by intensifying his identity with fellow Afrikaners. He can afford to relax a bit, think for himself, even test a few new ideas. As a result, in the words of one well-known Afrikaner judge: "We are beginning to realize that we can't isolate ourselves, that we can't stop the world and get off, that we must change."

Actually, only a few Afrikaners have changed, at least to the point where it matters. But their presence and influence have frightened extreme nationalists into vitriolic attacks on what they consider a new and dangerous threat to the purity of their culture. Besides denouncing the novels, the extremists have centered their attacks on Prime Minister John Vorster's entertainment of black leaders and diplomats from other countries, the encouragement of immigration of foreign whites, and the agreement to assemble a single Olympic team from members of different races.

Measured against South Africa's racial problems, these are piddling issues. If the verkrampies and verligtes are fighting only about sexy novels, black diplomats, Greek immigrants and colored sprinters, their rift is insignificant. But, when you talk in private with verligtes about the future, it becomes clear that the gap between them and other Afrikaner nationalists is wide and perhaps significant.

The verligtes believe in a sincere, thorough and speedy implementation of the Bantustan policy set down by the late Prime Minister Hendrik F. Verwoerd. To them, unlike other Afrikaners, the Bantustans are not a sham designed to divert the world's attention from apartheid. Verligtes want South Africa to develop the Bantustans or African tribal homelands and give them independence. At the same time, they want the government to end racial discrimination in the rest of the country, the so-called white areas.

On the surface, these views are neither startling nor acceptable. But the significance of the verligtes lies less in what they believe now than in what they may come to believe later. They are practical and thoughtful men who intend to face up to all the implications and contradictions of their convictions. In the years ahead, the verligtes will probably go through two crises that could determine whether they will ever become a force for change.

The first crisis will come when evidence and logic force verligtes to realize that the Bantustans, as set up now, will never work. Some verligtes understand this already and are talking about partition, perhaps giving Africans half of South Africa, including some industrial areas.

Furthermore, verligtes will have to realize that no matter how you divide South Africa, the so-called white areas will always have sizable permanent African populations. Africans, who may even be in the majority, will demand the vote as well as an end to social discrimination in these areas. Verligtes will either accept the implications or give up and withdraw into white supremacy.

The second crisis will come from the calumny that traditional Afrikanerdom will heap upon the upstarts. Even if verligtes believe in partition and the African vote, their beliefs will be meaningless if they are afraid to express them. So far, their record has been poor. They have refrained from saying what they really believe and contented themselves instead with making fun of the verkrampies. This caution probably comes from the realization that most other Afrikaner voters care nothing about Bantustans or Africans. Their creed is white supremacy.

Change is in the air in South Africa. But the timidity of the verligtes and the strength of their opposition may shackle modern men in the long run, turning them into a small class of intellectuals who talk dreamily of change and do nothing. If so, South Africa will lose one of its last slim chances for a peaceful way out of its racial binds.

REQUIEM FOR THE GREAT SOCIETY

JASON DRUKMAN

Mr. Drukman is completing Community and Purpose in America: An Analysis of American Political Theory, to be published by McGraw-Hill. He is an assistant professor of political science and chairman of the American Studies Program, at Reed College.

When President Johnson asked his fellow Americans not to allow the death of Martin Luther King, Jr., to lead to increased violence, to further divisiveness, his appeal could evoke only a cynical response from most of his listeners. Whatever emotions Johnson could once awaken he had long since rubbed raw; whatever leadership capital he possessed had been squandered in the pursuit of his Vietnamese policy. It made little difference that only a few days earlier Johnson had announced his withdrawal from the campaign in order to "raise the Presidency above politics" and "promote unity" in a badly divided nation. Such displays of "statesmanship" came much too late. Not even the assumption that he had the highest of motives, that his "sacrifice" was entirely unrelated to the next day's Gallup Poll or the impending defeat in Wisconsin, could redeem Johnson. He had so vitiated the authority of his office that it somehow seemed appropriate for the country to bid him farewell through the "Thank you, Lyndon" signs which Washington hippies paraded in front of the White House. Presidential prestige had so deteriorated when the country was grief-stricken, shocked and enraged by Dr. King's assassination, and Johnson stood helpless, except to engage in still another application of force. After Memphis, the people stood in desperate need of political and spiritual leadership, but by then the Johnson Administration had become a moral and political tragedy.

To those who view the Johnson years as primarily an exercise in tawdriness and duplicity the word tragedy might seem a grotesque inflation of terminology. Tragedy, one might argue, pertains to ambitions far nobler than those of the Great Society or the War on Poverty. I shall try to suggest why this position is misconceived, why the fall of the House of Johnson has tragic implications for all of us.

I am a political theorist and I must confess that I found (and still find) the concept of the Great Society enormously compelling. It embodied a vision of something more than a society based on consensus. It described a nation founded upon and energized by a sense of community: a society in which none would suffer the degradation of want, where all would enjoy equally the advantages of education, progress and public service, where all could link arms as brothers and strive together to achieve a nation whose greatness was not only material but aesthetic and spiritual, where equality and justice would not be regarded as the shibboleths of institutionalized hypocrisy. This plea for community argued that the current of progress was wide enough to include everyone, and that no citizen should be cast adrift or left caught in the eddies of social disadvantage or economic deprivation. And the War on Poverty was a perfect device to make the quest for the Great Society operational, for the reference to warfare suggested a total mobilization of the nation's resources against an enemy common, in one way or another, to every segment of society. The Great Society, in short, provided a national purpose to which American citizens and public officials alike could dedicate themselves; the War on Poverty provided a framework within which Americans could work together as a community to achieve their national purpose.

Surely the call to seek the Great Society was a call to nobility, a call far clearer and more compelling than that which had issued from the New Frontier. I would argue, in fact, that the Great Society idea stands unique in the annals of recent American politics. In this century, for example, the Great Society notion compares very favorably to its political predecessors; it was broader and more profound than either Theodore Roosevelt's New Nationalism or Wilson's New Freedom and it possessed more consistency and sense of direction than did FDR's New Deal. Had the Great Society doctrines been taken at their word and been implemented with even partial success, the resultant accomplishment would have constituted a genuine triumph for democratic politics and guaranteed for Lyndon B. Johnson an illustrious place in history. That the Great Society failed so miserably must be regarded as a defeat of tragic proportions.

Of course, there were reasons at the outset not to accept Johnson's doctrines at face value. For one thing, his rhetorical style raised doubts. Johnson's speeches, alternately saccharine and mail-fisted, did little to inspire a vision of greatness or vivify a lethargic population. Even more distracting, although not clearly perceived by many, was the paradoxical nature of a call for community arising from the political mainstream. The traditional political approach had been to settle for a sufficient modicum of consensus based upon the preservation of law and order. And the American pattern of consensus falls considerably short of a genuine sense of community. Consensus suggests a system in which individuals or groups pursue their own specific goals, where interests must compromise with other interests in order to obtain at least part of what they want, and where all interests are generally expected to agree to the same "rules of the game." Community, on the other hand, ties men together in a common enterprise and engenders in each a feeling for the well-being of all citizens. Community presupposes that citizens can depend upon one another in a fundamental way for social, economic and even psychological support. Thus, it seemed odd that Johnson, a consensus practitioner of long standing, should transcend his background in political brokerage for a new position of such radical dimension.

The truth is that Johnson never really transcended his past experience. His political style was fixed, and it was probably inevitable that his program should be sundered by the age-old tension between ends and means. While the Great Society's stated objectives were equal to our highest aspirations, Johnson failed to understand that these goals could never be reached by the traditional methods of interest politics. He preached equality of opportunity, justice and brotherhood, but engaged in a political enterprise whose blatant motto was: "Jump aboard boys, there's something here for everybody—everybody, that is, who agrees to play ball."

The tip-off came very early when Johnson's first response to racial explosions in the South was to call together the businessmen of the area and explain to them why their image might be impaired by continued unrest. His program as a whole suggested that the new community, the end to poverty, deprivation and bigotry, could be realized with a philosophy which assumed business as usual, no fundamental alteration of outlook and, until Vietnam got totally out of hand, even a reduced and balanced budget. It should have been apparent to everyone, especially to those progressive-minded intellectuals who remained on the Johnson team, that such a program would inevitably founder.

Especially ironic in the light of later events was the fact that Negroes, more than any other segment of the population, tended to take Johnson's call to greatness seriously. In supporting Johnson, black leaders were asking that white society willingly open its arms and unlock its doors. At its loftiest, the Negro aspiration demonstrated a genuine commitment to equalitarianism, to a sense of mutual reliance and brotherhood. This was the dream of Dr. King and this also was the hope of James Baldwin who, in The Fire Next Time, imagined an America purified by a national unity born of a collective, biracial response to a common exigency.

When this did not occur, it simply meant that Baldwin's worst predictions would be fulfilled—and they have been. One must bear in mind that mass violence in the ghetto is of fairly recent origin, and that its appearance is not just a reaction to a continued life of poverty and squalor but even more a response of utter rage against a Great Society promise that failed to live up to its own word. That Dr. King had the forbearance to hold out hope even after the program had shown its true character was either a tribute to his saintliness or a commentary on his naiveté.

I said earlier that even partial fulfillment of the Great Society would have meant a good deal. But even partial success was impossible once the Vietnamese War went its terrible way. While Johnson, as Robert Sherrill has pointed out, had a long history of illiberality in foreign policy matters, his strategy of escalation seems to have been, at least in the beginning, as much a function of unconcern with foreign affairs as of hard-line attitudes.

In almost mindless fashion, Johnson continued in office all of the Realpolitik academics who had taken power with Kennedy. As Noam Chomsky and others have shown, these men are not objective social scientists but rather ideologues who conceal a virulent anti-communism beneath their "policy science" methodology and their balance-of-power lexicon. They were dominated by cold-war perspectives and this position meant that all dialogues about alternatives of policy took place within the given context of counterinsurgency and the imperatives of mutual security agreements. In this context, Vietnam could proceed in only one direction. Whether or not Johnson was personally committed to such views, he became committed to the men who held them, for the politics of interest places a higher premium on loyalty to men than it does on fidelity to position. It was not long, therefore, before defense of policy and defense of men coincided, and Johnson himself, despite his training in the school of compromise, grew almost into a caricature of the anti-Communist ideologue. Once that happened, the Great Society was doomed.

Abu (London)

It is not certain that this consequence was unavoidable. If Vietnam had not so dominated the scene and, more important, if Johnson had used the enormous political advantage gained from his election more constructively, the Great Society might have had at least a fighting chance. Despite its unwieldiness and its tendency to be heavy-handed, governmental leadership can help direct and even provide the galvanizing ingredient in the attempt to achieve a decent society. Most of those in the New Left who have eschewed national programs and have concentrated on local organizing have for many reasons found the going very difficult. In the first place, they have confronted massive apathy on the part of their "constituency." Second, they have been forced to deal with the intractable problem of organizing without really creating an organization—that is, they have attempted to form isolated individuals into an effective political body without falling into the pitfalls of bureaucratic authoritarianism which beset all organizations once they have become established. Finally, they have continually had to deviate from their course in order to fight rear-guard actions against the counterattacks of local establishments. Leadership at the national level can deal with all of these problems.

Apathy, for example, can be overcome only as the cynicism of the impoverished is mitigated. And this will not happen until the poor feel that what becomes of them makes a difference, that a national policy exists to demonstrate that the nation cares about them and regards them as legitimate citizens. Similarly with local organizations. So far as I know, the only way to combat the inexorable growth of bureaucratic structure is to provide an external purpose to which all members of the organization are committed and feel some confidence in attaining. Bureaucratic rationalization invades all organizations. This must be acknowledged and accepted at the outset. The problem is not how to avoid the phenomenon but how to keep the inevitable pettiness, red tape and routinization of procedure from becoming so powerful that they strangle the organization. Demoralization in Peace Corps and VISTA programs, with which I am familiar, has occurred precisely when the participants have become convinced that bureaucratic imperatives are more important to the leaders than the goals of the program. When substantive goals and purposeful leadership vacate the field, procedural mechanisms can be counted upon to occupy the territory.

Local power structures can be dealt with most effectively when organizers are supported from Washington. It takes strong leadership dedicated to principle to avoid the compromises and capitulations which are typically made to parochial establishments. I personally saw a creative and productive Upward Bound program scuttled because federal authorities would not defend the program directors against local conservative factions. It would have taken only a modest endorsement by the national office to have resolved the matter differently. Such support could and should have been forthcoming and, if the Administration had been truly interested in advancing the War on Poverty, it would have been forthcoming. But while support from the top is vital and must be strong, it must not be accompanied by a dogmatic insistence upon centralized control. A grasping hold on power from above is the quickest way to produce alienation and apathy in the local elements.

Just how strong the national commitment must be is indicated by the fact that much of the nation is at best ambivalent about its own professed ideals. The Kerner committee's conclusion that America is a racist society should not have surprised many informed observers. The survey research findings of innumerable social scientists have shown time and again that the majority of Americans neither practice nor understand the specific applications of civil rights and social equality, even as they espouse the most general formulations of the American creed. The next leader of a Great Society program, if there is to be one, must be able to grip this situation. He must, by example and a judicious and dignified use of his office, construct a public policy which brings American political behavior and the lofty goals of American idealism more closely into harmony.

The possibility of such an accomplishment presupposes that it is not already too late, that militarism, racism and corruption have not become so deeply implanted in the American system that they can be rooted out only through the use of revolutionary force. It also presupposes that the alienation of black America has not passed beyond the point of amelioration. Neither of these assumptions is palpably demonstrable. The absolute hegemony of the military perspective during the last twenty-five years is undeniable. It is equally important that over a long historical development American conceptions of liberty and equality have come to be defined almost exclusively in economic terms, translated into doctrines of economic individualism and the defense of property rights. With the essential components of American democracy so understood, it is difficult to be optimistic, particularly when economic self-aggrandizement has so frequently been achieved at the expense of the poor. The realization of this fact has driven many blacks beyond recall. The most visible leadership in the movement (now that Dr. King is gone) has grown increasingly estranged.

It is foolish to think that the black masses will remain stationary, waiting patiently for white society to accommodate them. Perhaps it is true, as some have argued, that Dr. King's death represents the "worst" moment, before things get better, that it is the critical event which will engender a policy of genuine reform. What is even clearer, however, is that with his death black Americans, leaders and followers alike, have escalated their militancy and that if no new sense of community and purpose develops throughout the nation, it is probably now realistic to forecast the Apocalypse Next Time.

AUDITING A THINK TANK

The Profit and Loss of Herman Kahn

H. L. NIEBURG

Mr. Nieburg teaches political science at the University of Wisconsin (Milwaukee). He is the author of In the Name of Science (Quadrangle) and Nuclear Secrecy and Foreign Policy (Public Affairs Press).

A glimpse into the cogs and synapses of a "think factory" is afforded by a recent report of the U. S. General Accounting Office after an audit of the Hudson Institute, Inc. (Croton-on-Hudson, N.Y.), Herman Kahn's "non-profit" corporation engaged in research, study and analysis relating to national security and international order.

Three Civil Defense (OCD) contracts having a total value of about $600,000 (of about $5 million in U. S. contracts to Hudson from July, 1961, through 1966) were reviewed. The U.S. auditors found that the OCD judged most of the work to be valueless, "a rehash," "superficial," and further that virtually no records were kept either at Hudson or OCD on how money had been spent or how progress had been monitored by the government.

Hudson Institute, Inc., is classified as a "Federal Contract Research Center," one of about 100 such institutions exclusively or substantially financed by the government whose primary products are technical and policy advice, information and formulation of planning options and concepts. Their main tools are assorted Ph.Ds, computers, blackboards, pads and pencils, and walnut conference rooms for brain-storm sessions. Officially they are engaged in a form of research and development known as "software," distinguished from the 400 R&D firms engaged in actual laboratory work, engineering, or "systems management" of weapon development (the latter mostly by industrial profit firms) which together absorb 17 billion public dollars each year.

Hudson is modeled after its parent, the RAND Corporation (a "university without students"). The auditors note that Hudson's establishment in 1961 was facilitated because government officials wished to insure the availability of the expertise of Herman Kahn. By incorporating himself, Dr. Kahn guaranteed his availability on the basis of multimillion-dollar contracts rather than for the customary $100 a day government consulting fee.

The proliferation of think factories, independent R&D firms, and systems managers, etc., is the result of a deliberate policy initiated during the missile race (mid-fifties) to "contract out" virtually every government job not nailed to the floor—mostly on a cost-plus basis. The traditional in-house capability of the government to direct activities of contractors has been in the process of dismantlement. Agency regulations and Congressional resolutions convert public servants into mere paper shufflers, brokers and pawns of private power groups whose operations are almost completely shielded from public scrutiny. [See "The Feast at the Pentagon," The Nation, December 25, 1967, and "Little Watchdog of the Dollar Warriors," The Nation, March 4; both by Sanford Watzman.] This is done in the name of "preserving free enterprise" and "limiting federal bureaucracy." All government agencies have in the last ten years adopted the formula of open-ended and permissive "contract out."

The Hudson audit was the first ever made of a think factory. Up to now, these new havens of meditation have failed to show the public their seams. Virtually all of their workers have reaped prestige, financial security, new contracts, better paying jobs in aerospace firms or university professorships (along with government contracts and industrial consultantships), thus maintaining a smooth self-confident façade. Just what has the nation been getting for the investment of billions?

The Comptroller-General's report notes that OCD's objective in awarding study contracts was "to obtain well-reasoned and useful information that would enhance its ability to deal effectively with complex civil defense matters." Under the three contracts studied, Hudson submitted eleven reports (between 1964 and 1966). Seven of these were unsatisfactory, if not useless.

Item: "On the Rating of Blast Shelters," November,

1965. The director, OCD Systems Evaluation Division, indicated that "the author did not have sufficient knowledge of the subject area" and it was refused publication and distribution.

Item: "A New Look at the Design of Low-Budget Civil Defense Systems," August, 1965. Rejected for publication because, OCD found, it did not present a "new look" at all; it offered "unilateral arguments" representing advocacy of a narrow point of view; its technical conclusions were based on evidence and postulates that were not explicit or identified; it constituted "sensationalism" which, while appropriate "in muckraking newspapers, pseudo-intellectual magazines, and SANE propaganda . . . is not appropriate for research papers." Revised by Hudson with the advice and aid of OCD personnel (who were thus forced to do most of the work themselves), it was approved for publication subject to security clearance and after correction of an unsubstantiated and probably false central assumption "relating blast pressures to fallout casualties."

Item: "On the Design of Risk-Oriented, Low-Cost Fallout Shelter Systems," March, 1967. Rejected because "many of the report's assumptions were obvious or unproved" and its recommendations "indicated that Hudson was unaware of OCD's present activities"; after revision the paper was still unacceptable to OCD, but was accorded limited internal distribution with the stipulation that it "could be expanded, modified or withdrawn at any time" and was "not to be quoted or used as a reference in publication." Revised twice again over a two-year period with the advice and assistance of OCD personnel, it was eventually approved for publication.

Item: "Management Requirements for Crisis Civil Defense Programs," November, 1965. Approved because "the report had already been paid for" and "one of OCD's research personnel . . . had commented favorably," although the technical monitor considered it "superficial and not of much value." The gist of the project was, according to OCD, "to show the importance of peacetime preparations for the management of crisis programs," a goal which was obvious to begin with.

Item: "Deferred-Cost OCD Options for Nuclear Crises," December, 1966. Rejected with OCD comment that the central theme of the paper (to alternate survival options of varying response times as a "hedge against ambiguous attack warning") was too general and had "been a keystone of military defense doctrine for many years." Paper was full of "unsupported guesses that serve only to distract from . . . the original idea." A three-day deadline for revision was rejected by Hudson which preferred a new contract to rework the study in more detail. Finally approved for limited distribution but "not considered to be of sufficient depth to warrant general use."

Item: "OCD Program Planning for Crisis Program: Some Environmental Considerations," November, 1966. Based on an OCD civil defense study game held at Providence, R. I., the monitor approved the report "as evidence of the contractor's performance of the contract," but limited its distribution to within the agency (except with written approval by the Assistant Director of Research). This approach was intended "to preclude loading bookshelves with a report" for which the monitor saw no value. Hudson was not requested to make needed revisions, lest the government "incur additional costs" for a matter which had "no immediate significance."

Unlike the purchase of off-the-shelf hardware and the development of designs and prototype hardware, the thinking of Ph.D. wildcatters and promoters confronts the nation with a stiff bookkeeping and accounting problem. One of the chief reasons for the phenomenal growth of research and development in the federal budget (now $17 billion) is precisely the open-ended, permissive and un-auditable nature of R&D contracting. R&D can readily become a handy and subtle kind of defense profiteering.

In its Hudson study, the GAO was "unable to determine the cost of the seven reports from the records of the Hudson Institute." Herman Kahn consented only to submit accumulated totals "on a contract basis" without certification or indeed further explanation. Consequently, the audit states, "the costs of any of the several reports prepared under each contract could not be identified." The "nonprofit" fee is usually set at 6 per cent of the total direct and indirect costs. Theoretically, under law and procurement regulation, rigorous limits are defined on reimbursable direct and indirect costs, while the fee remains beyond the public ken. Since the actual cost figures are concealed by the contractor, the notion of a fixed fee becomes ludicrous. Why should a nonprofit get any kind of fee beyond costs?

Hudson-supplied estimates enabled the GAO to guess a cost of about $50,000 per man-year of work under the contracts. There appears to be no way to verify this figure. Other studies of cost-plus contracting have suggested a host of devious bookkeeping contrivances that enable both profit and nonprofit R&D firms to inflate fees, stuff overhead, hide equities and profits, add unconscionable perquisites and expense account items to already high salaries, allow the acquisition of buildings, computers and equipment of all sorts, not to mention reserve funds, investments, indirect expansion through mergers and subsidiaries, phony insurance fees, rigged prices paid by the contractor to his suppliers, etc. The open-ended nature of "science," thinking, systems analysis and management, research and development, all open a back door to a mid-20th-century brand of "honest graft," corruption and political patronage, underwritten with a government guarantee of corporate health and future growth.

The GAO study of Hudson shows that OCD, the contracting agency, did not implement even such sound procedures as were available and thereby increased the likelihood of unresponsive results. In fact, once a contract was signed, the agency evinced little interest in its performance. The work defined by the contracts "was very broad and permitted a great deal of leeway," consisting of brief general statements largely lifted intact from Hudson's own proposals. The GAO comments: "Since these proposals were not more specific than the contracts, this . . . did little to provide assurance that the work to be performed would provide information of direct interest to OCD." A review of agency files "did not reveal any additional documentation supplementing the scope of the work which would clarify what specifically were its objectives or would show that a mutual understanding had been reached on the work to be done."

A typical definition of task (Contract 66-30) concludes with a pledge to include in the consideration of "major elements of strategy the following: geopolitics, economics, national resources, and technology." The lack of detail led to situations in which unacceptable Hudson studies were nonetheless approved because, in the words of the Deputy Assistant Director of Research, they "could be rationalized . . . under the contract scope."

Such grudging progress reports as were made "did not show how much time Hudson had spent on the studies, individually or in total, or the amount of time Hudson planned to spend." Accordingly, the GAO comments, they "did not provide sufficient information to permit an evaluation." Reports often merely narrowed the field of inquiry, as though the research done up to that point had been really an effort to discover what should be researched. Under contract titled "Passive Defense and Future Nuclear Wars," one typical progress report stated that Hudson has been "developing some war-outbreak scenarios to study some of the strategic implications of defensive systems and their potential important influence on the future styles of nuclear diplomacy."

The Assistant Director of Research told auditors that "progress reports submitted by contractors are generally not well prepared and therefore not too useful." Even such inadequate reports as were made were "so late it would have been difficult to change the direction of the work even if the information provided had indicated that such a change was warranted."

No evidence was found that any of the conferences required by procurement regulations had been held, nor had regular and useful visits been made to Croton-on-Hudson to examine the status of work. Even when meetings were held and trips made, there were "no written records of meetings or trip reports" and such implementing agreements as were reached between OCD and Hudson were never written down and placed in the contract files as guidance for other members of the agency or for subsequent contract monitors. Did anyone really care? Did it make any difference?

The whole system of contracting-out to think factories has become an empty ritual, a means of spending money while rationalizing useless, unread and often uncirculated results. It has come to represent a collaboration subsidized by the taxpayer in which it is difficult to judge whether Herman Kahn is working for the government or OCD personnel are working for him, keeping him and his cohorts in their elegant and delightful retreat on the Hudson, shiny fatted monks whose real function is to pray for the United States, to enjoy the comforts of their monastery as a symbol of our affluence and sophistication, in hopes that an occasional inspiration will elevate, exalt and enlighten us. Kahn argues exactly along these lines in his rejoinder to the GAO charges:

Our primary focus . . . is on major policy issues, and we believe that our job is to emphasize rather speculative areas of study. We think that for this specialized type of research, the research organization . . . must be allowed an unusual degree of freedom to develop its thinking as it goes along. . . . Our most basic objective is to stimulate the imagination

In the corona of schlock-science, jargon and impenetrable numbers, he spins new myths which seek to justify national policies and inexorably advance the cases of sponsoring agencies before Congressional appropriations committees.

The central function of the think factories, viewed in terms of the impact and motivation of their reports, has been political. The RAND Corporation early pre-empted the brain-trust field. On behalf of the Air Force, it exerted a powerful influence in the National Security Council and on the Joint Chiefs of Staff and Congress. Supported by RAND's closely reasoned, bountifully documented technical papers, embellished with mathematical boiler plate spun out by tireless giant computers, the Air Force rose in the 1950s to become undisputed queen of the services in the critical disputes concerning strategy, weapons systems, mission assignments, budget allocations.

The function of the think factory as a contemporary form of political advocacy declined under Robert S. McNamara's term as Defense Secretary. Himself a product of computerized, operations-research-style management, surrounded by leading RAND gray eminences (such as Charles J. Hitch and Alain C. Enthoven), McNamara wrested himself free from the cobwebs of RAND logic.

The fact that the GAO has now questioned the authority of Herman Kahn testifies to the waning magic of chateaucloistered expertise, and possibly forecasts the demise of the Hudson Institute and all similarly strange mutations of quasi-government. Perhaps it presages only Kahn's own return to the shabby gentility of physics and the university.

INTEGRATION IN BERKELEY

THE CITY THAT WENT TO SCHOOL

RAY and BETTY HALPERN

Ray Halpern teaches at Merritt College, Oakland, Calif.; Betty Halpern is director of the Berkwood School, Berkeley; an instructor at San Francisco State College, and a consultant with Head Start.

Berkeley

In his discussion of the "Retreat to Separate but Equal" in American education (The Nation, November 27, 1967) Ivor Kraft argued convincingly for a new determination to integrate our schools—even though black radicals, tired liberals and die-hard bigots currently "agree" on apartheid education. In an impassioned conclusion he asserted that as the way to peace is through peace itself, the way to integration is through integration itself. Fine—no one should disagree. But this still leaves a mournful question: How?

The citizens of Berkeley, Calif. (now best known for its tumultuous university) can suggest one "how" that seems to be working. Basically, it is the notion that integration must be experienced on some level, and that black and white parents must "integrate" first, must face together their common problems in the political arena, before they will ask their children to do likewise. If Berkeley is a reliable guide, this process will involve crises, disputes, mass school board meetings, recall elections—the full political show. But once people are determined to live in a city rather than build walls, they can discover common grounds of interest that will override fear of change. When this occurs, they can move to build something new.

In September, Berkeley will become the first city in the country of more than 100,000 population (it now has 121,000) and a large Negro school enrollment (more than 40 per cent) to put into effect a plan for total integration of its elementary schools. Its keystone—the heterogeneous classroom—will replace the tracking system (based on “ability” or homogeneous grouping) which has become the main instrument of Northern school segregation. The Berkeley elementary system will be integrated, not just within the schools but within each classroom, and on the bases of race, sex, academic achievement and economic status.

To accomplish this, the school board will inaugurate a revolutionary two-way busing system never tried by any other community on more than a pilot basis. All children from kindergarten through 6th grade will share both the ghetto and the middle-class schools: classes from kindergarten through 3rd grade will be conducted in the white “hill schools”; those from 4th through 6th grades will be held in the now segregated Negro schools “on the flats.”

This will be no simple logistical exercise. Fifteen schools, with a total enrollment of almost 9,000, are involved. (Parents are now being invited to experience the busing their children will soon negotiate daily!) Fortunately, Berkeley’s school system does not cover a large geographical area. It extends along the eastern shore of San Francisco Bay for about 3.5 miles and runs back about 3 miles to the hills.

It is a desirable place to live—the weather temperate, the setting attractive, the housing relatively good even for the families (15 per cent) with yearly incomes under $3,000. There is no core slum, though much of the housing in the west and south is depressed. The hills, facing the Golden Gate and San Francisco’s jagged silhouette, contain a variety of old and modern homes of great warmth and appeal, their overall tone somewhat British. As Robert Gilmore, a Negro technical employee at the university, puts it, “Whites and Negroes both have ‘made it’ to be here.”

The university is the job giver for about one-third of the 50,000 gainfully employed. Although there is considerable industrial development, 62 per cent of the work force is white collar, and that explains why a near-record 67.5 per cent of the adult population has completed four years of high school or more. Berkeley’s citizens—both black and white—have great potential, but it took a long series of confrontations to make it actual.

Perhaps the story begins in the late 1950s when liberals were recovering from the blows of McCarthyism which were especially damaging in this oath-wracked university town. In January, 1958, the Berkeley branch of the NAACP requested that the school board address itself to the problem of de facto segregation. In its conservative fashion, the board acted—slowly. Twenty-one months later, in the fall of 1960, one of the first of Berkeley’s celebrated citizens’ committees—the Staats Committee—reported on “Interracial Problems and Their Effect on Education.” It was a modest report, in effect accepting the segregation pattern; yet its two major recommendations—the accelerated hiring of Negro teachers and the establishment of in-service training in integration for the teaching staff—have been carried out with far-reaching effect. The present integration plan would not have been conceivable without the solid professional base called for by the report.

In this period, also, black and white forces elected a second liberal member to the school board. In 1961 two others, including the first Negro—Dr. Roy Nichols, now pastor of Harlem’s St. Mark’s Methodist Church—became members, making a 4-to-1 majority. These victories proved, as Mary Jane Johnson, Berkeley’s NAACP president, states, that the “two races were in contact with each other, that lots of university people were aware and were functioning as part of the total community, that the hills were not an island.”

When urged by CORE in 1962 to correct segregation, especially in the junior high schools, the board again took typical action—it appointed another citizens’ committee, the thirty-six-member Hadsell Committee, to suggest a plan.

A year and a half of conflict and compromise within the committee and of study and controversy in the community at large, including virtually every PTA group and a score of political, business and civic organizations, elapsed before the so-called Ramsey Plan was adopted in May, 1964, by the school board before an audience of 2,000 divided citizens.

It was a hectic period. The infuriating logic of the plan—prefiguring the future total elementary school integration—hardly mollified white conservatives: There were two segregated junior highs—one white and one black. (A third was well integrated.) Therefore, why not simply declare the all-black school a 9th grade school for the entire system and divide the 7th and 8th grades between the other two? It has been done—and it’s working, but the plan shocked the community down to its gunwales because the white school had long been a cherished possession of the separatist hill folk. In the words of Dr. Thomas Wogaman, assistant to Superintendent of Schools Neil Sullivan: “This was a traumatic time for many citizens who resided in areas affected by the proposed boundary change and who had long regarded themselves as ‘liberals.’ ”

In fact the controversy erupted into an election to recall a majority of the school board after it had adopted the uncompromising boundary system. The community was crucially divided. The election was to take place on October 6. The summer months saw the most intense politicking over education that had ever shaken Berkeley—and at its height Sullivan arrived on September 1 to commence his new administration! The election resulted in an overwhelming endorsement of the incumbent board members.

The day after that victory, Sullivan offered a proposal for a Master Plan Committee of 138 members that would “take the school system apart and put it back together in our own image,” to quote Marc Monheimer, its future chairman. Sullivan had caught on quickly to the Berkeley way. He knew that a citizens’ committee need not be a delaying tactic of conservative forces but could as well be an instrument to unite a divided city and maintain a liberal consensus behind himself and the board. The community itself could be a school.

The Master Plan Committee was initiated in May, 1965, by the board to suggest solutions to both short-term problems and those “more of a directional nature, that is, establishing guidelines for the district to follow over twenty-five to thirty years." Since the specified areas for study "covered no less than the whole spectrum of public education in the modern urban community" (to quote the report), each became the title of a subcommittee: The Instructional Program; Special Education and Special Services; Finance and Business Services; Community Environment, School Buildings and Facilities, and District Relationships.

One-third of the committee members were from district staff. Lay members were selected by the board from 220 nominations by individuals and by almost every known community organization. Negroes were well represented. This group finally completed its plan, embodying 110 primary recommendations and hundreds of valuable suggestions and analyses in more than 600 pages of text, in October, 1967, after two and a half years of remarkable community labor.

Although the concept of an integrated school system in an eventual integrated society informs the entire work, its rich profusion of ideas cannot possibly be adequately summarized in one article. Here are but a few of the proposals.

A major suggestion is the centralized elementary school, with present neighborhood school buildings being converted to neighborhood centers containing libraries, meeting rooms and recreational facilities. Another is to place "the arts at the center, not the periphery of our culture." The plan advises also the elimination of "observances which tend to emphasize one religious tradition over others." Two recommendations on finances propose that school boards should have the same right as city councils to set property tax rates without statutory limitation and that the state should be expected to pay for the courses and programs it requires.

But the group dynamics of community confrontation is the real story of Berkeley's Master Plan—as it is of the evolution of the tracking proposal (which buttresses the forthcoming elementary integration) and, indeed, of Berkeley's renewal in education. True, Berkeley is a special place, and its specialness will be gone into further; nevertheless the basic point is that its people want to live together—and as one conservative member put it, "Get people together and differences do melt."

Robert Baldwin was chairman of the key Instructional Program Committee, which was divided into subcommittees on tracking and curriculum. He was a fortunate choice because of his background in labor relations and economic research. He had often seen "differences melt" in labor negotiations and believed he knew the correct strategy for arriving at consensus: research and "open-door" (read neutral) language.

Of course, first there had to be agreement on goals. But that is easy where everyone at least formally recognizes democratic aspirations. However, it is also easy to formulate democratic justifications for almost any program, including the homogeneous classroom: "respecting individual differences" pretty well summarizes these, and weighty argument can be marshaled to justify this position—which, after all, prevails in more than 95 per cent of the country's secondary schools and, in essence, a majority of elementary schools.

It would be wrong to assume that only "bigots" or conservatives favor homogeneous grouping. In fact, many liberal professors who found the philosophy of segregation noxious but who were also the parents of bright youngsters were extremely anxious about the dangers of "leveling." ("High-potential" students comprise 13 per cent of Berkeley school enrollment; the national average is only 2 per cent!) Therefore it was necessary to study actual conditions in the schools. The committee went into the classrooms, interviewed teachers, examined student records, consulted authorities, and did vast reading in the controversial IQ-achievement-grouping field.

They discovered: "The most obvious unintended (author's italics: a good example of "open-door" language) result of the tracking system in Berkeley is that it produces de facto segregated classrooms within our integrated secondary schools. Racial stereotyping, social circumstances and differences in educational background result in the top track being populated almost exclusively by Caucasians and Orientals and the bottom tracks almost exclusively by Negroes."

Furthermore, the consequences of tracking are intellectual, cultural and economic isolation, resulting in the lowering of both student and teacher aspirations. Therefore: "We conclude that the structural device of tracking inhibits the realization of the educational goals that we seek for all children in the Berkeley community." (Author's italics: once again note the careful, noncombustible research-style language.) To arrive at such findings was not easy. When its conclusions can prick the nerves of an entire community, research will never be dispassionate. Facts can become pawns of preconceptions, those that do not fit being conveniently ignored. Education of the young can arouse passion and anxiety. So it was in the tracking subcommittee.

Its chairman, Carl Mack, was a Negro who had been a teacher and professional scout leader and is now a housing administrator. He had become concerned with "doing something about education" when he observed Negro students in a nearby segregated Oakland high school being taught washing and ironing in senior English. One of his sons, who had been told by a prejudiced or incompetent Berkeley teacher that he could not learn to read, was transferred to another class and began reading above average.

But progress was not easily made. "Several of the committee just didn't want to believe. They would go to an 'integrated' high school and see all-Negro classes and all-white classes, with maybe one Negro, but they didn't believe it. They didn't believe what they saw. Ghetto schools, they could understand."

Even after the tracking subcommittee had presented its recommendation to the committee as a whole, three unresolved members made a motion to rewrite. At this point Mack threatened to resign.

He gathered up his papers amidst shocked disbelief. There were cries of "No!" "You can't do this!" But seemingly he was going to. Something had to break the horrendous impasse, but no one knew what. At last a Baldwinian motion was made to rewrite the entire recommendation by eliminating unnecessarily divisive language, professional jargon and excess verbiage.

The emphasis was to be placed on experimentalism. At least they were agreed that tracking was bad, even though they were not certain what strategies would be employed to assure that heterogeneity could produce quality education. But they could make suggestions, and they were all—regardless of color or philosophy—agreed on high standards. Why not say that?

The “open-door,” experimental approach prevailed. Following are some statements in the anti-tracking recommendation:

“How can we teach heterogeneous groups while still maintaining or raising our educational standards and meeting the individual needs of the students? . . . We are looking for teaching techniques that allow the teacher to meet the needs of individuals and small groups within the larger classroom. . . . Such teaching methods already exist. . . . They are the methods . . . of team-teaching, individualized instruction, independent learning, and the non-graded school.”

It became clear that the heterogeneous class could be visualized as the basis for a more individualized kind of learning than the homogeneous class affords, because from it can spring numerous subgroups formed for temporary diagnostic goals. Thus a student can join many successive—or simultaneous—groups instead of being frozen in one track throughout his school career. (This point, of course, appealed to any wavering advocates of tracking.)

Previous to the Master Plan certain predominantly Negro and white schools had been “paired,” a device which involved limited busing of students and considerable working together of the respective parent groups. Mack observed:

These parents were the most determined critics of tracking because they had become convinced through common experience that Negroes, as well as whites, want quality education.

Among my own friends I can observe this. Those who are products of integrated settings can understand whites and rationalize their positions, and they will work in the community. Yet they just don't go along with the Establishment either.

Even in my own family . . . one of my sons went to an integrated school and the other to an all-black school. One can get along with all types, the other thinks along Negro lines.

I had to do some rethinking of my own ideas and beliefs. I had been thinking just in terms of race. I learned that this isn't just a Negro problem. It just happens that most in the lower socio-economic group are Negro. It's a problem of the poor.

Ralph Miller, an advertising account executive on the committee, had another angle:

I started out strongly for tracking. Many of us in the Caucasian community thought our kids were doing well in school and saw no reason for change. I still think that tracking can be successfully used in the training of all youngsters.

Yet if Negroes are discouraged and demoralized, then—whatever your views—something is wrong. It is costing more than it is doing good. This is where the dilemma lies, and it is where I became confused, concerned and torn. I decided it is the concerns of people that are important, and I voted with the majority.

But he still insists that this was a moral decision, a decision based on values, and not on “facts” or research.

Basically, it is a question of the meaning of community: “We found new understandings come out. We saw why some people were concerned and why we would have to be concerned. Once your views are heard, you feel better.”

Monheimer, overall plan chairman, recalls many instances of those who reversed their beliefs. He can tell of conservatives who had formerly attempted to recall the board and are now strong advocates of heterogeneous grouping—“of real change for the schools”; and of liberals who “pulled in their horns” to join a more moderate consensus.

During plenary session almost all the proposals got better than 75 per cent approval of the entire committee; most of them received 90 per cent. The anti-tracking proposal was opposed by only five members. Monheimer attributes this high degree of agreement to the unifying impulse in people who have been working together for a long period of time. “They stop thinking about why Mrs. Smith doesn't change the text in Johnny's classroom. They discard pet schemes and peevess. They forget they are Johnny's mother or father.”

Monheimer is proud of the work done and he is aware of its significance. Yet he and his committee also know that they must constitute themselves into an organized force to insure serious consideration of the entire plan, for although “accepted” it is not mandated. Already a committee of Master Plan leaders has been appointed to assign priorities to its manifold proposals. “After all, we have to protect our investment: we worked two and a half years for this.”

This is the point at which to assess Berkeley's specialness in order to determine whether other cities could perhaps profit from its example. It would seem that Berkeley is not so very special. True, the university is a liberating force; true, the Negro community is compact, well organized and well led; true, the white community is well educated and has made numerous contacts with the black people on the flats; true, there are no suburbs for whites to flee to and yet remain in Berkeley.

Yet Berkeley's august citizens destroyed the career of liberal Mayor Lorraine Cross for having given Paul Robeson the opportunity to sing in a city auditorium; its beleaguered property owners recently rejected a local “fair housing” ordinance by a considerable margin; its voters have backed Republican candidates with dreary predictability. Berkeley is not so special. It is a city much like other American cities: impeded by contradictions, filled with promise.

The major distinction between Berkeley and some other cities is that it has no core ghetto. But even in those that do—Los Angeles, for example—many non-ghetto Negro areas could be joined to neighboring white districts if there were sufficient will, sufficient consistent effort to halt the murderous drift toward civil disaster!

As for Berkeley's vision of its schools, its goals are still more exemplary than its accomplishments—yet the goals have the deepest possible significance for a fracturing society. What they seem to mean is that a community uses its view of itself as a model for the "society" it establishes in which to educate its young people.

If a true community organization becomes such a model, the school will reflect its variegated but unified composition; the classroom too will become heterogeneous but cooperative—in other words, a community. But if a school bears the impress of an upper-class or racist or bourgeois view, it will be highly competitive, therefore rigidly grouped so that competition can function on a hierarchy of ability levels. As the result of "ability" grouping, students will operate in quite distinct educational, social, cultural and political worlds within the school society—just as their adult models on the outside do. And such a system can work very well if the society is agreed on the model. Ability grouping is not new. Europe has operated "successfully" on such a basis for centuries.

But, as Kraft points out, America's hangup lies in its dual allegiance to the aspirations of formal democracy on the one hand and the more coercive use and custom of a rigidly stratified "ability-grouped" socio-economic system on the other. If we adopt the latter, we must realize, as NAACP general counsel Robert L. Carter has warned, that "anti-white feeling will have become so virulent within a generation that any hope of the two races finding a common basis for peaceful coexistence will have gone forever."

Presuming democratic goals, therefore, the question becomes how to push the schools off their stuporous dead center to accomplish genuine integration. The Berkeley answer is adult "integration" even on the relatively superficial level of interracial participation in community committees responding to common problems—that is, presuming these committees have a real function and will be listened to, as they have been in Berkeley. People have been "protected" too long by their political representatives, their media, their prejudices. When they are face to face, responses become "surprising," human. Of course it would be better if residential and economic integration were the matrix for cooperation—but if that were the case there wouldn't be a problem! It's getting started that is difficult.

Fortunately Superintendent Sullivan is no stranger to conflict. In fact he was appointed by the Berkeley board because of a reputation gained the previous year when he reopened and re-established the school system of Prince Edward County, Va., closed for four years because of the unwillingness of its white citizenry to desegregate. Dr. Sullivan (Ed. D., Harvard, 1956) is tough, intelligent and adaptive. Also—unlike many of his breed—he has charm and style, along with experience gained from superintendencies in New England and Long Island, N.Y.

He is an appropriate leader for the kind of battle Berkeley's progressive forces are waging. The battle was explained in the preamble to the Master Plan. "Our country is in the midst of a profound social revolution. Our children will have a better understanding of their country, their community, and themselves if they learn to feel at home with the broad spectrum of individuals and backgrounds we find within our own city."

LETTERS (Continued from page 618)

Annals ("The Peace Corps Volunteer in the Field: Community Development," Vol. 365, May, 1966), he criticized my description of Latins as having had certain conditioned characteristics. This point was based on the previous, unquoted sentence in my article which said that "the environment in Latin America exerts a strong, almost regulatory influence. Having existed under various forms of oppression, Latin Americans have been conditioned to certain values and attitudes." . . . The point is not what Latins or North Americans are or are not. It is the nature of the element that does the conditioning that is significant. There is no value judgment placed on the results of the conditioning—i.e., people—whether Latin or North American. In this sense, my words carried an indictment of the rulers of the Latin countries rather than their oppressed citizens. But then again how can one expect an academic expert on Indian anthropology to understand the reality of Latin America?

Kirby Jones

Berkeley, Calif.

DEAR SIR: My mention of the termination of the Peace Corps activity in several countries (we may now add Nigeria, it seems) was presented as one kind of evidence of the deteriorating response to the PC, not as a direct result of the war in Vietnam as Mr. Norman (letters, Mar. 18) seems to think. There is plenty of other evidence of the effect of the war on the PC, and I presented some of it. I did not "seek to make the Peace Corps a casualty of the war in Vietnam." That war makes its own casualties, and the Peace Corps is one of them.

I think Mr. Frantz missed my point. I am sure that his brother is doing a good job in Panama. But that does not alter the fact that teaching athletics to orphans in Panama is regarded as hypocritical by many people at home and abroad when done in the name of peace by a government whose main foreign endeavor is the war in Vietnam. I am sorry that it should be so, but it is—and understandably.

I congratulate Mr. Jones for having organized the Peace Corps petition against the war. It was a worthy act and it took courage. In response to his comments on my article, I must say that I did not imply that during the Dominican Republic uprising, the Dominicans or the U.S. State Department regarded the Peace Corps as pro-Marines. It is to the PCVs credit that they were not so regarded. My point was that their activities have been used (in retrospect) by our government to direct attention to the benevolence of U.S. policies there and by implication elsewhere as well—hence the sugar coating.

My quotations of Mr. Jones's remarks at Berkeley were taken from local press reports, and while they may not be wholly accurate, they were not "invented." I heard him speak them and they were substantially as reported.

I am well aware of the conditioning effects of oppression. I have worked intensively with untouchables of India whose oppression is unsurpassed. . . . It seems that the most profound conditioning is in the means by which such systems are manipulated, cushioned and circumvented rather than passively acquiesced to or assimilated by those oppressed. This is true of Indian untouchables, black Americans and Latin Americans under dictatorship. . . . To characterize Latin Americans as "fatalistic," "blindly hopeful," "desirous of any status symbol of their own," etc., is patronizing and an underestimation of them, regardless of the presumed sources of these characteristics. If one reads the quoted paragraph to a Latin American, as I have, the response is likely to be about the same as that of a black American to a description of his people as lazy, dishonest and musical. The contribution of "academic experts" on anthropology . . . is precisely that they relate the realities of India to those of Latin America and wherever men live.

Gerald D. Berreman

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Coupling and Uncoupling

COUPLES. By John Updike. Alfred A. Knopf. 458 pp. $6.95.

JOSE YGLESIAS

Mr. Yglesias is the author of A Wake in Ybor City (Holt, Rinehart and Winston), The Goodbye Land (Pantheon), and the just published In the Fist of the Revolution: Life in a Cuban Country Town (Pantheon).

John Updike lives with his family in Ipswich, Mass., and during the weeks before publication date of his new novel, everyone began to call the book "Ipswich Place." Perhaps because of its sexuality. Perhaps because of the hundreds of thousands of dollars the movies had paid for it. Updike is very unpopular with much of the literary establishment—that part of it still flaying away at The New Yorker—and he makes a perfect butt for them: a kind of embodiment of the literature of the fifties that no one wants to defend any more. The critics are very hip now: they want Experimental Prose and Large Statements in fiction. They gave him up three years ago—there was almost a gang-up on Of the Farm—and it is very galling that he continues successful and widely read. That his present novel has all the stigmata of a bestseller will seem a confirmation—he can be flung on that heap where John Steinbeck and John O'Hara lie.

Yet the most striking thing about Couples is Updike's attempt to break out of the intimist, unpolitical, miniaturist mold that had become his official bust. He seems to be responding to the critics who wrongly argued that he had "nothing to say," by choosing the "larger social canvas" from which, ipso facto, significance must emerge. This is a presumptuous guess—writers, it is safe to say, respond mainly to their own vision—but Updike's novel is full of evidence that he is simply being his critics' dutiful student. Dutiful but unconvinced. The result is an uneasy mixture, as if James T. Farrell had been persuaded to sprinkle one of his laconic novels with metaphors and conceits.

It would appear that Updike started out to depict a group of married couples in Tarbox, a town sufficiently like Ipswich to have its quota of Boston exurbanites, but the early promise of equal time for each couple is soon dissipated. Piet Hanema, partner in a local construction firm, partner in an uneasy marriage, takes the center of the stage and becomes the single point of view from which we gaze at his circle of friends: an aesthetics for the construction of the novel that Updike seems incapable of abandoning. He cannot forgo, either, his marvelously developed talent for the exquisitely observed detail, the sensual nuances of physical response—as out of place in this flatly naturalistic scene as in the anonymous "Talk Of the Town" items in The New Yorker that Updike signs with his style. The pull of old habits is strong with writers. Updike's real accomplishment in finding a perfectly jointed phrasing and construction for his short stories and past novels becomes a manner and a lazy habit when imposed on a traditional novel about social relations.

In a sense, Updike is forced to settle on the single point of view—on a hero whose feeling for building things well comes close to Updike's own craftsmanship—to pour into his hero's life all the poetic images he (Updike) can with seeming ease scoop up from the simplest action. To do otherwise, to follow the action with other characters, is to run the risk—unwilling as he is to give up his mannerisms—of peopling the book with a cast whose sensibilities are all the same.

Though he abandons the fictional construction for a group portrait to the demands of his style—rather, mannerism: we tend to call inept protuberances style—he never gives up his subject, an acrid landscape of middle-class couples, coupling and uncoupling as the sociologists and scandal sheets have informed us has become usual. To their coupling Updike brings another transplanted old virtue: his sweet sensuality. It is a minor dividend—in a book with many minor pleasures—to find, as in all his novels, love for the flesh of women, affection in sex, naturalness and magic in the intimate touch. But, again, so inappropriate—in their effect—to these characters that one is tempted to hand Updike the ambiguous compliment of being the most sensitive heterosexual writer around. Like his metaphors, the fineness of sex feeling finally seems an overlay, a gratuitous display of "sensitivity."

Thomas Mann in one of his last essays, at the time he had finished the dense Doctor Faustus, with its style of scholarly qualifications, and about to embark on the light, cynical Felix Krull, said that the only stylistic approach left to the bourgeois writer was that of parody. Parody dictated by his subject or his narrator, for Mann believed that bourgeois social relations could be fruitfully described only in a satirical tone. Piet Hanema, asking his wife to sleep with the local dentist to get him out of a jam and his wife complying—all with no questions asked—might be made a believable scene; but not in the humanist style—either his own or Chekhov's or Edith Wharton's or any of those writers who straightforwardly expect that the most aberrant action can be salvaged by the essential human worth of their subjects or their unawakened potential. Something new has happened in the bourgeois world and you cannot do it justice with affecting metaphors. When his wife agrees, Piet is unable to answer for a moment: "he lay on the bed like a man lying on water, only his eyes and nostrils not immersed." It would make Aristotle laugh.

What has happened is that Updike has not allowed his partner-switching couples to say anything to him and, therefore, there is no tension between him and his subject, no stylistic consistency, and no interest for the reader. His doggedly pursued story turns into one of those overlong novels to which one surrenders dully in order to complete it. You can see it being read in snatches—in subways, lunch hours, before falling asleep—by readers of bestsellers used to skipping "poetic" passages to get on to the titillating moments of sex and the improbable dramatic turns.

Of course Mann's dictum works only with writers who know the class nature of their society and have some feelings and desires about it. Rather concrete desires too, even if they're not expressed in political, programmatic terms. Updike has chosen as his subject a recognizable social group engaged in specific activities (business, the professions, academia), and has refused or been incapable of judging it on its own terms. I do not mean overt judgment—though any lapse is forgiven a writer who confronts his subject—but that implicit judgment that creates the unifying tension in any work. Surprisingly, it is such social judgment on the author's part that gives his characters humanity, no matter how mean and senseless their ambience may be: the sour air that hangs around his couples comes from Updike's lack of committedness to any social point of view.

John Updike seems worrisomely aware that something is missing and to that we owe a couple of techniques, intermittently indulged, for imbuing the novel with Higher Significance. (Let's forget the epigraph from Paul Tillich and Updike's watered protestantism scarcely in evidence here.) He gives some characters names that are descriptive of the roles they play. Nowadays that passes for myth making, but when Dickens called his happiness-making characters Cheeryble, it was good for a laugh and no more. Now and again there are some vaguely symbolic descriptions, such as the weather vane on the church steeple, and happenings, such as the church fire at the end.

The New Mainstream

SOUL ON ICE. By Eldridge Cleaver. McGraw-Hill Book Co. 210 pp. $5.95.

JULIAN MAYFIELD

Mr. Mayfield is a novelist and journalist who worked as an aide to President Nkrumah in Ghana after his active support of the Robert F. Williams self-defense movement in Monroe, N. C. Presently a Junior Fellow of the Society for the Humanities at Cornell University where he conducts a seminar in race relations, in September he will join the faculty of the Schweitzer Program in the Humanities, at New York University.

There used to be a lot of nonsense written about black writers being outside the mainstream of American literature. This was because, for the most part, their work followed the protest tradition, and resisted the fads which sought to obscure the realities of history, economics, and the distribution of political power. Black writers, with varying degrees of success, clung stubbornly to the conviction that the black experience in America was worth exploiting. Now we know that it is worth more than most of us imagined, that it is integral to the American experience, not a marginal back street, and that the nation's survival may depend on how quickly it understands this and changes accordingly.

These thoughts are prompted by a remarkable book, Soul On Ice, a collection of essays and letters by Eldridge Cleaver, a 33-year-old black man who has spent the greater part of his adolescence and adulthood in California state prisons. He is, therefore, no stranger to violence, but neither are any of us any more. I feel more like a war correspondent as I sit down to review this book, for there are Also, since his publishers allow him to decide about his book jacket and flap copy, Updike makes one last attempt to give the book coherence: "The circle of acquaintances is felt as a magic circle, with ritual games, religious substitutions, a priest (Freddy Thorne) and a scapegoat (Piet Hanema)." The art on the cover is William Blake's "Adam and Eve Sleeping." The only significance in this is that a jacket wraps a book, it can't hold it together.

All these truisms aren't worth pointing out to readers were the writer ~~someone~~ less accomplished than Updike. Writers of his talent and achievements do not need lectures, but perhaps a reminder is in order: pay no attention to unappreciative critics and stick to your interests. There is room in literature for all kinds.

riots and fires raging in more than 100 of our cities and towns in the wake of the Memphis assassination. So I am only vaguely shocked when a friend telephones to say that Eldridge Cleaver has just been shot, and a fellow Black Panther member killed while attempting to surrender to the Oakland police. If that doesn't put our young writer into the American mainstream, which is violence, I don't know what will.

First it must be said that Soul On Ice is beautifully written by a man with a formidably analytical mind. His talent might have gone undiscovered and undeveloped had he not been busted by The Man at an early age and thrust into prison society, which really is just American society in microcosm, stripped naked.

It is a rare university which can boast of a Chris Lovdijeff, a teacher at San Quentin whose Christ-like portrait Cleaver draws with love and bitter irony. "What did he teach? Everything. It is easier to say that he taught Lovdijeff and let it go at that." The teacher led his students through an incredible range of thinking, from Japanese, Eskimo and African through Jesus Christ, Moses and Muhammad to Marx, Lenin and Mao Tse-tung. I suspect that Lovdijeff was something of a quack, as are all great teachers who cast aside objectivity, that perennial academic hiding ground, in order to distill all learning into a fuel with which to fire contemporary living. "Jesus wept," writes Cleaver. "Lovdijeff would weep over a tragic event that had taken place ten thousand years ago in some forgotten byway in the Fertile Crescent."

Ultimately and inevitably—like Tom Wolfe and Maxwell Perkins—Cleaver and his "Christ" came to a parting of the ways. One man was black and the other was white, and there was a limit to the distance they could travel together. It had to do with the black convict's rejection of the white teacher's concept of love. In an essay written for the class, Cleaver quoted Malcolm X: "How can I love a man who raped my mother, killed my father, enslaved my ancestors, dropped atomic bombs on Japan, killed off the Indians and keeps me cooped up in slums? I'd rather be tied in a sack and tossed in the Harlem River."

Lovdijeff wept and refused to grade the paper. That was the end of the friendship.

Eldridge Cleaver has also paid his religious dues before breaking free of that bag. I assume that like most black people he was born a good Protestant, but while in a Youth Authority institution he started going to the Catholic Church because that was where the blacks and the Mexicans went, and he wasn't foolish enough to try to integrate the Protestant Chapel. ("... one black face in a sea of white, and with guerrilla warfare going on between us, I might have ended up a Christian martyr—St. Eldridge the Stupe.") He was drawn into the Black Muslims, eventually becoming the leader of the San Quentin Mosque. It was Malcolm's defection from Mr. Muhammad that first caused him to question the tenets of the faith, and Malcolm's murder which led to the young convict's breaking away. Cleaver, as was Malcolm, is first a political man with a probing and sweeping intelligence that was bound eventually to burst out of the limitations of sect discipline.

(The author, like nearly everyone else on this side of the Atlantic, misinterpreted what happened to Malcolm while he was in Africa. I spent a good deal of time with him in both Cairo and Ghana, before and after his visit to Mecca, and he certainly never gave any indication that he had been converted to a love for whites. His understanding had broadened and he knew that the oppressed of the earth encompassed a wide range of colors, and that black parochial thinking would exclude revolutionaries like Fidel, Che Guevara, or the unlikely coming of another John Brown.)

Cleaver is at his very best, which is as good and as pertinent as anything I've read in years, when he dissects the real significance of the Muhammad Ali-Floyd Patterson drama, expressing what many black people felt at the time:

The "white hope" for a Patterson victory was, in essence, a counter-revolutionary desire to force the Negro, now in rebellion and personified by Ali, back into his "place." The black hope, on the contrary, was to see Lazarus [Patterson] crushed, to see Uncle Tom

This important new book is FREE!

With each new subscription to MODERN AFRICA, we will send you, free of charge and post-paid, a hard-bound copy of "The Transplanted Heart," the first and only book about the dramatic surgical operations performed by Dr. Christiaan Barnard in Cape Town, South Africa. Written by Peter Hawthorne, MODERN AFRICA's correspondent in Johannesburg, "The Transplanted Heart" has just been released and is enjoying a wide reception. It is a masterpiece of reporting in translating intricate surgical operations into layman's terms. Your subscription to MODERN AFRICA will bring you this remarkable book free!

This offer expires June 15, 1968

MODERN AFRICA is the only newsletter that provides up-to-date economic and political data on developments in Africa.

MODERN AFRICA fills the information gap of the sparse general press coverage by providing capsulized intelligence from highly qualified correspondents on the day-to-day scene. In addition, each issue of MODERN AFRICA contains 2-page special reports on subjects too broad to be covered in conventional newsletter format. As a special bonus, in-depth 6-page Special Supplements on important African developments affecting the entire world, are issued several times each year.

Many readers in the academic and business world have reported that a paragraph or two from a particular issue of MODERN AFRICA has been well worth the low subscription price.

Subscribe today to be assured of receiving continuous information on the world's greatest potential area of development — AFRICA!

MODERN AFRICA

Current African Publications, Inc.
145 East 49th St., New York, N.Y. 10017

Yes, please send me my Free and Post-Paid copy of "The Transplanted Heart," and enter my subscription to MODERN AFRICA, the only newsletter covering developments in all of Africa. Send a ☐ one-year @ $15, ☐ two-year @ $25 subscription to:

Name _____

Address _____

City/State/Zip _____

☐ Payment enclosed

☐ Bill me

defeated, to be given symbolic proof of the autonomous Negro over the subordinate Negro

. . . It was really Sonny Liston who marked the coming of the autonomous Negro to boxing. But he was non-ideological . . . when the ideological Negro seized the heavyweight crown, no front of cool could conceal the ferocious emotional eruption in white America and among the embarrassed Uncle Toms, who were also experiencing an identity crisis. Yes, even old faithful Uncle Tom has a self-image. All men must have one or they start seeing themselves as women, women start seeing them as women, then women lose their own self-image, and soon nobody knows what they are themselves or what anyone else is—that is to say, the world starts looking precisely as it looks today.

Eldridge Cleaver, like all engaged artists (LeRoi Jones, the early Kerouac, the early Mailer, the early Baldwin) makes you twist and flinch because he is no damned gentleman. He throws light on the dark areas that we wish he would leave alone. He is definitely not for everybody, and as much as I go for Soul On Ice, I realize that not all of him is for me. For example, I think that altogether too much space and soul-searching is devoted to the black male-white female hangup, a subject on which he can be maddening, but, I am sorry to say, terribly accurate. I doubt if many of his readers will care that he fell in love with his lawyer (happily a woman and presumably white), and they will wonder why in heaven's name he wants us to read their love letters. I didn't.

James Baldwin admirers should avoid Cleaver's book. I once wrote in praise of Baldwin that he had no gods. Bursting upon the American scene, he issued a challenge to the Hemingway-Faulkner-Steinbeck triumvirate, took a mean knock at the beloved Langston Hughes, and launched a sustained attack on our major novelist, Richard Wright. I regretted the shedding of so much blood, but I regarded Baldwin's arrival as a healthy sign that black intellectuals had reached the point where we could wash some of our dirty linen in public.

That was little more than a decade ago. Baldwin is now in his 40s, comfortably well-off, and a literary god. And here comes young Mr. Cleaver, hungry, with his rapier drawn and blood in his eyes. Baldwin is his natural target, and he moves into the attack with a ruthless, virile prose: "Baldwin's essay on Richard Wright [in Notes of a Native Son] reveals he despised—not Richard Wright but his masculinity." He ranges over the whole of Baldwin's work and draws conclusions which the reader may not share but will certainly remember.

This brilliant book is only the first by Eldridge Cleaver. If he somehow survives the California cops for another year or two, God only knows what he will come up with next. Whatever it is, it won't put anybody to sleep.

An Economist at Play

THE TRIUMPH. By John Kenneth Galbraith. Houghton Mifflin Co. 239 pp. $4.95.

JOHN BRIGHT

Mr. Bright is a screen writer and story editor for Bill Cosby.

Because the author regards this as a "non-novel," as real as absurd reality, it is tempting to review the book in relation to The New Industrial State and, more appositely, Economics and the Art of Controversy. In these works of sober probity, Galbraith is both the critic of U.S. capitalism's mistakes and of the politics, domestic and foreign, implementing these mistakes. Apogee of his distinguished wrath is his stinging rebuke of this country's involvement in Southeast Asia.

In The Triumph, Galbraith has added satire to scholarship. The novel has two targets: the State Department and its pompous apologies for Latin American police states; and the military dictatorships themselves, which are preposterous indeed but essentially brutal, greasy—and outdated.

Communication between Washington and a minor Central American "republic" of "Puerto Santos" (Guatemala?) is dim and confused by static. A lard-assed corrupt dictator, impressed by the medals he has given himself, has been "suppressing communism" for thirty years—with yanqui aid, which he has generously divided among his top generals and his numbered accounts in Swiss banks. It's all very cosy and normal until a small group of intellectuals, sparked by a radical or two, take the Alliance for Progress seriously—and are backed by a small band of peasants with antiquated guns. A few shots are fired, at nobody in particular; a few windows are broken, alongside other windows previously and nonpolitically broken.

Yet it is enough menace to cause the caudillo to waddle to the Paraguayan Embassy for sanctuary. The young liberal leader, Miro, takes power.

Opéra bouffe now shifts to the Potomac, no longer a sleepy stream. Communism is again on the rampage south of the border! Sound the alarm! Another threat to the Canal from Moscow! Miro is another Castro!

Panicked, although grave, State and the CIA act. Miro is deposed and in his place is inducted a more attractive new dictator, the son of Obeso, now living in Portugal.

The hoped-for Führer proves to be a progressive from the University of Michigan, indoctrinated by a campus Laski. He begins his reign with some genuine reforms, to American horror.

Galbraith's climax and denouement are sophisticated kidding, of course. The spinster fantasies a man under the bed, and a man materializes under the bed. It could happen, but the result would be an undefended Bay of Pigs, and the correction of the error with another more reliable martinet.

What is the truth behind Galbraith's cutting satire? In Guatemala, for example, Arbenz Guzmán was no more of a threat to the historically perverted Monroe Doctrine than FDR. He was an accommodating social democrat who knew that a mono-economics meant nothing but misery—and eventual revolution. The best insurance against upheaval out of hand was token land reform and industrialization, leading to slightly increased standards of living, using U.S. dollars in "non-exploitative" terms. It was a shrewdly cynical pattern set by Mexico, Judas ram for the Latin sheep.

The plan was on the drawing board. Standard of Ohio, having scientific geologic knowledge of vast oil resources under the jungles, was prepared to dig for it in exchange for favorable leases . . . when United Fruit, with its coolie labor empire, knowing the consequences of industrialization, acted swiftly through Secretary of State Dulles (Sullivan and Cromwell) and the CIA. The clock was set back to the 19th century with Castillo Armas and his successors. A negative feudalism prevailed over a positive capitalism.

The Guatemalan debacle presents an interesting challenge to the Wright Mills thesis about the solidarity of the power elite; yet a substantiation of the Leninist analysis of the contradictions within finance capital structure. What, indeed, is the capitalist point of view?

Maybe Galbraith and the ADA have a viable answer to the complexities of colonialism, and the throaty feverish challenge of the peoples pushed around. Certainly Pooh-bah Rusk hasn't.

Sonorities apart, Professor Galbraith has written, in The Triumph, a most unprofessional camp, laced with growling wit.

The Same the World Over

CHARLES BOOTH'S LONDON. Edited by Albert Fried and Richard M. Elman. Pantheon Books, 342 pp. $7.95.

CHARLES BOOTH ON THE CITY: Physical Pattern and Social Structure. Edited by Harold W. Pfautz. University of Chicago Press, 314 pp. $12.50.

EDWARD T. GARGAN

Mr. Gargan is professor of history at the University of Wisconsin. He is the author of De Tocqueville (Hillary House).

In his preface to Frantz Fanon's The Wretched of the Earth, Jean-Paul Sartre wrote: "It is enough today for two French people to meet together for there to be a dead man between them. One dead man did I say? In other days France was the name of a country. We should take care that in 1961 it does not become the name of a nervous disease." In 1968, America is the name of a disease.

The Mayor of Chicago demands of his police superintendent, "that an order be issued under his signature to shoot to kill any arsonist or anyone with a Molotov cocktail, and to shoot anyone looting stores in our city." In Washington a government lawyer assigned to our new "humanitarian" riot control is proud that following the death of Martin Luther King, Jr., only thirty-nine were killed whereas forty-nine were killed in Detroit last year. Ranking officers of the Army have already visited "in mufti" the cities they will command during the forthcoming riots, to familiarize themselves "with the terrain, the social and economic problems of potential riot areas, and the police with whom they would work. . . ." How fit and proper that a world choking with sociologists, economists, moralists, lawyers and Senators should finally play it straight and leave social and economic problems to the generals.

Our new humanitarians who prefer gas and Mace to ideology can consult with some profit the two recent selections from Charles Booth's Life and Labour of the People in London. Such a reading will remind them that the poor—even when white Anglo-Saxon Christians—have always been the alcoholics, prostitutes, unwed mothers, herded into our center cities, starved, chronically ill, vile smelling, vermin covered, indolent, dirty, easily killed, immune to the ministrations of priests, vulgar, despised, desperate. They should especially welcome the tone of Booth's great work for it is a cool professional account of the wretched of London at the turn of the century.

Charles Booth who founded a successful shipping firm was not, however, ■ man without feeling, and during his lifetime suffered a number of breakdowns that may be considered the honest response of a sane man to an insane world. A positivist who became president of the Royal Statistical Society, Booth projected in 1886 a precise exhaustive record of London's working-class population. Using the case notebooks of the School Board Visitors, who contacted every home with school-age children, Booth in the course of seventeen years produced seventeen volumes. He did not attempt a work of theory or of synthesis but concentrated on a street-by-street, house-by-house, room-by-room record of London's poor. He did draw one fundamental conclusion from his data which enabled him to identify a "poverty line" below which were to be found the truly destitute. He also skillfully divided the population and the city into five basic classes: the most miserable, identified as occasional laborers, loafers, semi-criminals; the very poor, living a hand-to-mouth existence; those underemployed and poorly paid; those having regular employment and sufficient regular incomes; and the lower and upper middle class. The two selections from Booth's classical inquiry accurately reflect Booth's emphasis on those below the poverty line.

Harold W. Pfautz contributes as an introduction to his selection a solid monograph discussing Booth's life, his method, his picture of London's physical and social structure. His final assessment of Booth's achievement is, however, a painfully dull academic exercise. The best he can say is that Booth deserves the titles, "husband, father, businessman, public servant, and sociologist!" Surely, if the poor did not exist they would have to be invented for the scientific needs of this academic discipline.

The brief introduction of Albert Fried and Richard M. Elman is, on the contrary, academically imaginative, lively in style, relevant. They approve of Booth's freedom from any approach to the poor that is like "the lyricism of James Agee or the rhetorical indignation of James Baldwin," and they properly admire his ear for common speech, his faultless sense of the detail that is significant. Fried and Elman's selection reflects their own intelligence and compassion and perfectly presents Booth's London; the streets, the houses, the rooms, the drink, the sweating occupations, the Jewish community, the religious exploitation of the poor are all graphically illustrated.

Booth suppressed all theory and moralizing in favor of the concrete im-

Freedom of Choice Affirmed

The lively new book by CORLISS LAMONT

☛ This is the most important work on freedom as a philosophical problem to appear in America since Jonathan Edwards' famous study in the 18th Century. ☛

—Professor Dale Riepe in HUMANIST

This widely acclaimed and eminently readable volume by the distinguished Humanist philosopher demonstrates that all men always possess the most basic freedom of all: Freedom of Choice.

Dr. Lamont marshals thoroughly documented evidence illuminating both sides of the free-will controversy to show that the doctrine of total determinism is false. He writes: "Full awareness of freedom of choice brings a new sense of power and exhilaration to every aspect of living."

The author draws upon science, literature, religion, the problems of everyday life, and examines the ideas of Einstein, Erich Fromm, William James, Spinoza, Thornton Wilder, John Dewey, Luther, and many other thinkers.

"I am so glad the book argues in such a convincing way against the mindless determinists. As you rightly say, there are a number of possibilities open to life, both in its evolutionary course and especially in man's history . . . I hope this important book will have a wide circulation."

—Sir Julian Huxley

"I know no stronger presentation for the affirmative and, incidentally, few if any problems so fundamental to the health (and perhaps the survival) of civilization."

—Joseph Wood Krutch

"He shows, in clear and simple language, how freedom of choice is made possible. . . . A wealth of concrete and vivid illustrations."

—John H. Randall, Jr.
Columbia University

An invaluable book for students, teachers, and lay readers.

At booksellers $5.95

HORIZON PRESS
156 FIFTH AVENUE, N.Y. 10010

pact of his evidence. He often arranged his material, however, in an unintentionally ironic commentary on the social history of his society. In a cruel counter example to Burke's Peerage, Booth recorded the genealogy of the Rooney family. Martin Rooney, aged 86, and his wife Ellen King, are duly inscribed as firmly founding a family "prolific in paupers." The members of this ignoble family experienced constant sickness, drunkenness, desertion, prison, syphilis, prostitution, illegitimacy, death in public asylums, burial from public funds. The readers of London's illustrated weekly press were accustomed to engaging accounts of the homes of the aristocracy. Booth invited them to picture the private lives of the inhabitants of a single room at number 18 Shelton Street: "The room here was full of rubbish—all in it would not fetch 10s.; the dirty walls covered with little pictures never taken down; vermin abounded and the stench was awful. These people had seven children, but about eight years ago two of them, aged nine and eleven, going to school in the morning, have never been heard of since."

Charles Booth trusted completely in the workings of the free enterprise system and was equally firm in his conviction that those who invested their capital in industrial operations were the salvation of mankind. He had nothing but contempt for those who babbled that the blood of Jesus would save this race, but his own unsentimental solution to poverty was appalling. He proposed that the chronically unemployed and near starving be placed in work camps under strict state supervision guaranteeing capital, work, wages, discipline, productivity. This system of "limited Socialism" would then enable society to harry "out of existence" those who would never work. Yet Booth understood the limits of his analysis and in a concluding paragraph to his lengthy work he prayed: "May some great soul, master of a subtler and nobler alchemy than mine, disentangle the confused issues, reconcile the apparent contradictions in aim, melt and commingle the various influences for good into one divine uniformity of effort, and make these dry bones live, so that the streets of our Jerusalem may sing with joy."

Fried and Elman in their excellent discussion of Booth's work have no suggestions for making our streets sing with joy. They propose, however, that this country will not equal England's contemporary welfare achievements until there occurs "a basic restructuring of society." This timidly stated need for revolutionary change seems certain to be unheard by a nation that accepts the idea that in a free society some will unfortunately live in crushing poverty. A recent article in Sports Illustrated describes Yale's Olympic swimming star, Don Schollander, who owns a copy of Galbraith's The New Industrial State, as modestly concerned to be faithful to idealism and lofty things. "I'm quite interested," he confides, "in doing extremely well financially in a relatively short time. I'm not money-hungry, but what I want to do is become financially secure so I can become more fully motivated to higher things in life—social good, humanitarian values. It is possible to help yourself and society at the same time. For example, there may be a way of building really low-cost housing in ghettos, improving conditions, helping people and, at the same time, helping yourself. I want to be a true entrepreneur—but as a humanitarian, not a philanthropist. Unfortunately, I'm not that altruistic."

Schollander should greatly enjoy reading Booth's many examples of those who built lower-cost housing in London's ghettos. Booth will also be valuable reading for all Presidential candidates who plan on helping the poor with the aid of private enterprise. The streets of our Jerusalem may not sing with joy, but they will continue to be profitable.

Sting-a-Ling-a-Ling

BRENDAN BEHAN: Man and Showman. By Rae Jeffs. The World Publishing Co. 256 pp. $4.95.

SEAN CROWIN

Mr. Cronin is a journalist who has lived in Ireland and the United States, and has written for publications in both countries.

Brendan Behan was a strange, turbulent, wayward genius who enjoyed a brief period of creativity as a writer but didn't make the most of it. He cast his talent to the wind after success, or notoriety, tapped him on the shoulder and in effect ceased to write though he continued talking into tapes, and publishers produced works which he never bothered to read. He made headlines for actions that had nothing to do with writing or nonwriting, such as being "drunk and disorderly," as the police phrase has it, in cities as diverse as Dublin, London, Paris, Toronto—though never New York, curiously enough, where he could make the press without the aid of a court appearance. And then he died in a great big splash of ink at the age of 41.

If anyone asked, "Will the real Brendan Behan please stand up?" there was no reply. The masks were there for everyone to see, but not what lay behind them. Clowning and spending he laid waste his years, a moralist might charge. How a man spends his time—or "does his bird" in English prison slang—is surely up to himself; but self-flagellation is a slow, hard way to die even if our world is a rack, which it surely is to men and women with the sensitivity of a Brendan Behan.

All the same he left behind a significant if small body of work: the autobiographical jail classic Borstal Boy; the tender short story "Confirmation Suit"; two plays, The Quare Fellow and The Hostage, which under the layers of coarse comedy have important things to say about the tragedy of man and are pregnant with promise of greater dramas to come. He also wrote a couple of poems in Irish, a nearly secret language now that few in Ireland can speak or understand, but which has a literature going back 1,500 years at least: Behan's contribution is worthy enough to be included in an anthology of modern Gaelic poetry.

He may also be remembered some day as the creator of the most talked about, unproduced, and for the most part unwritten, play of the 1960s, Richard's Cork Leg. The opening scene is a cemetery that has the reputation of being "one of the healthiest graveyards in Dublin." I know the place well and the description is accurate for it sits on a hill with a splendid view of Dublin Bay. Behan reveled in that kind of irony: in the midst of death we are in life.

A novel called the catacombs (the lower-case title was intentional) kept haunting him for years. He would return to it between bouts of drinking, sickness and tape recordings of Brendan Behan's Island, Brendan Behan's New York and Confessions of an Irish Rebel (published posthumously), but it died with him. A string of newspaper pieces he wrote for the Irish Press, a Dublin daily, in the early 1950s were put together as Hold Your Hour and Have Another, a Behan all-purpose reply to anything; and a detective story serial he produced pseudonymously for the Irish Times (another Dublin daily) when he needed "the readies" (cash) for a holiday in the Aran islands was also put between hard covers as The Scarperer, prison slang for an escapee. Whatever faults they have, dullness isn't one of them.

The person who worked closest with Behan in his last years was an Englishwoman, Mrs. Rae Jeffs, one-time publicity manager for Hutchinson, a London publishing house. She is the lady with the tape recorder who churned out the New York book (which is enhanced by Paul Hogarth's delightful drawings), the Ireland book and the "confessions." Her labor is astounding, but whether worth the effort is another matter.

This female Boswell of Behan's declining years now tells what it was like to work with an unpredictable and unwilling author who trod the shadow world of the alcoholic. I'm not quite sure he was that, but perhaps I'm being overtechnical; he was also a diabetic, which is forgotten, who shouldn't drink and couldn't stay away from it. Puritans don't understand pubs. In Dublin they are the friendliest and warmest places, where good talk flows faster than Jameson's whiskey or Guinness' stout, especially in the long nights of the damp northern winter when a bitter breeze blows across the bay. In Behan's city a man is judged by his pub as much as by the company he keeps. Friends of Behan say he needed no alcohol to make him high, and after four or five pints he was flying, which is another way of saying you have to probe deeper if you want to find his "problem." Mrs. Jeffs tells it the way she saw it, almost drink by drink, until one is overwhelmed by the sight, the sloppiness, the smell of it. Her rather pedestrian style helps and a lost character begins to take dim shape.

Behan loved an audience. He also loved to shock the conventional and the respectable. He outraged the Irish Establishment by his television appearances, his remarks to the press, his works. Borstal Boy was banned. Because there is no stage censorship, The Quare Fellow and The Hostage escaped molestation. But the compassion of these pieces was lost in a rash of talk about "vulgarity." Some not unfriendly critics thought The Hostage insulted Ireland and Behan's own political past; perhaps a too literal interpretation of the plot could lead to such a conclusion. But, as the discerning Benedict Kiely has pointed out, there is more to the play than brothel scenes and jokes about Mother Ireland: "Monsewer [owner of the noble old house that is now a brothel], in fact, is one of Behan's visions of God, and as he parades, salutes, plays the pipes and sings of tea and toast and muffin rings, the old ladies with stern faces and the captains and the kings, he falls into line with images of the Divinity that appear elsewhere in the plays and prose."

A man cries across a void to the unknown, discards the lie and seeks truth which is found only in the midst of degradation. That is one way out of the dilemma of life and the pen can find it. But for Behan writing was never enough. He distrusted his talent; in his early years, in prison and after, he was prepared to give writing the hard work and discipline it requires. In Borstal Boy he tells of the essay he rewrote five times to win the prize; the book itself obviously is well honed. But when he became a celebrity such close attention to craftsmanship grew impossible. It was then that he ceased writing and took to the tapes. Even that became difficult, as Mrs. Jeffs so patiently explains. It wasn't that he didn't want to write: he just couldn't. And so he fled: from pub to pub and from city to city.

But Mrs. Jeffs was tireless and indefatigable. She followed him—back and forth across the Atlantic and the Irish Sea. She succeeded in getting him to do some work. The bills had to be paid.

It is clear that he liked publicity rather in the manner of a small boy who draws the attention of adults by his deeds. It is also clear that he was exploited as a product. It occurs to the reader to ask why a very sick man had to go to all those literary luncheons, while the sponsors sat on the edges of their chairs waiting for the almost inevitable explosion. Why should he be nice to someone who writes for the London Daily Mail? Malcolm Muggeridge and the B.B.C., in their own spinsterish ways, managed to hack a pound of flesh out of him too; not that Behan gave a damn.

Mrs. Jeffs was not among the exploiters, though she may have served them unwittingly. She is sympathetic to Behan as a man and as an artist. Her error was that she thought she could "save" him, although she never uses the word. She tried to get the tired brain to work, the weary wracked body to rest. Sometimes she succeeded. She draws a sketch of a man existing in such a state of misery that it is not right to call it living. And then suddenly he would recover and show extraordinary vitality, only to crumble again. He remained good copy to the end.

When Behan started sending stories out of prison to the Irish literary magazine, The Bell, which Sean O'Faolain and later Peadar O'Donnell edited, word spread around Dublin of "an Irish Jack London from the slums." The parallel is accurate enough in some ways. They both managed to live like lords for a time and have champagne for breakfast. And that's a triumph of sorts.

But Behan, I feel, was more like the roisterous Gaelic poets of the 18th century who wandered the roads, made love to the girls, read their verses and told "Astonishing. Harrington is a problem-solver and a way-pointer."

—NEWSWEEK

"He sets himself the task of searching out some middle ground between the 'old' liberalism of the New Deal and his own tough-minded socialist position—in short, a new 'democratic left' which can work toward the genuine solution of the crises of war, poverty, the cities, inequality, the underdeveloped world. A manifesto as well as a radical critique and polemic."—NEWSWEEK

"Harrington is one of our best social critics. He is concerned only with our most important and pressing problems, to which he brings new insight, passion, a gift for revolutionary rhetoric." $5.95 —LOOK

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY
866 Third Avenue, New York 10022

their stories in taverns to peasant audiences, and drew down on their heads the wrath of priests, pietists and policemen—or the equivalent law-enforcing agency of the time. They mocked respectability, laughed at the follies of rulers, and sang sad songs about the misery around them. Life wins over death in the end, as Leslie, the young English soldier in The Hostage, tells us:

*The bells of hell
Go ting-a-ling-a-ling
For you but not for me.
Oh death where is thy
Sting a-ling-a-ling
Or grave thy victory?*

Book Marks

SARA BLACKBURN

Mrs. Blackburn, a former book editor for a New York publishing house, is now a freelance writer.

BODKIN. By Barton Midwood. Random House. 211 pp. $4.95.

Bodkin is a night watchman in a house for wayward boys. He might as well be a "good" teacher in a large public school, or a white man whose best friend is a black man, or a benevolent political leader, even a father. For Barton Midwood's novel is about the vast and absolute distance between authority and love, between power, no matter how gently wielded, and those upon whom it gets wielded.

Bodkin is a good man, wise, human, lovable. A series of events in the home throws him into an intimate alliance with two of his charges, against a cruel but pitiful administration which functions as best it can (horribly) under an absurd system. Step by step, Bodkin wins the boys' reluctant confidence and guarantees himself as their protector until they invest their very lives in him. Then a wild convergence of circumstances forces a choice between the system and the boys. Locked into his role—his culture, his age, his power—he steps back. All this is accomplished in a series of quick and dramatic scenes, some of them funny, populated by a memorable group of instantly recognizable characters. Mr. Midwood never sacrifices either his characters or his plot to his moral, and his reader is never preached at, simply always moved, always troubled and always admiring. This is a very ambitious novel that really works.

LISTEN RUBEN FONTANEZ. By Jay Neugeboren. Houghton Mifflin Co. 216 pp. $4.50.

The first-person narrator here is Harry Meyers, tired New York Jew, widower, schoolteacher and candidate for retirement from a life he feels finished with. The book's action—and there is a lot of it—centers upon his involvement with a group of his Puerto Rican students; subplots are all over the place, but what matters is Meyers' absolute authenticity. Mr. Neugeboren has managed to catch him in three dimensions as he moves on the brink of both culture and generation gap, and to make us care intensely about him as he grumbles through a series of wild, slightly mad adventures culminating in his decision to keep being alive. One of the highlights of his book is a quick and beautiful description of an old rabbi, which Mr. Neugeboren tosses off toward the beginning.

BLADE OF NIGHT. By Don Carpenter. Harcourt, Brace & World. 181 pp. $4.50.

Like Selby's Last Exit to Brooklyn, this nightmare of a novel allows the reader no relief from the sheer intensity of its steady, almost humdrum barrage of brutal detail. A man named Semple, hideous and barely articulate, is released after eighteen years in a hospital for the criminally insane. The novel's center is the gradual revelation of the act that landed him there, and how, as he tries to resume some kind of life, its memory circles back to entrap him in a still deadlier act. Mr. Carpenter, who wrote Hard Rain Falling, is a camera; he can make his hero's consumption of a plate of spaghetti intensely absorbing experience. But it is his X-ray vision into the incredible emptiness and isolation of his characters' lives that gives this novel its almost tangible quality of despair. Readers who are turned away by plot description (who needs another realistic novel about a tortured loser?) will miss a dazzling performance.

GRASSE 3/23/66. By Nicholas Delbanco. J. B. Lippincott Co. 139 pp. $4.50.

The problem of Nicholas Delbanco's narrator is that his wife has left him; he is writing the monologue that comprises Grasse 3/23/66 ("a fiction") as therapy. It goes like this: "Desist from the diseased deceased: from sheer tedium of this te deum. I am gone mad with words, with grief," and goes on in that way for most of its 139 pages. By the end of this unrelievedly clever Joycean and Dylanesque (Thomas, not Bob) hunk of alliteration, mythological allusion and literary punning, the reader's only impulse is to punch the grieved narrator in the nose and congratulate his wife on a wise decision. "What effulgence of indulgence sets me, still, to type?" Mr. Delbanco asks near the end. He's got me.

TELEVISION

JOHN HORN

The Carnegie Corporation, the Ford Foundation and the U.S. Office of Education have announced a joint project that will attempt to educate disadvantaged preschool children through daily hourlong television programs. One does not know whether to laugh or to cry.

It is not that the Children's Television Workshop lacks worthy ends or will not be in competent hands. Actually, the use of television to help youngsters instead of taking advantage of them is revolutionary in American television, which is predominantly commercial and exploitative. It is a noble endeavor and Mrs. Joan Ganz Cooney, executive director of the workshop, is imaginative, idealistic, able.

But certain aspects of the enterprise are bittersweet with irony. The need is for many such programs; one is proposed. The need is now, but the series will begin in the fall of 1969. It will be telecast in color, a far more expensive undertaking than black and white, even though the number of color TV sets in the slums and ghettos of our land is unknown.

Most serious, establishment of the workshop, which will be under the guidance and use of the facilities of the National Educational Television network, threatens to polarize children's television programming into two separate and un-

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 5-13-68

333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Pan-America; $2 foreign)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

equal worlds. While commercial stations and networks make fortunes by luring the young to outrageously offensive and frequent commercial interruptions with cheap programs addressed to the lowest common denominator of appeal (a mental and spiritual corruption of the innocent sanctioned by the Federal Communications Commission), one noncommercial program proposes to aid children at great private and public expense.

(I do not suggest that all commercial children's programs are meretricious, although most of them so strike this occasional viewer, but even the best—the lovingly conceived Captain Kangaroo, for example—are prostituted by insistent and insinuating commercials.)

Worthy as the workshop may be by itself, it is a stopgap approach to what should be a major national goal, the human use for human ends of a great communications instrument. It does not face—in fact it avoids facing, as did the Carnegie Commission on Educational Television—the central problem of television in the United States, which is the general repudiation of responsibility to the American public by commercial broadcasters.

Congress has in effect given over American television to commercial broadcasters. The fact that a proposal such as the workshop is necessary—as a noncommercial system for adults is also now necessary—is evidence enough that the commercial operators, while successful with advertisers, have failed the nation's children as they have the nation's adults. Theoretically, a rein on greed and a prod to public service could be provided by the FCC, but the agency is now best known for ineffectual promises.

I suppose that in this situation the Carnegie Corporation, the Ford Foundation and the U.S. Office of Education considered their modest proposal a matter of practicality and realism. It is time, however, to ask whether the application of first aid is adequate medical treatment for chronic morbidity. Do we really want two general systems of children's programming—one that exploits the audience (and makes a profit) and another that attempts to nourish it (and requires huge nonreturnable financial investment)?

The workshop will cost its backers an estimated $6 million to $8 million for twenty-six weeks of programs. Perhaps this largess would have been better invested in Congressional and FCC lobbying. A change in quality of children's television programming can come almost overnight if commercial networks and stations are required to drop sponsorship of children's programs—making them public service like public schools—and to program that air time with fare meet-

AT A DANCE

*Knowing what I know
I wonder what they know dancing as I have danced and been unhappy
but made my legs move quickly without pity
for myself or them, for knowledge comes like the theory of light without an angry cry.
I am ending as the conclusion to a book. It is being read and will be laid down
by a reader unknown to me.
My body handles me
and it is a finger
tapping on the earth
for an answer.*

DAVID IGNATOW

ing the requirements of an advisory committee, like the workshop's, composed primarily of responsible psychologists and educators. Such a remedy is drastic. I don't propose it as anything more than the starting point for a full-scale re-examination of the goals of American television by the public and Congress. Especially a re-examination in the field of children's programs.

One program—too little and too late, tomorrow and not today—will not change the record of twenty years; it will not even stir the scales.

FILMS

ROBERT HATCH

The Russians have made a film of War and Peace, and to that the immediate response is why? One may conjecture. Tolstoy's passionate hatred of war pours from the novel, both in his own words and through the fates of his characters. He said that as evil men conspire for evil, good men may conspire for good, and the film employs that exhortation as its motto. The Russians undoubtedly feel that this is a good thing to say and that today they are in a particularly strong position to say it. They are right on both counts.

The picture also gave employment to large segments of the Russian army over a period of several years, is of a magnificence to fill the heart of the average Russian with pride, and may earn applause and revenues abroad. On this last point, though, I have misgivings. The picture is a monument of world cinema, but it is one that should have been erected thirty years ago. No one makes pictures like this any more, for the reason that better uses have been found for the screen. I had not realized how complete the change has been until I sat through this stupendous collection of illustrations for an inconceivably de luxe edition of Tolstoy's masterpiece.

At least a generation ago, film ceased to be a window and became a language, with its own grammar, idioms, elisions, figures and rhetoric. Over the years, and almost without noticing, we have all become fluent in cinema, and it is vexing to be now thrown back upon our A,B,Cs, however sumptuous the primer. Much is made of the fact that War and Peace runs six and a half hours (omitting, inevitably, most of the real content of the book and never getting even to the end of the story), but time spent in the theatre is largely subjective and the fact is that the picture begins to seem interminable in the first forty-five minutes. It is ablaze with color and reeling with action, but it proceeds at a pace so meticulously explicit that one's back muscles ache from the strain of holding back. It is not War and Peace; it is a description of War and Peace by an enthusiast who has taken firm hold of your jacket. Tedium in a noble cause.

The film has two genuine virtues. The first of these is its eloquent tribute to the Russian land, a tribute which Americans will respond to the more easily because the beckoning vastness of this lovely countryside looks so much like home. It is only a small part of Russia, of course, as the Pennsylvania farmland or the Vermont hills are only parts of America, but we and they do have in common meadows, valleys, streams, woods and the awareness of horizon.

The other excellence of the picture is the physical rightness of the principal characters (also of the populace, but that is much easier). It is notoriously difficult to materialize characters as intimately known and deeply loved as the men and women of War and Peace; to my eye, the film never errs, and the feeling of satisfaction is extraordinary. At the same time, it must be said that the acting ability of this cast in no way matches its physical presence. The performance is wooden, superficial, explicit but unevocative. I doubt that anyone unfamiliar with the novel could understand what these people mean to one another or how their lives are meshed. There emerges about as much of human joy and sorrow, heroism and inadequacy as the scenario of a traditional ballet can provide. To weep at this film would be an exercise in sensibility.

I am not going to recite the list, but Pierre seems to the end an amiable boy of impulsive good intentions balked by awkwardness. Pierre Bezuhov reduced to a great puppy—and he is played by Sergei Bondarchuk, who directed the film! Natasha (Lyudmila Savelyeva) is a delight to observe, but again the pleasure is one of choreography, not of drama. The world of fiction is full of lovely girls who move like grain and weep as though their hearts would break. Natasha Rostova is one of the supreme creatures of literature. The dubbing is of course a wicked impediment; the worse, perhaps, because it is done so skillfully. It puts a stranger in an actor's mouth. However, the fault lies deeper than that: this cast has been overwhelmed by its responsibility.

There remains the war. The battle scenes, in scale, in intricacy of movement and proliferation of detail, in versatility of camera technique, are probably unmatched in the history of the movies. They are also faithful to Tolstoy's basic point: that whatever generals and military historians may pretend, great battles are utterly without form or plan or indeed consequence; that they are mere adventitious slaughter and the victor is he who believes the more strongly that he has won. Undoubtedly that is true, and inevitably it produces footage that is mere blood and noise and confusion. It is impossible to become involved in such pandemonium, and I passed the time trying to make out whether anyone was really getting hurt, to see how the horses were hobbled into a semblance of death throes.

I believe the Russians intended to astonish and delight us; I am sorry that they failed. It may be that the only way War and Peace could be filmed was as a colossal spectacle; if so, the time for filming it had long passed. I am sorry also—because I sense ideology at work—that the makers of the picture caused the serfs to disappear from the story and did not carry the narrative to its conclusion, with the bourgeois world taking up its life again. Tolstoy's attitude toward the peasant was no doubt thought disagreeably ambivalent, and the producers apparently wanted to close on the high apocalyptic note of Moscow rising from the ashes of its salvation. I hardly blame them for dropping all reference to Masonry (the expository problem would have been appalling), but it does leave a great hole in the portrait of Pierre.

It was honorable of the Russians to try to give War and Peace to the world; unfortunately, we received this unparalleled gift long ago.

A way to film the meaning of war that is exactly opposite to that used by the Russians is demonstrated by Jean-Luc Godard in Les Carabiniers (screenplay by Roberto Rossellini, Jean Gruault and the director, from a play by Benjamin Joppolo; this is a Franco-Italian production). He deploys two men and two women, interpolates some old combat footage, and films the whole thing in the style of an underground movie made on the city dump.

The characters are named Michelangelo, Ulysses, Venus and Cleopatra—a kind of symbolism that annoys me because it means a great deal less than it says. These are shantytown types, and the men go off to battle readily enough when two carabiniers arrive at their shack with a letter of mobilization from "the king," and informal promises of unlimited consumer goods to be liberated and unexcelled opportunities for the exercise of brutality.

The two send home scribbled notes detailing their global conquest (the field operations resemble the exploits of a posse that utterly lacks the power of concentration), and eventually they come back themselves with a satchel full of the fruits of conquest—picture postcards; neatly categorized and held with rubber bands, of every material value the world holds dear. Q.E.D.

It is not easy to find anything new to say about war, and Godard has chosen instead to say something in a (for him) new way. He will pretend to be an amateur movie maker, he will make believe that his resources are a hand-held camera, some friends with an itch to act, a couple of surplus rifles, some secondhand visored caps and a jeep to get around and shoot scenes in vacant property and on empty streets. But there is nothing harder for an expert than to pretend to be a novice. The real amateur tries to be as good as possible; he has freshness and enthusiasm working for him and may stumble upon an exciting invention. But a professional playing the novice game must continually hide what he knows, deliberately hamper himself, suppress any invention lest it spoil the masquerade. Godard is at a serious disadvantage among the "let's make a movie" crowd; his film is not really naive, but it is truly without zest.

Amateur movies are full of accidents and gaucheries which can bring the enterprise close to the audience—you see the thing being done and the people doing it. There are no mistakes in Godard's picture; it is a meticulous exercise in false incompetence. The effect is to carry mannerism to the point of estrangement. Indeed, estrangement may have been intended: an echo of Brecht hangs over this sardonic war preachment. But the estrangement is not what Brecht sought by creating some ambiguity between audience and stage. The viewer is not forced to see himself through the fractures of the illusion; instead, his attention is fixed by the assertiveness of a technical affectation imposed on a narrative invention.

And I think that as propaganda this narrative is not very pressing. It is perhaps not false, but it is certainly less than half true. War today is not made viable by the common soldier's lust for pillage and savagery. Once in it, he may discover such possibilities within himself, but that is an effect of war, not a cause. Soldiers today, when they are told anything more than where to report, are taught that they will bestow virtue on a wicked world. Godard's troopers might better have been seminarians than shanty toughs. We are surrounded by real moral quagmires, and it makes me uneasy when someone invents a swamp of wickedness that can be crossed with a good conscience.

TRAVEL

TOUR Finland, Germany, Russia, July 15–August 14. All expenses $1490. Jerome Davis, Friends House, Sandy Spring, Maryland.

EDUCATIONAL

ARTHUR MORGAN SCHOOL, Burnsville 5, N.C. Grades 7, 8 and 9. Co-educational, Quaker-related, informal. Work-study program.

QUAKER STUDY CENTER—Suburban Philadelphia. Special program for study in social change, non-violence and radical living. Also year's seminar on man's search for meaning, confirmation and dialogue. Write: L. W. Lewis, Pendle Hill, Wallingford, Pa. 19086.

ART

HEINRICH KLEY. Signed drawings, watercolors, gouaches. Fine collection. Authenticity guaranteed. Details Box 611, c/o The Nation.

PERSONALS

DISCOVER a fun way of meeting interesting, alert Jewish singles. For FREE analytical questionnaire write: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: write Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Estate Investment Trust, 30 East 42 Street, N.Y.C. 10017.

BUTTONS, PEACE JEWELRY, POSTCARDS, POSTERS, psychedelia, etc. Unusual merchandise. Good service. Wholesale to all. 10c brings exciting free catalogue air mail. FREE SPEECH. INC., 28 St. Marks Place, N.Y.C. 10003

SNOOPY FOR PRESIDENT—249 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/51, 50/55, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Free catalogue to all. Free sample to stores. A Big-Little Store, 1671 Washington, San Francisco, 94109. (415) 775-3140.

YOU CAN BE A CITIZEN DIPLOMAT TO RUSSIA THE "GLASSBORO WAY"

For details write:

CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS

Dept. N 5/13, 10 W. 46 St., NYC 10036

or Telephone: (212) LT 1-8113

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE

(Computerized Matching—All Ages)
"Let TEAM make you a team."

Write:

TEAM Project

55 East 30th Street

New York, N.Y. 10016, Phone 895-5050

Crossword Puzzle No. 1249

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Such people as Johnson? They might handle some of your security problems by design. (13)
- 9 Draws the line when it comes to regulations! (5)
- 10 Spreads it on thick, obviously. (7, 2)
- 11 City of New York, especially if South instead of West. (7)
- 12 Part of the capitol tour, and not well managed. (7)
- 13 Colors associated with St. Louis, possibly. (5)
- 14 He cashed a check for possible capital problems. (9)
- 16 A long time ago, or possibly just over 50 years? (6, 3)
- 18 A clever saying, conjecturally, by design? (5)
- 19 Run of the mine or clay pit, possibly.
- 21 English poet, good enough when young but ■ wonder at fifty! (7)
- 22 One way to change nacre into tin? (9)
- 23 Certainly not the 14 down part. (5)
- 24 20 are undue trouble when retired. (13)

DOWN:

- 1 See 8 down
- 2 Not necessarily speaking with ■ forked tongue. (9)
- 3 Cattleman didn't like such birds. (7)
- 4 Even the smartest set possibly includes the underground types of London. (5)

- 5 Change is eternal at such change. (9)
- 6 Was she improved by her midnight habits? (7)
- 7 In short, is she to seek judgement? (5)
- 8 and 1 down Evidently a whisper is appropriate with the president's club. (5, 6, 3, 5, 1, 3, 5)
- 14 The queen of the maritime service? Bill might mention her first! (9)
- 15 The language of a feverish child, when about 10? (9)
- 17 Most of the class is in the pen, conceivably, so hold close! (7)
- 18 Obviously a piece by ■ French composer (7)
- 20 Shows signs of being almost worn out clothes! (5)
- 21 Less-than-bright part of the room, or only appearing so. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1248

ACROSS: 1 Astrid; 5 Resumed; 10 Preparing; 11 Tutor; 12 and 20 across Codling moths; 13 Tin-horn; 14 Sling; 16 Inceptive; 18 Impounded; 22 Curtail; 24 Mandate; 26 Tiara; 27 Tactician; 28 Sitters. DOWN: 2 and 3 Speed reading 4 Drip-grind; 5 and 29 Right-Minded; 6 Satanic; 7 Methodist; 8 Derange; 9 Spaces; 15 Important; 17 Vade mecum; 18 Incites; 19 Unaware; 20 Mention; 21 Steins; 23 Lotus; 25 Alike.

PUBLICATIONS

GROUP NOW FORMING

to publish a new National Weekly Journal of Opinion: Jewish-oriented on the order of The Nation, New Republic and Commonweal. Location: New York City.

Seeks writers and complete staff. Cooperative venture on profit-sharing basis.

Send full details to:
P.O. Box 703, Harrisburg, Pa. 17103

THE CONSCIENCE OF A RADICAL

By Scott Nearing

A book you should read.

Have it sent postpaid for $2 clothbound or paperback at $1.

Social Science Institute
Harborside Maine 04642

THE SMITH/8

Epochal Issue—192 pages

The best issue of a "little" magazine.

Featuring: Tramontane, an apocalyptic novella by E. S. Rock; How Our Day Began, ■ personal memoir by James T. Farrell; Stones, a great narrative poem by Taliaferro; The Parent Wheel, a sharp play by Speer; and the Uncertainties of Van Brunt.

Also: Four short stories by other Smith discoveries, last poems by the late David Cornel DeJong, reports on Our Dark Leaders, the LSD Cultural Revolution, the All-Time Be-In and the Viet Cong in Our Public Schools. And more, in the superbly designed, book-size Smith/8.

At your bookstore, or from

THE SMITH, 15 Park Row, N.Y.C. 10038

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

OUR GENERATION

Largest circulation Quarterly of dissent in Canada and of the New Left in North America—

Analyzes, Reports, Reviews, Theorizes:

- the movement for educational university reform
- the black power and human rights
- the peace and anti-Vietnam war
- the anti-poverty and community organizing
- the Quebec independence movement
- tactics and strategy of New Left in Canada and U.S.A.

Sample issue: $1.50

Subscriptions: $5.00 (4 issues)

3837 St.-Laurent Blvd., Montreal 18, Canada

WORKER WANTED

INTERESTED IN KEEPING BUSY AND AIDING A GOOD CAUSE? Needed for part-time clerical assignment, small liberal publication. Duties include: Work with mailing house, keeping records, and occasional manuscript typing. Salary secondary. For further information write: Box 609, c/o The Nation.

SITUATION WANTED

2 COLLEGE MEN (Harvard and City College) seeking interesting summer job (with or without room and board) in San Francisco Bay area. Please contact: Myles Lynk, Harvard College, Kirkland House, Cambridge, Mass. 02138.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

"You will not find articles in The NATION that can be read in the newspapers or other magazines. The NATION focuses a spotlight upon dark corners that need ventilation. The NATION articles lead to controversy and action; they are not ephemeral. The NATION is not intended for the intellectually or morally moribund. It is a viable publication for people with minds and emotions who are interested in this country and all of its people."

—Elmer Gertz

THIS BOOK FREE

WITH EACH NEW
1 YEAR SUBSCRIPTION

What you will find in The NATION, an exciting weekly that has been vigorously concerned with the American tomorrow for over 103 years, is well embodied in the new edition of J. Bronowski's Science and Human Values.

This important book, recently expanded to include the author's famous dialogue, "The Abacus and the Rose," originated from writings first published in The NATION.

C. P. Snow said:

"If I were trying to select six works, in order to explain to an intelligent non-scientist something of the deepest meaning of science, Bronowski's would be one of them."

Julian Huxley said:

"Dr. Bronowski has the rare distinction of being both a distinguished professional scientist and an inspiring humanist. Accordingly his SCIENCE AND HUMAN VALUES sheds valuable illumination on some of the confusion of contemporary thought."

The good fight
is now in

THE NATION

—Why not
join now?

Send to:

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me free, J. Bronowski's SCIENCE AND HUMAN VALUES.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6. (Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Pan-America; $2 foreign)

Name

Street

City State Zip

N 5-13

BURLINGAME
MAY 21 1968
THE LIBRARY

GERMAN STEEPLECHASE C. AMERY

THE NATION

MAY 20, 1968 35 cents

ON MANEUVERS WITH THE RED ARMY

DESMOND SMITH

Battle of Chicago

A Study in Law and Order

JOSEPH L. SANDER

Church, State, and Money for Schools

WALLACE I. ROBERTS

Strachey Diffused / CALVIN REDIENT

Philby's Virtuoso Spying / ALEXANDER WERTH

Late Victorian Eroticism / THEODORE ROZAK

Durrell's Note of Mockery / KENNETH KEXROTH

5-21-68
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

ghost

Detroit, Mich.

DEAR SIR: Thanks for the perfect timing of Robert Sherrill's piece on Hubert Humphrey ["Hubert Humphrey: Speaking in Tongues," The Nation, Apr. 29]. It greatly increased our amusement at his announcement speech. What I want to know is—did Mr. Sherrill write that speech for Hubert?

Lucy Haessler

epithets

San Francisco, Calif.

DEAR SIR: You call Hubert Humphrey deceptively plain, soft and pliable almost to the point of womanliness, the weeping hawk, the friendly fat kid on the block, that pudgy huckster, glib, arrogant, a brain picker, shallow, an opportunist, wishy-washy, an unlighted hulk, just short of crackpot and unstable. I did not think that The Nation would ever resort to name-calling or mud-slinging.

John Edison

books and truncheons

New York City

DEAR SIR: A. M. Rosenthal's front-page story in The New York Times (May 1) quotes a policeman in President Kirk's office at Columbia as saying about the students, "The whole world is in these books . . . how could they do that?"

As a resident of a building that Columbia owns in Morningside Heights, I must question: how can I pay my rent to an administration that calls in police who beat, kick and assault students, faculty, reporters and bystanders? Those who may not have wanted to get involved in the dispute were ironically forced to do so by the truncheons.

Eve Merriam

Styron's Turner

Harrison, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: As one of William Styron's earliest mentors and supporters . . . I have watched his literary career with an increasing sense of disenchantment and despair.

I consider that The Confessions of Nat Turner, which marks the zenith of his commercial success and popular prestige, is in fact the nadir of his true literary talent. A product of the McCarthy period, Styron is now paying the price for his earlier lack of concern with history, society and politics.

Thus for him to describe Mr. Aptheker in the terms he has used ["Truth and Nat Turner: An Exchange," The Nation, Apr. 22] is simply outrageous. Everybody knows that Mr. Aptheker, whatever his political persuasion, is the standard authority on slave revolts and on Nat Turner in particular.

It does Mr. Styron no credit, moreover, to try to slither around his own statements in The New York Times—nor to invoke a Marxist critic in order to camouflage his own anti-Communist bias.

Maxwell Geismar

New York City

DEAR SIR: William Styron may believe he has found the ultimate defensive-offensive ploy—quoting the Communist Lukacs against the Communist Aptheker. To do so, however, he distorts Lukacs' intention and takes him out of context. In part this involves flagrantly misapplying Lukacs' remarks on feeling in the drama, to the novel. The worst of it, however, is Styron's effort to make us

(Continued on page 663)

EDITORIALS

Five Democrats

They are Kennedy, Branigin and McCarthy in Indiana; Gilligan and Lausche in Ohio. So far none of the commentators seems to have coupled the result in the Ohio Democratic primary with the result in Indiana. But there is a connection, as those who remember Gene I. Maeroff's piece, "Ohio: Politics After Johnson" (The Nation, April 22) will readily recognize.

First, Indiana. The New York Daily News headline expressed the result perfectly in prize-fight parlance: "Kennedy Decisions McCarthy." Kennedy won, but he didn't knock McCarthy out. McCarthy stayed in the running by at least 7 percentage points: he got 27 per cent, Branigin 31, Kennedy 42. Had McCarthy got 20 per cent, it still would not have eliminated him but it would have been a weak showing. As it is, running close to Branigin, the native son in the peculiarly isolationist Hoosier state, McCarthy did pretty well. His belief is plausible that if the contest had been between only the two foreigners, he would have attracted more of the Branigin vote than would Kennedy. And, as he points out, Kennedy did not get a majority, which would have shown real strength.

Branigin, whatever his pretensions, was a stand-in for Humphrey. Between them, McCarthy and Kennedy got 69 per cent of the vote. What this foreshadows is that if Kennedy and McCarthy do not kill each other off—if the one who loses nationally supports, as wholeheartedly as a losing politician can, the one who wins—Humphrey can be dumped.

Humphrey cannot shake Johnson, under whom he served and who, in the last analysis, dumped himself. Aside from this stigma, Humphrey is in the anomalous position now of having to rely largely on those Democrats such as the Wall Street director of directors, Sidney Weinberg (who would prefer to have things as little changed as possible), while still trading on his greatly exaggerated reputation as a liberal. In the current situation, a liberal cannot be authentic if he favors what Johnson has been doing in Vietnam, and promises to "fight communism" on the same premises elsewhere if the occasion arises.

Now, Ohio. Lausche was the Administration voice in that primary. In any realistic sense, for years he had not been a Democrat at all, but under that party designation he had been elected governor of Ohio five times before being sent to the Senate. As Maeroff pointed out, he flew with the highest of the hawks until (perhaps with a premonition that it was going to be unhealthy up there) he tried to mollify his critics last summer with a declaration that the United States should stop bombing North Vietnam and take the issue to the United Nations. His other motive was to show up Ho Chi Minh as a warmonger. Before President Johnson went to Canossa, Lausche had once again joined the hawks.

On the record, Gilligan could not compete with Lausche. He was a six-term Cincinnati councilman and a former teacher of modern literature and poetry at Xavier University, and he had served a single term in Congress.

But he had been a dove right along. What this imprecise term means in his case was that, not without some experience in war (he won the Silver Star at Okinawa), he dismissed U.S. military victory in Vietnam as an impossible objective. From the start, he opposed bombing North Vietnam. He said things like, "We had better start marking some limits and reduce the situation to reality, ending our Holy War against communism." Time was when that sentence alone would have insured his defeat, but on the basis of nearly complete returns he had 480,512 votes against Lausche's 379,921.

In short, the political world changes, with the old politics giving place to new. As William Shannon remarked in The New York Times on May 6, a quiet revolution is taking place, with the Johnsonian consensus as its first victim. In the improbable event that Humphrey can make it to the White House, he could not reassemble the remnants. As for Kennedy, he has said himself that it is still a long road to the convention, and he shows signs of not wearing well with the American people. McCarthy does stir the discerning, and if he can pick up enough support from the great mass of average, well-meaning but essentially apolitical voters, he may introduce us to a new, creative style in national politics.

The Real Issue

Last month, Britain began to look like a country as tainted with racism as the United States, and indeed it is altogether likely that race conflict will continue for a long time in these and other countries. Yet the basic issue, whether there or here, is not race at all. Race prejudice and hatred are only the conspicuous symptoms of a sickness that is essentially socio-economic; it cannot be cured except by massive injections of social justice.

Between 800,000 and 1 million "colored" (Indians, Pakistanis, black Africans and West Indians) live in Britain—not more than 2 per cent of the population. Yet when Enoch Powell, a right-wing Conservative, called for their "repatriation" and an end to further immigration (for which speech he was promptly fired from the Conservative shadow cabinet), a substantial section of the working class came to his support. It was not a pretty spectacle. Longshoremen struck in protest, sang Bye-Bye Blackbird outside Westminster Palace, and shouted, "Keep Britain white!" One member of a group that called on Ian Mikardo, the Labour member representing the east London dock area, screamed, "You'll get nothing out of him, he's a Jew." Mikardo called his assailant a "Fascist," whereupon the delegation emerged from his office protesting that he had applied the term to all of them.

Obviously an ugly situation is in the making, and in England, as among U.S. "ethnic" groups and rednecks, passion against nonwhites runs high. But it must not be overlooked that it is much easier for the educated and affluent to be "tolerant" than it is for Americans newly elevated to the lower middle class, or for British workingmen in the classical sense, whose fathers were workingmen and whose sons will be workingmen. They are the ones with whom the "colored" compete, and often in a

IN THIS ISSUE

May 20, 1968

EDITORIALS

650

ARTICLES

654 German Steeplechase

C. Amery

655 Battle of Chicago:

A Study in Law and Order

Joseph L. Sander

658 On Maneuvers with the Red Army

Desmond Smith

662 Service for What?

Milking the Pension Funds

Irving and Judith Younger

664 Church, State, and Money for Schools

Wallace I. Roberts

665 A Letter to the Castle

Harrisene Smalls

668 Harry Golden

BOOKS & THE ARTS

669 Philby: Virtuoso

Lying and Spying

Alexander Werth

670 Strachey Diffused and Blurred

Calvin Bedient

671 Late Victorian Eroticism

Theodore Roszak

673 A Steady Note of Mockery

Kenneth Rexroth

674 The Way To Get at Spain

Daniel Talbot

674 Serenade to My Derelicts (poem) Morton Marcus

675 Book Marks

Sara Blackburn

676 Public Speech

Sherman Paul

677 I Lift a Glass (poem)

Lennart Bruce

678 Theatre

Robert Hatch

679 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher

JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher

GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor

CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor

PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor

ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor

HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014, Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Pan America; $2 for foreign postage.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

NATION

Volume 206

No. 21

manner bound to breed resentment. Immigrant workers concentrated in industrial areas in far higher ratios than the overall 2 per cent, are usually cheaper to hire and, as the April 28 London Observer puts it, "will sometimes accept working conditions which, in the case of a white, would provoke union action." The Observer adds that there is "a degree of sweated labor in the Midlands and the North, where most of the factories that employ more coloreds than whites are found."

In short, the "coloreds" are sweated by the managerial class and hated by the less enlightened white workers, who do not raise a similar outcry against Cypriots, Maltese, New Zealanders, Canadians and Irish; of the last-named alone, 500,000 have come to England since 1945. The "colored" carry a badge of difference and can thus be singled out as targets. Race would be wholly irrelevant, or at least not a prime consideration (sex competition is also sometimes a factor), were it not for the fears and resentments aroused by the economic struggle.

Wherever circumstances stimulate or aggravate competition for status, power and income, this kind of scapegoating is a sure consequence; and the more precarious the situation of the adversaries, the more intense the reaction. The competition need not even be real, nor on a significant scale. The mere threat of a competitive situation can trigger the reaction, and it will then be fed by pre-existing frustrations and hostilities.

The issue cuts across class and party lines to a considerable extent. Not all Tories, by any means, support Enoch Powell—nor do all British workingmen, some of whom are among the most enlightened and class-conscious in the world. But one cannot blink the fact that Powell has strong worker support, as does George Wallace here.

What Britain needs is a further overhauling of its social structure, modernization of its industry (which calls for capital and stopping the "brain drain"—or, alternatively, democratic socialism) and independence of the United States, diplomatically and militarily. Sending every "colored" back to where he came from and barring further entries will not go one centimeter toward solving the complex problem.

Frozen Policy

On May 1, the State Department viewed with "interest and sympathy" recent developments in Czechoslovakia. At that time, Robert J. McCloskey, speaking for the Department, indicated a desire to discuss with the Czechs issues that stand in the way of cordial relations between the two countries. This marks a potentially productive change from the U.S. position that was criticized by The Washington Post two weeks earlier (April 14): "For years American officials have called on Communist states to liberalize internally and turn a more independent face to the West, but now that Czechoslovakia is doing this, officials find themselves unprepared to encourage or otherwise respond to the change."

And it is not merely that our State Department people have been unresponsive; the Czechs would have a good case if they accused them of bad faith. The United States holds 18.4 tons of gold which the Nazis seized from the Czechs in World War II and which we seized from the Nazis. Czechoslovakia has been trying for fifteen years to get that gold back. In 1961, an agreement was reached whereby Czechoslovakia was to compensate the United States for $12 million of American property it had nationalized, and unfreeze some accounts; in exchange, we would return the gold, worth at that time about $20 million. The agreement was initialed by the negotiators but never honored by the State Department, which now values the assets nationalized by the Czechs at $54 million.

Granted that there may be legislative and political difficulties, if the State Department and the President had the will, it is inconceivable that they could not find the way to settle this matter—which in terms of international finance is a trifle. The original agreement should be carried out without further procrastination. Then, as an affirmative, tactful gesture, we should extend a long-term credit to the liberalized Czech Government. They are starved for currency, but the trade possibilities are excellent. The Czechs are not mendicants. They manufacture excellent products that our people would buy, given the chance.

Not only should we do something of this sort immediately but we should do it without the slightest fanfare. The whole procedure should be quiet and unostentatious and not be hailed as a triumph for our diplomacy. Above all, it should not be made to seem an attempt to seduce Czechoslovakia from its alliance with the Soviet Union, for the fact is that the Russians are, and will remain, the predominant military power in that region. On the contrary, Western diplomacy and propaganda should be urging moderation on the Czech hotheads who dream of a necessarily self-defeating uprising against communism. The Czechs can make gains but they cannot turn Eastern Europe upside down. Europe wants no more of a 1956 Hungary, with the U.S. radio calling the "freedom fighters" to arms and then prudently standing aside while the Russian tanks roll over them.

There is a real opportunity here. If we do not grab it, the only possible conclusion is that on our side the interests that want the cold war to go on indefinitely still have the upper hand.

Pity Poor NASA

The inevitable campaign is on to restore to NASA its former prestige and appropriation-cadging ability. NASA has been accustomed to a yearly allotment of $5 billion, but in the present state of the dollar—and of the country generally—this is being cut, and by all indications will be cut further in future years. There have been and will be no cuts in Apollo, the men-to-the-moon program, but post-Apollo is suffering.

The Nation is never opposed space exploration. Its stand has been, however, that there should be no cold-war race to the moon—that it does not matter whether Americans get there by midnight, December 31, 1969, or at some later date. NASA clings obstinately to the end-of-the-decade goal set by President Kennedy in 1961, an insistence which may well entail some added risk for the astronauts who essay the first flight. As for Mars and Venus, the principal objectives of post-Apollo, it will be no calamity if they are explored by men or instruments a few years later than the NASA promoters would like.

NASA has been busy trying to take evasive action on the cuts in government spending which are in the offing, and several experts have offered more or less rational arguments for their side. It has remained for Wernher von Braun, the famed director of NASA's Marshall Space Center in Alabama, to link the perils of NASA with the perils, as he sees them, of the war on poverty. The other day he warned the Senate Space Committee that if it "bleeds" the space program it will be headed for the status of a "have-not nation" like Britain. "The British," he explained, "built up welfare programs in the '50s while ignoring the burgeoning aerospace technology. Now, they don't have enough money to pay for their welfare programs."

Dr. von Braun is the best man in the country on rocket propulsion, but what he doesn't know about the causes of Britain's economic troubles would fill volumes. He is equally ignorant about Japan. We should be wise, he argues, to emulate Japan, "which showed a deliberate disregard for social welfare programs in the '50s" and now is thriving in shipbuilding and electronics.

He neglects at least four facts: the prosperity of Japanese industry redounds to the advantage of the Japanese capitalists; the bulk of the Japanese people are profoundly dissatisfied with their living standard; Japan has no incipient Negro insurrection on its hands, and Japan has no space program worth mentioning. Dr. von Braun is entitled to do what he can for NASA, but he had better stick to his rockets and avoid forays into statesmanship.

Ecology: Getting Worse

In the last week in April, two newsworthy events took place in New York City. One was the student insurrection at Columbia University, which on April 26 pre-empted about a third of the front page of The New York Times and a full inside page. The other was a two-day conference, "Challenge for Survival," held in the elegant precincts of Rockefeller University and at the New York Botanical Garden, which needed and deserved far more public and private attention than it got.

Despite valiant public relations efforts and the attendance of some 300 experts on the conservation (and pollution) of land, air and water, supported by several big names in the scientific and literary worlds, the usually conscientious Times responded only with a delayed reaction in the Sunday, May 5, garden section. In contrast, in the May 5 first section the Times gave immediate, well-deserved coverage to a May 4 press conference of the National Association for Mental Health, calling attention to the fact that there is a great deal more illness—including mental illness—among the poor.

This illustrates one of the handicaps of ecology: superficially, the human-interest factor is not commensurate with the human importance of the field. But what should interest people more than whether they, and their children, can survive in the now largely human-made environment? This is no exaggeration. Opening the second day's proceedings, Dr. William C. Steere, director of the Botanical Garden, said that what he had heard on the first day had "scared hell" out of him. At this point, only misuse of land and air had been discussed; water was still to come.

The generally gloomy bionomic picture is slightly relieved by two patches of light. One is that such a conference could have been held at all. Ten years ago, one participant remarked, it would have been inconceivable. Ecology was then a matter almost solely of academic concern, and expense alone would have been an obstacle; this time, however, the National Science Foundation provided supplementary support. The second ray of hope is the fact that industry is beginning to realize that operations which contribute to the degradation of the environment produce bad public relations now and may lead to worse consequences in the future.

Perhaps the greatest service of the symposium was in bringing out the cumulative abuse of the biosphere. The very first speaker quoted F. R. Fosberg on "The Preservation of Man's Environment": "It is entirely possible that man will not survive the changed environment that he is creating, either because of failure of resources, war over their dwindling supply, or failure of his nervous system to evolve as rapidly as the change in environment will require." But this is not a current statement. Fosberg was quoted from Proceedings of the Ninth Pacific Science Conference, 1957, and since then the spoliation of nature has gone on apace.

What threatens is not a new malignancy but one that is metastasizing with increasing speed. More than 300 years ago, before Watt invented his steam engine, London was already beset by smoke palls. But that was an exceptional situation; now it is far from exceptional and it gets a good deal of attention, though not nearly enough in proportion to the menace it presents.

The hazards are increased because of the insidious nature of some of the deleterious effects. G. M. Woodwell of the Brookhaven National Laboratory, accustomed to thinking of radioactive substances in terms of half-lives, pointed out that DDT persists with a half-life in excess of ten years, and in that period can have "catastrophic effects on animal populations all over the world."

Similarly, when air pollution reaches disaster levels (the Meuse Valley, Donora, London), it gets into the headlines, but only specialists pay much attention to the lesser concentrations that cause respiratory distress in the susceptible, with perhaps long-term harm to others.

Nor is much attention paid to the role of war in the ruination of the environment. Pierre Dansereau of the New York Botanical Garden said it was difficult for a practicing ecologist "to satisfy himself that some of the modifications of the landscape in Vietnam are not irreversible. . . . Clean agriculture, clean industry, clean urbanization, and clean war are about as clean as our conscience as scientists. . . ."

The New York Botanical Garden and Rockefeller University conference should be an annual event, and the press should feature it according to its actual importance—which is far greater than the public now realizes.

GERMAN STEEPLECHASE

C. AMERY

Bonn

The heavy National Democratic Party (NPD) percentage in the recent Baden-Württemberg state elections (9.8 per cent of the vote) came as no surprise to most German observers. In fact, pre-election polls had indicated that the ultra-right-wing vote might rise to 15 per cent. The most spectacular single cause, so it seemed, was the Easter rioting of the students—or, as it is more accurate to say, of the militant core of the extra-parliamentary opposition. (In true German style it has institutionalized itself by alphabetizing its title: APO for Ausserparlamentarische Opposition.) It is true, no doubt, that the dawn-age reporting and editorializing of the Springer press, pursued now for almost a year, created the atmosphere for the poor madman to shoot Rudi Dutschke; but, unfortunately, it is also true that the APO has compounded its misfortune by fulfilling Axel Springer's dearest wishes. Nothing could have been better for the Hamburg newspaper czar than the ensuing state of emergency whereby reluctant Socialist mayors were forced to defend their "property rights" against brickbatters and arsonists. While Springer is no NPD fan, it is certainly difficult for outside observers to see where the line is drawn. At the very least, an unsuspecting reader of his papers must have come to the conclusion that it was high time to re-establish "law and order"—i.e., the rule of the night stick.

Closer scrutiny, however, makes one doubt the overall importance of the neo-Nazi backlash factor. Bitter spokesmen of the Social Democrats, who lost most heavily, almost 9 per cent, blamed the trade unions for their setback; and while this is certainly Monday morning quarterbacking, it reveals unease in the party of Willy Brandt and Herbert Wehner. Since it entered the Grand Coalition, the SPD has been losing the rank-and-file support of class-conscious older workers, as well as the allegiance of the turbulent young. But more important for election results, it has become uninteresting to the "old-style indignant," of David Riesman memory, who make up so large a percentage of Germany's population. Distrustful of the present order, haunted by ghosts of Wilhelmian "stability," and threatened in its identity by the emergence of a modern technocratic capitalism, this class (or morass of decaying classes) has produced a considerable oppositional floating vote ever since the founding of the Federal Republic. When the lure of respectability proved overwhelming and the SPD entered the government, it necessarily became part of that establishment which is still highly suspect to the social primitives of the German provinces. The only legitimate opposition party still remaining, the Free Democrats, were somewhat invigorated by the election results (they picked up 2 per cent), but their new style, preached by Rolf Dahrendorf, who is known abroad for his Democracy and Society in Germany, is an enlightened liberalism and obviously unacceptable to the authoritarian floaters. In other words, an NPD jump of almost 10 per cent was no more than normal under the circumstances.

Normalcy of that kind is shocking, of course, and Western observers of Germany were right to be shocked. The steady growth of the German neo-Nazis supports another contention of leftist opinion, both in Germany and abroad: that Adenauer's cold-war policies did not overcome but only masked an existing malaise of German consciousness, and that the showdown would come when the obvious need for a Russo-American deal—that is, the common responsibility to maintain the miserable kind of peace we all now endure—ended the artificial union of "solid" and "unsolid" right-wing forces in Germany. The violent spokesmen of the Right, in particular the Nationalzeitung und Soldatenzeitung, openly favor a complete switch of foreign policy. They advocate concerted pressure by Germany and Peking (!) on the United States and Russia, to "regain" the lost territories in the East and effect other changes dear to their hearts. Harebrained as this sounds, it reveals the deep unease that is fostered by the U.S.-USSR entente.

What, if any, remedies can be applied? It would seem to me that things must become worse before they can become better. Any government that remembers the not so distant past will have to make it clear to Germany that its international credit depends on its internal development; this, in turn, will strengthen the professional haters. But—

Bernie, Aux Ecoutes (Paris)

"Well, Mein Herr, Do You Believe in a N zi Danger in Germany?"

and this is important—those haters themselves depend on an obsolete social consciousness. Both foreign and domestic efforts will have to concentrate on creating the New Germany, a Germany that responds to its technological, social and political realities. All parties, including the Socialists, have dawdled too long, have nursed at least some of the amorphous resentments that lurk in the old corners, have played at least a few motifs of the old Wagnerian score. They have neglected a thorough reform of Germany's educational establishment; they have been content to put up with a system of pork-barreling which costs today almost one-third of the federal budget, and which keeps alive economic and social structures that are unable to advance, but unwilling to die. Ironically, the students who are denounced by Springer and company as the "matriculated mob," have the clearest and most concrete case against this establishment. All their considerable shortcomings—their romantic violence, their yearning for in-group warmth, their mistakes of method and goal of attack—are sins which they share with their enemies: metahistorical and metapolitical thinking, excessive indulgence in "structural" thought, even a certain mystique of bloodshed.

Nevertheless, it is significant that the real violence did not come until the police "counterattacked": law and order has always had a strong advantage in Germany when it has been a question of squelching "rebellion." There remains one indisputable fact: Germany needs students, needs them desperately and fast. If this society does not propose to cut its own throat, it must come to terms with the new Ausserparlamentarische Opposition. It is possible, of course, that the neo-Nazis, who in the last analysis are bent on suicide, will clamor for the universities to be closed—as Franco did close some of them in Spain. But if the establishment has a few more years left to it (as it does), and is not completely blind to its own survival, the German steeplechase may still come up with a legitimate winner.

BATTLE OF CHICAGO

A STUDY IN LAW AND ORDER

JOSEPH L. SANDER

Mr. Sander, a free-lance writer, teaches a writing workshop, reviews plays for Skyline, a Chicago magazine, and is a civilian adviser to local poverty and urban renewal agencies.

Chicago

On April 27, a parade-demonstration was held in Chicago. An annual event of the Chicago Peace Council, it was prepared for by months of organization, applications for proper permits, and the eagerness of citizens to express peacefully their feelings about the three topics of deepest concern in the nation's life—peace, racism and poverty. But the city government fears for its image after the recent expression by black people of how they regard local conditions; and those who decide what shall be permitted in Chicago used the Peace Council's mobilization to serve indirect notice on the populace that between now and the Democratic National Convention in August demonstrations against the policies of government will not be tolerated. In a systematic betrayal of contract, permit, verbal agreement and constitutional guarantee, various city agencies made it impossible for more than 5,000 citizens to attain their peaceful objective, and much violence was deliberately provoked and then harshly put down.

Law and order came to mean not the fulfillment of a contract by the Chicago Park District to provide sound equipment so that the demonstrators might be informed of what was happening, but the illegal holding of pedestrians on city sidewalks at the arbitrary discretion of the police for as long as two hours. The duplicity involving the loss of promised sound equipment was not discovered until shortly before the meeting was to begin. Then a visit by the parade committee to the Park District office found it staffed only by a janitor. Contact was made with the Park District's legal chief, a man named Kerwin, who informed the committee that the sound equipment operators had refused to operate the system, and that union officials at IBEW would not permit supervisory personnel to do so.

In the absence of loud-speakers, there was no way to advise the marchers of last-minute changes in plan brought about by revised rulings from city agencies. This set the stage for what was, to the eye of this reporter, a planned series of provocations that produced the anticipated result of blood on the civic center pavement.

Thus, the paraders started off in the general belief that they were legally entitled to parade the streets to the Civic Center Plaza where they would hear a speech by Alderman A. A. ("Sammy") Rayner of Chicago's Sixth ward. But though permits for the use of the center plaza had been sought, they were rejected on the ground that much needed repairs to the almost new plaza were scheduled for that date. (The repairs turned out to be sidewalk caulking, and the plaza that couldn't have stood a citizen's foot upon it on Saturday was the scene on the following morning of a Shriner's Motorcycle Contingent group exercise and picture posing around the Picasso statue.)

To assure a peaceful assembly and march, Alderman Rayner had secured use of a room in City Hall for the parade committee to meet well in advance with the various agencies who might be involved—the Chicago Park District, the Department of Streets and Sanitation, the Police Department and the Frank M. Whiston company, managers of the Civic Center Plaza (Mr. Whiston is also president of the Chicago Board of Education). But not one official representative of any of those departments responded to the invitation to plan a peaceful meeting, except the Police Department which sent a man to say, substantially, that the laws of the city would be enforced.

Thus put off in their first attempt to smooth the progress of the parade, the committee met with the Bureau of Streets and Sanitation, which is responsible for parade permits. The committee looked to the Loop area, but another parade had already been scheduled there, and a city ordinance prohibits a second parade in the Loop on the same day. So a compromise was worked out, as neither side wished to take the case to court, the city being concerned lest its parade statutes be declared unconstitutional, and the parade committee being afraid that delays might make it impossible to march at all.

It was agreed that an 11-block parade permit would authorize the demonstration's march along Columbus Drive (in the park) north to Monroe Drive and east to Michigan Avenue. It was also agreed that the police would facilitate the further progress of the marchers, walking on the sidewalks, through the Loop to their destination at the Civic Center Plaza, if the parade committee was willing to accept an assigned route, which it did. For this passage, the paraders were to become pedestrians by legal definition and to require no permit.

No sooner had the first contingent of the paraders turned pedestrians crossed Michigan Avenue when the first arrest was made. Taken into custody was Joe Horton, regional traveler for SDS. The arrest was atypical, as most of those seized later turned out not to be organizational people. It was also interesting because the offender was not moving quickly enough when spoken to by a police officer. Two plain-clothes men grabbed Horton, shouting, "I've got him." In the apparent belief that he had been set upon by hostile onlookers, he twisted out of their grasp, whereupon he was forcibly "subdued" and hustled into a waiting police car.

Far from facilitating the paraders' progress across the Loop, the police held up marchers at stop lights, not just for the ordinary span of a red light, but for span after span, so that the crowd piled up in the streets behind. Then, of course, came the order to stay on the sidewalk. Then the order to make aisles so that cross-pedestrian traffic could get through. This brought confusion to the march, breaking the massive parade into tiny segments that it was hoped would not be so noticeable a blot on the serenity of the city.

After the first few hundred marchers had reached the Civic Center, the police held up further progress of demonstrators on a corner across from the plaza and refused to permit them to leave their ranks. The message was that, since the plaza itself could not be stepped on, no additional demonstrators would be permitted to cross until those already there had dispersed. The law indicated that pedestrians may rightfully continue walking around the plaza sidewalk, and this was the order given by the parade committee. Demonstrators, with a few individual exceptions, respected the polystyrene "ropes" that had been put up. Even after the ropes had parted, the demonstrators did not break their end of the bargain by moving onto the forbidden ground.

It must be borne in mind that the experience of most of the marchers was a continuous betrayal by city and police officials, and that anger and frustration were high by the time the Civic Center area had been reached. When about half of the marchers had made the perilous journey across the last street, the police held up the other half. There was no apparent reason, but they were kept waiting ten or fifteen minutes. This at length became too much to bear, as the police surely knew it must, and a great cry went up from those already at the plaza for the others to join them. Suddenly a rush of people took the police by surprise and broke across Dearborn Street for the length almost of a city block. The police tried to give chase, but realized the futility and regained what was left of their dignity by continuing to hold back those who had missed the first rush.

One youth, identifiable because of his long hair, was spotted by a policeman whom he had earlier eluded and suddenly, though things had long since quieted down, the boy saw the policeman rushing at him. He began to run and the officer ran after him, beating him on the head with his night stick, and finally brought in his prey. A few people were arrested on the plaza and brought inside the building. One young man who couldn't obey a police order to move because of the crush of people behind him, was arrested and dragged away by two officers, to whom he offered no resistance, while a third sprayed him with Mace en route. Mace could be used even more wantonly, as those arrested discovered. The door of a locked paddy wagon would be opened and an arm would enter, spray Mace inside the wagon, withdraw, and then the door would be shut again on the unventilated space.

Wedge between two policemen near the fountain at the edge of the plaza, Mark DiSuvero, a sculptor who is working temporarily on a major project in Chicago, was wrestled off balance and thrown into the fountain, where he was beaten with clubs and sprayed with Mace before being arrested. More than half of those arrested report that they were subjected to Mace after arrest. One person said that Mace was used on him as he lay strapped to a stretcher inside a Fire Department ambulance that was taking him to the hospital.

After some time, the police apparently felt that the period for the assembly had run out; they formed a wedge and began to push along the sidewalk and across the plaza, moving forward faster than people could reasonably move backward. Many fell and as fast as they did so were clubbed, kicked, and physically and verbally abused by police officers. Onlookers who protested the action soon became targets themselves.

After the immediate area had been cleared, the police hunted in posses through the Loop, beating and arresting many whose buttons identified them as march participants. Many officers removed their badges and name plates for this action. Newsmen and TV crews were frequently ordered to "get those cameras out of here!" Often, too, a uniformed police officer would step before the camera to prevent its recording the actual descent of a raised club. At one such post-demonstration encounter at the corner of Randolph and State Streets, an officer in a riot helmet, furious because the street was not cleared fast enough, ordered the driver of a halted station wagon to drive right into the crowd. The motorist started forward and knocked down two girls before regaining sanity. About ten arrests were made at this point, several from among onlookers who had not been involved until they saw how law and order was working to protect them. A photographer from the Chicago Sun-Times was beaten and had his clothes torn when he tried to take a picture of a woman who had been knocked to the sidewalk, and a reporter on assignment from the City News Bureau likewise suffered a policeman's night stick.

There were about sixty-three arrests, some fourteen of them women. Prisoners were held uniformly for almost seven hours before being permitted to make that important phone call. At no point after arrest or booking were their rights explained to them. No prisoner was brought before a judge to plead for release on his own recognizance, but a uniform bond of $1,000 was set for each. Charges were either disorderly conduct or resisting arrest; a few included attacking a police officer. At no point after the arrests were any prisoners confronted by the arresting officer, and many of those taken up at State and Randolph were booked for resisting arrest at the Civic Center. A further abuse of civil rights was the locking of all outside doors of the Central Police Station, thus excluding for hours those who appeared with bail money. Despite the Chicago Police Department's much boasted automation of procedures, male prisoners began to be released on bail at about 3 A.M. the following day; none of the female prisoners had been seen by 4:30.

Those arriving with bail money were kept in a chairless vestibule that was small and crowded, although inside the booking area four times as much space was available. At intervals a belligerent sergeant would come out and shout that everyone would have to crowd against the walls to keep the aisle clear or he would have all wait outside in the cold. Inasmuch as very few people entered or left the building, the order was regarded as malicious. Tired from waiting in this cheerless spot for five hours, one young man sat down, and the officer made a special trip out to make him stand and to ask him if he thought this was a hotel.

It was the feeling of at least one member of the parade committee that the city government is trying to get across the message that it will not tolerate peaceful demonstrations by local citizens and that any who try to make their grievances known to the public will be made to wish they hadn't. Clark Kissinger, staff co-ordinator of the April Parade Committee, observed that "by making a non-violent protest impossible, they make a violent one inevitable." He expressed the view that the citizens of Chicago have entered "a new period of a general suspension of constitutional guarantees."

Current city policy seems to have been made clear by both statement and action. Chicago will shoot to kill its arsonists, shoot to maim its looters, and beat into submission those who seek peaceful demonstration of their oppositional social or political feelings. The reality of law and order will not be permitted, but its form will be maintained and its letter enforced.

It may be that the city fathers now think this message has been driven home, or perhaps the reactions of Chicagoans who had been present or seen the brutality on TV suggested that the education in civic docility was being pressed too fast. In any case, a permit was issued for another peace demonstration at the Civic Center Plaza on the following Saturday.

The turnout was somewhat less for this hasty event, perhaps 3,000, but the spirit was jubilant and the change of police attitude was striking. Remembering the events of the previous week, it was almost comical to imagine what orders must have been issued to cause a police lieutenant to pick up a bullhorn and say: "Would you gentlemen please step off the street so a car doesn't hit you?" Or a patrolman at the busy corner where the marchers turned into the plaza to appeal to the applauding onlookers: "C'mon fellas, please move back."

Of course, the plaza was again covered with plain-clothes men, identifiable in Chicago—should you miss the bulge of the revolver over the right hip—by a small green button worn on (or under) the coat lapel. Much of the previous week's action was undertaken by these men, who now just stood together and talked, believing themselves unobtrusive.

Across from the plaza, the movie cameras of Chicago's "Red Squad" were trained on the crowd. Additional photos were taken by a plain-clothes man, dressed as a participant (except for the green button), who stood facing the marchers and got his shots head-on and up close. He was noticeably immune to all suggestions by the patrolmen that the crowd move back.

Summing up the entire two-stage event was a sign scrawled on a window shade and carried as a banner: "This is a lawful, orderly demonstration of Chicagoans." One still must wait to know whether this lesson or the lesson of Mace will prevail in Chicago.

On Maneuvers with the Red Army

DESMOND SMITH

Mr. Smith spent eight months in Russia as writer-producer of Comrade Soldier, a one-hour portrait of the Russian GI, to be shown on the A.B.C. network early this summer. Mr. Smith and the television crew were the first Americans to live and work in Soviet Army camps since World War II.

I was on the training ground of the First Motorized Rifle Regiment, not far from the old Cossack town of Novocherkassk in southern Russia. In summertime the Don countryside, its fields filled with golden sunflowers, resembles a page torn from a Tolstoy romance. But we were surrounded by the grim business of battle training. Although it was a blistering 90 in the shade, the Levchenko platoon, AKM rifles slung across their shoulders, were charging the half-mile obstacle course as though their lives depended on it. After a bit, their platoon commander, 22-year-old Sascha Levchenko, gave them a rest. One of the draftees had brought along his guitar. In the warm shade of the poplar trees the young soldiers sprawled on the grass singing army songs and smoking paperossi, the peculiar-looking cardboard filter cigarettes favored by many Russians. Beyond the tree line was a collective farm, field after field filled with drooping sunflowers. As I walked its boundary with Levchenko I told him that his platoon's dash and esprit reminded me of our own elite First Cavalry. "We are not elite troops," said Levchenko, "but I think we are much better than your soldiers."

Pride and patriotism are characteristics of the modern Soviet Army, a professionally led citizen army which celebrated its 50th anniversary this spring. No accurate figures are available, but it is conservatively estimated that the Soviets spend more than one-third of their national budget on defense. The USSR literally bristles with military might. Behind the draft army of 2 million are millions of trained reserves which can be mobilized within forty-eight hours. The Soviets manage this by training every able-bodied man after his 18th birthday, and enlisting him after active duty in both the national reserve and the unique network of para-military "sports clubs" that are a basic feature of Soviet life.

From the shaky beginnings fifty years ago, when 38-year-old Leon Trotsky organized the Red Army of Workers and Peasants, to Marshal Andrei Grechko's present-day nuclear-armed Soviet army, the iron principle which has always motivated the ordinary Russian soldier is that the Soviet Army defends the people. Around the staff of the red banner that stands, glass encased, in the vestibule of Moscow's Frunze Military Academy are marble plaques. Each plaque recalls a campaign that Lenin's army has fought, and the sequence starts with Budenny's defeat of the White Army at Voronezh in October, 1919. The names graven on marble have a familiar ring: Stalingrad, Kharkov, Kursk, Moscow, Kiev. Such battles fought in defense of the soil of Mother Russia have given the army a place of special affection in the eyes of ordinary Soviet citizens.

Because of this heroic tradition, the army believes it possesses a soul and that its essence is the spirit of the Soviet people. Sooner or later, a visitor who catches the extraordinary national pride of the army begins to wonder aloud: "What makes these young soldiers such fervent patriots?" When I asked Lieutenant Levchenko, he said: "All my men are, like myself, postwar babies. We grew up in the ruins left by the Hitlerites. We played in the rubble of war. When our parents spoke of the war, it was a war that took place in our streets and parks. It destroyed everything that our revolution had built." Levchenko continued: "Most of us feel an obligation to our parents' generation."

So it is not surprising that the Communist Party has encouraged army planners to maintain and strengthen the bonds forged in wartime between the people and the soldiers. Hardly a town in the Soviet Union is without an army-owned Park of Culture and Rest or an army community center. The Soviet Army does not (like the United States Army) expect the civilians to entertain them; it entertains the public with literally hundreds of army-led choirs, dance troupes and theatre companies. During last summer's 50th anniversary celebrations, Western military specialists were astonished to see—following the formidable rockets—an entire company of Soviet soldiers marching through the Red Square with small children on their shoulders carrying flowers.

Such extraordinary goings-on seem perfectly natural to a Russian. On a scale altogether novel in conventional military thought, the Soviet Army has been constructed around its many associations with ordinary people. Each unit in the Soviet Army is "twinned" to a particular factory or farm collective. I couldn't help noticing that Levchenko's platoon seemed especially fortunate. Their civilian partner was a Rostov-on-Don garment factory with a labor force of teen-age girls. Their barracks-room bulletin board was crowded with photographs and messages describing the "Socialist achievements" of Tania and Natasha and the rest of the girls.

The comradely attitude, the local view of things, is no artificial creation of the Soviet leadership; it arises realistically enough from the fact that the army's chief role is at home. The great preponderance of the Soviet Union's 140 army divisions are stationed inside its own borders. Moreover, they have been there since 1945. Soviet strategists, unlike our global-minded military thinkers, stick to an old-fashioned belief that the best way to defend your own country is to stay on its soil.

Logically, if only because it has the manpower and resources, the army is called upon from time to time to help out the civilian sector. Thus, when a shattering earthquake half destroyed Tashkent two years ago, the army restored essential services. And not only did army units rebuild the bridges; they also restored damaged roads and apartment houses. Army labor is used to help bring in the wheat harvest; and Trud, the labor newspaper, not long ago carried a glowing article on how a unit of army engineers broke up an ice jam by the simple process of mortaring the obstruction. But the use of the army for economic functions undeniably creates a conflict between politics and professionalism. I mentioned this to a Soviet general one day, and he muttered in disgruntlement that his "first consideration is given to military affairs, techniques and specialist work."

Like the U.S. Army, the Soviet Army relies on the draft for its manpower needs. But in sharp contrast to our army, there are no "Re-up" signs in any Soviet barracks. The long-term soldier is a rarity and, except for rocket troops, re-enlistment is discouraged. The USSR is more rigid about its draft law than is the United States. Military service is the duty—the Soviet Constitution calls it the "sacred duty"—of every citizen. There are no grounds whatsoever for conscientious objection. A draft resister, if a person so declared himself, would be liable to criminal arrest, not by the local police but by the State Security Police. The details are spelled out in a formidable document known as the Draft Law of Universal Military Service. Military preparedness is the underlying theme of its 104 separate articles. When it comes to national security, the Soviets never confuse peace with pacifism. "The first precept of our policy, the first lesson," wrote Lenin nearly fifty years ago, "is to be on the alert, to remember that we are surrounded by people, classes, governments, who openly express the utmost hatred for us."

The 28-year-old draft law was revised last year. Among many changes, student deferments were tightened. Full-time military instructors were introduced into the nation's 36,000 high schools. The draft age was lowered from 19 to 18. About the only item of good news for Soviet youngsters was that the active duty requirement was cut from three years to two, reflecting the more intensive pre-service training requirements. A Soviet youth's military obligation is, in essence, a three-part contract: pre-service training, active duty and reserve duty until the age of 50. A Russian draftee will have done his "boot-camp" training in his spare time, and when he is called up he will be sent directly to his assigned military unit.

It is impossible to understand how the Russian Army runs without some knowledge of DOSAAF (Voluntary Defense Organization for the Soviet Army, Navy and Air Force), the military-patriotic society in which a future Soviet draftee does his pre-service training. Put simply, DOSAAF is the mass defense organization of the nation, a kind of National Guard, Civil Air Patrol and Navy League, all rolled into one.

Parachute jumping, motorcycling, rifle shooting, rocket and flying clubs are entwined in the social fabric of every town and hamlet like an ivy vine; from the flourishing leaves of this vine, wherever one pulls, up pops DOSAAF. At least four cosmonauts began their careers in DOSAAF air clubs: Pavel Popovich, Valery Bykovsky, Yuri Gagarin and the world's only woman cosmonaut, Valentina Tereshkova. "My road to outer space," wrote Gagarin, "began at the Saratov Air Club where skilled instructors inspired me with a passion for flying and helped me find my vocation." DOSAAF's influence is multiplied in many ways: its membership organizes film festivals, book discussions on patriotic themes, visits to civil war and World War II battlefields. In a sense, DOSAAF merchandises national pride, and it does so with the vigor that Proctor & Gamble reserves for the marketing of Tide. To put it mildly, patriotism is encouraged in the Soviet Union. By the time a boy joins the army he is expected to have earned DOSAAF's "Defense of the Motherland" certificate, a parchment sheet emblazoned with red banners testifying to his successes in his military-patriotic education.

To get a feel of what life is like for a Soviet GI, consider the case of Pvt. Anatoly Sezoninko. A draftsman in the Dzerzhinsky Tractor Factory in Volgograd, Sezoninko was inducted last autumn. At the factory he earned between 90 and 100 rubles a month, and since he lived with his parents most of his pay went into his pocket. The two-year army hitch will make a big change in his spending habits. As the newest member of the Levchenko platoon, his pay is only 3 rubles a month, which is about 10c a day. From this, Sezoninko is expected to buy his own toiletries and sewing needs. Curiously, none of the draftees I talked with seemed upset by their low pay. Sezoninko asked me: "Why should we profit from doing our duty? After all, we are fully supported." What was the worst thing about army life? The soldiers laughed. "No vodka!" said one. Soviet soldiers are expected to be teetotal during their army service, but one draftee confided to me, "We get plenty of 'milk' in parcels from home."

One misconception about the Soviet Army is that it is undisciplined. The privates do, of course, call their officers "comrade" but they are quick to add the officer's rank after the fraternal greeting. Soldiers are taught to salute not only their officers but also their NCOs. They are not allowed to answer simply Da or Nyet. Instead they must stand rigid and respond Yest! (So it is!) or Nikak nyet! (No, certainly!). The weekend pass is unknown; a soldier is allowed only one ten-day leave during his active duty, and this is a privilege, not a right, which can be revoked for poor behavior. For Sezoninko, a typical day in the Levchenko platoon begins at 6 A.M. and ends sixteen hours later at 10 P.M. It is a six-day workweek. Sunday is in theory a day of rest. More often than not, it is a sports day and if the platoon is not participating it is expected to provide "comradely" support for the boys on the field. The translated Russian word for this kind of thing is "voluntary-obligatory." If a soldier smokes, he pays nothing for his cigarettes. Nonsmokers get an increased ration of sugar or candy in lieu of tobacco. For married men, army life is tough. There are no allotments for those without children. Those with children get only a tiny allowance; mothers are expected to put their children in a day nursery and work. In his rare moments away from the barracks and the training field, a Soviet GI must keep in mind item 44 in the Red Book of Regulations: "The serviceman is obliged constantly to set an example of high culture, modesty and self-control, strictly to observe the requirement of Communist ethics and behave with dignity in public places and on the street." I began to understand, after reading through the Red Book, why Soviet soldiers will go to almost any lengths to get a bottle of "milk" from home. It is for the same reason that recruits at Fort Dix sneak off post to have a hamburger and listen to the juke box at the Paradise restaurant.

Red Star, for anyone who remembers Stars & Stripes, has to be read to be believed. This newspaper of the Soviet armed forces can be bought at any newsstand, and all army bases have at least one copy posted up in a glass-fronted case. In Novocherkassk I seldom saw anyone reading it. Indeed, it is hard to imagine the ideal reader of Red Star, except that he must possess a dogged perseverance. The KILLS WOMAN, BURNS BODY style of headline writing is not for Red Star. The one before me has for a main head: TRIUMPH OF THE IDEAS OF LENINISM, THE IDEAS OF OCTOBER. Below this as the lead story is the complete text of a long speech given by a party functionary in the Kremlin Palace of Congresses. Embedded in the text like stones in a river are quotations from Lenin. Every so often the awful monotony is broken by the phrase "stormy applause." Elsewhere on page 1 is a fuzzy picture of soldiers harvesting grain under the caption: LET EVERY HECTARE BE GATHERED! No other reference is made to the topic. Page 2 is devoted to another speech, this one given by an artillery general. The rest of the paper is taken up with the "brilliant successes" of various military units, the power of positive thinking reaching an apogee of sorts with NOVEMBER 19 IS HOLIDAY OF ROCKET TROOPS AND ARTILLERY: CONGRATULATIONS MASTERS OF FORMIDABLE WEAPONS! Close examination reveals that the amount of real news in Red Star is distributed in about the same proportion as gold in Danziger goldwasser, one part in 10,000. And this at a time when there is such ferment and vitality in Soviet literary life.

Though the army is run on the idea that it is a people's army, a visitor is struck more by the differences between officers and men than by the similarities. It is a draft army led by an almost wholly professional officer corps. In contrast to the other ranks, officers are well paid. Junior Lieutenant Levchenko's base pay of 160 rubles a month is sixteen times more than a master sergeant earns, fifty-three times more than Private Sezoninko earns. He too is "fully supported." In addition to his pay, he is clothed by the army, fed by a military cooperative, and enjoys the use of the army's sports facilities for his leisure. His medical and dental care cost him nothing, and he and his wife Tamara—like all Soviet citizens—get a month's paid vacation once a year. In their case, they take it at an army rest center. By comparison with civilian standards, Sascha Levchenko is already part of the nation's elite. As a junior grade officer he earns more than a doctor or a lawyer in, say, Rostov-on-Don. In return, he works hard, much harder than his American counterpart. It is not only that he must meet his day-to-day military responsibilities. As a candidate member of the Communist Party he must attend cell meetings, watch the political health of his platoon, participate in community and army social life and pursue his technical education. Levchenko was born in the Cossack town of Ordzenikidze in 1945. He entered the Moscow Military Officers School at 17. His father, a military lawyer, retired from the army not long ago. Levchenko told me his biggest ambition in life is eventually to enter the famed Frunze Academy in Moscow. To do that he will have to be very bright indeed.

The goal of Soviet officer training is to produce a commander who acts, thinks, and leads his troops on the basis of a Marxist-Leninist view of the world. "Without a scientific approach and Marxist methodology," wrote Marshal Rodion Malinovsky, "there can be no scientific leadership of troops in modern conditions. The graduate must understand well that his knowledge is worth little unless, in applying it in practice, he constantly shows himself to be a militant fighter for the application of Communist ideals." The whole stress is political motivation. No one who spends any time with the Soviet Army can fail to be impressed by the hours that soldiers and officers alike spend studying. The pedagogical tone is imposing.

Of the more than twenty full-time military universities in the Soviet Union, easily the best known is in Moscow—the Frunze Academy, named after Mikhail Frunze, the great military theorist of the Revolution. It is occasionally described as Russia's West Point, but that is a misnomer. To enter the prestigious Frunze Academy, an officer must have the rank of Company Commander (Captain) or better. Order of the Day No. 47 of the Revolutionary Military Council published on October 7, 1918, stated that the academy had "to give not only a higher military and exhaustive special education but also, as far as possible, a broad general education to enable the persons finishing it to occupy staff and command post and interpret all questions pertaining to political, social and international life."

As the oldest Soviet military academy, it is generally acknowledged to be the single most influential educational force in the army, and its graduates—who are entitled to wear blue and white diamond-shaped badges on their tunics—have a special status all over the Soviet Union. It is attached directly to the General Staff through the Army Historical Section, a little-known "think tank" that specializes in the kind of advanced military thinking that Americans associate with the RAND Corporation and Herman Kahn.

A brisk seven-minute walk from the center of Moscow, the Frunze Academy is a fourteen-story dun-colored building that faces a quiet park not far from the Kremlin. In contrast to West Point, where anyone may wander around the open campus, getting into the Frunze is not simple. Passes are scrutinized closely, both entering and leaving. Inside, the beeswaxed corridors are lined with statues of czarist generals and oil paintings of World War II Soviet generals. I noticed that Marshal Zhukov had a place of honor, and a staff captain told me that "the old boy still comes to see us when he isn't too busy with his fishing." He told my friends and me that we were the first visitors from the United States since 1945. The assistant commandant of the Frunze, a one-star general, took us up several flights of red-carpeted marble stairs to his office. Over fresh fruit and Narzan water—Soviet hospitality is hard to avoid—he told us a little about the academy.

The Frunze has "around" 2,000 students; he wasn't prepared to give a precise figure. These are the elite among field grade officers and marked for higher command. Among them are a smattering of rising foreign officers from the Warsaw Pact countries. When I asked what was the motto of the academy, his reply was quick: "We do not specialize in mottoes. If we had one, it would be Vladimir Ilich's [Lenin's] advice: 'Study, study, and study.'" Later he took us on a tour of the classrooms. We rode up to the ninth floor in an old-fashioned "pater-noster"; an open-faced dumb-waiter elevator that you step briskly in and out of as it goes up and down on an endless chain. What impressed me first about the classes was the stern, old-fashioned teacher-pupil relationship. There was certainly nothing Socratic about the teaching method. The students, most of them in their late and middle 30s, sat in stiff rows, elbow touching elbow, facing the teacher. He talked, they made notes. I noticed further the enormous preoccupation with World War II. The corridors are lined with maps, diagrams and photographs of the big battles—Stalingrad-Kursk, Volga-Don and the battle for Moscow. Predictably, the class in tactics that we sat through was discussing the final onslaught on Berlin, where as the colonel-instructor told the rapt audience, "fascism was crushed."

Two months spent with the Soviet Army provides plenty of surprises. I had never known that Soviet soldiers don't wear socks, that instead they bind their feet in cloth strips called portyanki; that Defense Minister Andrei Grechko earns a remarkable 4,000 rubles ($4,400) a month salary; that Soviet Army mess halls have a "birthday table," where the mess sergeant provides a birthday cake and special lunch in honor of a soldier's birthday.

I was mildly surprised to see Soviet soldiers kneeling in prayer in Zagorsk Cathedral; I was startled to see them dancing a wild Gypsy dance, arm in arm in a Rostov-on-Don restaurant, and dumfounded to watch them give up their seats in the Moscow Metro when a group of NCOs boarded the train. In Soviet Army slang, mess-hall soup is "shrapnel," and, since he assigns work, the duty soldier is known as the "soup ladle." I knew that the Soviet Army was equipped with 500-seater "air buses"; I was amazed to hear that in the Soviet Far East the army continues to use camels for transportation. I was aware that American troops fought side by side with Soviet troops in the battle for Berlin. I was astounded to learn that there is an American military cemetery in Siberia, a grim keepsake from the days when President Wilson sent an expeditionary force ("The Polar Bears") in a misguided attempt to stifle the Russian Revolution.

I still find it hard to believe that there is no mention in any Soviet Army textbook of the man who founded the Red Army—Leon Trotsky, a public relations ploy akin to striking George Washington out of the American Revolution.

I shall end on an optimistic note. Though they support the second largest army in the world, the Soviets have a genuine horror of war. Kremlinologists are generally agreed on one point: that a third world war, fought with nuclear weapons, has no role in Soviet national aims—any more than it has in those of the United States. The nuclear fact has stalemated both Washington and Moscow. Moreover, geography, long the Soviet Union's strategic ace in the hole, will be made meaningless by the orbital bomb. For the Americans and Russians alike, death in any future war will come in a split second.

It has occurred to me that the presence of this huge home army is in itself an encouraging sign. The Soviets make it work for the state's goals in a dozen diverse ways—from ceremonial parades, to its mighty economic role, to its chief duties as a Communist training school for the manpower of the nation. Also it is a powerful morale booster. As I traveled about Russia last summer I kept noticing two billboards, always side by side. The first showed a mother holding a child and was captioned: "For Their Sake We Must Have Peace." The second depicted a steel-helmeted soldier with bayonet fixed: "Ready for the Defense of the Motherland." Almost mortally damaged in 1941, the progress of the revolution Lenin began is still unfinished business inside Russia. The Soviet leadership is showing signs of accommodating itself to the human dimensions of this goal. Meantime most Soviet citizens feel good when they pass a company of soldiers working on one of the dozens of building sites that nowadays ring Soviet cities. Why not? They strike an American visitor as an eminently sensible use of the military mind.

SERVICE FOR WHAT?

MILKING THE PENSION FUNDS

IRVING and JUDITH T. YOUNGER

Mr. and Mrs. Younger are lawyers, both on the faculty of New York University School of Law. Mr. Younger was formerly Assistant United States Attorney for the Southern District of New York.

Private welfare and pension funds have reached a rich maturity. Their assets as of the end of 1966 stood at more than $94 billion, and by 1981 will approach $250 billion. With prosperity has come a certain roughness, disclosures of which have left Congress, like a loving but worried parent, wondering what to do next. For example:

On January 20, The New York Times reported that the National Maritime Union had assessed an annual "service charge" on retired members as a requirement for continued receipt of their pensions. "What services?" one must ask. The cost of pensions for retired NMU members, including all administrative expenses, is borne entirely by employers. Despite the vociferous complaints of dissident union members, the NLRB has held that such a charge is not an unfair labor practice, and the Department of Labor has opined that it does not violate existing statutes.

In 1966, the Senate Committee on Government Operations disclosed that George Barasch, an official of the Teamsters Union and other locals, had capitalized on apathetic union membership, unalert management co-trustees, and timely amendments to the trust deeds (dictated by himself) to transfer almost $5 million from welfare funds to four membership corporations consisting of Barasch and selected friends and relatives.

Also in 1966, the same Senate committee described the capers of Jack McCarthy, formerly a union official and now secretary-treasurer of a labor relations consulting firm. McCarthy had set up dental and optical services purportedly for union members, the money coming from welfare funds. The hitch was that, instead of supplying dentistry and eyeglasses, McCarthy's services remitted the money to McCarthy, two doctors and five bookies (see "The Thumb in Labor's Soup," The Nation, January 22). In a softer moment, McCarthy lent welfare funds to a firm in which he was a partner, and used the funds to buy a building for his mother.

Hastily responding to the obvious need for some kind of action, Senators Javits, McClellan and Yarborough and Congressman Perkins have introduced several bills that would subject the administration of private welfare and pension funds to federal regulation by:

(1) Converting all such funds, whatever the form in which they were established, into trusts.

(2) Limiting the use of fund assets to benefit payments and reasonable administrative expenses.

(3) Decreeing that all persons who exercise any authority over fund assets are fiduciaries, and holding them to the standard of that favorite legal personality, the ordinarily prudent man.

(4) Prohibiting funds and fiduciaries from self-dealing.

(5) Making fiduciaries civilly liable for losses occurring through their failure to measure up to the required standard, and criminally liable for willful breaches.

(6) Appointing the federal courts as surrogates to supervise the administration of private welfare and pension funds.

Though commendable in purpose, these measures are unwise. They set up a prudent-man standard and open the federal courts to proceedings to enforce that standard. Yet the President's Committee on Corporate Pension Funds and Other Private Retirement and Welfare Programs "doubts whether a major problem is the lack of appropriate standards of prudence." These have long been established in law and in custom. The problem is rather one of securing their vigorous and certain enforcement. To place this burden on federal shoulders is not necessarily to solve it. A federal judge possesses no magical powers unknown to his brother on the state bench.

Federal courts have traditionally declined to act as surrogates and, in view of their already jammed calendars, are not likely to crow with delight at the prospect of riding herd on the administration of the nation's welfare and pension funds. Nor have the states defaulted on their duty to put an end to the abuses that have come to light. Despite the rulings of the NLRB and the Department of Labor, the New York State Insurance and Banking Department on March 1 persuaded the NMU to stop collecting the "service charge." The supreme court in New York County has sustained a challenge by dissident NMU members to the legality of the "service charge." And the New York State Insurance Department had started proceedings to recover the funds that were diverted by Jack McCarthy before the McCellan committee's investigation got under way.

All of which is not to say that Congress should do nothing. On the contrary, there is much for it to do in place of the trite and irrelevant measures at present pending before it. A single step would go far toward resolving the problems of conversion of fund assets—Congress should limit the choice of fund administrators to banks and insurance companies, already strictly regulated by law.

More fundamentally, Congress should take advantage of the enormous social possibilities asleep in the assets of private welfare and pension funds by passing legislation designed to foster community conscience in those responsible for the creation and management of the funds. Rich men without convictions are a menace, and the private welfare and pension funds are nothing if not rich. This stupendous wealth belongs, of course, to the millions of employees who must receive benefits out of it. But Congress can safeguard employees' interests while causing the wealth to be invested in ways that benefit society. Imagine what would happen if 50 per cent of the funds' assets were to be invested in job training for the hard-core unemployed, or in slum clearance or in urban renewal. About $50 billion could be available at once, and $110 billion by 1981. The means to bring this about are not unknown to Congress. The Housing Act of 1968, now under debate, provides for "federally guaranteed cash flow debentures" to encourage investment in new towns. Similarly, Congress might guarantee principal and a limited return on any investment by a welfare or pension fund in a socially desirable enterprise (such as job training, slum clearance, etc.), and deny tax benefits to any fund which did not invest, say, 50 per cent of its assets in such enterprises. The cost to government would be negligible, any outlays pursuant to the guarantee probably being balanced by increased tax collections from noncomplying funds. Capital in staggering amounts would be released for investment in domestic reconstruction: capital in amounts that simply cannot otherwise be found—without, that is, tyrannical taxation or instant withdrawal from Vietnam.

With such an opportunity before it, Congressional imagination labors and brings forth the idea of turning federal judges into surrogates.

LETTERS (Continued from page 650)

believe that Lukacs encourages taking liberties with epochal and institutionally historical "facts" such as Dr. Aptheker finds confirmed in Nat Turner's experience. Lukacs encourages nothing of the kind; he brands as subjectivism efforts to deform or deny the typical patterns of relationships in an epoch.

Thus some researched facts may be incidental or untypical and, therefore, may actually interfere with the imaginative writer's task and achievement. Still other facts, due to their larger representativeness, may be vital to recreating a historical moment; and where facts of this order are not known, or are inappropriate to the deeply historical imagination, they should be invented. But are the recorded facts of Turner's source of education, his family relationships, or the absence of blacks fighting his forces, incidental? Or untypical? Unfortunately, Lukacs offers Styron no comfort when it comes to a distortive "imagination" of "facts" of this order. Lee Baxandall juxtaposition

Forest Hills, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: At one point Grant McConnell ["New Politics of Conviction," The Nation, Apr. 8] writes: "If, for example, you are a black man and concerned with human dignity, the time may come when you are prepared to kill or be killed. Or if you are white and determined to protect the purity of your women from the vilest of threats, you may do the same."

In this unfortunate juxtaposition, McConnell tends to equate the legitimate aspiration of the black man for human dignity with the false, inflammatory battle cry of the arrant racists, lending as much credibility to the latter as to the former. It may be that McConnell meant the phrase about "vilest of threats" to refer only to a belief on the part of some people to that effect, but this objective statement, following an objective, contrasting statement, does not convey that meaning. James H. Durkin not so in Greece

East Lansing, Mich.

DEAR SIR: Recent political and social developments in Czechoslovakia have been viewed with hope and renewed expectation by people in the United States. In contrast, it is lamentable that a year has gone by since a ruthless military dictatorship was established in Greece . . . This suppression of personal and collective freedoms has created widespread discontent among the Greek people, and reports of armed resistance have already appeared in the Western press. We therefore feel that the free world must act now if a new Vietnam, this time in Europe, is to be avoided.

John P. Henderson, Professor of Economics
Michigan State University

Church, State, and Money for Schools

WALLACE I. ROBERTS

Mr. Roberts is a reporter on the Providence Journal-Bulletin.

The last few months in Rhode Island education have been among the most lively since Roger Williams, after escaping officials with intolerant theological views in the Massachusetts Bay Colony, began his experiment in the complete separation of church and state. Soaring and often wasted educational budgets and the rising proportion of state revenues going to aid for local schools have produced in Rhode Island and five other states carefully coordinated campaigns to demand that public tax money be used to subsidize private and parochial schools. In Rhode Island and Michigan the fight is dead for the present, but the issue almost certainly will be resurrected next year. In Pennsylvania and Louisiana, the debate is now in progress, and in Ohio and New Hampshire, the groundwork is being laid for campaigns in the next few months.

The issue is hard cash, not bus rides, lunches, textbooks or some equally equivocal service which in the past has enabled supporters to skirt the church-state issue on the ground that the aid was legal for safety reasons or that it was aid which directly benefited the child, not the institution. The organization that has planned the six-state thrust is Citizens for Educational Freedom, a national organization with headquarters in Washington, where in the past it has lobbied against federal aid to education unless it contained, as did the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965, provisions offering financial help to students in nonpublic schools.

CEF, claiming 250,000 members in all fifty states, contends that it is a nonpartisan, nonsectarian and nonprofit group of parents; but, if only because 91 per cent of the children in nonpublic schools attend Catholic parochial schools, the nonsectarian disclaimer is academic and has given rise to observations, by the Episcopal bishop of Rhode Island, among others, that the organization is a front for the Catholic Church.

Such statements injected a bit of anti-papist heat into the debates on CEF-sponsored legislation in Rhode Island and Michigan, where the states would be required to give parents of children in private and parochial schools money that could be spent only to pay tuitions. Legislators in both states have found the issue too hot to handle and have quietly buried the bills in committees. They also found the proposals expensive; the Rhode Island bill, which would have helped 47,000 children, had a first year cost estimate of $6 million, and the Michigan bill would have cost an estimated $25 million.

Although shelved in two states, CEF has a chance to get substantial aid from the Pennsylvania legislature because the CEF state chapter has become a potent force in local politics. The particular forms given the CEF bills in Rhode Island and Pennsylvania indicate that although the drive is national, it is geared to local situations. The Rhode Island CEF bill, unlike the one in Michigan and those planned for Ohio and Louisiana, has no specific dollars-per-child limit. It is geared to the state's progressive, open-ended formula for public school aid. As the amount of money spent by the state for each child gradually increases with local school expenditures, the tuition aid would also rise and would always equal about half of the state per-pupil support.

The Pennsylvania bill, on the other hand, is not even a tuition aid proposal, but would set up a special state authority to provide an estimated $25 million to "purchase services" for nonpublic schools, such as paying for instruction in secular subjects taught by state-certified teachers. The reason for this approach is that the authority device was upheld by local courts when it was used by a public school district to finance school construction.

All the CEF campaigns have been or promise to be highly organized, well financed from local sources, and unabashedly blunt in their politics. The state chapters use letter-writing campaigns and establish speaker services to drum up support. The Ohio drive is also planning to use the one successful tactic that emerged from CEF's failure last year to have the Blaine amendment prohibiting aid to nonpublic schools omitted from the New York State constitution. The Ohio CEF units plan in September to question all the candidates for November election to the legislature on their positions as to tuition aid bills. A similar poll of the candidates for the New York Constitutional Convention produced endorsement of the repeal from 75 per cent of the candidates.

Aside from the politics, the controversies over the CEF-sponsored legislation have raised some irrelevant non-issues and ignored some real problems facing both public and nonpublic education. For instance, the child-benefit theory which CEF uses to avoid the constitutional separation of church and state, is a legal fiction. The aid is going to the schools; the parents are only a funnel, and even CEF has acknowledged this in the preamble to the Rhode Island bill, which contains a long section describing the financial crisis of the state's private and public schools. CEF also argues that the church-state issue is not a constitutional problem but a "political" one, and that appears reasonable, except that it would seem to call for changing the Constitution by legitimate political processes rather than by subverting it.

Even more important, however, is that proponents of the bill maintain that private and parochial schools will be forced out of business if the bills are not passed, thus dumping hundreds of thousands of children into the already overburdened public school systems. Opponents contend that if the aid is given, it will mean the further deterioration of the public schools because people will pull their children out to send them with the state's help to parochial and private schools.

It would appear that the opponents of tuition aid have the better case. Part of the reason for the poor quality of public education in today's cities is that the Catholic parochial schools have drawn off a considerable number of average and above-average white students, leaving behind, with the Negroes, the retarded, the emotionally disturbed, and those with discipline problems for the public schools to educate. The figures are not insignificant; one-third of the students in Philadelphia and Providence attend Catholic parochial schools. In view of the vast problems of urban education and the fact that some of its products are burning down the cities which failed to educate them, it would seem that, before the states think of easing the burden of white middle-class parents whose children are already in nonpublic schools, or encouraging others to make the switch, they should first pay the bills for the enormous costs piled up by their past failures.

The American public school system was a vital force in assimilating diverse groups of immigrants, and the Catholic parochial schools filled the vital need of defending the faith in the days when public schools were not only blatantly Protestant but in many cases openly hostile to Catholicism. But conditions have changed, and the institutions have not. The public schools have failed to bring the Negro into the middle class as they did the other groups, and Catholics no longer have to feel threatened by public education. Whether either system should be continued in its present form, especially in the cities, is a question that cannot be ignored and to which the obvious answer seems "no."

A LETTER TO THE CASTLE

HARRISENE SMALLS

The following letter was written to Dr. Leo Hamalian of the City College of New York by a young woman who is seeking, through his good offices, to find somewhere in the city's educational system an opportunity to train the mind she so obviously possesses. Following the letter there appears a note by Dr Hamalian.

Dear Dr. Hamalian:

Hello again, you wouldn't believe it but I've been penning this letter for weeks. I haven't any excuse but, for the most part, I've been dealing with my immediate problems at hand. My responsibility to my offspring and the daily struggle of life. And, yes, I've started a new job, a meat wrapper at a large store. Adding this job to many others. Forgive me, therefore, for keeping you waiting.

You asked me to write about myself and why I want to go to school. I'll try to squeeze twenty-six years into these few pages.

Why I Want To Go Back To School. Or should I say why I've got to go back to school.

I was born twenty-six years ago—February 10, 1941—in Morrisania Hospital, the Bronx, six minutes after my twin brother, called Harrison, Jr. I had to be named, what else, Harrisene. That was my beginning.

From what I'm told, my father and mother separated when I was 6 months old. I really don't know, I was too young. But, as we grew up my earliest memories were living on Prospect Avenue in the Bronx. I remember my mother raising my two older sisters and a set of twins. I do remember my father wasn't there. Mr. Welfare (ADC) was there: I remember that awful-tasting oatmeal, that was stamped, "Not to be Sold, Gov't Property, Welfare Recipients Only."

My mother, Catherine (Turner) Bailey was murdered soon after. At 26 years old her life was snuffed out. Perhaps it was best, I don't know, for they do say death is peace. I know she died for us, so that we might live but, after twenty years, I still miss her so.

We were taken to one of the children's shelters down by Central Park. There we were to stay, a place so cold and impersonal. I was 6½ then.

Not knowing this would begin many years of disappointment and frustration. But somehow children hold on to something when tragedy strikes. Something deep-seeded in your soul. That something was and still is, hope. My mother left us this something. All she had to leave us, hope, and this came from within herself. And giving of oneself is priceless.

When I was 11½, my father came into our lives again, trying to piece his broken life and family together. We had a stepmother, fourteen years his junior. Somehow in his mind I feel he thought a younger wife could endure raising four children, whose minds were already formed. We had seen practically all of the cruel and seedy side of life, but living with her just added to the misery.

She turned out not to be a true mother; she was an alcoholic and was bisexed and went through my father's hard-earned money, buying liquor and anyone's favors, men, women, even little boys and girls.

One night when my father couldn't endure any more, and knew we could no longer endure starvation or degradation, with all of our worldly possessions wrapped in a spread, we left Nyack, N. Y., and came to Corona, Long Island.

We lived in one room—with use of the bathroom and kitchen. There were four other rooms occupied. This building was formerly a house of ill repute. It was supposed to have been cleaned out; it never was.

I attended Junior High School 16 in Corona. I graduated to Flushing High School but, because of the zoning laws, I had to forget about Flushing and attend Newtown High School in Elmhurst.

This made me very unhappy because I had so wanted to attend Flushing; its curriculum was so much like the school I attended in Nyack. Even though our bellies were empty when we lived in Nyack, the school kind of brought life into our lives. I was now 14. So, with that I went to Newtown. My attitude and my outlook on school were dim, most of all because of the one room, the drunks, the junkies and the apathy. Even the fact that if we didn't work odd jobs—housework on weekends in other people's homes, baby sitting, hauling groceries at the A&P—we would never have had that nickel to go with our bus passes. Breakfast we didn't have and lunch was unheard.

I chose the right way, the hardest way, but in the long run I still had my self-respect. Thus, I worked. I continued school, continuing to survive. Trying to break out reaching up, hoping.

Thus, from the time I was a child I promised my unborn children that they would never hunger for the basic needs in life, which every parent owes their offspring—food, good shoes, books, knowledge and most of all understanding.

When I was 15 I met a boy of 20 years, his name was Robert. He lived down the block from our one room. Robert fed me and my family almost every day. His poor mother's food bill! She worked so hard in the garment district. Robert was attending Manhattan College then, contemplating dropping out. I use to say to him, "I wish I had a mother. I wish I could have gone to school." Knowing then somehow I wouldn't finish school.

I was grateful to Robert, perhaps he felt sorry for me, but anyway I became pregnant. I was 16. I didn't want to get married, so I went away. I worked in a laundry plant eight hours a day, six days a week at 80c an hour. This was 1957. I cleaned bungalows and rooms for my room and board. I saved every dime. I was sick; I had just gotten over a spinal operation, a scared kid. Rather than give up I continued to work. All I know is that I had to make it so my baby wouldn't be hungry. I worked until the summer was over, then when the resort closed, I returned home.

Robert still insisting on getting married. Thus, being ill, my spine still open, tired and very much afraid, I agreed. I had returned home September 5, we married September 8, 1957. Kimble Annette was born February 21, 1958; a year later Kendall Anthony was born, February 26, 1959.

Robert continued school. With a teen-age bride, a baby and another on the way, he finished a B-average student. I worked pregnancies. I was to have completed school after helping Robert finish, and go into nursing, but it didn't work out that way.

Robert received his B.S. degree in psychology and his commission in the U.S. Air Force. Nine years later he is making it a career. I left Robert almost five years ago. We obtained a legal separation. I won't go into our marriage difficulties; it's a part of my life I would want to leave in back of me.

There I was 22 years old. Seven years of marriage; three children, ages 6 years to 18 months; ten years of schooling. Qualifications: experience in housekeeping, laundry clothes sorter, filing and baby sitting.

Baby sitters were hard to come by, so I had to stay home. I lived in a poverty-stricken area, paying $130 a month for three rooms. It was a dump. I wasn't quite well enough to go to work, with surgery on recent hernial repairs and separation in my stomach muscles, but soon after I found a sitter. Twenty-six dollars a week. I took that out of their support of $300 a month. With the rent, that took care of every cent. I worked as a maid in a motel, cleaning fifteen rooms a day and I worked nights in a real estate office canvassing on the telephone. I worked hard and saved and pinched, to move out of my poverty-stricken area.

The money I receive from their father is theirs. Let's call it the fruits of my labor. I didn't help their father through the hardest years of school to let my children live around apathy, welfare, eat pinto beans and that horrible oatmeal and live in the slums. To let them around dirt, junkies, would be giving them the same inheritance that I had. We owe our children something better.

How can a child think anything of himself if he grows up in a slum? Maybe, moving out of the slum is not the answer. I only know that my children see life different than I did. They do deserve better. I'm not paying the rent here, $150 a month. I couldn't afford it. I couldn't afford it if I wasn't getting this support and I still can't afford it now.

It's funny the Germans, Irish and the Jewish and Italians were in the slums. And somehow my people are still there.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

Maybe, because it's easier to accept, than to continue to suffer and work hard like my family did and many more of my people to break out of the slums. Obtaining their goals by sacrifice and the sweat of their brows. And still keep their pride.

I've gone to Manpower to ask to be trained and helped to go to school. But one of the stiffest qualifications is to live in a poverty-stricken area. This is what you hear: "I'm sorry Mrs. Smalls, you can take the test, but, there's so little money around, and there's many immediate cases and after all you are getting $300 a month." $3,600 a year for a family of four, are they kidding?

Then on to operation Seek. "This is beautiful" I said. Hope again! My son's teacher told me about it, but again another closed door: Requirements high school equivalency and most of all you must live in a poverty-stricken area.

I've had nine jobs in the last four years. Struggling to produce three positive thinking individuals, who will become productive citizens and a credit to their country and their world. Not just to exist and become burdens on any society. But I need help. The Seek program could help me.

Dr. Hamalian, I've just resigned from Creedmore State Hospital, a mental institution. My position there was Grade 6, psychiatric attendant. I worked five days a week. Every weekend, no holidays. I was on the Medical Surgical Ward. Short of help always. Double workload. All aging and incontinent patients. Feedings, dressings, mopping floors with GI mops, lifting poor helpless people. Emptying garbage. Seven months of this slave labor and I cleared $68 a week. Paid a sitter $20 a week, sometimes $25. Physically I'm in no condition, but, most of all cooking, always catching up with housework, the children's studies going down. I had to resign; someone has to be here.

Their father is in Vietnam. He'll be stationed in the Far East for three years. He never had much interest in them anyway. Thus, it is up to me, I am their tree, they are my branches. I must not fall or fail them.

These are some of the reasons why I've got to go back to school; in paving a future for myself it will be for them. I'm scared, not just afraid. I must be qualified. I must get a degree, in order to survive; otherwise I might just as well throw in the towel. Ten years from now I'll be 36. Have a daughter of 20, a son of 19 and a daughter of 15. I'll have so much to give them and to other children.

I'd like to be a teacher in any poverty-stricken area to help children and teach them and most of all give them hope.

If one only could obtain wisdom sooner, rather than take a lifetime. I know what I have to do, I need help, "no man is an island unto himself." If I could just get my toe in the door then I feel confident that I will make it.

I'm working part-time now, to make ends meet and keeping in mind, body and my soul that there is hope. Well, Dr. Hamalian, I've tried to squeeze twenty years into many pages. It wasn't all bleak, it wasn't all dark, life isn't so bad, if you remember to stop and look into the little children's smiling faces.

It could get worse, life I'm referring to, and it has been.

There was no room to take the equivalency test; I'm studying very hard. I haven't fallen asleep over school books in eleven years and it's a good sleep. I'm going to make a good mark on my test in March; when I get the results I'll send them to you.

If you can help me in any way to give me this chance to get back into school I can promise I will not disappoint you: I find that I can't afford the luxury to put my books down.

I'll close now. God bless you and your family.

I remain

Sincerely,

/s/ Harrisene Smalls

One night about two months ago, Harrisene Smalls, high school dropout, amateur actress, mother and main support of three children, started out from her home in Queens Village to seek advice from me about the possibility of attending The City College either as a non-matriculant or as a Pre-Bacc student (see Leonard Kriegel's "Headstart for College," The Nation, February 26). On her way to the college she was attacked in St. Nicholas Park by a knife-wielding hood. She now thinks that she may have saved herself from rape by refusing to "freeze up." Instead, she knocked her attacker off balance with a swift blow and fled for the safety of the college library up on Washington Heights.

When she had recovered her composure, she started out for my office. She was accosted a second time by the same assailant and once more managed to escape him ("Hard work keeps this mother in shape"). She reached my office only to find that through a misunderstanding we had missed connections. Had Harrisene Smalls decided at that moment that not even a degree from City College was worth repeating the experience she had just endured, no one could have blamed her.

But Harrisene Smalls is tough and she called to arrange another appointment. We met this time, and as I questioned her about her educational background, she told her story, calmly, even cheerfully. I asked her to put it down on paper so that I could pass it on to the proper authority for evaluation. I hardly expected her to do so and after I had read the account, I knew I would have to bring it to the attention of other readers as well.

Harrisene Smalls is not asking for much: merely the opportunity to give dignity and purpose to her life. In this land where people who wish to attend school are given a second, third, and sometimes fourth crack at college, she is requesting a first real chance to educate herself up to her intellectual capacity. If she has the intelligence and motive to absorb higher education, then this request is neither idle nor arrogant.

Perhaps we have to establish immediately a unit in the City University or State University where there are no prerequisites of any kind, where adults long on intelligence but short on information will be afforded an opportunity to apply that intelligence arduously. That a Harrisene Smalls is 26 years old means only that her powers of perception have been heightened by her suffering, her appreciations broadened by experience, and that they both are likely to be further sharpened by the discipline and direction of a rigorous education which she is now ready to accept with joy. LEO HAMALIAN

HARRY GOLDEN

POOOR whites in the rural area of North Carolina refuse to participate in any of the welfare programs. They deprive themselves of this much needed aid because the programs are integrated. As a result, the preponderance of welfare recipients are black, and the whites sullenly refer to "the nigger poverty program" and stay clear.

Since the Reconstruction, the black man in North Carolina has been the only poor man. White men chopped and tied tobacco for 25c a day, their children working away in the hot fields with them, but these white peons never believed they were poor in the way that Negroes were poor. White men had hope. The hope never led them any place, but still they believed it distinguished them from the black man. In rural areas poor white men did enjoy a certain social equality with the big plantation owners and the rich farmers. To apply now for aid from an integrated federal agency would forever erase that equality.

Almost seventy years ago, the hatred of Captain Dreyfus opened the doors of the aristocrats to the bourgeoisie. A butcher was more than a butcher, he was an anti-Dreyfusard just like the bank president. In Craven County, N.C., a man can say, "I ain't no 50c an hour cotton chopper, I'm a segregationist."

Reporter James K. Batten of the Charlotte Observer has just completed a survey of the poverty program in his state. North Carolina has more poor than any other state, 234,000 families, and 66 per cent of these families are white, according to the 1960 census. Yet only a tiny fraction join any poverty program. Negroes are quick to take advantage of whatever help they can get. But as the white segregationist will remark, "Niggers ain't got a hell of a lot of pride to swallow."

In Craven County, there are 5,132 poor families—families who live in tar-paper shacks, who are functionally or wholly illiterate. Of these families, 2,722 are white and 2,360 are Negro. James Godwin, the director of Craven's Operation Progress, believes the whites simply refuse to acknowledge their plight. "Yet some of them are so darn poor," he says, "it is pathetic." How to reach them baffles Godwin as it baffled his predecessor.

Compounding the problem are the local booster clubs who never tire of singing the praises of these poverty-ridden cities. The establishment is quickly annoyed when a poverty agency moves into a city or town—it spoils the magnolia illusion. They disparage the efforts of the social workers and their hostile influence in many matters is decisive.

Reporter Batten did find some whites who participated. One of them, a 58-year-old mother, told him her daughter was a member of the Neighborhood Youth Corps. The girl earned $12.50 a week doing odd jobs at the nearby Farm Life High School. The money enabled her to stay in high school. (A high school diploma is the only ticket out of dreary Craven County.) When Batten asked the mother what the neighbors thought, she said, "They hain't throwed off on me. I've always treated colored people right, but I've always been taught to go with my color. But if you're poor you can't help it."

These poor whites are victimizing themselves because federal money is dispersed only through integrated agencies and they will not queue up with Negroes. But the Negro is making progress, more than he ever made before, and this confuses and enrages the whites. Into this vacuum steps the Ku Klux Klan. Probably North Carolina has the most active Klan in the United States. It no longer wears nightshirts and hoods but sun-tan khaki and helmet liners. It marches through these rural towns every Sunday. James Robert Jones, the Grand Dragon of North Carolina, warms up his meetings with the question: "The Jews got the B'nai B'rith; the Catholics got the Knights of Columbus, the niggers got the NAACP; what in hell has the poor white man got but the Ku Klux Klan?"

Social progress doesn't always banish problems. I remember a taxi driver in Charlotte condemning Roosevelt intemperately. When I asked him why he was so mad at FDR, he told me he had just had a colored preacher in his cab. "He paid me with a $5 bill," the driver said. "Now when did you ever see a nigger with a $5 bill before Roosevelt?"

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Philby: Virtuoso Lying and Spying

MY SILENT WAR. By Kim Philby. Grove Press. 262 pp. $5.95.

ALEXANDER WERTH

Not being addicted to detective stories and spy thrillers, I could not work up any inordinate interest in the story of Kim Philby ("the best spy the Russians ever had," according to CIA Chief Allen Dulles); but even if I were such an addict, I am not sure that I'd be wildly excited by this story as "told by himself." For the answer to the really important question is just not there. What actually did Philby do for the Russians between 1933, when he became a Soviet agent, and 1963, when he realized that the game was up, and slipped over the border into Russia? Philby tells us what is already known—that he engineered the escape to Moscow of Burgess and Maclean when they were on the point of being arrested; but whether they were of any further use to the Russians after that is more than doubtful. After the Burgess-Maclean defection, Philby became suspect. Bedell Smith told the British that he would not have him back in Washington; the British Intelligence people questioned him for hours, took away his passport, and continued to treat him as a dubious character for years. But nothing could definitely be proved against him and, in the end, Harold Macmillan had to admit in the House of Commons that "there was no evidence that he had betrayed the interests of the country." After that he worked in the Middle East as Observer and Economist correspondent and continued to work as a British Intelligence (SIS) agent—though, apparently, in only some minor capacity. As he here admits, his real job was to collect information for the Russians.

Since 1933 when, at the age of 21 and while still at Cambridge, he became a Soviet agent, the nature of his work required him to be a liar of extraordinary skill and virtuosity (without this skill, he would never have got away with the Burgess-Maclean affair). Since this lying had become second nature with him, it is almost impossible to say what in this book is true or untrue. Moreover, it was written in Moscow, and was checked out by the Russians; the last thing to expect from it is any kind of revelation of the workings of the Soviet Intelligence Services. One of the few things he admits is that his first trip to Franco Spain during the Spanish Civil War was on the Russians' behalf; the second time, he went as the London Times correspondent. This, and expeditions to Nazi Germany, when he masqueraded as a British pro-Nazi, helped him to win the confidence of the British Secret Services, and made him particularly eligible, once the war was over, for heading various British and joint Anglo-American anti-Soviet and anti-Communist Intelligence operations.

What he did for the Russians before the war during his hobnobbing with General Franco and the Nazis is not quite clear; neither did his work in various Intelligence agencies during the war seem to have much connection with the Russians. He was chiefly concerned with Spain, Portugal and North Africa. In retrospect he explains, however, that:

My connection with the Secret Intelligence Service must be seen against my prior total commitment to the Soviet Union which I regarded then, as I do now, the inner fortress of the world movement.

He also explains why Stalinism, even at its worst, did not deter him; there was much he did not like about Stalinism but, on balance, it was still better than anything else:

And [today] it is a sobering thought that, but for the power of the Soviet Union . . . the Old World, if not the whole world, would now be ruled by Hitler and Hirohito.

He seems to have been unenthusiastic about the war against Germany before the Russians entered it:

It often appeared that the British wanted a simple return to the status quo before Hitler, to a Europe comfortably dominated by Britain and France through the medium of reactionary governments just strong enough to keep their own people in order and uphold the cordon sanitaire against the Soviet Union.

Hence the failure of the SOE, the Secret Operations Executive, to stir up any revolutionary uprisings against the Nazi occupation; the real Resistance movements did not get going until the Russians infused some life into them. In the minds of the European masses, according to Philby, British Intelligence was too closely associated with the same type of men who had betrayed Ethiopia, Spain and Czechoslovakia. That "all these people" had no idea of Russia is illustrated in Philby's story by prophecies among British Intelligence chiefs that the Russians would be defeated in 1941 in "three weeks, or three months at most."

Philby became particularly useful to the Russians in 1945 when he was appointed head of a new SIS section "in charge of anti-Communist and anti-Soviet counter-intelligence," and especially in 1949 when he was at last allowed to enter "the Lion's Den" as SIS representative in Washington—as "the top British secret service officer working in liaison with the CIA and the FBI." He speaks with supreme irony of the comic-opera attempts to set up a "democratic" government in Albania, and of the rivalry between the British and Americans in trying to infiltrate their agents into potentially disloyal parts of the Soviet Union, such as Georgia and the Ukraine. None of these attempts produced the slightest results. The old Menshevik leader, Jordania, was proven to have had as little following in Georgia as the Ukrainian Nazi, Stepan Bandera, was shown to have had in the Ukraine. In 1956, Bandera (a great favorite of the British) was mysteriously assassinated in Munich; Philby suggests that the CIA killed him off—presumably to annoy his British patrons. Could not, in reality, Soviet agents have done it, too?

There is also, in Philby's story, a comic passage on the NTS, the Munich-based émigré organization which was at first subsidized by the British; but whether because these had no money or, more probably, because the NTS proved completely useless, the Americans, with money to burn, took it over. They keep spending several millions of dollars a year on it still. There is little to show, however, that any of the money goes much beyond Munich, except for the unfortunate Gerald Brooks, who is still in a Soviet jail for having agreed to smuggle some leaflets into Russia, provided the NTS paid his hotel bills!

To American readers, the chapters on Washington will be of particular interest. Philby seems to have, professionally, a considerable respect for Bedell Smith, then head of the CIA who was, apparently, the first to have smelled a rat in the case of Philby himself. On the other hand, J. Edgar Hoover is to him a constant object of professional contempt and personal ridicule, "a prima donna." Maybe the FBI is all right for checking crime in the United States, but "its counter-espionage is conspicuous for failure. . . ." Philby writes:

Hoover did not catch Maclean or Burgess; he did not catch Fuchs, and he would not have caught the rest if the British had not caught Fuchs and worked brilliantly on his tangled emotions; he did not catch Lonsdale; he did not catch Abel for years . . . He did not even catch me. If there was a bubble reputation, it is Hoover's.

Altogether, Hoover's blanket methods and ruthless authoritarianism are "the wrong weapons for the subtle world of intelligence." But, according to Philby, Hoover has a superb filing system:

The overt record shows that a distressing number of Congressmen have pasts that do not bear minute scrutiny. As for the covert record held by Hoover, the mere existence of the huge FBI filing system has deterred many from attacking Hoover's totalitarian empire.

What a pity Philby should tell us only about the secret services in America and England, and nothing—strictly nothing—about the NKVD and the Soviet Secret Services for whom he devoted the thirty best years of his life, and with whose machinery he may be even more familiar than he is with Mr. Hoover's card indexes!

Why did Philby, a member of the British ruling class, become a Soviet spy? Two dates stick out: 1933, when he enlisted as a spy, was also the year Hitler set up his dictatorship in Germany; and 1949, when Philby reached the top of the espionage ladder, was the peak year of the cold war. Philby was never rich. He seems, indeed, to have done it all out of conviction, not for money. However, the impression this book leaves is that greater even than Philby's devotion to communism was his hatred of the Baldwins and Chamberlains before the war, and of the Trumans and Bevins after the war. And all the SOE and MI-5 and MI-6 characters he describes are made to look a pretty phony lot. Though not well written, the book still has some amusing satirical touches. Philby's story tells us much about other people, but unfortunately too little about himself.

dier attempting to rape your sister?" "I should try," Strachey answered with wicked ambiguity, "and interpose my own body." Atheistic, diseased, loveless as he was, he avoided the profundities of pessimism, preferring the shallower water of a witty skeptic. As a result, he made himself a burden to no one. Not even death could intimidate him. "If this is dying," he announced from his death-bed, "then I don't think much of it."

It was fame that he lived for, and at length he won it, with Eminent Victorians—first published in 1918, when Strachey was 38. Then followed Queen Victoria (in 1921) and several lesser achievements. Strachey, as is well known, transformed biography, giving it a "becoming brevity," dramatic unity and gusto, and the force and freedom of a "cynical point of view." Turning his skepticism against the Victorians, ". . . he struck the note of ridicule," Cyril Connolly said, "which the whole war-weary generation wanted to hear. . . ." Yet it was not long before his reputation fell under a shadow—his methods were "questionable," he caricatured, he set an example (though this his detractors could scarcely admit) too brilliant to follow. But now it would seem that the shadow is passing; and here, as if to celebrate the new day, is a 1200-page biography of the great biographer himself.

Michael Holroyd's Lytton Strachey, however, is only another cloud. As a biography, it is soggy with detail, heavy with observation, pallid and unshapely; and as an assessment of Strachey's art, it is indefinite and noncommittal.

Needless to say, Holroyd does not preserve a becoming brevity; yet what makes his book so tiresome is not simply its length but its prose and an unseemly eagerness to pass judgment. Time and again one is brought to a halt by the sheer awfulness of the writing: "Now, buried alive in the towering edifice of Lancaster Gate, a vague and universal feeling of unhappiness preserved him dimly, like a dried-up flower on a pad of blotting paper"—this from a writer who condescends to Strachey's prose. Everything is said at maximum length and with maximum limpness. As for Holroyd's eagerness to judge, let Strachey show an opinion of Bertrand Russell or Blake or George Moore or Prince Albert and immediately Holroyd steps in to tell us exactly where Strachey was wrong and just what we should think about these figures. And meanwhile Strachey himself can hardly be said to come into focus; he is, as it were, diffused like a blur through Holroyd's book.

Even with what he thinks of as the help of his "hitherto . . . unknown portrait," Holroyd manages to be obtuse about Strachey's work. He speaks, for

Strachey Diffused and Blurred

LYTTON STRACHEY: Vol. I, The Unknown Years (1880-1910), 475 pp. Vol. II, The Years of Achievement (1910-1932), 754 pp. By Michael Holroyd. Holt, Rinehart & Winston. $21.95 the set.

CALVIN BEDIENT

Mr. Bedient teaches literature at Emory University, Atlanta, Ga.

Lytton Strachey, rejecting the "two fat volumes" of biographical tradition, wrote thin and now famous biographies of Queen Victoria and other "eminent" Victorians; and thinness, it might be said, was his destiny. He struck all who met him as preternaturally long and narrow, like a caricature encountered in an illustrated Dickens. There was insufficient room in his torso (so a doctor informed him) for his "lungs, liver and lights"; and, collapsing frequently, he dragged his long length about England and Europe, searching for health. Moreover, "his atmosphere," said a certain sexual rival, "is as thin as his body—he is merely learned and scholarly but fundamentally empty. . . ." Thin and empty he was, in relation to women; but in men, especially those of a heroic cast, he sometimes found, for an hour or a week, a release and an expansion: "To be able," he once said longingly, "to melt into a body literally twice as big as one's own."

Even as a lover Strachey was forced to subsist on the thin fare of hope and disappointment. He loved a Cambridge undergraduate named Duckworth: Duckworth, however, fell in love with Maynard Keynes. Strachey then fell in love with Duncan Grant; but Duncan Grant soon fell in love with—Duckworth. Then, just as it seemed that Duncan might come round to Strachey again, Duncan fell in love with—Maynard Keynes. And so it went, Strachey almost always on the side lines, looking on, like an amorous mantis, at loves and lives fuller than his own.

Yet, in spite of all of this, there was strength and buoyancy in Strachey—courage, integrity, wit, a campy light-heartedness. To give his thinness style, he affected a sombrero and cape, and wore golden earrings. He was given to startling bursts of shrill laughter. We have a glimpse of him tottering about in Lady Ottoline Morrell's high-heeled shoes—"with feet," she said, "looking so absurdly small . . . both of us . . . getting more fantastic and gay." And there was steel beneath the silliness. During World War I, Strachey was a conscientious objector: "I am convinced," he said, "that the whole system by which it is sought to settle international disputes by force is profoundly evil. . . ." "Then tell me, Mr. Strachey," demanded a military officer during certain formal proceedings, "what would you do if you saw a German sol-instance, of "Lytton's inability to convey pathos"; but unlike Holroyd's own biography, Strachey's books often grip and give a twist to the heart.

And, beyond these matters, is Eminent Victorians properly described as a "prolonged onslaught upon . . . evangelicalism"? Where it has any real uniformity, it is, rather, an exposure of the alloy of egoism in religious or altruistic lives. Nor is anyone likely to rest content with Holroyd's faint conclusion that Eminent Victorians occupies some undefined "anomalous position in modern literature." Let us ignore, for the moment, the vague vastnesses of "modern literature"; let us judge Strachey simply as a biographer. In that category he is something better than anomalous; he is triumphant—and in his portraits of Cardinal Manning, Florence Nightingale and Queen Victoria, he is even more, he is supreme. What a delight he is; and how he brings the dead alive again. True, he lacked detachment; he asserted his own peculiar sense of the facts. Yet despite all his minor falsifications, Strachey never misleads, for—the preface to Eminent Victorians aside—he never pretends to scientific detachment. What he always presents is obviously his own very plausible and illuminating view.

Holroyd's Lytton Strachey is biography of a different kind; for Holroyd may indeed lay claim to scientific detachment. But the result is a very lifeless portrait. Undoubtedly, his book purveys much valuable information—but gracelessly, without defined interest or point. It is not the biography that Lytton Strachey deserves.

another Victorian schoolmaster, was a pederast, do we need a thumbnail biography of each and every one of his obscure lovers (with photos where available)—and indeed of their lovers in turn? And how fair is it to treat anybody's sex life, whether straight or queer, in such unrelenting isolation from the rest of his existence—as Croft-Cooke insists upon doing? It is especially at this point that something like a question of professional discretion arises. Doubtless a biographer who meant to do a thorough job would have to let us know at some point that Lewis Carroll was (alas!) a dirty old man. But has Croft-Cooke any right to recall the man's habits simply to fill us in on who the little girls were and what Carroll did with them up in his photographic studio—only that and nothing more?

Indeed, at times Croft-Cooke betrays an almost suspicious passion for sifting the historical rubble heap down to its most trivial transgressors. Was it really necessary for anyone to drag poor Edward Cracroft Lefroy (who . . . ?) out of merciful and well-deserved obscurity (and to quote his sonnets yet!; surely the most god-awful verse ever written in our language) so that it might be documented that the old man was a homosexual?

In fields as well-plowed and as thickly

Late Victorian Eroticism

FEASTING WITH PANTHERS: A New Consideration of Some Late Victorian Writers. By Rupert Croft-Cooke. Holt, Rinehart & Winston. 308 pp. $6.50.

THEODORE ROSZAK

Mr. Roszak, an associate professor of history, is chairman of the History of Western Culture Program at California State College, Hayward. He edited and contributed to The Dissenting Academy (Pantheon).

that poor Swinburne, like many another Victorian schoolboy, was cursed with le vice Anglais, do we really gain anything more by sorting through every last algalogian fantasy he bestowed upon the whipping block at Eton? After we have learned that J. A. Symonds, like many

Is there a point at which historical research laps over into unredeemed gossip? Or is the scholarly nose privileged to poke itself into anybody's business which happens to have gotten itself enmeshed in a surviving document or two? If Rupert Croft-Cooke's sexological survey of that sickly sweet generation of English aesthetes that runs from Swinburne to Wilde just barely avoids the charge of fortuitous scandal-mongering, it is only because the personalities with which he is dealing went to a deal of trouble to obtrude their bizarre style of eroticism upon the public consciousness, and often with an arrogance that hinted intimidat-ingly of superior sensibility. Perhaps then they deserve the good irreverent drubbing Croft-Cooke is out to give them. He is at pains to tell us that this "bevy of catamites . . . needs cutting down to size." But do the likes of J. A. Symonds or Walter Pater or Ernest Dowson any longer bulk that large? Even the current rage among the Bohemian hip for Aubrey Beardsley's sirupy cartooning is a tongue-in-cheek infatuation with the quaintly camp, and hardly a matter of deep and considered taste.

Yet does the muck that Croft-Cooke has so assiduously collected require so fine-toothed a raking? Once we know is "a writer with a fine eye, a fine ear—and heart—Mr. Brossard has caught much of the best in Spain, and much, much more of the worst.... He converses at great length with angry young students, angry young workers, angry young priests, and angry Basques.... His slices of Spanish life, like slices from a good, pungent chorizo sausage, are delectable.... A hot, angry exposé of what's wrong in Spain."

Photo by Marvin E. Newman

Chandler Brossard

—BENJAMIN WELLES, Saturday Review $4.00

THE SPANISH SCENE

THE VIKING PRESS

New York 10022

THE NATION

a weekly journal which has believed for 103 years that the quality of our national discourse shapes the quality of our national life—and that that discourse becomes more vital, not less, in time of national crisis—

offers FREE with each NEW full year subscription your choice of the following books:

LBJ LAMPOONED: Cartoon Criticism of
Lyndon B. Johnson, intro. by Jules Feiffer ☐

BITTER GREETINGS: The Scandal of the
Military Draft, by NATION contributor
Jean Carper ☐

THE ACCIDENTAL PRESIDENT,
by NATION Washington correspondent Robert Sherrill ☐

THE LOGIC OF WITHDRAWAL,
by NATION contributor Howard Zinn ☐

THE FERVENT YEARS: The Story of the Group Theatre of the 30s with a new chapter
on Postwar Theatre, by NATION drama critic
Harold Clurman ☐

THE DESTRUCTION OF CALIFORNIA,
by NATION contributor Raymond F. Dasmann ☐

SCIENCE AND HUMAN VALUES,
by NATION contributor J. Bronowski ☐

AIR WAR: VIETNAM,
by Frank Harvey ☐

UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED,
by NATION contributor Ralph Nader ☐

THE NEW STUDENT LEFT,
ed. by Mitchell Cohen and Dennis Hale ☐

FREE MEN AND FREE MARKETS—
Proposed: A Guaranteed Income,
by NATION contributor Robert Theobald ☐

Clip and send this coupon to:

The NATION, 333 6th Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014.

☐ I'll join you for the year (48 issues). Enclosed is $10. I've checked the book I want.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6.
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Pan-America; $2 foreign)

Name

Street

City State Zip

N 5-20

The good fight
is now in

THE NATION

—Why not
join now?

documented as modern English (and American) history, the temptation to husband every last shred of evidence is bound to be strong. And Croft-Cooke is not alone in yielding to it. If there are reasons why we must violate historical privacies, surely the task can be done with some professional tact. I am willing to agree that there is some merit in Croft-Cooke's effort to show up the sheer giddiness that lay behind the voluptuary attitudinizing of his eminent Victorians; it is sadly instructive to see how passion can work to soften the best minds.

It ought to serve as a warning to all the literati of our own day who would amaze or transport by virtue of their erotic pretensions. What will it all look like fifty years hence, beneath some cold-blooded biographer's clinical gaze?

venna, entranced like a woman in orgasm. Durrell echoes not only his poem of a Levantine tart and the Ravenna mosaic but the prose of Gibbon's story of the Empress, so full of half-disguised erotic excitement. Later, Durrell's handling of her as a cinema star is synthetic, but she dies convincingly enough.

The plot (an inventor is trapped by an immense, mysterious corporation whose minions act much more like Kabul moneychangers than modern detergent-soaked executives) is worthy of an early Fritz Lang picture and would have been great for Peter Lorre, Conrad Veidt, Emil Jannings and Pola Negri.

A Steady Note of Mockery

TUNC. By Lawrence Durrell. E. P. Dutton & Co. 360 pp. $6.95.

KENNETH REXROTH

Mr. Rexroth, a frequent Nation contributor, is the author most recently of The Heart's Garden/The Garden's Heart (Pym-Randall Press).

Lawrence Durrell has not received enough credit as the founder of a fashion, the revival among intellectuals of the plots and local color of Sax Rohmer and Talbot Mundy, the pseudo-Oriental romance.

There is a difference. Nobody imagines that Fu Manchu ever existed, or even that Robbe-Grillet's recent Hong Kong collapsible fantasy bore any relation to reality. The tales of The Alexandria Quartet, and Tunc, "the first volume of a double decker," as Durrell calls it, are supposed to be for real. Life is supposed to be like that in the mysterious East. Is it? Has Talbot Mundy come true?

Durrell's is a special, comic vision of the universe, a bitterly satirical one, too—which is not the same thing. All this leprous lechery and Levantine plotting and overcolored prose is a form of self-satire. The irony is consummate; no one, least of all the author, can ever be sure what is to be taken seriously and what not—a dangerous proceeding that sometimes no longer skirts the edges, but tumbles over into pure corn. Night scenes for instance seem to get the best of Durrell—he becomes careless and speaks of the young moon rising late (sic!, as they say) and "the river which mirrored the opal-studded floors of the dark heaven powdered by stardust" (sic 'em!, as they say).

Tunc pushes harder against the adult reader's "wilful suspension of disbelief" than even the most overrich parts of The Alexandria Quartet.

Justine, with her name from Sade and Swinburne, and her face from Beardsley, is a simple Gretchen beside this new crop of girls, ladies straight out of Klimt and Scheele, with the manners and morals of the radioactive bikini-clothed heroines of spicy science fiction. Durrell's heroine may be a schizophrenic billionaire with twelve toes and weak with nameless diseases, but she can ride all a summer's day at falconry in the Turkish hills, or ride all a winter's day through deep snow in the English countryside, and then screw all night in a sleeping bag.

The best of the girls is the little Greek whore who becomes a great movie star. Durrell's description of her young days when she was just an innocent prostitute recalls Durrell's beautiful poem, "Theodora"—which certainly is convincingly real—as well as, quite deliberately, the Empress Theodora herself, her exothalamic face staring out of the mosaic at Ra-

What does it all mean? The innocent will take it seriously, at face value, human relationships out of Ouida by Evergreen Review, the artistic prose out of Edgar Saltus and Arthur Machen, the passages of deep thought out of Henry Miller. They will miss the steady note of mockery—of reader, characters and author. It is irony that distinguishes Durrell from Robbe-Grillet, who has none whatever. Le Maison des Rendezvous is trash: Tunc is comedy.

Who are these people really? Durrell in a final note points to hidden echoes of his first novel—The Black Book. They are the lumpen Bohemians of his London youth and the hungry tarts of prewar

Cuba today

★ "The most discerning, sensitive, and faithful portrait of contemporary Cuba since Warren Miller's 90 Miles From Home . . . There is no other book like it."—LEE LOCKWOOD

★ "A thoroughly charming, affectionate, but nonetheless critical account of day-to-day country life in Cuba, disclosing a style and humanity that will undoubtedly surprise American readers, confuse the press and cause panic in the State Department."

—JULES FEIFFER

★ "An intimate, amusing, dispassionate account of exactly what the revolution has meant."

—SIR HERBERT READ

IN THE FIST OF THE REVOLUTION

JOSE YGLESIAS

$5.95, now at your bookstore

PANTHEON

Athens dressed in sables and diamonds and Bond Street tailoring in the age of affluence.

And, moreover, of course it is actually happening. Miller and Durrell are rich and candidates for the Nobel Prize, a tart or two have become movie stars, a few pawnbrokers are now bankers. Although high finance is not run as in Tunc even in the Levant, Madison Avenue is. The world is being Bohemianized. And furthermore—the precise world Durrell describes has come to life in Athens and Istanbul. It is called the CIA.

The Way To Get at Spain

THE SPANISH SCENE. By Chandler Brossard. The Viking Press. 113 pp. $4.

DANIEL TALBOT

Mr. Talbot, owner of the New Yorker Theatre, and producer of the film, Point of Order, has spent considerable time in Spain. He has reviewed for a number of publications.

Claude Levi-Strauss opens his book Tristes Tropiques with this line: "Travel and travellers are two things I loathe—and yet here I am, all set to tell the story of my expeditions." The compulsion ("and yet here I am") to describe a foreign culture can serve as a sentimental way of manufacturing affection for one's native country (as in Mark Twain) or, as in the case of Chandler Brossard's The Spanish Scene, it can be an apocalyptic mode of understanding one's disgust with America today. As such, The Spanish Scene is not so much a book about the Spanish scene as a gifted novelist's predicament in explaining why he is so bugged by life in his own country.

Spain is of course a tourist's dream. Its dramatic landscapes, benign weather, cheap prices, seductive populace, its differentness from all other Western societies while being a Western country—all these things will do as a magnet. The tragedy of this mass tourism is a cliché that makes

Pop art out of truth, at the same time that it tends to turn Spaniards into Pop art. English, French, Germans, Americans, Swedes, by now Russians, are visiting by the millions, and what on earth is a poor Spaniard to make of all this? Consider the prospect of an Andalusian farmer watching a Bentley tearing toward Fuen-girola, his eyes moving like tracking shots. Or a cultivated Madrileño with $40 to his name in a smartly tailored suit talking T.S. Eliot in the Café Gijón with an American professor who makes $15,000 a year. Or twenty Germans, with Zeissess slung around their chubby necks clicking away at cracked pastel plastered walls in Mojacar, while a kid walks his donkey home. It becomes apparent that perhaps it might be more interesting to make demonic interpretations of the tourist and forget the Spaniard who, by now, would seem to be not so much a Spaniard as a bewildered onlooker caught up in a new, bizarre interpersonal situation. One thinks of Ortega y Gasset's having endlessly nagged his countrymen to join modern Europe, and the irony of it is enough to make one weep. Since travel as a culturally expanding process has been virtually replaced by cold cash catting around we infer that it becomes at

SERENADE TO MY DERELICTS

Flaming pigeons fall
through my bloodstream.
There is a dark night
inside me and rain scattering like blackened seeds.
The pigeons dive through the weather,
seeking the shelter
of arches, diameters
of doorways, cramming sudden passages and congested corridors of heart attack.
One falls,
his wings
sputter into darkness,
singeing the night
with a gathering of ashes
in my throat.
Even if my tongue
is a burnt-out wick
there's light enough from their flying.

But in the city
far below someone is beating
on the doors,
shouting with a muffled voice to let him in,
and the pigeons rise
like a combustion,
the red flames
of their feathers
fluttering shadows
through the tunnels
that are beating
with their flight
and the hidden dynamos that pound
inside the walls.
Their only refuge
is my heart's cathedral with its carmine rugs, and that is shaken
high above
by windy organ pipes and dynamos
so loud
the pigeons
only stay

a moment,
seeing the figure beating on the altar with his fists
before they circle through the city
once again,
avoiding rain and darkness
with their fires.

They arrive and depart:
pigeons
everywhere,
flaring through the darkness
like a multitude of torches that flicker through the city's rusty streets, disturbing
jellied nests and mildew and lost men in pulled-down hats who stammer and lurch against the rain.

MORTON MARCUS

least tricky to understand or explain the authentic values and sentiments of such heavily touristed countries as Spain. We can now classify George Orwell's Homage to Catalonia and Gerald Brenan's South From Granada as 19th-century commentaries.

The merit of Brossard's book is not so much what he reveals about Spanish ferment in 1967 as in the way he gets at it. An American journalist in Spain in 1967 with any kind of sensibility can be like an escaped convict daydreaming of his past prison life. In this short work Brossard talks to people from all walks of life. Each dialogue becomes a short set piece revolving about one or two ideas, the essence of which is captured by some sharp statement or observation. These pieces are alternated with paragraph-long "shots" of street scenes. The effect is somewhat like a Godard scenario in which the documentary scene approaches poetry while the "made-up stuff" looks like newsreel footage.

The Spanish Scene reminds me of two French documentaries seen here a few years ago—Chris Marker's Le Joli Mai and Jean Rouch and Edgar Morin's Chronicles of a Summer. Marker's film tries to capture the Parisian scene in the lovely Parisian month of May, 1962. The Algerian War has just ended and life seems more promising. Marker interviews people from all walks of life, captures them with "their defenses down." Rouch and Morin (who are both ethnologists by profession) interview a group of people in the course of a summer. Their theme is: what does life mean to you right now: what is it you want out of life? etc. In both instances, political anthropology approaches poetry. Similarly, Brossard asks people from all walks of 1967 Spanish life what their Spanishness means to them at such a critical moment in world history. The responses vary, but the net result is the same: malaise over thirty-one years of Franco's rule (and who wouldn't be tired of one man for thirty-one years, even if he were a good guy?), pride in their culture, scorn for the tourist hordes, empathy for the youthful revolts the world over.

A businessman says to Brossard:

It is possible to live better in Spain than anywhere else in Europe, better even than in America. Here it is possible to belong to oneself instead of to a system, as it is in England and America. Your power and prosperity are useless. You Americans and English are constantly checking in with the fantastic system that depersonalizes you. Not the Spaniard. He is truly a free man.

A government official tells the writer: "A Spaniard will give you everything he has, but not his identity. And that is what upsets foreigners the most." And a writer in Madrid indicates: "I am not alienated from my culture. I am my culture . . . The Spaniard asks, Who am I? The American asks, Why am I me?" The prostitute deals with freedom in this way: "So here I am . . . But now I get paid. And I do not have to scrub floors or listen to a man complaining all the time." It comes as a revelation that there are 30,000 Communist Party members in Madrid and ten times that all over the country. Priests and students are in revolt. Does the bourgeois then become more bourgeois? Flaubert was the first to say that when a merchant closes his shop at night his brain goes blank. An underground priest tells Brossard: "What is encouraging is that some of the middle class, among them business people, sympathize with this social revolution and even contribute money to it, secretly of course. The bourgeois wants a new life, a free and dynamic life."

The linguistic problem implicit in this book stems from the modern vogue of revolutionary rhetoric, and a heartbreaking dilemma it is. As most men become politicized beyond the wildest expectations of George Orwell, the impulse to exegete the meaning of "freedom" becomes stronger. Structures indeed must change. How? A society reveals its ugliness by its acts. We speak, all over the world, of man having to alter his consciousness (and conscience), of the historical necessity of violence (by which we understand the ultimate reification of man). Mass media moves in on this new rhetoric. Ortega y Gasset's "el señorito satisfecho" grows his hair longer, frugs, and admits that his work has been a fraud. The fact that his rhetoric may be rational and humane is beside the point. We are in the final stage of sin, language qua language. The Spanish Scene moves around this problem by poeticizing discourse. In this way Brossard captures real people below the surface of language. We enter the province of the novelist. And, as in most instances, the artistic impulse is more reliable than the journalistic one.

Book Marks

SARA BLACKBURN

SUPERWORM. By George Deaux. Simon & Schuster. 252 pp. $5.50.

Maybe it's really not too late for a novel about a history professor who dyes his long underwear into a black uniform, adopts a racy side-kick, and sets out to, among other things, screw up the plumbing of a right-wing pizza factory. But Superworm is a superdrag because George Deaux is worried that his reader

An authoritative account of the explosive forces that touched off the third Arab-Israeli war

ISRAEL AND WORLD POLITICS

Roots of the Third Arab-Israeli War

by THEODORE DRAPER

Author of Abuse of Power

"Mr. Draper of the Hoover Institution on War, Revolution and Peace at Stanford University is concerned . . . with the events leading to the June war in the Middle East. He has tried to answer the question of 'how and why it came about,' and to describe the 'peculiar combination of internal and external forces' that set off the war. While he sets the stage by providing a brief historical background, he concentrates on the events of May and June 1967 and the role of the protagonists, the United States, Soviet Russia, and the United Nations in these events. His conclusions, especially those about what he calls 'war by proxy,' are thought provoking."—Library Journal

"A sober, solid, and critical analyst."—Wall Street Journal

Paper edition $2.25 • Cloth edition $5.75

THE VIKING PRESS 625 Madison Avenue, New York 10022

won't get the point; he keeps holding up little signs that say "outrageous!" or "humorously but touchingly futile." Mr. Deaux always has too much to say about too little, and the reader is often painfully aware that he's witnessing a waste of talent, as well as a hipsterism that's just a little out of date (why mention assigning Ginsberg and Burroughs to a history class unless you think it's way out?). It's as if five-year-old Feiffer political cartoons were being offered to a 1968 audience which is now embarrassed to remember that it laughed at them. Superworm's moral may be that the system can both withstand and smoothly absorb direct action even though it may totally destroy those who initiate action, but the novel boomerangs into a brief for the assertion that frustrated and ineffectual peace creeps, no matter how witty their fantasies, are pretty dull company.

FEEL FREE. By David Slavitt. Delacorte Press. 242 pp. $4.95.

Feel Free is a Jewish soap opera with Malamudic ambitions. The situation is promising: Bernie Lazarus, husband and father, goes bankrupt in fabrics, and welcomes the event as a chance at a new life. He'll lower his standard of living, and plunge now into the freedom from materialism that he's always longed for. But Ruth (you know Ruth) doesn't want to give up the house; she's ashamed in front of her own millionaire family at Bernie's fall; she likes nice things. Bernie, intent on his dream, leaves her, and starts living with old girl friend Rose (she's left rich Charlie, always neglecting her, talking about deals). They get an apartment on 14th Street, but things don't work out. Rose goes back to Charlie, but Ruth still likes nice things, can't see it Bernie's way even though he's proved he's somebody by tipping off her family to one of Charlie's big stock deals. (Rose told him about it in bed). A tragic and prophetic ending gets slapped on. There's a curious deadness about this novel. Mr. Slavitt strains for a style that doesn't come naturally; and it's hard to care about his characters, especially for Lazarus (get it?) himself, who just doesn't have the nobility with which the author keeps trying to harness him.

THE ARTIST TYPE. By Brian Glanville. Coward-McCann. 192 pp. $4.50.

Brian Glanville's tenth novel is about what publishers persist in calling "the sex game" (is that anything like the marriage game, or the pervert game?). Set in London, it's about Geoff (a former actor, he is, reluctantly, in the ad game), who is torn between two women; dull, pretty, bourgeois Jane, who loves him, supports him and marries him, and rich, beautiful, sexy, cruel Audrey, who uses him. Naturally, he can't stop panting after Audrey. The book doesn't pretend to be any more serious than it is (medium), and, like a good Lelouche film, it has a verve, momentum and immediacy that are completely absorbing.

THE ARTIFICIAL TRAVELER. By Warren Fine. Coward-McCann. 255 pp. $4.95.

It's by now old hat to book people that unless first novels are heavily promoted by their publishers, they get shockingly little review attention. If, in addition to this handicap, they contain material which challenges and confuses the reviewer or makes him at all uneasy about their content, they stand an excellent chance of being almost totally ignored. (It is delightful, in a sadistic way, to consider what would happen today if early review copies of, say, a Ulysses, by an unknown author, began arriving for the first time, unaccompanied either by explanatory flap copy or advance raves from literary types.) This combination of circumstances probably accounts for the ringing silence which has greeted the publication (in January) of The Artificial Traveler. Warren Fine's novel is about the godliness of some beautiful and possessed people in the Midwest. I found its Biblical allusions formidable, perplexing and a little pretentious, but Mr. Fine's prose style, and the intensity of his talent for character and narrative are so far superior to those of most first—or simply, most—novelists who get published today, that to miss reading his book would be a shame.

Public Speech

A CONTINUING JOURNEY. By Archibald MacLeish. Houghton Mifflin Co. 374 pp. $5.95.

SHERMAN PAUL

Mr. Paul teaches English at the University of Iowa. His most recent book is Edmund Wilson: A Study of Literary Vocation in Our Time (University of Illinois Press). He is also the author of Louis Sullivan: An Architect in American Thought (Prentice-Hall).

The title of this new collection of Archibald MacLeish's essays and addresses fits exactly the occasion of this work and its themes. MacLeish's journey, for a long stretch of his life, has been, as he says, "continuous in its direction." It is appropriate, therefore, to record its most recent stage—the years from the end of World War II to the present—in a book that can be placed beside the earlier landmarks of A Time To Speak (1941) and A Time To Act (1943).

MacLeish's journey is over farther reaches of time than the contemporary era; it begins, historically, several centuries back in the collapse of old certainties, but it moves, as he sees it, in the inevitable direction of human life, ever forward toward "greater and greater individuality." The movement of mankind with which he allies himself and for which he speaks is toward "the fulfillment of consciousness," a fulfillment already achieved perhaps by his heroes Job and Prometheus, for it is "an individual, not a herd, achievement." Nothing collective, institutional, communitarian compromises this destiny, which is also spiritual, in the largest sense "our mysterious journey," and, in the more immediate example of the intrepid modern artist, a "far journey" into the interior world of self.

As occasions of this journey the essays and addresses have for background a grand and perilous landscape. Their themes, not unexpectedly, are invariably profound: the destiny of man and the destiny of the Republic, and the corruptions and failures of the "human heart" that, more than anything, according to MacLeish, jeopardize these high courses.

All of them testify to his choice of singleness and duty, to the moral need and imperative that he feels gives him his public mission: and all "address" us—address our lapse of moral courage and human faith, our flawed individualism—and speak hearteningly to us. The title of the initial group "The Idea of Man" comes from Valéry's remark that "all politics presuppose an idea of man," and this provides the way into the specifically political sections, "State of the Union"

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION

5-20-68

111 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Pan-America; $2 foreign)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

nd "The Second Civil War," and those actions no less political in import, "Writers in a Wrong Time," in which he presents again the issue of the writer's responsibility raised in The Irresponsibles (1940), and "Teaching and Harvard," in which he treats the necessary and remedial work to be done by literary studies in a time when the idea of man is diminished.

There is little here with which one wishes to take exception, for what is here belongs to the body of verities that comprise a noble human—and, as MacLeish insists, American—faith. Who would argue the tragic view of man given us by the Greeks and the equally wonderful view of his grandeur presented by Rilke in "Archaischer Torso Apollos"? (Rilke and Yeats are his supreme modern poets.) Who would argue the contemporary dissociation of sensibility and the uses of art and education in restoring man's wholeness? And since this human faith is inseparable from the American faith, who would argue, especially when MacLeish denies the sharp questioning of our history by Niebuhr and Lippmann, the American dream of man, the Jeffersonian declaration of his inalienable rights? Finally, now, in the crisis of our time, when MacLeish sees the erosion of that faith in the widespread willingness to forgo the hardships of freedom for the transitory security of authority, who would argue the fact that we have betrayed our past and shown that the foremost need of the Republic is "some renewal of belief in the spiritual possibilities of man"?

I LIFT A GLASS,

*in a sweeping movement into the light.
My fingers are magnified
by the mass of water between them.
Light is broken,
the spectrum spreads
above the belly of my index finger Shadows deepen in the joints gripping the transparent substance, fingertip faces staring into it into me; I lie
inside the body
of my own hand, locked in my own grip,
wrinkles of my own skin flattened against my embryo breathing without a sound looking straight into the crotch between my fingers my legs up there a little soft concave shadow, an opening?*

LENNART BRUCE

The essential liberalism of this secular faith (a liberalism well characterized by Richard Chase's "conservative impulse, radical idea") accounts for the most authentic moments of the record: MacLeish's early and forthright stand against the anti-Communist diplomacy of containment and his prophetic assessment of the moral damage a merely negative policy would do, and his equally courageous stand against McCarthyism. (In a farewell speech to his colleagues in the Department of English at Harvard, he recalls the unceremonious but splendid occasion in Sanders Theatre when the faculty commended "the courage of the University administration in standing, wholly alone and without measurable public support, against the most vicious menace to intellectual freedom in the history of Harvard. . . .")

Still, one is unhappy with this book and must take exception to its pervasive gentility, to the manner of its speech and the tone, which make addresses of almost all of these thirty-eight pieces and none of them satisfactory confrontations of our political troubles or essays that truly bear witness. A Continuing Journey may be "a private history" for its author, but for us, to borrow the title of the book of poems that announced his public role, it is "public speech." It is speech, moreover, little altered from that of his earlier addresses and sounding now, out of habit perhaps as much as ceremonial demand and certainly because the speech of a new generation powerfully countervails it, like an ancestral voice. Not a voice engaged enough to challenge us, for its occasions of commencement, dedication and tributes were not especially challenging, but stock occasions rather for crying us down in order to raise up and console us.

In these public pieces, MacLeish is serving a Republic that looms ever larger in his speech as it recedes from him—no wonder he speaks of "betrayal." He is trying to affirm what is hard to affirm and so increasingly turns to "the words of the founders and defenders." He calls us to move forward but his exhortation fails because he is himself looking backward and has little besides exhortation and comfort-making argument to give us—and the old faith will not do the work of practical proposals. What Hemingway (celebrated here) said about embarrassment over big words applies; after a while "America," as MacLeish wrote in another context in "American Letter," becomes neither place nor people but a "great word," a holy of holies before which to perform the rites of patriotism.

One misses in MacLeish the candor of full personal exposure; his public speech is the speech of matters already public.

He chooses the authority of the public rather than the private man; and he is not as convincing as those who choose the latter, Isaac Rosenfeld for example, a writer of this period in MacLeish's journey whose collected pieces in An Age of Enormity sound depths unacknowledged by him. His patriotism is unassailable, but it lacks the lively and certifying ring of the following passage from one of his equally ardent Jeffersonian compatriots, Paul Goodman: "I am walking briskly down 23rd Street after having finished Growing Up Absurd—I am carrying the last chapter to the publisher, 'The Missing Community'—and suddenly I find myself whistling The Star-Spangled Banner!, confidently fighting for my country against the system that is destroying her. . . . This book, and most of the rest of what I have bravely done this year . . . have sprung directly from reading Washington's Circular Letter. That did fire me and gave me something to do."

And most distressing in MacLeish's work is not the pretentiousness of profundity, the crisis-mode, or the salvation to be had by faith alone but the alienation of his own speech. The public voice of these addresses is curiously personal. Listen to the opening sentences of a piece on the fight to desegregate the University of Mississippi: "Most things, public

WE'RE YOURS for free!

The next time you plan to collect signatures for a "protest" ad, let a professional advise you how and in what media to spend your money.

CONTEMPORARY COMMUNICATION Inc. is a non-commercial advertising and public relations agency, the only one of its kind. You've probably seen our ads and press releases for the Civil Liberties Legal Defense Fund, the Medical Committee for Human Rights, and others.

Our work and counsel won't cost you a cent because the agency fee is paid by the newspaper, magazine, or other medium in which the ad appears. We will therefore, plan, write, design, coordinate, arrange for follow-up interviews in the press, TV and radio, advise and worry—FOR FREE. You can be sure your opponents are using all the professional help they can get. Why shouldn't you?

CONTEMPORARY COMMUNICATION Inc.

382 Commonwealth Avenue
Boston, Massachusetts 02215
(617) 536-5819 Boston (212) 874-0541 N.Y.

Interested in the mechanics of effective protest? Write for our free pamphlet, "PROTEST AND PROFESSIONALISM" things, happen and go by and you forget about them, but not the Mississippi riots. Not for me, anyway, and I don't suppose I'm alone." There is an echo here of the voice of E. B. White, one of the genuine voices of our time, but it has too much equanimity, too little inflection of personal concern. It misses what White always hits: the exact equivalence of fact and feeling. It stages a feeling, makes it an abstraction, which may be why the ceremonial occasion is so attractive to MacLeish. It seems insincere, is achieved by artfulness, by loosening the style. And it belies what it professes: it summons us to return to American Scripture, to read in the primer of the old-time faith, to ponder the profiles of courage and decency, but in itself is not their warrant, lacking the precious individuality and daring consciousness to make them good.

PERSONALS

YOU CAN BE A CITIZEN DIPLOMAT TO RUSSIA THE "GLASSBORO WAY"

For details write:

CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS
Dept. N 5/20, 10 W. 46 St., NYC 10036
or Telephone: (212) LT 1-8113

SALASACAN WALL-HANGINGS — Tapestries hand-woven by the Salasacan Indians of the Andes. Moderately priced. (C.D.Project). Write: ANDEAN, Box 472, Cuenca, Ecuador.

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: write Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 30 East 42 Street, N.Y.C. 10017.

INTERESTED IN LIFE? Believe men should live each day to the fullest? So do humanists. For information write: Dept. N-1, American Humanist Association, 125 El Camino del Mar, San Francisco, Calif. 94121.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE

(Computerized Matching—All Ages)
"Let TEAM make you a team."

Write:

TEAM Project
245 East 30th Street
New York, N.Y. 10016, Phone 552-5075

BUTTONS, PEACE JEWELRY, POSTCARDS, POSTERS, psychedelia, etc. Unusual merchandise. Good service. Wholesale to all. 10c brings exciting free catalogue air mail. FREE SPEECH, INC., 23 St. Marks Place, N.Y.C. 10003

DISCOVER a fun way of meeting interesting, alert Jewish singles. For FREE analytical questionnaire write: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036

SNOOPY FOR PRESIDENT—249 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/$1, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Free catalogue to all. Free sample to stores. Big-Little Store, 1671 Washington, San Francisco, 94109. (415) 775-3140.

MANUSCRIPT IN TROUBLE? Skilled Pro editor-writer aids authors in revising Mss. for publication. Box 612, c/o The Nation.

THEATRE / Robert Hatch

Rolf Hochhuth's didactic purpose in life is to bring certain dominant figures of World War II to the dock of public esteem. Pope Pius (The Deputy) was cold to the fate of Europe's Jews; Winston Churchill (Soldiers, now playing at the Billy Rose) was indifferent to the lives of the citizens of Hamburg and Dresden, and capable (whether or not culpable) of assenting to the murder of General Sikorski, the Polish Prime Minister in Exile. An examination of FDR is in progress.

Hochhuth, it will be seen, does not waste his energies (and in research he is prodigious) on obvious villains. He is disturbed, rather, by the good man's compromise with evil under the pressure of war. Or, perhaps, he traces war to the fact that men called good are capable of such compromises. In any case, he has an instinct for the inconvenient thesis, and his plays move toward the stage in a storm of controversy that guarantees maximum attention for their pronouncements and minimum examination of their form. (The British censors, with the folly of their peculiar vocation, banned Soldiers and made it an object of national curiosity.)

It is not to be presumed that Hochhuth has plotted this road to theatrical fame, but it may well have been the only one open to him. His gifts are almost entirely polemical. He appears to understand the theatre, not as a stage on which things happen but as a platform on which things are said. His characters are not created, they are summoned; they do not unfold, they are displayed.

Thus the three acts of Soldiers (I ignore the fact that it is a play within a play, since the surrounding envelope is no more than a tedious attempt to lend contemporary force to events whose continuing relevance is self-evident) take place aboard a warship in the North Sea, in Churchill's bedroom, presumably at 10 Downing Street, and in the garden at Chequers. But these locations, or the Prime Minister's appearance from scene to scene in a nautical jacket, boisterous pajamas and an RAF uniform, have no bearing on the playback of statements made (or judiciously assumed to have been made) by Churchill and certain of his close associates in 1943. The purpose of locale and dress is visual variety, no dramatic movements.

The interest to be derived from this work is in historical detection and the significant juxtaposition of texts; it has nothing to do with drama, and is indeed so inappropriate to the stage that its content can be grasped only imperfectly under conditions of exhausting concentration. The only play offered here by Hochhuth is an affection that grows between Churchill's secretary and a young Polish officer, and is destroyed by the actions of their superiors; a playwright would of course have brought these two bit parts to the center of the work. Aside from this, the spectacle is a wax-works wired for sound—but sound that is innocent of any knowledge that if lines are to prevail on the stage they must be written for the stage.

The museum ghouliness of the piece is accentuated by the appearance of the principals, and particularly of Churchill. By use of very heavy (and perfectly apparent) make-up, John Colicos is made to look a good deal like Churchill (in some poses, disconcertingly like W. C. Fields). But no one who ever saw or heard Churchill could be fooled for a moment. The tone of voice, the attitudes, the stature are insufficient—I had to fight the (at least melodramatic) supposition that the real Churchill had been disposed of by the Gestapo. As for Lord Cherwell and General, Sir Alan Brooke, they are given the presence of junior masters at a boys' school. But suppose the impersonations had been faultless, suppose this was Churchill miraculously returned, what would that have to do with acting? It would be mere mimicry, a trick, a mechanical duplication at the pole opposite to creating a stage image.

The truth is that real playwrights do not put public figures of world renown at the center of their canvases, because to do so would be to frustrate the invention of character development and human relations that impels them to write plays. Shakespeare? But Henry V died in 1422, Richard III in 1485, and Shakespeare was born in 1564. Nor did those monarchs write memoirs, appear in newsreels, or record their speeches with the B.B.C. There is a great deal still to be said about Churchill—and, whether correct or not, Hochhuth has added his opinion to the conversation. But there is nothing to be done with him on the stage, and there won't be for 100 years.

Now, for the good of the theatre, if not of history, I trust that Hochhuth is not amassing evidence to demonstrate that Roosevelt planned Pearl Harbor. True or false, it won't play.

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY

$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

200 Ninth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
243-8400

Crossword Puzzle No. 1250

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Action of sub-transformation? It isn't quite clear! (11)
- 9 Pass a brief interlude in a state of exhaustion? (8)
- 10 One of these isn't left in the ring pre-rogatives. (6)
- 11 See 22 across
- 12 See 25 down
- 14 Little ways around are likely to produce impolite looks. (6)
- 15 Insomniacs are and do, probably. (8)
- 17 The players grow old, and they may go around hurt. (8)
- 20 One can't after being checked for fancy accommodations. (6)
- 22 and 11 across Such a game has force on only one side. (4,3,7)
- 24 Such things as jam the old ranches? (7)
- 26 Astringent in back, no longer in attendance. (6)
- 27 Had some young scattered about? (8)
- 28 Evidence of prosperity just around more than one corner? Such things don't make sense! (11)

DOWN:

- 2 Having the ability, in a way, to get fed up when it's hammered home too often? (9)
- 3 When they call a strike, the board may respond quickly. (7)
- 4 Bass or tenor, possibly. (4)

- 5 Proving the sailor is given something to shoot at. (7)

- 6 Should be tough to figure out! (5)
- 7 One of those Assyrian gleamers? (6)
- 8 Puts up with things put up for show? (6)
- 13 Is it crude to make such a profit? (5)
- 16 Cant a sort of villainous look portray the audience? (9)
- 18 Rings a series of strokes on the bell. (6)
- 19 Plant a clue for this agent in disguise. (7)
- 20 Money in Washington, for example? (7)
- 21 Such a deal is not for the men! (6)
- 23 A large number in an undetermined group battle with it. (5)
- 25, and 12 across Secret group of people set apart for a particular use. (11)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1249

ACROSS: 1 Cabinetmakers; 9 Rules; 10 Butters up; 11 Yonkers; 12 Rotunda; 13 Blues; 14 Headaches; 16 Golden Age; 18 Motif; 19 Typical; 21 Marvell; 22 Container; 23 Extra; 24 Superannuated. DOWN: 2 Bilingual; 3 Nesters; 4 Tubes; 5 Alternate; 6 Electra; 7 Susan; 8 and 1 down Speak softly and carry a big stick; 14 Headliner; 15 Hottentot; 17 Enclasp; 18 Morceau; 20 Pants; 21 Moron.

EDUCATIONAL

WHO NEEDS IT? Independent study? Personal freedom? A chance to help make a new kind of college work? If you need it, write Admissions N, Franconia College, Franconia, N.H. 03580.

QUAKER STUDY CENTER—Suburban Philadelphia. Special program for study in social change, non-violence and radical living. Also year's seminar on man's search for meaning, confirmation and dialogue. Write: L. W. Lewis, Pendle Hill, Wallingford, Pa. 19086.

PUBLICATIONS

OUR GENERATION

Largest circulation Quarterly of dissent in Canada and of the New Left in North America—

Analyzes, Reports, Reviews, Theorizes:

- the movement for educational university reform
- the black power and human rights
- the peace and anti-Vietnam war
- the anti-poverty and community organizing
- the Quebec independence movement
- tactics and strategy of New Left in Canada and U.S.A.

Sample issue: $1.50

Subscriptions: $5.00 (4 issues)

3837 St.-Laurent Blvd., Montreal 18, Canada

GROUP NOW FORMING

to publish a new National Weekly Journal of Opinion: Jewish-oriented on the order of The Nation, New Republic and Commonweal. Location: New York City.

Seeks writers and complete staff. Cooperative venture on profit-sharing basis.

Send full details to:

P.O. Box 703, Harrisburg, Pa. 17103

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

SEE AMERICA BY CAR, Scenic Routes, Historic Sites, Parks, Best Places To Stay, Where To Stay, 170,000 word book, only $2.50. Order No. HP20T3, TOBI-ROCK, 3545 Ring Lane, Jacksonville, Fla. 32207.

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! Used bargain lists. Fiction and non-fiction. Free search. Harco, Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032.

THE CONSCIENCE OF A RADICAL

By Scott Nearing

A book you should read.

Have it sent postpaid for $2 clothbound or paperback at $1.

Social Science Institute
Harborside Maine 04642

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

SITUATION WANTED

TEACHER, Humanist, male, 41. Seeks employment at a liberal, non-Christian boys' elementary boarding school. Member Summerhill Society. Views expressed in The Humanization of Man, A. Montagu. Write: Box 274, Del Norte, Colorado 81132.

BUY YOUR BOOKS THROUGH THE NATION

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014.

What is Psychology Today?

At last! A magazine that bridges the information gap between responsible psychology and the educated public!

Today all of us—the executive, the salesman, the housewife, the teacher, the clergyman, and the teen-ager consistently (and often knowingly) use this thing we call psychology.

However, many of the solemn scientific truths you learned about psychology only yesterday in college are sheer myths today. In the information explosion, no field is moving faster than psychology. New and exciting discoveries which affect you deeply and personally are yielding themselves up on an almost daily basis.

Before the appearance of Psychology Today magazine, these new findings were not available in a lively, accurate monthly magazine. All that is changed. Now there is a magazine about psychology, with articles written by world-renowned experts in psychology, religion, education, child development, philosophy—the total human condition. Current and coming articles include:

Explosion in the Ghetto	The Psychology of Power
Religious Hangups	Understanding Children's Art
Student Activists	Morality in Psychotherapy
Love and Death	Drugs—The Quiet Revolution
Russian Psychology	A New Look at Menopause
Adult Play Therapy	Group Therapy—Is It All Talk?
Hypnosis	The Career Woman's Dilemma
The Sexual Personality	The Motives of a Soldier
The Pre-Logical Child	Self-Stimulation of the Brain
Stuttering	Why Babies Smile or Cry
ESP	Psychology of Police Confessions
The Taming of a Wolf	Psychology of the Reverse Sell
Is Graphology Valid?	Stimulating Executive Creativity

No facts are beyond our pale. We talk about sex clinically and, when necessary, carnally. About children we are neither

Receive the current issue as a gift and begin a better understanding of your children, your spouse, your boss, your mother-in-law ... yourself.

psychology today

PSYCHOLOGY TODAY, 1330 Camino Del Mar, Del Mar, California

Please send me my complimentary current issue of PSYCHOLOGY TODAY. I may keep my sample copy and owe nothing. However, unless I cancel, you may enroll me as a trial subscriber and send me the next 11 issues. Bill me after my subscription has started for just $6.00, my special Charter Subscriber rate—instead of the regular $9 annual price.

085

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____ Zip _____

doting nor derisive. And with religion, we treat both the blasphemous and the beatific with objectivity. Lucidity is the watchword. You'll find no jargon in Psychology Today. No circumlocution, no pomposity. Our editors are as ruthless with their blue pencils as they are sensitive to your threshold of ennui.

Moreover, we think you'll like our contemporary design—full of style, boldness, and a touch of whimsy. Our pages are awash with full color photographs, and even our charts are fascinating.

Send no money

To receive your complimentary copy of Psychology Today don't send us a cent. Just fill out the coupon below, mail it to us, and we'll send you your free issue posthaste. If the magazine doesn't fascinate you—and yield you valuable insights—cancel and consider the matter closed. Otherwise you'll receive the next 11 issues and a bill for only $6.00. The regular yearly subscription rate, not so incidentally, is half again as much—$9.00.

By subscribing now, you're not only making enormous savings over the newsstand price ($1 per copy) but you're also taking advantage of a special subscription price that may be withdrawn at any time.

GHETTO SCHOOLS? CLOSE 'EM! NEIL V. SULLIVAN

THE

NATION

BURLINGAME

MAY 28 1968

LIBRARY

MAY 27, 1968 35 cents

America Revisited

THE LONELY FRONTIER OF REASON

MICHEL CROZIER

Down the Primary Stretch

KARL O'LESSKER
ANTHONY NETBOY

and 'Squeeze' in Asia

FRANCES L. STARNER

Triller on the Steps of the Pentagon

ALAN TRACHTENBERG

5-21-68R PLS-1449
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

right to challenge

Austin, Tex.

DEAR SIR: On Apr. 15 you published my letter of objection to Mr. Brossard's comments on the education of children. In explanation you evade the question of Mr. Brossard's competence in the professional field of pedagogy. Teaching literature and social science in colleges does not make one an educator in the professional sense, and only a professional educator is entitled to make such derogatory statements (seemingly authoritative) about the quality and effect of elementary education in this country.

I repeat, Mr. Brossard is talking through his hat . . .

George I. Sánchez

Portland, Ore.

DEAR SIR: Speaking as a schoolgirl of fourteen years' experience (not as many as Mr. Sánchez's but emphatically long enough), I must state that the atrocities of American education inflicted upon myself and many others to whom I've talked fully support Mr. Holt's and Mr. Brossard's position. Perhaps as a teacher and teacher of teachers, Mr. Sánchez has not been in the correct place to learn of what Mr. Brossard speaks . . . I don't know if teachers, administrators, school boards, or others are responsible, but I know I do not want any of my children to endure the enormous agony of American public education. I still get a frantic feeling when passing one of those repressive restrainers, an American school.

Lynne Botten
Reed College

'War and Peace'

New York City

DEAR SIR: Creative criticism in the performing arts is so rare that it demands responsible comment from those who are occupied with performances. Robert Hatch's review of the Soviet version of Tolstoy's War and Peace [The Nation, May 13] was a masterpiece of clinical analysis. Not since the days of James Agee has a subject been so attacked in style, depth, historical and sociological analysis. The film cost $100 million; in about 1,000 words, Mr. Hatch said all that need be said about a complex, indeed ■ baffling problem, of transliteration, novel to "epic"; casting and direction. Would that the dance had a single voice today as perspicacious and as sympathetically devastating.

Lincoln Kirstein

empty pedestal

Ann Arbor, Mich.

DEAR SIR: Alexander Werth ["Moscow's Wayward Satellites," The Nation, Apr. 22] has some illuminating comments on Czech "realism" but it is clear he hasn't been to Prague for a long, long time. When my wife visited Prague in 1962, she brought home slides which included some of the monster statue of Stalin overlooking the city from the high bank of the Vltava . . . Nothing was supposed to have happened between 1962 and 1963 in Czechoslovakia. Yet when I visited there in 1963, Stalin had quietly disappeared. No public toppling, no photos, no publicity. People weren't even sure exactly when he had vanished . . . some silent dark night. What remained was a huge stone pedestal with no occupant. Beneath the pedestal were plaques commemorating resistance heroes and martyrs, like Lidice and the writer Fuchs . . . Chalked in at various places were other names like Benes, Masaryk and names I do not remember or know.

(Continued on page 700)

EDITORIALS

The Road from Nebraska

Senator Kennedy's 51 per cent margin of victory in the Nebraska primary was definitely more impressive than his 42 per cent margin in Indiana; on the other hand Senator McCarthy, in Nebraska as in Indiana (see article p. 686) did rather better than we had expected. In both states he was unable to match, financially or organizationally, the resources available to Senator Kennedy, and neither state was favorable McCarthy terrain. From Nebraska the road leads westward to Oregon (see article p. 687) and from Oregon down the coast to California. These two primaries will have much greater national significance than those of Nebraska and Indiana, whose chief importance was to give a boost to the Kennedy candidacy which had been showing signs of wobble and distress.

With the Oregon (May 28) and California (June 4) primaries as the major political happenings before the Chicago convention, now is a good time to restate The Nation's endorsement of Senator McCarthy. Prior to McCarthy's announcement, the outlook for the 1968 Presidential election could hardly have been more discouraging. It then seemed as though voters might be offered a throat-slitting "choice" of Wallace, Johnson or Nixon. Now they have the possibility of indicating a preference for McCarthy, Kennedy, Humphrey, Nixon or Rockefeller—a refreshing enlargement of alternatives. For this distinct improvement in the political outlook McCarthy is, of course, largely responsible. It is our judgment that the North Vietnamese responded as quickly as they did to the President's message because he had decided to withdraw from the race—and for this, too, McCarthy was largely responsible. Under the circumstances, therefore, it is our view that all those who oppose the war and want to see a redirection of American power and a reordering of national priorities should continue to support Senator McCarthy.

But there is reason for growing concern about the way the election is shaping up. While the outlook has improved, it could still end up with a "choice" of, say, Wallace, Humphrey and Nixon. Whether or not the President's withdrawal, coupled with the message to Hanoi, was calculated to rob his critics of the major issue of the campaign (or at least make it extremely difficult for them to exploit it), that has been the practical effect of his decision. Once again "images" and "personalities" are taking precedence over issues and alternative policies. Business Week (May 4) notes that Kennedy, Humphrey, Nixon and Rockefeller—McCarthy is placed in a different category—will each try in his own fashion "to define a new middle of the road in national politics." But what we need is a new politics, not a new middle of the road. A new bipartisan consensus in support of the cold-war policies of the last quarter of a century will not restore confidence and faith in the political process—it will further undermine it.

At the moment, there is a remarkable unanimity of opinion that negotiations in Paris will follow the pattern of the Korean negotiations and be interminable. But what if they take a different course? Suppose that an agreement—perhaps an interim agreement of some sort—is reached before the conventions. Humphrey and Nixon might then emerge as the nominees most likely to appeal to “the new middle.” This in turn would arouse even deeper distrust of the political process among the groups that are most seriously disaffected. Perhaps 30 per cent of the electorate has become estranged from governmental process by the performance of both parties and has been clamoring for a more significant politics.

The poor—long excluded from the consensus of middle-income groups—are only beginning to organize in a manner that would force attention on their urgent and legitimate needs. The formation of a new consensus of the middle, from which they would still be excluded, will only contribute to their disaffection and despair. Similarly, it would be a bitter anticlimax to confront young voters, who have come out in droves for McCarthy and Kennedy, with a “choice” of Wallace, Humphrey and Nixon. Under these circumstances, the prospect for a politics relevant to contemporary America and the world would be eclipsed almost as swiftly as it was revived.

A McCarthy victory is the best assurance that the new interest and confidence in the political process will not be extinguished. Both in style and substance, Senator McCarthy has shown a real awareness of the need for a new politics. He is well aware that the nature of national politics is changing. Value judgments on the direction that American policy should take are overshadowing specific group and sectional interests. New issues are cutting across the old groupings, alliances and coalitions. These new issues are bringing forth new national constituencies. McCarthy, “the man the people found,” has addressed these new constituencies with a candor and intelligence that has strengthened their confidence in the political process. Whether or not he succeeds in having himself nominated, McCarthy has ushered in the “new politics” of the next several decades.

Regardless of the political fortunes of Senators McCarthy and Kennedy—and of personal preferences—the point to keep in mind is that the opposition in the Democratic Party is strong enough, if consolidated, to dominate the Chicago convention. In the primaries thus far held, a majority of Democratic voters have shown that they want—as Senator Kennedy puts it—“a different course of action from that followed by the Johnson-Humphrey Administration.” But they are no more likely to get it if Humphrey and Nixon are nominated than they would be if the nominees were Americus Liberator, the retired cowboy, and Harold Stassen, who ran neck and neck with him in the Nebraska primary.

The paramount need at the moment is to see to it that the Oregon and California primaries are conducted in a manner that will not damage the prospects of uniting the McCarthy-Kennedy forces at Chicago. Should this effort fail, we may yet be engulfed in “happiness politics” and all that. At Chicago, if necessary, McCarthy and Kennedy can toss a coin to decide who should have the first place and who the second. There is no longer any need for, indeed there is a real danger in, perpetuating the nonsense

IN THIS ISSUE

May 27, 1968

EDITORIALS

682

ARTICLES

Down the Primary Stretch:

686 From Indiana . . .

Karl O'Lessker

687 . . . to Oregon

Anthony Netboy

690 America Revisited:

The Lonely Frontier of Reason

Michel Crozier

694 Ghetto Schools? Close 'em!

Neil V. Sullivan

696 Aid and “Squeeze” in Asia

Frances L. Starnier

BOOKS & THE ARTS

701 Mailer on the Steps of the Pentagon

Alan Trachtenberg

703 No Pretense to Coherency

Calvin Bedient

704 The Uses of Chaliapin

Simon Karlinsky

704 Today Decided the Question (poem)

Roger Apon

706 Art

Max Kozloff

709 Theatre & Films

Robert Hatch

710 Theatre

Robert Pasolli

710 Aging Wife (poem)

Martha Friedberg

711 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014, Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Pan America; $2 for foreign postage.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 206

No. 22

about "ticket balancing." Let the Democratic Party nominate the two best men. The fact that both are Catholics is beside the point; for a couple of centuries both parties have thought it perfectly proper to nominate two Protestants for the top offices.

Sobering Up

Individuals may go on weekend benders, but nations do things on a larger scale. Our very own Uncle Sam has been on a twenty-five-year spree and now, forced to face facts, he finds things pretty rough.

"This can't go on" is the national feeling, and when something has to give even Establishment Senators begin to think unthinkable thoughts—such as actually making cuts in the Department of Defense budget. For the first time there is a mood to question, to look sharply, to regard a billion as a billion and a million as a million. Oh, if we could only get back a fraction of the $900 billion we have spent on "defense" and related programs since 1945! Oh, if we could just collect a little interest on the $21.5 billion of wartime lending! But it is all gone, gone forever, and the sobering up will be difficult indeed.

In Forbes (May 1), Otto Eckstein, the Harvard economist who served on the President's Council of Economic Advisers from 1964 to 1966 and is still a consultant, expounds the hard facts. Many businessmen (including the Committee for Economic Development) think that when the Vietnamese War ends—with its drain of $30 billion yearly—$20 billion, say, will become available for useful purposes. Professor Eckstein warns against such high hopes. The defense budget is now around $83 billion. It had leveled off at around $50 billion before Vietnam, but Eckstein assures us that we shall never see that level again. Maybe $75 billion, he thinks. Another military pay rise is in the offing. Major equipment prices have risen. Expenditures on developing new strategic weapons have been deferred (it seems incredible, but that only shows how little we appreciate the size of the military appetite). We must have Minuteman III, it seems, at least as "thin" defense against Chinese ICBMs, and other such splendid hardware. Whatever is saved at the end of the war in Vietnam—whenever that comes—will be up for grabs by the military.

Nevertheless, even hawk Senators like Symington (he seemed to have had a period of reflection but his status now is uncertain) are apprehensive, and so is big business and its economic advisers. The idea is gaining currency that while "defense" spending benefits the big arms suppliers and the regions in which they are concentrated, for the country as a whole it is counter-productive. Eliot Janeway, in his new book, The Economics of Crisis: War, Politics and the Dollar, argues that in attempting to act as the world's policeman the United States is increasingly bogged down with its wars, losing economic opportunities that it could otherwise seize, and thus falling into a worsening economic crisis. The best—the only—way to stimulate the economy is to shift into peace spending; the Wall Street reaction shows that this is generally realized. So the military importuners must be resisted; their requests for what they consider absolutely necessary must be shown for what they usually are: exaggerated, spendthrift estimates for future wars which will be as ruinous as the present one, and as unwinnable. Nor should organizations like the CIA be any more sacrosanct than the Department of Defense. No matter how much Congressional courage it may take to do so, these budgets must be cut ruthlessly. There is no other way to get money for the country's urgent needs, and if these needs are not met, then the trouble that lies ahead will far exceed the trouble we are in already.

Aghast

Reviewing The Philby Conspiracy for The Washington Post, Thomas W. Braden pronounced himself "aghast" at Philby's treachery. Almost bereft of his senses by horror, he was at length forced "to face an abasing truth: that it is possible for a man to accept from those with whom he walks all that they can give in affection, well-being, education, trust and honor, and in return lie to them, steal from them, betray them, even murder them."

All true, but who is Braden to point the finger? He may not himself have stooped to being a double agent, but he stooped plenty when he worked for the CIA. To vary the Biblical saying, he sees the beam in his neighbor's eye but not the (somewhat smaller) beam in his own. Without the slightest compunction, when he was working for the CIA Braden deceived the American people, in the matter of the foundations and other ostensibly worthy organizations which he covertly financed with CIA money. It was all in the name of national security, of course—which may cleanse Braden's conscience—but he can hardly hold himself up as a model of rectitude. It is hard to see why he gets so emotional about Philby, or about any other operator in the intelligence business, where some are sure to be found serving two masters or else serving one and deceiving the other.

By all the evidence at hand, the CIA is no more scrupulous than any other intelligence service in its operations. Remember Francis Gary Powers, the hillbilly who became a first-class flier and was downed in the Soviet Union while flying a U-2 photographic plane—thereby breaking up a scheduled Big Four Summit meeting and prolonging the cold war? The Los Angeles Times recently carried a story about him which leaves us aghast, though not as aghast as Tom Braden because we do not pretend to observe the world from so elevated a moral station. At 38, Powers is working as a test pilot for Lockheed, which was his ostensible employer when he was flying for the CIA. His mishap occurred on May 1, 1960, and the Soviets gave him a ten-year sentence after a show trial in which Powers confessed all. In 1962, however, he was exchanged for the Soviet spy Rudolf Ivanovich Abel. In 1963, he divorced his first wife and married an attractive CIA psychologist, with whom he lives (incognito, or at least not to be interviewed or even called on the telephone) in a $40,000 home in the foothills of the Verdugo Mountains. But there is more to his story than that.

The U-2 in which Powers did his spying was equipped with a special destruct mechanism which, when actuated, was designed to blow up the plane, after allowing the pilot seventy seconds to eject and get far enough away to survive. But there was some question about the length of the delay in the minds of some of the U-2 pilots, and that may have had something to do with the fact that Powers is alive and still flying, with the $50,000 back pay he received and the medal which the CIA awarded him in 1965—very quietly.

The cover story which had been prepared in advance by the CIA did not assume a live pilot, or an unexploded aircraft. In his book, The Real CIA, the former executive director of the CIA, Lyman B. Kirkpatrick, Jr., recalled sitting in Allen Dulles' office and listening to Dick Bissell "explain how it would have been impossible for the pilot to have survived the crash and therefore that the United States should stick to the cover story . . ." (Italics added.) And in his memoirs, Waging Peace, General Eisenhower refers to the self-destructing mechanisms and says he was told by CIA and the Joint Chiefs that "in the event of mishap . . . it would be impossible . . . for the Soviets to come in possession of the equipment intact—or, unfortunately, of a live pilot."

Unfortunately—or fortunately? At any rate, Powers did not throw the destruct switch. He said that the forces exerted by the spinning plane were such that he could not reach the switch. He did not eject; he got the canopy open and climbed out. His story is that he then tried to reach the switch but couldn't. Suspicious persons (such as ourselves) might wonder whether the CIA had plotted to destroy plane and pilot in the one explosion. The author of the Los Angeles Times story wonders too. It is a fair surmise that the CIA did scheme to destroy one of its own agents in order to maintain its cover story. This type of "intelligence" is a dirty business all around. Even in reference to a character like Philby, moral indignation can seem out of place.

Common Courtesy

What we call corruption, an American official explains, the South Vietnamese call common courtesy. It was that way before we came—except that, since the country was not then flooded with American personnel, products and funds, there was less "courtesy" to go around. And the same is true of Thailand, and of every Asian land our troops enter, in the name of saving it from communism. President Johnson has consistently taken the problem of corruption in Vietnam quite lightly. Speaking in Texas not long ago, he observed that corruption is everywhere—in Boston, New York and Johnson City. "Somebody is stealing something in Beaumont right now," he said to his audience in Beaumont, Tex.

No doubt of it, but corruption in Beaumont does not have quite the same impact that American-financed corruption has in Southeast Asia, for reasons which Frances Starner points out in this issue (p. 696) and which Sen. Ernest Gruening, as chairman of the Subcommittee on Foreign Aid Expenditures, has pointed out in announcing hearings on the same subject. By furthering the corruption which is a way of life in most traditional Southeast Asian societies, we contribute to the conditions which Communists turn to their advantage. Corruption is not a minor issue in South Vietnam; it is, as Douglas Kirk points out in a dispatch to the Washington Star, "the key word in Vietnamese politics." Consider the story of the black-shirted Anti-Corruption League, with a membership of 32,000, which Vice President Ky organized in 1965. Recently he was mortified, so he said, to find it necessary to arrest Dang Van Thu, national chief of the organization; Le Van Kha, inspector general; and Le Van Thanh, a provincial leader. The three were charged with misappropriation of government funds and the sale of draft-exemption cards. An AP report indicates that the price of such cards ran as high as 75,000 piasters or $635. The more certain American officials ponder the problem of "common courtesy" in South Vietnam, the more they are inclined to rethink the kind of role we actually play in South Vietnam and Thailand and Laos by contrast with the role we say we are playing "Whether attacking poverty or Communism," writes Robert Keatley in a dispatch to The Wall Street Journal from Thailand (May 15), "the U.S. sometimes aggravates problems it seeks to solve, or even creates new ones in the process." We hope Senator Gruening presses forward with his investigation; the findings will be of continuing relevance to American policy in Southeast Asia, quite apart from what happens in the Paris peace talks.

The Return Flow

The Peace and Freedom Party qualified for the ballot in California last year with 105,100 registrations, substantially more than the number required by the state election code. The new party, composed primarily of voters under 30, reflected a sharp alienation from consensus politics at a time when it appeared that the only alternative to President Johnson this year would be Richard Nixon—a prospect that dismayed millions of older voters as well as the young.

The Peace and Freedom registration has now dropped to 71,532, a loss of nearly one-third of its original strength. (We had anticipated that some such shift would in all probability take place: see our editorial "Thoughts in a Dry Season," February 19.) P.&F. leaders, allied ideologically to the militant Left, see little if any difference in the programs and prospects of Johnson, McCarthy, Kennedy and Humphrey, or in those of Rockefeller and Nixon; but 33,568 former members of their party disagree. Most of the credit for their decision to return to the main political stage must go to Senator McCarthy, who was the first political leader to sense the vulnerability of President Johnson.

The Peace and Freedom Party could still become a significant factor this year in California politics. If the August conventions nominate Nixon and Humphrey, the new party could gain as many as a half-million protest votes, mostly from the Democratic ranks, though the anti-Nixon Republicans would also be tempted to leave home in disgust.

DOWN THE PRIMARY STRETCH

From Indiana ...

KARL O'LESSKER

Mr. O'Lessker has been active in Indiana Democratic politics for many years. A member of the Wabash College faculty, he is now visiting professor of political science at the University of Illinois.

A white backlash that didn't develop, a Republican cross-over that did: a huge Negro vote and a set of Democratic organization factional fights of almost impenetrable obscurity—this is the stuff out of which Sens. Robert Kennedy and Eugene McCarthy put together their different kinds of "victory" in Indiana's primary.

There were few surprises, and those only of degree. Everyone knew Kennedy would do well among the Negroes; no one supposed he would get, as he did, 90 per cent of their vote. Everyone knew McCarthy would be helped by Republican cross-overs; no one supposed he would get, as he appears to have done, more than half of them.

But for the most part, the pollsters had done their job well. At least two weeks before the election they showed the correct order of finish among the three candidates (favorite son Gov. Roger Branigin was picked to come second, and did), and their principal sources of strength within the Democratic electorate. Most important, they indicated that no substantial backlash was developing against Kennedy among the "ethnics" of industrial northern Indiana, where his candidacy could have smashed beyond salvage.

As it turned out, Kennedy did better than he had dared hope, not only in the all-white working-class districts but also in the mixed white-black districts. In one predominantly Polish precinct of South Bend, for example, he took just over two-thirds of the almost 400 votes; and in a racially tense mixed precinct in the same city he won exactly half the vote. (McCarthy ran well ahead of Branigin in both.) And Kennedy ran up a substantial plurality in bitterly divided Lake County where four years earlier George Wallace had beaten a stand-in for President Johnson.

Some backlash does seem to have motivated the non-ethnic white working class of central and southern Indiana, a population drawn largely from Kentucky and rural Indiana. In an all-white working-class precinct in Columbus, Kennedy had to settle for a plurality (42 per cent) against Branigin's 34 per cent, a result which takes on significance when measured against the Senator's sweep in the industrial north. In that same Columbus district, and in others like it, McCarthy also fared markedly less well than he did among the "ethnics"; this suggests, if only faintly, some lingering traces of the religious issue which was so important in Indiana eight years ago.

In contrast to Kennedy, McCarthy showed greatest strength (as anticipated) in university and well-to-do suburban districts. Monroe County, home of Indiana University, gave him one of his few substantial victories. He carried the entire county with a plurality of almost 46 per cent, beating Branigin by more than 2 to 1. And in a Purdue University precinct in West Lafayette, McCarthy received 150 votes to 91 for Kennedy and 92 for Branigin. In an upper-middle-class district in Evansville the Minnesotan took 85 of the 181 total; in a similar, though largely Jewish, precinct outside Indianapolis, he won a similar but still impressive plurality.

An important increment to the McCarthy total came from Republican cross-overs. Like Branigin, he had solicited them: and while earlier estimates indicated that the Governor, not the Senator, would be the main beneficiary of any party jumping, spot checks taken just before and during the balloting showed that McCarthy stood to gain at least half of them. If, as most observers now believe, some 10 per cent of the approximately 700,000 votes in the Democratic primary were cast by Republicans, and if McCarthy and Branigin divided them equally (Kennedy, it is agreed, got none), the boost to McCarthy would represent something like 17 per cent of his total vote.

Put another way, without cross-overs McCarthy would have received 25, Branigin 29 and Kennedy 47 per cent of the Democratic vote instead of the 28, 30 and 42 per cent which they did receive.

The main sources of Branigin strength are difficult to assess. To be sure, he had the support of his own once potent party organization, of most of Indiana's labor leaders, and of the big-circulation, ultra-conservative Indianapolis newspapers. But the organization has had its internal troubles of late, with a number of county chairmen only too willing to humiliate both the Governor and the party's state chairman. And in any case, as several long-time politician watchers in Indiana (including the senior U.S. Senator, Vance Hartke) commented in the aftermath, the "old style" politics just doesn't work as it once did: voters are too deeply concerned with issues and personalities to be much impressed by appeals to organization loyalty.

The labor leaders demonstrated once again their inability to carry the rank and file with them on electoral decisions. Their object, of course, was to hold the national convention delegation for Humphrey. Had the Vice President been on the ballot, or had he at least campaigned hard on behalf of his ostensible stand-in (Branigin denied being any such thing), the outcome might have been dramatically different. But union members saw and heard Kennedy and McCarthy present the issues and ask for their votes: the leadership offered them only a maneuver.

That Branigin received as much of the vote as he did is testimony to his personal popularity with large numbers of Hoosiers, especially in the rural and small-town areas.

He appears also to have scored points with his argument that an uncommitted delegation could best serve Indiana's interests in Chicago next August. And a degree of anti-Kennedy feeling, among voters for whom Eugene McCarthy was still too much of an unknown quantity, surely contributed to the Governor's poll. But by any accounting, and despite his second-place finish, Branigin was the one clear loser in Indiana's Presidential primary.

Who then was the winner? Robert Kennedy got more votes than anyone else on the Democratic ticket and exceeded the ten-point spread he had hoped for between himself and his nearest opponent. He demonstrated, what was vital, that he could win both the Negro vote and the prospective ethnic-white-backlash vote. And he ran extraordinarily well in certain rural counties, notably several in southern Indiana, where his name might have been supposed to be anathema (Scott County, for example, once the most racist in the entire state, gave him 1,300 votes to 900 for Branigin and 500 for McCarthy).

But he did not succeed altogether in allaying fears that a significant minority of Democrats are utterly opposed to his candidacy; perhaps no such demonstration was reasonably possible. In any case, Democratic politicians in Indiana remain unconvinced that Kennedy would be the party's strongest standard-bearer in this state next November. For it is victory in the Statehouse, not the White House, that most concerns them. To that extent Kennedy's triumph here was something less than decisive.

McCarthy and his staff argue with obvious conviction that their campaign hasn't been hurt at all by the third-place finish. McCarthy's vote, they say, exceeded their expectations. More important, they are convinced that practically all the Branigin voters would have gone to them had the Governor dropped out after Johnson's withdrawal, and that in a head-to-head fight with Kennedy in Indiana McCarthy would have emerged a big winner.

This line of reasoning is by no means irresistible. At least among the party organization people one talks to, Kennedy and not McCarthy was a clear second choice to Governor Branigin. And in order to agree that the bulk of the Branigin vote would have transferred to McCarthy, you must assume a much greater depth of anti-Kennedy feeling than anything in this election demonstrates.

In sum, Indiana was a round of sparring; the combat will have to resume in other arenas. And when the knock-out does come, as it almost certainly will in the next few weeks, the victor will have to use every ounce of his remaining strength to keep another man from walking off with the prize.

... to Oregon

ANTHONY NETBOY

Mr. Netboy, assistant professor at Portland State College, is co-author of Water, Land and People (Knopf).

Portland

Originally settled by New Englanders and Midwesterners of New England background, Oregon has retained their conservative outlook. The state is today preponderantly Protestant, with few minority groups, and none of great political importance. It is generally admitted that conservatism makes Oregon a morally healthy but not a forward-looking place in which to live. There is a saying that Oregonians build for yesterday.

As one would expect from this, the state's voting record has been predominantly Republican. In fact, until 1954, it had rarely sent a Democrat to Congress. In that year Richard L. Neuberger broke a forty-year tradition by winning a seat in the United States Senate, and Edith Green was elected to the House, the first Democrat since the early New Deal. The Congressional delegations are now split evenly.

There are no strong political machines in Oregon. In the sixteen years that I have lived here I have never heard of a political boss. The only votes a candidate for office can really count on are those of family and friends, and friends of friends. One of the candidates for attorney general this year is married to a woman who has fourteen brothers and sisters, and this is acknowledged to be a real asset.

The familiarity of a name counts for a great deal more in Oregon than it does in the East, and candidates without any political experience, or ability, are often elected to high office because their names are well known around the state. Thus the present Governor, Tom McCall, won office simply by having been for many years a newscaster. He had never held any public office. He plastered the state with signs reading "Vote for McCall," not bothering to mention his Republican affiliation or the office he was seeking.

One must view the Oregon primary (May 28), which can be a boost or a blow for Presidential candidates, against this background. In the last fourteen Presidential primaries, Oregon Democrats picked the eventual candidate eleven times and Republicans eight. This record scarcely makes the state an infallible political barometer, but with the advent of television and the creation of what has been called the "mini-industry" of campaign news coverage, national attention is focused on the Oregon primary, probably out of proportion to its intrinsic importance, and yet with appreciable effect on candidate momentum. In 1964, Henry Cabot Lodge's aspirations died when he lost to Rockefeller in Oregon and the latter's prospects seemed to soar until, two weeks later, he lost to Goldwater in California.

This year, there are two active campaigners among the Democrats. Senators Kennedy and McCarthy, and the name of Lyndon B. Johnson is still on the ballot. Hubert Humphrey also appears on the ballot, but in the Vice Presidential slot. Richard Nixon and Ronald Reagan appear on the Republican ticket, but the latter has not campaigned personally in the state.

The sudden elimination of LBJ threw most of the Democratic Party leaders into confusion. Senator Morse, though a dove, has refused to endorse either McCarthy or Kennedy, and in fact keeps reminding his constituency that he is a close friend of Johnson. On May 9, the AFL-CIO executive board in Oregon endorsed Humphrey, following pleas from George Meany that labor should support neither Kennedy nor McCarthy. George Brown, educational director of the Oregon AFL-CIO legislative and political arm, declared that "most labor leaders here in Oregon, like those around the nation, still remember Kennedy's distasteful activities in the state as chief counsel to the anti-labor Rackets Committee in the 1950s. The Oregon probe was blown up completely out of proportion and Kennedy was going around calling us the 'crime capital of the nation.' Oregon leaders just can't trust the man."

Many adherents of LBJ, among them Norman Stoll, Democratic national committeeman, and state Sen. Ross Morgan, co-chairman of the Oregon Citizens for Humphrey Committee, are also actively campaigning against both McCarthy and Kennedy. Morgan, supposedly a liberal, says: "The most effective way to block the 'siren songs' of Sens. Eugene McCarthy and Robert F. Kennedy is to vote for the President, whose name remains on the ballot." A write-in for Humphrey in the Presidential box, he adds, would not be as effective, nor would a vote for McCarthy in the hope of stopping Kennedy. The word is out to party stalwarts that LBJ is determined at all costs to stop Kennedy.

Edith Green, who was an original booster of John Kennedy, is the most important Democrat to have joined Robert Kennedy's forces. Mrs. Green wields a certain amount of influence, and her friendship with politically generous Jewish businessmen guarantees ardent workers and effective financial support for Kennedy in the state. It does not necessarily promise many votes, since the Jewish community is small. No prominent Democrat has as yet endorsed McCarthy, but he is rapidly gaining adherents among intellectuals, educators and many liberal Republicans who, after Rockefeller dropped out the first time around, switched their registration to vote for the Senator.

Kennedy has been the most active campaigner in the state, using his now familiar technique: a two- or three-day blitz in concentrated areas, accompanied by a tremendous entourage of press agents, speech writers, photographers, relatives and other followers. Advance men make sure there will be crowds at the airports, shopping centers, factories and schools on the itinerary. Signs galore are carried by screeching high school and college students, and plenty of excitement is generated as the cavalcade moves from town to town. Kennedy, still looking like a college student himself, makes numerous speeches, mostly impromptu, and relies on such platitudes as "We must be used to seek peace with justice, to secure peace without fear"; "no government can sustain international law and order unless it can do so at home." He constantly repeats the slogan, "We must turn the country around."

Another Kennedy refrain is: "I enter this campaign because I believe the nation is divided. Young people are divided by older people; and black people by white people, and the nation is divided by war 10,000 miles away." And "The death or maiming of many a young man in the swamps of Vietnam—this is indecent. So is poverty . . . and unemployment." Sometimes he is more specific. In March he told Oregonians: "We must seek a more balanced and normal relationship with the Soviet Union. We must recommit ourselves to the concept of the United Nations. We must do everything in our power to halt the arms race. We must reappraise the danger of China, accepting the need for that gigantic nation to take a more normal part in the international community." He has called for bringing the Vietcong into the government of South Vietnam, as has McCarthy.

The state is being deluged with Kennedy literature, and seemingly every registered voter is being reached by phone, if he has a phone. Kennedy admits spending more than $600,000 in Indiana; he will probably exceed that figure in Oregon. He has gone out of his way to attract the Negroes in Portland, but on the whole his campaign seems to have interested mostly younger people.

Up to the middle of May, McCarthy had campaigned but little in the state. His method is in striking contrast to that of Kennedy. He travels without much of a company and keeps his family in the background, except for his daughter Mary. Tall, dignified, graying, he not only looks like a professor but talks like one, displaying a wit that Kennedy seems to lack. One feels that he is sound and stable, and he appeals to mature as well as younger Americans. To Oregonians he is practically a stranger, but they are becoming acquainted with him through the news media. Most of his campaign workers are college students.

McCarthy made a good impression on May 10 when he spoke before the City Club of Portland, probably the most important group he had addressed up to that time. Speaking on inflation and the force of the dollar in foreign affairs, he called for a re-evaluation of our foreign commitments and a coalition government in Vietnam. He advocated a less personalized approach to the Presidency, scolding LBJ for constantly speaking of "My Congress, my White House, and even my Vice President," and expressing polite contempt for Secretary Rusk. His impromptu wit appealed to this hardheaded audience. He has also spoken to labor and college audiences and seems to wear well.

Since Oregonians usually tend to vote more for the man than for his program, one feels that McCarthy would beat Kennedy in the primary if there were time enough for him to be properly introduced to the voters. Harold Hughes, the astute political writer for the Portland Oregonian, probably sized up the campaign accurately when he wrote: "A victory for McCarthy in Oregon could be the edge for victory in California, a success that would smash the Kennedy drive and make certain the nomination of Hubert Humphrey on the first ballot in Chicago. The opposite could happen, too. A Kennedy Oregon victory, if big, could set the cadence for California, maybe ending all serious talk of Eugene McCarthy." McCarthy seems confident of ultimate victory, and tells his audience he is the front runner. Kennedy, in contrast, iterates to every audience, "I need your help," meaning he will have a hard fight for the nomination.

Summing up the Democratic primary in mid-May, it seems that Kennedy is ahead and may well carry the state by a sizable margin; no polls have been published. LBJ's name on the ticket will certainly take votes from Kennedy and increase McCarthy's chances.

The Republican primary in Oregon is lacking in color or interest since Rockefeller, who is very popular in the state, took his name off the ballot. Nixon has campaigned considerably in person and by paid TV commercials, and his organization is papering the state with literature and billboards, exclaiming "Nixon's the One." Reflecting the conservative trend of Oregon Republicanism in 1968, the Nixon camp is led by prominent Goldwaterites with a sprinkling of John Birchers. Former Secretary of State Howell Appling, Jr., is chairman of the campaign committee, assisted by a large group of state legislators, bankers, the rabid conservative industrialist Ernest Swigert, and the like.

The re-emergence of Rockefeller as an active candidate jolted Mr. Appling, who lost his aplomb and exclaimed: "Now that the entry date for all the primaries is for him conveniently past, I'm not sure whether his recent posture is that of a draft dodger, a conscientious objector or a plain 4F." Such nasty remarks are not designed to improve the image of the former Vice President. Were Rockefeller on the ballot, he would probably defeat Nixon.

Supporters of Governor Reagan saw the entry of Rockefeller as evidence that Nixon cannot win the nomination. Don Hodel, spokesman for the Reagan forces in Oregon, said: "Because Nixon's campaign nationally has failed to catch fire, apparently Rockefeller backers concluded that Nixon is slipping." This sentiment was echoed by Robert Hazen, chairman of the Reagan campaign, which incidentally is said to be financed to the tune of some $300,000.

The effort of Wayne Morse to win a fifth term in the Senate almost eclipses the Presidential primary. Morse is not only an astute politician but an extremely lucky one. In his twenty-four years in the Senate he has been a Republican, an Independent and, in recent years, a Democrat. The truth is that he is not a party man at all, but one who goes his own way, taking strong positions, and standing or falling by them. His enormous gifts as an orator and lawyer have not resulted in great statesmanship nor any impressive legislative achievements. A deep streak of egotism and vindictiveness, verging on pettiness, are flaws in his character which have alienated many Senatorial colleagues, and prevented the kind of teamwork which liberals like George Norris and the elder LaFollette employed to gain legislative ends. Morse's contributions have been mostly in raising issues like the immorality of the Vietnamese War and the unfairness of the Taft-Hartley Act. Morse is passionately hated, as by the Portland Oregonian, or passionately defended, as by many a plain citizen. It is doubtful that such an individualist could have been successful politically in any state but Oregon, where he has been able to rely upon a large bloc of independent voters.

Last year, when he began to campaign for re-election as a dove, Morse's chances were dimmed by the candidacy of former Rep. Robert Duncan, a hawkish follower of the Administration, who had almost defeated Mark Hatfield for the Senate in 1966. Duncan's chief support comes from certain labor unions who hate Morse and from Administration followers. Since the withdrawal of LBJ from the race and the subsidence of the Administration's war fever, Duncan has changed his tune, and it is hard now to say how he differs from Morse on that crucial issue.

The main resentment against Morse is that he is something of a carpetbagger, living on a farm in Maryland and only nominally a resident of Oregon, his adopted state. His visits are infrequent until it is time to campaign again and then his followers see a great deal of him. He has been a failure as a sponsor of natural resource measures that would help Oregon, such as the Dunes National Seashore bill, a pet project of the Neubergeres, which passed the House and would have passed the Senate if Morse had not blocked it because he objected to the condemnation clause such bills always carry.

Starting out as an underdog in early 1968, Morse now has a comfortable lead alleged by Duncan to run into seven figures. Senate seniority would make him chairman of the Labor Committee if re-elected, and this has brought him much union money. He has put his record into a 135-page book that makes many Oregonians chuckle—the claims recall Paul Bunyan. Much to the dismay of the many Morse haters, he will probably win both the primary and the election with ease. As in his last three campaigns, he will run against a Republican straw man.

AMERICA REVISITED

THE LONELY FRONTIER OF REASON

MICHEL CROZIER

Mr. Crozier teaches sociology at the University of Paris (Nanterre). He has visited the United States many times, notably as a fellow of the Center for Advanced Studies in the Behavioral Sciences (1959-60) and as visiting professor at Harvard in 1964 and 1967. His most recent book is The Bureaucratic Phenomenon (University of Chicago Press).

America has changed. I almost do not recognize my old America. Of course, the successive generations of downtown skyscrapers are still there, and the shaded campuses and the marvelous choice of houses at $15,000, $20,000, $50,000 and $100,000. The friendly smile, good will and clear conscience still welcome you; indeed one is tempted to say that they are more evident than before and that they will continue to grow with the steady growth of the Gross National Product. But if the backdrop of buildings and faces, trees and smiles, remains the same, something more subtle, and perhaps deeper, must have changed. One cannot otherwise explain the uneasiness that assails the returning visitor, and the new excitement that this time affects the spirit, the way life is lived. It amounts to a meta-physical change.

One naturally thinks first of the political climate, of the moral fever agitating the youth and troubling the nation over the war in Vietnam, and one is struck by its familiar European character. A French visitor in particular, who has lived through the Algerian War, is impressed by the extraordinary parallel; the postures assumed, the rationalizations, the arguments on both sides, the logic and even the tone are similar. Once again, one finds intellectuals, professors and students urging one another on, while the more conventional indict the eggheads. The same unexpected realignments occur in this new moment of truth, the same rapid disillusionment with the Establishment, the same lies, the same gap between public discussion and private conversation, the same demoralization, the same moral perturbation, the same refusal to face reality, even the same swift soul-searching, unexpected, in a youth considered apolitical, but which shows again the naive illusions in youth's sudden discovery of justice as a cause.

But if one dirty war resembles another, and if the interplay of politics and morality is so similar in America and in France, those who speak of the radicalization or the Europeanization of the United States tend to forget how temporary these manifestations may be. And we French should know how effectively and speedily a country can wipe out all trace of the conflicts that have torn it apart.

Of course, the Negro revolt is a permanent phenomenon. The movement grows and its momentum increases; an unprecedented violence erupts, and the international brotherhood of the victims of American power is tied in with it.

All this is true, but one must not draw hasty inferences: America has never experienced a successful revolution

(the rebels lost the Civil War, and the War of Independence is a revolution only in name) but it has always been a nation characterized by crisis and violence. Of all the Western nations, with the possible exception of Spain, it has had the most bloody past. Its many wars aside, riots of the unemployed, battles between strikers and police, witch hunts and anarchist attacks stand out in the history of a nation whose conformity has always remained on the surface.

The current explosions—a traditional form of protest—do not strike me as new in America; nor do the appearance of numerous militant groups, or the new romantic effort to relate the class struggle (in the European sense) to the oppressed people of the Third World. Such efforts are made, in vain, whenever America suffers a crisis. What does strike me as new is the revolt of the individual against the system. It is a revolt primarily psychological, found as much in the Negro uprising as in the struggle of the students and of the young in general, tangentially involved in political action but radically different. This personal war, expressed through drugs, the repudiation of the American way of life and the embrace of psychedelia and the occult, attracts and fascinates the entire intellectual world.

Although we have in Europe numerous equivalents and imitations of this movement, it assumes in the United States a special character of contentiousness, of total challenge, unprecedented in brutality and radicalism. Every era has had its Bohemians, but compared to this new American Bohemianism, the surrealism of the prewar years and the Saint-Germain-des-Prés attitudes of the postwar years seem like mere gatherings of earnest young people looking for new ways to sow their wild oats.

That suddenly this minority attitude, this marginal behavior, whose value of course derives from its marginality, should arouse the whole of American youth testifies to a profound change, in my opinion. This time, it is the system that is being challenged.

It may seem surprising that I minimize the great social movement of the Negro revolt and devote so much attention to the always transitory state of student agitation, so let me make my point clear. I do not expect the students to undertake revolution or even to threaten the established order. As I see it, their agitation does not even signify that the system is sick but rather that it is in the process of profound change. What one can perceive behind a temporary crisis such as Vietnam, and a chronic crisis like that of the emancipation of Negroes, is the reaction of the young to a mutation of society that affects them far more than it does their seniors who are protected by their positions in the vast and relatively static economic and social system.

If the system is under fire, it is not so much because new forces assault it as because changes already occurring in it disturb individuals and groups to the point that those most affected are stimulated to make the challenge.

But why America? Why should the American system change? At first sight the very idea may be strange, but aren't we in Europe far too ready to see the American system as permanent? Promised Land or air-conditioned hell, America is always our principal standard of reference—to confirm our fears, or our hopes and expectations. For the security of our rationalizations we require that America should remain faithful to itself.

Contemporary America has in fact stagnated for some time, although it steadily produced more gadgets, and some people wondered whether quantitative accumulation would not eventually produce qualitative difference. But the climate of the Eisenhower era gave ample support to the judgment of European intellectuals like Sartre that America was definitively overburdened, dormant or sleepwalking amid prosperity. Such observers failed to understand why America marked time. Relations between the growth of an economy and the creative activity of a society are not the same when the economy is at an unprecedented peak of development as they are when a lag in the economy prompts the society to offer tangible models and new objectives.

It was natural for America to be conservative, to have lost confidence in its creative ability, to seek refuge in a ponderous moral complacency, showing beneath its hypocrisy an inferiority complex toward communism and even toward Europe. But such a period of suspension could only be temporary. The conditions necessary for a fresh start were present, but it has been delayed because the new growth could not follow the old path of simple accumulation, the linear development of material and moral investments. It required the transformation of the rules of the game, of methods of action, of objectives, a new industrial revolution—or rather, one should say with Daniel Bell, post-industrial revolution, since progress for some time now has not centered upon industrial production.

Contrary to the hasty opinions of Europeans—naïve materialists—this delay was to be fruitful. During the somnolent period of traditional prosperity, affluence permitted research and experimentation. Little by little, the machine that invents the future was put back into commission, and since then what most strikes the visitor is no longer the complacent and conservative prosperity of the United States but its aggressive confidence in human reason and in the capacity of America to solve all problems by its use.

There has perhaps never before been such arrogant pride in the powers of reason, but let us not be too quick with our ridicule. One can criticize the excesses of this self-assurance but it is justified by results. Never before has the world seen such an extraordinary capacity to mobilize resources and put them to work. In Europe, we often value this capacity rather lightly. We certainly fear the power of the great American corporations, but we do not appreciate the considerable intellectual capacity of these mastodons, which constitutes their essential superiority. Of course, a substantial majority of American businesses and institutions are still dominated by the traditional conformism of free enterprise and the false democracy of the friendly smile, but success has for a long time eluded these traditionalists. The successful manager of the sixties is even further removed from the great industrial organizers of the twenties than were the latter from the Vanderbilts, Carnegies or Rockefellers of the Gilded Age. Their assets lie neither in their resources, nor in their financial contacts, nor in their abilities as leaders of men or of empires but in their rigorous capacity to calculate the adjustment of means to ends.

Some will ask what is new in the situation. Have not economists often so defined the role of the entrepreneur? But it used to be thought that the effective manipulation of means and ends was a simple matter, involving only problems of individual character. Modern America has discovered the extraordinary complexity of the problem, technological, psychological and ultimately organizational, and has created instruments to develop rationality of action at its focal points.

The practical successes of the science of decision making are by now conclusively proven. Upon them rests the new surge of American confidence, which on the political level has completely upset the relations between the United States and the Communist world. The consequences are many; one is that the business world is in flux. Of course, the giants continue to grow; they benefit from the progress they helped to develop. However, they no longer constitute the leading wing of economic thought. This role has been assumed by spectacularly effective new firms which directly or indirectly sell this decision-making capacity. Some specialize in the revamping of businesses that have lost their profit-making capacities. Others are pioneers in new relations of business with big science, with the government and with the universities, not only to earn their administrative fees but to exploit the advantages of the new kind of analysis in areas formerly unexplored. Government, education and health, areas hitherto paralyzed by bureaucratic inefficiency, will become more and more the preferred grounds of this new revolution.

Robert McNamara is absolutely characteristic of the new spirit. A man of action whose essential capacity is his intellectual ability, he was responsible for the reorganization of the Ford empire, succeeding in his undertaking without bothering to learn how cars are made or how a factory operates. His spectacular reorganization of the Department of Defense was the work of a civilian who will never grasp military doctrines, but who is able to measure the efficiency of systems within which the arbitrary demands of the generals must be accommodated. The Vietnam folly, into which the whole machine has been dragged, should not prevent us from seeing the value of the perfected instrument. The extension of the Planning Programming Budgeting System to all American Government agencies, ordered by the President last March, is an example of the speedy spread of McNamara's administrative methods.

This wave of rational decision making which linked the actions of intellectuals to those of administrators, all in step and proclaiming the same faith (sometimes aggressively, but usually modestly), this belief in the omnipotence of reason, is in sharp contrast to the existential anguish of the young hippies and the Negro revolt. But the two movements are the opposite faces of America's transformation, of its passage as it were, to a new form of society.

We Europeans have a poor understanding of this split

(when we notice it) because we are still blinded by the Marxist or para-Marxist schematic analysis. We have a picture of America being strangled, if not by big business then by large bureaucratic organizations, and paying for its comforts and material progress with an alienation in conformity; an America on the way toward a "brave new world" dominated by technocrats.

In this connection nothing could be more misleading than the opinions in William Whyte, Jr.'s book, The Organization Man, which reflects our European myths. The experience of the last decade has been convincing: never have men of action in America been less conformist. The intellectual climate of the team surrounding President Kennedy was a vivid example in the area of politics; but the world of science, the universities, intellectuals and a segment of the business world had already experienced this new surge. It is Europe that now seems overwhelmed by the burden of old loyalties and organizational mistrust. It is Europe that most suffers from the timidity of "Organization Men." Compared to these, America seems to be populated by irreverent and innovating Young Turks.

The image of America tomorrow, the America which attracts the hopes of new generations, is not that of tenacious and sententious administrators emerging from labyrinths of tests but of the young ultra-brilliant scientist capable of categorically opposing his superior and, if the latter refuses to give way, finding the next day the capital necessary to carry out his idea by founding a rival company. It is still a myth, of course, but a myth beginning to come true.

The real cost of rational progress, therefore, is not at all alienation through bureaucratic regimentation, the loss of individuality. It would seem to me quite the contrary. The cost has to be sought in the growth of individuality itself, in the ever-increasing burden that comes from freedom of choice.

The cross carried by the American male of the nouvelle vague is not his submission to the large organizations (the latter having become increasingly flexible and tolerant); it is his submission to rationalism itself, the manipulation of himself by himself to which he finds himself condemned if he wants to succeed. Under the burning sun of a cost-utility system, there is no more excuse for failure; there is no longer a bureaucratic alibi, no protective niche, no privilege or handicap that is convincing either to those who benefit from the system or to those who suffer from it.

Certainly, even the most progressive sectors in America are far from achieving such objectives, but the considerable advances being made in this direction are sufficient to create profound moral turmoil, to give rise to violent conflicts and to a challenge of the traditional balance in the American way of life.

Naturally, the field of education is most profoundly affected because the essential condition for survival in the new hyper-rationalist world, in preparation for which training is indispensable, will depend more and more on a capacity for abstract reasoning, and to that the schools hold the key. Herein lies one of the aspects of the Negro problem which is least understood in Europe. If violence and despair are so prevalent in the colored minority precisely at the moment when its political progress appears to be greatest, it is only an example of the well-known rule that the oppressed do not revolt when they are most exploited, but when the liberalism of the oppressors allows them to begin to assert themselves. Nor is it only a result of the contagion of the international revolutionary agitation in the Third World. The fact is that American Negroes find their gains to be valueless. The civil equality that permitted all the ethnic minorities to take their part in the game has proved to be of little value to the Negroes. The passport finally granted does not open the door because it is no longer possible to make good through mere numbers, through the vote or through manual labor, but only through the ability to play the game of modern calculation. And in that area the Negro is still fundamentally disadvantaged. The more rational the society becomes, the more he loses his foothold. His emancipation is of no use to him, because he is much less competitive in today's society than he was in the traditional industrial society. His relative situation tends to become worse and, in order for this to change, the Negro community would have to transform completely its mores and values. Only the extremist movements such as the Black Muslims have openly declared that goal, but the blind hostility of white society permits Negroes to assert themselves in no way but through terrorism, and automatically abandons thousands of young Northern Negroes to the chaos of delinquency, drugs and political blackmail.

Cultural advancement cannot be gained through blind violence, education cannot be won by threat; and, for lack of realistic objectives, the Negro revolt tends to become neurotic. Increasingly it can assert itself only in terms of pure protest, and by appeals to catastrophe. But its apocalyptic aura should not hide the basic facts; their problem stems from the intellectual change, not from a will to seize power.

At this point the existential anguish of the students, though quite different, resembles the Negro revolt. Both include an element, metaphysical in nature, of pure revolt. More than others in American society, students are fascinated by the system through which they expect to benefit, and which provides their best weapon against their elders, still caught in a less rational past. At the same time it frightens them, for it already weighs heavily on them and they sense that they will pay dearly for the inheritance. It is they who must be the rational men in the demystified world of tomorrow. And this rationalism, which they absorb directly or indirectly in those intellectual hot-houses that the great universities have become, offers them neither respite, nor any secret corner, nor even the possibility of recrimination or contempt (as in France).

Thus one understands the compelling attraction of anything that might play the role of an anti-system, in particular the lure of those marginal communities that now flourish in the great cities, communities dedicated to the cult of passivity and drugs, to living in happy abandon, to the refusal to shoulder the burden of calculation and responsibility. It is a life that ultimately rejects all decision making.

Surrounding these communities, and influenced by them, hippie fashions spread to all the campuses. The informal and unorganized, but very effective networks that have been formed make it possible to spread the great game of strikes, sit-downs and the derision of traditional institutions from one end of America to another. The struggle is public and profoundly affects an entire generation. Never before have young Americans so openly discussed the workings of their system. In order to appreciate the intensity of the debate, one should witness, as I did, the passionate confrontation between Timothy Leary, the prophet of LSD, and one of the better representatives of the rationalist psychology. In France, one would expect that the anguish of being obliged to face an excessively clear world of rational decision making could be relieved through intellectual fashions, such as structuralism or the new novel. In America, it affects the self more deeply, and is expressed in the individual search for abandon, in the arrangement of one's life into an immense happening for which no one is responsible—a system of signals with no one pressing the controls.

Where is America going? It would be absurd to oppose the two tendencies and ask which of them will triumph. Decision makers and long-haired hippies do not confront each other on the same level, and their relations are as much interdependent as they are incompatible. The problem is better stated by asking what kind of balance and new dialectic America will evolve.

The extraordinary development of rational calculation appears irresistible, but it is limited by the tension it creates in the individual who feels himself incapable of directly coping with all the consequences of his own actions. The result is an ever-increasing number of pointless revolts and the development of new experiments in life styles of radical opposition. But these setbacks suffered by the proliferating system are somewhat ambiguous, for they also affect the old society, which used to constitute the best protection against the coming system. Moreover, the research and experiments undertaken in the cause of resistance to rationality can also be considered indirect, though by no means valueless, approaches to a rational exploration of human possibilities. Remember that LSD was first and still remains an instrument of scientific experimentation. The Herman Kahn school of futurists is already seriously discussing the possibility that man may completely control his emotions and his sense perception.

Nowhere can this ambiguity be more clearly seen than in the extraordinary success of the books of Marshall McLuhan, who has become in the past two years an intellectual hero of the modern age—first, for the wide student public, and then for the public at large. Prophet of the electronic universe, of television and of the happening, McLuhan announces the development of a new, synthetic tribal culture, to which we have access through the mass media and modern science. At the same time he signals the doom of analytical man, that limited product of the printed word and the linear and sequential reasoning it imposes. McLuhan almost puts science itself on the side of the hippies, though McLuhan's science must still remain intellectual and therefore for all its inconsistencies still chained to rationality. Consisting of flashing intuitions and comparisons that are at once preposterous, irritating and redundant, this highly controversial approach, thanks to the admirable tolerance of the American university, is already invading the doctoral theses of the most serious students.

But such a success naturally remains more literary than scientific. Although the young American may dream with McLuhan of synthetic global communication, of short circuits which would permit him to escape the rational process, it is still a fact that he has never before read so many books or applied himself so thoroughly to the analytical disciplines. Through the study of systems, to be sure, he discovers further interlocking complexities, but he does not lose in them the identity that weighs him down. Furthermore, McLuhan's intuitions, if they prevail, will probably turn out to be new tools for integrating the logic of the new media into an all-powerful rationalism.

And yet the conflict remains, and will remain, between the rational and the spontaneous, the community and the individual, the desire for freedom and the fear of responsibility. There are no solutions to these dilemmas. An individual can join a marginal group, but there is no such thing as an artificial paradise where a society can take refuge. Perhaps, in order to carry the debate further, Americans will have to abandon this insoluble riddle and re-examine, through their institutions, the minimal degree of anarchy, confusion and inefficiency which must be tolerated if the participants are to withstand the rigors of the new rationality.

GHETTO SCHOOLS? CLOSE 'EM!

NEIL V. SULLIVAN

Mr. Sullivan is superintendent of the Berkeley Unified School District. His previous experience as an educator includes re-opening the public schools of Prince Edward County, Va., under directions from then Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy, when they had been closed for several years to avoid integration.

Berkeley

What shall we do about the ghetto schools that lock our minority children into anger and despair? Close them, I say. Close them and make them over, from teachers to paint job. Shake them up, turn them inside out, change the teachers, change the children. Then open them again as new institutions.

When I say this, almost everybody jumps. "You can't!" they say flatly. All but a few, so far, have responded like that. But one who responds positively is a top-flight teacher in a small city down the coast. She has been an elementary teacher, then a remedial reading specialist, and now heads a center where all tutoring and volunteer projects are concentrated. She has taught in city ghettos, in suburbs and small cities.

"That's it," she said to me over the phone, then came up to my office to talk about it. Now let me try this "close the ghetto schools" idea out on the broad public.

I am deadly serious. I know the ghetto schools. I attended them as the son of an Irish immigrant. As teacher and administrator and consultant, I've rubbed my nose in their squalor. I see them when I visit our inner cities—old, some of them going back 100 years and more: grimy and odorous; bleak, dank, dark and dismal; teachers more frustrated even than the children—teachers ashamed of their jobs and rushing out of the ghetto when the last bell rings; prisons that it would take Dickens to describe.

Close these prisons, I say. Close them right now and during this coming hot summer and bring them, their teachers and their children back to life and hope. Clean them, let in the light and air, paint the walls bright, make over the playgrounds, plant some trees—make them livable. Let's call it a transfusion, with 80 per cent new blood.

That is only the beginning. While they're closed, retrain the teachers and make them over. Or, let us say, bring them up to their potential, to being committed people and proud professionals. Send the "child haters," as my supportive teacher describes them, to the suburbs where they can't hurt anybody in those routine, well-financed, secure establishments. I would temper her description a bit and say, send out those teachers who don't want to join the venture, who don't want to emerge from their rigidity or prejudice, or for whom—whether they're young or old—the possibility of change comes too late.

Select a committed group who deeply want to stay or to come into the ghetto, who want to help children grow and change. Recruit others. Bend the credentials for those you know are good, as we did in Prince Edward County, Va., when we opened the Free Schools for Negro children deprived of education for three years by the whites' refusal to integrate.

Bring in all the best modern methods and materials. Train and retrain them for this immediate task by experts drawn not only from universities but also from business and industry, from the Job Corps. Let the "know-how" teachers train the others.

Now, as to the details. The program of human and equipment renovation will be set up on a twelve-month-a-year basis for teachers and children, with a few brief vacations at intervals. Teachers will be paid accordingly. Approximately half the children will attend at one time for one semester—first, kindergarten through 3, then grades 4 through 6. Enough plants to house them will, of course, stay open. Meanwhile, the closed buildings will be refurbished and humanized. All playgrounds, except those being enhanced by redesigning, renovated and enriched by equipment, will stay open. Retraining will be conducted in one building and with pilot groups of children.

Now here come the questions from the nonbelievers. First, they ask me, "What will the children do when they're not in school?" And, "What will their parents do with them?" The children will go on field trips, and don't laugh that off. These field trips will be intensively organized, financed, and conducted by professionals from universities, public agencies ranging from the city recreation departments to the U.S. Department of Agriculture, business and industry. They will be manned by many volunteers, including parents. The children will meet at one of the schools left open.

Trips will range from the usual zoo or bird sanctuary to factories. They could include visits to the U.S. Congress or the state legislature. The children will be tourists "in depth." Some of the ghetto playgrounds will remain open, while others are remodeled, and trained volunteers will be in charge.

If we can't have a field trip every day, which I'm sure we could, the parents will be "stuck with" their kids a few days a week. They'll have a chance to get acquainted with them. If it happens that the kids are on the streets some of the time, the streets—at the moment—are better than the ghetto schools. For working mothers with pre-school children at home, we can provide baby sitters or better, child care centers. Parents would not be led into this program blindly. We would announce and discuss the carefully made plan. We would guide them to understanding, consensus and cooperation.

The children, after one semester out, will return not only to brightened-up teachers but to brightened-up classrooms and playgrounds. "Look what they did for us," they will exclaim. This alone will give them a fresh start.

Then comes the next question: "How will the kids catch up on what they've lost during the semester out?" Two answers: They have lost only academic learning. The "super" field trips will have given them another kind of education, out in the major world—a world many of them have never seen. The other answer: On their return, their learning will be accelerated through the kind of instruction the teachers will have been trained to give.

I offer as a model the Free Schools of Prince Edward County, which I organized and directed, where Negro children caught up—in one year—on subjects they hadn't touched or thought of for four years. I can also give as a model some of the methods we are using in Berkeley's Negro ghetto as we approach the end of the ghetto school through "Desegregation 1968." [See "The City That Went to School" by Ray and Betty Halpern, The Nation, May 13.] After use of the Columbus (School) Reading Program, recent tests found almost twice as many first graders achieving above-grade level in 1967 as did so the year before.

Next: "How can you close the schools within state and federal law?" Was it legal, I answer, for the white population of Prince Edward County to close the schools against the Negro children? Was it not legal for me to open them under the direction of then Attorney General Kennedy as he enforced the Supreme Court edict of 1954?

And finally, "Where will you get the money?" I can answer with President Johnson, "We are rich enough." I shall add to his quote, "We must be rich enough." I have no budget for my "close the ghetto schools" plan, but I know that a huge amount of funds would not be necessary. The cost of experts, some of which would be shouldered by universities, business and industry, the cost of three months more on the teaching schedule, the cost of refurbishing, would be immeasurably less than the cost of remodeling a whole inner city which, of course, must be done but can't be done now and can't be done quickly; immeasurably less than the riots and holocausts of our hot summers. We can get the money—federal, state, business and industry, foundations.

I say we have no choice. Something must be done now, before it is too late. All who read know what is happening to our inner cities. To their current burgeoning population of Negroes, Puerto Ricans, Mexican Americans, there is now being added a tremendous inpouring of Negro and white agricultural workers, always impoverished and now unemployed by mechanized farming. As the whites flee the inner city for the suburbs, these citizens pour in. What will we do for their children, along with all the others in the ghetto chaos?

Nothing short of a revolutionary effort must be made, and made at once. We should not heed the gun at our heads, but the gun is at our heads. I can never forget the Negro mothers in the Detroit ghetto who told me that their children, raised and schooled in that Northern city, are worse off, less educated, more entrapped, than they themselves had been as children in the rural South. Can we be satisfied with that condition?

Nor can I forget what Oscar Lewis said in a recent dialogue with Sen. Robert Kennedy, printed in Redbook. He said, regarding the Puerto Rican family he has studied for his book La Vida, that the family branch living on $7,000 a year was as ghetto-bound as its relatives subsisting on $3,000; that both had the same ghetto "bind"—the concept of being "non-people," "non-citizens," "non-accepted." (The quotes are mine.)

Finally, the doubters say to me: "But you're for integration. You're for busing kids into mixed schools.

You're for educational parks. Now you say rev up the ghetto schools."

That's all true. I'm for integration, as everybody in Berkeley, and wherever else I speak, knows well. I'm for busing children into desegregated schools. Berkeley, whose school population is 41 per cent Negro, will be busing approximately 4,000 Negro and white elementary children in September, 1968, and, with desegregation already in effect in our secondary schools, we shall then have total desegregation. But Desegregation 1968 has taken fourteen years to accomplish in Berkeley, population 120,000: ten years to bring about desegregation of the secondary schools, four more to achieve it at the elementary level. Any city the size of Berkeley can do the same, and we give the Berkeley plan as a model.

I want educational parks to be built, but I think it will take ten to twenty years and massive money to transform the blueprints into buildings.

America can't wait all those years; we must act now. We can desegregate children's minds, while we wait to desegregate and free them physically from the ghetto trap. There are two ways to get children out of the ghetto—one is physically the other psychologically. It is futile to think we can bring them physically out of the sprawling ghettos now. Psychologically, we can do so.

Through the revolutionized ghetto schools I have here envisioned, we can bring the children out of that ghetto "bind," the feeling that, no matter what, they can never belong to the major world.

We can change children. We can give them that better "self-image" we talk so much about. We can give them that "sense of control of their destiny" that will rid them of ghetto despair and alienation. Teachers can give them the tools of learning to break down the bars.

They will still go back to their ghetto homes but they will never truly go home again.

AID AND 'SQUEEZE' IN ASIA

FRANCES L. STARNER

Miss Starnier is the author of Magsaysay and the Philippine Peasantry and is completing a study of regional alignment in Southeast Asia. She is an associate professor of political science at the University of North Carolina at Charlotte.

A well-known correspondent in Southeast Asia tells of going, by appointment, to see the Prime Minister of Indonesia a few years ago and receiving a broad hint from the appointments secretary that he pay the latter to admit him. The correspondent refused and was not let in. Later, when he did get to see the Prime Minister, he protested about the earlier bribery attempt. The Prime Minister shrugged his shoulders and said, "The man has to live."

An official of Singapore—a state which does not tolerate bureaucratic corruption—tells of his country's experience in opening an embassy in a neighboring country. A third country, willing to pay exorbitant sums to "expedite" the process, had its telephone system installed promptly, but Singapore waited three or four months, because of its stand on graft.

A few years ago in the Philippines, Harry Stonehill became a millionaire many times over with equipment and raw materials either smuggled in with the connivance of customs officials or imported on licenses purchased with bribes. Stonehill reportedly boasted that there was no one in the Philippine Government he couldn't buy, but clearly he was either wrong or had overlooked an outstretched palm: one Sunday morning in March, 1962, he found himself in jail, with his bank accounts frozen and his files and records—literally truckloads of them—impounded by the Department of Justice. On the other hand, the key witness against him disappeared into the Sulu Seas a month or two later, apparently while fleeing the country. Shortly after that, Stonehill and his chief associates were abruptly expelled from the country.

Not all corruption in Southeast Asia involves officials that close to government. On a third-class train traversing central Java, a railroad policeman stops and probes the assorted bundles of a passenger. The man leaves his seat and returns with a number of bills which he hands over silently to the officer. Passengers nearby exchange knowing looks; the policeman moves on down the aisle. At Tan Son Nhut airport outside Saigon, a businessman from Okinawa hands his passport to a customs official with a couple of bills tucked inside, and his bags are passed without examination. Later he confides that Air Vietnam had insisted there was no space available on the plane to Bangkok until he paid the clerk an extra 1,200 piasters. Aboard the plane, approximately one-third of the seats are unoccupied.

A Western scholar in Kuala Lumpur—where today a new anti-corruption agency occupies an entire government building in the center of the city—argues that the pervasiveness of corruption can be gauged more accurately from the paltriness of “collections” than it can from the large sums sometimes involved. And he cites as an example a petty trader who delivers kerosene by pushcart to stall holders in the Malaysian capital and who pays off the policeman who comes around each week with 20c Malay, or the equivalent of 6.7c U.S.!

Every Westerner who has spent much time in Southeast Asia has a similar collection of stories of corruption, high and low. Taken together, they add up to a picture of an officialdom which subsists—and in a number of instances thrives—on payments it receives from citizens and from foreigners who are forced to do business, however peripherally, with government.

The subject of corruption in the developing countries has received much attention in recent years, both from Western officials and from the international press. The American interest derives, in large part, from the evidence that substantial amounts of foreign aid have been diverted to elevate the style of living of Asian officials, and have not served the objectives or reached the people intended.

American aid officials have reason, for example, to be sensitive about the case of Marshal Sarit Thanarat of Thailand. As a member of SEATO and the so-called Free World, Sarit's government was the recipient of very considerable assistance in the years from the time he came to power in 1958 until his death in 1963; but his mishandling of those funds—and indeed his personal conduct generally—were blandly ignored by all public sources during his lifetime. (A United Nations official in Bangkok comments that the Americans were willing to overlook Sarit's corruption “because he was a good anti-Communist.”) The regime of his successor, Thanom Kittikachorn, has not felt inhibited from scrutinizing Sarit's handling of public finance or from publicizing his personal behavior. In 1964, following a dispute among members of his family regarding the administration of his estate, the Thanom regime auditing it in an effort to reclaim public funds, estimated as high as $100 million, which he had diverted from the public coffers. In mid-1967, it was announced that the Finance Ministry expected by November to have recovered $30 million. No estimate ever seems to have been made of the amount diverted but not recoverable. However, 100 wives, each set up in her own establishment, with the servants, automobiles, clothes, and so on befitting the wife of the ruling Field Marshal, would have been expensive.

If American officials in Thailand have continued to be embarrassed by the Sarit case, it is because they had refused to see during his lifetime what was general public knowledge: that the regime was literally held together by corruption. Yet it needs to be pointed out that no general purge followed Sarit's death and the succession of Thanom. The present government is made up in large part of officials who served with the Marshal; and if Thanom's personal integrity is unquestioned, the same cannot be said for many of those with whom he shares power. (It is, in fact, commonly recognized in Bangkok today that Thanom's power is more apparent than real.)

Official corruption and the misuse of aid funds in Laos has probably surpassed, on a per capita basis, anything that has happened in Thailand. This seems likely simply because the United States has, for a number of years, almost completely underwritten the expenses of the Laotian Government including, at times, its warring factions. According to a summary of foreign assistance prepared by USAID for the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Laos received $473.4 million in economic aid from 1953 through 1966, and $128.5 million in military aid through 1962. (Subsequent to the Geneva accord of 1962, Laos in 1963 became the only country in East Asia whose military assistance figures were “classified.”) Corruption in Laos, it should be pointed out, did not start with the advent of American aid and is not limited to AID transactions today, although the quantities of assistance which have been poured into this little landlocked state of 2 million to 3 million people have certainly produced some bizarre effects. Indeed, the foreign observer, once he is outside of Laos, is often tempted to dismiss the entire country as an illusion. Consider these facts, taken from official reports of the American Embassy in Vientiane:

(1) It is estimated that Laos exports approximately $2 million worth of opium yearly, which, except for gold, would make opium the country's largest item of export. (For 1965, according to government statistics, the total of all other exports was less than $500,000.) The United States and a number of international agencies operating in Laos are pledged to the eradication of the opium trade which, needless to say, could not flourish without the connivance of local public officials.

(2) Laos imported $60 million worth of gold in 1966; in the first quarter of 1967, gold imports were $27 million. This is apparently all quite legal but somewhat baffling, since Laos has a highly unfavorable balance of trade, even if one adds in the $2 million worth of opium. (In 1965, for example, imports, excluding gold, amounted to $15.8 million as opposed to exports of $2.5 million.) For what purpose is this quantity of gold imported? Vientiane, after all, hardly merits the description of an international trade center or thoroughfare. It would appear that most of it ends up—as an illegal transaction and one which the United States has an interest in blocking—in South Vietnam. Some of it may reach North Vietnam and China. Again, this trade could hardly prosper without official connivance.

(3) The Laotian exchange situation deteriorated alarmingly a few years ago when Pathet Lao took over a considerable portion of the country and a series of attempted coups threatened stability in the balance. As a consequence, the United States first endeavored to underwrite an extensive import program at a preferred rate of exchange. A recent report of the AID establishment in Vientiane tells what happened:

On September 1, 1965, commodities authorized for importation under [the U.S. Importation Program] were substantially reduced in an effort to maximize the benefits of U.S. assistance to Laos. It was found that importers and dealers were making large profits out of USIP by falsifying invoices, re-exporting goods to Thailand, and pricing at the 500 exchange rate [kips to the dollar] goods imported at the 240 rate. Thus, only a few merchants, rather than the people, were benefitting from many of the USIP imports. Moreover, not all of the goods under USIP were essential to the living standard of the lower and middle income consumer and, therefore, did not justify the subsidy provided through sales at the official rate of exchange.

Rice, petroleum products, industrial machinery and utility vehicles can still be obtained at the special rate.

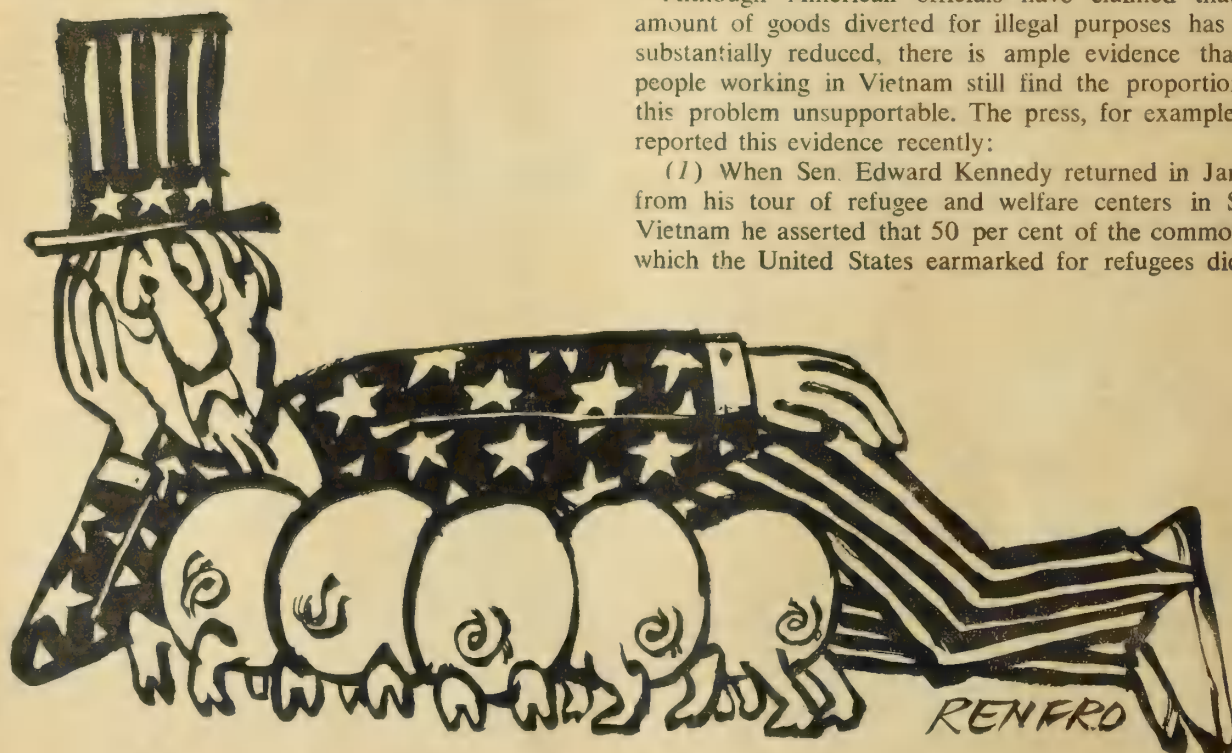

As this item indicates, American officials have at least tacitly admitted through the years that a substantial part of American aid to Laos has been diverted from its public purpose. They may even concede privately that they know who the corrupt officials are, since such evidence is not easy to hide in a country as small as Laos. But since political, economic and military power have all three been concentrated traditionally in the hands of single individuals—or more accurately, single families—and since these are the people with whom the United States does business, aid officials have been understandably reluctant to force the ouster of corrupt officials in any but the most flagrant cases.

In Vietnam, of course, the problem of corruption is both more complex and more acute than elsewhere. The task of selling “democratic” government is not made easier by the example of corrupt officials who fatten themselves on funds supplied by the Americans—an example which the insurgents have gone to some lengths to point out to the villagers. In the Vietnamese countryside, the American dilemma is painful, for here the highly selective campaigns of terrorism carried out by the Vietcong make positions of leadership—“collaboration with the imperialist enemy and its Saigon puppets,” according to VC patriots—attractive from only one standpoint, access to power and to public, that is, American, funds. Area commanders and province chiefs, almost all of whom are military officers, have recently been singled out in the international press as a major source of corruption in Vietnam. But the documented cases range all the way from a cabinet officer involved in a major scandal involving kickbacks on medicinal drugs, through massive theft of military and relief supplies, down to the policemen on the beat who collect their small “gratuities” for fixing fines and for “protection.” (It should be pointed out that the Americans have not always been clean in this regard. Not long ago, a high-ranking U.S. Naval officer, known widely in Asia as the “Mayor of Saigon,” stood court-martial in San Francisco for his mishandling of Post Exchange funds. A major point in his defense was not that he was innocent but that war conditions always encourage activities such as he was charged with and that the military had always condoned them.)

Although American officials have claimed that the amount of goods diverted for illegal purposes has been substantially reduced, there is ample evidence that the people working in Vietnam still find the proportions of this problem unsupportable. The press, for example, has reported this evidence recently:

(1) When Sen. Edward Kennedy returned in January from his tour of refugee and welfare centers in South Vietnam he asserted that 50 per cent of the commodities which the United States earmarked for refugees did not reach them (The New York Times, January 26). Moreover:

Each refugee is supposed to receive the equivalent of $45 for resettlement. . . . It was estimated to me by a United States official advisory to the refugee program that 75 per cent of this amount is siphoned off before it reaches these people.

That is, 75 per cent of $30 million for this particular program. Kennedy also noted that "the levels of corruption reach all the way up to if not including the ministerial level" (The New York Times, February 4).

(2) In December, when Vietnam's Roman Catholic bishops finally broke their prolonged silence and came out in favor of more positive steps toward peace, they shocked observers with the vehemence of their attack on high government officials. "How," they asked, "can there be peace when those in responsible places mask their false promises behind rhetoric? How can there be peace when laziness, hypocrisy and corruption prevail everywhere in society?" Since both President Thieu and the dominant bloc in the Senate belong to the Roman Catholic minority which makes up only 10 per cent of the population, this denunciation by the Church's prelates carries substantially more weight than would otherwise be the case.

(3) Partially overlooked in the January furor over the Pueblo incident in Korean waters was the announcement in Saigon of the resignation of Maj. Gen. Nguyen Duc Thang, the second ranking officer in the Vietnamese army and the one entrusted with the pacification and anti-corruption drives. Thang, who apparently enjoyed the full confidence of American advisers, was reportedly embittered by the failure of Thieu's government to support the war against corruption, and frustrated by the failure of the pacification program, which he had headed for more than two years.

(4) At about the same time that Thang was said to have finally quit the government, The New York Times reported that two South Vietnamese army officers who had been dismissed from appointive political positions a few months earlier on charges of corruption (one was province chief in Phuoc Tuy, the other the Mayor of Vung Tau), had been given "attractive army assignments." (The Americans cynically refer to this promotion system as "foul up and move up," and it is undoubtedly only one of the frustrations which led to Thang's resignation.)

The term "corruption" has been used here to denote the practice, widespread in Asia, whereby public employees add fringe benefits, variously called "grease," "tea money" or "squeeze," to the salary and emoluments to which they are legally entitled. Yet the term corruption has its disadvantages. One is that there is an opprobrium attached to the word which Asians have not traditionally attached to the practice. In addition, "corruption" confuses the issue of responsibility. Who is the corrupter and who the corrupted? The policeman who exacts payment from the hawker and the truck driver for not enforcing the laws too rigorously seems to be taking advantage of their vulnerability. Yet investigation would no doubt reveal that the people who pay him off prefer this to the alternative of severe law enforcement; and, moreover, that his salary is so low that there is almost a presumption that he will supplement it in this fashion.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

In Saigon, a high-ranking U.S. official confesses that no reform of the Vietnamese police is possible unless salaries are raised substantially; but that, if this were done, all other government salaries would require similar readjustment. In other words, the cost of government would probably increase several fold. Yet in this respect the situation in Vietnam is mild compared with that in Indonesia. There, in recent years, inflation unparalleled elsewhere in time of peace has far outrun salaries; as a consequence, the salaried class has been forced to develop considerable ingenuity to accumulate enough money to survive. From 1961 through 1966—when inflation reached 1,500 per cent in a single year—stories of corrupt public servants were not limited to tales of extortion by tax officials and police officers, and of demands for gratuities from civil servants. There were also reports of teachers whose wealthier pupils required private tutoring, and in fact almost any service which public employees were expected to perform as a part of their duties, Indonesian civil servants apparently performed only for a fee. In this case, who did the corrupting? There can be no doubt that a few high-ranking officials took advantage of their positions to acquire vast fortunes which they frequently deposited in Geneva banks; but for the vast majority it appears that the system was the corrupter and that the public and civil servants alike were victims.

There is another side to the story. To what extent is the businessman victimized and to what extent does he victimize the petty official? A substantial number of Western businessmen in Asia seem to take pride in their ability to work with the system even when they complain about the cost of doing business. On the other hand, many Southeast Asian Chinese, deprived by local laws of an opportunity to earn a living legitimately even in the countries in which they were born, have had to resort to devious means in order to survive.

Since the foreign businessman is there in order to make money, it is not surprising that he is frequently a party to corruption. And since the amount of money at his disposal is generally large by Asian standards, the demands on him may be high. Last summer, a story was going the rounds in Southeast Asia about the way in which a foreign businessman arrives at the cost of doing business in Bangkok. It seems he goes into the office of the official whose assistance he needs and surreptitiously drops a wallet. Picking it up, he exclaims, "Oh! You dropped your wallet—with 85,000 baht in it." And the official replies, "No. I dropped a wallet with 250,000 baht in it." Yet the fact remains that the businessman pays off only to the extent that it is profitable for him to do so and, therefore, a degree of collusion unquestionably exists between him and, for example, the customs official. (In fact, the willingness of the foreign businessman to charge pay-offs to overhead and forget them may make it more difficult for the local businessman to compete.)

The fact that corruption appears to be endemic in traditional societies, where government is frankly and openly personal, has led some scholars to suggest that it is a mistake to make an issue of it; that it should simply be accepted as part of the system. Some will even maintain that, in the long run, the interests of society are really being served by the official who uses his cut of the public treasury to build his own business empire and thereby assist his country in the modernization process. Even if one accepted this latter argument as valid, one would always be running up against the case of the official who, having diverted public funds to his own purse, decided his private interests were best served by depositing funds in hard currency in Switzerland.

But one cannot simply dismiss this general argument. What Americans call corruption because it violates their standard of the "rule of laws and not of men," is viewed somewhat differently in the developing societies. Both officialdom—the "mandarinate" of dynastic China—and the subjects or citizens of these societies seem to continue to prefer, because they understand, personal government; and payment for favors received from public officials is just one of its aspects. (Ironically, those who have the least to gain from this system—the have-nots—are generally the ones most attached to it.) It would be self-defeating for us to ignore the values that have inhered in these societies traditionally and the obstacles that stand in the way of their replacement.

On the other hand, the United States is surely not spending billions of dollars in foreign assistance to these countries simply to reinforce their tribal—or feudal—systems and enrich their potentates, old and new, beyond anything previously dreamed of. If our intent is merely to promote stability in these states, it would no doubt be better if we left them to their own devices—that is, if we did not try to foist off on them economic systems which accentuate the differences between those persons with access to power—and AID dollars—and those without. If the intent is to assist them to compete in the world, we can hardly hope to accomplish this by an aid system which rewards not efficiency but avarice. And if it is to promote democracy, we are certainly defeating our own ends by adding gross new inequalities to the ones which already existed.

Here, perhaps, the Marxists have an advantage in Southeast Asia over the United States and its allies. Their goals are avowedly revolutionary and they are not concerned with the niceties of tradition. However, where the use of public funds is concerned, their standards are puritanical. (That is one reason why Indonesia's army leaders, in charge of a substantial number of public corporations, were so hostile to the Communists in the time of Sukarno.) And the fact that an "imperialist" or "neo-colonialist" power is spending billions of dollars every year to bolster, and in effect to enrich, feudal leaders is not lost on Asia's insurgents.

Some months ago I talked with the Governor of Sakhon Nakorn, a province in northeast Thailand, where insurgency has reportedly reached alarming proportions. Although the insurgents there are Thais, he said that the North Vietnamese living in the province were responsible for the unrest. When I asked why the Thais followed the lead of the North Vietnamese, the Governor misunderstood and replied, "Oh, we Thais hate the Vietnamese." I repeated the question and this time the answer was that the Vietnamese tell the people in the villages that the government in Bangkok "has sold the country to the Americans. The Thais who follow [the North Vietnamese] don't know what the government does for the villages."

In northeast Thailand it is understandable that the people don't know what the government has done for them, since the contribution isn't readily apparent. There is evidence everywhere of American "assistance," from military installations and personnel (which have caused prices in their vicinity to skyrocket) to four-lane highways (clearly not required to transport the area's scanty produce to market, but perhaps of assistance in moving armies). But according to the Governor, the annual per capita income in Sakhon Nakorn is only $5. This figure may be abnormally low, since AID officials cite a figure of $180, per family, for a neighboring and somewhat more prosperous province. However, neither figure provides a picture of an affluent peasantry or explains how Marshal Sarit was able to accumulate his huge estate.

Given ideal conditions, some of the villagers in the northeast should benefit in a few years from the AID dollars spent there for irrigation, agricultural experimentation and related programs. For the present, Thai officials are getting richer and the buying power of the peasantry is getting smaller. And relations between the United States and Thailand are getting noticeably cooler. In part, this is the result of the enlarged American presence there; in part, it stems from the fact that the Thai Government has met increasing criticism in the Western press, which it cannot control. Unhappily, the American Government, dependent on Thai support and Thai bases in the Vietnamese conflict, is even less able today than it was in Sarit's time to insure that American assistance is not misused.

LETTERS (Continued from page 682)

In 1963 it was clear changes had come to Czechoslovakia, but they were quiet and taken "realistically." Unlike the flashy display of Poland's freedom which blossomed after 1958, little has been made of Czechoslovakia's slow, but steady growth. But the basis was there in 1963 and it has since been seen at the Brussels and Montreal fairs, in the cinema and in the cultural and artistic development which these represent. Being based on a more consistent and solidly grounded foundation, a "realistic" foundation as Mr. Werth might say, it is more likely to have a lasting influence . . .

Harold L. Orbach

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Mailer on the Steps of the Pentagon

THE ARMIES OF THE NIGHT: History as a Novel, The Novel as History. By Norman Mailer. New American Library. 288 pp. $5.95.

ALAN TRACHTENBERG

Mr. Trachtenberg is in the English Department at Pennsylvania State University.

Norman Mailer was described some years ago as a writer capable of seeing himself as a "battlefield of history." The image is remarkably apt. From The Naked and the Dead, published just twenty years ago, to his latest and equally important book, The Armies of the Night, Mailer has found his themes by brooding over his relations to the large events of modern history, the shifting currents of public feeling and ideology, and especially to war. Mailer has been somewhat lonely until recently as the most consistently radical among our major writers, and the public performances both in and out of books which have earned his notoriety as a "personality" may be taken in part as compensation for these political frustrations.

His experiments in style, his explorations of extreme forms of behavior (literary and personal) can be seen as a quest for relevance and for fulfillment of some high role in American life which he conceives, along with Whitman, to be the function of the writer.

The Armies of the Night is a product of that search: the discovery of a form expressive of his vision of himself as a significant battlefield. History and self become an inseparable continuum in this complex and stylistically sophisticated nonfiction novel (against which Truman Capote's In Cold Blood appears as trivial virtuosity) dealing with the march on the Pentagon in October, 1967. Mailer makes that event into an elaborately conceived symbolic, in fact ritualistic, experience. The extraordinary achievement of this work is its demonstration of the process whereby history is invented in the chambers of consciousness—invented out of a fusion of the particularities of recorded fact and the necessities and bias of character. Only a writer steeped in American life, with all his wits about him, and with a genuinely compassionate social vision, could have produced a work so acute in its historical insights and so moving in its portraits of contemporaries. To put my judgment extremely, Mailer writes as if the techniques and faculties of fiction were invented for just such a penetration of real life.

Mailer sees the novel as a great, supple instrument of collective knowledge, a vehicle for social vision. In Cannibals and Christians he argued for the novelist's "task of explaining America." But America moves in obscure ways. "The novel," Mailer wrote, "gave up any desire to be a creation equal to the phenomenon of the country itself; it settled for being a metaphor." "Who can swear," he asks, that "there has not been something catastrophic to America in the failure of her novelists? Maybe we are the last liberators in the land."

The Armies of the Night attempts an act of liberation; it attempts to free the mind and feelings from inarticulateness. This of course is the function of all art, but Mailer's act is noteworthy in its scale, its ambition to formulate the central meanings of contemporary American experience. The result is far from a tract—far as well from a simple realistic account of experience. The method of the book is an exacting kind of artfulness which calls for an equally exacting effort of reading.

The book's subtitles suggest one of its exactions upon the reader. The first part, Book One (the bulk of the work), is the nonfiction novel proper: it presents "history" in the guise of a novelistic account of Mailer's own firsthand experiences. Book Two, written "in the cloak of an historic style," serves as a stylistic counterpoint to Book One: based on secondhand sources, it presents a more "objective" account, particularly of events which Mailer himself did not witness. It is a "precis of a collective novel," something like a scenario for a Tolstoyan treatment of the several facets of the event: the role of particular personalities and their various political stances in the planning of the march, a military analysis of the logistics of the march, of the assault upon the mall, of the army troops and demonstrators on the "front line" during the long night after the march. The change in perspective upon the same total event thus insists upon the interaction of subjective and objective points of view in order to grasp the full reality.

The two sections effectively complement each other and produce a unified, encompassing point of view toward the march and its symbolic meaning.

Taken by itself, Book Two is not nearly so persuasive or compelling a piece of writing as the earlier part, from which it takes its aesthetic justification as counterpoint. It seems too much a muted coda, adding information but not really extending insight and feeling beyond Book One.

It is in Book One that Mailer does his real work. Here we experience a quality of self-awareness which contains the book's authentic meanings. Mailer puts himself at the center of the action as a character, and tells the story in the third person, from the point of view of a sympathetic observer, harsh judge, and confidant of the feelings and reveries of the character named "Mailer." What might be taken for shameless egotism is in this case a cunning and subtle literary device. In numerous heuristic asides Mailer the author comments on his own devices, insinuating upon the reader the feeling that the final subject of the book includes the problem of creation itself. Several of his comments make the point that a writer, like the new revolutionaries, learns about himself from his style rather than his abstract ideas: "the clue to discovery was not in the substance of one's ideas, but in what was learned from the style of one's attack." Just as the entire work examines the aesthetics of the march—"revolution by theatre and without a script"—in order to perceive its essential meaning, so Mailer brings himself into an equally sharp field of vision as a "style," or series of styles.

The tactic proves so entirely successful because of a brilliantly demonstrated coincidence between the objective event and the subjective experience. The occasion, the implausible assault upon the Pentagon by a shaky coalition of old and New Left and "respectable" peace groups, "marching not to capture it, but to wound it symbolically," becomes the perfect vehicle to bring Mailer's own inner experience into focus, and Mailer himself, "a comic hero," a "figure of monumental disproportions," becomes the perfect figure through which "to recapture the precise feel of the ambiguity of the event and its monumental disproportions." Much like Henry Adams in his Education, Mailer here discovers an aptness between his own posture in the world and the crazy configurations of the world itself. This discovery is implicit and immanent in the subtlest movements of his prose, his shift from style to style and mood to mood—from a hilarity unmatched, I think, outside of Faulkner, to bemused nostalgia and seizures of terror. Mailer discovers himself as history's persona, if only for the moment—a point of conjunction of several vectors otherwise scattered and obscure in less coherent visions.

It is fitting, Mailer the author writes, that his "hero" should be "an egotist of the most startling misproportions, outrageously and often unhappily self-assertive, yet in command of a detachment classic in severity." He refers to this duality as a "two-headed" egotism, "thrusting itself forward the better to study itself." This image suggests an extreme version of the Romantic hunger for experience for the sake of art, and self-destructive overtones are indeed evident. But rarely, I think, has such a treacherous program for the interpenetration between art and life been so convincingly redeemed by the final artistic result.

His self-capture is all the more striking because one head of the ego performs such extremes of assertive behavior as the comic boozy harangue at the theatre, or the confrontation with the U.S. marshals and the murderous young Nazi in the police van—this recovery of the precise shape of experience requires a literary self-consciousness much like that cultivated by Henry James, and it is astonishing to find Mailer in possession of it. James himself assumes a similar point of view toward the figure of himself as a "restless analyst" of American life in The American Scene. In the case of both writers, extremities of style are directly in response to extremities and disproportions and incongruities in the social scene. The point may be that American experience itself drives writers to these stylistic resources. "Once history inhabits a crazy house," Mailer writes, "egotism may be the last tool left to history."

Other participants in the march may very well differ with Mailer regarding the meaning of the demonstration at the Pentagon. However, his commitment is that the reality of the event resides in the interplay between consciousness and event—not consciousness in the form of abstract analysis but, to borrow a phrase from Karl Marx, consciousness as "sensuous human activity." In part the book is a reproach to journalism as a form of historical writing (and as a major distortion of American life), and one of its methods is to include newspaper accounts in order to subvert them (Book One is framed by two such distortions in the press). The book insists that history is an artifact, a created version of reality. The novelist differs from the journalist precisely at the point where he confesses that he is creating rather than copying.

The version of history manifest in The Armies of the Night has its syndrome in the idea of confrontation, in which differing and opposing styles, of dress and speech, of mind and feeling, face one another with varying degrees of incomprehension. With his novelist's eye for distinguishing gestures of class and character, and his radical's recognition of political forces, Mailer dramatizes a sense of aching splits in American life. His portrait of middle-class hippies and New Leftists up against the guns of the military, manned by the sons of the working class and the small towns, intimates a desperate historical tragedy in the making. The book contemplates awful divisions within America, and if its underlying feeling is apocalyptic, it is accompanied by sorrow mingled with anticipation.

Most remarkable perhaps is the feeling of deep personal complicity in the tragedy: "How much guilt lay on the back of a good writer?" Mailer ruminates out of his own experience about the "great wall of total miscomprehension . . . built over the years between a writer and the audience reached by a newspaper." He speaks of new responsibilities hoisted upon writers by the vast power of the media to educate the nation into humane sensibility and self-consciousness. Mailer's deepest fears are of a division beyond repair, especially beyond the repair of literature. Calling to mind Fitzgerald's Crack-Up, he writes:

Yes, how much of Fitzgerald's long dark night may have come from that fine winnowing sense in the very fine hair of his nose that the two halves of America were not coming together, and when they failed to touch, all of history might be lost in the divide. Yes, there was a dark night if you had the illusion you could do something about it, and the conviction that not enough had been done. Or was it simply impossible—had the two worlds of America drifted irretrievably apart?

In this light Mailer sees the march on the Pentagon as "the first major battle of a war which may go on for twenty years." War, as in the beginning of his career, provides him with ultimate metaphors for our collective life. He suggests that the battle begun on the mall may loom as large in our history as the Civil War (from which he draws many of his images in the text). It already appears that the lessons in courage won in Washington are leading to a widening of the tactics of resistance and calculated disruptions. Mailer's intimations may be prophetic. But regardless of the course the several struggles of our day may take, The Armies of the Night is a permanent contribution to our literature—a unique testimony to literary responsiveness and responsibility.

IN CUBA TODAY

Someone there told me the story about Roberto Henderson, one I was to hear often in Guatemala [the name given, after the revolution, to the former United Fruit Company sugar mill in Cuba]. Henderson was the chief engineer at the mill, a very fine man; he was the only one to answer the angry statement of the American administrator that the Cubans would be unable to make sugar without them. He told them the Americans had never made sugar: that had been the work of the Cubans. "He told that last administrator to his face and that man was bad amongst the bad!" Henderson was now in Havana; he had been important in the organization of Acopio, the distribution organization for food.

Someone smiled: Henderson first went to the United States with the other executives and then returned.

"It was his Cuban wife," Paco Ortego said. "She was the one who wanted to go Up North. He divorced her. He said, Well, we have been here three months, I am going back. But she finally rejoined him and they are now remarried and living in Havana."

This story about Roberto Henderson was told me so often, with embellishments to broaden it and speculation to give it depth, that Henderson became a myth to me. Until one day, looking through a weekly, I came across a story on Acopio and in a photograph of some of its officials saw a fair, thin, middle-aged man identified as he. But as soon as Henderson was mentioned again the story filled out Henderson, who had diminished on being a man in a picture, to his proper dimensions. That double view is the vision of all Cubans: their heroes walk about them as human beings and legends; and the street one lives on and the place where one works are the settings of lived history.

From In the Fist of the Revolution: Life in a Cuban Country Town, by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $5.95). A first-person, novelistic account, by a frequent Nation contributor, of the author's three-month stay in the town of Mayari in the spring of 1967, affording an intimate view of the profoundly altered lives of people at all levels of society in revolutionary Cuba.

No Pretense to Coherency

UNSPEAKABLE PRACTICES. UNNATURAL ACTS. By Donald Barthelme. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 170 pp. $4.95.

CALVIN BEDIENT

Mr. Bedient teaches literature at Emory University, Atlanta.

Copping out from meaning is the latest gambit, the latest fillip, and the latest refuge of the arts: and of writers none has been so relentlessly and entertainingly unmeaningful as Donald Barthelme. In his brief, bright, breezy, stories, as in his delightful novella, Snow White, there is not even that implicit appeal to sanity, to an instinct for survival, which is found in the black humorists. There is only (in words from this new volume) "a frightful illness of the mind, lightmindedness." And this invites nothing more than the complicity of whatever nausea is felt about "knowledgeableness" and "significance" in the world today.

Light-mindedness—judging from these stories—is the product of the contemporary glut of jargons, ideologies, processes, "studies," messages and media—the giddiness and the sense of unauthenticity that this weltering variety involves, like an overdose of oxygen to the brain. Dislocation, fragmentation, above all skepticism—these are the keynotes of Barthelme's work. The dislocation is both spatial and historical. Thus in the story called "Edward and Pia," Sweden, Amsterdam, Leningrad, Copenhagen, Berlin and France are, to all effects, simultaneously the location of the hero and heroine; and in "A Picture History of the War," the Battle of Waterloo and the American Civil War are coeval with a certain Kellerman, who, among other things, reads, while running, an essay by Paul Goodman in Commentary. The far is spliced with the near, the past with the present, like successive frames in a film. Comanches rain arrows into the city—any city—while the IRA helps to defend it. Overloaded, the contemporary mind fuses out. Now is every time; everywhere is here.

As for the fragmentation in Barthelme, it is both symptom and reaction. Wholeness and coherency are "too much"; reality is authentic only in its pieces.

"Fragments," says the narrator of "See the Moon?" "are the only forms I trust." Hence most of the stories add on rather than "up." They are fragmentary in their parts and fragmentary as wholes. In their constant dislocations of narrative, their continual surprise and inconsequence, their sudden drops and sudden resumptions of subjects, they reflect the chaotic multiplicity of modern life—a subject of complaint since the 19th century—and, at the same time, exaggerate it in order to mock all surviving pretenses to coherency, whether of reason or of practice.

Since everything encroaches, everything has the same ambiguous importance. From "The President":

Our exhausted age wishes above everything to plunge into the heart of the problem, to be able to say, Here is the difficulty. And the new President, that tiny, strange, and brilliant man, seems cankered and difficult enough to take us there. In the meantime, people are fainting. My secretary fell in the middle of a sentence. Miss Kagle, I said. Are you all right? She was wearing an anklet of tiny silver circles. Each tiny silver circle held an initial: @@@@. . . Who is this person A? What is he in your life, Miss Kagle?

The tiny silver circles and the tiny President are of equal "significance"; "exhaustion" is shown in their equation. The mystery of "A" is as momentous, as minuscule, as "the heart of the problem"; the new President is as "strange" as the anklet, the fainting. Even as the passage expresses hope that the Leader will take us into the heart of the problem, it tells us that there is no heart, that there is only a shallow, cinematic flow of ambiguity—the result of the liquescence of any criteria that might have given a problem a "heart."

Barthelme's stories are thus unnatural acts. They are attempts—mocking attempts—at narrative in a time that is shapeless and that affords no principle of selection. Like William Burroughs, Barthelme creates a new kind of fiction by frustrating, spoofing or aggressively ignoring the expectations—of situation, development, denouement—raised by the old. He is light-minded with a vengeance; or, if light-mindedness is indeed an illness, militant mockery is its slightly feverish principle. Hence these stories, though so much like play, are not quite free. They mock contemporary life, they mock the art of fiction itself, not in simple exuberance, and certainly not in full comic gaiety but in a somewhat painful merriment, and with ever so slight a feeling of having to vomit.

In most of these stories, so dreadfully "knowing" of the "knowledgeable knowers" of today, the mockery is total, a machine gun of disbelief. Let anything

Cuba today

★ "The most discerning, sensitive, and faithful portrait of contemporary Cuba since Warren Miller's 90 Miles From Home . . . There is no other book like it."—LEE LOCKWOOD

★ "A thoroughly charming, affectionate, but nonetheless critical account of day-to-day country life in Cuba, disclosing a style and humanity that will undoubtedly surprise American readers, confuse the press and cause panic in the State Department."

—JULES FEIFFER

★ "An intimate, amusing, dispassionate account of exactly what the revolution has meant."

—SIR HERBERT READ

IN THE FIST OF THE REVOLUTION JOSE YGLESIAS

$5.95, now at your bookstore

PANTHEON

claim seriousness—sin or war, death or anxiety, Robert Kennedy or methodology—and Barthelme will let the air out of its bag. Or let anyone speak of purpose, milestones, responsibility, potential, solutions, analysis, functioning, or the “meaning,” say, of Barthelme’s fiction, and Barthelme will be lurking there, grinning and taking notes with a pen dipped in the immunity of an absolute unseriousness. “A grand word, meaningful,” he says. The man is filled to overflowing with distrust of “significance.” Who is not? What other age has talked so endlessly, so unconvincingly, of meaning, or of the meaning of meaning? The inevitable reaction has come—in Barthelme’s case, with a light-mindedness that is delectably ironic.

Perhaps in two of the stories, “Report” and “The Police Band,” Barthelme loses a little of his cool. In the first, for example, which ridicules “the war” as “a process”—the only “thing” that “seems to be functioning” (“Other people’s things don’t seem to be working”)—he scores off against the automatism of “multi-disciplined problem-solving team” projects, doubting that “a moral sense” (“It is on punched cards, perhaps the most advanced and sensitive moral sense the world has ever known”) will prevent the rending, devouring, and crushing of the enemy. Yet as a “story” teller, of course, Barthelme is neither better nor worse for any betrayal of commitment. His success depends only on the gusto and perverse inspiration of his inventions—and to some extent on the transparency of their allusion to the world they mock. Five of these sixteen stories—“Alice,” “Game,” “The Indian Uprising,” “This Newspaper Here,” “Can We Talk”—are dull, willed creations. The rest—though not up to the dazzle of Snow White—are delightful. “There is enough aesthetic excitement here,” to quote from “The Indian Uprising,” “to satisfy anyone but a damned fool.”

amount of distortion, misinformation and just plain absurdity about Chaliapin and his life that is found in the book.

The attribution of authorship to Gorky, to begin with, can only be qualified as opportunistic. Pages of My Life was dictated by Chaliapin to Gorky’s stenographer and had the benefit of Gorky’s editorial assistance. None of the earlier foreign or Russian editions (including the version in the 1957 two-volume collection of Chaliapin materials published in the Soviet Union by the Soviet musicologist E. A. Grosheva, from which the present English version is purportedly translated) list Gorky as the author or even ghost writer. The closest Gorky himself came to claiming any share in the book was in the letter he wrote at the behest of the Soviet Government, to be presented as evidence in the French court where Chaliapin, by then a rabidly anti-Soviet émigré, was suing for damages for an unauthorized republication of the biography in the Soviet Union. The lawsuit ended the friendship of decades between the writer and the singer, but even in a document intended to discredit Chaliapin in every way, all Gorky lays claim to is editorial assistance and transcribing the stenographer’s notes. None of the complete editions of Gorky’s works in the USSR includes this book, although it has been announced for the forthcoming centenary edition as a work Gorky helped edit.

All the pertinent letters from Gorky on the origin of the book are reproduced in the current English edition of the autobiography, causing the “as told to” and the raves on the dust jacket about Gorky’s “brilliant handling” of his subject to ring a bit hollow. And, since the English text is a free rearrangement of the Russian original rather than a literal translation, a more accurate designation of the volume would have been: “Chaliapin’s Autobiography as edited by Gorky and retold by Nina Froud and James Hanley.”

In addition to the autobiography, the book contains a selection of Gorky-Chaliapin correspondence, portraits and

The Uses of Chaliapin

CHALIAPIN: An Autobiography As Told To Maxim Gorky. With Supplementary Correspondence and Notes. Translated from the Russian, compiled and edited by Nina Froud and James Hanley. Stein & Day. 320 pp. $10.

SIMON KARLINSKY

Mr. Karlinsky is professor of Slavic languages and literature at the University of California. He is the author of Marina Cvetaeva: Her Life and Art (University of California Press).

One of the earliest memories of the celebrated Russian basso, Feodor Chaliapin, as recorded in the first of his two autobiographies (Pages of My Life), was the folk legend he heard from his mother about the fall of Satan from grace and the elevation of Michael to the rank of archangel. In the version that Avdotya Chaliapina told her 5-year-old son, the Lord, angered by the rebellion of the archangel Satanael, decided to replace him with a strange, hairy, but meek supernatural creature named Micha, who just happened to be around in Heaven. “Well then, having driven away Satanael, God called Micha unto Him and said: ‘Although thou art not intelligent, it would still be better if I make thee the commander of Heavenly Hosts, an archangel. Thou wouldst not cause trouble in Heaven. And henceforth, thou shalt be not Micha, but Michael, while Satanael shall be simply Satan!’”

This the-last-shall-be-the-first story, so very relevant to Chaliapin’s own subsequent myth, made an indelible impression on the little boy. In the current English version of this biography (an earlier American edition appeared in 1926 as Pages from My Life), the passage just quoted appears thus: “God sent for him and said: ‘Although you are not clever, I will take you as head of the Heavenly forces and as arch-strategist. You will start no trouble here, and henceforth you will be called, not Mikh, but Satan.’”

Such inability on the part of the editors and translators of this beautifully produced and illustrated volume to tell the difference between Satan and Michael, between archangel (arkhi-stratig) and arch-strategist, or to discern the significance of the little legend for the rest of the autobiography, goes a long way toward explaining the vast

TODAY DECIDED THE QUESTION

*I turn from your touch
From the mackerel in the window
From the frog pinned at the point of a knife.*

*I hate the hermit in the ford
The maid with her hands of pumice
The flower vendor and his gladiolas
I hate the wax eyes of my last whore.*

*I’ve jumped time to sit in yachts sucking gin
Wondering at the flavor of your new lover
Tasting the salt in the wind.*

ROGER APLON

other Chaliapiniana. The acknowledgments section and introductions tell of twelve years spent in preparing the volume, of trips to the Soviet Union, and of digging up rare materials in Soviet archives. Just why all this traveling and research were necessary is utterly puzzling because, with the exception of a few letters published elsewhere and an article culled from a popular Soviet magazine, all the material in the book, including the annotations, is taken from the 1957 two-volume Grosheva collection. So resolutely did the editors restrict themselves to this one source, that even the most important single Chaliapin publication, his second and far more detailed autobiography, Mask and Soul (English version, Man and Mask), published in France and in America in 1932, was read by them, as they admit, only in the bowdlerized selections included in the same Grosheva collection. The sections of Mask and Soul censored for Soviet publication (approximately one-third of the original text) are indispensable for understanding the biography, the attitudes and the politics of the singer. But these omitted passages and chapters would be too much at variance with the sentimentalized image of Chaliapin as the great democratic, nationalistic and realistic artist of the Russian people, whose officially encouraged cult has been a prominent feature of the post-Stalinist period in Soviet cultural life. And while an American volume dedicated to fostering this patently false and slanted image is at least ludicrous, viewed within its Soviet context the Chaliapin revival (of which the Grosheva collection and its American Gorky-credited avatar are symptoms) is of considerable interest, and provides us with valid insights into recent Soviet cultural policies.

The partial amnesty of the more daring and innovative 20th-century Russian art prohibited under Stalin is still proceeding cautiously and hesitantly. Much of the earlier work of Sergei Prokofiev is still under virtual ban. While the poetry of Andrei Belyi has been republished, his great experimental novels, Petersburg and Kotik Letaeu, are still unavailable and unmentionable. Meyerhold has been posthumously rehabilitated politically, but none of his magnificent productions has been revived, and his practices and theories are relegated to the past and are not permitted to have any impact on the current Soviet theatre. While these three innovators, who died as loyal Soviet citizens and members of Soviet artists' unions are allowed what may be called a partial recognition, three sworn enemies of the Soviet regime whose works were previously taboo—Chaliapin, the writer Ivan Bunin, and the composer Serge Rachmaninov—are now enthusiastically accepted and prop-agandized by the Soviet cultural establishment. Such paradoxically selective rehabilitation makes sense only if seen as a triumph of the aesthetics of Socialist realism over politics or historical justice. Neither Bunin nor Chaliapin nor Rachmaninov was considered in any way progressive or revolutionary or even democratic when they made their respective artistic reputations in prerevolutionary Russia. But they were all close friends of Maxim Gorky (until they broke with him over political issues after they emigrated to the West), which is practically a cachet de noblesse for purposes of rehabilitation.

Unlike Gorky, these three had no tolerance or understanding for any of the 20th-century developments in the arts, remaining aristocratically aloof from the main trends in the Russian artistic revival of the first decades of the century. Chaliapin, in particular, was actively hostile to all methods of staging opera that deviated from the melodramatic Russian stagings of the 1890s, and he was opposed to all important 20th-century music (with the exception of Rachmaninov's). In his heyday, he was powerful enough to sabotage some of the newer music, preventing Russian productions of Richard Strauss and blocking Diaghilev's project of a joint instrumentation of Moussorgsky's Khovanshchina by Ravel and Stravinsky. As Stravinsky tells it: "Unfortunately, however, Diaghilev cared less about establishing a good instrumentation of the opera and rescuing it from Rimsky-Korsakov than about our version as a new vehicle for Chaliapin. That idiot from every nonvocal point of view, and from some of these, could not realize the value of such instrumentation. He declined to sing, and the project was abandoned, though we had already done considerable work." (Stravinsky and Craft, Conversations with Igor Stravinsky.)

In current Soviet aesthetics, traditional and nationalistic late-19th-century art is still mechanically equated with such concepts as "progressive" and "realistic." It is their parochialism and their traditionalism that make the émigrés Bunin, Rachmaninov and Chaliapin so eminently acceptable to the post-Stalinist Soviet cultural authorities, rather than their artistic achievements, which are undeniable in the cases of the first two.

During his long musical career, Chaliapin was many things to many men. For Maxim Gorky, he was the very embodiment of the Russian nation. "Such men appear to remind us all how strong, handsome and talented the Russian people are," wrote Gorky. Nicholas II agreed (one of the few imaginable subjects on which the monarch and the

"The most important documentary study on America's participation in and responsibility for the war in Vietnam."

—HENRY STEELE COMMAGER

IN THE NAME OF AMERICA

A Study Commissioned and Published by Clergy and Laymen Concerned About Vietnam

"This book is a fundamental challenge to anyone, whatever his preconceptions about the American presence in Vietnam."

—NAT HENTOFF

"It is a saddening experience to read the evidence collected in this impressive book. One can only feel shame and horror—that these things have happened, that we have permitted them to happen."

—NOAM CHOMSKY

Cloth, $4.95; Paper, $2.95

At all bookstores or write direct to Clergy and Laymen Concerned About Vietnam, 475 Riverside Drive, Room 547, New York 10027, all orders prepaid Distributed by E. P. DUTTON & CO.

William J. Lederer

in his most urgently important book spells out the reasons why we Americans are

OUR OWN WORST ENEMY

The author of A NATION OF SHEEP and co-author of THE UGLY AMERICAN has written "a book blazing with harsh facts. It should be required reading for every American who feels the slightest compassion for those who are fighting and dying in South Vietnam."—Book Week

At all bookstores, $4.95

W. W. NORTON & COMPANY, INC.
55 Fifth Ave., N. Y. 10003

writer could conceivably see eye to eye). He gave Chaliapin a gold watch and the title of His Majesty's Soloist (later Chaliapin demanded that the watch be exchanged for a showier one that would be more suitable for demonstrating the largess of the Russian Czar on trips abroad). Both Gorky and Nicholas II (as the whole Rasputin business well demonstrated) were susceptible to the peculiarly Russian mystique of the Divinely Inspired Peasant, as the Representative of the Masses.

This particular appeal was something on which Chaliapin, like his contemporary, Rasputin, never failed to capitalize. He was not merely a singer to be judged on his vocal or dramatic abilities but always the Archangel Michael who had to be loved and admired because he had once been the lowly and hairy Micha. His foreign audiences saw him primarily as an exotic and barbarous Russian, whose overwhelming voice and presence made them overlook his hammy acting and his monumental lack of the most elementary musical taste and culture. A singer with a narrowly provincial repertoire, he made an international name for himself almost solely in the operas by the Russian Five. Back in Russia, despite an occasional Don Basilio or Mefistofele his favorite roles were in such god-awful third-rate works as Anton Rubinstein's Demon and Serov's Judith. If we are told that the interpretations of Boris Godunov by Pinza, London or Christoff owe a lot to Chaliapin, it is only in the sense that Jeanne Moreau may owe some of her acting techniques to Theda Bara.

It is of course understandable that a charismatic crowd pleaser like Chaliapin should find his admirers both at home and abroad. His weepy, breast-beating Boris, his moaning and cooing renditions of Massenet's Elégie or Rubinstein's Persian Love Song are bound to be appreciated by the type of listener who is left cold by the far superior musicianship and vocal artistry of a Fischer-Dieskau, a Ghiaurov or a Donald Gramm.

During his emigration, Chaliapin lived in Paris where he became the rallying point for the most hidebound of the émigrés who now saw in him the embodiment of the vanished glories of Imperial Russia. For Vladimir Mayakovsky, who denounced him in a long poem and never tired of needling him in his articles and topical poetry, Chaliapin stood for the worst and the most antiquated in Russian theatre and music, and was a foreign imperialist flunky to boot. To encounter him now in an American-published book as a pro-Soviet pal of Gorky and Lenin is paradoxical, but on the whole, harmless. The official Soviet cult of Chaliapin, on the other hand, that can produce two 800-page volumes of materials dedicated to the proposition that Chaliapin's art was realistic and progressive, and that it represents the finest in early 20th-century music (while dismissing Igor Stravinsky in a contemptuous footnote as a "militant apologist for formalism in music"), can only be seen as ominous and profoundly reactionary in every conceivable meaning of that term.

the exclusion of reconstructed tableaux—say Schwitter's Merzbau, or the Cabaret Voltaire. Dali's 1938 taxi with snail-covered manikins was a bow in that theatrical direction, although not enough to satisfy those who deplore the absence of the Surrealist "spirit" from the Modern's halls. There were many, too, who were irritated more or less justifiably by director William Rubin's omission of such artists as Alechinski, Fahlstrom, Saul Steinberg, Balthus, the later work of the Abstract-Expressionists, Robert Morris, et al. This criticism is made inevitable by the untidy pervasiveness of Surrealism as a sensibility—a pervasiveness that no exhibition could register, except as a schematic chart that must lop off interesting stylistic tributaries and, worse, whole clauses from the endless poem. But the paradox of this "inclusionist" comment is that it hankered after less rather than more responsibility from the show's organizer—that it would have preferred a more wayward, unstable and imbalanced tally of the Surrealist achievement.

For the real objection was to the Museum's "centralist" position, and the pedagogical neatness of its display. Even though it was always acknowledged, this virtue was given little priority, except by critics of a formalist persuasion. For Nicolas Calas in Arts and John Ashbery in Art News, both of whom are devoted to and even shaped by the movement, Mr. Rubin's art historical penchant for viewing any work simultaneously as an object and an influence mars the perception of its real significance. The attempt to make sense of the Surrealist congeries of style led Rubin, in Calas' words, "to viewing the Surrealists as bastard heirs of Picasso and Matisse, and the post-Surrealists as bastard Surrealists. What a dismal heritage."

It is curious that the intercultural and iconographic disciplines needed to see continuities in such vast and unruly material should have been precisely those deplored by writers committed to imaginative cross-fertilization in Surrealism's name! Leaving aside The Village Voice and The New York Free Press, which judged such scholarship as mere pedantry, one sees the important thrust against the show in the notion that Surrealism has been "reduced" to a history of its types. It is a clash between two opposing visions of historicity: the one that detaches itself from earlier events in order to consider them from an overall and accurate, but still invented perspective; and the other that nostalgically, yet with much truth, upholds and identifies with, a past impulse that is undying.

Surely this quarrel would not have emerged had the subject of discussion

The Best Way
To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 5-27-68

1111 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Pan-America; $2 foreign)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

ART

MAX KOZLOFF

The Dada, Surrealism and their Heritage show at the Museum of Modern Art has been the target, unlike most exhibitions of its large scale but innocent historical intentions, of a farrago of brickbats and kudos. I am not the appropriate writer, and this is not the place to report knowledgeably, on the scholarly contributions of this museological enterprise. But its press reception tells so much about the present state of art, the current tensions in taste, that I make bold to use this response as a roundabout socio-critical mirror of the aesthetic milieu of New York.

One of the immediate issues turns out to be the exhibition's thoroughness, an issue that can be broken down into two sections. The first, of lesser interest, concerns what could have been, as compared with what was, included at the museum. It is useless now to lament

For a conspiracy "there doesn't have to be a formal meeting; A MEETING OF THE MINDS IS ENOUGH, and which can be proved by circumstantial evidence."

John E. Wall, Asst. U.S. Attorney 4/18/68

HAVE YOU EVER CONSPIRED WITH DR. SPOCK?

Have you ever THOUGHT that the war in Vietnam is illegal, unjust or immoral?

Have you ever SYMPATHIZED with those men who, in conscience, refuse to fight in such a war?

Have you EVER HOPED that America would turn her resources towards solving her divisive domestic crises and away from wasteful military interventions abroad?

Have you always FELT FREE to share your worst fears and best hopes for America with fellow citizens in public as well as private?

You may wonder, if these are considered the thoughts and acts of conspirators, how would a free man think and act?

You may wonder how free men can defend themselves, if in trying citizens for conspiracy, the government claims it need not prove that the defendants actually committed any overt illegal acts; or if, in trying them for conspiracy to counsel, it claims that it need not name those counseled by the defendants, nor prove that they influenced the activity of any other persons. Constitutional rights of free expression and due process of law can thus be abused.

The conspiracy trial in Boston has received much public attention. However little notice seems to be given to the hundreds of other cases which are now before the courts. These are the cases of conscientious young men, often standing alone in hostile or unsympathetic communities, facing the threat of up to five years in jail. Support MUST be obtained for these men, so that they may have the adequate legal defense which they, too, justly deserve, and which is their right.

To provide this defense, even if lawyers volunteer their time, an ample reservoir of funds must be created: funds for extensive legal research, transcripts of court proceedings, appeal fees and secretarial costs, all of which are essential elements of adequate legal defense. This is especially so in the complicated area of selective service law in which few lawyers have had extensive experience.

To meet this need the CIVIL LIBERTIES LEGAL DEFENSE FUND has been established. The Fund, an independent, non-profit, non-political organization is now engaged in a nationwide campaign to raise money for the legal defense of conscientious resisters and their supporters in the Coffin-Spock case and all other cases; to serve the legal profession by aiding in the formation of panels of attorneys experienced in selective service law; and to facilitate the initiation of affirmative legal actions in the area of civil liberties.

The Fund has already contributed not only to the defense of Coffin, Ferber, Goodman, Raskin and Spock, but to many others as well. Regardless of the outcome of the presidential campaign or the attempts to begin peace talks, these cases will continue to be prosecuted. For some young men the work of the Fund can mean the difference between liberty and five years in prison.

YOU CAN HELP MAKE THAT DIFFERENCE. PLEASE GIVE WHAT YOU CAN AS SOON AS POSSIBLE.

The persons whose names appear below are members of the Board of Directors of Civil Liberties Legal Defense Fund, Inc. Affiliations are given for identification only.

ROBERT ALAN ROSENTHAL
Lecturer on Education
Harvard University
Chairman

ABRAHAM J. HESCHEL
Professor of Jewish Ethics, Jewish
Theological Seminary
Honorary Chairman

JOHN C. BENNETT
President, Union
Theological Seminary

ARTHUR L. BERNEY
Professor, Boston
College Law School

VERN COUNTRYMAN
Professor, Harvard
University Law School

ROBERT A. DAHL
Professor of Political Science
Yale University

REV. ROBERT F. DRINAN, S.J.
Dean, Boston
College Law School

EDWARD J. ENNIS
General Counsel
American Civil Liberties Union

W. H. PERRY
Vice President
Fund for the Republic

ARTHUR KINOF
Professor, Rutgers
University Law School

MARYIN M. KAPATHIN
General Counsel
Central Committee for Conscientious Objectors

R.W.B. LEWIS
Master of Cahoon College
Yale University

W. E. SPENCER PARSONS
Dean, Rockefeller
Memorial Chapel
University of Chicago

CHARLES P. PRICE Preacher to the University
Harvard University

Civil Liberties Legal Defense Fund, Inc.

8 Bow Street, Cambridge, Massachusetts 02138

- ☐ I wish to contribute $..... (Make checks payable to CLLDF, Inc.)
- ☐ I wish to assist CLLDF in its fund raising efforts.
- ☐ I would like to make a substantial contribution. Please contact me.
- ☐ I would like further information.

NAME

STREET

CITY STATE ZIP

(CLLDF, Inc. is making application for tax-exempt status.)

been Cubism, say, or the Bauhaus. These movements do not generate today the same amount of emotion as Surrealism because in the case of the latter an extra-aesthetic presumption stubbornly nags not only the social, but the psychic conscience of its spectators. Formulated once again in terms of history, the debate pivots on whether you take seriously the idea that art issues primarily from art, or accept literally the Surrealist assumption that art can transcend itself (i.e., its historical moment and hermetic instincts) and permanently affect life in the same way as could an "action." For a contemporary art criticism that is obviously fatigued by the triviality of formal analysis, yet whose impulses are still primarily aesthetic, this is a crucial and disturbing question. And it is no less so for the quite justifiably estranged youth who do not wish to see the single most congenially anarchic movement in 20th-century art memorialized, as though in a cemetery.

The one prominent critic undisturbed by this predicament is Hilton Kramer of The New York Times, who sympathetically wrote that William Rubin "has exposed the harsh and unremitting way in which history itself has disclosed Dada and Surrealism to be, despite all hopes and protestations to the contrary, primarily movements of aesthetic thought and artistic accomplishment." That this was quite sufficient vindication of their treatment at the Modern was seconded by Barbara Rose in Vogue and Philip Leider, editor of Artforum. The latter, however, considers the Surrealist adventure to be "discredited," since it was a stopgap attempt of bad art to meet the challenge of Cubism by subject matter that, no matter how "convincing," had nothing to do with good painting. He cites with approval the opinion of another formalist writer, Michael Fried, that "the extent to which a painting is contaminated by the Surrealist sensibility is the extent of its failure." Those selections which he approves—and they include work by Miró, Matta and Giacometti—Leider praises for a finite and measurable "goodness" that somehow escaped relative "contamination," or at least proves it to be a secondary issue. Miró becomes the whipping boy here, the Miró whose undoubted brilliance as a painter is as recognized as the inextricable depth of his engagement with Surrealism is despised. Evidently, there are "good" Surrealists, in much the same fashion that some people speak of "good" Jews.

The great peculiarity of this rather soreheaded controversy in New York is that the two sides take stances exactly the opposite of what would have been expected of them. The one group, not caring for this artistic tradition and conceiving it as a kind of dropout, nevertheless applauds its installation at the Museum. The other party, partisan toward Dada and Surrealism, rejects the most ambitious and comprehensive presentation of it that we have yet seen. The only plausible interpretation of this reversal I can think of is that we are witnessing a squabble over proprietorship (particularly evident in the hassle about the Heritage section of the exhibition). This occurs at a moment when Cubism has long ago shown itself to have played out its most vital implications, and Dada and Surrealism are still being absorbed confusingly within the most disparate artistic frontiers.

If successful, a large exhibition might provoke certain fruitful areas of thinking. Inevitably, one of these levels of thought is the scholastic, and one can already imagine some of the future collations of the less familiar objects—the Bellmers, the Marcel Jancos, etc.—with the established corpus of the Surrealist imagination; or one can now more confidently relate "peinture-poesie" to some of its variants today. No less suggestive is the enhanced picture of the relation between Giacometti and American sculpture of the thirties and forties, or Miró's and Ernst's effect on our painting during the same time. Other, larger questions present themselves, too: what manner of artistic impulse is it that not merely survives most recent shifts in style but is implicit in those shifts, and can still explicitly affect their outcomes? (Or conversely, what in the nature of modern styles permits this kind of infiltration?) If it could not have explored such issues, the journalism I have described might at least have indicated them. Instead, with characteristic impatience, it refused to treat the show as a field day for connecting new circuits in the Dada-Surrealist switchboard, and indulged its primitive though obviously legitimate lust for talking about value.

It becomes hard for me to resist any longer adding my voice to the dialogue. Though I have no stake, and do not aspire to create a stake in Dada and Surrealism, I can still be as opinionated as anyone else. Mr. Rubin's admirable detachment, in his catalogue and his show, was necessary for him to clarify a record too long obscured and distorted. His efforts are unthickened by the coagulating passions of criticism. On the other hand, the most impressive and yet fluent critique of Surrealism I know is by Herbert Muller, in New Directions, 1940. He challenges the Surrealists' self-image of freedom on the ground of their dependence on the 19th-century absolutism of Freud, who conceived of the unconscious as "true psychic reality," a mechanistically fixed and commanded cause, rather than a mere description, of phenomena inside or behind or beyond psychic events. It is Muller's special objection that commitment to this absolutism paradoxically induces a kind of chaotic license. "Conceive," he writes, "the Unconscious as a vast storehouse to which Imagination has direct access, and its contents still need to be evaluated; what comes up is often trivial or freakish. Conceive it as the matrix of all impulse and desire, and these still need to be governed; how behavior ends is always more important than where it begins. Conceive it altogether as a wider and deeper self from which 'saving experiences' may come, and it is still no self at all until it has become self-conscious."

Whenever the first elements in this series of propositions win out over the second in the tangible underpinning of the Dada or Surrealist work of art, then they seem to have humiliated the value I would accord the work. For self-consciousness is the only faculty that can perceive and require a set of values. The correlative of this is that art generally stems only from art—its particular form of self-consciousness, as traced in its lost and regained (hence constantly rediscovered) awareness of its own history. This history, however, can never solely be a succession of physical configurations or an exclusive series of equations of objects with an outer or inner reality. A visual work of art is, I think, a condensed and crystallized set of allusions to sentiments and appearances that are manifested by forms and images. If this be taken as true, then it is inconceivable to me that the literalist views of Dada and Surrealism pronounced so vehemently this last month, views that embrace the whole of the most pervasive tradition in 20th-century art, can be other than partial and misguided. They do not recognize allusions as sufficient credentials for works of art that are not more or less handsome objects, or more or less effective gestures. To assume such requirements for the pieces assembled at the Museum is, oddly enough, to be strait jacketed by one's own self-consciousness, or rather, super-ego. For, if artistic allusion is to be credible, there must be some relaxation, some flexibility and latitude, in the way we program our responses. Let them be responses to authentic stimuli, rather than prescriptive judgments of no more than aesthetic myths. It is a tribute to the vitality of Dada and Surrealism that they still elicit such partisan reaction. But it is a misfortune that the light the exhibition reflects on criticism still reveals the futility and obsolescence of its entrenched positions.

THEATRE & FILMS/ Robert Hatch

The socio-political high spirits that characterize so much of the news coming now from Czechoslovakia is to be found in full voice at the Public Theater, where Joseph Papp has staged The Memorandum by Vaclav Havel, a young Czech playwright and the literary manager of the Balustrade Theater in Prague. The Czechs today seem able to generate an impressive amount of reformist zeal without developing the self-righteousness and intolerance that customarily accompany such house cleaning. But distance makes this impression unreliable, and it is pleasant to have it supported by Mr. Havel's bureaucratic burlesque.

Not that The Memorandum is to be taken as a metaphoric reading of the readjustments now taking place within Czech Communist forces; indeed, it was written some time back and before the current positions had emerged. Rather, Mr. Havel entertains himself, and his audience, with some speculation as to what usually lies behind the more passionate ideological disputes. Chiefly, he finds, it is a matter of whose initials will validate a chit—a dominance too loosely guarded by those who enjoy it and hungered for with exaggerated appetite by those who do not.

In a true bureaucracy, any pretext will serve to test the nerves and resourcefulness of the reigning manager. In this case, the showdown comes over the adoption of Ptydepe as the official language for inter-office memoranda, the peculiar virtue of the tongue being that it can express with utter accuracy every nuance of every idea habitually transmitted in such communications (with the considerable side benefit that it is incapable of expressing other ideas in any form at all). The shocking fact is that the manager does not read Ptydepe, and his position is made no more tenable by the fact that neither does anyone else, with the exception of one very minor clerk who takes to the pigeon-hole pidgin with Bartleby-like assiduity. He would obviously "go far" if the revolution were to prevail.

Alas for him, Ptydepe is mere pretext, and when the rubber stamps have changed hands its hour of ascendancy is done. A chief clerk has been found wool-gathering, an assistant chief clerk has been rewarded for excellent generalship in the lunchroom—so empires topple and mutations of power spur the social evolution of the species.

All this is performed with excellent wit by a cast that Mr. Papp has schooled to crisp speech, elliptical gesture and rapid movement. (Their agility is both improved and enforced by the revolving stage on which Douglas Schmidt has placed his office set. It spins, not only to change scenes but to place the hierarchic positions of the contestants in jeopardy—they must skip nimbly to stay in one place.) I do not know how much Mr. Papp has done to Americanize the atmosphere, but if his direction has been neutral in this regard, the universality of office types suggested by Havel's play is impressive. In addition to the expectable yea sayers and rule watchers, there is the stenographer who repeatedly prays leave to run out for light refreshments; the loud and bawdy administrative assistant, a sort of den mother to the young bachelors; the fat-tish boy who always knows what's on for lunch. The members of the cast who make the sharpest impression—if only because they have the best opportunities—are Paul Stevens, John Heffernan, Sudie Bond, William Duell and Olympia Dukakis. Brad Sullivan has a rewarding, if cramping, part as an official spy hidden in the ventilating system—a position he compromises by an inability to stifle outbursts of protest against breached protocol. The theatre of moral instruction is not often this much fun.

A Czech work about which I have more mixed feelings is the film by Zbynek Brynych, The Fifth Horseman Is Fear. It opens on a huge arrangement of chairs, chinaware, clocks and violins in profusion upon the walls. This might be an exhibition of exemplary objects in some modern museum, but it is a collecting point for confiscated Jewish property during the time of German conquest. Somehow the graphic appeal works against the implications.

The house in which lives the hero, Dr. Braun, and particularly his own room, are as rational as a Mondrian. Brynych works with beauty: a shower room in which Czech whores prepare for their night with the Wehrmacht takes on the delights of an Impressionist vision of bathers—and never mind the overtones that showers evoke in the history of the Third Reich.

I think I understand the intention: by making life so beautiful, down to the least significant clothes peg, the most fleeting female torso, the accidental montage of a peeling exterior wall, you screw up the horror of impending extermination. Even an insane asylum, staged as a dance, can heighten the desirability of existence. But though I could respect that response on the part of another viewer, it did not work so for me. Decor fenced me off from the abomination.

Or perhaps it is only that I was more

TICKETS NOW ON SALE
AT BOX OFFICE OR BY MAIL

THE 6½ HOUR,
TWO-PART
PRODUCTION OF
LEO TOLSTOY'S

WAR and PEACE

PRESENTED BY THE WALTER READE
ORGANIZATION AND SATRA •
IN COLOR • STEREOPHONIC SOUND •
70MM WIDE SCREEN •
RELEASED BY CONTINENTAL

SHOWN IN TWO PARTS, EACH AT A
SEPARATE PERFORMANCE. YOU
CAN SEE PART I AND PART II ON
SAME DAY—OR ON DIFFERENT DAYS.

All matinee and evening performances:
ORCH. & LOGE $7.50. FRONT BALC. $6.50.
REAR BALC. $5.50. Price of ticket includes admission to both parts. Performances daily
at 2 and 8 PM.

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

If you cannot decide when purchasing tickets the date you wish to see Part I, you can obtain a special Exchange Coupon, which will be redeemed for a Part I reserved seat ticket, in advance, at the box office or by mail.

MAY

	SUNDAY	MONDAY	TUESDAY	WEDNESDAY	THURSDAY	FRIDAY	SATURDAY
MAY				1	2	3	4
EVE				1	2	3	4
MAY	5	6	7	8	9	10	11
EVE	5	6	7	8	9	10	11
MAY	12	13	14	15	16	17	18
EVE	12	13	14	15	16	17	18
MAY	19	20	21	22	23	24	25
EVE	19	20	21	22	23	24	25
MAY	26	27	28	29	30	31
EVE	26	27	28	29	30	31

TICKETS MAY BE CHARGED TO DINER'S CLUB, CARTE BLANCHE, AMERICAN EXPRESS.

THE DEMILLE A WALTER READE
47th St. & 7th Ave. CO 5 8430 THEATRE

aware of the conscious taste because the story failed to seize me. I believe it. I honor it, I have never seen it better done. But I have seen it done so often. The Jewish doctor, stripped of his profession, who nevertheless must heal; the frightened human being, whose compassion will not permit him to save his own life at the expense of another's pain. It is fine and it used to restore one's faith. But it has become a cliché and lost its restorative powers.

And one aspect of the picture I do not believe at all. The Czech police have come to the old Jew's room, where a wounded partisan lies hidden. The lieutenant (as clean-jawed and Marine-cropped as the hero of any Support Your Local Police TV serial) clearly knows the man is there and clearly spares the doctor. It is only the phone call of a neighbor crazed with fear that brings on the denouement. I can't swallow quising cops who retain a soft spot for defiant Jews. Something of the same moral ambiguity struck me about The Shop on Main Street. There is a need, apparently, to admit that the contagion of nastiness infected every country that Hitler overran, and at the same time a reluctance to admit that it really happened. The time for breast-beating is now probably past; in any case, it does no good to beat your breast with padded fists.

ROBERT PASOLLI

While Robert Lowell writes "deep" plays which probably reward study, I don't think that Endecott and the Red Cross need be as hard to grasp on first encounter as it is in John Hancock's spectacular production at the American Place Theatre. Lowell engages serious issues by focusing on the personal affairs of public men, and makes his statements through a sequence of monologues and duologues. Thus his play narrows rather than expands your field of attention. Hancock, however, has mounted a wide-open production, multiplying discrete effects and actions until they accumulate into a panorama which is constantly flinging your attention out and away. The elements of play and production are counter-engrossing. You cannot close out one or the other. But, the senses being more available to stimulus than the intellect, the production does in the end win the day. While I could recount what happens in Endecott and the Red Cross, I could only speculate on the implications of what happens, particularly in the references which Lowell obviously intends his historical particulars to make to current affairs.

In one area, however, play and production work together: that is, in creating a rich and detailed historical atmosphere. The action takes place in 1630 at a royal plantation in New England. Salem, of which Endecott is Governor, is close by, and Indians are about.

In this setting a series of confrontations occurs between the Crown and the colonists, whose interests are already diverging. In the end, Endecott finds himself defiling the flag of England—at that time, a red cross on a white field—incarcerating the King's emissary and destroying the settlement. Lowell and Hancock have collaborated to create an imaginary garden with real Puritans in it—an atmosphere at once familiar, hence accessible, and particular, hence authoritative. Lowell's "historical" language is natural without being colloquial, and his characterizations are rooted in the modern psychology of the stage without calling attention

AGING WIFE

*I flick on the FM in the mornings, and Vivaldi, cooking, listening for you shields me from my self.
But when night creaks
in the floorboards,
and the great oars of sleep
dip into you, then like a blind woman
I lie in my starless mind and wait for your luminous stillnesses to water my body
and rinse out the dying inside.*

MARTHA FRIEDBERG

to the fact. His nerve never fails him, and his sense of proportion between then and now almost never.

Hancock has nothing if not nerve. He has had his talented designers trick out the garden with some fabulous topiary. Robert LaVigne, a costume designer capable of inspiration in several modes, has clothed the up-tight Puritans, the loose-living Royalists and the unreconstructed Indians with equal élan. His conception of the armored suits in which the Puritan soldiers walked around the forest is wicked, and his ribbon-belaced homespun for the eccentric royal colonists is as daft as their behavior. John Wulps's set paintings of foreshortened trees, looking like what Henri Rousseau would have painted if he had belonged to the Hudson River School, make an illusion of great depth of forest with Robert Morgan's lights behind them; it is a masterful effect.

Hancock has also drawn diverse performances from his major actors. Kenneth Haigh, who plays the title role, has wonderful presence, and since he does his soul-searching on a causeway jutting into the audience, he is very present indeed. He performs the Olivier bit extremely well—the eyes, don't move anything but the eyes—which always works, in spite of the touch of cynicism it incorporates. Jack Harkins is a pudding of a plantation keeper, all mealy-mouthed bluff, but with a mischievous sparkle in the eye. Nick Kepros does the King's emissary with elegance and a stunning calm; he is splendid in Oxford finery, and speaks the king's English, not to mention Lowell's, with precision and polish. Ralph Clanton, finally, plays a Puritan theocrat with an authoritative dignity which captures the human meaning of the type; that is, its meaning in its own milieu rather than in ours (Lowell takes care of the latter very nicely). These performances, being part of Hancock's mixed bag, are effective individually without a thought for ensemble. The whole, it seems, is exactly equal to the sum of its parts.

VACATIONS

1st "Dialogue Summer" at POWDER HILL SKI/RESORT AREA, appealing to creative, inquiring, life-loving, socially concerned individuals, seeking rural hideaway with possibilities for intellectual excitement. New Inn features stunning air-cond. rooms & budget dorms. Olympic Pool, Tennis, Golf, "dialogue theatre." Lively Discussions. SPECIAL for Memorial Weekend—4 days, 3 nights—mod. Amer. Plan, dorms $29.50, private (2 in room) $44.50. For brochure —POWDER HILL, Middlefield, Conn. 06455. Tel. (203) 349-3454.

PERSONALS

SNOOPY FOR PRESIDENT—249 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/51, 50/85, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Free catalogue to all. Free sample to stores. A Big-Little Store, 1471 Washington, San Francisco, 94109. (415) 775-3140.

DISCOVER a fun way of meeting interesting, alert Jewish singles. For FREE analytical questionnaire write: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: write Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 30 East 42 Street, N.Y.C. 10017.

BUTTONS, PEACE JEWELRY, POSTCARDS, POSTERS, psychedelia, etc. Unusual merchandise. Good service. Wholesale to all. 10c brings exciting free catalogue air mail. FREE! SPEECH, INC., 211 St. Marks Place, N.Y.C. 10002

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE

(Computerized Matching—All Ages)
"Let TEAM make you a team."

Write:

TEAM Project

111 East 30th Street

New York, N.Y. 10016, Phone 889-6020

YOU CAN BE A CITIZEN DIPLOMAT TO RUSSIA THE "GLASSBORO WAY"

For details write:

CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS

Dept. N 5/27, 10 W. 46 St., NYC 10036

or Telephone: (212) LT 1-8113

Crossword Puzzle No. 1251

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 and 15 across Only one of the things Lorenzo said we will let creep in our ears? (It's related to a family affair.) (3,5,2,5)
- 6 See 4 down
- 10 It certainly wouldn't be sensible to find it in jam, or on ice cream. (7)
- 11 Item one of 1 down? (7)
- 12 How those who have to pay come in the French game? (8)
- 13 Change your own chemise, if old enough! (5)
- 15 See 1 across
- 17 A natural source for the missile plant?
- 19 and 28 across Was Scott's a mere woman? (3,4,2,3,4)
- 21 Swift creature, but hardly graceful. (5)
- 23 See 1 down
- 24 How Morality expires, according to Pope. (8)
- 27 Hold the answer in position ■ places removed. (7)
- 28 See 19 across
- 29 Double-acting, but comparatively dead in expression. (4)
- 30 Sometimes established by the military to be ■ sort of big red chief afterwards. (10)

DOWN:

- 1 and 23 across You could make ■ sort of upset mug fit the original. (Get the speed of the little pests!) (4,5)
- 2 The lobes have ■ pearl's design. (7)

- 3 His is a possessive case. (5)
- 4 and 6 across Evidently one needs at bad! (9,4)
- 5 Nothing wise or brave? (5)
- 7 It's a strange feeling to make one move on green! (7)
- 8 Within which an action must be brought? You might have the letters to mail in it. (10)
- 9 Effect a method to keep you above water? (8)
- 14 Career opportunity for the forger? What a ham! (10)
- 16 See 24 down
- 18 Made a light 26. (9)
- 20 Acted like ■ demonstrator. (7)
- 22 Not a dessert associated with Plymouth—it's a bit outmoded in preparation.
- 24 and 16 down Senior, perhaps, but not necessarily one of the idle rich. (5,8)
- 25 Perhaps part of the wood labeled only middling? (5)
- 26 Knot a bow? (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1250

ACROSS: 1 Obfuscation; 9 Collapse; 10 Rights; 14 Stares; 15 Restless; 17 Bandages; 20 Castle; 22 and 11 Cops and robbers; 24 Spreads; 26 Alumni; 27 Littered; 28 Meaningless. DOWN: 2 Belabored; 3 Umpires; 4 Clef; 5 Targets; 6 Ought; 7 Cohort; 8 Stands; 13 Gross; 16 Listeners; 18 Atolls; 19 Gentian; 20 Capital; 21 Ladies; 23 Somme; 25 and 12 across Clandestine.

PUBLICATIONS

OUR GENERATION

Largest circulation Quarterly of dissent in Canada and of the New Left in North America—

Analyzes, Reports, Reviews, Theorizes:

- the movement for educational university reform
- the black power and human rights
- the peace and anti-Vietnam war
- the anti-poverty and community organizing
- the Quebec independence movement
- tactics and strategy of New Left in Canada and U.S.A.

Sample issue: $1.50

Subscriptions: $5.00 (4 issues)

3837 St.-Laurent Blvd., Montreal 18, Canada

THE CONSCIENCE OF A RADICAL

By Scott Nearing

A book you should read.

Have it sent postpaid for $2 clothbound or paperback at $1.

Social Science Institute
Harborside Maine 04642

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

May-June RADICAL AMERICA. Overview of New Left, 1960-65; Staughton Lynd on radicals & history; student left in 1950's; essay on Gorz' Strategy for Labor. 50c or $3/yr. 1237 Spaight, Madison, Wisconsin 53703.

GROUP NOW FORMING

to publish a new National Weekly Journal of Opinion: Jewish-oriented on the order of The Nation, New Republic and Commonweal. Location: New York City.

Seeks writers and complete staff. Cooperative venture on profit-sharing basis.

Send full details to:
P.O. Box 703, Harrisburg, Pa. 17103

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! Used bargain lists. Fiction and non-fiction. Free search. Harco, Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032.

MAREN'S PINE TAVERN MENUS AND RECIPES. 350 recipes, 80 menus from the cuisine of Oregon's distinguished Pine Tavern Restaurant. $2.50. MAREN'S COOK BOOKS, P.O. Box 461, Bend, Oregon 97701.

EDUCATIONAL

QUAKER STUDY CENTER—Suburban Philadelphia. Special program for study in social change, non-violence and radical living. Also year's seminar on man's search for meaning, confirmation and dialogue. Write: L. W. Lewis, Pendle Hill, Wallingford, Pa. 19086.

ARTHUR MORGAN SCHOOL, Burnsville 5, N.C. Grades 7, 8 and 9. Co-educational, Quaker-related, informal. Work-study program.

ARTS & CRAFTS

MAGNIFICENT LEATHER HASSOCKS, HANDBAGS—luxurious, decorative, Moroccan artisan-crafted, hand-tooled. Ideal gifts for her, for them, for yourself. Incredibly low priced. Free illustrated folder, SELECTIVE CRAFTS, Box 666, Westport, Conn. 06880.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

"You will not find articles in The NATION

that can be read in the newspapers or other magazines. The NATION focuses a spotlight upon dark corners that need ventilation. The NATION articles lead to controversy and action; they are not ephemeral. The NATION is not intended for the intellectually or morally moribund. It is a viable publication for people with minds and emotions who are interested in this country and all of its people."

—Elmer Gertz

THIS BOOK FREE

WITH EACH NEW
1 YEAR SUBSCRIPTION

What you will find in The NATION, an exciting weekly that has been vigorously concerned with the American tomorrow for over 103 years, is well embodied in the new edition of J. Bronowski's Science and Human Values.

This important book, recently expanded to include the author's famous dialogue, "The Abacus and the Rose," originated from writings first published in The NATION.

C. P. Snow said:

"If I were trying to select six works, in order to explain to an intelligent non-scientist something of the deepest meaning of science, Bronowski's would be one of them."

Julian Huxley said:

"Dr. Bronowski has the rare distinction of being both ■ distinguished professional scientist and ■■ inspiring humanist. Accordingly his SCIENCE AND HUMAN VALUES sheds valuable illumination on some of the confusion of contemporary thought."

The good fight
is now in

THE NATION
—Why not
join now?

Send to:

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me free, J. Bronowski's SCIENCE AND HUMAN VALUES.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6. (Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Pan-America; $2 foreign)

Name

Street

City State Zip

N 5-27

POETRY OF THE ANTI-WAR

THE

NATION

JUNE 3, 1968 35 cents

BURLINGAME
JUN 2 1968
LIBRARY

The Student Vanguard

SIX DAYS IN PARIS

HARRY BRAVERMAN

Back from Vietnam

THE INVISIBLE VETERANS

SANDY GOODMAN

PETER CLECAK

on James T. Farrell

NDLER BROSSARD

rik Erikson

TOM CHRISTOFFEL

on Michael Harrington

5-21-68 PL5-1449
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

Columbia

Rockville Centre, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: The tragic event at Columbia can have one fruitful outcome if it will draw public attention to the need for democratization of Columbia's Board of Trustees.

Presidents and provosts may come and go; they only execute policy that is set by this self-appointed, self-perpetuating group of trustees—responsible to no one but themselves. For the most part they achieved their positions by having been successful entrepreneurs in an acquisitive society, which is not only not a qualification for ruling a vast educational complex but is the kind of record that results in a self-sufficient mentality not unlike the traditional Bourbon outlook: they learn nothing, they forget nothing.

It is incidental and illustrative that in an institution located near Harlem and affecting so many Puerto Ricans by its real estate operations, there is neither a black man nor a Hispano-American on the board. . . .

Howard N. Meyer, Columbia '34 quality of dissent

Long Beach, Calif.

DEAR SIR: A few footnotes, cautionary and otherwise, might be added to Prof. Louis Levine's analysis of campus confrontations ["Why Students Seize Power," The Nation, May 13]. The real focus of the article is upon the why of the new, ideological student activism. But should we not also be concerned about the quality of such dissent . . . and about immediate and long-term results?

The militants at some institutions mobilize and deploy student power because they can, at the moment, while confrontation is still fashionable. And if the activists of X University have genuine grievances about significant issues, it is possible for the militants of Y University to apply the same highly effective tactics of disruption in disputes over matters of considerably less substance.

Professor Levine points out the typical reactions against the militant minority by the trustees, "jocks," "freddies" and faculty supporters of the "hard-line, law and order position." He does not comment on the equally Pavlovian behavior of the posturing sort of student (and faculty) activist, hell-bent on doing his thing regardless of the merits of a given case or the consequences to the academic community.

D. A. Drury

Berkeley schools

Berkeley, Calif.

DEAR SIR: Between the submission of our article on Berkeley's elementary school integration ("The City That Went to School," The Nation, May 13) and publication, a few errors came to our attention that inadvertently were not corrected. For one, Dr. Roy Nichols is minister of Salem—rather than St. Mark's—Methodist Church in Harlem. Another is that the recall election of October, 1964, concerned only two integrationist board members since the other three (of which Dr. Nichols was one) had already resigned.

One matter of interpretation should be mentioned. The Berkeley school people insist that the elementary schools are not tracked and therefore cannot be untracked. Granted that these schools draw from segregated neighborhoods and that many influential philosophical survivals of tracking remain in the system (which is the way we had hoped our corrected formulation to read), we would then concede the validity of the objection. . . . Ray and Betty Halpern

EDITORIALS

Out of the Blue

There are many kinds of revolution and for each kind one can find more than one theoretical explanation. But underlying the phenomenon in its major form there is always a radical shift or change in mass consciousness. Suddenly, it seems, people begin to perceive socio-economic situations in a new way. The perspective shifts, the shift is momentous, but it is not as abrupt as it appears on the surface. The change has been gestating over a period measured in years, not in weeks or days.

The happenings in Paris are a case in point. Without political leadership, without union leadership, events rose to a boil under the eyes of the unsuspecting Gaullist regime. But the Gaullists were no blinder than the Communists who, far from leading the revolution, hesitated, then jumped on the bandwagon. The revolution was triggered by students. The police made the blunders the police always make, whether in France or the United States, but in France, with its revolutionary traditions, the consequences were more serious. Yet, for all these blunders and all this inattention up on high, if the consciousness of the people had not changed the student revolt would have died away, having gained some changes in university administration and nothing more. The students, as one of them is quoted as saying in this issue (p. 719) simply had "achieved consciousness in advance of others. . . ."

The premonitory student conversion is not a purely French phenomenon, as Neal Ascherson shows in "Soviets on the Campus" (The Observer, May 19, 1968). In the United States the students have not torn up the cobblestones and modernized the barricades with overturned automobiles, and they lack political theory, although Ascherson sees an incipient Maoist kind of social analysis in Students for a Democratic Society. But this time American students were in the lead; it was the Sorbonne students that followed, fighting in their way, as Frenchmen fight when the revolutionary mood seizes them. The student grievances in the two countries (and leaders of other industrialized nations had better listen and learn) were and are much the same. University populations have multiplied out of proportion to the increase in facilities. The schools and colleges have largely become what H. L. Mencken called "rolling mills" of learning for the mass production of specialists to attend to the needs of a technological society. Students and junior faculties feel more and more out of touch with impersonal administrations. The teacher/pupil ratio has declined; many of the professors have little interest in anything but research or working for the government. All the elements of alienation, resentment and rebellion are present to a greater extent among the students than among the workers, but it is only a matter of degree.

In France the workers were in the same mood, without being aware of the extent to which as a mass group they shared sentiments with the students. The workers who seized the Sud-Aviation factory at Nantes (which makes Caravelle jets) and locked themselves in, were astonished when the workers of other factories raised the red flag and followed their example. Within a few days France was in the grip of a near-general strike. If ever there was a grass-roots revolution, this was it. It was a wildcat strike on a national scale.

A rare phenomenon, surely, and new theories will have to be invented. It is a revolution less against the state as state, than against the current form of society, against the whole technological-bureaucratic pattern of civilization. Somewhat the same thing is happening in Prague as in Paris: we may be seeing a world-wide uprising against repressive institutions. The institutions are called on to respond, to mesh gears with what people want, feel, need as human beings. Of course there are also local grievances about dormitories and sex mores, about wages and hours, but if these are satisfied, the students and the people will still not be satisfied with the pre-existing institutions.

We should take timely warning from the events in France. The revolt there may peter out for the present, but the de Gaulle regime will never be the same again. Here, a party system that masquerades as a true democracy, but is nothing of the kind, cannot endure. It is a fraud; some of the people know it for a fraud now; others will find out; still others will resist any adaptive change in institutions. Our political system must be infused with the life and vitality it now lacks, or sharp civil strife lies ahead.

Nixon's 'New' Coalition

Everything about Richard Nixon is new, or at least looks new. His appearance on TV is much improved: now one might conceivably buy a used car from this man. His new character overflows with the milk of human kindness and spouts a dialogue that is as funny at times as a Lucille Ball script. If this contravenes all we have been told by the psychologists about people in their fifties, Dick may claim to be a shining exception. Most important, the fellow has a new coalition—and it's a humdinger.

Nixon has picked up where Barry Goldwater left off, and since Barry is clumsy while Dick is clever, it would be careless to dismiss the latter's chances. Geographically, the Goldwater coalition took in the South, the Mountain States and the Midwest, with the various political aspirations and grievances of these three regions. Though Goldwater is not himself a racist, there was a tinge of racism in many of his moves. The inclusion of the Old South—which had not yet shipped North a large proportion of its unneeded Negroes—reinforced the elements of racism in the Goldwater coalition, just at a time when civil rights were in the ascendancy. Another weakness was that the elements in the Goldwater line-up had no strong cohesion, and Goldwater's campaign blunders finished it off.

The Nixon coalition looks even more thinly stuck together; but in a year of confusion, and with Nixon's incomparable gall as a binder, it is not to be underestimated. Its components are liberals, Black Militants and the New South. The cement contains various ingredients—opposition to centralization of power, white anxiety to placate the rebellious Negroes (if it can be done without upsetting the status quo), a general uneasiness about America's

IN THIS ISSUE

June 3, 1968

EDITORIALS

714

ARTICLES

- 718 John Collier's Vision D'Arcy McNickle
719 The Student Vanguard:
Six Days in Paris Harry Braverman
723 Back from Vietnam:
The Invisible Veterans Sandy Goodman
726 Second Year of the June War Stanley Wolpert
729 New Haven: Renewal and Riots Dane Archer

BOOKS & THE ARTS

- 733 James T. Farrell: Peter Clecak
An Impossible Comeback
734 Making Life Tougher Chandler Brossard
736 For Middle-Class Candides Tom Christoffel
737 Book Marks Howard N. Meyer
738 Poetry of the Anti-War:
Black Mountain, Los Altos Robert Hass
A Body Becomes a Furrow Dennis Schmitz
Six O'Clock News John Osling
La Rue Sans Joie Robley Wilson, Jr.
After the March Gabor Kovacs
The Power To Make War Paul Bennett
The War: Marking Time Stanley Plumly
742 Films Robert Hatch
743 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Publisher JAMES J. STORROW JR.	Associate Publisher GIFFORD PHILLIPS
Editor CAREY McWILLIAMS	Associate Editor PHIL KINNEY
Executive Editor ROBERT HATCH	Literary Editor HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014, Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Pan America; $2 for foreign postage.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 206

No. 23

future and, as a corollary, a yearning to return to the tried and true, or a simulacrum thereof.

Nixon woos the Black Militants with the notion of Black Power in the form of black capitalism. White America, he says, has sought to buy off the Negro with welfare payments, when what is needed to make the ghetto a Great Society is "the economic power that comes from ownership, and the security and independence that come from economic power." Every Negro a capitalist! And of course no Black Militant, having somehow grown rich under President Nixon, will think of exploiting any other Negro—not only because the other Negro is a Soul Brother but because the other will be rich too.

This scheme has been taken apart before. What chance, in a post-industrial, high-technology society like ours, would ghetto small business have? It would anchor the Negro more firmly than ever in a segregated, underdeveloped society, somewhat like that of the struggling nations of Africa. It was debunked in Abram Harris' The Negro as Capitalist—in 1936. The average American Negro has too much sense to buy such a bill of goods, but unlike Goldwater, Nixon will not be alienating the Negro voters en masse.

Nixon's bid for "liberal" support falls under the heading of what the CIA would call a "cover story"; that is, it is designed to make him appear much more "modern," much less "extremist" than Barry Goldwater. By purporting to find a parallel between some of his views and those of Daniel Moynihan (and the parallel does exist), Nixon hopes to succeed in convincing the gullible that he is much less intransigent than Goldwater. And so he is, in the sense that he is an opportunist and Goldwater is not. In a word, Nixon is trying to borrow the cloak of liberalism from certain apostate "liberals," thus suggesting that his views are much more "reasonable" than were Goldwater's. But his basic strategy is much the same as that of Goldwater and he is appealing to essentially the same elements. When, for example, he asks for the support of the New South, he makes his simultaneous plea for the support of the Old South much less palpable than was Goldwater's wooing of that element. In brief, the talk about Black Capitalism, the New Liberals, and the New South is all by way of putting a gloss on the ideology of Goldwaterism and covering up the underlying presuppositions on which the Goldwater coalition was based.

The Nixon idea has a substratum of sense in it, as The Nation recognized in the 1964 campaign. (See "Goldwaterism: The New Ideology" by Carey McWilliams, The Nation, August 24, 1964, p. 68, and "Goldwater Seeks ■ New Coalition" by Alan K. Campbell and Seymour Sacks, The New York Times Magazine, August 23, 1964.) The element of sense is that new centers of power have arisen outside New York, particularly in Texas, in the missile crescent from Cape Kennedy to Houston, and thence west to Southern California. In this great arc are the money and power of a nouveau riche element that likes to thumb its nose at New York and Boston, the power bases of the Rockefellers and Kennedys, and is especially alienated by a scholarly politician like Gene McCarthy.

There is really nothing new in the idea of a coalition which takes these basic facts into account. All Nixon has done is to dress up the racial part of it by a phony appeal to Negroes gullible enough, or self-seeking enough, to swallow it. But for Nixon's purpose—which is, first, last and always, the snaring of votes—it is not to be dismissed as utter fantasy. To give Nixon his due, he is a practical man. And for nerve he has no peer in American politics, past or present.

Concentration Camps?

For the past several months, rumors have circulated—principally in Black Nationalist circles but also among anti-war demonstrators, and leftist groups of various shades—to the effect that the government is preparing concentration camps for rioters, arsonists, draft card burners and other types regarded by the Red hunters as high internal security risks.

In Look (May 28), William Hedgepeth, a senior editor, reveals that Martin Luther King, Jr., told him six days before his assassination: "I see a ghetto perhaps cordoned off into a concentration camp. I haven't said there was a move afoot, just that it is a possibility. The more there are riots, the more repression will take place, and the more we face the danger of a right-wing take-over, and eventually a Fascist society." The Black Nationalist groups, said Dr. King, believe the government is preparing concentration camps in various locations. "They are absolutely convinced of this," he assured Hedgepeth. "I don't think this is the spreading of a false rumor; it's something they really believe."

Responding to these rumors, Attorney General Ramsey Clark has said that there "have been and will be no concentration camps." But this assurance will not quiet the rumors to which Dr. King referred, for the possibility does in fact exist. Six so-called "detention centers" were set up in 1952 under Title II, Section 104(c) of the McCarran Act, which provides that persons "detained" under the Act may be confined "in such places of detention as may be prescribed by the Attorney General." They still exist today. Mr. Clark feels that Title II does not pose a threat: "It's all so academic because it's so remote."

What is "academic" today, however, may be quite real tomorrow. Senator McCarran himself described the Title II amendment as "a concentration camp measure, pure and simple," and Senator Mundt called it a program for "... establishing concentration camps into which people might be put without benefit of trial, but merely by executive fiat." And the Supreme Court upheld the legislation—as a wartime measure to be sure—under which the West Coast Japanese were "detained" during World War II.

A recent report issued by the House Committee on Un-American Activities suggests that the centers might be used to detain urban guerrilla fighters in case of major riots. And Senator Eastland's proposed "Internal Security Act of 1968" which the Senate is now considering (described by Thomas I. Emerson of the Yale Law School as "the legal foundation for a police state") would, if enacted, greatly enlarge the categories of potential detainees.

Title II of the McCarran Act should, of course, be repealed, but that is not likely to happen, given the Attorney General's nonchalant attitude. "In terms of priorities," he has said, "I'd rather have open-housing legislation." Perhaps; all the same, Title II should be repealed, and on his recommendation—that is, if he really has no intention of using it. Fortunately, the American Civil Liberties Union is preparing to file an action which would seek an injunction against enforcement of Title II on the ground that it is unconstitutional. What is important is not that detention centers exist—if they did not, the government could build them in a hurry—but the fact that as long as Title II is on the statute book and its enforcement has not been enjoined, rumors of the kind now afloat will add to the current tension and uneasiness.

Instructive Little Incident

On April 19 the Senate voted 31 to 28 to let a contract for the building of several FDLs—Fast Deployment Logistics ships. These are 40,000 tonners of approximately 900-foot length, designed to hold not troops but military rolling stock under controlled humidity conditions, so that the equipment will be ready for use at any time. Supposedly, they are to complement U.S. air-lift capacity—C-5 transports carrying about 500 troops apiece with light equipment.

This identical item had been cut out of the 1967 and 1968 budgets but was restored in the 1969 budget. It may be killed in the Appropriations Committee, but it shows how the military-industrial complex moves, not in a conspiratorial way but by sheer momentum. The military section cooks up new schemes for global involvement and lobbies for the necessary hardware in Congress. The industrial section is hungry for business. And unpredictable events follow in the Congressional committees that are supposed to evaluate these schemes before they get out on the floor, where scarcely any member is in a position to know what it is all about.

In this case the favored finalists were aerospace firms with shipbuilding facilities they had promised to modernize. Lockheed, General Dynamics and Litton Industries face cutbacks from the reduced appropriations in store for NASA, and it is logical to think that some quid pro quo was promised to the primary shipbuilding companies that were deprived of what would normally be their plum. Even so, the proposal would have had little chance if Sen. Richard Russell, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, had not happened to be ill. Russell was opposed to the project, but in his absence, Sen. John Stennis was able to elicit Senate approval.

An interesting sidelight is that this FDL business is of great interest to Ingalls Shipbuilding Co. of Pascagoula, Miss., a subsidiary of Litton. It may be purely coincidental, but Mr. Stennis is the Senator from Mississippi.

The New Insurgency

Tickets for Senator McCarthy's Madison Square Garden rally on May 19 were not cheap, but aside from the privilege of giving to a good cause, playwright Arthur Miller's talk—which the press ignored and from which the following excerpts are taken—made the price seem modest:

From Moscow to Warsaw to Prague to Paris to Rio to Berkeley and New York, there is a deep and boiling rebellion against institutions and institutionalized feeling. Be it a government, a university, a moral code or a way of life, the institution as king is naked now. The mere fact that it exists is no longer proof of its value. In the past four years the war in Vietnam has become an institution, an institution with high private, sacred ceremonies of death and sacrifice, and all the sanctification of a holy crusade. Now, you can criticize an institution, you can suggest improvements and even point out its failings, but there is one thing you dare not do excepting at the risk of your public life, and that is to ask why it should exist at all . . .

The next President is going to face a revolutionary country and a world in revolution, and he will need a lot more than gallantry. He will need the habit of mind to perceive in the institutions he leads what is dead and inhuman and must be dismantled. The next President will not be able to lead by consensus, by the expert manipulation of opinion, or by calls for unity, however passionate. For our disunity has been institutionalized into this country and into this world by virtue of the rule of the contented over the desperate. A unity based on injustice cannot last and it ought not to last.

The next President will have to weigh every action not for what it will do for our prestige or our institutions but for what it will do to people. Everyone of the candidates in this campaign knew perfectly well what the Vietnam War was doing not only to the Vietnamese but the American people. Why did they not speak directly to this issue? Because the institution of war in Vietnam was sacrosanct, it was forbidden territory. Forbidden to all but one who dared to stand and face that frightful juggernaut while the others were on their knees thinking their private thoughts.

The Revolutionary Test

"Neither the agricultural nor the industrial problem has been resolved," said Mao Tse-tung to André Malraux in 1965. "Still less, the problem of the young . . . The young must be put to the test." The Frenchman, perhaps from the hindsight of 1967, sensed the formation of "a new revolutionary action comparable to the one which raised and then repressed 'The Hundred Flowers.'"

Since then, of course, the Red Guards have shaken the state "as a madman shakes a dead geranium," the students of Prague have turned out the Stalinist rascals and, rather than being tested, the followers of Dutschke, Savio, Carmichael and 500 other leaders at 500 other places have themselves put many a situation to many a test.

Are what a too quickly cynical Chicago professor called "the revolting young" unique to these times? In most ways, surely not. The University of Paris was shaken apart in Abélard's day; Cambridge was formed—like today's free universities—by rebellious Oxford students; even the young Harlan Fisk Stone (assisted, it is said, by the young Calvin Coolidge) led an Amherst "riot" that toppled a college president.

And there have been still deeper juvenile trenches. In the time of Louis XIV, the Camisards tore southern France apart for years. They sprang from religious suppression and broken official promises. There were Paul Goodmans (Jurieu) and Che Guevaras (du Serre). Children, called "petits prophètes," went from village to village spouting quotations—not from Chairman Mao but from Revelations. The army commander, Cavalier, was a 17-year-old baker's boy, and such injunctions as the following were issued: "We demand that you throw out all the priests and missionaries within three days or be burned alive with them."

A few years ago, Mr. and Mrs. Opie showed in their Language and Lore of Childhood that a Davy Crockett rhyme thought up in Topeka could appear within a week in Brussels and Tasmania; now the politics of youthful action travel with as great speed. A 23-year-old German house painter (that fatal profession) is inspired by the assassination of Martin Luther King to shoot Rudi Dutschke, and within a month students are in the administrative fortresses of Columbia and Grenoble. Although the FBI and the Deuxième Bureau will find portraits of Chairman Mao stuck up in both places, they should not think it is the old type of conspiracy. The "breath" is there, but it is that contagious classic breath of the revolting young.

Still, many of these young, not so young, and professional young are tuned in and set up for the glorious and immediate planetary revolution. Distributing leaflets on the greenswards of their seminaries, they might do well to think on Chairman Mao's revolutionary notions. Fifty years, he tells his French visitor, is a very short time. "Khrushchev seemed to think a revolution is done when a Communist party comes to power—as if it had something to do with national liberation. . . . Lenin knew the Revolution only began then. . . . You remember Kosygin at the 23rd Congress: 'Communism is the raising of the standard of living.' Oh yes! And swimming is a way of putting on a bathing suit! . . . Everything is yet to be done! The thought, the culture, the customs which led China where we found her must disappear. . . ."

No, it is not civil injustice, military brutality or bureaucratic stultification that concern the revolutionary. It is everything. "I bring not peace but a sword," said another whose revolution was quickly muddled by the old human slime.

RICHARD STERN

JOHN COLLIER'S VISION

D'ARCY McNICKLE

Mr. McNickle is a member of the Confederated Salish and Kootenai tribes of Montana. He is a professor of anthropology at the University of Saskatchewan, Regina Campus.

John Collier, former Commissioner of Indian Affairs, died on May 8 in the little Holy Cross Hospital at Taos, N.M., at the age of 84. His death silences one of the civilized voices of a savage age.

The fact that his long and productive life ended at Taos carries its own poignancy, for at Taos some forty-six years ago John Collier found his purpose. The Taos Indians who sang by his bedside at the end were acknowledging that discovery, thus completing the cycle.

As Commissioner during the years 1933-45, years of depression and war, Collier quite certainly rescued American Indians from the doom prepared for them by generations of stupidity and venality fostered by government policies and practices. Indians will thus have the most immediate sense of loss in Collier's passing. Less immediate and less apparent is the loss of a social critic of uncommon gifts.

For Collier, insight into Indian life gave access to "stupendous facts within tiny dimensions" about the condition of man in modern society. That was what first commanded his attention at Taos Pueblo in 1922, as he watched a ceremonial dance. Later he described how "a whole race of men, before my eyes, passed into ecstasy through a willed discipline, splendid and fierce, yet structural, an objectively impassioned discipline which was a thousand years old."

Watching the dancers, he realized: "These were unsentimental men who could neither read nor write, poor men who lived by hard work, men who were told every day in all kinds of unsympathetic ways that all they believed in and cared for had to die, and who never answered back. For these men were at one with their gods."

As he reflected on these and similar scenes in the years that carried him deeper into tribal affairs, it was borne in on Collier that Indians had retained something that had disappeared from the lives of industrialized Westerners. Urbanization had uprooted populations, destroyed neighborhoods, impoverished the relationship between generations, expanded enormously such escape devices as commercialized recreation, and favored the lowest common denominators in entertainment and mass communication. In all of this, urbanized man stood bewildered, confronting ultimate destruction.

That Indian societies could survive in an environment so hostile to simple folk values could only astonish a mind as sophisticated as his. In spite of oppression, contempt, appropriation of their wealth, even threats of extermination through wars and pestilence, they had remained viable, keeping their languages, their religions, their kinship systems and their self-views and world views. They had been adaptive and assimilative, yet faithful to the past. He observed: "Intensity of life, form in life, beauty in the human relationship, happiness and amplitude of personality are not dependent on complexity of material culture or on that 'security' which in the world today has come to be a controlling objective. . . . It is hard for us, citizens of an age of giant external power, to conceive that the human psychic and social values . . . were not created by ourselves."

Sustained by a strongly integrated personality, Collier never adulterated the intellectual content of his discourse. Whether writing letters to his field officers, addressing a meeting of DAR ladies, or preparing an editorial for the Bureau's house organ, Indians at Work, he wrote or talked in a prose style that often dazzled and confounded his audience. On one occasion, after he had spent several hours speaking eloquently on Indian values and world view before a Congressional committee, at the conclusion of which the committee members trooped out of the meeting room glassy-eyed, the clerk of the committee shook his head dejectedly. "What a pity," he remarked, "they didn't understand a word he said."

The Indians, however, seemed always to understand. Either the interpreters who worked with him were unusually good, or his style of speech translated readily into the richly imaged native vernaculars. Whatever the reason, one always sensed a quickening of responsiveness when Collier addressed an Indian gathering. His voice carried warmth, gentility and dignity, modulated by tenderness, which brought quick smiles of recognition and sometimes teasing answers. It was the kind of discourse which Indians could appreciate because their good speakers display similar manners.

Because he would not temper the quality of his conceptual grasp, Collier was sometimes dismissed as a visionary, an impractical intellectual. Because he expounded Indian worth, and more particularly, perhaps, because he insisted on extending religious and cultural freedom to Indian groups and proved to be politically astute in obtaining the enactment of such life-giving legislation as the Indian Reorganization Act, he was accused of turning the clock back on Indian development and of trying to convert Indians into museum pieces. His detractors constituted a strange medley of unlikely associates—frustrated land grabbers, special-interest lobbyists, Indian "experts" of various shades of competence, overzealous Bible thumpers, and an occasional part-time Indian who had been discovered in some act of chicanery.

In spite of all the criticisms aimed at his administration, subsequent events demonstrated the soundness of the vision and the practicality of the action. With encouragement to act out their own lives and with the beginnings of financial assistance in restoring and developing their resource base (abruptly halted by war), Indian tribes all across the country seemed to renew their traditional tribalism, while at the same time participating increasingly in areas of interest in the general society. Identity with an Indian community, even an urban community of relocated tribesmen, provides the base from which adaptive and assimilative processes can draw new growth. Without such a base, there can be only a withering of social impulses.

Thus, Collier wrote: "Societies are living things, sources of the power and values of their members; to be and to function in a consciously living, aspiring, striving society is to be a personality fulfilled."

It may yet happen that fragmented, depersonalized urban man will give thanks that the Indians were not totally destroyed. And on that day, however far off, a special debt will be owed John Collier for having defined and explored the terms by which the Indian people could survive.

THE STUDENT VANGUARD

SIX DAYS IN PARIS

HARRY BRAVERMAN

Mr. Braverman, director of Monthly Review Press, was on a European publishing trip when the upheaval broke out in France.

On Thursday, May 9, late in the afternoon, Paris seemed peaceful. From the airport bus moving along the Avenue du Maine, I saw the usual crowds of shoppers and strollers; the cafés were starting to fill up. The taxi driver raced from the Aerogare to the hotel in Montparnasse with customary Paris dash; a book open on the wheel in front of him, he insisted on an English lesson as he shot through traffic.

But the newspapers report that the university buildings of Nanterre and the Sorbonne are closed, the Latin Quarter is occupied by massive police forces, and the students are continuing their protests of the past two weeks. The national unions of students and of university teachers are standing firm on their strike order, demanding evacuation of police from the Latin Quarter, the release of imprisoned demonstrators, and the reopening of the Sorbonne.

At the publishing house of François Maspero, next morning, things were a bit upset. The police had flung a gas grenade into the firm's bookstore off the Boulevard Saint-Michel, and several people were seriously injured. It was claimed that, along with the usual tear gas, the police were using a variety employed by the Americans in Vietnam that can inflict serious and permanent injury. Students, newspapers, Sorbonne professors expert in chemical warfare, and much of Paris seemed to believe the charge. Feeling against police brutality was running high, newspapers as staid as Le Monde carrying page-long accounts of unprovoked attacks against students and bystanders, including foreign tourists (who, someone remarked, were especially badly beaten because, unlike the student demonstrators, they didn't fight back).

In the Latin Quarter, police were everywhere, blocking off streets, gathered in menacing groups at squares and intersections. Everywhere also were the paniers à salade, the black Paris police wagons, in graduated sizes up to bus length. The Compagnies Republicaines de Sécurité (CRS), riot troops of the Ministry of the Interior, were out in force: heavy, black-coated, steel-helmeted, with shields on their arms, big goggles over their eyes and submachine guns slung on their shoulders, they look particularly dangerous, even sinister. Most of the police and troops stared impassively, but some of their faces glowed with hatred.

That evening, from 6:30, there was a demonstration at the Place Denfert-Rochereau in Montparnasse. At starting time, the square was filled with students and sympathizers, probably 20,000 people. The speeches were hard to hear, the amplifiers being weak. Soon a march began down the Boulevard Arago, and the walls resounded with "Liberez nos camarades!" The demonstration headed for the Santé prison, but was turned away. It moved into the Latin Quarter, where, later that evening, police blocked passage into many streets and students milled. Some theatres were closing, some restaurants putting up their iron shutters.

In the smaller streets, the students began to build barricades. Cars were dragged from the curbs and lined up across the narrow ways. The heavy iron grilles that encircle the trees were taken up and thrown into the gaps, along with street signs and anything else loose; thousands of cobblestones were torn up and heaped on top. One barricade was almost 10 feet high. Meanwhile, car radios were turned on and groups huddled close to listen. Daniel Cohn-Bendit, the most popular student leader, has proclaimed a peaceful occupation of the Latin Quarter. The students are to entrench themselves and remain until the police withdraw; meanwhile, student leaders are meeting with university officials, though taking the stand that they will not negotiate until their imprisoned comrades are free. By one o'clock, the students had made themselves as comfortable as they could for the night; it seemed time to leave.

But the next morning, Saturday, the 11th, all Paris was on its ear. Shortly after 2 A.M., the police had been ordered to demolish the barricades and drive the students out. Fighting went on all through the night. The police were better armed, of course, and used gas, fire hoses, truncheons and concussion grenades. These last are supposedly meant only to frighten, but one young student had his hand blown off. The students have the advantages usual to guerrillas and street fighters: the sympathy of the inhabitants, who sheltered them and showered the police with missiles from their windows; a better knowledge of the terrain; and a fighting spirit that, next day, had Paris excited with admiration.

The police operation was far from successful. The International Herald Tribune described the fighting this way:

Some 500 specially trained riot police moved up from around the flowering Luxembourg Gardens. Carrying shields in one hand and truncheons in the other, they quickly overran the outer barricades, sending the outpost defenders fleeing.

When they reached the Rue Gay-Lussac they ran into the stronghold, held by about 3,000 students, the ones who wanted to fight. The stronghold held out till dawn. It never really fell—it just got smaller. . . .

The police had first tried to weaken the resistance of the defenders by shelling them with rifle-launched tear gas grenades. When the first line of riot police tried to take the first barricade they were driven back by their own tear gas—despite masks.

The students didn't have any masks but they stayed somehow in that inferno. Reporters who tried to get in were driven back coughing and crying, and the radio men had to switch off. But the students held out and even counterattacked.

The police set off flares and fired in their grenades. The students put up red flags. The police shot in concussion grenades. The students mounted the roofs and shelled them with paving stones. The police charged the barricades. The students replied with molotov cocktails. Before long most of the barricades were in flames.

It was warfare without bullets. By 3 a.m. the police had decided they could not take the stronghold because of the fires and retreated to near the Gare du Luxembourg to patiently continue the shelling. No one in the stronghold had fled. They cursed and they shouted and sang the "Marseillaise" and the "Internationale." It sounded like a war. . . .

Finally, the riot police shock troops were sent in. Flames burst out up and down the street. A water main was hit and flooded the streets with filth from the grenades. The tear gas was held down by low clouds. The students on the rooftops continued to shower the police with whatever they had left. Fire trucks got as close as they could to lay down water. By 5:30, in daylight, some 100 students were left. . . . Some were still on the rooftops much later yesterday morning, sleeping in the rain, silhouetted against the chimneys, waiting for the police to come.

The prefect of police quickly charged that the leaders were not students but "guerrillas" with a knowledge of barricade building and street fighting. The charge was greeted with hoots of laughter all over Paris, and Cohn-Bendit, "Dany, le Rouge," said: "What happened in the street is that all the young people were expressing themselves against a certain society." But one does have to marvel at these students with their barricades, their resourceful combat tactics, their motorcycle couriers, their whistle signals, their bullhorns, their fast surprise maneuvers. Against reason, one is forced to feel that the children of France imbibe all this with their mothers' milk.

Demonstrations had taken place all over France, sentiment was overwhelmingly with the students, and two powerful forces now felt moved to respond. The government announced withdrawal of the police from the Sorbonne and its reopening. On the other side, the big parties of the Left and the union federations decided to throw their great weight into the battle. The students greeted their new allies with mixed feelings. With elation—from then on the slogan heard everywhere was Ouvriers et étudiants ensemble! But also with wariness, because insofar as the students have any leadership it is made up of dissident radicals—Maoists, Guevarists, Trotskyists, anarchists—and also because almost up to this instant, the students had been contemptuously dismissed by the Communists as "adventurers," "bourgeois" and " fils à papa." Naturally, they didn't like being called "papa's boys," an epithet that in any case seemed particularly inappropriate at the moment. And more deeply, the students regard the big Left parties as almost part of the Establishment, have little confidence that these parties can ever change society, and are repelled by what they know of Communist rule in Russia and Eastern Europe. Dany Cohn-Bendit calls the Communists "Stalinist creeps."

But now, all over Paris, placards on the newspaper kiosks proclaimed a general strike and monster demonstration for Monday. Leaflets were passed out, a few skirmishes took place, the weekend passed in an atmosphere of expectancy. Paris was overwhelmingly sympathetic to the students; polls showed that they had the backing of four persons out of five. Not that the sentiment was by any means universal; in the bar of the Pont Royal, for instance, I overheard a haughty, well-dressed woman: "Yes, of course, they can go and burn our cars in the Latin Quarter. And what can we do to them in return? They don't even own anything we can destroy!"

But Monday morning showed how many there were who would not have applauded the indignant and militant lady. The Métro was running, but the ticket seller and ticket taker waved me through. Not as many trains as usual, but that day everyone rode free, courtesy of the subway workers of Paris. And at the Place de la République where the demonstration was to gather, it was almost impossible well before the appointed hour to force one's way to the center of the square, where a view from the top of a construction shanty showed a human sea, banners waving, red flags flying, and as far as the eye could see down three principal boulevards, masses of demonstrators trying to push forward into the huge square.

The march to the Left Bank began. At the Place du Châtelet, just before the Seine, the demonstration moved massively, forty abreast. It seemed that all of Paris had turned out, not just to watch but to cheer. At every square and along the line of march, the Internationale was sung—in assured accents by the heavy battalions of labor; more fumblingly by the masses of students, many grouped around bits of paper bearing the words. But before the day ended everyone knew the words.

Slogans became increasingly radical; not just for the liberation of the imprisoned demonstrators, not just for unity of workers and students and for a free university, but now also for an end to the Fifth Republic. "Power is on the run; let it fall!" "Ten years, that's enough!" and, very rhythmically, "La Cinquième au clou, La Sixième, c'est nous!" The movement which began over educational issues now wanted to send the Fifth Republic to the hock shop and take its place as the Sixth. A lilting chant, "Adieu, de Gaulle," sung by one contingent to the accompaniment of hundreds of waving handkerchiefs, was very popular with the crowds. Placards proclaimed that the Algerian disorders of May 13, 1958, had brought de Gaulle to power; but that the struggle of the students on the barricades, May 13, 1968, signaled his end. "Bon anniversaire, mon Général," the marchers shouted. And a group of Left officials, proclaiming slogans for the march from a balcony, heard in reply from the marchers below: "Bureaucrates, dans la rue!"

There was in the air a spirit of rebellion that few had known existed. As one Parisian said to me, "I didn't realize that everyone else was feeling this way."

Coming off the Pont Saint-Michel, into the Place Saint-

Michel, the crowd watched enthralled while a youngster with a red flag tried to shinny up a flagpole. At first he made good progress with the aid of a traffic sign clamped to the pole, but beyond that point he would gain a few feet and then fall back to the accompaniment of cries and groans. At last his outstretched finger tips catch the tri-color, which he flings to the street. A roar goes up from the demonstration, and the man beside me says, "Treason!"—with a delighted grin.

I had an appointment at La Boule D'Or in the Place Saint-Michel, and waited at a table in front, with two elderly, well-dressed gentlemen, wondering what they thought. When the waiter arrives, it becomes clear that I am a foreigner, an American. A short silence, and then one of my table mates points to the square and bids me take a good look: "La France, c'est ça! No one can meddle with our liberties, not even de Gaulle." My own sympathies made clear, there are shouts of elation, many toasts to liberté, etc.

From the student magazine, Action
 "He Was Armed?" "Yes, Chief—with a Diploma."

Further along Saint-Michel, the demonstrators quieted one another, and the march moved in dead silence past the Sorbonne. Soon the slogans and the singing began again. It was now almost eight o'clock and the march went on. At the Place Denfert-Rochereau where the demonstration was to terminate, there was some confusion. The marchers could not fit into the square—ten such squares would not have held them—and the loudspeakers of the CGT (the principal trade union federation, controlled by the Communists) were telling everyone to go home. Bands of students raced to the cars protesting vehemently, demanding the microphones, insisting that the demonstration continue, perhaps in the Champ de Mars, shouting that they had been betrayed: "Why did we come out into the streets, just to go home?"

That evening, the demonstration in the Champ de Mars was small, but with the police withdrawn from the Latin Quarter, the students moved in, and so began the Occupation of the Sorbonne. The scene was unforgettable. The statue of Auguste Comte wore a flowing red necktie, and in the inner court Zola and Pasteur brandished red flags. The walls of the court were lined with literature tables stocked by all the radical groups, and the buildings were covered with placards, hundreds of them: slogans, manifestoes, poetry, announcements of meetings—one of them to take place “à salle Lenine.” A grand piano had been dragged out, and jazz alternated with Mozart and Chopin, one player succeeding another. The big courtyard was jammed, as were the nearby streets, squares, the university corridors, with people discussing in groups—and not just students, because the occupiers of the Sorbonne demonstratively threw open the doors to the workers, to the people from the neighborhood, and many came—to see the inside of the Sorbonne for the first time, to talk, to take part in the meetings.

In the corridors and meeting halls the “Smoking Forbidden” signs were scribbled over (everyone was smoking furiously): “It is Forbidden to Forbid.” The dim corridors and gloomy amphitheatres were adorned with bright water colors that clashed with the pompous neo-classical decor, but were nonetheless cheering to the eye. In one meeting hall, jammed to its limit with students and a sprinkling of professors, the discussion was impassioned, eloquent, but apparently fumbling and inconclusive, as the students tried to come to some decision on what to do about the year-end examinations. They were clearly in no state to sit for them, and besides they oppose the rigorous and arbitrary system of sudden-death examinations; but they were also trying to be conscientious and didn’t want to give an impression of shirking their academic duties. There seemed to be as many opinions as speakers, some getting a hand, some laughter, some groans. Everything was under the control of the students themselves; a student presidium at the head table conferred often on procedure, but just as often was swept into the debate. The professors listened with apparent sympathy and intervened little. In one meeting a Nobel laureate in biology was interrupted by a comrade student—unheard of!—but he listened, smiling and attentive.

Next day, there was time to stroll around Paris, and to browse in the bookstores, where the most prominently displayed volumes are those which, over the past few years, have surely had a great deal to do with the creation of the mood that burst out in the streets: Guevara, Castro and Camilo Torres; Jalée and Nizan; Trotsky and Mao; Marcuse and C. Wright Mills. And Marx everywhere, especially Marx, because it is also his anniversary, the 150th of his birth, and a colloquy organized by UNESCO is going on in Paris to mark the occasion. There is time also to read the two numbers of a special student paper, Action. The featured article of the second number is headed “Les Enfants de Marx and du 13 Mai,” and it ends: “The barricades of the Latin Quarter celebrate in a worthy manner the 150th anniversary of Marx and the tenth anniversary of May 13.” The paper contains news of the struggles, articles discussing educational changes desired by the students, and a piece by a graduate sociologist-urbanist about the kinds of jobs open to him: making door-to-door visits “like a salesman or a parson” in foolish surveys, or as an “industrial sociologist,” engaged to figure out how to keep the workers in line. “Every occupation is evidently in the end another way of participating in repression. . . . A sociologist is no different from a flic.”

And on its back page Le Journal de Dimanche ran two fascinating interviews in which students tried to make clear what the revolt was all about. In the first, a student of law and sociology, his father a Métro engineer, tells how he was drawn into the revolt by the invasion of the Sorbonne by a police column on May 3, and explains student discontent as based on the limited number of professional opportunities for graduates. The future for students, he says, is dark; and he quotes from memory the opening words of Paul Nizan’s popular Aden, Arabie: “I was twenty. I will let no one say it is the best time of life.” The interviewer probes further, and the student readily broadens the issues: he is against the society of “consumers” and for a society of “participants,” he is against (and here he uses the title of one of Jalée’s books) “the pillage of the Third World.” “Both in the West and in the Soviet Union, we live in a class-dominated society,” and violence appears to be the sole means for effecting a radical change.”

The other student (of political science, the son of an official) also runs rapidly through the reforms he would like to see in the university, and then, asked to say what in general is wrong, answers flatly: “The political order. The Fifth Republic doesn’t satisfy us. Unhappily, at the moment, there is no political formation of the Left that seems to us capable of replacing this regime for the better. The students have achieved consciousness in advance of others. There is, within the university, an extraordinary flow of ideas which is developing amid a certain confusion but which is extremely important and useful But this movement should not be exclusively student. It should take its place within a revolutionary workers’ movement. Unhappily, the Western Communist parties and the unions have given up all idea of the class struggle.” What sort of society does he want? “Very simple, I am for a Socialist democracy,” free of bureaucratism of the kind instituted by Stalinism. “That’s why I think at the moment the Cuban regime and, lately, that of Czechoslovakia accord best with my ideas of the ideal society, which is not to say that they should be imitated in everything.”

I had a few more business visits. Jérôme Lindon of Les Editions de Minuit tells me that his house sold 1,000 copies of a Marcuse book that morning. I lunched with an intellectual of the independent Left, in the company of an Algerian student and a German student who was apparently reproaching himself for having left the barricades he helped build on Friday night before the fighting broke out. My host, pointing to me, tells him: “You see, he also thought nothing more was going to happen that night.”

On Wednesday morning, it was time to leave the children of Marx and of the 13th of May, who had filled the boulevards with such attractive energy, vivacity and intelligence. All the taxis were on strike, no English lesson in a speeding cab; instead I lugged my baggage to the Aero-gare. And the last thing I heard was that 2,000 workers had occupied the aircraft plant of Sud-Aviation at Nantes, had welded the gates shut, and were holding prisoner the manager and his executives.

THE INVISIBLE VETERANS

SANDY GOODMAN

Mr. Goodman, a television news producer and writer, was nominated for a 1967-68 Emmy Award for a TV version of some of the material in this article.

One night three weeks after his release from the army, where he'd served as a paratrooper in Vietnam, 23-year-old Ronald Jordan walked into a bar in Newark's black ghetto and started to move to the rear. Another patron was sitting in his way. Jordan asked the man to move.

"Walk around me," the other replied.

"I figured he's a man and I'm a man," recalls Jordan, a tough, wiry youth. "What business he got to tell me to walk around? So I just kept walking in the direction I was going."

There was a fight. The other man turned out to be an off-duty detective who was having a drink with his partner. They double-teamed Jordan, who ended up with one of his eyes puffed up like a balloon and his face looking like a piece of raw meat. The police hauled him down to the Fourth Precinct and booked him on a charge of assaulting an officer. Jordan insists that one of the detectives there—like all of those involved, a Negro—glowered at him and snapped: "You're just another bad nigger from Vietnam."

That much recognition, however dubious, is a lot more than most Vietnam veterans get from their countrymen. They're among the strangest products of the strangest conflict the United States has ever fought—veterans who don't act like veterans, of a war that isn't officially a war. The rest of us hardly noticed when they went away. And now we're even less aware that nearly half a million have already returned to civilian life, and that others are pouring out of the service at the rate of 30,000 a month, according to the Veterans Administration.

They aren't bothering to remind us, either. They are slipping back into civilian life as quickly and quietly as an army of invisible men. "Their reception is all but nonexistent," observes William Tackmann, an official of the New York City Division of Veterans Affairs, one of the oldest and largest local veterans' agencies in the United States.

The Vietvets' anonymity and their countrymen's indifference combine to produce results that are unfair and sometimes shocking. Jordan, without income for four months after he left the army, was not eligible for mustering-out pay to help tide him over. Had he served in World War II or Korea, he'd have gotten $300. A former Navy lieutenant named Donald da Parma, now attending Columbia University Law School, gets $5 less per academic year in GI Bill benefits than did veterans of World War II—despite skyrocketing educational costs in the last twenty-four years. A plucky police trainee named Jerry Simpson, whose lifelong ambition was to become one of New York's Finest, was at first asked to resign from the Police Department when he returned from the battle front minus a leg. A place for him was eventually found, but it is hard to imagine a situation like that arising in any other war.

As a group, the Vietnam veterans resemble neither the noisy, assertive veterans of World War II, who clomped around as if they owned the country, nor the quiet, apathetic young men who shuffled aimlessly about after Korea, "staring nowhere," as one observer described them. Like the men of Korea, the Vietvets are relatively few in number and light in impact, but unlike the Korean veteran, the Vietvet has no glassy, faraway look in his eyes. He knows exactly what he wants: to throw off his identity as an ex-GI and become a civilian again as fast as possible.

He is doing just that. His readjustment is the smoothest in recent history, according to William Driver, the head of the Veterans Administration. Part of the reason for this, undoubtedly, is that the Vietvets are returning in a smaller, steadier stream. Part of it is because they weren't away as long. Nobody is in for the duration, as millions were in World War II. And so far enlistments haven't been extended, as they were during Korea. Today's Vietvet was like a man following a timetable: two years in the army, twelve months of it in Vietnam, then back home.

But perhaps the biggest reason why the Vietvet is—and wants to be—invisible is the nation's reaction to the war. World War II united the country in a kind of holy crusade. Many Americans weren't sure why we were in Korea, and it had the same frustrating, limited-war quality that annoys so many people about Vietnam. But at least everybody was agreed on the identity of the good guys and the bad guys. This time, there is no such agreement.

"This war is not like any other war," observes Tackmann. "There are no bands, no parades, no troops marching home." He continues: "I know of one instance where a boy returned to his neighborhood after being away for two years and they thought he'd been in jail."

"The business firms are not as anxious to hire them as they were after World War II when everybody wore his little 'ruptured duck' emblem in his lapel, and 'I am a veteran' meant something to the individual. Many of the boys' difficulties are due to the national dissent."

Ironically, about half the Vietvets—the overwhelming majority of whom are pro-war—are returning to college campuses, the hot centers of anti-war sentiment. One former sergeant, crippled in the terrible battle of the Ia Drang Valley and now attending college in New York City, hasn't even told any of his classmates that he's a veteran. "I don't want to start any arguments," he explains.

Another ex-serviceman learned to his chagrin that being a Vietvet even managed to get in the way of his sex life. "I met a coed in a bar," he recalls. "The wheels of seduction were turning full speed—until the subject got around to Vietnam. That ended it." Still a third, now at Harvard, has only half-jokingly been dubbed "the resident Fascist pig" of his dormitory.

Little wonder that Vietvets don't advertise their recent service by dressing distinctively in khaki pants and field jackets, as did the veterans of World War II. Nor do they cluster together.

The 26-year-old da Parma says he's not even sure how many other Vietvets there are in his class. "I don't pal around with veterans." No one has tried to form a veterans' group on the Columbia campus, he says, and no one wants to.

Da Parma got out of the Navy in May, 1967, after a tour in Vietnam as commanding officer of a tiny "swift boat"—one of the speedy, six-man craft that patrol coastal waters in search of smugglers and gunrunners. He's a Dartmouth graduate, alert and articulate, with a sense of humor that includes a fondness for understatement. Da Parma also has a knack for generalizing that makes you feel he's speaking for thousands of his fellows.

"Almost every veteran has an emotional bias in favor of the war," he reflects. "When you're in Vietnam, you can't sit around and wonder whether the Vietcong are right. They can't be right, they're trying to kill you. This," he continues with a smile, "tends to develop a certain antagonism in people. And that's something that sticks with you."

Despite this admitted bias, da Parma declines to label himself a hawk. Rather, he insists, he's a moderate. "When you've seen the war close up you begin to look at the question from so many sides that you're a little leery of the absolute answer." He sees the peace advocates as guilty of just that kind of absolutist thinking.

Unlike da Parma, who could afford to go to school with or without the GI Bill, many other Vietvets are as troubled trying to make ends meet on their educational benefits as they are about the attitudes of their classmates. Compared with earlier veterans, they are getting badly shortchanged. Under the first GI Bill, passed in 1944, a single veteran attending college full time got a $75-a-month subsistence allowance, plus up to $500 a year for tuition, books and supplies. For a nine-month academic year, that added up to $1,175.

Under the latest bill, enacted only last August, a veteran in the same circumstances gets a flat $130 a month, or a total of $1,170.

Almost exactly the same amount of money, but in 1944 it often covered all college expenses; now it pays for only about half or a third, depending on whether the veteran is attending a public or private school. This penalizes the Vietvet whose family lacks money to help him make up the difference.

Veterans who pass up the ivory towers in favor of jobs are finding that in today's booming economy quite a few prospective employers stand ready to hire them. "There's not nearly as much of the patriotic ballyhoo about hiring a veteran as there was after World War II, though there is more than after Korea," says Louis D. Kelsey, an official of the Labor Department's Office of Veterans Re-Employment Rights, stationed in New York. "The motives today are almost strictly economic. Veterans are draftproof."

Under federal law, a man who left a job to go into service is entitled to get it back—if it still exists when he comes home. If he can't perform that job because he's disabled, he's entitled to another with equal pay, status and seniority. That applies to federal jobs and those with private employers, but because of the doctrine of division of powers, Congress never made it binding on the state or local governments. "The way it works now," observes a federal official, "a man employed by a state or a city comes back, in effect, a second-class veteran. He may be denied his job back because he worked for the wrong employer."

This problem especially affects disabled veterans, as it did Jerry Simpson, the New York city police trainee whose left leg was accidentally blown off by American artillery near Chu Lai. While he was away, the Department stood foursquare behind Jerry Simpson—or so it seemed. When he was wounded, 800 policemen signed a get-well scroll and sent it to him in the hospital. And the New York Post quoted a police spokesman as saying: "Simpson's job will be waiting for him when he comes back."

But when Simpson came back, there was no job waiting for him—only sad-eyed Department officials who said that of course he couldn't qualify to be a patrolman. Simpson insisted there were all sorts of things a handicapped policeman could do, such as work in the crime laboratory or teach at the Police Academy. And he pointed out that the Department did have a special light-duty section for injured members of the force. But, replied the Department, that section had no amputees. And besides, it was confined to cops injured in the line of duty—and that didn't include Vietnam.

Little wonder that Simpson was angry at the attitude of many of his countrymen. "I don't think they appreciate any of the sacrifices we make," he said. "They look at the newspaper and say, 'what a shame, we ought to get out.' They really don't know what's going on over there, and most of them don't really care."

But then, Simpson's plight was revealed on the TV program A.B.C. Scope. Louis Kelsey, the federal re-employment official, saw that program, and Sid Davidoff, a top aide to Mayor John V. Lindsay, heard about it. They got together and brought the matter to the personal attention of the Mayor and Police Commissioner Howard R. Leary. An exception was made in the regulations, and Jerry Simpson became one of New York's Finest after all.

Neither the loss of his leg nor the frustrations over regaining his job have lessened Simpson's pride in serving his country. "That is the way I was brought up," he explains. "My country is my country. It doesn't matter if the war is right or wrong. If they say fight, you fight."

Was the war worth his own terrible personal sacrifice? Simpson answers slowly, searching his mind for the whole truth. "It was worth going there," he says. "I was doing what I thought was right. I was doing what I wanted to do.

"But on the other hand," he adds sadly, "there are a lot of things I'll never be able to do again that make it not worth anything, really."

Aside from the disabled, the Vietvets with the most problems as a group are the Negroes. The Vietnamese conflict is the first in which U.S. forces have been completely integrated. Negro soldiers, Marines and airmen, fighting shoulder to shoulder with their white countrymen, have exploded the long-held myth of black inferiority in combat. They have also experienced far more integration and equality than any group of black Americans in history—military or civilian.

What will happen as the Negro veterans, filled with a new sense of pride and equality, and thoroughly trained in all the arts of killing and destruction, return to the ghettos to confront the same squalor, joblessness and prejudice that they knew when they left? Whitney M. Young, Jr., executive secretary of the National Urban League, warns that they just won't stand for it—that they may well turn to violence, becoming a major national threat, and making the expected long, hot summers even longer and hotter.

Others are more optimistic. Marshall C. Miller, assistant chief of the Labor Department's Veterans Employment Service, says if they are given the chance, the black veterans will be a major constructive influence in their community. So far, at least, the optimists are winning. The report of the President's riot commission didn't mention black veterans even once as a factor in last summer's widespread disorders. Nor was there any indication from news reports that they took part in the riots that followed Martin Luther King's assassination. "I can find you plenty of bitter Negroes," says the head of a black veterans' group in New York, "but they'll be guys who've never been in service. I'd have a hard time finding a veteran who's bitter."

Ronald Jordan of Newark, for example, insists he's not bitter, though he is angry at the treatment he says he has received at the hands of the police—especially since all the charges against him were later dropped. He doubts that Negro veterans, specifically, will turn to violence. But, like everybody else, he does expect more trouble from the black community as a whole.

Jordan is much better off than most of his ghetto neighbors. He lives with both parents in a neat, five-room apartment that contains a large color television set. His sister is away at college. His brother is a machinist. So is his father, who has worked for the same firm for twenty-four years. Jordan wants to be a machinist himself, but since he got out of the army last October, he has had trouble finding a job.

A VA counselor has persuaded Jordan to gain skills by enrolling in a thirteen-week course in tool-and-die making under the Manpower Development and Training Act. He gets a bigger weekly allowance under this program than he would have received under the training provisions of the GI Bill. The big question remains: can he get a job once he's properly prepared for one? Some counselors insist that in these prosperous times almost anyone with a skill can find work; others say that for Negroes it isn't that easy.

"Some Negroes get out of service and take some of training," says Vincent Malveaux of the New York City Division of Veterans Affairs, "but then they re-enlist because they can't use that training to get a job." That helps explain why the all-service re-enlistment rate for Negroes is more than twice as high as for whites. In the army alone, the difference is even more striking: 66 per cent for Negroes to 20 per cent for whites.

Another decided minority group among the Vietvets is made up of those who are against the war. Probably the most famous of the doves is 38-year-old Donald Duncan of Oakland, Calif. He is well known by sight to browsers at bookstores and paperback stands. Nattily attired in his ribbon-festooned uniform, with his Green Beret set firmly on his head, the former master sergeant glares out at prospective readers from the jacket of The New Legions, looking exactly like what he was—a rough-and-ready member of the army's elite Special Forces.

But Duncan has come a long way since those days. After more than ten years in the service, the last eighteen months of it in Vietnam, he turned down a battlefield commission, resigned from the army, and returned late in 1965 to become a hard-hitting critic of U.S. policy and the military's growing influence on American life.

A talk with Duncan quickly dispels the book-jacket image of the gruff, burly six-striper. He is quiet voiced and scholarly sounding. His disillusionment with the war, Duncan says, began when he got to Vietnam. "I really believed, as most soldiers do, that we were fighting to save the world for democracy," he says, "but when I got over there, the contradictions became glaring. It became clear to me that the United States was violating its own doctrines by propping up a corrupt leadership that didn't have popular support. Here we were trying to build a brave new world—and using a garbage pit as our foundation."

Duncan says the United States will be worse off if it wins a military victory than if it loses. "If we win then we'll try the same thing in other places—especially Latin America—and isolate ourselves even further from the developing nations of the world."

Like most Vietvets, Duncan is not a joiner, and rarely takes part in demonstrations, but there is at least one peace organization made up exclusively of men who served in Vietnam. It is called Viet Nam Veterans Against The War, and it was founded in June, 1967. It has thirty-one chapters across the country. However, according to its national field secretary, a former Signal Corps sergeant named Francis Rocks, its nation-wide membership totals only about 200.

Rocks says he and other members have been alienated by the peace movement because of some of its tactics. "I got my head bashed in and was arrested during 'Stop The Draft Week' in New York last December," recalls Rocks, a high school dropout who works on and off as a truck driver.

"I believe in peaceful picketing," he says, "but a lot of things that went on during that week were wrong—all that running through the streets. I don't believe in charging the Pentagon either. Things like that just alienate people, especially veterans."

Doves and hawks alike, the Vietvets are gradually—but inevitably—becoming more visible as their ranks continue to swell. Television stations have begun running public service announcements in which no less a personage than Ed Sullivan urges employers to give them jobs. And in recent months, the government, if not the rank and file of their fellow citizens, has started showing a growing awareness of their needs and is taking some steps to meet them.

Despite its glaring weaknesses in mustering-out pay and education, the latest GI Bill, passed in August, 1967, brings most benefits up to those of earlier laws. There have even been a few improvements. For example, a veteran who wants to complete high school today can, for the first time, draw full educational allowances without having them charged against his future college benefits.

And, for the first time in any war, the VA is even sending representatives to the battlefields, to speak with GIs about to come home and make sure they're aware of their benefits. More than 200,000 men have been reached in Vietnam to date.

Back home, when President Johnson asked Congress to raise the eighteen-year-old ceiling on government-guaranteed home loans from $7,500 to $10,000, the lawmakers responded by approving a $12,500 limit.

The President has set in motion a host of brand new programs of assistance. He has ordered the U.S. Employment Service to try to reach every new veteran by phone or in person to help him find work if necessary; has set aside $50 million in the budget for extra incentive payments to veterans willing to take on certain public service jobs, such as teaching poor children and manning understrength police and fire departments and hospitals, and given veterans new priority in getting civil service jobs. The VA has widely expanded its counseling and guidance services. Since February, new veterans' advisory centers have opened in twenty major cities.

The Labor Department has even begun a small but heartening program to help black-sheep veterans—those who left the service with less than honorable discharges. If his pastor or another community leader will attest that such a man is making progress in rehabilitating himself, the Department will issue him a certificate that is intended to improve his prospects for a job. More than 2,000 men have already applied for such certificates.

The biggest, boldest new program, called Project Transition, could some day turn out to be as revolutionary in the job-training field as the GI Bill was in education.

Tried out experimentally at five bases last year, it is now being extended, by Presidential order, to all major troop installations in the United States. Its purpose is to teach GIs civilian skills during their last six months in service. Courses are offered four hours a day, five days a week in everything from automatic data processing to gasoline-station management. Business firms such as IBM, United Parcel Service and the Humble Oil & Refining Co. are providing some of the instructors and lesson plans—and hiring some of the students when they're discharged.

The program places special emphasis on helping disadvantaged GIs—among them many Negroes—but it is open to all interested. However, when facilities are limited, those thought to need help most get priority.

Project Transition's target for the next fiscal year, as set by the President, is to reach half a million servicemen—nearly 60 per cent of the total due for release. It and all the other new programs should help convince the Vietvets that although they may still be largely invisible, they have not been entirely forgotten.

SECOND YEAR OF THE JUNE WAR

STANLEY WOLPERT

Mr. Wolpert, professor of history at the University of California, is the author of Morley and India, 1906-1910 (University of California Press), The Expedition (Little, Brown), Nine Hours to Rama (Random House), and other books.

On June 5 it will be one full year since the outbreak of the Six Day War between Israel and Egypt-Jordan-Syria, yet the seventh day of peace has still not come to the tortured Holy Land. Last year at this time the world paused, and watched, holding its breath, as Nasser's army of nearly 1,000 tanks rolled across Sinai, while Egyptian guns closed the Strait of Tiran, and Arab broadcasts beamed to Tel Aviv, Haifa and Jerusalem, threatened to push "all Jews into the sea." The UN waited in loquacious impotence for the inevitable jihad of extermination. The "alliance" of Western maritime powers, which supposedly was being forged in the back rooms of Europe's admiralties, foundered before ever being launched. Israel looked for the hand of help which our State Department and President had promised in 1957 in return for the withdrawal from Sinai; but American forces were overextended elsewhere when that promissory note came due, and Mr. Johnson kept his own counsel while 5,000 graves were dug outside Tel Aviv and hotels atop Mount Carmel were converted into emergency hospitals.

That was a year ago, a war away—or was it but yesterday's third blast of battle in an unending twenty years' war of attrition? The eve of the anniversary is an appropriate time to reflect upon the June war, reconsidering its historic significance and, more important, considering what may be done in the days ahead to avert further rounds of violence in the Near East. Militarily, last June's victory of Israeli arms remains little less than a "miracle" of strategy, tactics and national spirit, an example to the world of what the union of science, intellect, faith and desperation may accomplish. Japan's victory over Russia in 1905 pales by comparison, for Israel not only defeated three enemy armies poised to attack it from as many directions but quadrupled its size and secured new borders that are strategically far superior to the former lines. The blockade of Eilat was lifted, Tel Aviv gained an additional ten minutes of precious warning time against air attack, and the capital of Jerusalem was reunited. [See "Today in Tel Aviv" by Stanley Wolpert, The Nation, July 3, 1967.]

Diplomatically, however, the war's aftermath has brought Israel an intensification of conflict, vigilance and tension, rather than an end to them. Last summer, Israelis hoped that the stunning blow would quickly bring Hussein at least, and Nasser perhaps, to a conference table at which captured territory could be traded for the promise of peace sanctified by solemn treaties of recognition. The West Bank and Sinai were spoken of as "levers" for prying an intransigent Egypt and its vacillating satellite Jordan loose from political positions that had proved as untenable as they were anachronistic and irrational. No one in Israel doubted that wounds of humiliation and broken dreams of glory would long stoke the hatred in Arab hearts, yet everyone hoped that time would soon begin to numb the rancor and peace would work its natural cure among neighbors left to resolve their own difficulties.

Israel and its Arab neighbors, however, were hardly left to cope with their conflicts alone. The charred fuselages of Russian jets were not all cleared from Egyptian airfields before replacements began to arrive, and within six months an estimated $2 billion worth of fresh military hardware had been shipped from Moscow to Cairo. The Russians sought this time to insure their investment more prudently by sending many more "advisers" than ever before to the U.A.R.; today, approximately 3,000 Russian scientists, technicians and military officers are working with the Egyptian army, navy and air force. The guided-missile sinking of the Israeli destroyer Eilat last October proved dramatically the increased effectiveness of Russia's Near East mission, and Israel knows too well by now that future wars will not be announced by two weeks of bellicose threats from Cairo, Damascus or Amman. The "next round," if diplomacy fails to avert it, would start with the scream of missiles raining on Tel Aviv or Jerusalem.

Israel, of course, is determined to prevent such a tragedy at whatever cost, and many Israelis insist that the only sure protection against Russo-Arab treachery tomorrow is the invasion and occupation of Cairo, Damascus and Amman today. Eshkol's newly United Labor Party has successfully resisted such extremist pressure, but the longer a permanent settlement is deferred the more difficult it becomes for the counsel of Israeli moderates to prevail. The March raid into Jordan, focused upon Karamah, was at once a warning of how short the fuse of patience has burned within Israel, and a reminder of the ultimate futility of violence as the exterminator of violence.

The most tragic reflection on the eve of this first anniversary is that hardly one day of total peace has passed since the cease-fire of June 10, 1967. Israeli soldiers have continued to provide living targets to gun batteries across the Nile and Jordan Rivers; Israeli civilians continue to follow their daily rounds of existence poised precariously over unseen land mines, which one day destroy a bus filled with school children and on the next blow up a jeep loaded with farmers.

Bernie, Aux Ecoutes (Paris)

"Stop! I Am Colonel Popov of the Soviet Secret Service!"

The El-Fatah bands of terrorists grow larger and more daring, and have by now virtually been accepted as members of the Jordanian army. Israel's reprisal raids of March were followed by the opening of El-Fatah recruiting offices in Amman, and Hussein, far from disarming the terrorist bands in his country, hailed their patriotism and has offered them open support. Bitterness, hatred and tension have reached a new peak. Throughout the Arab world, from Damascus to Dakar, terrorists are eulogized as "national freedom fighters," or "commando heroes." The combination of Russian arms and the increasing popularity of terrorist action, therefore, has made the recurrence of major warfare between Israel and the surrounding Arab states more probable in the immediate future than it had been at any time during the decade preceding last June.

What of the prospects for international mediation? Since last November, when the United Nations Security Council, in an unprecedented show of unanimity concerning the Near East, passed the British resolution calling for "withdrawal of Israeli armed forces from territories occupied in the recent conflict," as well as the "termination of all claims or states of belligerency and respect for and acknowledgment of the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of every state in the area . . ." Gunnar Jarring, mediator for the UN, has labored to breathe life into those formulas. His mission to date has made several significant forward strides, most important of which perhaps is that it continues—for where negotiations are as delicate and precarious as those across the Nile and Jordan, the mere fact that they have not broken down entirely is encouraging. Syria, it is true, has refused to speak with Jarring, and will doubtless remain the most intransigent Arab state, though if Egypt and Jordan become reconciled to Israel's "sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence" it is hard to imagine that Syria would long resist alone.

The Israeli Egyptian prisoner exchange in January was the first act of positive peace making accomplished by Jarring's mission, and the initial steps taken to clear the Suez Canal seemed further evidence that the bellicose posture was softening; but since then Egyptian and Jordanian backs have restiffened, and Israeli trigger fingers have become more nervous. Yet surely both sides in this debilitating conflict must realize by now that it is to their own best interests to achieve a "permanent" peaceful settlement.

As the price of continuing nonrecognition of Israel, Nasser and Hussein have mortgaged their own nation's sovereignty to Saudi Arabia, Iraq and Kuwait. The irony of their irrational refusal to accept the obvious is that by pursuing this ostrich policy they have done more to undermine Arab power than anything Israel could have accomplished under normal conditions of regional diplomacy. Many Israelis freely admit, moreover, that Nasser's threats and hatred have proved to be Zionism's most effective recent source of recruitment and support. He has done for Israel what "Bull" Connor did for the civil rights movement. Not only did Nasser lose the last war but he appears as a result to have lost his health and spirit, and it may well be too late for him to negotiate anything other than his own retirement from public life. That would, of course, raise Hussein's stature in the Arab world and could possibly give him the chance he seems long to have awaited, of taking independent initiative to reach a rapprochement with Israel. What might the specific ingredients of such a settlement be?

Obviously, Israel will not redivide Jerusalem, but except for this and several strategic outposts, such as Latrun, all the other captured portions of the West Bank could probably either revert to Jordan or come under some condominium arrangement, as the reward of Hussein's recognition of Israel. Jordan could also receive free access to the ports of Haifa and Jaffa, and doubtless a substantial subsidy for the permanent resettlement of Palestinian refugees, who might well prefer to become productive farmers on the West Bank than to remain eternally at the mercy of some international dole. Israel's advanced atomic potential could then be put to peaceful rather than militant use, and atomic-powered desalination plants could be built at the Mediterranean for fresh-water irrigation schemes designed to enrich the productivity of the entire West Bank.

Jordan and Israel would thus become partners in a long overdue program of bilateral economic development. The Hashemite Kingdom could set an example of progressive reform for the entire Arab world, and by real achievements pull ahead of its so-called Socialist neighbors, Syria and Egypt. Admittedly, the first step would require Hussein to show great courage, but the potential rewards to his people outweigh the risks involved, and if history can teach anyone anything, surely it instructs the Arab leadership that the path hitherto chosen by Nasser leads only to self-destruction.

Israel continues to insist that it will negotiate only "directly" with the Arab states confronting its borders, but Jarring has served the role of UN "intermediary" for almost half a year in his conversations with Eban and Eshkol, and there is no reason to assume that he could not function in New York as Ralph Bunche did in Rhodes during the armistice talks there twenty years ago. A noisy "Greater Israel" minority faction tends to see Israel's "manifest destiny" as that of completing the job of North African imperial conquest long abandoned by Britain and France. But such vainglorious dreams merely rival the fantasies of those Arabs who cling to the myth that Israel was born, has prospered and survived every test of time as the "cat's paw" of some international conspiracy. If Israel is to retain its unique character and national identity, at once so remarkably complex, so rich in cultural cross currents, yet unified in spirit, heritage and purpose, it is difficult to imagine why the Gaza Strip should be permanently incorporated into the state. Not that Egyptian forces would ever again be granted a base of operations so close to Tel Aviv, at least not by any Israeli Government that hoped to survive such an act; but a totally demilitarized Gaza, an internationally secure zone similar perhaps to the arrangement ultimately worked out for the West Bank, would probably meet with approval in Jerusalem.

As for Sinai and the Golan Heights, Israel sees both regions as martial "barometers"—presaging war when filled; peace, if empty. Yet could not precisely the same be said of the view from Cairo and Damascus? It is hardly reasonable to expect Syrians or Egyptians to feel any less anxious and hostile about Israeli tanks and artillery within range of their capitals than Israelis have always felt about the long guns atop Golan and the tanks in Gaza. The trust needed for continuing peace can hardly be generated within range of loaded muzzles, and Israel must be persuaded to withdraw its armed forces from north and south as well as west in return for guaranteed international patrolling of vacated areas. Finally, there must be solemn and dependable assurance that the Suez Canal and Gulf of Aqaba will remain open to all shipping and, if necessary, an international maritime task force should be kept ready to enforce that right of free passage against any unilateral seizure.

How "realistic" are the prospects that the present faint trickle of negotiations will become a stream to break down barriers of false pride? Hardly encouraging, no doubt, but what are the alternatives? The status quo must prove less tolerable for both sides with each passing day, each act of terror and counter-terror, leading inexorably toward another blaze of mass death and destruction, conceivably even to atomic holocaust. In May, 1967, there was no time to negotiate a "cooling-off" period, no time to arrange quiet meetings, no time to ward off the incendiary confrontation, which rolled toward its climax with the inevitability of a Greek tragedy once Nasser's demand for the withdrawal of the UN force met with immediate acquiescence from U Thant. This year, while time remains, the United States should link its promise of military support for Hussein to the demand for peaceful negotiations and official Jordanian action to stop El-Fatah terrorism. It should, moreover, initiate a summit conference with the Soviet Union to deal with pacification of the Near East, most effective as part of a blueprint for global peace. Yet whatever the results of peace talks concerning Vietnam, we must not ignore the equally urgent and potentially greater source of world conflict in the Holy Land.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

NEW HAVEN: RENEWAL AND RIOTS

DANE ARCHER

Mr. Archer, a senior at Yale University, is a frequent contributor to the Yale Alumni Magazine and a former editor of Friday, a magazine published by the Yale Daily News, and circulated to college campuses in the Northeast.

New Haven

In 1953, Richard C. Lee became the mayor of New Haven, Connecticut's port city of 142,000. In the last fifteen years, his pioneering programs of urban renewal have rebuilt the city. With the single-mindedness of a visionary, he has transformed New Haven's inner city from an aging slum into a futuristic landscape of poured concrete and high steel. Now Richard Lee is in trouble.

In 1953, New Haven's critics were fond of calling the city "a big slum around a big school," but Lee has changed all that. Today, the streets around Yale hum with the sounds of prosperity. Under the Mayor's aggressive leadership, the city's decaying core has given way to bustling retail areas, striking commercial buildings, sweeping highway systems and matching high-rise apartments.

New Haven's massive programs of renewal have garnered national attention for the city and its Mayor. Since 1953, Lee has been the subject of a handful of books and of more than 200 magazine articles. Renewal has also been good politics. Last fall, Lee was returned to his eighth term in office by a comfortable margin. And much federal legislation—including, at least in part, the birth of the War on Poverty—has been influenced by his success. To federal authorities and to jealous mayors of other cities, New Haven is "The Model City."

But something is desperately wrong in New Haven. On Saturday, August 19, 1967, a white snack-bar owner shot a young Puerto Rican. That night, the city's black pockets erupted. Fires, looting and rage swept New Haven. Lee called upon state police and alerted National Guardsmen in an effort to contain the rioters. There were 550 arrests, 145 on felony charges. The violence lasted four days, and was longer and more destructive than the summer riots in any city of comparable size. Only the conflagrations of Detroit, Newark and Milwaukee were more costly.

New Haven officials were stunned. Despite its skyscraping pillars of glass and steel, the city which had prided itself as the high-water mark of America's urban renewal efforts had been found sadly no more secure from violence than the nation's most unredeveloped cities. The city fathers stumbled over one another in a flurry of self-justification.

One spokesman confided privately that "the riots came as a terrible surprise—especially after all Dick has tried to do for those people." New Haven's anti-poverty agency characterized the rioters as nothing more serious than "teen-age hooligans" with a thirst for revelry. According to the agency, "few if any of the incidents of the four days bespoke any widespread discontent."

Mayor Lee called the riots "those awful days last August," and said publicly: "I don't feel discouraged, nor dejected. . . . It won't deter me from continuing the programs we have and if possible intensifying them."

The Mayor is sincere, but his resolve is unfortunate. The resentment which crashed windows to the city's pavements last August is chronic, and not the warm-weather caprice of delinquents. As one ghetto black said, "In winter, the people have the same feelings—but they keep them indoors instead of on the streets."

Today, the city is polarized into racial camps. Last August's violence is never far from sight—it can be seen in the glass shards which litter the streets, and in the plywood panels behind which the ghetto's merchants nervously ply their trades. The city's high schools erupt in staccato bouts of chair throwing and window smashing. The police are nervous and quick to employ Mace in any of a hundred situations where they fear the mushrooming of mass violence.

The anger of blacks has become an inescapable fact of life in urban America, but that it should fan into violence in New Haven astonishes the liberal forces which propelled Lee into power. New Haven has a reputation for working tirelessly to mitigate the toll of being poor, shunned and powerless. This philanthropic image is misleading. The city talks a great deal about progress, but its performance is progress of a very special sort. In 1968, New Haven is much prettier than it was when Lee took office, but it is still a city of the prosperous and the tragically poor. Indeed, there is ample reason to believe that the urban renewal program never really intended it to be anything else.

The story of New Haven's adventures in urban renewal is inseparable from the career of Mayor Lee. Born of mixed English, Scottish and Irish blood, Lee began work as a reporter for the city's Journal-Courier. In 1943, he became director of the Yale News Bureau where his talent for public relations landed A. Whitney Griswold, then president of Yale, on the covers of both Time and Newsweek.

While working for Yale, Lee entered New Haven politics. In 1949 and 1951, he ran losing races for mayor, the second time by two votes. Then one evening in 1951, Lee visited a tenement on Oak Street, at that time the city's most notorious slum. Overcome by the wretched conditions inside, Lee burst from the building and was violently sick at the curb. The incident angered him and, according to his associates, lit within him a determination to purge New Haven of its slums.

In 1953, with liberal support for a new concept called "urban redevelopment," Lee became mayor. Suddenly, the city came alive. As one aide recalls, "Word spread that something new and big was about to happen in New Haven, and soon political idealists began drifting in from all over the country." Lee attracted city planners and "poverty" bureaucrats like Edward Logue, Mitchell Sviridoff, L. Thomas Appleby, Melvin Adams and others.

In the beginning, the Mayor's ambitious plans for a "slumless city" met opposition. New Haven's other elected officials, including the city's Board of Aldermen, were reluctant to commit the will and resources that massive urban renewal would require. Many of the city's financial leaders feared that Lee's schemes would bankrupt New Haven.

The Mayor was not deterred. Lee made almost no effort to capture the city's political machinery, building his own instead. With federal and private backing, he created a new high-powered bureaucracy called the Redevelopment Agency and, in 1962, a high-budget anti-poverty program. As critics like John Wilhelm have pointed out, Lee's hand-picked "private government" brought with it a vast pool of patronage and power that, financed by federal and foundation money, remained immune to the pressures that dependence on local taxes would have produced.

The bureaucracy of redevelopment is also politically autonomous. No part of the Mayor's machinery (except Lee himself) is elected by the people of New Haven. Despite this, Lee's private government has become the most far-reaching political force in the history of New Haven. His bureaucrats make the decisions which determine the physical shape of the city and, indirectly, the quality of its life.

To underwrite his ambitious plans for the "new" New Haven, Lee looked to Washington. He was the first mayor in America to recognize the cash value of Title One of the Federal Housing Act of 1949 which provided $1 billion for redevelopment planning and property acquisition. Under the terms of the act, the costs of land purchase and clearance are borne two-thirds by the federal government and one-third by local sources. With federal dollars, cities like New Haven were able to buy, level, and sell land to private developers at a loss.

The housing legislation of the federal government also introduced a greater use of the municipal powers of "eminent domain." As one public official said: "Before the 1949 Act, cities could only seize private properties for public use, like a highway or school. But now the properties can be taken for a public purpose—which in New Haven's case means the elimination of slums and blight."

Lee rapidly became expert at tapping federal coffers. In fifteen years, the city has been given, or has on reserve, urban renewal funds totaling $130,665,844—or roughly $915 for every person in New Haven. By comparison, New York City has attracted a modest $37 of renewal money per person. William F. Buckley has calculated that if every American city were dealt with as generously as was New Haven, the federal budget for urban renewal alone would be roughly $146 billion.

New Haven's war on blight began with ceremony in January, 1957, when the Mayor rode in the cab of a wrecker to send its huge steel ball crashing through the walls of an Oak Street tenement. The demolition crews cut a wide swath through the heart of New Haven, and the city's first renewal project was under way.

Today New Haven operates the most ambitious and thoroughgoing programs of redevelopment anywhere in America. More than 3,000 acres—almost one-third of the city's 22 square miles—have been rebuilt, cleared, or committed to renewal plans. More than $237 million in construction has been completed. Business and industry have profited, the flight of upper-income families to the suburbs has been curbed, and municipal assessments in the redeveloped areas have swelled from $15 million to more than $38 million.

Robert Weaver, Federal Housing and Home Finance Administrator, has said: "I think New Haven is coming closest to our dream of a slumless city." In a sense, that is accurate: most of the city's slum areas are being replaced by attractive new structures. But in terms of people's lives, renewal has meant nothing less than disaster. New Haven is being rebuilt as if it were Brasilia—a city started from scratch in unpopulated wasteland. Modern high-rise apartments are landscaped by vast open spaces of grass; eight-lane divided highways race through the middle of the city; gargantuan garages and parking lots sprawl over vast areas in the center city. But to make room for Lee's Brazilian vision, thousands of people have had to move. One black, an ex-resident who had been "relocated" to make way for the luxury housing on Oak Street, said: "Man, there used to be people—thousands of real, live people living on Oak Street. It wasn't the classiest place in town, but it was home. Today, you can't see a poor face on Oak Street, or a black face either."

In Lee's New Haven, urban renewal has been a euphemism for "Poor Removal" and, in particular, for "Poor Blacks Removal." To clear land for its flashy projects, the Redevelopment Agency makes extensive use of its power to seize private holdings. The natural victims are the city's poor, and most blacks are poor. Although less than 5 per cent of the city's whites have had to move for renewal, nearly 40 per cent of its blacks have been or are being bulldozed from their homes. Despite this, the nonwhite population of New Haven has more than tripled since 1953, and today blacks and Puerto Ricans make up from 25 to 35 per cent of the city. As renewal knocks down existing nonwhite housing, the residents and a growing stream of immigrants are packed into whatever buildings are left standing.

New Haven has compounded its abuse of the poor by its failure to replace the homes it has eagerly destroyed. Since the onset of urban renewal, the city has crumbled 6,776 households—about one-seventh of all the housing in New Haven. In the same period, the city has built less than 2,000 new units of housing, and eight out of ten of these have been for the city's wealthy or middle class. New Haven has completed about 400 low-rental units, but all but twelve have been for the elderly. In short, the city's poor have not been rehoused and New Haven's rich and Yale-related professionals now live on land that was once theirs. Perhaps for this reason, Courtland Wilson of the NAACP has called urban renewal "the raping and lynching of the black community—Northern style."

Behind the foggy rhetoric of "doing something for the poor," the city has used public funds to purchase and destroy their homes. In New Haven, it is the already thriving—and not the poor—who profit from renewal. But because the city continues to talk about helping its poor, there is some confusion over precisely what the aims of urban renewal have been and are. And the confusion has worked in the Mayor's favor. Lee is the "plastic man" of urban politics and he has carefully stretched himself to be all things to all men. To merchants, Lee is a mayor dedicated to revitalizing business and shopping areas in the city. To industry, he is a man who will flex municipal muscles to secure attractive factory sites. And to the liberals in New Haven and at Yale, Lee is a crusader whose paramount concerns have something to do with poverty and the creation of "a decent home for every New Haven family." In the past, Lee's versatility has created a coalition of support from the organized interests in New Haven.

But after fifteen years, the real nature of the Mayor's programs has become less ambiguous. Melvin Adams, the current Redevelopment Administrator, has said that those forced from their land have been dispersed to foster integration and prevent the creation of new slums. That is just not true—the poor are dispersed to already swollen slums simply because there is nowhere else for them to go. At any given time in New Haven, there are fewer than 1,500 vacancies. Many of these are high rent or too small for a large family, and, after last summer, only a handful of white home owners would rent vacant apartments to blacks or Puerto Ricans. One black on New Haven's Congress Avenue said bitterly: "Man, I've been moved four times in two years. I've tried to get a place where there aren't any bulldozers. But the ads in the paper just list the address and never the phone number, so you have to go in person. The minute they see the color of your face, the place is taken or else going for $250 a month."

Lee's vague concern for poverty is sincere, even if his city's programs fail to reflect it. He is a man distressed by poverty, and his crusade to rid the city of its slums is in part well meant. To the Mayor slums represent "occasions of sin"—they are the breeding ground of vice and crime where children may be molested and where the young may begin lives outside the law.

But Lee's solution to slums has been regrettably simple: he has just knocked them down and seems to harbor the whimsical hope that the poor will be Pied Pipered off to Bridgeport or some other Connecticut city. But the poor do not evaporate, even when their homes are demolished.

In 1962, the city won $2.5 million from the Ford Foundation for an anti-poverty agency intended to improve the quality of life among the city's poor. This agency, Community Progress, Inc. (CPI), has spent more than $22 million in five years, but its dollars have done little more than fuel its own bureaucracy. The face of poverty, and particularly black poverty, has not changed. In 1966, the nonwhite unemployment rates were double those for whites. Whites paid a mean rent of $84.18; blacks paid $99.06. One white in eight lived in substandard housing, but one black in four was poorly housed. In CPI's own words, "All of the various indices of slum housing are present."

With federal backing, Lee has had at his disposal ample resources to mount an unprecedented attack on the causes and symptoms of poverty, but the city has demonstrated other priorities. Perhaps because of his special purposes, Lee has thought it best to by-pass federal guidelines which call for the participation of an informed public in renewal plans. Since the poor are unlikely to champion plans which call for their own removal, they are informed only after the city's designs have been worked out in secrecy. By that time, financing has been arranged and the city is "committed" to its blueprints. Through after-the-fact consultation of the public, Lee has successfully blunted the effectiveness of citizen criticism.

But Lee is a successful politician and, since redevelopment is the most conspicuous feature of his administration, his supporters brandish the eight election victories as an open-ended mandate from the public. In fact, Lee's repeated terms in office prove only that the interests best served by renewal—business, the professions, middle- and upper-income families—are precisely those groups that go to the polls. Those badly served by clearance and relocation—the city's black and white poor—are underregistered and do not vote.

Since last summer's riots, however, the illusory consensus behind Lee has begun to disintegrate. Riots are the products of many things, among them the simple contagion of a well-publicized idea. But in New Haven, they ushered in a fresh look at just what renewal has and has not done. The report of the Kerner Commission on Civil Disorder spoke of the "lesson" of both New Haven and Detroit, "where well-intentioned programs designed to respond to the needs of ghetto residents were not worked out and implemented sufficiently in cooperation with the intended beneficiaries."

One very good reason why New Haven's programs were not worked out in consultation with the poor is that the poor were never intended as the "beneficiaries" of renewal. The real goals of renewal, as Herbert Gans says of Boston's redevelopment in that city's West End in The Urban Villagers, involved "replacing low-yield areas with high-rent buildings that would bring in additional municipal income."

As the real purposes and quality of renewal have become apparent, a number of citizen groups have mobilized to inform the public and to organize resistance. The American Independent Movement (AIM), a radical group made up largely of whites, has from almost the start scored the inequity and folly of Lee's brand of city reconstruction. Recently, perhaps because of the riots, people have begun listening to AIM's criticism and some small progress has been made toward limiting the nearly total power of the Redevelopment Agency. Last summer, before the riots, a black group called the Hill Parents' Association (HPA) was given shoestring support by the city to organize a number of black-run, self-help programs. Under the leadership of Fred Harris, HPA's programs—which included a day camp for ghetto children and an employment agency for the unemployed—sparked a small renaissance on the Hill, the city's sprawling ghetto. As one minor city official said, "HPA worked wonders. The kids were going to camp, men were going to work—the Hill was alive and humming for the first time."

But then came the violence and the city stopped playing ball with black leaders, especially those like Harris who feel that blacks should help choose and run the kinds of programs that are advertised as helping blacks. The city also began what could only be seen as a concerted program of harassment. Harris was arrested and charged with the possession of drugs and a stolen typewriter. Then in late December, New Haven police arrested six men—five of them nonwhite—who had allegedly conspired to blow several of the Mayor's new buildings out from under him. Two of the six had connections with community-run organizations on the Hill. To blacks, the city was clearly on a witch hunt to show that New Haven's riots were the work of anarchists and criminals and had nothing to do with redevelopment or the racial malice that divides New Haven.

The winds of change are in the air, and both public opinion and professional judgment are reappraising Lee's variety of renewal. Several aldermen are bucking municipal coercion in an effort to stop the most recent renewal folly: a six-lane "ring" highway which would isolate Yale and downtown New Haven from the rest of the city. And at least one important magazine, Progressive Architecture, has criticized the social failures of Lee's renewal programs.

With the end of America's war in Vietnam, what the riot commission called the "lesson" of New Haven will become increasingly valuable. Out of fear, guilt and some sense of justice, our society may be about to shift the gears of its priorities in the direction of its have-nots. As the nation's most redeveloped metropolis, New Haven could easily emerge as a model for whatever new spending is set aside to better America's cities. For just that reason, an accurate evaluation of the "miracle" in Model City has never been more necessary.

In the black areas of New Haven today, passing patrol cars are met with clenched fists. The city's blacks are angry and its whites are arming. Sometimes, as when a tenement vaporizes in the fiery night, the background rumbling of the ghetto is even audible downtown. But at City Hall, fingers crossed, the Mayor continues to apply old errors in efforts to solve the very problems they helped create.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

James T. Farrell: An Impossible Comeback

NEW YEAR'S EVE/1929. By James T. Farrell. The Smith with Horizon Press. 144 pp. $4.50.

PETER CLECAK

Mr. Clecak teaches English at the University of California (Irvine), and is at work on a book on contemporary American social criticism.

In a sense, the theme of my fiction is the American way of life.

—James T. Farrell, 1941

The literary career of James T. Farrell spans nearly four decades of American life. He published his first piece of short fiction in 1929; ten years later he had apparently achieved a permanent though modest place in American letters. But Farrell has gradually become a novelist without an audience even though he continues to write at a furious pace. His best work—the Studs Lonigan trilogy—remains locked in the remote world of the thirties, a decade which embarrasses the surviving literary intellectuals, while striking most younger readers as a historical curiosity. And his postwar efforts can be most charitably described as a series of pale fictions devoid of the intensity and driving energy which, as Alfred Kazin has remarked, gave his earlier novels “a kind of dreary grandeur.”

It is tempting to regard Farrell's disappearance from the American literary scene merely as the personal misfortune of a writer unable to recognize the loss of his most formidable resource—an intense will to comprehend and dominate his environment through fiction. The novelist who gave permanent form to the American way of life in the twenties and thirties thus appears as a minor champ whose decline follows from the same ambition and blindness which led him to early literary achievement. Although this general hypothesis takes us a long way toward explaining his decline, it tends to obscure the larger social and historical patterns which continued to define Farrell long after he lost his capacity to define them. If the early novels record his struggle to express and achieve “the American way of life,” his postwar fiction testifies to the anesthetizing and embittering consequences of personal success and subsequent failure.

Farrell's life illustrates the central theme of his fiction. It is a plausible variation of the Horatio Alger myth which moves from the dreary South Side of Chicago to New York. Beginning as a poor Irish Catholic boy, a second-generation American, Farrell quickly experienced the imprisoning forces of the urban jungle—poverty, violence, ignorance and religious superstition. Through reading, however, he began to understand the possibilities of escape. He did not propose to escape into fiction but rather to escape through it. From the limited perspective of the ghetto, all forms of success required the gradual and painful creation of a thoroughly individualistic ideology, a total investment of physical energy, intelligence and will in the task of self-emancipation. But liberation under these terms also required an intimate knowledge of the imprisoning social context. Angered by the dehumanizing conditions which dissipated the energies of those around him, Farrell turned to writing and to left-wing politics in the late twenties. “When I first began to write I was full of indignation because of the sorrows of this world. I was indignant because of the exploitation of some men and women by others, because of the coldness with which some people manipulate others, because of dirt, poverty, ignorance, aggressiveness, and the other things which ruin and sadden human lives.”

But Farrell's attraction to the American Left did not endure the first rhetorical salvos of the cold war, for his Socialist vision finally expressed and concealed a deeper commitment to individual achievement. Farrell's personal success—which prefigured the movement of large segments of the American middle class to more affluent suburban surroundings—canceled the need for a rhetoric and politics of social salvation. For him literature was fundamentally the vehicle of a personal battle against stifling social forces, and only incidentally a weapon in the class war.

From the outset Farrell's novels reflect the progress of his own struggle for survival. The central characters in the three major series of novels—Studs Lonigan, Danny O'Neill and Bernard Carr—comprise a semi-autobiographical record of Farrell's successive efforts to transcend his surroundings. Studs tries to forge an ideology of self-interest, but lacks sufficient understanding and will to overcome the social forces which finally destroy him. Like Farrell, Danny O'Neill avoids the fate of Studs by transforming the material of the slums into fiction. And Bernard represents the later Farrell, the successful New York writer who has largely recovered from the anger, frustration and rage which plagued Danny O'Neill in his parallel literary achievement.

If the movement from Studs to Bernard traces the pattern of Farrell's public success, it also suggests the primary basis of his decline as a novelist. Farrell's personal need to achieve “the American way of life” provided the substance and energy of his early work, enabling him to overcome drastic limitations as a novelist—simplistic patterns of thought, a somewhat barren imagination and a careless approach to form and style. Although his theoretical formulations of naturalism, individualism and Marxism could never bear intensive scrutiny, they did not paralyze his early fiction which embodied the felt tensions between individuals and their environment. The Studs trilogy survives primarily because Farrell can set his major characters in motion against the palpable social context which defines, limits, and frustrates them. Attempting to forge ideologies of individual survival within and against the dense (though frequently tedious and repetitious) social world of the novels, Farrell's best characters come to life.

The later fictions, however, do not survive their creator's personal success. Even critics who admire the idea of Bernard Carr find him unconvincing. Edgar Branch observes that the world Carr “moves in lacks the solidity . . . of that other rejected world in Studs Lonigan, and Bernard himself insufficiently represents the positive ideal made real.” But Branch fails to relate the patterns of Farrell's success and failure to the outer and inner worlds of his later fiction. Farrell cannot embody the “positive ideal” of free and self-sufficient characters because he remains essentially a prisoner of his original individualistic ideology. As the early obstacles to success faded into his memory, the strategies of individual survival appropriate to the ceaseless battle against the visible forces of the city began to lose their dynamic power. By the mid-fifties, Farrell's anger at social injustice had mellowed “into a stoical feeling,” and he had come to “see that pain and agony are part of the way it is in life.”

But if literary success permanently convinced him of the self-sufficiency of individuals, it did not prepare him for the bitter loneliness and isolation which plague the atomized man. Farrell's questionable philosophic vision numbed him to the more subtle pressures of middle-class life, and to the possibilities of fiction as well. His rise from the Chicago South Side dissolved the tensions between character and context which energized his best work, and he lacked the imagination to construct a symbolic universe for his liberated heroes. Although Farrell has continued his aggressive and lonely battle against external realities, the definable enemies of poverty, violence and ignorance have melted into a series of imprecise abstractions—"life," "death," "entropy," "time." And the social settings have become merely the background for a cast of mechanical characters who must bear full responsibility for their achievements and failures.

Farrell's most recent novel, New Year's Eve/1929, sadly displays all of his limitations and few of his previous strengths. It is a mercifully brief account of the last days of Beatrice Burns, a trivial and wholly self-centered nurse suffering from incurable lung cancer. Alternately confronting and evading her extreme situation, Beatrice attempts to invest the last moments of her empty life with meaning. She begins her narrative in bed: "Was anything important?" she asks. And after 140 meandering pages she returns to her bed—still lonely, afraid and unenlightened—to offer a final pronouncement: she "opened her eyes, and looked at the bare, whitish-grayish ceiling. That, she told herself, was her life."

The primary action of the novel is a New Year's Eve party which mildly stirs and then predictably explodes her hopes for momentary happiness. From the opening scenes, however, Bea vaguely comprehends the futility of her gesture: "She pretended that there was no loneliness, no sadness in life, and she always tried to be gay and never sentimental, but it was all a game she played, an act she put on." Beatrice pathetically seeks attention, but is systematically rejected or ignored (except when knocked out by an aimless punch thrown by Sven Swanson, the inebriated Swede). Only as voyeur can she forget herself. She wanders about the party, savoring the dull dance of atoms, watching couples split up only to seek new partners. And she lives vicariously off the "tidbits" of trivial gossip which make her momentarily visible—and annoying—to those whom she threatens to expose.

Farrell populates the book with a cast of patronizing stereotypes dredged up from the twenties: Mr. Schmolsky, the Jewish landlord who shelters the Bohemian characters ("Artists, culture, but every month I pay my bills"); Sven Swanson, the blond Swede who calls for "Visky," while smiling "genially but stupidly"; Pete, the lecher ("I'm not vulgar, I'm Greek"); Lily Arnstein, "that rich girl" who lures Danny O'Neill into the kitchen (or is it the bathroom?), and then refuses to "go the limit"; and even an anonymous "colored girl" who enters the room only to "move off" with one of Beatrice's potential playmates.

Farrell tries to animate this incredible collection of wooden figures in the meaningless world of "Mr. Schmolsky's Culture Center," the scene of the interminable party. All the characters are as narrow, alienated, petty and selfish as Beatrice. Hence, the novel is not only circular, ending where it begins; it never goes anywhere. There are no illuminating perspectives: like Bea's ceiling and her life, the fiction is "whitish-grayish." After exhibiting a series of mechanical manic-depressive responses to the spectacle of the party, Beatrice delivers the didactic message of the book: "Al had betrayed Joan. . . . Dan would have been unfaithful to Anna if he could have been. There was no trust and faithfulness and loyalty in love. She had been right in never marrying. She, too, would only have been betrayed." What begins as a biological tragedy gradually becomes an oblique metaphor for the "human condition": the universe is an empty void in which petty, mean creatures float meaninglessly, unable to escape their isolation and self-pity.

But the thin fiction cannot bear such heavy philosophical freight, for the closed world of the novel lacks centrifugal energy. Although set in the early depression, New Year's Eve/1929 conveys an indirect image of contemporary middle-class life. None of the characters has a history: they merely exhibit a narrow range of intrinsic (and suspiciously similar) qualities and attitudes. Having lost his perspective on the tensions between individuals and their historical context, Farrell cannot portray the social dimensions of psychic diseases. Instead of creating a parable of the human condition, then, he merely reflects the American condition in his inability to write the final act of the drama of individual "success." Ironically, his ideology of self-sufficiency makes the loss of his public identity intolerable, and Farrell emerges as a pathetic figure, forever preparing for an impossible comeback. Deprived of his vision, Farrell has ceased to be a novelist, though he remains the angry victim of forces which he can neither comprehend nor transcend.

Making Life Tougher

IDENTITY: Youth and Crisis. By Erik H. Erikson. W. W. Norton & Co. 336 pp. $6.95.

CHANDLER BROSSARD

Mr. Brossard's current work is The Spanish Scene (Viking). He is an associate professor at the State University College, Old Westbury, N.Y.

Rhetoric—or a calculated stylized nonsense—has come at us from all sides, and usually from the mouths of people we have learned to perceive as hungry types: politicians, healers in carnivals, "educators," movie propagandists, religionists, to name a few. We know that such as these are up to no good and are to be ignored. Now it is in just this connection that we do ourselves harm: we tell ourselves that rhetoric is a device peculiar only to "hustlers." And this positions us to be damaged by the equally nonsensical utterances, and politics, of "high types" and serious investigators of the human condition. We are duped by those very people we have all along been assuming shared our own need for illumination and meaning. This can, of course, precipitate despair.

The rhetoric employed by many psychologists and sociologists these days is very rich, and that which characterizes Erikson and his followers is indeed among the richest and most effectively delusory. A dimension or two needs to be added to the definition of rhetoric. For rhetoric represents not only a language style but a life style and a political commitment as well; that is, as it relates to one's power relationship with other humans. Erikson's work, in this volume, must be viewed in terms of its contemporary relevance rather than in the confines of clinical psychology (though that would be worth while too, since rhetoric must be a dubious clinical tool with which to cure the sick). Otherwise, it is outside our interests as ordinary human beings.

Erikson's work has influenced a great many other "serious" investigators who have then "understood" and manipulated human experience and data by means of it. In other words, they have been guilty of making life a lot tougher. Let me first quote a series of his statements:

"One may note with satisfaction (!) that the conceptualization of identity has led to a series of valid investigations which, if they do not make clearer what identity is, nevertheless have provided useful data in social psychology."

"I spoke of a loss of 'ego identity' . . . we have recognized the same central disturbance in severely conflicted young people whose sense of confusion is due . . . to a war within themselves, and in confused rebels and destructive delinquents who war on their society."

"We have learned to ascribe a normative 'identity crisis' to the age of adolescence and young adulthood."

"... I would call a sense of identity . . . a subjective sense of an invigorating sameness and continuity."

The above selections are self-validating statements which defy and discourage any cognitive response. "Invigorating sameness and continuity . . ." is bad poetry and patently illogical. Sameness and continuity have never, in my existential experience, been invigorating. But I do not wish to niggle. What is more important than his bad logic, and Olympian disengagement from human reality, is his apparent unawareness of the profound difference between, and mortal conflict of, Identity and Being. And this reveals the totality of what I feel is his conservatism. That is, he regards as basic that which is superimposed, and the rejection or lack of this as, ipso facto, a sign of sickness. (This is equivalent, and I am not being funny, to Secretary Rusk saying that the peace demonstrators are injuring our organic political body and ought to be either straightened out or punished.) Further, it indicates Erikson's crucial flaw as a seriously engaged observer: he has no grasp of (or sympathy for) the political-power matrix of contemporary life. He seems to be looking at our society from a secluded upper-middle-class 19th-century country home. My thesis (and response to Erikson) is this: Identities are political superego forms placed upon a person in order for him not to experience his unique and nonmanipulative Being. Insofar as you have "successful identity," and survive the "identity crisis" (Erikson's most popular concept re today's youth), you have abandoned your self and become something else. This is the essence of To Be Or Not To Be, and what the social revolutions all over the world are about.

Erikson's peculiar naïveté (not really; it is the essence of his strategy, as I hope to show later) moves on. He is able, for example, to say this: "The responsible Negro writers continue to write and write strongly, for fiction even in acknowledging the depth of nothingness can contribute something akin to a collective recovery." This single statement is paradigmatic of the total Eriksonian way, or rhetoric, and can rewardingly engage our scrutiny. "Responsible" is a key word-view. In his middle-class Umwelt it can only mean "nice." He clearly suggests that there are some irresponsible Negro writers who cannot be taken into serious account, either as artists or members of an acceptable community. What I would like to know is, who are they? What is the nature of their irresponsibility? Are they artists and not middle-class puppet propagandists? Would Céline or Miller or Joyce be considered responsible? He sounds like the white principal of a disorderly Harlem high school recruiting fink hall monitors. More. Does he really think that any kind of fiction—good, bad, responsible, irresponsible—is going to "contribute to (the Negro's) collective recovery"? Have the novels of Baldwin and Ellison and Richard Wright made the slightest dent (assuming, absurdly, that the Negro in the street has read them) in the average desperate Negro's life on the tenant farm and in the ghetto? Has it made him "recover" himself, whoever he may be? This borders on the preposterous and, as I have said, reveals an awesome lack of contact with the very reality that Erikson is presuming to generalize about.

"Youth" is something that engages Erikson (rhetorically, of course), and it is in that invented country of psychosocial academic ritual that he is a figure of prominence: that is, he is an expert. It is interesting to note the projective revelations of his style and tone: "Whereas twenty years ago we gingerly suggested that some young people might be suffering from a more or less unconscious identity conflict, a certain type today tells us in no uncertain terms, and with the dramatic outer display of what we once considered to be inner secrets [italics mine]; that, yes, indeed, they have an identity conflict—and they wear it on their sleeves, Edwardian or leather. Sexual identity confusion? Yes, indeed: sometimes when we see them walking down the street, it is impossible for us to tell, without indelicate scrutiny, who is a boy and who is a girl. Negative identity? Oh, yes; they seem to want to be everything which 'society' tells them not to be: in this, at least, they 'conform.'"

I do not know any young person (who has not been scared out of his intelligence and his right to react negatively to authoritarian figures such as Erikson) to whom this would not clearly be a hostile, contemptuous and irrelevant response to them and their personalized way of exploring themselves and their possible Being. Such "views," ritualized, rhetoricized, and proprietary, have degraded them for generations, in families, in schools, in institutions which decided whether they should be "included" and rewarded. It would be silly, therefore, to expect such authorities to even vaguely understand the contempt, and sometimes hatred, the young have for them (unfortunately too often expressed only in secret and among themselves in futile disenchantment).

One searches in vain throughout this book for any authentic relevance to the

NEW DIRECTIONS

BOOKS

Marvin Cohen

THE SELF-DEVOTED FRIEND. Narrative episodes. "For the high purposes of verbal comedy and linguistic entertainment . . ."

— London Times. $5

Gustave Flaubert

DICTIONARY OF ACCEPTED IDEAS. Revised edition translated by Jacques Barzun.

Paper, $1.45

New Directions 20

An anthology of new writing. "... the standard is universally high."—Publishers' Weekly. $5; Paper $1.95

Ezra Pound

GUIDE TO KULCHUR. A challenging, iconoclastic exploration of history and the bases of taste.

Paper, $2.35

Andrew Sinclair

ADVENTURES IN THE SKIN TRADE. A play based on the bizarre, comic novel by Dylan Thomas.

$4.50

Enid Starkie

ARTHUR RIMBAUD. The definitive and "superb biography . . ."

— Publishers' Weekly. Paper, $3.25

Martin Turnell

THE ART OF FRENCH FICTION. A comprehensive study of Prévost, Stendhal, Zola, Maupassant, Proust, Gide, and Mauriac.

$8.50; Paper, $2.95

John Willett

THE THEATRE OF BERTOLT BRECHT. Revised, critical study of the great German playwright.

Paper, $3.50

Send for Complete Catalog

NEW DIRECTIONS
333 6th Ave.,
N.Y. 10014

actuality of our time, for any views or concepts that understand or take into consideration such humanity molding features as loneliness, power, class struggle, boredom, credibility, conscience, good or bad faith (in Sartre's sense), the emergence of style to replace sensibility (a critical gesture of defeat among the mass population). Where is his acknowledgment of Fromm, Sullivan, Schachtel, Buher, Friedenberg, Camus, Marcuse, Laing? Where is his awareness of the new languages of intergroup communication? His strategy, or perhaps his anxious professionalism, deny these men and realities their validity and existence. But surely, without an awareness and an assimilation of their significance, no explorer into the world around and in us can be understood as having passionate substance, no matter how hallowed his image in the academy. He can only be regarded as a rhetorician. And the function of rhetoric is based upon the necessity for disengaging the audience from its simple street-corner intelligence so that it does not question a position of presumed a priori superiority—the very essence of ■ power structure.

Erikson's status quo-ism, and his operational co-optism, are stunningly expressed in this paragraph: "The possibility of a true polarization of the new specialized-technological identity and the universalist-humanist one must be allowed for the simple reason that such a polarization is the mark of the over-all identity of any period. A new generation growing up with and in technological and scientific progress as a matter of course will be prepared by the daily confrontation with radically new practical possibilities to entertain radically new modes of thought."

Technological and scientific progress, by their very nature, eliminate any kind of true polarization and any true dialogue. Just read the newspapers, daily, if proof is needed.

For Middle-Class Candidates

TOWARD A DEMOCRATIC LEFT: A Radical Program for a New Majority. By Michael Harrington. The Macmillan Co. 314 pp. $5.95.

TOM CHRISTOFFEL

Mr. Christoffel is a lawyer who has served on the staffs of a Democratic Governor and a Democratic Attorney General in Wisconsin, and is currently a researcher at the Institute of Politics at Harvard. He is an associate editor of Radical America, and has worked as an SDS regional traveler in New England.

Michael Harrington's new book paints a telling picture of the "dynamics of misery" in American society and then issues a call to action: "America needs a majority party of the democratic Left." His call is not directed at today's energetic student radicals, who are anxious—and available—to change America. He is concerned, instead, with expanding the consciousness of a "new class" and with providing a minor manifesto for Left-liberals. As a catalogue of social ills the book should make interesting reading for the Candidates of the middle class. But as a program for action it is irrelevant to political reality.

Harrington's ultimate vision is of a Socialist reorganization of American society. But, as he explains at the outset, "the horizon of this book is set roughly twenty years in the distance and it is not, alas, realistic to expect that the American people will decide to transform capitalism during that period." Toward a Democratic Left presents a "transitional" program "which socialists and radicals can—and must—support but which appeals to the more traditional aspirations for reform as well."

Harrington assumes that the existing political system is open to significant reform, that "even in a society based on private economic power, the Government can be an agency of social, rather than corporate, purpose—if a vast popular mobilization forces it to do so." It is only with such a perspective that he can believe that a New Majority will be able to "build new institutions of democratic planning which can make the uneconomic, commercially wasteful and humane decisions about education and urban living this society so desperately needs."

Harrington's assumptions are a variation on the standard liberal view of the capitalist state: The American system is essentially good, but it is frustrated politically in realizing its promise by the strategically placed power of a conservative coalition in Congress. The liberal's role is to overpower the conservative coalition and guide the system toward a democratic fulfillment of its potential.

Harrington argues that the forces of humanitarian progress must work together to transform the system. This is to be done by overcoming the same forces which block reform: the conservative coalition (which Harrington calls the Dixiecrat-Republican coalition). For "as long as major party politics, with all their lack of principle, offer the best point of departure for basic change, that is where one must work." Thus, the main programmatic thrust of Harrington's argument is that "the best strategy for the democratic Left is to seek to win the Democratic Party in such a way as to exclude its Right wing permanently."

Harrington, in effect, is seeking to improve upon the Roosevelt New Deal coalition by both strengthening and liberalizing it. His New Majority is to include progressive Southerners, newly independent blacks, the middle class (or new class), labor and—of course—liberal intellectuals. This new alliance, however, is really not a new alliance at all. It is in effect the Roosevelt coalition—minus the city machines, plus the middle-class sons and daughters of the New Deal.

And it is offered at a time when this old coalition—as Joseph Kraft, Walter Lippmann, Daniel Patrick Moynihan and others understand—is falling apart before our very eyes. The trade unions and city machines are in decline, the blacks are increasingly wary of alliances and increasingly unpopular, the Southerners are beginning to realize that only an accident of history bound them to the Democratic Party in the first place, and the liberal intellectuals never have been even a minor voting bloc. Harrington himself admits that "practically every one of these groups is quarreling with Turns the wackiest state in the union inside out... blueprints the players and possibilities in the 1968 campaign-

DANCING BEAR

An Inside Look at California Politics
by Gladwin Hill

Discloses the existence of the "Capricious Million" who decide California elections. Explains how Ronald Reagan was actually elected by Democrats. Exposes the phoniness of the state's party conventions. Reveals unexplained aspects of Nixon's career that may rise up to haunt him in his Presidential quest.

$6.50 at all bookstores

WORLD PUBLISHING
TIMES MIRROR

every other as the Sixties come to an end." He insists that "they will either come together or else America has no hope." But in order to reassemble these fracturing elements, Harrington would have to offer them a new basis for coalition. And this he does not do.

His program is marred by an even more fatal flaw, for even if the Roosevelt coalition could be reassembled in a new, improved version, it would make little difference. All that such a New Majority could do would be to elect a liberal Democratic President. This, it should be remembered, is all the Roosevelt coalition has been able to do since 1938. FDR, HST, JFK and LBJ, once elected, was each continually frustrated by the blocking power of the House of Representatives. Reform programs could only get through in token form.

What Harrington really needs is not a Presidential New Majority but an assembly of little new majorities: a majority in each of a majority of Congressional districts. His book fails to deal with this reality of Congressional politics.

The Kerner commission told us that the nation is moving toward two societies—separate and unequal. Congressional politics is similarly polarized. Forming one pole are the suburbs—the largest and fastest-growing centers in the country. Here one finds, side by side, upper-class wealth, snugly mortgaged middle-class sons and daughters of the New Deal, and slightly affluent skilled trade union members—in a mixture that is 96 per cent white. Here, also, is a solid tax base and a strong disinclination to use it to "reward rioters." The suburbs tend to be politically heterogeneous—they've been called a "political mixed salad"—but by and large they elect Congressmen who show up in political science studies as anti-metro, anti-larger-federal-role, and—on the central issue of spending money in the ghetto—as simply conservative.

Scattered like tightly packed islands within this suburban sea are the main liberal-electing constituencies. The poor white and black ghetto areas of our central cities, because of their density and socio-economic homogeneity, usually provide lopsided electoral victories for their reform Representatives and thereby waste votes that the reform coalition badly needs.

This demographic polarization, and the racism that intensifies it, are the major factors underlying the crumbling of the old Roosevelt coalition. They are similarly the major factors undercutting Harrington's hope for a transformed Democratic Party.

Thus Harrington naively assumes that the machinery of the exploitative system which he opposes is politically neutral. "One of the most important paradoxes of the time," according to Harrington, is "that bureaucracy is itself a weapon to be used against bureaucracy."

He might have argued, in the manner of the traditional Left, that the government apparatus can become a positive force after the political system itself is changed. Or, with the New Left, he could have argued that no fundamental change is immediately in sight, so we must look for ways of getting around the federal roadblock as we fight it (using what power the Left does have on a grass-roots level). But by trying to use the existing system against itself, Harrington becomes tangled in the political marshmallow of the system he opposes. Liberal programs are easily lost within this complexity of bureaucracy and politics. The intricate system of political trade-offs—among President and Congress, Democrats and Republicans, liberals and conservatives, and among individual members—institutionalizes the status quo. And when liberal legislation is passed, its enforcement can often be effectively blocked. If Harrington really wants to build a creative, leftist alliance of influential proportions (and he does), then he has to develop an alliance that directly challenges and eventually undermines the existing American state. This he does not propose to do.

Harrington presents a scenario, a "dark vision" of a future in which "trade-unionists, Negroes and the poor will struggle against one another for scarce resources, such as housing, jobs and adequate education The social fabric of the nation will, of course, be torn to shreds." He proposes to avoid this "social horror story" with his strategy of the democratic Left. He doesn't pull it off, probably because he is too optimistic about the short-run future.

In fact, this "dark vision" is a likely possibility in the next two decades, although one often exaggerated by those prone to apocalyptic visions. The real question is: Can this coming period be used to weld together a truly new coalition for truly radical change?

Harrington, however, looks at the future with a short-term, uncreative perspective, and he therefore ends up offering virtually nothing new on the programmatic level. Since he provides no basis for assembling a New Majority coalition, he is left with only a skeleton—the old politics.

Harrington devotes a major section of his book to an exposition of how easy it would be—in a technical sense—to solve the nation's problems. He talks of "the immediate possibilities of a Freedom Budget, tax reform and the progressive use of Government contracts." It is all as politically practical (in terms of positive accomplishments) as the Full Employment Bill of 1945. Moreover, it is dangerous. For the effect of such discussion is to mislead those seriously concerned with the evils of our system into believing that slow reform and transformation along social-democratic lines is a real and practical alternative. It misleads them into a fruitless shadowboxing that leaves untouched the very evils Harrington has outlined.

Book Marks

HOWARD N. MEYER

Mr. Meyer is the author of Colonel of the Black Regiment (W. W. Norton).

EYEWITNESS: THE NEGRO IN AMERICAN HISTORY: By William Loren Katz. Pitman Publishers. Illustrated. 554 pp. $9.75.

Mr. Katz began teaching secondary school history in 1952 and soon felt obliged to remedy omissions and distortions pertaining to the Negro in America in the textbooks he used in his New York
(Continued on page 739)

An invitation to subscribe to the liveliest "sleeper" in the literary world

It's called THE CHICAGO JEWISH FORUM, but don't let the name throw you. You don't have to be Jewish or live in Chicago to enjoy the stimulation of its penetrating articles on minority problems or the poetry and fiction by leading authors, and the discerning book reviews.

The Forum is a quarterly which will serve as a grace note to your reading of the weekly Nation and the monthly Atlantic, Harper's or Commentary.

You can find The Forum in the library of almost any important university, but you can receive your personal copies for only $5.00 a year.

THE CHICAGO JEWISH FORUM

173 West Madison Street
Chicago, Illinois 60602

Our 25th year of publication

Poetry of the Anti-War

BLACK MOUNTAIN, LOS ALTOS

*Clumps of ghostly buckeye bleached bones
weirdly gray in the run-off between ridges, the flats in fog. Five deer grazing on a far hill. The soft cluck of mourning doves, creeks running. I feel furry as sage here after an hour's walk in the clear midmorning air.*

Only

*three species of tree in all these hills: blue oak,
the buckeyes, and patches of leafy, fragrant laurel.
In the old quiet the Indians could have heard bells at Mission Santa Clara where the brown-cowled padres taught the Sorrowful Mysteries with a whip . . .
They manufacture napalm
in the fog where Redwood
City sprawls into the bay.
I think of the village of Ben Hoa, the early spring death in the buckeyes and up the long valley
my eyes flash like another knife, clean as malice.*

ROBERT HASS

SIX O'CLOCK NEWS

*For the Southeast Asian spot the deer takes a trench and twists across the screen.
The tank thunders yet offstage.
The view, to avoid allegory, is mostly posterior, but my son,
a craftless three, joys at such goings-on and recites a favored nursery word.
For two years now he has named the animals, has watched the creatures come and go through the endless garden of his mind. He has been spared, thus far, of knowing tanks, the aim of that phallic snout. But I wonder if, as a late poet somewhat said, the tanks will not chase him out of grace and the meadows from his mind.*

JOHN OSTLING

A BODY BECOMES A FURROW: VIETNAM

up the hill they haul the whole side of the first building: a canteen already wired for cold drink machines & the smooth flush of the foreign cereals one is forced to consume highly seasoned. the small fields almost upright on the hills shed the rain, sometimes seize shallow pools where a body becomes a furrow & the grain in the belly blossoms through the clothes, blows stems thin as eyelashes over the sightless pools

DENNIS SCHMITZ

LA RUE SANS JOIE

(To the memory of Bernard B. Fall)

*Tired from the sounds
His own voice made
He turned at a corner.*

*His footsteps ceased.
He heard himself
Breathing the twilight.*

*What was the matter
With the gold air?
It caught in his throat.*

*He said to himself:
I am a garden
Harrowed for war.*

*The houses were walls;
The paving-stones
Were a barren ground.*

*Fluttering commenced.
Wings sifting down.
Leaflets. His breath.*

*Under his weight
The stones flowered
And the light branched;*

*The soldiers sprang
From the red earth
Into an escort.*

ROBLEY WILSON, JR.

AFTER THE MARCH TO THE PENTAGON, OCTOBER 1, 1966

1

The evening shadow slides up the wall.

*A long time ago
my mother throws a dead parrot into the furnace and chases fish around the bathroom with ■ toothbrush.*

Raindrops still hang on the window like broken insects.

2

My body is a darkening vessel filled with black blood

cries of an icy hand travelling down schoolhouse corridors.

3

*Everywhere, women standing like islands
pulling the black veins from their bodies their husbands' heads the size of an assembly plant hover above them, like tame predatory birds.*

4

*Even the inmates know—
the tidal wave is inevitable.*

*Crowds from as far as Bakersfield gather on the beaches
as a giant teen-age girl in a half-ton bikini walks into the water, with sailors and submarines
under her arms.*

GABOR KOVACSI

THE POWER TO MAKE WAR

*Built to swing like arbors in the wind,
Multicolored, iridescent as summer wings,
The feeding cones hang, but no birds come.
Here and elsewhere death stalks the hills,
Birds and men move furtively, without sound;
Sharp eyes probe each leaf and twig's turning,
For movement, antithesis of death, brings death.*

*Growing up in ■ village soaked in blood
By the wanton murder of ninety-six Men, women, and children,
I early learned not to dig the mound
On which we lay to play our games;
A friend, turning soil with his bare hands,
Unearthed bone fragments scalloped by worms.*

*Here and elsewhere the power to make war
Unsettles minds; as if gun, napalm and bomb
Could restore the necessary dream.
Even as nature recoils
From the nightmare of their acts,
Mesmerized men, counseled by their kind,
Automate death, and shattered bodies bleed.*

PAUL HICKS

THE WAR: MARKING TIME

*It's early March, almost another season.
Wild birds blow from bough to bough inside your human head.*

*The sun no longer sours in the belly of ■ bear.
There's even, almost, a clean bite to the air.*

We who pretend to survive ourselves and more must now discount the living from the dead as the last snows clear.

STANLEY PLUMLY

BOOK MARKS

(Continued from page 737)

classrooms. Unlike the nearsighted who generously offer "Negro History" to curricula for black children only ("give them a usable past, by all means"), he recognized that we had inherited an educational establishment geared to perpetuate racism among whites as well as to inculcate inferiority among blacks, an effect he describes as "grim cruelty." For the sake of insuring the credibility of what was not mentioned in, or contradicted by, the texts, he sought supplementary material and especially eyewitness accounts of episodes or events of interest, to furnish to his own students.

Over the years he gathered enough data for the development of a full-length treatment of the history of the Negro in America. This he has done by dividing the original or eyewitness materials into nineteen groups and prefacing each with a narrative that is self-contained as well as introductory to the documents and excerpts. The copious illustrations are attractive and instructive. The "Chapters" correspond with the "units" of a social studies curriculum (obviously no coincidence, for the publisher must be aiming at the school as well as the trade market). But we are a nation, for the most part, of culturally deprived ex-students; many whites are infected with varying degrees of racism and many blacks with alienation due to belief in a myth-ridden past and a lack of the sense of community that comes with a shared heritage. To say that adults should read books like Eyewitness is easy: unfortunately, the greater the need, the less likely to read.

THE NEGRO AMERICAN: A Documentary History. By Leslie H. Fishel, Jr., and Benjamin Quarles. William Morrow & Co. Illustrated. 536 pp. $6.95.

The purpose of the authors has been to gather, select and present documents, preferably those not readily available elsewhere, that will illustrate the role of the Negro in American history and inform as to the Negro's own history in America. The documents offered range much more broadly than mere first-hand or factual accounts: there is a good deal of interpretive and illustrative material as well, such as legal documents, contemporary racial and political polemics and excerpts from earlier essayists, advocates, chroniclers and historians. One deficiency Fishel and Quarles share with Katz—not really to be explained by delay between date of completion and publication—is the omission of the outstanding characteristic of the Johnson-Humphrey era: the “Tragic Gap” (as the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc., called it as long ago as its Spring, 1966, convocation) between civil rights law and its enforcement. The concept of “tokenism” is not mentioned in this work and appears in Katz only indirectly in a speech by Malcolm X. The discontent of the white know-nothing with new legislation, and the dissatisfaction of the oppressed with the insignificant changes in their plight produce a consensus of displeasure that dominates our day. There is nothing in the final twelfth of the Fishel/Quarles work—“The Last Mile to Freedom”—which reveals the existence of the gap, much less illumines the reason for it.

IN THEIR OWN WORDS: A History of the American Negro. Vol. I, 1619-1865. 195 pp. Vol. II, 1865-1916. 180

pp. Vol. III, 1916-1966. 212 pp. By Milton Meltzer. Thomas Y. Crowell. $4.95 each.

Although they are listed for the so-called juvenile market, there is nothing that should deter any interested adult from reading or consulting any of the three volumes. The only feature that distinguishes them from the average “adult” book is the size of the type face and the generous leading. Volume I offers David Walker's Appeal and Nat Turner's Confessions (the genuine article); and Volume II presents such atrocities as the cold-blooded murder of Charles Caldwell, while Volume III concludes with an interview with Fannie Lou Hamer, indicating no inhibitions on the author's part about “telling it like it is.” The maturity of the content of the documents is matched by the candor and lack of condescension in the individual introductory paragraphs written for each excerpt. Insight and information are offered that cannot fail to be of interest to readers seeking to make a beginning of the inquiry so crucial to our epoch: “Who are we Americans and how did we get that way?”—the question posed by Lerone Bennett at a Negro History Week breakfast in New York in 1965. Meltzer weaves a narrative that informs as it entertains. The result is as impressive as Martin Duberman's In White America (a documentary drama) but more rewarding because so much more ground is covered. Each of the first two volumes deals with substantially the same periods as the two volumes of Herbert Aptheker's monumental A Documentary History of the Negro People in the United States (first published in 1951 and recently reissued in paperback) to which they seem somewhat indebted. The Aptheker work remains essential for any serious student of American history. Meltzer's third volume, contrary to its title, terminates in 1964, and actually does not contain much about events in the sixties; it could nevertheless make invaluable reading for both a white parent and teen-age child in offering the former information about the times in which he grew up that was never covered honestly by the media, and the latter some questions to ask his social studies teacher about what is missing from the textbooks.

THE BURDEN OF RACE. By Gilbert Osofsky. Harper & Row. 654 pp. $7.95.

Subtitled “A Documentary History of Negro-White Relations in America.” Professor Osofsky's compilation is modestly described in its preface as offering his “personal and selective vision” of significant ideas that explain “America's racial past.” But every selection of documents—as indeed every history—is personal and selective. As recently as 1966, Daniel Boorstin published a 1,000-page, two-volume U.S. documentary history, elaborately annotated, without a single word from Frederick Douglass or any other Negro historical figure: not DuBois, not Martin Luther King, not Booker T. Washington. Osofsky's anthology is strongest where some of the other documentary compilations are weak, in the long “dark age” of the post-Reconstruction period, and in the modern urban era with which literature he became particularly familiar in compiling his history of Harlem. His understanding of the ghetto prompts him to present Garvey and Garveyism more compassionately than have others. He gives appropriate significance (as do none of the other works under review, although Meltzer gives the facts) to the Scottsboro cases. Those trials and appeals represent a significant watershed in the nation's, as well as the Supreme Court's turn from nullification of the Fourteenth Amendment's promise of equality and justice. While properly critical of the twists, the turns and the opportunism of the Communist Party's position, Osofsky is unique among non-Communist historians in observing with fairness and candor:

The Party's call for full racial equality and its attempts to devise methods of achieving it were rare in the history of American radicalism . . . Party workers in the South refused to acquiesce to Southern codes of racial etiquette when they worked with sharecroppers or the unemployed, and many paid the consequences of such heresy.

BLACK PROTEST: History, Documents, Analyses. 1619 To The Present. By Joanne Grant. Fawcett World Library. 512 pp. Paper 95c.

The inclusion in the title of the phrase “1619 to the present” may not have been Miss Grant's responsibility; but there is a disappointing lack of balance particularly in the incompleteness of the five sections that cover the pre-1955 period. Almost half of the material dates from the coming into being of SNCC, and as documentation of a decade of militancy, its dividends, its disillusionment and the beginnings of separatism—that is to say, the neo-separatism of our day—the book is an obvious bargain. There is a popular need for a documentation of the history of protest, as such, and this is an adequate treatment of the modern period, with one major exception: the continuing protest against racism in educational materials, racism in the media, both published and electronic, is not reflected here.

The Best Way
To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 6-3-68

333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 1 Months, $

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Pan-America; $2 foreign)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

PEACE IN VIETNAM--JUSTICE IN AMERICA

300 LOS ANGELES SOCIAL WORKERS SUPPORT AN ALTERNATIVE TO DESTRUCTION AND POVERTY

The United States is currently spending 30 billion dollars a year (3½ million dollars an hour, 24 hours a day) of the nation's wealth on an effort which is morally unjustifiable, politically inexpedient, and economically unsound.

We submit that the war in Vietnam could conceivably involve the total destruction of the Vietnamese people and their land. (We see no other alternative because the goals of our policy are nebulous and morally bankrupt.)

We ask that our country's human resources and technology take up the task of meaningfully eliminating poverty at home.

We, social workers, want to see our national efforts re-directed toward a final solution of economic and social problems.

One of the hardest facts to convey to the American people is that the gulf between poor Americans and those who are "making it" is increasing, not lessening. The effects of this desperation of 25% of our total population are beginning to be felt throughout the land. It is the duty of those who govern in our name to do what Americans have built a reputation for doing—turn a great liability into an opportunity.

We propose the following:

1. That the United States immediately initiate withdrawal of its military men, supplies and equipment from Southeast Asia, including (but not limited to) the countries of Vietnam, Thailand, and Laos.
2. That a symposium be convened in Washington, D.C., to plan the strategies for eradicating poverty in this country. This symposium should include, at full salary, anyone with constructive suggestions on how the job might be done.
3. That the 30 billion dollars budgeted annually for the war be reassigned toward implementing the programs formulated in the aforementioned manner.

As social workers, it is crucial that we pledge our minds and energies to help rebuild our society. A few small men with large egos and a great mass of apathetic Americans have permitted the evolvement of an increasingly alienated society.

We must change this direction and channel our energies into a system which considers its most fundamental obligations to be the eradication of poverty and the provision of a chance for all men to live in peace.

Sandra Aaron
Bill Abbot
Roger C. Anderson
Jeri Archuleta
Judith A. Atkinson
Diane Azar

Jacqueline M. Bacharach
Elisabeta Baker
H. Pat Banks
Susan Beale
Dorothy R. Bell
T. O. Bell
Judith Benjamin
Martin Benson
Carolyn Berger
Ed Berlin
Arnold M. Berman
Eileen Berman
Bill Beverly
Joan Bikoff
Laura Black
Jacqueline Blazer
Nat Bliss
Lidice Block
Joseph A. Bonelli
Myra Bornstein
Nick Barabe
Jewel Brandt
Patricia Breen
Thomas Brook
Dennis F. Brooks
Emily Brown
Janie Brown
Judith Ann Bruner

Elizabeth Camprazano
Ray Carpenter
Frank A. Cellucci
Robert O. Chapel
Brenda Chappell
Mildred Chorus
Harlow Church
James M. Cirocco
Dana Ann Clark
Foy G. Clark
Myrna Clendenon
Judson H. Cole
Donna L. Conley
Jan R. Cooper
Joan C. Coyner
Edward E. Crider
David Crippen

Gerald Cuba
James G. Dashiell, Jr.
Edward Davis
Gerald Davis
Jane A. Dennis
Susan Deyl
Vincent J. Deyl
Sue D'Lssel
Mal Dobbs
Margaret Gordon Doyle
Ellen A. Dunbar
Thomas M. S. Dunphy

Tracy Eason
Jack Eisenberg
Lawrence R. Emme
Barbara Enloe
Teena Ente
Ruth Erb
Carolyn Facey
Paul Feinzimer
Keith S. Felton
Irwin Finkelstein
Dan A. Fleming
Valerie L. Fong
Dorothy Frank
Betty Freeman
Kenneth B. Fry

Sheryl R. Gaines
George Gaman
Marthelma Gaman
E. Garabedian
Dorthe Gecenak
Don Gelman
Kathleen Geogheyan
Sonya Gerlach
Alice Gharib
Cristine E. Gilroy
Martin M. Goldman
Stanley E. Goldstein
Jim Gordon
Bernice Grant
Thomas Green
B. Ornega Greene
Estelle Greenberg
Norman Greenfield
Joyce Grinuk
Margi Gruber
Joan B. Guertlin

Douglas L. Hadsell
L. M. Hale
Jerry Hall
Michael Hamud
Harvey Hanemoto
Barbara Hanna
Jack B. Harmell
Sheila Hartfield
Alex Hecht
Roseann Herman
Philip Hewitt
Donald A. Hill
Marian Himelhoch
Reed Hirschhorn
Howard A. Hockenbury
Morley J. Hoffman
Sybil E. Holland
Joann B. Holley
Ben J. Hollombe
Michael P. Horenstein
Jane Horgan
Gene A. Hottell
Martha Sue Hottel
Francis P. Howley
Thomas H. Hubbard

Vance W. Irvin
Karen Jacquemetton
Myrna G. Jamieson
Bobbie Nell Jason
Dennis Johnson
Mary Lou Johnson
Mary M. Johnson
Rhea E. Johnson
Mary Jane Jones
Walter Jungmichel

Jane Kodama
Rhoda Katz
Patricia R. Kellogg
John Kelly
Peter Kettner
Theresa Killeen
Sandy Kinsella
Robert Kirkhart
Dan Kramon
Wendy Kramon
Carol Krasel
Patricia Kruger
Gigi (Gayle) Kukla
Merridy Lazare
Carol L. Lee
Clarence Lee

William E. Lewis
Robert O. Lia Braaten
Marshall Linton
Richard J. Lippman
Roxana Luzader

Jean Machel
Harry Masaki
David J. Mallen
John C. Maran
Sallee R. Marcussen
Zena E. Marks
Josephine Martin
Georgia Mattison
William U. Maxwell
Violet Mayfield
Martha McAulliffe
Sara J. McCown
Peter J. McDonald
Ellen McInlay
Robert Melvin
Mary K. Menar
Robert M. Menar
Feather Meston
Victor Miller
Nanella Mincy
Abraham Mipos
David Y. Miyashita
Charles Montgomery
Leo C. Mouton
Rosalind Myatt

Moss T. Nader
Lana Neece
Elizabeth Nelson
Harry Nelson
Joanne Nelson
Jan Newmark
Jon Nickel
Jan Nishiyama
Gary Olthoff
Jean Olthoff
Mary Lou Onalfts

J. M. Parnell II
Linda Passy
Susan D. Pearson
Valentina L. Peteoff
Stephan M. Pfaff
Elva Pierron
Patricia Pierucci
Laurie Pincus
Renee D. Pincus

Joann Piontkowski
Keith O. Piper
Sylvia M. Pizzini
Yvonne Powdrill
Naomi Preston
Buster Price

Jim Ratliff
Fred Reas
John Rees
Paula C. Resler
Ruth L. Richman
Mary Robertson
Lorraine P. Rogson
Kathleen Rosche
C. H. Rose
Robert Rose
Sharon C. Roseberry
Leonard Rosenberg
Milton Rosenberg
Leonard Rosenfield
Lee Roskin
Kathleen Ross
Virginia A. Ross
Jeff Roth
Wayne Roth
Janet Rowlan
Janet C. Ryan
Robert E. Ryan, Jr.

Frank B. Sanders
Al Saxton
Arnold P. Schildhaus
Donald E. Schluter
Alfred L. Schwalb
Raymond P. Schwartz
Judith A. Schwartzbaum
Charlotta Seaberg
Frank Shapiro
Jim Sheahan
Beth Sims
Erika Sloane
Katharine V. R. Smith
Richard H. Smith
Thom Smitham
Linda H. Snee
David L. Solin
Lucy Solin
Michael A. Solymann
Lynn E. Sorrick
Lon Spiegelman
Stewart Spivak
Barbara Stahnke
Philip St. Armand

Larry Stein
Barbara Steinberg
Patricia R. Steinberg
Ray Steinfeld
Ray A. Steinfeld
Marcia Strauss
Andrea Swerdlow
Linda Swerdlow
Paul J. Swettik

Lynn Tanenberg
Joane Taylor
Anita Terry
Janet Ter Veen
Viola B. Thompson
M. E. Thoresen
Charleen Thygeson
Irene Tso
Marc E. Turchin
Stephen Tuttle

Barbara Ushida

Susanna Vale
Edmund Valentin
Susan Vaughn
Harold P. Velasquez

Dorothy Walcer
Michael D. Walter
Michael E. Walft
Arleen Warren
Katherine Warren
Lucille G. Washington
Elizabeth Lee Wearing
Marian C. Wellman
Mary K. Welsh
Lesley Wenger
Louisa Westerland
Neta Whitty
Rochelle Williams
W. Michele Willson
Susan Winkler
Lori Winsom
Susan B. Wisotsky
Pearl M. Wolff
Philip Wood
Joan Woodson
Otella Wruck

Bonnie Yaeger
Jerome Zeldman
Bea Zubok

Michael E. Walft/Vincent J. Deyl

For further information write:
P.O. Box 9009

Los Angeles, California 90018

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) ■ "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author ■ 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! Used bargain lists. Fiction and non-fiction. Free search. Harco. ■ 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46031.

THE CONSCIENCE OF A RADICAL By Scott Nearing

A book you should read.
Have it sent postpaid for $2 clothbound or paperback at $1.

Social Science Institute
Harborside Maine 04642

FREE PAPERBACK LISTS. Write, inquire how thousands save! PAPERBACKS, HARDBOUNDS, RECORDS. Fast service. New York Book, 48 West 43rd Street, N.Y.C. 10036.

MAREN'S PINE TAVERN MENUS AND RECIPES. 350 recipes, ■ menus from the cuisine of Oregon's distinguished Pine Tavern Restaurant. $2.50. MAREN'S COOK BOOKS, P.O. Box 461, Bend, Oregon 97701.

WORLD DEMOCRACY by Bin Dir Woor, Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2 Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 7th Ave., N.Y.C. Bin Dir Woor calls again on President Johnson to make the ultimate human effort for World Peace by calling for a permanent World Congress of the elected heads of all nations to seek to prevent or arbitrate every war. Reader, call this to the President's attention.

GLOSSARY of 129 American carnival slang terms gathered by ■ veteran carnies. $1 each. R. Oliver, CMR Box 4374, APO New York 09132.

NEW MAGAZINE OF SATIRE—ACCLIVUM— Black & Subtle humor; fantastic artwork. 1 copy 50c; 1 year $3.00 or send for free information: ACCLIVUM, c/o ■ Ava Lane, Buffalo, N.Y. 14221.

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION
Independent, lively, and original.
Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

AGENTS WANTED

CHRISTMAS CARDS—Business and Personal. Customer's name imprinted. Earn unusually high commissions from this medium- and high-priced line. No investment. No inventory. Free Sample Album. Process Corp. (our 47th year), 3430 S. 54th Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60650.

WORKER WANTED—FEMALE

PERSONNEL ASSISTANT. To $7500 start. Non-profit organization. College graduate. Intelligent, literate. 212-245-8000, ext. 216. Equal opportunity employer.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c ■ line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
242-8400

FILMS / Robert Hatch

A fail-safe device long popular with the science fictionist perplexed to terminate his galactic voyage is the time warp—a concept whereby, under conditions of extreme distance or speed, sequential experience is alleged to fracture and permit simultaneous existence in discontinuous segments of chronology. Thus a voyager somewhere beyond alpha Centauri may discover that he has become his own son or his own grandfather, as the case may be. Since this phenomenon, like the related anomaly of extra-dimensional space, is not only inexplicable but incomprehensible to the linear thought processes of contemporary man, it allows the novelist to exit in a display of pyrotechnic mysticism. But it is done at the cost of raising in the reader a suspicion that the narrative carpet has been snatched from under him; the most resourceful practitioners avoid it.

I was sorry, thus, that the sole surviving argonaut of the Stanley Kubrick-Arthur C. Clarke 2001 found himself at journey's end in a Directoire motel bedroom, hobnobbing with himself at several ages, including the yet unborn. This personal redundancy was preceded by passages of considerable length in which the lights of Broadway appeared to have been reduced to a jet stream by mirrors in parallel and the substance of the color film itself seemed to melt into spirals of fuming infinity. Neither effect is unknown to experimental film makers of the past twenty years.

The ambiguity of these closing scenes is the more disappointing because at least twice in its progress this most ambitious and often most thrilling of space films promises some energy of communication. First, a segment of the picture that precedes the planetary departure from the moon introduces some sardonic comment on the transfer of middle-class sentimentality, affluent comfort and the CIA mentality to orbit. Then, once deep space itself is invaded, it becomes apparent that a conflict is brewing between the two human astronauts and the computer that operates the ship and is known as Hal.

Here the picture shows signs of shifting over from social criticism to melodrama—the natural habitat of science fiction. Hal, we are told, may have had "feelings" programed into its circuits, the better to communicate with its flesh and blood lieutenants. It soon develops that the computer, which talks in a voice suggesting a too great attachment to its mother, is motivated primarily by feelings of paranoia. Disaster, of course, follows, but the plot does not. We are left to confuse ourselves with the semantic dilemma of whether or not a sufficiently sophisticated "electronic brain" could develop an identity. Some independence of operation can be built into computers and man may thus in time condition himself to assume their autonomy, but if Hal was indeed a homicidal psychotic it was because someone back there had coded the mania into its transistor. Some promising suspects were to be seen tramping about the moon in their snappy space suits, but we shall never know—the threads are all lost in fog and the flouting of Aristotle and Euclid. I prefer that thrillers should unmask the villain.

Finally, the mock-ups of astronomy and space technology are beautiful (the great rotating wheel of the way station between earth and moon is magnificent) and the expediences of weightlessness are amusing. A great deal of skill and ingenuity went into this amazing voyage to nowhere.

As evidence that I am not hostile to temporal anomaly per se, I recommend Alain Robbe-Grillet's Trans-Europ-Express. It seems that M. Robbe-Grillet, his daughter and a friend decide to devote the time of a trip from Paris to Antwerp to concocting a story about dope smuggling from Antwerp to Paris, using as their man with the false-bottomed suitcase, Jean-Louis Trintignant, whom they have spotted as a fellow passenger. With occasional pauses for consultation, Robbe-Grillet ad-libs the tale into a tape recorder held on his daughter's knees and Trintignant obliges as best he can by carrying out the tentative and not always consistent moves of the casual plot. It quickly becomes evident that Robbe-Grillet takes a somewhat tongue-in-cheek view of the high-camp, odd-sex chase films of recent acclaim. Trintignant is endowed with a taste for ropes and chains, and soon finds the girl to wear them. He is also bedeviled by a series of signals, passwords and rendezvous so pointlessly complicated that only a lively mind bored by travel could have invented them.

Robbe-Grillet is being arrogant for our entertainment. When one of his companions objects that the beset smuggler didn't have on him the key that was stolen from him, the author says: "We'll cut that in the editing." And when there is a question as to whether Trintignant would dispose of a package, he tosses it always a half dozen times and ends with it under his arm. Trans-Europ-Express is a picture about time wasting designed to waste time attractively. And Marie-France Pisier, playing the girl who accepts pseudo-sadism as business as usual, is most attractive.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1251

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Conduct a court as it should be, for a second spell of course! (8, 7)
- 9 It includes what the princess of "My Fair Lady" should have spoken. (5)
- 10 Self-proclaimed as timely and classy, but not rehearsed. (9)
- 11 The saucy state of Mexico! (7)
- 12 The real makeup of one Carolinian? (9)
- 13 What one does to fish for movie wrongdoing? (5, 2)
- 14 There's no landing in the middle of this flight. (7)
- 16 What one does at first with curtain calls? (5, 2)
- 19 Normal and fit, as the lesson shows. (7)
- 21 Medicine from the islands? (7)
- 23 What gives light support? (Naturally, it doesn't bend much!) (7)
- 24 Perhaps the range of 7, with Cain in trouble therein. (9)
- 25 Find out how to be skinny right inside (5)
- 26 Gay production originally—this after the German version. (5-5, 5)

DOWN:

- 1 Agent that makes the adder madder? (15)
- 2 Indian vegetables from the sea? (9)
- 3 Approaches the expenses of lighting, but not direct expenses. (7)

- 4 Thurber set one in the garden. (7)
- 5 Puts a lid on the supposedly healthy color sometimes going round in the navy. (7)
- 6 Scotch purse. (7)
- 7 Garden variety of fruit? (5)
- 8 Evidently one doesn't have a single illness with it. (6, 9)
- 15 Blew in with a tear shed around for nursery escapists? (9)
- 17 Its fuel is made from salt. (7)
- 18 Pirate stronghold giving up the last letter as an act of mortification. (7)
- 19 Father takes a firm position on what might be afoot. (7)
- 20 A shower of rain preceding an old treatment by Brahms and Tasso. (7)
- 22 Extra good, but dated! (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1251

ACROSS: 1 and 15 The Sound of Music; 10 Moronic; 11 Anagram; 12 Lacrosse; 13 Shift; 17 Arrowroot; 19 and 28 The Lady of the Lake; 21 Yahoo; 24 Unawares; 27 Enclasp; 29 Dodo; 30 Bridgehead.
DOWN: 1 and 23 across Time flies; 2 Earlaps; 3 Owner; 4 and 6 across Necessary evil; 5 Osage; 7 Vertigo; 8 Limitation; 9 Causeway; 14 Smithfield; 18 Refracted; 20 Evined; 22 Hoecake; 24 and 16 Upper classman; 25 Abele; 26 Bend.

EDUCATIONAL

WHO NEEDS IT? Independent study? Personal freedom? A chance to help make a new kind of college work? If you need it, write Admissions N, Franconia College, Franconia, N.H. 02330.

QUAKER STUDY CENTER—Suburban Philadelphia. Special program for study in social change, non-violence and radical living. Also year's seminar on man's search for meaning, confirmation and dialogue. Write: L. W. Lewis, Pendle Hill, Wallingford, Pa. 19086.

PERSONALS

GENTLEMAN, semi-retired, needs work few days a week. Varied background. Group work, business, etc. A-409, 3429 Bellevue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90026.

HAND-EMBROIDERED INDIAN DRESSES—of hand-woven cotton, vivid colors, indigenous designs, free catalogue. Write: ANDEAN, Box 472-A, Cuenca, Ecuador.

MANUSCRIPT IN TROUBLE? Skilled Pro editor-writer aids authors in revising Mss. for publication. Box 612, c/o The Nation.

JOIN CEC CHINA CORPS

Beginning numbered list of pioneer volunteer Americans, all ages and occupations, whom CEC will prepare to "BUILD BRIDGES TO MAINLAND CHINA" as Vice President Humphrey suggests. For information, including N.Y. Times editorials on CEC non-political programs write:

CEC CHINA CORPS CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS

Dept. N-6/3, 10 W. 46 St., NYC 10036

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: write Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 30 East 42 Street, N.Y.C. 10017.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE

(Computerized Matching—All Ages)
"Let TEAM make you a team."

Write:

TEAM Project

111 East 30th Street

New York, N.Y. 10016, Phone 859-9400

DISCOVER a fun way of meeting interesting, alert Jewish singles. For FREE analytical questionnaire write: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 511 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036

SNOOPY FOR PRESIDENT—249 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/$1, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Free catalogue to all. Free sample to stores. A Big-Little Store, 1671 Washington, San Francisco, 94—109. (415) 775-3140.

BUTTONS, PEACE JEWELRY, POSTCARDS, POSTERS, psychedelia, etc. Unusual merchandise. Good service. Wholesale to all. 10c brings exciting free catalogue air mail. FREE SPEECH, INC., 111 St. Marks Place, N.Y.C. 10003

YOU CAN BE A CITIZEN DIPLOMAT TO RUSSIA THE "GLASSBORO WAY"

3 week Study-Exchanges

LEAVE NYC: July 10, 20, 30 &

Aug. 23 or MEET CEC in Moscow

CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS

Dept. N 6/3, 10 W. 46th St., NYC 10036

or Telephone: (212) LT 1-8113

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014.

'In the Name of America'—Free to New Subscribers

WITH EACH NEW
1 YEAR SUBSCRIPTION

Commissioned and published by the Clergy and Laymen Concerned About Vietnam, IN THE NAME OF AMERICA gives a living, vivid picture of the large-scale war of aggression in Vietnam. Here is testimony by soldiers, journalists, priests and others who have been involved.

"This book is a fundamental challenge to anyone, whatever his preconceptions about the American presence in Vietnam. The challenge is whether you can read it all the way through and still have any doubt as to the complicity of us all in war crimes in that country."

Nat Hentoff

Join the good fight as a subscriber and we will send you this important book free.

The good fight
is now in
THE NATION
—Why not
join now?

Send to:

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me free, IN THE NAME OF AMERICA.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6. (Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Pan-America; $2 foreign)

Name

Street

City State Zip

N 6-3

THE NATION

JUNE 10, 1968 35 cents

BURLINGAME
JUN 11 1968
LIBRARY

A GENERATION UP IN ARMS

Berkeley on the Tiber GIANFRANCO CORSINI

SDS: Between Reform & Revolution
JAMES JACOBS

Big Bust on Morningside Heights
MARVIN HARRIS

James Baldwin's New Novel / ROBERT EMMET LONG

2-628 PL-3537
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

flyiing with Hubert

Minneapolis, Minn.

DEAR SIRs: I have just read with interest Robert G. Sherrill's article, "Hubert Humphrey: Speaking in Tongues" [The Nation, Apr. 29]. As I read along, my eyes widened in horror as I gullibly soaked up the gospel according to Sherrill.

That is, until I got to the part where Sherrill uses the 1966 Minnesota gubernatorial campaign as the backdrop for one of his Humphrey stories. A conversation Sherrill says took place between Humphrey and DFL-endorsed gubernatorial candidate A. M. Keith (defeated in the primary) was during a "hedgehopping air trip" when "Humphrey returned to his home grounds to help the Democratic-Farmer-Labor candidate." [The point of the story was Mr. Keith's surprise that Humphrey could present himself as belonging to whatever church the men speaking to him attended. Editors]

As a member of Lt. Gov. Sandy Keith's campaign staff, I know full well Hubert Humphrey never returned to his home state to actively campaign for anybody in that primary fight

Mrs. B. J. Pickett

Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIRs: I appreciate Mrs. Pickett's calling my attention to a careless error I have rechecked with my source and found that, as Mrs. Pickett correctly points out, Humphrey gave no further assistance to Keith after endorsing him at a press conference in Minneapolis on the day after the convention. The hedgehopping ride and the conversation I quoted occurred on an earlier date.

Robert G. Sherrill

justice to Chaliapin

St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR SIRs: The review "The Uses of Chaliapin" by Simon Karlinsky [The Nation, May 27] demonstrates, at least to this reader, that Professor Karlinsky can have no ear either for vocal music or for the Russian language. Those of us who have heard Chaliapin in person, and to whom Russian is a native language, found his performances to be an unforgettable, and even shattering, experience Further, Chaliapin's role in helping to intersperse the endless succession of Italian and French operas with native Russian works, often of superior quality, was an important and progressive contribution.

In a sense, Chaliapin summed up musical and artistic life in pre-revolutionary Russia, and an exciting and creative period it was. Chaliapin's character had many flaws and his political views were primitive. But it will take a man of greater insight and less prejudice than Professor Karlinsky to do justice to this superb artist.

A. V. Brushkovitch, St. Louis University

Surrealism

New York City

DEAR SIRs: Since the idea that I can enjoy particular Surrealist works, while at the same time remaining indifferent, if not hostile to Surrealism as a sensibility, seems already too complicated a thought for Mr. Kozloff to grapple with [The Nation, May 27], I hesitate to join him in urging my colleagues to even greater complexity, for fear of blowing his mind altogether.

May I also point out that the line Mr. Kozloff gives as a quotation from Michael Fried is no such thing, but only a sample of my own poor dogmatic prose? . . .

Philip Leider

EDITORIALS

The New Constituency

In Oregon, Senator McCarthy found what he has been seeking. He has been raising the right issues all along; his problem, as he puts it, has been one of "finding our constituency." He did well in Nebraska and Indiana, but one does not seek new constituencies in those states. The Nation has felt from the start that McCarthy would be very effective in Oregon and California. States with weak party organizations and a record of independent voting, they both provide fine hunting grounds for new constituencies. And Oregon and California are exceptional only in the sense that their voting pattern tends to foreshadow national trends; they are pacesetters.

The new constituency that Senator McCarthy has sought cannot be defined in a few phrases; in fact, it cannot be precisely defined at all, for the reason that it is only now beginning to emerge. As a potentiality, this constituency has existed for some time. It has been clearly reflected in polls showing a high percentage of voters who are profoundly dissatisfied with the politics of the phony consensus. By the style and content of his campaign, McCarthy is tapping this potential, drawing it forth, giving it a chance to emerge as a new force in national politics.

Most commentators, most of the time, are deluded by the notion that the "new politics" is exclusively a matter of what Ray Bliss of the Republican National Committee refers to as "the nuts and bolts" of politics: techniques, polls, image making, manipulation, television, etc. Senator McCarthy is the only candidate in this election who understands that the new politics is really concerned with new issues and new constituencies. The old-style "brokerage" politics is being superseded by a new national concern with the issues of a post-industrial society.

The new issues cut across the old alliances and coalitions. They are concerned with foreign policy, environmental hazards, national priorities and the use of power, the control and proper use of technology, educational policy, civil liberties and civil rights, human dignity, the quality of social life and, above all, with goals and purposes, with aims and values. "We are in the beginning stages," as J. K. Galbraith points out, "of the questioning of the goals of the industrial system." McCarthy understands this substantive aspect of the new politics. For example, he does not appeal to slum residents in terms of inducing industry to build a few factories in ghetto areas. By insisting that now is no time to retreat from the ideal of integration, he is making the strongest possible appeal for and on behalf of Negroes. In brief, the new constituency begins to take form as voters respond to McCarthy and the issues he is raising.

But the "old politics" is still with us; it is being challenged but it has not been displaced. It has strong organizational and institutional roots. It permeates both parties. The President and Vice President are adroit practitioners of the politics of the phony consensus; so is Richard Nixon. In both parties, the "old politics" is strong in terms of delegate count, but in terms of enthusiasm, participation, new voters, and breadth and intensity of appeal, the "new politics" could be decisive in November—that is, if a new-style politician is pitted against a practitioner of the old.

The Oregon vote demonstrates that Nixon is running an effective campaign, and he will probably be the GOP nominee. He would make his strongest race against Humphrey, who likes to point out that he and Nixon are not too far apart in their views on the war (U.S. News & World Report May 27). With Humphrey and Nixon as the nominees, voters would once again be locked into a synthetic harmony on both foreign and domestic issues (for foreign policy clearly defines the parameters of domestic programs). With Nixon as the likely Republican nominee, the Democrats should nominate McCarthy if they want to win. He can unify the party. Humphrey cannot, nor can Kennedy. McCarthy has strong independent support. He also draws substantially from liberal-moderate Republicans who cannot abide Nixon. He has broad appeal; in Oregon, for example, he did remarkably well in high- and middle-income areas. He outpolls all other candidates in campus communities. The California primary will provide an even better test than Oregon of the potency of this constituency. For as Lord Bryce pointed out many years ago, "What America is to Europe, what Western America is to Eastern, that California is to the other Western States. It has more than any other the character of a great country."

The Institution

Writing in Fortune on "The New Arithmetic of Defense," Gilbert Burck and Alan Greenspan warn that Vietnam is going to cost more than the 1969 budget projects. Only the other day the President confirmed this prediction by casually asking Congress for a supplemental defense appropriation of $3.9 billion. The press treated the request as routine—which in fact such fiscal escalations have become.

Fortune, which never fails in sang-froid, assures us that while the rise from $24 billion to $33 billion annually will compound some problems, it is really no great matter. While the increment will exacerbate inflation, increase budget deficits, and further disturb balance of payments, still it is only a small fraction of GNP; $9 billion is not chicken feed, but "actually it would impose little strain on the nation's physical resources." Of course it won't—if shooting off physical resources on a Gargantuan scale is no strain. Ground and air ordnance output alone is running at the rate of more than $5 billion a year. TNT stands for trinitrotoluene, and its ingredients are useful in other connections.

The human expenditure is also within the bounds of statistical tolerance. In two recent weeks the actual U.S. dead, as distinguished from the number reported initially (there is a time lag), were 550 and 640. From January 1, 1961, to May 23, 1968, U.S. casualties have been 23,500 killed and 143,678 wounded. Many of the wounded are permanently mutilated or crippled. These are our strong young men. Like the chemicals which go into ammunition,

IN THIS ISSUE

NOV 13

June 10, 1968

EDITORIALS

746

ARTICLES

A Generation Up in Arms:

750 Berkeley on the Tiber

Gianfranco Corsini

753 SDS: Between Reform and Revolution

James Jacobs

757 Big Bust on Morningside Heights

Marvin Harris

764 Sonar and Radar:

The Tin Ears of War

Jack Robertson

BOOKS & THE ARTS

766 Through the Lens

of Social Vision

Alan Trachtenberg

769 From Elegant to Hip

Robert Emmet Long

770 Lure of the Polar Profits

Russell W. Gibbons

771 Discrimination in Israel?

Raphael Rothstein

772 Theatre

Robert Pasolli

774 The Reason a Mountain

Never Changes (poem)

Robert Rohr

775 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GUYFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CARY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KENNEDY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 for foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 206

No. 24

better uses might be found for them. Still, it is no great strain on our human resources.

A devastating survey in The New York Times (May 27) shows 800,000 deteriorating apartments in New York City alone, but funds were available to build only 12,000 new apartments last year under publicly aided programs, and at least half of these were for middle-income families. Vast areas are in decay. On the previous day, the Times had discovered 800,000 poor people in the suburbs—where all is supposed to be affluence and the good life. Congress is growing more and more resentful of the Poor People's March in Washington, and the key issue in the Presidential campaign may well be crime. Nine billion dollars would go a long way toward alleviating these evils, but the war comes first.

With only a little hesitation, Fortune looks on the bright side. As Burck and Greenspan were writing, the Pentagon was sticking to its estimate that it would take 750,000 men "to finish the job." The good news is that the costs will build up at a considerably slower rate than will U.S. forces in Vietnam. At the end of 1967, with 485,000 in Vietnam, the direct cost of the war was running at about $24 billion a year, or $50,000 per man. With our force level built up to 750,000, the total cost will be $33 billion a year—or only $34,000 per man. In a sense, we are getting a bargain on these manpower additions.

Not only Fortune but almost all the media are complacent about this drainage of money and men into the illusion of Vietnam. It hasn't really figured distinctly in the campaign. Last week we quoted Arthur Miller's striking characterization of the present war as an institution. An institution is what it has become, and a most respectable one. In the United States, that is; elsewhere it's a different story. Even among our "allies" many people think we have gone crazy.

Magic Words

Mr. Byrd of Virginia rises in the Senate to quote, out of context and with an ax of his own to grind, from The New York Times. The subject is "decentralization" of schools. Mr. Byrd favors it. "I feel strongly," he intones, "that the closer we can keep the schools to the people, the more effective school system we will have. . . . I want the Federal Government to keep its hands off the operation of the schools in the various localities. . . . I want decentralization of the schools."

What he really wants is the system that prevailed in the South before racial segregation in public schools was ruled unconstitutional by the Supreme Court in 1954. He wants educational apartheid. And, ironically, he attracts allies with whom he would not be found dead—nor they with him. It is a perfect instance of the use of a word as an incantation, to cover up the fact that you don't know how to solve the problem, or don't want to see it solved.

In this instance, the trouble arose in the City of New York but it is of national scope. In barest outline, and without trying to prejudge the merits of the case, it began in the course of an experiment in community control of the schools in a predominantly slum area of Brooklyn, when the Negro administrator of the school district dismissed nineteen teachers and supervisors (as far as his jurisdiction was concerned) without the permission or approval of the city Board of Education. The result was a fracas involving the board, the school district, the children and their parents, the Mayor, the Governor, the state legislature, the state Commissioner of Education and Board of Regents, the United Federation of Teachers, the city police, and numerous other parties. There was some disorder—nothing very serious—but most of the children and many teachers stayed home and the schools had to be closed temporarily. Whatever the outcome may be, this was what happened at this particular stage, in this particular attempt to decentralize.

In New York and other large cities there are plenty of arguments for decentralization: the systems have become unwieldy. In this aspect, decentralization is an attempt to contend with entrenched bureaucracy, and of all bureaucracies the educational variety is probably the worst in its capacity to do harm, in both the present and the future. The New York Board of Education has not been able to alleviate the plight of the Negro and Puerto Rican children, who are not getting an education and whose parents are up in arms. The idea of community control not only has the support of the community but was put forward under the respectable auspices of the Ford Foundation and with its financial help. On the part of the Foundation, it was an attempt to solve the problem; on the part of the politicians involved it was mainly an attempt to take some of the heat out of the situation and saddle the complainants with responsibility—while giving them only limited and poorly defined authority.

Under such conditions, the danger is that for diverse reasons all kinds of groups will join in a hue and cry for "decentralized" schools: Right-wing elements like the idea—witness Senator Byrd. Some Black Nationalists like it. Those who are reluctant to spend what must be spent on the school system (centralized or decentralized) to make it work also like it. Those who have given up on integration may not like it but are inclined to accept it, faute de mieux.

With these forces in favor, and in the absence of strong countervailing sentiment, "decentralization" may emerge as a substitute for the pre-1954 type of segregation and the de facto segregation that followed, thus instituting a permanent pattern of segregation, the only redeeming feature being the fact that the segregated schools will be under the control of the segregated community.

This pattern can spread to other racial and ethnic groups, postponing indefinitely the realization of the ideal of a cohesive community indifferent to race. In addition, such a solution (if it can be called a solution) obscures this fact: Whatever the size of the district, or the extent of decentralization, success in education is impossible without massive infusion of public funds and improved facilities, services and programs. And the provision and application of this support must be worked out by experienced, dedicated administrators and teachers.

Which brings us back to the fiscal and social agony of the cities and all that is wrong with American civilization, which without flourishing cities is only a hollow shell. The Brooklyn experience proves—if proof is needed—that words and phrases cannot solve a deep-seated difficulty. Used indiscriminately, they may even aggravate the trouble and preclude a humane solution.

Killing the Watchdog

Los Angeles

By any standard, the California Public Utilities Commission is the pre-eminent state regulatory agency in the nation, with a budget of $11 million and a staff of more than 700. Deriving its authority from the state constitution, the commission is independent of legislative control, and its orders may not be reviewed by the lower courts; appeal starts at the state Supreme Court.

If the commission's resources and authority are great, they are needed to control the giant stockholder-owned utilities operating in California. The Pacific Telephone and Telegraph Co., an AT&T subsidiary, has assets of $3.700 million, and the combined worth of the state's largest utilities (PT&T, Pacific Gas and Electric, Southern California Edison, Pacific Lighting Corp., and two smaller companies) is more than $11 billion, a figure that does not include rail and highway carriers or airlines.

The influence of the CPUC is nation-wide. After the Federal Communications Commission announced its decision in an AT&T rate case in 1964, the California commission asked for a rehearing, on the ground that California, with 6 million telephone subscribers, had had no opportunity to be heard. When this petition was denied, the CPUC filed suit in the U.S. Court of Appeals, requesting a review of the FCC action. This also failed, but the insistent California commission, in effect, won its point. Shortly afterward, the FCC began an investigation of AT&T rates, covering all the issues raised by the CPUC. The "commission's concern for the consumer," acknowledged by The Wall Street Journal, is reflected in the cost of utility services. For example, 20 thermal units of gas, 50 kilowatt hours of electricity and a private telephone cost $15.35 in San Francisco. The bill for the same service is $30.72 in Boston and $28.35 in New York.

The regulatory climate in California has now changed, thanks chiefly to the election of Gov. Ronald Reagan. A little more than a month after Reagan's inauguration, Pacific filed an application with the CPUC for the biggest rate increase the company had ever requested—$181 million. PT&T's optimism was sound: Governor Reagan appointed two new commissioners to the five-member board, replacing men who had voted in 1965 for a $40-million telephone rate decrease. One of the new commissioners, Fred P. Morrissey, one-time associate dean of the Graduate School of Business Administration at the University of California, is a former paid consultant to PT&T; his appointment was recommended by the utilities. Governor Reagan's second appointee, also sympathetic to the utilities, is William Symonds, Jr., a former Republican state Senator.

During the eighty-two days of public hearings on PT&T's $181-million rate hike, Governor Reagan openly attempted to influence the commission by publicly stating that a telephone rate increase is "indicated" because of the company's need for capital expansion. And Lt. Gov. Robert H. Finch said at the annual convention of the Pacific Coast Gas Association that regulation of utilities only in the public interest is an outdated philosophy. The Lieutenant Governor's suggestion that investor and consumer are often one and the same person was greeted with enthusiasm.

However strong its newly protective attitude toward the utilities, the commission should not be under any compulsion to act quickly to save PT&T from bankruptcy. In 1967 PT&T's net income was $163,465,000—more than $10 million above earnings of the previous year—and so far in 1968 they are 25 per cent ahead of that.

The CPUC now has the $181-million plea under consideration. Pacific Telephone probably will not get it all—public uproar would be too great—but it appears likely that the company will get as much as half the amount requested. William M. Bennett, the most experienced of the CPUC members, a consistent defender of consumer interests and a holdover appointee of Governor Brown, stated recently: "Regulation as we have known it [in California] is dead. . . . The California utilities now dominate this commission."

PHIL KERBY

The Bourgeois as Disciplinarian

Years ago, Joseph A. Schumpeter, one of the staunchest and most intelligent defenders of capitalism was ever blessed with, commented on "those short-term attempts at resistance by which bourgeois society proves itself so incompetent and occasionally so childish a disciplinarian."

In a time like the present, American judges are particularly prone to lose their heads when draft resisters appear before them. Last October, in a symbolic act of opposition to the draft and the Vietnamese War, the Rev. Philip F. Berrigan—a Catholic priest known the world over for his dedication and courage—joined with Thomas P. Lewis, an artist, David Eberhardt, a former teacher and conscientious objector, and the Rev. James Mengel, an unassigned minister of the United Church of Christ. The quartet poured a quantity of duck's blood on some draft-board records at the U.S. Customs House in Baltimore. A jury convicted them of destruction of government property and other offenses. On May 24, Federal District Judge Edward S. Northrop sentenced Eberhardt to serve three three-year sentences concurrently, while Berrigan and Lewis got six years apiece. Mengel's sentence was postponed while the Judge seeks "professional" (i.e., psychiatric) advice; in the meantime the defendant is under a technical sentence of eighteen years.

At about the same time, the black power militant Rap Brown, convicted in federal court in New Orleans on an obscure gun charge, got five years. Although Congress has refused to regulate the sale of rifles and shotguns, by mail order or otherwise, it is a federal crime for anyone under indictment to transport firearms across state lines. This was one of the facts of American jurisprudence that had escaped Brown's notice: accordingly he carried a .30 caliber carbine with him on a plane from New Orleans to

New York while he was under indictment in Maryland for arson.

Lately Brown has been on the downgrade: his term ■ SNCC's national chairman is nearly over, and SNCC's influence is not what it used to be. Now he achieves renewed prominence, as a martyr. "I knew he would get busted sooner or later," a middle-class Negro businessman remarked, more or less sympathetically.

One need not approve the style of protest in these instances to recognize that the sentences are out of relation to the offenses charged. Sentencing Berrigan, et al., the judge verged on hysteria. "You deliberately set out to use violent means to destroy the very fabric of our society," he declared. "All of you hide behind words to accomplish your ends—to bring down this society."

Abroad, no one has ever heard of Judge Northrop, but millions know and admire Father Berrigan. With his vindictive sentences, Northrop has done more to bring down the society he treasures than Berrigan and his companions ever could (if such were their intention) by pouring blood on draft records. This act, however bizarre, has nothing whatever to do with overthrowing the government.

A GENERATION UP IN ARMS

Berkeley on the Tiber

GIANFRANCO CORSINI

Mr. Corsini, literary editor of Paese Sera (Rome), has published in Italy two books on American letters and society.

Rome

In the spring of 1967, Italians watching the government-controlled TV news were suddenly confronted with a scene that might have been familiar to an American audience, but was new here. Except for the neo-Roman architecture of the Fascist-built University of Rome, the sit-in taking place in the main square of this "citadel of culture" could easily have been mistaken for a scene filmed on the Berkeley campus. The students were mourning the death of Paolo Rossi, victim of a neo-Fascist assault on the militant dissenters at the university, and when the speeches to the silent crowd were over, the air was suddenly filled with the singing of We Shall Overcome—in English. In their time of crisis, the first protest song to come to the minds of thousands of Italian students was the anthem of the American civil rights movement. But in a sense this choice of song was appropriate, for the biggest student uprising ever to take place in this country started with borrowed tactics and borrowed slogans.

There is no doubt that the request for "student power," stressed by this unprecedented national movement, was originally motivated, to quote Newsweek, "by the desire to reform an archaic system of higher education" and to obtain "a voice in university administration." The emphasis was definitely on "power," and the working committees of the students who occupied main universities detailed their aims in a series of remarkable documents, now available in several books. The manifestoes of "participatory education" are obviously based on the specific needs of the outmoded Italian educational system. There has also been a symbolic banning of stuffy old books as ■ protest against the authoritarian notion of culture as "wealth possessed and distributed by the university institutions." It was accordingly suggested that the students be provided with more topical counter-courses (lectures), which turned out to be on matters such as revolution in South America, black power, Wilhelm Reich and the sexual revolution, new trends in psychoanalysis, the doctrines of Herbert Marcuse. In the mimeographed documents one can find a bibliography of preliminary reading which includes Hal Draper's The Berkeley Revolution, Paul Goodman's Growing Up Absurd, Stokely Carmichael's Black Power, the Autobiography of Malcolm X, and Marcuse's One Dimensional Man, all available in Italian translations.

The anti-textbooks of the new student elite in Italy, 1968, also include works by Guevara, Debray and Ho Chi Minh, but the massive presence of American authors is particularly instructive for anyone who would grasp the principal motivations of the Italian—and to a certain extent European—student movement. The "specter that haunts" the strongholds of European "culture" seems to speak mainly in English, with a strong American accent. The world-wide rejection of established values and institutions, which also animates the Italian student movement, springs from two parallel "ideological" sources that merge here in a new mixture. On the one hand it includes a revaluation of the Marxist "world view"; on the other, it responds to the more empirical suggestions of American "dissent."

Emphasis varies from country to country, but in Continental dimensions the movement can be interpreted as a protest against the existing society, a critique of the main features of its affluence, and the rejection of its accelerating process of Americanization. Thus America provides both villain and hero. At the very moment when Italian and French and German students join in a massive attack upon neo-capitalism, neo-colonialism and neo-imperialism (as represented by the American socio-economic structure, the American intervention in Vietnam and the American failure to give equal rights to its black citizens), they also borrow the intellectual weapons of their struggle from the arsenal of American "dissent." The American "myth" that we have known in the past is dying out, and a new American myth is growing in its place.

The present student rebellion is making Europeans aware of a major change in the relation between Europe and the United States; and for the second time within twenty-five years this relation is totally reversed. The American myth of "freedom and opportunity" which inspired the young Italian dissenters struggling against fascism in the late thirties and early forties lost its persuasion in the McCarthy era, and gave way to final rejection in the fifties, as documented by the later works of Pavese or Vittorini. The "discovery" of American "culture" which had begun to shake the old foundations of the European humanistic tradition was followed too closely by the disillusion of the cold war. Intellectual Europe began to shrink back into the comfortable boundaries of its heritage.

But European society has been changing almost at the pace of American society, fast enough to become soon aware that isolation was impossible. Oddly enough, it was then the American "sociological imagination" of the late fifties and early sixties that awakened some European intellectuals to the alarming symptoms of their own advancing mass society. By that time Europe had begun to wonder where its "lonely crowds" were going, who was its "power elite," when the "other" Europe would be found, or why its "inner persuaders" were twisting reality to fit their aims.

At that point a new European generation, still unequipped for self-criticism (except through the conventional channels of the Communist Parties in France and Italy, but without even those in England and Germany), found some inspiration in the new American symbol of the dissenter. The new American hero of a thousand faces looked like the Berkeley student or the SNCC activist, Allen Ginsberg or Malcolm X; Sergeant Yossarian or Noam Chomsky; Paul Goodman or Herbert Marcuse. Each one of them represented the "other America," as they call it here, and at the same time the "other man" that a whole generation was waiting to see emerge from the general mess. The strength of the new hero was that, though free of the sins of the Christian-colonial tradition, he was yet the unmistakable product of the technological age. Born into it, he proved the possibility of rejection from within. After all, he seemed to suggest that if there could be "another America" there could also be "another Europe"; hence his credibility in defiance of the simple, old-fashioned negations of dogmatic Marxism.

The new radicalism, then, developed where the old radicalism was still a strong component of political life; at the same time, in other areas (Germany or England) it aimed in a way to replace the old. This accounts for the ideological shadings to be found among the various European student movements. In Germany, where there is no strong left-wing opposition, the influence of the American radical students seems particularly close, whereas in France or in Italy the new radicalism still finds itself deeply rooted in the Marxist movement. Also significant in these two countries is the participation of radical Catholic groups which tend more and more to dissociate themselves from the orthodoxy of the Church and the established Catholic parties. One might ask, then, why there is this impulse to abandon traditional politics even in countries where the Communist Parties still represent the only strong and organized opposition to the power structure? Why the interest in a new American style, just at the time when American prestige in Europe is at its lowest? A possible answer lies in the general crisis of European culture, which has proved incapable of coping effectively with the new problems of the advancing mass society. Emphasis here is always put on the so-called technological gap between Europe and the United States; not enough attention has been given so far to the cultural lag, in a time when the two societies are acquiring more and more the same features.

Horner, New Statesman

Some forty years ago, in the isolation of prison, where the Fascists tried to "stop his brain," the Italian Marxist Gramsci wrote some surprising notes on Babbitt, which still seem to throw light on the situation:

The existence of a literary current of realism in America which begins to be critical of its mores is a cultural fact of great importance: it means that a new American civilization is being born, conscious of its strengths and weaknesses. The European intellectuals have already lost this function to a large extent: they no longer represent cultural self-criticism, the self-criticism of the ruling class. They have either become direct agents of the ruling class or have separated into a little caste with no national roots. Babbitt is a philistine in a country in motion; the European petty bourgeoisie are philistines in conservative countries, rotting away in the swamps of a parochialism which preens itself on being a great culture.

Forty years later a new generation fully realizes, as Gramsci had suggested, that "the European Babbitt does not even fight against his philistinism; on the contrary he thrives on it." Therefore, this generation rejects its "great tradition" and sides with the dissenters born out of the culture of "self-criticism." In accepting the new American hero, however, today's European intellectual does not throw out the baby with the bath water; rather, he frequently reintegrates the Marxism in his outlook through, say, an American dimension of Marcuse's work. The latter's validity, then, must also be seen in perspective. The transcripts of a recent debate between the German-American philosopher and some Berlin students, published in Das Ende der Utopie (Berlin, 1967), show not only that Marcuse takes his lead from Marx but also that the students constantly try to bring him back to Marx. Many seem worried that the "end of utopia" might lead to another kind of utopia too far removed from contemporary reality. This is also strongly felt among many of the Italian students, whose documents suggest the need for "linking of the student movement with the political forces of the workers' movement through parties and unions. . . ."

The failures of European Social Democracy and the inflexibility shown by the old party-line Marxism have often in the past provoked a reassessment of the ideological foundations of the revolutionary movements and led to positions independent of the traditional parties of the Left; but these were designed to bring pressure on them from the outside, rather than to by-pass them. In this context one might say that in France and Italy there has been on the whole no open split between the student movement and the old Left, but that a tension was created by a justifiable difference in outlook while the need for possible common action was emphasized. The fact that it was a student-worker First of May celebration which took place in Rome a few weeks ago emphasizes this point. Even Marcuse, answering a German student during his recent Berlin seminar, had to admit that "the tradition of the working class seems to be still very strong, at least in most European countries, while in America, where it previously existed, it is now extinguished." (Das Ende der Utopie.)

But it is striking that now for the first time the old European notion of the intellectual as the "conscience" of society has found for many its embodiment mainly on the other side of the ocean, and travels back to Europe in American dress. This adds to the responsibility of American intellectuals, who often appear unaware of the new burden that sits on their shoulders. Their victories and their failures will from now on affect us too.

If it is true that many young Europeans find inspiration in the moral upsurge of the American intelligentsia, they are not blind to the limitations exposed by J. P. Nettl in his recent Nation article ("Are Intellectuals Obsolete?" March 4), the attention he calls to a lack of "purpose and direction." The American "neo-intellectuals"—as Nettl calls them—might even find what was creatively borrowed from them by the European students (and used differently within the historical and social framework of each European nation) was a loan that could pay excellent interest if only they were willing to analyze what use was being made of it.

If the new American hero, who today replaces the old American clichés on the Continent, is content to be no more than a new "myth," his survival is problematic. This would be true also of those over here who might content themselves with accepting the new hero as a myth, instead of making him a living agent of change. The new hero would in such case become just another consumer product on the intellectual market. But if this discovery of the "other America" should develop into a two-way link between two new cultures, the achievement could very well be revolutionary. The anti-hero of dissent and rejection might then find his place among the purposeful agents of social change that C. Wright Mills so clearly identified in his later years. The new European generation has found in the American "dissenter" the missing link between the post-illuministic age and the post-technological era; but the problem now is to find an adequate setting for the new man yet to be born.

The European student movement should act as a warning to its American counterpart insofar as it shows the need to fill the ideological vacuum of the old Left with an organic construction of aims for the new "New Left." The revolutionary impact of American "dissent" on the European student movement needs to be emphasized, for its importance is great; on the other hand, it is also necessary to be clear about what distinguished the two. One need only refer to "Protest, Power and the Future of Politics" by Carey McWilliams (The Nation, January 15), where it was very plainly stated that the task of American radicalism is more than ever "to concentrate for a change on the political problems." European students know this full well, even if some of them, like their American friends, may think it possible or profitable to avoid the task.

SDS: Between Reform and Revolution

JAMES JACOBS

Mr. Jacobs is on the staff of the Radical Education Project, a research and publication organization in Ann Arbor, Mich. He is an active member of SDS.

Although the popular press has been concentrating recently on the hippie as the dominant manifestation of American youth culture, the student Left movement has not disappeared; in fact, it has become considerably larger and more powerful; recent events at Columbia and other campuses confirm this growth. Once a small group of social activists working for university reform, the New Left has become a permanent force in the political culture of the university. Liberal student body presidents and even administrators have found it prudent to mouth New Left rhetoric, since radical groups now set the tone of campus politics. In addition to the campus activity, a striking new development has been the growth in high schools of student groups that work on issues ranging from academic and social reforms to draft resistance.

Yet for all its growth and vigor, the student movement is not without problems, and these arise primarily from a transformation of its purpose. Starting as a series of local groups pressing for specific reforms, the New Left in the last two years has swung over to building a movement that will fundamentally change American society. This shift of perspective has produced new areas of activities and new difficulties. Students for a Democratic Society (SDS) is the major student radical organization and a study of its actions and problems offers reliable insight into the state of the movement.

Established almost six years ago, SDS was at first principally devoted to exposing the social problems of contemporary America. In large measure, the early members saw activism on the local level as the major tactic in dramatizing the issues of poverty and civil rights. Politically, SDS members supported liberal Congressional candidates and, much to the later embarrassment of the organization, even went "part of the way with LBJ" in 1964. SDS was untroubled by the dogmatic struggles that embittered the old Left, and was welcomed by many liberals and leftists as a happy recovery from the "apathetic" student generation of the fifties.

The student activists soon lost their enthusiasm for working within the established order. Although the plight of poor and black Americans was more than sufficiently documented in the early sixties, little attack was made on the causes of poverty and racism. SDS members came increasingly to distrust liberal voices in the Democratic Party who urged support for their meager actions by repeatedly envisioning a take-over by the radical Right if the Democrats should lose.

By 1965, moreover, the aggressive and expansionist nature of American foreign policy had begun to dominate the concerns of student radicals. On Vietnam the Republicans and the Democrats were as one, and the students sensed that something more deeply imbedded in American society than political parties explained this consensus. Clearly, exposing obvious defects in the society and working for specific reforms were not enough to change America. These problems were rooted in the social and economic order of modern capitalism, which system must be overturned. Thus, SDS turned to organizing a radical movement that would seek to supplant existing institutions. Its 1966 National Convention made the new role explicit by calling for members to develop themselves as organizers of a mass movement for change. The Wobblies became an important symbol of the new SDS defiance of the established order.

If any such movement is to succeed, it must develop a long-range perspective that will aid in building a constituency. After six years, SDS still faces the problem of defining strategies and programs that will carry the radical movement beyond campus-based student protests. In part, the problem is organizational. Among the many criticisms of SDS, one that is valid is its almost total decentralization. A national office does exist and convention and national council meetings decide organizational policy, but almost no attempt is made to implement national programs. Campus chapters launch programs without consulting the national office, which has barely enough funds to pay staff salaries and print the SDS weekly paper, New Left Notes. Little effort has been made to alter this condition and at best, the policy proposals adopted at national meetings are broad enough to leave the chapters a good deal of room for "doing their thing."

Decentralization of the organization becomes an increasingly severe hazard as SDS membership grows. Since 1965, one older member puts it, "the organization has been literally swamped by thousands of new recruits from every part of the country, exhibiting an astonishing range of political viewpoints, aspirations and degrees of sophistication." Many of the new people were moved by an emotional reaction against the Vietnamese War; others were part of the young culture revolt against the society in general. Both groups critically needed deeper political understanding if they were to sustain any commitment over the long haul. Lacking long-range goals and frustrated by the inability of SDS to do anything about what they see as the major issues of the society (war in Vietnam, the draft), many of the new recruits simply "burn up" in the movement. Although SDS continues to grow, a great many people slip away from the organization into one of the varieties of nonpolitical life styles that now exist on most campuses.

More important is the political development of the organization itself. At odds with the existing society, SDS must be extremely careful that its actions will remain radical, yet relevant to the concerns of Americans. The moralistic attitude that characterized the early days of SDS has been supplemented by a strong focus upon "political perspectives": What sort of issues radicalize people? How should SDS handle these issues? Can SDS actions fit into the overall development of the radical movement in the society? When political moves are discussed on the national level, SDS members divide broadly into two tendencies: theoretical activists and plain activists.

The theoretical activists are usually well read in Marxist analysis and concerned that SDS programs reflect certain ideological assumptions of socialism. They view immediate issues in a long perspective, seeing the remote implications of particular programs. Specifically, the theoretical activists are concerned that SDS members should not be co-opted by corporate liberals such as Kennedy and McCarthy. Although they all see themselves as revolutionary Socialists, the political differences among theoretical activists are immense (the sources of much of their thinking include Maoism, Third Camp socialism, varieties of Trotskyism and anarchism).

While the theoretical activists have been gaining ascendancy in recent years, the organizational tone and style is still more often set by the plain activists. These latter place less stock in theoretical perspectives and more in short-run strategies and tactics to radicalize people. Possessing a less cohesive critique of American society, the plain activists seek to create social dynamism on many levels. They are often unclear about the development of radical programs from action and thus tend to be less critical of their organizing projects. While most plain activists hold a revolutionary view toward change in the society, their perspective for the future development of the movement is very unclear.

Within SDS there is no strong conflict between theoretical activists and plain activists. For the most part, the theoretical activists dominate discussions of international politics and of future programs, while the plain activists are more concerned with domestic issues and with immediate tactical and strategical plans. Both positions can be held in different contexts by one person and very often programs are so formulated that the interests of each group are satisfied.

The tension between the theoretical activists and the plain activists is most apparent when the question of SDS or New Left ideology is discussed. The theoretical activists argue for a strong Socialist perspective that will clearly define organizational goals and priorities. The plain activists agree vaguely that some form of socialism is the goal, but say that SDS needs more experience at organizing before any ideology can be adequately formulated. This disagreement between the theoretical activists and the plain activists makes it exceedingly difficult to formulate an SDS national perspective, except in the broadest generalities. Although outdated and unrepresentative of what SDS believes today, the Port Huron Statement, issued in 1962 as the movement's ideology, has never been revised. The lack of consensus puts off systematic discussion of ideology, and the organization usually debates issues on the basis of tactics and strategies, with little attempt being made to see questions at longer range.

A recognition that analysis and education were needed if issues and programs were to evolve a durable ideology led to the establishment of the Radical Education Project, and later when REP became independent of SDS, to the Radical Education Center. Yet, the fear of many SDS members that internal education meant boring and useless intellectual discussion, when analysis should be arrived at through experience, has severely limited the effect of internal education programs. These projects offer empirical information and a variety of political perspectives, but have done little to provide ideological alternatives or develop new programs.

The inability to develop a more substantial ideology has often meant that the worst aspects of both theoretical and plain positions emerged in SDS actions. When the theorists predominate, SDS actions are apt to be couched in boring, often pretentious rhetoric which strait-jackets the organization in sectarianism. When the plain activists are ascendant, actions are superficially planned, their implications unclear; and they are not followed by critical evaluation of success or failure. SDS must reach some agreement between the theoretical activists and the plain activists if ideological consistency and national programs are to develop. Until it does, the organization will spend its efforts flip-flopping from issue to issue with no clear idea of what lies ahead.

Horner, New Statesman

Major style problems for both groups are the excessive reliance on rhetoric and the failure to back up demands with concrete programs. This happens in part because local chapters overestimate the present strength of the student Left power which they know is growing. They assume mass campus support when little is present and fail, therefore, to organize thoroughly. The use of rhetoric probably reached its height last fall during the demonstrations against war research and recruiting when provocative actions and simplistic analysis were frequently apparent. On review, it became clear to SDS chapters that their programs tended to isolate them from campus and ultimately hampered the organizing of students. While SDS chapters are responsive to the call to create "two, three, many Columbias" (and no doubt the Columbia experience will be duplicated elsewhere), few will act unless they feel that local situations will be improved by massive confrontations. SDS's apprehension about recent efforts to plan huge demonstrations at the Democratic Party Convention this summer indicates a growing concern to avoid actions which are self-isolating.

While national SDS is beset by financial, organizational and ideological problems, the strength of the organization lies with the local chapters. These vary considerably in their activities and strength. The University of Michigan chapter won a number of victories during the academic year of 1966-67, but this spring lost a major referendum on the question of secret research on the campus. Through a series of actions on many issues, Princeton SDS has grown considerably during the past year, establishing a large following and influencing university policies. The University of Chicago SDS, which in 1966 held an important confrontation with the university over the ranking of students for draft purposes, has not reached that height of support on campus since. Chapters sometimes coordinate their activities, as last fall when campaigns were launched against university membership in the Institute for Defense Analysis. However, the allegation that Columbia was selected as a target for disruption by "an SDS meeting in Maryland" is nonsense. Anyone with the slightest experience of SDS chapters knows that all actions are planned by local chapters according to local conditions.

At the campus chapter level, the distinction between the theoretical activist and the plain activist loses meaning as all efforts are focused on the next demonstration, teach-in, rally, guerrilla theatre, seminar, or the varieties of other tactics used to dramatize and discuss issues. SDS chapters stress activism. Programs have been developed for student power over dormitory hours, judicial matters and other non-academic affairs. On many major campuses, a recent issue has been the presence of classified research and war-industry recruiters. In the past year the major noncampus issues have been the draft and the Vietnamese War, but many chapters are now beginning to develop programs around electoral politics and the Presidential campaign. Although most chapters attempt to base programs on specific issues, a good deal of their activity is launched in response to campus and world events as the chapter organizers seek the "right issue" to radicalize the campus.

Success is measured by the growth of the chapter and the impact it has upon the rest of the institution. Most chapters are sources of literature, speakers and films, often providing the only political perspectives on major domestic and international issues on campus. In some areas, particularly those not near a major urban center, the SDS chapter serves a social function, attracting many hippies and others whose life styles do not mesh with the campus stereotypes.

Normally a small group of committed people do the major organizational work, and they are instrumental in the establishment of chapter programs. The rest of the chapter has been described as the "shock troops." Although they endorse programs and provide the bodies for demonstrations and confrontations, a wide gulf usually separates them from the leadership. The shock troops often lack the political articulation of the leadership, and since they rarely participate in the informal formulation of programs they have little effect upon chapter actions. Almost every SDS chapter goes through an annual attempt by chapter leadership to get the shock troops involved in positions of leadership.

A whole generation of activists is emerging from the experiences gained in local campus activity. Rather than possessing "apocalyptic fantasies" of being "nihilistic revolutionaries," as many critics have complained, SDS is developing a cadre of organizers comparable in skill to those who emerged from the CIO drive of the 1930s. They are articulate and politically aware. Moreover, they learn from their mistakes and are extremely conscious of the skill and power of their opponents.

Actions by local SDS chapters have a "spin-off" effect in the development of locally based radical projects. Usually focused on one specific issue, these local groups are staffed by people sympathetic to SDS. The establishment of draft resistance projects organized in working-class and ghetto neighborhoods has been partially motivated by SDS people. Another development has been the growing number of private community schools where children learn unhampered by boring, regimented classrooms and where parents can have a say in educational politics. Particularly successful schools now exist in Ann Arbor and San Francisco. Several SDS labor projects have made contact with workers by supporting strikes and rank-and-file insurgencies. The activities of women's liberation groups have involved many who would have been intimidated by the male-dominated SDS chapters. Finally, a whole series of publications, films and underground papers have sprung out of the protest culture. Centers like Liberation Press Service, The Movement, The Guardian and the Newsreel have given the New Left a substantial communications network. While these media simply report activities with little or no analysis, they reflect the present intelligence needs of the movement. The organizational chaos of national SDS stands in contrast to the strength and activity of local chapters and these independent groups. They are the backbone of the movement.

On both local and national levels two particularly pressing problems affect SDS members. The transformation of SDS into an organization for radical change has made most of the membership painfully aware of the isolation and limitation of the student movement. Another aspect of this problem is the need felt by the older members to develop roles for themselves after college.

Although a middle-class student organization, SDS has always been concerned with working with "agents for change" in the society. In 1963, this led to the formation of the Economic Research and Action Project (ERAP) which called for SDS members to leave their campuses and go to work organizing poor and black people in Northern ghettos. Today, most of the projects have folded, often because organizers were unclear about what issues to raise and were uncertain as to what constituted a radical perspective when working with the poor. Furthermore, as the war in Vietnam became the overriding issue, a good deal of enthusiasm drained away from the projects and many of them were terminated before they had time to try out their organizing ideas.

In contrast to the ERAP days, SDS now talks about organizing the working class or the lower-middle class. For a brief time in 1967 the idea of organizing the "new working class"—engineers, technicians, teachers and some skilled workers—enjoyed considerable vogue, but with few actual organizing efforts initiated, the idea dropped from view. SDS members recognize the privileged role of students in the society, and they sense that ordinary people can see issues in a very different light. As yet, however, this knowledge does not dampen the militancy of student protests, for most SDS members feel that working people will support their actions when they see "how bad things are."

A good deal of debate in SDS now centers on how to reach the majority of working people. Those possessing a traditional Socialist perspective emphasize organizing around the work place, particularly among workers in major industrial areas of the country. Yet going into the shops requires discipline, a strong sense of goals, and adjustment to boring, repetitive and often dangerous work. For these reasons the number of SDS members active in the shops is relatively small.

A more commonly accepted approach is organizing in the neighborhood. As part of the National Community Union, an organization growing out of an ERAP project located in Chicago, many SDS members will this summer be living in poor white and working-class neighborhoods, going to bars and simply "getting to know folks." It is hoped that after this experience some will remain in the neighborhoods for serious organizing, or commit themselves to organizing after college. In spite of this activity, organizing "in the heart of America"—in lower-middle-class and working-class communities—draws precious few SDS people off the campus.

The problem of isolation takes another form when SDS relates to the actions of blacks. Although SDS members support black attempts to achieve self-determination, essentially they remain spectators. At a recent SDS national meeting, Carl Oglesby, former president of the organization, called for support of black struggles rather than opposition to the Vietnamese War as the major SDS issue. His speech was enthusiastically received, but no programs for making SDS actions relevant to blacks have emerged. In part, this reflects the growing loss of contact between white radicals and the blacks.

Another hindrance has been the feeling by most SDS members that whites cannot and should not take part in black affairs. What white radicals should do is organize whites against racism. Ever since SNCC's first articulation of black power, SDS has proclaimed this goal. Yet it simply has not been done. For the most part SDS has stood aloof, while white racism has intensified.

What may pull SDS off the campus is that the early members of SDS must now find ways to remain active in the movement after completing college and graduate school. Since many SDS members are intellectually gifted, they often land either in the best graduate schools, or in professional training as doctors, architects, urban planners, etc. In most of these professions, SDS members, trained to identify with the peanut-butter-and-jelly life styles of the community organizer, find themselves falling into an affluence that encourages them to sell out. The problem is also political, for those that are interested in organizing remain very isolated from the student movement.

Last year the question of "radicals in the professions" became critical for the older SDS members. The Radical Education Project has generated much discussion on the question. In general, it is widely agreed that radicals should be active organizers in their professional roles. University-trained people might see themselves as teaching not in the Ivy League or Big Ten schools but in a community college or a working-class high school where organized radical activity is at a minimum. For radical doctors, the goal might be to work in a ghetto area, teaching community people medical skills. For urban planners, it might be working on community planning with lower-income people. Whatever the means, the thrust of this approach is to break away from the elitist attitude inherent in many professions.

More ambitious plans call for professionally trained individuals to work with community organizing projects. For example, if a project were established in a working-class area, radicals might get jobs in the local high schools, social work agencies or hospitals. They would work closely with the organizing activity using their skills to set up community schools, medical co-ops, a community newspaper and other institutions that form part of any successful organizing project. While this sort of coordination has been discussed, little has been done. An exception is a community project based in a white middle-class section of Chicago where such programs as draft resistance, high school organizing, and establishment of day-care nurseries have proved successful in the development of a radical community organization.

Another approach emphasizes organizing on a professional basis. High school teachers work with the newly formed radical causes within the American Federation of Teachers. Doctors, architects and urban planners have established organizations which are devoted to shattering the conservative image of these professions. When a large number of radicals find themselves in the same occupation, it is at least feasible to form a nation-wide organization that is expressly political in its professional concerns. Such is the case with the recent establishment of a new organization, the New Universities Committee, of radical university faculty and graduate students. [See "New Universities Conference: The Dilemmas of Resistance" by Norman Birnbaum, The Nation, April 22.]

There are many problems. Certain professions place strong constraints on radical activity. Middle-class life is often just as isolating as the campus. Professional work is stimulating and many lose sight of their political functions while becoming good doctors, lawyers or teachers. Nevertheless, there is a good deal of enthusiasm, and many of the older radicals identify themselves and their activities directly with SDS (some name their local organizations Movement For A Democratic Society). There is even talk of creating an adult New Left organization that would serve the interests of the older SDS members.

What lies ahead for SDS? With the possibility of the war ending and the political thaw bringing forth a new liberalism, SDS probably will not continue to expand at the present rate. This might be beneficial. An end to the fighting would eliminate many of the frantic Vietniks, Left sectarians, and others from SDS, whose identification with the organization is based more on personal problems than politics. A solution in Vietnam would also mean that attention could again be given to domestic issues, and particularly to socio-economic problems that have received little original thought from SDS in the past two years. They are the issues that concern the majority of America.

In the short run, the end of the war will probably make the student movement smaller. But it may also allow it to develop more cohesive domestic programs and possibly to resolve some of its organizational problems. In addition, there seems a strong likelihood that in the next few years an adult New Left organization will be established. If it is to reach the goal of creating a radical political movement in the country, SDS will be forced to mature. In its future activities, SDS might borrow a phrase from the early days of union organizing in the auto industry: "Take it easy, but take it."

Big Bust on Morningside Heights

MARVIN HARRIS

Mr. Harris is professor of anthropology at Columbia University and former chairman of the department. He is the author of The Nature of Cultural Things (Random House) and the recently published The Rise of Anthropological Theory (Thomas Y. Crowell).

At 2:30 A.M., Tuesday, April 30, a thousand New York City policemen attacked an approximately equal number of students barricaded inside five Columbia University buildings. The action lasted three hours and injured at least 148 persons in varying degrees. Many students were thrown or dragged down stairways. Girls were pulled out by the hair; their arms were twisted; they were punched in the face. Faculty members were kicked in the groin, tossed through hedges, punched in the eye. Noses and cheekbones were broken. A diabetic student fell into a coma. One faculty member suffered a nervous collapse. Many students bled profusely from head wounds opened by handcuffs wielded as weapons. Dozens of moaning people lay about the grass unattended. At one point an estimated 2,000 spectators were set upon by the police and pinned against the gates. Outside the campus, mounted police chased screaming knots of people, young and old, up and down Broadway in a scene from Planet of the Apes. It took a line of paddy wagons stretching along Amsterdam Avenue from 118th to 110th Street to carry off the 720 persons who were arrested. They were driven away, unrepentant, beating on the bars, cursing the police, President Grayson Kirk and Vice President David Truman.

It would seem self-evident that an event so contrary to the routine and purpose of a great university compels all who were its victims and participants to speak out concerning what happened, to establish the sequence of events, and to contribute to the analysis of both remote and immediate causes. Yet there are many members of the administration and faculty who feel that the well-being of Columbia requires rapid termination of all such inquiries, and the development of an attitude of studied indifference to the questions of who and what were responsible for the disaster. There is much talk about the need for "binding up the wounds" and for forgetting in a spirit of constructive reconciliation acts and statements produced under stressful circumstances.

I do not impugn the motives of the majority of these hushers and forgetters, but I do challenge their assumptions about what it will take to secure the university's future. The attempt to discover and disseminate truth is at all times the proper function of professors and students, but we all know that the truth seldom proclaims itself in a simple blinding image, jointly experienced by all observers. Establishing the truth in human affairs is in part a political process in which theories and anti-theories are the symbols of conflicting wills and countervailing interests. The search for the truth at Columbia is thus an aspect of an unfolding political struggle. Under these circumstances, to remain quiet in the name of academic dignity is to take a highly defined political position.

The number of Columbia faculty who are perfectly aware that political acts manifest themselves in not doing or saying as well as in doing and saying is probably as great as at any university in the world. Columbia's faculty are linked by personal and commercial bonds to New York's intellectual establishment, and many enjoy in their own right the privilege of being literary or sociological muzzins. Yet in the present crisis this enlightened faculty has given little evidence that it comprehends how loudly dignified silence speaks for the status quo.

Most astonishing is the failure of the liberal Columbia establishment, hitherto identifiable by vanguard efforts in civil rights and the peace movement, collectively to take a principled and unambiguous position on a single important issue in the current dispute. While the buildings were occupied, the segment of the faculty from which an independent critique of the situation might have been expected consumed its energies in a futile attempt to mediate between the enraged students and the equally enraged administration. These mediation efforts were conducted by the steering committee of an informal, self-constituted group of concerned instructors and professors, who called themselves the Ad Hoc Faculty Committee. The good will and dedication of the majority of this group and of its steering committee are beyond dispute. Their analysis of what was happening, however, was inadequate. The actions and in-actions which they undertook, in conformity with certain false assumptions, resulted in a series of unintended disasters, culminating in the great bust.

By playing the role of mediator, this group actually prevented the beginning of negotiations between the administration and the students. The Columbia administration has repeatedly asserted that "we ignored no opportunity for negotiations," and the news media have stressed the assertion that student intransigence during negotiations between the administration and the strikers left the administration with no alternative but to call in the police. Contrary to popular impression, there were few sessions during which members of the students' strike steering committee and members of the administration actually met to talk with each other. To communicate with the students in Hamilton Hall—"liberated" by black students and converted to Malcolm X University—the administration relied on a number of high-level mediators supplied by the Mayor's office and the black community. As far as the students in the other four buildings were concerned, however, there appears to have been only one instance of what might be called a negotiating session. This took place early in the morning of Friday, April 26. Thereafter, for almost four days preceding the police action, there were no negotiations with the main body of the strikers. Instead, numerous delegated or self-appointed members of the Ad Hoc Faculty Committee rushed back and forth between the students and the administration, sounding out both sides with a series of proposals intended to serve as the basis for a start of negotiations. Some of these suggestions—as, for example, the so-called Galanter-Trilling-Hovde proposal for the creation of a tripartite disciplinary body—were actually voted on by the Ad Hoc Faculty Committee. But many other proposals that were dangled before the students were purely the result of the momentary fancy of the faculty mediators.

Even when a proposal had been voted on by the Ad Hoc Committee, the students were correct to view it with skepticism, since if they agreed to a particular point, there was no way for the Ad Hoc Committee to guarantee that the administration would endorse its side of the bargain. Several faculty mediators actually tried to split the strikers by deliberately proposing solutions which they knew would appeal to students in some of the buildings but not in others. It was common for faculty mediators to tell students that they had already won two of their main objectives—termination of the gymnasium project and severance of all ties with the Institute of Defense Analysis—and on this basis to appeal for the withdrawal of their other demands, especially the demand that the strikers not be punished. Yet the faculty mediators could not guarantee the ultimate decision of the administration on either of these issues and, by the existing charter of the university, were completely at the mercy of the Board of Trustees in all such matters. The faculty mediators asked the strikers to trust them, pledging their professional integrity and moral influence, but the students became increasingly distrustful of the divisive solicitation carried out by representatives of a faculty group whose legitimacy from the point of view of the administration was as dubious as that of the strikers themselves, and who in the actual situation seemed even more powerless.

Contrary to official pronouncements and to the misrepresentations of the mass media, there is no evidence that the Columbia administration ever seriously intended to clear the occupied buildings (with the exception of Hamilton Hall) by means of negotiation. The chronology of events at Columbia has been so complex and rapid that even many participants have forgotten that the police were first officially asked to intervene on the second day of the strike—12:30 A.M., Friday, April 26—four days before the actual bust. The circumstances of this call and the reasons why it did not result in an attempt to clear the buildings must be given due consideration. On Wednesday, the 24th, at an official meeting of the faculty of Columbia College (presided over by President Kirk and Vice President Truman) a motion had been passed asking for the peaceful settlement of the dispute and trusting that police action would not be used. The sentiment against police action was further confirmed on Thursday when more than 200 members of the Ad Hoc Committee affixed their signatures to a document, point 4 of which stated: "Until this crisis is settled, we will stand before the occupied buildings to prevent forcible entry by police or others." In conformity with this resolution, shifts of faculty volunteers had been maintaining a twenty-four-hour-a-day vigil at the entrances to the struck buildings. By late Thursday evening, however, there were many rumors indicating that the police were about to be used. At midnight, a high-ranking member of the administration appeared before the Ad Hoc Faculty Committee to insist that the rumors were baseless and that the administration did not contemplate any such action. One half-hour later a hush fell over the group as Vice President Truman—in his final appearance before the Ad Hoc Committee—entered the room. "I know you are not going to like what I have to tell you, gentlemen, but five minutes ago President Kirk was on the phone asking the Mayor for permission to use the police to preserve peace and order."

This announcement, coming so close on the denial, elicited voluminous hissing and booing and an almost unanimous cry of "shame!" Most of the faculty rushed from the room to take up positions in front of the buildings; a handful remained to phone the Mayor's office to ask that the police be stopped. Some contingents of police actually did go into action. At about 1:15 A.M. twenty-five plainclothes men charged the entrance to Low Memorial Library and injured several faculty members who stood in their way. But the crowd around the building had grown to dangerous proportions. It included large numbers of faculty and students, some of them opposed to the strikers' demands but united in their opposition to the use of the police. The administration wavered and called off the action (which it had probably intended as a means of clearing only Low Memorial Library, leaving the other buildings to be dealt with on a separate basis).

To the faculty who had interfered it was made clear that the administration was determined to pursue a hard line and that under no circumstances would it consider amnesty for the strikers. Influential representatives of the faculty accepted the rejection of amnesty as an ultimate and unmodifiable condition. They merely argued that it was too soon to resort to the police since there was still a possibility that some students could be split off and made to come out of the buildings by offering leniency rather than amnesty. The administration replied, in effect, that it would give the faculty a few more days to talk some sense into the strikers, and the sleepless faculty mediators hurried back to their task with a renewed sense of urgency.

But in accepting the administration's intransigence on the amnesty question, the faculty mediators ceased to be mediators and became instead the more or less unwitting accomplices of the administration's plans to use physical force to crush the strike and then to jail and expel the strike's leaders. When it gradually became clear to the students that the faculty mediators regarded the no-amnesty position as a requisite for negotiations, the strikers became increasingly hostile to and suspicious of the Ad Hoc Committee, and in some instances refused to speak further with its representatives.

The response of the faculty to the administration's threat to seek a bloody solution to its long-festering problems with radical students was either spineless or masochistic. This was an administration which could ill afford to give ultimatums to its professors. It was an administration which had foolishly risked the physical survival of the Morningside Heights campus by clinging to a disputed construction site in a public park overlooking what is perhaps the world's most volatile ghetto. Obviously, there are other ways to provide adequate gymnasium facilities. The university recently built a twelve-story school of business on top of the old gymnasium—Uris Hall, named after the family of one of the trustees—right in the center of the campus. A simple matter of dollars and cents prevented the remodeling of the old gymnasium under Uris or the construction of a new one in place of Uris. The park site, at $3,000 a year for 2.1 acres, seemed a tempting deal. But a university is not a construction firm or a discount department store; it is a semi-public corporation whose budget must include social costs and social benefits.

As officers of the corporation, the faculty could well appreciate the efforts made by the administration to hold the line on expenses and to manage the endowment funds with proper sobriety. The benefits of such policies could at least be passed on in the form of lower tuition and higher salaries. The paradox here is that tuition at Columbia has risen faster than the cost of living, while faculty salaries have barely kept pace with the rate of inflation. The only reason why there has not been a mass faculty exodus to schools which offer $4,000 to $5,000 per annum above Columbia's salaries at the associate professor level is that the artistic, intellectual and commercial fringe benefits of New York City subsidize the cost of keeping the faculty in place. On the other hand, the reason why the trustees have not been able to pay the faculty at the going market rate—according to a recent analysis of the fiscal condition of private universities carried out by the Ford Foundation—is that they have been unduly conservative in their investment policies. There has been too much concern with mortgages, not enough with common stocks. (The only institution with greater real estate holdings in Manhattan is the Catholic Church.) In other words they have been acquiring real estate—and thus making a mess of community relations—in the name of an investment policy which crippled the university's finances.

The trustees' capacity to subordinate social values to a false sense of economy is well illustrated in the case of the Strickman cigarette filter. In that instance the president of the university proposed to link increments in faculty salaries to the sale of carcinogens. On the basis of wholly inadequate research and testing, Dr. Kirk himself gave what amounted to a TV commercial in which the university urged the public to buy its filter because it produced less tar per puff. Kirk was later obliged to withdraw this claim under questioning by the U.S. Senate Commerce Committee, and subsequent tests carried out by qualified members of the university prompted the administration to abandon its plans for cashing in on the cancer business.

There are further indignities for which the faculty might have been expected to hold the administration accountable. Not the least of these consists of a series of misrepresentations concerning the extent of university involvement with CIA cold-war research, especially through Columbia's Regional Institutes and the School of International Affairs. More immediate to the present crisis, however, was the assurance given by the dean of the Graduate Faculties to several hundred people in Low Memorial Library on March 23, 1967, that "Columbia has no institutional connection with IDA" (the Institute for Defense Analysis). Subsequently, student activists forced the administration to acknowledge that its graduate dean had been mistaken and that Columbia had been an institutional member of IDA since 1960. On March 30, 1967, IDA's vice president, Norman L. Christeller, informed the student newspaper: "We consider Columbia to be one of the three or four primary university sponsors of the IDA."

The most remarkable aspect of this confrontation between suspicious students and a less than candid or ill-informed dean, is that Columbia's connection with IDA was a public arrangement, the conditions of which were available to anyone who was curious enough to ask for IDA's unclassified reports. With one or two exceptions, however, Columbia's large contingent of pro-McCarthy, anti-Vietnamese War liberals (not to mention the politically apathetic center that makes up the majority of the faculty) remained ignorant of the university's tie with IDA or failed to grasp its significance. In this instance at least, the student activists carried out a genuine educational task on a matter of paramount importance to the entire university community. They did indeed educate their professors, however unorthodox their teaching methods.

Columbia's affiliation with IDA was institutionalized through a contract which named Grayson Kirk as a member of IDA's Board of Trustees. The chairman of the Board of Trustees of IDA is William A. M. Burden who, in addition to serving as a director of the Allied Chemical Corporation, American Metal Climax Corporation, Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc., Lockheed Aircraft Co., and the Manufacturers Hanover Trust Co., is also one of the trustees of Columbia University. In a brilliant example of the intellectual triviality of micro-focused political theory, Columbia's David Truman recently argued that Burden's additional affiliation with Columbia was a mere "accident." Other members of the administration have attempted to pooh-pooh the IDA tie on the ground that no substantial contracts have been established between IDA and Columbia for specific research purposes. (Kirk called IDA "a phony issue" on the C.B.S. program, Face the Nation May 5). Although it is true that direct contracts between IDA and Columbia have been negligible (one for $18,950 is known), IDA's influence on campus has been substantial indeed.

Through Lawrence O'Neil, former associate dean of Columbia's School of Engineering, the university has been deeply involved in projects coordinated by IDA. One of IDA's most important divisions is known as Jason. It is to the Jason Division that the Pentagon's Advanced Research Projects Agency assigned the task of coordinating work on the theoretical analysis of "ballistic missile defense and exoatmospheric nuclear detonations" (Science, 17 May 1968, Vol. 160, p. 746). O'Neil has been a steady consultant to IDA. O'Neil is also the director of what used to be Columbia's Electronic Research Laboratory, now called the Riverside Research Institute. Under O'Neil, the Electronic Research Laboratory enjoyed a budget of $5.5 million a year, much of it derived from classified research concerned with the development of radar systems for ballistic missile defense under contract with the above mentioned Advanced Research Projects Agency. No doubt this is another one of Dr. Truman's "accidents." Recently IDA has turned to research more directly associated with the Vietnamese War, concentrating on such projects as: Small Arms for Counter-Guerrilla Operations, Tactical Nuclear Weapons, Chemical Control of Vegetation, Night Vision for Counter-Insurgents, Interdiction of Trucks from the Air at Night, and Helicopter Aural Detection of Tactical Situations. The extent of the university's involvement in these projects is suggested by the fact that when adjunct professor of physics, Richard Garwin, a member of IDA's Jason Division, took a trip to the Far East early this year, he touched off a world-wide rumor that tactical nuclear weapons were to be used in Vietnam [see "The Secret Thinkers," by Michael Klare; The Nation, April 15].

In 1965 IDA noted that it "was proud to grace the pages of our report with scenes of the campuses of our Twelve Member Universities" (see Science, 17 May, 1968, p. 748). I invite my colleagues who have husbanded the political independence of their university, and who have scrupulously refrained from using Columbia's name in their off-campus activities, except for identification purposes, to reflect on the audacity of a unilateral administrative decision which committed the entire university to the support of developing weaponry systems for a military clique.

It was the students who pressed for the exposure of Columbia's contribution to IDA. Having collected 1,800 signatures on a petition requesting the end of the university's connection with IDA, 200 students entered Low Memorial Library to confront Grayson Kirk with their findings. They were told that they were in violation of a ban on indoor demonstrations, and five of their leaders were placed on disciplinary probation. To protest this action, the students called a rally. Attended by more than 500 sympathizers, the rally ended in an abortive attempt to enter Low Memorial Library. The students were deflected by the campus guards, veered off toward Morning-side Park, and pulled down the fence surrounding the gymnasium construction site. When one of the demonstrators was arrested by the police, the group returned to the campus. After some hesitation, they decided to invade Hamilton Hall, and to take a dean hostage in return, they said, for the student they had lost to the police. Thus the IDA issue met and fused with the gymnasium issue, leading directly to the strike and the big bust.

I share a feeling of repugnance with my liberal colleagues over the vulgarity and brashness of some of the actions of some of the students. A professor's sense of style is inevitably jarred by the crude slogans and tactics being used. From the students' point of view, however, there is, in turn, something seriously lacking in the faculty's style. From teaching too long, they apparently have forgotten how to be taught. They take their lessons very ungraciously and seem to want to make the students suffer for having achieved a superior understanding of the true nature of their university.

The failure of the administration to act quickly and seriously in response to various student charges concerning the university's complicity in the detested Vietnamese War contributed heavily to the breakdown of trust and communication between the student activists and their administrative counterparts. Columbia's destiny up to now has been under the control of a Board of Trustees consisting almost entirely of top-ranking businessmen—directors of more than sixty banks, insurance companies, utilities and manufacturing corporations including IBM, C.B.S., Con Ed, Ford, Equitable Life, Shell Oil, AT&T, Metropolitan Life, Irving Trust Co. and the Chase Manhattan Bank. Insofar as these men are leaders of bureaucratic empires which our best students associate with massive acts of social irresponsibility, evasion, hypocrisy and exploitation, their image is unsuited to attempts to establish cross-generational dialogues under the present circumstances. Nothing which the trustees of Columbia University have done during the past two years has indicated that the negative impression which they create on young minds thirsting for principled commitments to life and humanity is incorrect.

The disparity in class identity, and hence in social values, between the trustees and the majority of students, is clearly one of the fundamental causes of the strike and of the catastrophic bust. Contempt for the "establishment" has reached crisis proportions throughout wide segments of the youth of the developed nations. Too many people in the older generation have tended to ignore or dismiss these manifestations of distrust and disillusionment as mere youthful aberration. Thus, the final indignity suffered by the faculty was that the administration had let its relations with the student body deteriorate to the point where five of the university's buildings were under siege, with the rest of the university virtually paralyzed. And then to solve the problem, the administration declared itself irrevocably determined to precipitate an even larger catastrophe by inviting the police to attack its own students and professors.

Why didn't the faculty step in and demand that the administration grant amnesty or, at the very least, indicate that it held the administration to be as much in need of amnesty as the students? Why didn't the faculty indicate its own unalterable determination to oppose a solution through force? Evidently, most of the faculty refused to accept the students' arguments on behalf of amnesty. These arguments rested on the following principle: The seizure of the buildings had been carried out in order to awaken the university community to the ethical blunders of the IDA affiliation and of the gymnasium site. Due to the authoritarian structure of the university, there were available no adequate democratic means of redress. Hence, amnesty rather than punishment was required, since people should not be punished for bringing about changes which, as among the faculty, were widely regarded as necessary and just. It should be noted, furthermore, that most of the faculty were convinced, even before the police action, that student interests were inadequately represented at the university. Indeed, after the bust, dozens of committees were formed at the departmental level to begin the work of making the university more democratic, thereby confirming the strikers' contention that the normal avenues of protest and communication had previously been inadequate.

Nevertheless, most of the faculty apparently accepted the administration's view. According to Kirk and Truman, the strikers had been duped by a small band of fanatical agitators who were bent upon achieving a confrontation with authority. If amnesty were granted, these agitators would be back in the buildings every other week, and the university would be incapable of discharging its educational responsibilities. Although the administration admitted that the claims about the lack of democratic representation were in part true, it held that the students had violated the rule of law. According to Truman, law and morality are identical. Hence, the transgressors must be punished. In accepting these arguments, it must be supposed that the faculty were especially concerned about the rifling of Grayson Kirk's files by strikers who occupied the president's office in Low Memorial Library.

I believe that there is a connection between the mentality expressed in the Columbia administration's viewpoint and that which was responsible for driving this country deeper and deeper into the Vietnamese War. It is the domino theory, all over again. If we don't punish the revolutionaries for taking over the president's office, how are we going to stop them from taking over the entire university? The answer, as we have almost learned in Vietnam, is that if there are well-formed structural reasons for mass resentments against existing laws and authority, the dominoes have a good chance of falling no matter how many policemen are brought in to shore them up. The threat of radical political change cannot be met by strategies which are temporarily successful in the prevention of muggings or shop lifting. On Tuesday, April 23, there were only about 150 hard-core members of Students for a Democratic Society (and most of these were opposed to a confrontation). A week later, at the height of the strike, more than 6,000 students were actively expressing their hostility to the Columbia administration. Was this the work of a handful of superstudents whose demagogic skills proved too much for the honest defenders of the university's good name? The proposition is as absurd as trying to blame the Third World's hostility toward America on agitators like Che Guevara or General Giap. On Thursday, April 25, a referendum at Columbia, carried out under independent student auspices, showed that students were in favor, 4,093 to 1,433, of ending construction of the gymnasium. The vote for ending ties with IDA was carried, 3,572 to 1,855. (In large part the strikers in the buildings did not vote.)

It is clear that the original handful of protesters had been able to convince 1,000 of their fellow students to join them in the occupation of the buildings at great personal risk because the issues involved in the strike were relevant to the deeply felt social needs of additional thousands of students. To propose that amnesty would have meant recurrent invasions of Low Memorial Library at the whim of irresponsible anarchists is to insult the intelligence and to demean the social conscience of many of the university's brightest and most responsible students. They were not in those buildings to protest a ban on panty raids, or to demand higher grades or better food in the dorms. The issues involved were of supreme importance: racial prejudice and de facto discrimination; complicity of the educational establishment in the slaughter of an innocent peasantry. As long as the university's policies remain ambiguous on these issues, it can expect periodic visitations from larger and more militant striking bodies. Calling in the police at Columbia or elsewhere will only make such confrontations bigger.

I regard it as regrettable that the strikers broke into President Kirk's files and copied documents out of his private correspondence. But breaking into official files (the strikers refused to acknowledge Kirk's right to have secrets about Columbia) was not the worst offense. The most serious act was the overnight detention of the acting dean of Columbia College and two of his assistants in Hamilton Hall. This was the only instance in which the strikers could be said to have committed crimes against persons as opposed to crimes against property. After 5:00 A.M., Thursday, April 25, all of the white strikers left Hamilton Hall and the hostages were held until 3:00 P.M. by black students. In addition to holding hostages, some of the blacks (allegedly nonstudents) were said to have been in possession of firearms. These same students threatened the administration with the specter of mobs summoned up from Harlem who would burn the campus to the ground. When Rap Brown and Stokely Carmichael broke through the police barriers on Friday, April 26, to confer with the blacks inside Hamilton Hall, the very survival of the university hung in the balance.

Despite the violent nature of the threats which the blacks in Hamilton posed, the administration's strategy from the outset was to deal with the white students in the four other buildings on a separate and harsher basis. Mediators sent by the Mayor's office—William Booth, Theodore Kheel and Sid Davidoff—conferred with the blacks in Hamilton, but not with the whites in the other buildings. According to David Truman (as quoted in Newsweek, May 13), the blacks were immediately made "an offer of nothing more than disciplinary warning" (virtual amnesty). The reason for this special treatment, said Truman, was that the blacks were "a totally different cut as far as performance is concerned," as compared with the whites. "I must say I admire the way they conducted themselves." This novel form of racism appealed to others as well. At the Ad Hoc Committee, distinguished professors arose to plead for separate treatment of the blacks on the ground that they had behaved like gentlemen, while the whites in the other buildings were like wild beasts. Finally, late in the afternoon preceding the bust, when many members of the faculty knew that the police action was imminent, Prof. Lionel Trilling openly argued that the time had come for granting amnesty to the blacks and only to the blacks!

One of the consequences of this indulgent attitude toward black strikers was that none of the black students in Hamilton Hall was injured during the bust. They exited through underground tunnels under the watchful eyes of William Booth and Kenneth Clark. While Clark and Booth complimented the police on their exemplary handling of the black students, pandemonium reigned in front of and inside the other buildings. (Clark, however, later condemned the police action in the rest of the campus.) What was said to the black students in order to get them to walk quietly into the paddy wagons is a source of continuing speculation. The point here, however, is that many faculty members, who found the notion of amnesty abhorrent when applied to the white students, found themselves ready to forgive and forget when it came to the blacks—even though the blacks took hostages and constituted the gravest physical threat to the university.

It is clear that the harsher punishment recommended for the white students (and already received by them at the hands of the police) has nothing to do with principles of law and equity. There are plenty of precedents in the labor movement and in the civil rights movement in this country for granting amnesty to demonstrators who have committed trespass. Recently the Uniformed Sanitationmen's Association staged a strike in defiance of the laws of the state of New York. Their action resulted in the accumulation of refuse in the streets to the point of menacing the health of 8 million people. When Mayor Lindsay put their leader in jail, the Governor of New York, Nelson Rockefeller himself, granted him a pardon!

In the light of the recent history of Columbia's administration, it is difficult to accept Kirk and Truman's assurance that they took a hard line only because it slowly dawned on them that they were up against a completely cynical band of opportunists and demagogues. Everyone seems to have forgotten that an unprecedented shake-up in administrative personnel took place less than a year ago in which the provost and dean of faculties, the vice president and the dean of the graduate faculties, among others, abruptly resigned en masse. Truman, who was then dean of Columbia College, moved up to the specially created post of provost and vice president, leaving only an ineffectual acting dean behind him in the college. At the same time, the post of dean of graduate faculties was left unfilled. Thus during the month immediately preceding his fatal confrontation with the students, Truman was in virtually unqualified control of the statutory or de facto powers formerly possessed by two deans, the provost and the vice president!

Nor was this an "accident." The massive shake-up in question occurred shortly after the launching of Columbia's $200 million fund drive, the largest ever undertaken by a "private" university. To explain the sudden departure of almost every top-ranking administrator except Kirk, the university issued a statement in which the success of fund-raising activities was said to depend upon the greater centralization of administrative authority. The significance of this explanation was lost upon the majority of the faculty and students. The main problem in reaching the $200 million goal was not, as it then seemed, a question of lack of coordination and organizational diffuseness. Rather, the problem was that pressure from the neighborhood community and from the "radical" anti-draft and anti-war students threatened to blow the whole university sky-high. It is known, for example, that the former provost, Jacques Barzun, was unable or unwilling to control his contempt in the presence of neighborhood protesters. It was known also that former Vice President Lawrence Chamberlain was far too concerned about the disagreeable side effects which occur when unruly students are squashed down to size. His departure for a prolonged fishing trip in Colorado marked the end of ideology at Columbia. Truman took power precisely because he thought he knew how to keep the lid on, at least until the fund drive was completed: it was the hard line.

Almost exactly one year before the big bust, the pattern for disaster had been laid down in conformity with Truman's understanding of the science of campus politics. The SDS, in familiar possession of the university's jugular, was about to administer the coup de grâce to $200 million. They were seeking to prevent the United States Marine Corps from recruiting on campus. There had already been an ugly brawl when a group of college athletes attempted to clear out several hundred protesters who were baiting the Marines about Vietnam. The Marines left the campus, but they were scheduled to return the next day. What to do? The crowds would be bigger and both sides would be more eager for violence. Yet how could a needy American campus refuse to play host to those widely traveled, clean-cut patriots? The Marines came back, largely on Truman's assurance that he could maintain order. Two groups of opposing students, numbering perhaps 1,000 on each side, threatened each other throughout the day; but aside from a few minor fist fights, Truman's decision seemed to have been vindicated. Asked why he had chosen to risk the physical welfare of so many of his students on behalf of an organization which had nothing to contribute to campus life, and which did not lack for opportunities to get its message across to the nation's youth, Truman replied: "If we had given in, there would have been no end to their demands. We had to stand firm or they would eventually try to take over Low Library."

The students, outraged by the moral ambiguities of the administration's response to their substantive demands, escalated their own tactics to meet the challenge of Truman's campus Realpolitik. When the administration placed a ban on indoor demonstrations, they collected their 1,800 signatures and held a demonstration inside Low. Truman played the hard line again and tried to pick off the five most important leaders of SDS with disciplinary probations. Meanwhile, the fund drive was lagging and the pressures to keep the campus quiet were greater than ever. At some unknown point, well before the bust, it became clear to Truman that his career as an administrator was now wholly dependent on his ability to rid the campus of the band of agitators who refused to knuckle under to his textbook show of force. Similarly, the idea at some point got across to the students that only the most radical of measures stood a chance of deflecting Kirk and Truman from their determination to sanitize the campus and to ignore the justice of the students' substantive claims. I do not condone the student take-over of the university buildings, but I regard it as wholly undemonstrable that the administration was interested in providing the students with genuine alternatives.

After the bust, when Truman was asked at a press conference if he had any advice to give other college administrators, he replied without hesitation: "Don't wait. Call in the police." Apparently, he still believes that the only thing wrong with his hard line was that it wasn't hard enough (especially when he hesitated because a few faculty members had gotten in the way).

Four weeks after the bust the students were back in Hamilton Hall. In the "second battle of Columbia," another 170 students were arrested and an even more vicious and uncontrolled display of police brutality was unleashed across the campus. Flailing out on their own, with a premeditated disregard of constitutionally guaranteed rights of due process, the administration is moving toward the suspension or expulsion of perhaps as many as 500 of its students whom it has charged with criminal trespass. In this grim fashion political identities will be acquired by the various segments of the university. Members of the faculty, who have been so troubled to decide if they approve or disapprove of meeting the complaints of their students by wounding and expelling them, will have plenty of additional opportunities to make up their minds.

THE TIN EARS OF WAR

JACK ROBERTSON

Mr. Robertson is a senior science writer for Electronic News, which specializes in military technology; he is also a contributor to Where Do We Go from the Moon?, a book exploring post-Apollo space goals (Fairchild).

At 9:20 A.M. Tuesday, August 4, 1964 (Washington time), the National Military Command Center in the Pentagon got a "flash red" cable from Vietnam. The U.S.S. Maddox, Navy destroyer on a secret spy mission in the Gulf of Tonkin, reported enemy ships approaching. An attack appeared likely. Soon after came an intelligence report "from an unimpeachable source"—presumably from eavesdropping gear on the Maddox or her sister ship, the Turner Joy. North Vietnamese patrol boats had been ordered to attack.

By 11 A.M. wires were cascading into the war room. The Maddox said it had sighted what appeared to be the cockpit lights of patrol craft passing by in the ink-black night. The Turner Joy said two torpedoes had missed it. Intelligence reports, again probably from monitored enemy radio, said an attack was under way. Later intelligence overheard the enemy commander reporting that he had inflicted damage and shot down two U.S. planes.

The welter of messages now began to contradict one another. Former Defense Secretary McNamara testified that even now, three and a half years later, precise details of the August 4 incident are not fully certain.

Five hours after the first report, the war room got a most perplexing cable from no less than Task Force Commander J. J. Herrick: "Freak weather effects and overeager sonarmen may have accounted for many reports. No actual visual sightings by Maddox. Suggest complete evaluation before any further action." The Naval Commander in Chief in the Pacific phoned that he had no doubt an attack had taken place—but had doubts as to its nature and details.

Yet at 6:30 P.M.—four hours after the Pentagon was advised to go slow—the order went out to bomb North Vietnamese territory in retaliation. At 7:06 P.M. the Pacific Naval Command was still cabling the Maddox and Turner Joy to confirm the attack on them. That night, in the first major escalation of the war, the United States flew sixty-four sorties against bases in North Vietnam, destroying a third of the country's fuel storage. Two days later the Pentagon finished sifting all the Tonkin messages and concluded that an attack had taken place.

The Pentagon leaders spent a seven-hour talkathon at Senate hearings trying to justify the Tonkin-incited air strike, but hardly a word in the 110-page record answers Sen. J. William Fulbright's prefacing question: are we doomed to repeat this crisis confusion? As a case study of Pentagon crisis reaction, Tonkin Gulf can scare you out of your wits. It was based on sonar reports of enemy torpedoes, radar sightings of patrol craft, intercepted enemy messages, and the ships' own reports, former Secretary McNamara testified. All these factors could be present in any future confrontation.

Garbled sonar reports akin to those of the Turner Joy and Maddox are present continuously in U.S. military networks around the world. Few reach the brinkmanship level of Tonkin Gulf, but the confusion is just as great.

Some evidence now suggests the Turner Joy sonar may have picked up its own noisy engines at full speed. Or its own wake in the zigzag dodging to escape enemy boats. The Defense Department still does not explain what the "overeager sonarmen" actually saw. Comdr. Herbert Ogier, senior officer of the Maddox in 1964, now believes most of the echoes on his sonar scopes were from his own ship. Reached in Houston where he is NROTC commander, Ogier said the Maddox was making sharp turns to avoid the presumed enemy attack, and sonar picked up the ship's own rudder. However, the destroyer was not maneuvering when sonar detected what Commander Ogier believes were two torpedoes. As for Commander Herrick's caution on "overeager sonarmen," the former Maddox captain said: "There are sonarmen and there are sonarmen."

Sonar operators today face even tougher tasks. Nuclear submarines slink quietly through ocean depths, and sonar strains harder to detect faint echoes in the surprisingly noisy world of the sea. On top of this, the enemy has an arsenal of sound decoys and countermeasures to mask sub and torpedo noises. These sound "spooks" create false targets, blot out the sounds of the real threat. The Navy has developed electronic wizardry to sift this underseas bedlam, but it has not ended guesswork. The Maddox and Turner Joy, by their own reports, were hampered by no countermeasures. Even so, their sonar sightings were ambiguous.

Early-warning bomber and missile radars face the same perplexities. The Air Force operates radar networks so powerful that they could spot a grapefruit 1,000 miles in space. Not surprisingly, these giant antennae pick up thousands of mysterious blips—officially tagged Unidentified Target Data (UTD). Researchers at the University of Texas believe some of them to be insects.

Dramatic incidents may be isolated, and expert radar operators have learned to live with the myriad of smaller mystery targets. But in time of tension, could "overeager radarmen and freak weather effects" create another Tonkin Gulf? The builders of the Ballistic Missile Early Warning System (BMEWS) now laugh about the alert flashed shortly after the radars boosted power. The target? The full moon coming above the horizon. Radars were later adjusted to ignore the moon. Even "flying saucers" have shown up on radar screens. Allen Hynek, astronomer and chief Air Force investigator of Unidentified Flying Objects, confirms that U.S. jets once scrambled after a UFO sighting.

Department of Defense strategists are calling for even more sensitive warning nets—over-the-horizon radars that could reach all the way to the Soviet Union or China. This makes detection even trickier. Over-the-horizon radars bounce their signals off the ionosphere and get target echoes back the same way—much like short-wave radio. Just as one struggles to tune in the fluctuating and fading short-wave signal, over-the-horizon radarmen sweat to pick up an echo a hundred times weaker.

If there is an all-out missile attack, early-warning radars will certainly spot the skyful of terror. But what if only one or two suspicious targets are picked up? The white phone rings in the National Military Command Center, as in the Tonkin crisis. But now the warning time is twenty minutes—three minutes if it is a Russian FOBS suborbital bomb. How do you decide whether or not it is a live missile?

The Communists continually test our warning reflexes. Recently four Soviet bombers penetrated warning nets to within 150 miles of U.S. air space. The Canadian Government later disclosed previous probing flights. Russian tracking ships regularly ply international waters just off the East Coast. The State Department has confirmed four 1964 Soviet spy-ship intrusions inside U.S. waters. At least twice Soviet spy trawlers have shadowed our ships so closely as to collide with them. This Soviet “playing-with-matches” policy adds to alert jitters. (And there is every reason to believe that we also play the game.)

The Tonkin crisis also raises the question of decisions based on intercepted enemy messages. On August 4, the Pentagon relied heavily on four Communist messages to confirm the attack: (1) a command ordering the attack; (2) reports from the vessels that they were preparing to attack; (3) that the attack was under way; (4) the enemy commander's report after the attack that damage had been inflicted and two U.S. planes shot down (none were).

How reliable is the enemy as an “unimpeachable source” on his actions? In the Tonkin affair, intercepted enemy messages were as confusing as our own. If we add the enemy's own contradictions to our radio frenzy, have we clarified anything?

Sen. Albert Gore questions just how much stock we can take in exaggerated enemy reports—at least whether we should go so far as to base a major retaliatory strike on them. The United States is certainly enthusiastic about intercepted spy messages. The Air Force runs more than 200 eavesdropping radio posts around the world. It flies twenty “big-ear” spy planes, each as large as a Boeing 707 and crammed with monitoring gear. Snooping satellites fly over Russia and China to spy on radio communications. The Navy operates spy ships of the Pueblo and Liberty class and a flotilla of spy destroyers.

In any given crisis, the decision makers have a dossier of enemy messages. What's more, the enemy knows it. How then do we know when the enemy deliberately feeds us lies to mislead us in our eavesdropping? Electronic lying is an old ploy. World War II airmen at times falsified radio navigation signals to throw off the Japanese and German fighter planes and flak stations.

Today, electronic “spoofing” rivals Buck Rogers. Our radar bounces off an enemy target, but he changes the radar signal before sending it back to us. We get a completely fake target—and sometimes no target at all. Planes and missiles regularly fire decoys to throw off enemy radars and heat flares to confuse infrared-tracking missiles. There are even decoys for decoys—to cause a plane to exhaust its flares and radar chaff on a false target and become a sitting duck for attack. In such mayhem, can a future Tonkin Gulf separate bogus from real targets?

Time delays plagued the Pentagon in its Tonkin deliberations. Hours after the first alert, the war room was still trying to get reliable evidence of an attack. The nerve center has not improved greatly. In the more recent Pueblo spy-ship seizure by North Korea, the President was not notified until two and a half hours after the alert. By this time the Pueblo was already secured by the Communists and there was no chance for action. For the pickings, the Communist world got a first-hand inspection of the latest U.S. spy gear, throwing U.S. world-wide intelligence operations into a quandary.

The Defense Department is now setting up a world-secure “hot line” so that the war room, or the President, can talk directly to any commander in the field. Eventually this “white-phone” network may be extended to talk to the front-line soldier himself. Even so, the new million-dollar network may not solve the problem. If the President had been able to talk directly to the Maddox on that August 4, could he have learned any more about the contradictory reports?

The pitfalls possible in crisis decisions do concern the Defense Department. The Joint Chiefs of Staff compiles study on top of study of decision making. Even the Tonkin deliberations are the subject of a top-secret investigation, “Command and Control of the Tonkin Gulf Incident, 4-5 August, 1964.” Believed written by the high-level Weapons Systems Evaluation Group, the report should make interesting reading. Unfortunately, the Pentagon has dodged releasing it.

The Fulbright committee did release an anonymous letter from a Pentagon inner-circle worker. “One of the things your committee should really look into is the constant use of security regulations to conceal the blunders in the field of national security. . . . Right now the Joint Chiefs of Staff is refusing materials in their field wanted by people working on Vietnam for the Secretary of Defense, most obviously because they are fearful it would serve the Secretary of Defense's purposes, not theirs.” Pentagon leaders dismiss the charges as coming from “faceless accusers.” But other Americans besides the nameless defense employee may share the concern.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Through the Lens of Social Vision

LEWIS W. HINE AND THE AMERICAN SOCIAL CONSCIENCE. By Judith Mara Gutman. Walker & Co. 156 pp. $12.50.

TOWARD A SOCIAL LANDSCAPE: Bruce Davidson, Lee Friedlander, Garry Winogrand, Danny Lyon, Duane Michals. Edited by Nathan Lyons. Horizon Press. 67 pp. $4.95.

12 PHOTOGRAPHERS OF THE AMERICAN SOCIAL LANDSCAPE. Rose Art Museum. Catalogue of a show. Brandeis University.

ALAN TRACHTENBERG

Mr. Trachtenberg teaches English and American studies at the Pennsylvania State University.

The meaning of the depression was created as much by the camera, in the work of Walker Evans and Dorothea Lange and the entire Farm Security Administration project, as by lists of statistics and political rhetoric. The images certainly have a superior staying power; history reaches us concretely, in postures of people and in palpableness of textures. It can be said that the camera is chiefly responsible for our point of view toward the depression. The intention of the FSA project was not polemical; it was a form of anthropology, undertaking a comprehensive photographic survey of American social life for the record. But the feeling which emerges from the thousands of prints made under its auspices is one of complete engagement between photographer and subject. The camera became an instrument in a self-conscious search for identification and for the meaning of a historical moment. This engagement, with its compassion for the poor, its regret for the assault of technological change upon rural society, its indignation at economic injustice, accounts for the prevailing idea of strength and resistance to social forces the pictures communicate. In mass they constitute a remarkable document of hope.

Lewis Hine's work, with its freely accepted rhetorical purpose of protest and reform, is an unmistakable precedent for the social photography of the 1930s—and just as unmistakably a stark contrast to the work of contemporary photographers of the "social landscape." The difference between Hine and Robert Frank, Bruce Davidson, Lee Friedlander, Garry Winogrand, and others represented in these monographs (both based upon exhibitions) is in part a difference between the social scenes of 1910 and 1960. But more important is the dramatic difference in point of view toward the respective scenes, in commitment and in intention. Fundamentally it is a difference in social vision, and can thus serve as a revealing measure of intellectual and moral changes in American life.

Lewis Hine was a classical social documentist. He was driven by a hatred of injustice and a belief in good will as a means toward social change. His work serves as a form of historical memory, a record of formative experiences in American society early in this century. Immigration, urban poverty, agricultural and industrial working conditions—these were the general headings within which he produced his "photographic documents of social conditions, 1905-1939" (his title for a comprehensive collection now at the New York Public Library). For Hine the camera was an instrument of social analysis and the picture a means of persuasion. His images are icons of a social system. With the same quiet, unassuming impersonal persistence with which Atget explored Paris streets making documents pour artistes of stone façades, street types and shop windows, Hine traveled exhaustively, through New England, the South, the Middle West, recording his evidence of American life. In many cases his subjects were "given" in the nature of assignments from such groups as the National Child Labor Committee, the Red Cross, the TVA and the WPA. But the "historical record in pictures" (another of his titles) he produced derived more from his intuitive response to the revelatory images as they appeared on his ground glass than from any programmatic criticism of American society.

The task of assembling a collection of Hine's work, in order to represent him accurately as a major artist, is formidable. The condition of available prints and negatives is often poor; many of his negatives are lost, leaving only abominably printed pictures in books and magazines as the sole version of some of his finest work. Beaumont Newhall has pointed out that in true documentary photography not only is subject primary but the final print as an object for itself is very much secondary. Documentary photographs are meant to be seen and felt as widely as possible; they are meant for the mass media, not for gallery hangings. Hine did much of his early work for charity and reform journals, for reports and bulletins (he began photographing in 1905, and had the first of three shows during his lifetime in 1920). In the past decade the several collections of his work have been mined for illustrations of poverty, of pre-World War I city scenes, and of working children, for magazines and books and advertisements. Many of these pictures, especially of wan and sallow girls operating spinning machines, have become standard public images of past conditions. As a figure, even as a name, Hine is far less known than several of his pictures—perhaps attaining thereby the status of authentic anonymous folk artist.

A thorough survey of available materials, biographical as well as photographic, is the first step toward preparing this figure for study. And this groundwork has been undertaken with talent and efficiency by Judith Mara Gutman. Her book is the result of impressive research, and her bibliography, especially of magazines and books in which Hine's pictures first appeared, is an excellent and generous contribution.

To rescue him from anonymity, Mrs. Gutman wants to present Hine within the context of American social and intellectual history, and at the same time to establish his importance as an artist on aesthetic grounds. A lengthy introduction, written with enthusiasm, places Hine in relation to "the American social conscience"—particularly in relation to the reform impulse in the progressive period. Mrs. Gutman conveys sympathy for Hine's personal struggles, especially against neglect of his work as a photographer. Also, the introduction suggests an approach to the pictures which takes into account the broad outlines of Hine's response to urban, industrial America, a response, Mrs. Gutman argues, rooted in rural, Midwestern values. An alternation between city and nature, between images of oppressive factory labor and satisfying handicraft labor, she points out, pervades Hine's work. The approach is thus quite helpful in reconstructing a pattern of interaction between artist and society, between art and social reality.

At its best all writing about photography seems redundant in the presence of the pictures. Mrs. Gutman quotes Hine himself saying in 1909, "the picture is a symbol that brings one immediately into close touch with reality In fact, it is often more effective than the reality would have been, because, in the picture, the non-essential and conflicting interests have been eliminated." The author's own most important interpretation of Hine lies in her selection and arrangement of his symbols of reality. As a picture editor she makes certain choices one may question ("Long Leaf Pine," which shows that Hine had an eye, though not an extraordinary one, for nature, seems a curious print with which to open the section on immigrants); but all editorial selections are bound to raise questions. It would have been helpful if the editor had included somewhere a clear statement of her principles of selection; aesthetic and historical considerations seem often to vie with one another. But on the whole the group of pictures provides a valuable guide to the variety of subjects and treatments in Hine's canon: immigrants, working children, adults afflicted by industrialism, World War I refugees, the construction of the Empire State Building, and rural life in the 1930s.

The largest group of pictures is of children. These are Hine's most powerful and affecting photographs. Most of them were made as documents for charity and reform organizations; they are an epic assault on child labor, which is redefined in these images as child desertion, heartless and self-indicting. These pictures are an equivalent to Blake's Songs of Experience, a vision of innocence debased and exploited by an inhumane social system. They serve the coup de grâce to the 19th-century American cult of the child, a rebuke to genteel idealizations. "There is such a thing, in the United States," wrote Henry James in 1907, "as the freedom to grow up to be blighted, and it may be the only freedom in store for the smaller fry of future generations." Hine provides the visual testimonials to what James in the same passage called "the weight of the new remorseless monopolies."

The image of innocence betrayed is also an image of innocence affirmed. Hine's pictures of blight imply a social conscience and the possibility of change by appeal to that conscience. The iconography of his pictures insists upon identifying a definite social reality for the sake of suggesting what needs to be changed. Characteristically, his pictures project social reality through perceived relationships: children to adults and to machines, to factory gates and closed doors. He rarely allows a figure to isolate itself from a setting.

Sometimes the relationship allows for an easy irony: a little newsboy in dirty shirt and worn boots strides manfully along on a street corner in Washington, heading right for the camera, a bundle of papers, his man-sized "burden," under his arm; to the left, having just crossed his path, is a ludicrously bosomed society dame, her attention drawn momentarily toward the camera but not enough to stop her haughty gait—and surely she has hardly noticed the boy—the plumes of her hat, the shine of her boots, the leather of her gloves, all setting her in a social world alien to newsboys and indifferent toward them: in the background, the wide, clean avenue and the white stone of a government building in the baroque capital—high society and the state both ignoring the social realities spawned by their system (in 1909 Hine illustrated a book on Washington slums, Neglected Neighbors in the National Capital, in which he uses the dome of the Capitol building as the central ironic symbol in several pictures).

A less obvious commentary is made in a picture of a small newsboy sitting in a doorway, catching some sun and browsing, like an adult, through one of his papers. He is flanked by two well-dressed, derbied men, probably drummer types, each slouching on iron railings on either side of the doorway, sunning themselves, bemused by the passing scene. Nothing sinister at all—except that no one in the group is aware of any of the others. The commentary resides in the visual impact of such inner preoccupa-

The legalized racket of Life Insurance and what you can do about it

The Mortality Merchants

by G. Scott Reynolds

A lot of so-called "benefits" in your life-insurance policy go straight into the pockets of the industry. This book, by a licensed insurance-investment broker, tells you how to beat the life-insurance companies at their own game — pay a lot less, get a lot more protection.

"Deserves to be widely read and pondered . . . clarifies the issues and adds to the consumers' range of informal choice."—SENATOR PAUL H. DOUGLAS $4.95

The Realities of Chemical and Biological Warfare

The Silent Weapons

by Robin Clarke

In World War I, the use of poison gases scandalized the world. Now, in this book, a British science editor makes it chillingly clear that the major powers have today the know-how—and the secret lethal equipment—to contaminate the air we breathe and incapacitate or kill all who breathe it. The Silent Weapons shows that today's scientists are producing in test tubes an arsenal of weapons whose potential destructiveness rivals that of The Bomb. In addition to giving the facts, Mr. Clarke raises disturbing moral questions concerning the "silent weapons." $4.95

DAVID McKAY COMPANY, INC.
New York, N. Y. 10017

tion which isolates each from the other, especially in the presence of the virtually deserted newsboy. The whole social system is implicated in that image.

As in the case of Atget and Paris, Hine's pictures are not merely records of city streets but of the artist confronting and interacting with the evidence. Hine's pallid girls, posing forlornly in corridors formed by dark metallic spinning machines, are pictures of his own responses to the scene. His signature, like Atget's, is a firmly maintained distance, a respect and a refusal to sentimentalize and exploit the children for the sake of self-congratulatory emotion. Hine knew his material so well—it was the kind of material which allowed for uncomplicated emotion—and came to know and master his camera as an instrument of his knowledge, that it was unnecessary to interfere with the process of seeing by adding "artistic" touches of studio lighting, fuzzy focusing or contrived poses. His aim was to allow the essential reality to express itself, as it does in the dull eyes and hardened hands and mouth sores of his factory angels. You feel with Hine's best work as with Walker Evans' that the details of the picture from border to border fill out entirely and contain to the fullest the artist's intention; it is a feeling of an identification between the compassionate eye and its drastically selected object, complete and final and innocent.

And something else, more difficult to define: a sense of the picture retaining the quiet drama of the original confrontation between subject and artist, a confrontation in which the subject, perhaps for the first time in his blighted life, senses himself being taken seriously as a human being. As the child looks out at you from these haunting pictures, you feel that he is looking not at you but at himself, seeing himself as a consequence of being seen. This quality makes Hine's best photographs human documents in a very moving sense: they are human-making images.

Isolation, inner preoccupation and social dislocation also mark the contemporary work, but social causes are not nearly so clear to the eye. The typical relationships in the new social landscape seen by these young photographers are fragmented, disconnected, obscure: a television set playing to an empty bed, random reflections of faces superimposed on reflections of cars and furniture in store windows, empty interiors of laundrettes, subway cars, automobiles. The new images are often swift, taken on the run, of moving things from moving things. Perspective is rarely defined as a clear position, either physical or moral, outside the subject; they propose, with very rapid cameras, to present a view of the city from within. There is no effort to judge but instead to express. The snapshot or the passing glimpse seems the appropriate vehicle for a society which has lost a sense of whole relationships. It is also appropriate that many of the glimpses contained in these volumes show man-made but uninhabited landscapes: emptiness conveys the leading feeling of social desolation.

On the whole this is brilliant work, but deeply disturbing and disengaging. The irony is far more subtle, sophisticated and literary than Hine's rhetorical irony, which always points to an obvious discrepancy between norm and reality. An example is Lee Friedlander's magnificent picture of an American flag laid out in what appears to be a grocery store window, part of the display, flanked by tin cans; to the right, out of deep shadows, the foot of an old woman appears, shoe, ankle, part of calf, and nothing more. We are removed from her, even from knowledge of her, as the flag and its meaning is from the canned foods. The textures are all commonplace: dirty concrete pavement, tin, some kind of artificial composition at the base of the store window, creased leather, flesh and bone encased in heavy stocking. The meaning comes to us through the juxtaposition of these materials—the limp spread-out flag, the canned food, the foot. It is a juxtaposition utterly devoid of comprehension. We are not invited to inquire what it means, how it happened, or why, but only to accept it and experience it as disconcerting meaninglessness. There is no humor blacker than this.

In such a perceived landscape irony assumes a function much different from Hine's: it becomes self-protection, and thus the wit itself is an index to an underlying social point of view. These pictures contain no emblems of hope or even comprehension. More than specific landscapes or icons, they represent acts of seeing, a style of response in which the act itself contains the commentary: detached, high-speed, micro- and telescopic. The anatomy is exposed cold-heartedly. Apathy, loneliness, anomie, are not simply reflected but ingrained in the chrome and formica and plate-glass surfaces which carry their distortions to the eye. Many of these pictures can be read as illustrations to the themes of alienation and debasement of popular culture, discussion of which passed for our most serious social analysis until recently. For this reason the photography of the new social landscape runs a risk of triteness, of overstatement to the point of cliché. But many of these works seem, like Pop art, to embrace the cliché. They seem mordant celebrations of a plastic environment. In a deserted drive-in movie (it is daylight), the blank screen addresses little listening posts arranged neatly like so many soldiers. Prefab houses crowd the brow of a ridge above the screen. Not a soul in sight. Probably all inside watching TV. Glutted with artifacts, with artificialities, this social landscape suffocates. The word "social" itself becomes a bitter joke. Many of these pictures leave the feelings paralyzed, gripped in fear and mystification.

Although this inclusive account necessarily blurs the many distinctions among these dozen or so photographers, they all share a vision of a directionless affluence. Hine's children have been liberated from the mills, but the victory over poverty and exploitation seems hollow. This is, of course, the inner sense of these new pictures. Social landscapes shift in the eyes of the observers, and the outward scene, the reality created by photography, originates in part within. We can expect images of social landscape to reflect transformations in cultural value, in social desires. In this sense social documentary can serve as a guide to the inner landscapes of our time.

ON YOUNG RADICALS

However we judge the young radicals, to describe their search is to enumerate the problems of our changing, affluent, and violent society, a society that has barely begun to catch up with the dilemmas it has created. The new radicals are right when they argue that our problems lie deeper than a particular election result or a particular war in Southeast Asia. Ours are in fact the problems of a new kind of society trying to find its way in a new kind of world where cataclysm is only a button away. Few of us know how to live wisely and well in such a world: that fact is reflected in the deep malaise, violence, and inner divisions of America and the world. The new radicals are at least confronting the central issues of our time, and confronting them more directly than most of us can afford to. They are asking the basic questions, making the mistakes, and perhaps moving toward some of the answers we all desperately need.

From Young Radicals: Notes on Committed Youth by Kenneth Keniston (Harcourt, Brace & World, $5.95). A study of a group of young people, during the months of June to September, 1967, involved in Vietnam Summer, an organization opposing American policy in Southeast Asia. A section of this book appeared under the title "Young Radicals & the Fear of Power" in The Nation, March 18.

From Elegant to Hip

TELL ME HOW LONG THE TRAIN'S BEEN GONE. By James Baldwin. The Dial Press. 484 pp. $5.95.

ROBERT EMMET LONG

Mr. Long will teach English at Queens College in September. He has written for Commonweal and The North American Review.

In Advertisements For Myself (1959), Norman Mailer patronized James Baldwin as "too charming a writer to be major." He called him too genteel and aerated to tell off his readers in four-letter words, and added that "one itches at times to take a hammer to his detachment, smash the perfumed dome of his ego, and reduce him to what must be one of the most tortured and magical nerves of our time." Two years later, in "The Black Boy Looks at the White Boy," Baldwin defended himself against Mailer's charges, declaring his right to his detachment, his commitment to be, simply, an artist. But Mailer's criticism was prophetic, and may even have been influential. For Baldwin has almost ceased to be an artist, and has indeed become a tortured nerve.

Notes of a Native Son and Nobody Knows My Name are works of rare distinction in contemporary American writing, expressing a passionate outrage at the social injustice, racial bigotry and ignorance that destroy both the oppressed and the oppressor. In these early essays, Baldwin's intelligence functions brilliantly, coolly, preserving always a sense of proportion—seen in the arrangement and progression of the essays that operate on different levels at once. There is first the personal anguish of the writer, "a confessional" role that is subordinated to the larger issue of all of black America, and its demand for human dignity. Then there is the question of America itself, and its search for identity in its past and present. Many of Baldwin's best insights illuminate our national psychology, and he is able to do this because his anger is held in poise by his desire to see clearly and to understand justly.

This was the early James Baldwin, the young man who wrote in polished sentences for Partisan Review, and although his audience was as yet limited, his promise seemed great. Baldwin's second novel, Giovanni's Room (1956), was part of this early period. His worldly characters (all of whom are white) and Parisian setting, his attempt to strike an "intelligent" and detached tone—indicate that Baldwin was allying himself with the novel of Henry James. Giovanni's Room was unsuccessful however; and not because it was too intelligent, too raffiné but because it was not intelligent enough. At the core of the novel, there was a mawkish self-pity for the victim of society whom Baldwin had himself sent arbitrarily to the guillotine.

The Baldwin of Tell Me How Long the Train's Been Gone has abandoned his admiration for James, together with his earlier poise and detachment. Where he had once worked for a "civilized" tone, he now assumes a hipster stance, contemptuous of the "square" world, by which is meant everything that has to do with the white man's assumptions. There is little aesthetic control in Tell Me How Long the Train's Been Gone; the novel sprawls (Baldwin had once practiced austere economy), its characters hardly created, and the flashback and flashback-within-flashback technique is handled awkwardly. His once polished prose now seems lusterless, and his diction fluctuates incongruously from the elegant to the obscene. His insights are unremarkable and blurred.

Tell Me How Long the Train's Been Gone is the life story of Leo Proudhammer, a 39-year-old Negro actor who suffers a heart attack as the novel opens. He has driven himself too hard estab-

"Nothing shall change the truth of our innocence." — Ethel Rosenberg

In remembrance of Ethel and Julius Rosenberg on the 15th anniversary of their execution

In anticipation of Morton Sobell's release within the year...

MEMORIAL MEETING AND CONCERT

Honored Guests

Rabbi Balfour Brickner, Director of the Commission on Interfaith Activities of UAHF

Dr. Emily Alman, Associate Professor of Sociology, Rutgers University

Edith Segal ■ Walter and Miriam Schneir ■ Rose Sobell ■ Helen Sobell

Jeff Killion leading baritone with the American Opera Company.

Carnegie Recital Hall, 154 West 57th Street, N.Y. C.
Wednesday, June 19th, 7 P. M. ■ No Admission Charge

Committee to Free Morton Sobell, 150 Fifth Ave., NYC 10011 Tel: 243-6030

lishing his talent against the odds a Negro faces in the theatre. In a series of flashbacks, we review his early humiliations in his boyhood Harlem, his apprenticeship in a summer stock theatre in New Jersey, his Bohemian years in the Village, his first success that starts him to the top of his profession. The ending is bright with photographers' flash bulbs, as the great Leo Proudhammer is interviewed by the press, and receives the homage of a grateful nation. But Leo Proudhammer is not happy, although he has fame, power, wealth and love. Indeed, he can barely control the hatred he feels for the mental suffering he has endured at the hands of white America. He denounces Christianity as the white man's swindle of the Negro; the creature of his bosom is a young black nationalist who, at the end, goes off to buy guns.

If Baldwin's theme is the failure of love, American coldness and callousness that set up artificial barriers between human beings (it is the theme also of Giovanni's Room and Another Country), the counter-theme is love's redemptive power. Love's redemption is meant to be shown in a scene in which little Leo and his older brother Caleb engage in an act of mutual masturbation; in a sense, this scene speaks for the immaturity of the whole book.

But Tell Me How Long the Train's Been Gone is more than a novel with an argument, as are Sinclair's The Jungle and Richard Wright's Native Son. For the novel takes much of its interest from, and is centered upon, the sex life of Leo Proudhammer, who is a virtuoso, bedding down alternately with females and males. A young white Southern heiress named Barbara King devotes her life to him, and many others—Negro and white, male and female—fall in love with him during the course of the novel. Since Leo bears a certain resemblance to Baldwin himself, one feels that psychological strategies and fantasies are being acted out in Leo's conquering prowess as a bisexual; that he is in fact passive; and that his fury and rage against whites is an inversion of self-hatred. If Baldwin has bared his ego in Tell Me How Long the Train's Been Gone, it turns out to be a very large one, haunted by bad dreams. In the end, ego reduces the novel to a work of self-indulgence.

Lure of the Polar Profits

THE POLAR PASSION: The Quest for the North Pole. By Farley Mowat. Little, Brown & Co. 302 pp. 210 illustrations and maps. $15.

RUSSELL W. GIBBONS

Mr. Gibbons has written on the subject of American Arctic exploration for the journals of the Stefansson Collection at Dartmouth College, the Department of Northern Affairs in Ottawa, and the Centre d'Etudes Arctiques in Paris.

If for no other reason, the fact that even the once isolated Thule Eskimos of northern Greenland now have the dubious distinction of joining the farmers of Palomares, Spain, in the category of having a "lost" hydrogen bomb in their neighborhood, Americans might be prompted to dig out a map of the North Polar regions.

If they do so, an examination of some of the most forbidding and remote parts of North America will reveal an assortment of many of the names identified with the robber baron era of American capitalism: Cape Thomas Hubbard, Morris Jesup Land, Cape (James) Colgate, etc.

This was no coincidence, of course. Explorers of the late 19th and early 20th centuries were not wholly visionary in their quest for Polar glory; they were in many instances pragmatic enough to finance their journeys by pre-selling names of yet undiscovered landmarks to rich patrons. All of which is not just incidental intelligence in the thread which is woven through Farley Mowat's latest book, The Polar Passion.

Mowat has not become as well known as he perhaps should be outside of Canada. His Westviking, a tour de force on the Viking visitations to North America in pre-Columbian times, came out about the same time as the Vinland Map. But it was his earlier books, People of the Deer and The Desperate People, that established him as somewhat of a Rachel Carson of the North: his accounts of the sufferings among the Canadian Eskimos demonstrated that the United States did not hold a complete monopoly of Bourbonism and stupidity toward its first inhabitants, and the books were a significant factor in an official awakening toward the Eskimos' plight.

The Polar Passion is a very large collection of difficult to obtain accounts of explorers who sought what Mowat describes "as that peculiarly non-objective yet passionately desired Holy Grail of so many men—the North Pole," woven into a consistent and patterned narrative. Through them we gain some insight into the actual lure of the Pole.

It would be too simplistic to say that the same motivations that propelled Cortez, a bandit with a royal commission, toward the discovery and exploration of Middle America (greed) also motivated Americans, Britons and Scandinavians in the race for the Pole. There was, of course, the constant quest for the Northwest Passage and the addition of land to Empire, not to mention nationalistic pride. The story of Polar history which Mowat helps to relate is of particular worth because he develops for us the character, the morality and the values of people so often glossed over by uncritical contemporary biographers or journals.

The American Army expedition commanded by Lt. Adolphus Greely, for instance, was a fatal fiasco because Greely refused to seek any help from the Etah Eskimo tribe, less than 30 miles away from the camp where seventeen of his men died in 1884. Others saw the Eskimo as a source of money and exhibitionism. Robert E. Peary, a civil engineer attached to the U.S. Navy, who advanced his career through political intimates of both Democratic (McKinley) and Republican (Theodore Roosevelt) Presidents, took a meteorite from Cape York, Greenland, where it had for centuries been a source of Eskimo knives and arrowheads, as well as ancestral treasure, and transported it to New York. There it was sold to Morris K. Jesup, the philanthropist who established the American Museum of Natural History. Peary also brought back six of the "Arctic Highlanders" as they were called then. Two men, a woman and two children died within a year, but first they had been exhibited at Jesup's museum. The survivor, educated by a museum employee, related in later years that the skeleton of his father had been preserved in the museum.

The controversy over the discovery of the Pole has been distasteful to most geographers (one describes it as "the most dismal and undignified episode in the history of exploration"), and too many historians ignored it because of the Great War and Woodrow Wilson. Mowat makes a significant contribution by placing in fascinating perspective the background of the two claimants to prior Polar discovery, Brooklyn physician Frederick Albert Cook and Peary, the naval engineer. History, as most schoolboys know, records that Peary discovered the Pole in 1909; Cook, if he is mentioned at all, is dismissed at best as a charlatan, although he maintained to his death that he reached the Pole a full year ahead of Peary, in 1908.

(An interesting contemporary aside to Mr. Mowat's most controversial thesis occurred last April, when a St. Paul, Minn., insurance man and three hardy companions demonstrated that Washington's redoubtable National Geographic Society has no monopoly on commercialized geography. At a reported cost of $250,000—and with the careful endorsement of companies that make everything from soup to flotation survival jackets—they literally drove to the North Pole in four snowmobiles, made sure that an Air Force weather plane spotted them at 90 degrees true north, and then took a charter plane back to civilization.)

Even biographers sympathetic to Peary's claims, have described him as domineering, arrogant and obsessed with a personal manifest destiny (upon his departure to the Arctic for his last Polar quest, he told benefactor Theodore Roosevelt that the exploration was "the work for which God Almighty intended me"). He was fully equipped for the savage dispute with Cook, his one-time shipmate and surgeon, who in an era of ruthless, aggressive goals was somewhat a babe in the woods. What outraged Peary and his supporters was Cook's reliance on his own resources and his faith in the Eskimos. The doctor had only $3,000 and the experience of almost two decades in the Arctic, sub-arctic Alaska and the Antarctic. He reached the Pole across the Arctic Ocean ice pack with few provisions, two sleds, a canvas boat and two young Eskimo helpers. Mowat relates what this did to the national honor:

... for Cook to tackle the Pole in such a casual manner when Peary had demonstrated to the world that only the most determined mobilization of American resources could do the job was to mortally insult not only Peary and his supporters, but the United States. Yet this is what Cook, in his incurable innocence, chose to do... he (Cook) represented no great body of savants and no consortium of wealthy interests; his methods were insultingly simple; he represented the wrong set of values.

The same financial backers of the "Peary Arctic Club" had highly placed friends in the well-heeled and influential commercial enterprise called the National Geographic Society, as well as the government: that their verdict as to who discovered the Pole would be Robert Peary was no surprise: what is surprising is that some historians half a century later still accept it while the once discredited Dr. Cook continues to gain acknowledgment by both European authorities and modern Arctic travelers.

In Europe the American physician-explorer has won new converts to the contemporary explorers who supported him (Amundsen, Nordenskjold, Sverdrup and Mikkelsen among them) and the Polar historians who accepted his journey after the emotions of the controversy had abated (England's J. Gordon Hayes and Germany's H. H. Houben). For more than a decade, the director of the Geographical Polar Institute of Italy has advocated Cook's prior attainment, acknowledged in atlases, reference volumes and geographical journals of that country.

The late Bernard J. Hubbard of Santa Clara University, who spent more than twenty years in the Arctic, corroborated Cook's original descriptions of the moving ice at the top of the world in his many flights over the Pole in the late 1940s. Rear Adm. Charles W. Thomas, Byrd's ice navigator in the Antarctic, first postulated the argument of ice island verification of Cook's claim, perhaps the strongest evidence in his favor and among the ex post facto findings which led a writer in the Journal of the Arctic Institute of North America to declare in 1966 that "Cook's own story of the polar journey is unassailable."

It remains as one of history's majestic ironies that Peary's reputation is inextricably bound up with that of his rival, Cook, for the ultimate judgment of their work will rest with their characters. Farley Mowat, in reconstructing their motivations, provides further evidence of Wilde's advice that the only duty we owe to history is to rewrite it.

Discrimination in Israel?

THE ARYANIZATION OF THE JEWISH STATE. By Michael Selzer. Black Star. 126 pp. $5.

THE END OF THE JEWISH PEOPLE? By Georges Friedmann. Translated from the French by Eric Mosbacher. Double-day & Co. 307 pp. $5.95.

RAPHAEL ROTHSTEIN

Mr. Rothstein is on the staff of the New York Times News Service, and has written for newspapers in Australia and Israel.

In an interview some months ago, Michael Selzer stated that The Aryanization of the Jewish State had received very little attention from the usual channels for reviewing and publicizing books. Mr. Selzer felt that his anti-Zionist book was suffering from the reluctance of book editors and radio and television commentators to be associated with criticism of Israel at a time when pro-Israel public sentiment is so strong. Selzer cited his experience with the Allan Burke Show, a TV talk program which features verbal parrying between Mr. Burke and guests holding eccentric or controversial views. After arranging with the author for a scheduled Saturday night appearance, the producers informed Selzer that he was being dropped from the program because the show preferred not to present a Jew critical of Israel. Reportedly, the producers would have no objection if Selzer had been an Arab, since anti-Israel Arabs are acceptable TV protagonists.

The argument of Selzer's book is that Zionism is anti-Semitic in origin, since it is a movement originally initiated by emancipated European Jews eager to create a de-Judaized state on the model of Western nations, without allowing for the cultural and social expression of Oriental Judaism. His thesis is not original; separatist movements in Israel have expressed variations of this theme, and anti-Zionist writers often emphasize the unnatural relationship between Westernized Israel and its geographical setting.

Unfortunately, the sensational aspect of Selzer's work, implicit in the book's provocative title, obscures the perceptive and worth-while analysis of Israel's social and political life that appears amid some romanticizing of the Oriental way of life and unrealistic theorizing about the possibility of "Orientalization" of the Jewish state.

Selzer's conviction that Zionism dominates and controls the instruments of Jewish life and thought in the United States is probably one reason why he chose to offer his work to the public in such a deliberately defiant fashion. A more conventional approach, the author

The Best Way To Get

THE
NATION

THE NATION

6-10-68

113 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

is likely to reason, would fail to obtain a forum for his ideas. Ironically, this is precisely what has happened despite Selzer's audacious attempt to link the behavior of Zionism with the crimes of Nazism.

Georges Friedmann, a French sociologist, has also pondered the unique character of modern Israel and wonders whether the native-born Israeli is really a Jew in the ways his brethren in other countries identify themselves as Jews. Like Michael Selzer, Mr. Friedmann sees the Jewish state as the culmination of Jewish historical aspiration, as well as a society strikingly different from the styles and attitudes of Jewish life practiced elsewhere in the world. This perception has led him to explore Israel as a means of formulating a projection of the future of the Jewish people.

His study is probably the best general work ever written about Israel. An admittedly assimilated Jew who first discovered the special meaning of Jewishness under the Vichy regime, Friedmann combines the rare talents of a disciplined scholar, an alert journalist and a cultivated and urbane commentator. He has also been fortunate in his translator, Eric Mosbacher.

Unlike many writers, both Jewish and non-Jewish, who are carried away with their "discovery" of Israel, Georges Friedmann maintains a finely balanced detachment tempered with sympathy and a growing identification. He is aware of the emotional challenge Israel poses and expresses this consciousness early in the book:

Visiting Israel is certainly a disturbing experience to any Jew, however peripheral or marginal a Jew he may be. It may rouse his enthusiasm or irritate him, but it will certainly shake him. If the most "assimilated" visitor stays there long enough . . . it will establish itself irrevocably in his heart and mind.

The author draws on studies by both foreign and Israeli sociologists and has amply supported his conclusions with footnotes indicating copious research. Friedmann's background in industrial sociology aids him in describing and analyzing the structure of organized labor and agricultural cooperatives. His chapters on the Histadrut Labor Federation and the kibbutz are lucid essays explaining the difficulties and contradictions confronting these important institutions, peculiar to Israel. I don't think any non-Israeli writer has ever described the Histadrut—a combination labor federation, capitalist developer and monopoly—so well.

Another significant contribution of The End of the Jewish People? is the discussion of the "second Israel"—the Oriental Jews of the Middle East and North Africa who came to Israel after the establishment of the state and who lacking in education and industrial skills, have been relegated to the lower level of Israeli society. These Jews are often referred to collectively as "Sephardim," a Hebrew term used for Jews of Spanish and Portuguese descent, who follow the Sephardic rite in their synagogues. But the "Sephardim" in Israel include Jews from the Arab countries of the Middle East and North Africa, and from India and Kurdistan, as well as the Ladino-speaking Jews who fled Spain and Portugal in the 15th century and settled in lands under Ottoman dominion.

The Sepharo-Oriental Jews form the majority—60 per cent—of Israel's population, as opposed to the Ashkenazim or Yiddish-speaking Jews of Eastern and Central Europe. Selzer calls the Oriental Jews "the outcasts of Israel" and charges that the Ashkenazi leaders of the Zionist establishment are committing "cultural genocide" by imbuing the majority group with a sense of ethnic inferiority and alienation in a Western-oriented nation.

However exaggerated the use of the term "cultural genocide" may be, there is some truth to Selzer's allegations. Jews of the "second Israel" are divided by an ever-widening gap from the affluent, European-style existence of the Ashkenazim. In any town or city in Israel one can observe large numbers of able-bodied, unemployed, Oriental Jewish men passing their days in neighborhood cafés and on street corners, while their families depend on welfare and the scant earnings of their many children who rarely complete elementary school. Bewildered by the social mores of a foreign and puzzling atmosphere, they cannot but respond to modern Israel as frustrated aliens, withdrawn into the idle way of life they knew in Morocco or Iraq. And Friedmann recounts conversations with French-speaking North African Jews in Israel that reflect the bitterness of people who feel discriminated against and betrayed by the Promised Land.

Education in "the broadest possible sense of the term" is Friedmann's proposed solution to the problem of disadvantaged Oriental Jewish youth. He suggests headstart programs and more primary schools where children could spend the whole day "in order to remove them from a family environment and living conditions that are unfavorable to learning." But he cautions that care must be taken to avoid cutting them off from their environment, and he echoes Selzer's concern that Israel's school system was devised by Ashkenazim and is often an impediment in achieving the integration of the Orientals.

The optimistic view of many Israelis that the ethnic problems will pass with time is belied by the facts, Friedmann writes. And he warns us that "in the absence of carefully considered, concerted, large-scale action, the material and moral gap between the two communities in income, living conditions, qualifications and mentality can only deepen." Both books warn of the possibility that the greatest threat to Israel's well-being may not, after all, come from outside the country but from its inner, unsolved problems.

THEATRE

ROBERT PASOLLI

You get through "Collision Course," an off-Broadway program of eleven plays at the Café Au Go Go, by holding it at arm's length, as you do the real life in the streets which inspires its psychically punishing production style. As the show careens around the tiny playing area at the café, hard, shrill and headlong, you avoid emotional contact if you can, for contact means, precisely, collision. The show's effect is alienation, an awkward stance to have to assume toward an art work, even if it duplicates a fundamental response to modern life. It is one thing to find a show hard to like, another to find it hard to take.

Edward Parone, the director of the production, obviously felt that a bill of eleven short plays required a homogeneous production style. His approach reflects a phase the theatre is going through, and for good reason. Words having been made suspect by the preposterous illegitimate uses to which they have been put on political and societal levels, many theatre people have lately turned their attention to nonverbal expression. Exhuming the theories of Artaud, the avant-garde has been developing the capacity of the theatre for kinesthetic, pictorial and abstract statement, frequently in alliance with dancers, painters and sculptors (who invented the happening). Jerzy Grotowski's experiment in environmental theatre in Poland have inspired innovative work in many countries, including in America that of the Living Theatre, the Open Theatre, the La Mama Troupe and the Performance Group. But this work necessarily redefines the traditional roles and relationships of actors, directors and writers, and it has so far succeeded only where the author has created his play in company with a performing group, or where the author is so dead and his work so rich that a troupe could slash, edit and radically reinterpret to its heart's content. Neither of those circumstances prevails in "Collision Course," the scripts of which were written for conventional production. That is, they need the sen-

NOW GENE McCARTHY IS NOT THE ONLY ALTERNATIVE BUT MORE THAN EVER, HE IS THE BEST ALTERNATIVE

All candidates talk about national unity. There is only one candidate who can inspire it—one candidate who can lead America out of the Vietnam quagmire without polarizing our society further. Gene McCarthy.

All candidates talk about new policies. Only one candidate isn't tied to old policies and old policy-makers. Only one candidate will bring new men along with new priorities to Washington. Gene McCarthy.

All candidates talk about democracy. Only one candidate had the faith to take his case to the people. Only one has truly revitalized the role of citizens in politics. Gene McCarthy.

McCarthy has the largest army of unpaid volunteers in the history of American politics. But the McCarthy campaign urgently needs money—large sums of money—to help pay for television time in the New York State primary.

We cannot—we must not—let America lose this unique opportunity for a new kind of politics.

McCarthy for President
815 17th Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20006

Enclosed is my check (made payable to McCarthy for President) for—— $500 —— $250 —— $100 —— $25 —— $ ——

Please let Senator McCarthy know that I believe in his kind of democracy.

(name)

(address)

(city) (state) (zip)

EDUCATIONAL

ARTHUR MORGAN SCHOOL, Burnsville 5, N.C.
Grades 7, 8 and 9. Co-educational, Quaker-related, informal. Work-study program.

PERSONALS

JOIN CEC CHINA CORPS

Beginning numbered list of pioneer volunteer Americans, all ages and occupations, whom CEC will prepare to "BUILD BRIDGES TO MAINLAND CHINA" as Vice President Humphrey suggests. For information, including N.Y. Times editorials on CEC non-political programs write:

CEC CHINA CORPS
CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS
Dept. N-6/10, 10 W. 46th St., NYC 10036

DISCOVER ■ fun way of meeting interesting, alert Jewish singles. For FREE analytical questionnaire write: OPERATION HAZEL TOV, 550
Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10022

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: write Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment
Trust, 30 East 42 Street, N.Y.C. 10017.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You ■ Team". For FREE questionnaire write:
TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York,
N.Y. 10016

BUTTONS, PEACE JEWELRY, POSTCARDS,
POSTERS, psychedelia, etc. Unusual merchandise. Good service. Wholesale to all. 10c brings exciting free catalogue air mail. FREE SPEECH, INC., 28 St. Marks Place, N.Y.C.
10003

HAND-EMBROIDERED INDIAN DRESSES—of hand-woven cotton, vivid colors, indigenous designs, free catalogue. Write: ANDEAN, Box 472-A, Cuenca, Ecuador.

HELP FIGHT JUNK MAIL. Send it back at THEIR expense. Labels and instructions $1.00.
Artichoke, P.O. 9123C, Bridgeport, Conn. 06601.

YOU CAN BE A CITIZEN DIPLOMAT TO RUSSIA THE "GLASSBORO WAY"

3 week Study-Exchanges

LEAVE NYC: July 10, 20, 30 &

Aug. ■ or MEET CEC in Moscow

CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS

Dept. N-6/10, 10 W. 46th St., NYC 10036

■ Telephone: (212) LT 1-8113

SITUATION WANTED

GENTLEMAN, semi-retired, needs work few days ■ week. Varied background. Group work. business. etc. A-409, 3429 Bellevue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90026.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c ■ line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
242-8400

THE REASON A MOUNTAIN NEVER CHANGES

The reason ■ mountain never changes is that the snow molds it into frozen permanence at ■ height even the sun can't reach. And like an ancient mammoth stiff in the ice the mile-high beauty stands everlasting.

*Down below, where we live (do we exclude Denver?), during the cold days, weather-reported Mother Nature, too much in a flurry to stay, snows to her doom below ■ skyscraped skyline;
the melting flakes feed expectant drainpipes, our own replacement for a mountain stream.*

ROBERT ROHR

sitive articulation by a director and actors of the authors' various intentions.
"Collision Course" is an example of rampant productionism applied to dramatic texts rather than fused with theatrical scenarios.

Some of the plays do submit to Parone's psychically and physically clamorous approach, but without yielding up their special qualities to it. In Lanford Wilson's Wandering, for example, a young man encounters the clichés which motivate the adults who structure his experience—parents, teachers, draft examiners, and so on. Parone takes the schematic structure of the play as justification for running it so fast and furiously that it whistles past almost unperceived. Another example is Rosalyn Drexler's Sky-writing, which depicts the arguing of a married couple and demonstrates that people close to one another argue for emotional release rather than for substantiation of the issues. But the production's ruthless emphasis on what the characters say draws your attention quite erroneously to the meaning of their meaningless statements, and the psychological point is buried.

Robert Patrick's Camera Obscura is best suited of all the plays to Parone's production. Here a man and a woman communicate over long distance via closed-circuit television, their anxieties compounded by the five-second lag between sight and sound. The progress they go from confusion to awkwardness to mastery to isolation (when their allotted time elapses) is tense, funny and touching. Since Patrick clearly intends the situation as a metaphor for the prevailing lack of face-to-face communication, the implications of technocracy is the subject of the play; hence Parone's production sets it off nicely.

Tour by Terrence McNally is the only play on the bill that is full and dense enough to assert itself against Parone's production. An American couple try hard not to be "your average American tourists" as they ride into the Italian countryside in a hired car driven by ■ young native whom they mistrust. Mc-Nally renders his fanciful situation with humor and exact observation but, quite wondrously, he alters his course halfway through. The wife has been preoccupied with her soldier son who is in Vietnam.

In her worry and misery she has been easily frightened by anything unusual on their trip. Gradually this affects her husband's studied bounce, and soon irrational fears have thoroughly unnerved the two of them. They alight from the car in order to pull themselves together only to be set upon by a group of mendicant monks, whom we do not see. Somehow the monks are transformed by the couple's misery and isolation into the maimed and wounded citizens crying out in Vietnam, and this forces the couple into ■ confrontation with a horror for which they know themselves to be responsible. As a frivolity, turning imperceptibly into a horror show, Tour is a virtuoso stroke.

Two light-weight and amusing plays are The Unexpurgated Memoirs of Bernard Mergendeiler by Jules Feiffer, in which a promiscuous couple manage to make love after she convinces him that sex is meant to seem dirty; and Chuck by Jack Larson, in which an epileptic magazine salesman proves to a housewife that reading magazines is better than watching television. (He has a fit in her doorway and then asks, "Wouldn't you rather read about me than see me?")
Israel Horowitz's Rats is a tense confrontation between a kingpin rat and a young rat out for his piece of the action.
The five other plays, which make little discussable impression, are by Leonard Melfi, Harvey Perr, Jean-Claude van Itallie, in collaboration with Sharon Thie and Martin Duberman. Among the cast
Sam Groom, Tom Rosqui and Susan
Browning excel in a variety of roles.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1253

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Get the picture here? Not very well, if in the position of the surrey top! (6, 4)
- 6 Shakespeare told the ladies to do it no more. (4)
- 10 Shoots holes into the things children like to ask. (7)
- 11 Indian, French or American animal. (7)
- 12 Some people take a lime mixture when given it. (4)
- 13 A body qualified to be charming? (10)
- 15 They're not very bright to suggest the Shakespearean players' tomb! (7)
- 16 Learns poorly, with nothing to supply the port. (7)
- 17 Implying an unknown article, rare and yellow. (7)
- 20 Improve one spot in the middle, when so threatened. (7)
- 22 and 24 down. Does it imply trouble for the scrub team? (10, 4)
- 23 Evidence of cold coming back, as the title shows. (4)
- 25 Once unrecognizable, born about the Tertiary period, in part. (7)
- 26 Not exactly equivalent to what a South American could give for thought. (7)
- 27 Afghanistan might be in the middle!
- 28 They're not likely to speak freely of anything. (10)

DOWN:

- 1 What one has to go through to call Paris! (It might involve settling accounts with such as de Gaulle!) (7, 8)

- 2 A number found in red and indigo? (7)
- 3 Game where you might get beat up (4)
- 4 The ones below are of older design.
- 5 Cuts out certain duties, perhaps. (7)
- 7 A child's protection lies in a sort of 23, especially when one drinks like one. (7)
- 8 The Third Amendment says they can't make your this! (The British have them anyway!) (9, 6)
- 9 A good selection of baggage available on the railway? (9)
- 14 Made somewhat paler after taking off a little weight? (9)
- 18 One runs out of such cells. (7)
- 19 Next to having a good sound receiver in the home? (7)
- 20 Not much pertains to the power in the flower! (7)
- 21 Stack one against another, and arrive at about equal conclusions? (7)
- 24 See 22 across

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1252

ACROSS: 1 Coconut custard; 9 Ugric; 10 Impromptu; 11 Tabasco; 12 Tarheel; 13 Reels in; 14 Nonstop; 16 Rings up; 19 Parable; 21 Insulin; 23 Sunbeam; 24 Appliance; 25 Learn; 26 Three-Penny Opera.
DOWN: 1 Counterirritant; 2 Caribbean; 3 Accosts; 4 Unicorn; 5 Capstan; 6 Sporrán; 7 Apple; 8 Double pneumonia; 15 Tableware; 17 Sulfite; 18 Penance; 19 Pastern; 20 Rinaldo; 22 Super.

PUBLICATIONS

THE CONSCIENCE OF A RADICAL By Scott Nearing

A book you should read.
Have it sent postpaid for $2 clothbound or paperback at $1.
Social Science Institute
Harborside Maine 04642

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! Used bargain lists. Fiction and non-fiction. Free search. Harco, Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032.

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

NEWSPAPER CRITICISM: Grassroots Editor gives fearless Bi-Monthly analysis of Significant journalistic developments. Three dollars yearly. Sample copy one dollar. Grassroots Editor, Journalism Department, Southern Illinois University, Carbondale, Illinois 62901.

DIRECTORY TO RADICAL PERIODICALS. Entire radical spectrum. $1.00. Alpine, Dept. 17, 1340 Geddes, Ann Arbor, Mich. 48104.

AGENTS WANTED

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION
Independent, lively, and original.
Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

CHRISTMAS CARDS—Business and Personal. Customer's name imprinted. Earn unusually high commissions from this medium- and high-priced line. No investment. No inventory. Free Sample Album. Process Corp. (our 47th year), 3430 S. 54th Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60650.

The Nation BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

- ☐ VIETNAM FOLLY
by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $3.95
- ☐ THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER by Ronald Sampson (Pantheon, $4.95) .. $3.95

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

6-10-68

^{OVER} NATION

a weekly journal which has believed for 103 years that the quality of our national discourse shapes the quality of our national life—and that that discourse becomes more vital, not less, in time of national crisis—

offers FREE with each NEW full year subscription your choice of the following books:

LBJ LAMPOONED: Cartoon Criticism of
Lyndon B. Johnson, intro. by Jules Feiffer ☐

BITTER GREETINGS: The Scandal of the
Military Draft, by NATION contributor
Jean Carper ☐

THE ACCIDENTAL PRESIDENT,
by NATION Washington correspondent Robert Sherrill ☐

THE LOGIC OF WITHDRAWAL,
by NATION contributor Howard Zinn ☐

THE FERVENT YEARS: The Story of the Group Theatre of the 30s with a new chapter
on Postwar Theatre, by NATION drama critic
Harold Clurman ☐

THE DESTRUCTION OF CALIFORNIA,
by NATION contributor Raymond F. Dasmann ☐

SCIENCE AND HUMAN VALUES,
by NATION contributor J. Bronowski ☐

AIR WAR: VIETNAM,
by Frank Harvey ☐

UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED.
by NATION contributor Ralph Nader ☐

THE NEW STUDENT LEFT,
ed. by Mitchell Cohen and Dennis Hale ☐

FREE MEN AND FREE MARKETS—
Proposed: A Guaranteed Income,
by NATION contributor Robert Theobald ☐

Clip and send this coupon to:

The NATION, 333 6th Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014.

☐ I'll join you for the year (48 issues). Enclosed is $10. I've checked the book I want.

☐ I'll try you for ☐ months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6.
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name

Street

City State Zip

N 6-10

The good fight

is now in

THE NATION

—Why not

join now?

22

WALTER REUTHER B. J. WIDICK

THE

NATION

JUNE 17, 1968 35 cents

BURLINGAME
JUL 15 1968
LIBRARY

BURLINGAME
APR 18 1969
LIBRARY

IN A TIME OF ASSASSINS

3 Editorials

HUBERT HUMPHREY: THE ILLUSION OF CHANGE

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Good-by, Corbusier NATHAN SILVER

'The Rosenbergs' in the French Theatre

NICHOLAS BIEL

LETTERS

shared humanity

New York City

DEAR SIR: Publishing Sandy Goodman's "Back from Vietnam: The Invisible Veterans" [The Nation, June 3] took a certain courage for any magazine that stands on the Left. The strident rhetoric of much of the Peace Movement—a good deal of it coming from people who as late as six months ago were sitting on their fences, trying, as a colleague of mine phrased it, "to get a better overall view of things"—made the publication of such an article a necessity, if for no other reason than to remind us that the soldiers doing our national "thing" in Vietnam are very much like the rest of us—battered and blistered by the rhetoric, still in love with what they learned in the first grade was "a true democracy," and striving, in however painful a manner, to match the conception against the reality. . . . In a time as mad as ours, one is grateful for any reminders of the humanity we share. Leonard Kriegel terror in Greece

Lansing, Mich.

DEAR SIR: After a year of military rule in Greece the junta has succeeded in alienating the proud Greek people by depriving them of such rights as freedom of speech, assembly and due process of law. Such oppression has resulted in growing unrest and recently accelerated underground resistance, notably in Salonika and Patras (The New York Times, Apr. 19) . . .

It appears only prudent that the nations of the free world step up their efforts to restore a true democratic order in Greece. The large-scale terror and intimidation . . . imposed on the Greek people seems hardly the makings of the type of stability compatible with the . . . long-range interests of the Western bloc. John Kinney

legal absurdity

New York City

DEAR SIR: On Monday, May 27, the Supreme Court held that Congress could constitutionally make it a crime for one to burn his draft card, whatever the reason for such action. The result of this holding is that a young man will now spend six years in jail.

Behind all the verbiage and legal niceties, behind all the issue making and word playing, behind the distinctions between speech and action upon which freedom is made to turn, does anybody, including the lawyers and the judges, realize that essentially what we are doing is putting someone in jail for six years for burning a worthless piece of paper? This is absurd. Stephen Gillers

splenetic

Reno, Nev.

DEAR SIR: I must protest Richard Eberhart's review of Conrad Aiken's Thee ["Thumb-Sucking," The Nation, Apr. 1]. I have reservations about the poem myself. (And still greater ones about the pertinence or fitness of the illustrations.) I feel that Mr. Aiken was undertaking the impossible, and that some less direct and abstract approach might have come closer to success.

But Mr. Aiken knew, I am sure, that he was undertaking the impossible, and knew also, I am even more certain, the dangers of his method. The undertaking was an act of high poetic courage, and emotionally, to my mind (and how else could it work?), it did succeed to a remarkable degree. To discard it as "Thumb-sucking" is splenetic (I don't know why) and sub-critical. Walter Van Tilburg Clark

EDITORIALS

Dogged by Fate

Long ago, the American Presidency became a dangerous office. No one attacked the persons of our first fifteen Presidents, but from Lincoln on four have died by the assassin's bullet and three others—Theodore Roosevelt, Franklin D. Roosevelt and Harry S. Truman—have been shot at. In the past few years, killings at a lower political level have been numerous; witness the martyrs of the civil rights cause, with Martin Luther King, Jr., the latest victim and the greatest loss from the standpoint of a non-violent solution to the race problem. And now, Robert F. Kennedy, the most senseless killing of them all. It is tragic for the victim; tragic for the Kennedy family, so blessed with ability and wealth, so dogged by fate; tragic for a country which must seem to the world as lethal for all who aspire to give it leadership as is the Congo or Haiti. Two hours after Senator Kennedy was shot, the British Broadcasting Corporation offered its listeners a prayer: "We pray for the American people that they may come to their senses."

In essence, the single point in RFK's campaign—as in that of Eugene McCarthy—was that America must come to its senses. And in that lies a tragedy that goes deeper than the bullet. It involves the whole situation of the Kennedy clan, of which only one son of Joseph P. and Rose Kennedy now survives. Robert always lived under the shadow of his brother, and much of the acclaim which greeted him wherever he went, and a large part of the votes which would have been cast for him, were an inheritance from the late President. Robert never stood entirely on his own feet, never entirely freed his own abundant talent from the memory of what John F. Kennedy accomplished and might have accomplished had he been spared. And now, in grim turn, we shall never know what Robert might have accomplished.

This was not merely Robert's personal problem; it concerned his relations to the Democratic Party and to the country as a whole. JFK was, after all, responsible for Johnson, whom he chose for purely political reasons and without whom he would probably have lost in 1960. Thus the policy against which Robert rebelled—and, however long he delayed, he did rebel—was one which he and his brother had put in motion. Rusk, McNamara, Taylor, Lodge and other outstanding hawks, active or acquiescent, were initially Kennedy appointees. It was Kennedy who, in one way or another, gave Johnson the opportunity to involve the United States in a great war on the mainland of Asia and thus by necessity to ignore all the problems, domestic and foreign, that today beset the most powerful of nations. And it was this whole mindless, cruel drift that Robert Kennedy was determined to stop. He was moved by impulses of the most responsible patriotism but he was also moved by family: the Kennedys are proud. He would secure his brother's good name by defying, and if possible defeating, the evil consequences that had flowed from his brother's brutally interrupted administration. And now a bullet has put a stop to that.

A Memorial of Action

Robert Kennedy's bold stratagem need not die with him, but if it is to survive we must honor the dead man with action, not with repining. The political moratorium, inevitable at the moment of first shock, must be cut short—its continuance serves only the interests of Hubert Humphrey and Richard Nixon, those spokesmen for the discredited machinery of political consensus that RFK was determined to break.

Robert Kennedy, like all the clan, was a fierce competitor. It is all the more impressive, therefore, that in the days leading up to California he drew attention not only to his own support but to the fact that his constituency, combined with that of McCarthy, simply overwhelmed the support for Humphrey running in Johnson's shoes. (As to the shoes in which Humphrey runs, see Robert G. Sherrill's article, page 783 in this issue.)

Defeat would have been bitter to Robert, but would he necessarily have seen defeat in a McCarthy victory? A few hours before he was shot, he said to a crowd: "It is less important what happens to me than what happens to the cause I have tried to represent." In all essentials that cause—a politics responsible to the people of the country and the peoples of the world—is also embraced by McCarthy. It is tragically remote from Humphrey's grasp.

But politics is not only principles; it is also manipulation and the flow of human loyalties. The Kennedy forces are for the moment leaderless; it is widely feared that they will disperse and that enough may be drawn into the Vice President's orbit to assure his victory in Chicago (with the predictable result that Richard Nixon would be the next President). There is, however, still a Senator Kennedy. Edward is less well known, but in a short term of service he has earned remarkable stature. His policies are sound, and—as he showed in his bitter reports from South Vietnam—his heart is stout.

Edward Kennedy should now assume, if not his brother's place, a large measure of his brother's responsibility. The dedicated men and women who were the sinews of Robert's astonishing campaign should put Edward at their head and should seek the confederation with McCarthy that his brother more than once hinted at as the next necessary step. It might be that he would accept the second position on the ticket, and in that case the tragedy of Los Angeles need not be unrelieved. Eugene McCarthy and Edward Kennedy could very probably beat Humphrey in August, and could almost certainly overwhelm Nixon in November. Failing some such gallant recovery from this current horror, the country will be faced again in 1968 with a choice that is no choice at all. That would be the unrelieved—perhaps the fatal—tragedy.

'For God's Sake'

If any example were needed of the corrupting monotone of voice and thought that Robert Kennedy was intent upon replacing, it was provided by Lyndon Johnson's television appearance on the night when the Senator was dying. He opened his brief talk with a perfunctory and platitudinous

THE NATION/June 17, 1968

IN THIS ISSUE

JAN 7

June 17, 1968

EDITORIALS

778

ARTICLES

782 Walter Reuther Breaks His Chains

B. J. Widick

783 Hubert Humphrey:
The Illusion of Change

Robert G. Sherrill

788 Harry Golden

789 Our Press and Theirs:
The Mask of Objectivity

Leslie R. Colitt

792 Guerrillas of Rio Arriba:
The New Mexican Land War

Clark Knowlton

BOOKS & THE ARTS

797 Good-by, Corbusier

Nathan Silver

798 The Sedentaries (poem)

Anselm Hollo

799 Passengers Will Please Refrain

George Zabriskie

800 Book Marks

Sara Blackburn

801 Theatre

Nicholas Biel

802 Music

Benjamin Boretz

802 Rumor (poem)

Lawrence Locke

805 Films

Robert Hatch

807 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD HULL

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KENY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014, Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 for foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 206

No. 25

779

expression of shock, dismay and sympathy for the Kennedys. On this score he is not to be much criticized. It is difficult for a public man to utter convincing words of condolence, and Johnson's task was the more difficult because he could not pretend to any love for the man.

But we have been told ad nauseam that LBJ, however ignorant his opinions and ill-considered his actions, truly loves his country. So he went before the country on that tragic, perilous night, and what did he say? He called for an end to violence in the streets and appointed a commission to investigate the causes thereof. Did he mention Vietnam, or poverty, or life in the ghetto, or the frustrated aspirations of every minority group in America? Did he refer to the waste of our resources, the contamination of our environment, the arrogance of our colossal stance on this earth? He cited none of these things: "My fellow citizens, we cannot, we must not, tolerate the sway of violent men among us." Was there nobody in his retinue to tell him that he indicted himself?

He appointed a commission to acquaint him with the causes of violence. If it were sincere, what could such a commission tell him except truths about his own Administration so bitter that he has long since proved himself unable or unwilling to accept them? But this commission will not attempt to drive home any such hard facts: it is itself made up overwhelmingly of men who have supported his policy in Vietnam, men who believe that we can kill without scruple in Southeast Asia and by moral uncton and police implacability suppress the consequences at home. No President who had read with seeing eyes the report of the Kerner Commission could possibly require the services of another such body, let alone that of the Milton Eisenhower Commission.

But Johnson does not see; his eyes are turned inward to ■ reality of his own invention, and he responds to events with programed jerks that are faithfully echoed in the articulated gestures of his platform delivery. That is what Robert Kennedy was fighting, and Eugene McCarthy is fighting. So, to borrow one of the President's favorite apostrophes, "let us, for God's sake," put an end to it. And let us remember that Humphrey is its heir and Nixon its only too loyal opposition.

Don't Underrate Nippon

As late as the interval between the two World Wars, the idea prevailed in the United States that the Japanese were mere copyists in engineering and the physical sciences. This was an exaggeration, compounded of race prejudice and the tensions that existed between the two countries. Actually, even before the turn of the century Japan had become a great military and industrial power, based, as under modern conditions it had to be, on a competent scientific and technological work force.

After World War II, Japan recovered rapidly from defeat and pushed ahead in electronics, shipbuilding and other fields, including railroads. In the last area, advances were especially noteworthy: while, with few exceptions, U.S. carriers were jettisoning their passenger service, the Japanese were improving theirs and attracting customers.

The extent to which we are beginning to copy Japanese rail techniques is one of the main topics discussed in the April, 1968 issue of Proceedings of the IEEE (Institute of Electrical and Electronics Engineers) which is devoted to the latest U.S. and foreign advances in transportation by land, sea and air, and looks ahead to the year 2000.

Several of the papers are by Japanese engineers. One, by Matsutaro Fujii, describes the famous New Tokaido Line (NTL) which connects Tokyo and Osaka, 320 miles to the west. High-speed, luxurious passenger service began in 1964 after a five-year construction period. The double track, electrified line now carries an average of 150,000 passengers a day at a total revenue of around $1 million. The trains make the run in three hours, at an average speed of 100 mph and a maximum of 130 mph. All trains are controlled from operations headquarters in Tokyo, with the dispatchers also in voice communication with the train drivers.

Plans and building are under way to extend NTL another 375 miles, and to build a similar railroad northward to the neighboring island of Hokkaido, with a length of 675 miles including an undersea tunnel some 20 miles long. All this indicates that for distances up to, say, 600 miles, modernized train service can more than hold its own with airline competition. That being so it could help to relieve the dangerous congestion at major U.S. airports.

In the field of urban transportation, everyone knows that the New York City subway, with 237 miles of track, carrying 1.3 billion passengers per year, is one of the busiest, if by no means one of the most comfortable, railroads in the world. The first section began operation in 1904. The Tokyo subway, which dates back to 1927, is now technologically in the lead and by present indications will remain so. In the rush hours, both railroads are indecently overcrowded, but the Tokyo system is automatically operated, frequency-modulated radio being used to control trains through receivers in head cars and wayside transmitters. The motorman is there for manual operation in the event of mechanical or electrical failure, but such failure cannot be total, and while he monitors the system when it is working properly, it will monitor him if he takes over. Plans call for completely centralized traffic control, as on the NTL, for a further increase in traffic density.

In an entirely different field, but likewise suggestive, is the "Pastures of the Sea" story in the April 30 Japan Report. Fishery products account for about 60 per cent of Japanese consumption of animal protein. Instead of just catching fish, the Japanese are projecting various schemes for growing and harvesting. Schools of fish gather around and inside a sunken ship; taking that habit as a clue, the Japanese are building "apartment houses" for fish, with large concrete blocks, generating artificial tides and currents favorable for marine life, using underwater lighting to attract fish to desired locations, etc. Instead of leaving it all to nature, with the inevitable fluctuations in supply, the Japanese would like to make their whole continental shelf available for fish culture.

Taking it all in all, the United States has a technological lead over the rest of the world, but it can still learn from the Japanese (and others) as they can learn from us.

Prodding the FCC

The past month has been an unsettling one for the broadcasting industry. First, Sen. Philip A. Hart (D., Mich.), chairman of the Senate Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee, told the Federal Bar Association of his deep concern about rapid concentration of ownership of radio and TV stations, including CATV cable and microwave, which he described as "the pipe line for communication to the home in the future." He sharply attacked the Federal Communications Commission and the Justice Department for their apathy to the merger trend.

The Senator's facts came from several volumes of hearings on the "Failing Newspapers Act," a legislative effort by some newspaper interests to gain for themselves an antitrust exemption for mergers and joint working agreements. The bill provided the occasion which Senator Hart had been waiting for to undertake a thorough probe into media concentration, without ripping apart an uneasy truce with the Republican-Southern bloc on the subcommittee. He boiled down his findings in one sentence: "There are no scale economies, business necessities, or efficiencies which can justify this movement [toward greater concentration]. What is involved here is power—political and economic."

Following but not because of the Hart speech, part of the FCC woke up and produced a document that will jar the broadcasting industry and possibly set in motion forces that will end FCC passivity toward license renewals of radio and TV stations. Commissioners Kenneth Cox and Nicholas Johnson took the opportunity provided by a routine application for the renewal of the licenses of Oklahoma broadcasters to deliver a 308-page statement on the ills affecting broadcasting.

The two Commissioners concluded (1) that local stations are overwhelmingly transmitters of entertainment and news from national centers such as New York and Los Angeles; (2) that there is little, if any, relevant information available to local citizens about local radio and TV stations; (3) that "the control of the greatest share of the audience, profit, and political power lies in the hands of very few"; (4) that "the listening and viewing public is almost totally excluded from, and uninformed about its rights in, the station's program selection process"; (5) that the stations generally failed to provide their audiences with local news, entertainment, community dialogue and the airing of local controversial issues; and (6) that "the Commission is making virtually no use of the information it is now receiving from licensees in the renewal forms."

The Cox-Johnson statement placed major blame for this state of affairs on the FCC, calling the agency's purported review "ritual" a "sham," with no real point beyond being a "boon for the Washington, D.C., communications bar." These are strong words to describe one's own agency, but the evidence adduced in support is even stronger. The U.S. Government built the broadcasting industry on the assumption of "local service." The industry's nation-wide performance reflects the situation in Oklahoma, say the Commissioners, with stations providing almost literally no programming that can meaningfully be described as "local expression." The Oklahoma station that is best in this respect devotes only two hours a week (out of 105 to 134 hours of programming) to programs which can be classified as "local public affairs." Six stations carry less than one hour; two stations carry none.

Cox and Johnson end their analysis with seven recommendations to guide the Commission in its review of renewal applications. They form a framework of inquiry which the Commissioners hope will stimulate public-spirited groups and citizens to participate actively in the agency's renewal procedures—something which is now done almost not at all. Three years ago, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit recognized the "legal standing" of listeners who wished to challenge renewal requests before the FCC. The availability of the Cox-Johnson statement indicates that the Commissioners want this right used on a national scale.

Unfair Comment vs. Fair Trial

After it became known that District Attorney Evelle J. Younger of Los Angeles would consent to a mistrial in a murder case, George Putnam, a Los Angeles television reporter and commentator (KTLA) addressed a series of questions to his audience: "Is it true that a deal is being discussed behind the scenes on this conviction? Is it true that a mistrial . . . is being sought? And is it true that such a declaration hinges on approval from the Los Angeles County District Attorney . . . ? A mistrial? What do you think, mother?"

The final question was calculated to wring the heart of every parent who heard the broadcast, because the convicted man had been found guilty of raping and strangling two young sisters, aged 6 and 7.

Younger subsequently did join in a request for a new trial. He disclosed that Thomas P. Finnerty, Jr., the deputy district attorney who prosecuted the man, had reported that the defense attorney was under the influence of liquor at the trial—an accusation the attorney denied. Finnerty himself signed an affidavit in support of a new trial. A Los Angeles newspaper was moved to comment: "In such a situation, no responsible district attorney could have acted otherwise. Yet . . . Younger . . . was maligned ignorantly and abusively."

Granting the motion, a superior court judge said: "Not only do I feel that the defendant did not receive adequate representation, he did not have adequate preparation and investigation of his case before trial." The defense had offered no evidence and—except for lynchings—the day-and-a-half proceedings may have been the shortest capital case on record.

The denouement came on April 9 when, after a second trial lasting five weeks, the man was found not guilty.

This episode is merely an incident in the career of the Los Angeles broadcaster, who specializes in inflammatory opinion. (After the capture of the Pueblo, he characteristically analyzed the situation: "Too many of our people have a yellow streak a foot wide down their backs.")

Such incidents point up the need to strengthen and extend the FCC's "fairness" doctrine—which, just now, is under renewed attack.

Walter Reuther Breaks His Chains

B. J. WIDICK

Mr. Widick is the author of Labor Today: The Triumphs and Failures of Unionism in the United States (Houghton Mifflin). He teaches at Columbia and Wayne State Universities.

The long expected public break between Walter Reuther and George Meany has at last taken place. The façade of the AFL-CIO is cracked, and its leaders can no longer claim to speak for organized labor. The Auto Workers and the Teamsters, America's largest and most decisive unions, are outside the Meany policy-making structure. Reuther heads a union of 1.6 million workers (1.4 million dues payers and 200,000 active retirees) and he has cultivated a live-and-let-live arrangement with James Hoffa, whose 1.9 million Teamsters union has not only survived but thrived since its expulsion from the AFL-CIO.

Indifference toward social movements and change will now become a more difficult position for the aging AFL-CIO hierarchs whose gradualism is increasingly unattractive to its own members, half of whom are younger than 40 and have less than five years of union experience. The politics of Meany are the politics of Lyndon B. Johnson, whose abdication was a greater shock to the AFL-CIO leaders than to anyone else in the Democratic Party machine. (When President Johnson was applauded eighty-one times during his speech to the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union in April, the assembled leaders and delegates apparently failed to realize that they were cheering statements of policy which most Americans had repudiated so strongly that their sponsor despaired of reelection.)

Even if the most optimistic hopes of the AFL-CIO leaders are realized and Hubert Humphrey wins the Democratic Party nomination and the November Presidential election, union as usual and politics as usual face stormy times. Perhaps the AFL-CIO bureaucracy, plus the Democratic Party regular machine, plus the Southern Democrats can deliver the nomination to Humphrey, but that will not at all erase the new ideas and forces set in motion by Eugene McCarthy and Robert Kennedy. And the American electorate will still have to be convinced in November.

Since most politicians are now concentrating on the primaries and the national conventions, they overlook the increasing likelihood of a steel strike this fall. The opposition between millions of tons of steel inventories and the rising expectation of the Steelworkers will make collective bargaining as usual rather difficult. The Steelworkers can match the gains of the Auto Workers only by repudiating the "austerity" advice given them by the Johnson Administration. The failure of the steel negotiators to settle the many acute plant grievances already raised increases the probability of a steel strike. And the Johnson-Humphrey forces, including the AFL-CIO leaders, will not find it easy to side-step a crisis of that magnitude on the eve of a Presidential election.

Furthermore, no one can be certain how much of labor will vote "wrong" from race prejudice. Recent municipal elections in Cleveland, Ohio, and Gary, Ind., offer no basis for optimism on this score. Nearly half of the members of unions live in suburbs—the white noose around the throat of the city ghettos—and the AFL-CIO's educational efforts over the years have been inept. A. H. Raskin of The New York Times, one of America's most astute labor journalists and himself a friend of many AFL-CIO leaders, wrote recently: "The typical worker—from construction craftsman to shoe clerk—has become probably the most reactionary political force in the country." This, to be sure, is an exaggeration. If the United States Commission on Civil Disorders is right that America is a "white racist society," the middle class has a larger claim to Raskin's characterization. Labor's record of support for civil rights legislation and the organization of at least 1.5 million Negroes into unions have been inadequate, but still the effort has been better than that of other social force in America, except the social movements of the Negroes themselves in recent times.

The question of labor's social position is critical, for perhaps the only real difference between Walter Reuther and George Meany is their understanding of the social crisis in America and their view of labor's role in it. For Reuther, the AFL-CIO is too fat, too complacent, too far out of touch with changing times. Reuther knows unions are richer, have better contracts, and have made some organizational gains, but to him these are tragically inadequate measures of success in a country wracked by social conflict, and tolerating poverty for millions in an otherwise affluent society.

For George Meany, "the American labor movement is in the best condition in its history," and to Reuther's appeals that the unions be revitalized, Meany replies: "We have some loud-mouth critics on our side who say we are not doing too well; that the AFL-CIO . . . has failed to display an adequate sense of social consciousness—whatever the hell that means." Reuther's eleven years of struggle within the framework of the AFL-CIO hierarchy failed utterly to educate Meany. The conflict is between a man raised in the struggles and social movement of the 1930s CIO and a man who has lived his entire life in the atmosphere of craft unions and the building trades. No one knows better than Walter Reuther that the dreams of the AFL-CIO merger in 1955 have become illusions.

When sanitation workers of Memphis struck, Reuther marched with them and gave $50,000 to the strike fund, despite vigorous criticism by the anti-Negro elements in his own union. Meany sent a representative to Memphis. It was a repetition of Reuther's response to the 1963 March on Washington, which the AFL-CIO refused to endorse.

The idealism of Senator McCarthy's "Children's Crusade" reminds Reuther of the army of young volunteers who assisted and worked in the CIO; for Meany, these are at best misguided youth following a Pied Piper down the road of appeasement in Vietnam. Meany has seldom lost an opportunity to display his scorn of "peaceniks," whatever brand or policy. Reuther seeks to keep a tie with the peace movements through his associates who are disturbed or opposed by the disastrous war. The AFL-CIO has endorsed Humphrey—long considered a Meany man by the UAW top leaders—and Reuther's neutrality in the primaries had been leaning toward Senator Kennedy.

People wonder what is Reuther's program, where he is going. Will he head a new union movement as John L. Lewis did when he formed the CIO in the 1930s? There are no conclusive answers; indeed, until this break there was no evidence that Reuther had answered these questions to himself or to his colleagues. But he has developed a sense of direction, of movement which must increasingly clash with the status quo policies of the AFL-CIO.

Just being outside the AFL-CIO hierarchy gives Reuther a sense of independence which was beyond his grasp when he faced Meany's mechanical majority in the AFL-CIO council. Perhaps 500,000 workers in three unions, rubber, chemical and federal government, will join in a loose coalition with the UAW, or make some other arrangement outside the AFL-CIO. This is no inconsiderable social base for Reuther. Much depends on what happens in the war and its aftermath, what happens this summer in the ghettos, what happens in the November election. Reuther's next step must depend largely on the outcome of these events—in none of which is labor playing the kind of role Reuther thinks it should take. What he does have is a flexibility of operation he desires and needs. Now, by separating the UAW from the AFL-CIO, Reuther automatically becomes the voice of challenge and disagreement, and gains a solid power base in the country.

Abroad, the AFL-CIO is in the process of watching, and in some respects pushing, the disintegration of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. This organization has refused to accept the dictates of the AFL-CIO in many areas, including the activities of those of its secretariats which seek a détente with unionists behind the iron curtain. It is plagued, thus, with an internal crisis. By contrast, the UAW has been increasing its independent work throughout the world, and its teams are establishing a dialogue with unionists everywhere. The UAW policy aim is to cool off the cold war and promote efforts for freedom and peace; the AFL-CIO still stands firmly to the cold-war hard line. So Reuther's break with Meany enables him to stay in close touch with the tumultuous changes affecting most of Europe.

American trade unions represent almost 18 million members, and their conflicts and goals cannot fail to help shape the domestic welfare of the country. As for the world overseas, recent French events suggest that it would be rashly premature to write off the "working class" in any country.

HUBERT HUMPHREY

THE ILLUSION OF CHANGE

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

This article is adapted from a chapter in Mr. Sherrill's The Drugstore Liberal: Hubert H. Humphrey in Politics, which will be published by Grossman on July 15.

When word got back to Hubert Humphrey, earlier this year, that some of his old buddies were calling his patter "slavish" and reminiscent of Richard Nixon, he grew red, started to say one thing, stopped, and finally dismissed their protest as "the knee-jerk liberal line." He sat for a few moments staring at his desk, then swiveled slowly to look at the seal of the Vice President on his wall, the eagle's wings down, its claws holding only one arrow. "Some say I have changed." He paused. "I have."

And he has, but not in the way most of his unhappy liberal friends think. They think he has drowned his true feelings out of loyalty to the office. "Hubert faces the realities of power which are quite different from what he faced when he was not in power," says former Sen. Paul Douglas, thinking of economic affairs, not the war, for he is a hawk himself. "Hubert's heart is still good." There are countless Humphreyites like that all over Washington, all over the country. For an even better illustration, a conversation with Senator Joseph Clark:

Q. Have you talked to him since he's become Vice President? On what issues does he sound like the old Hubert?

CLARK: Yes, I've talked with him quite a bit. He gives me the impression that he's in there slugging just as hard as he can for sweetness and light, "all those things we've always longed for . . . gee, it's nice to see you lookin' swell, baby." And that he's the one force that holds off much worse in foreign affairs.

Q. The one force?

CLARK: He and Goldberg.

Q. But he is happy about our being there, isn't he?

CLARK: He says he is. Doesn't he have to say so? Isn't he a trained seal?

Q. You're the one to say. You're his friend.

CLARK: Well, I know I'm a friend. I wouldn't have done it—I would have quit. Wouldn't have run.

Q. But the point is, if he's a fellow who can adapt, and he obviously can, is he incapable of playing honest with you, of saying, "Joe, you know I don't like to be over there but what the hell, I'm a Vice President now and I've got to be an alter ego. I can't speak what is in my heart until I'm President or out of this office"?

CLARK: He can imply it and he has. But it would be disloyal for him to say that to me when he knows how I feel about Johnson.

Q. But he has implied it?

CLARK: Yes. [Goes into an imitation.] "Jesus, Joe, if you knew what I had to put up with. I'm in there every day. . . ."

Q. Meaning, pitching for your side?

CLARK: Yeah.

Q. So you have given your argument to him, time and again?

CLARK: Yes. "Goddammit, Hubert, why do you do this? You don't have to do this. You know it's not right." . . . [Switches again to an imitation of Humphrey.] "I just think I have to fight from inside. I can't come out in the newspapers. I'm representing your point of view in there every day and getting my head just as bloody as it can be. Don't think I'm not in there slugging, because I am."

Q. Well, if he has a bloody head, is that why he cries so much?

CLARK: He is being torn up. In pieces. God, he's Hamlet. Stevenson was very much the same. Except Adlai was more remote. I think Hubert is being torn to pieces.

The conclusions drawn by these close friends are, so far as one can discover by combing Humphrey's career for tell-tale tendencies, pure wishing. They are a pathetic "Say it ain't so, Hubie." But it is so. When Humphrey says he has changed, he means, surely, that he no longer has to disguise his true feelings. He has changed to a new honesty: he no longer must pretend to be the smashing young liberal who will give the Minneapolis Red-infiltrated unions a fair shake; no longer must he pretend to be the liberal who will purify the Democratic Farm Labor Party for the all-American leftists; no longer pretend to be the leader of the liberal bloc who can deal with the national leadership successfully. Now he is in the leadership, and he can say straight out, as he did a few months ago, "I suppose I'm left of Center. I wouldn't deny that. But very moderately left of Center." Now he openly jeers at the "tired radicals, the militants of the 1930s who are the absentees of the 1960s"—the absentees he helped destroy. Quite accurately Fortune appraised him in 1965: "After allowance for differences between Minnesota and Texas, there is not much gap between his liberalism and Johnson's."

There is every reason to take Humphrey's word when he says: "Nor should some of my old friends imagine that I support some basic Administration policies merely because of constricting official involvement. I am supporting them out of clear intellectual commitment."

This commitment is firm, not only in regard to Johnson's war policy but also in regard to Johnson's favoritism for big business.

To maintain his credentials as the "prairie Populist" in the 1950s, Humphrey frequently berated the Eisenhower administration for knuckling under to big business. In 1950, speaking in Richmond, Va., he said "growing monopoly" was the greatest danger facing America. In 1952, he called the Tidelands oil bill "the greatest steal in the history of this generation." In 1953 he said big business is "calling the tune" for the Eisenhower administration on labor, as well as "every other issue," and he was still on that theme on a May morning in 1956 when, flailing his arms and shouting, the Young Democratic Club cheering him on, Humphrey made Washington's old Willard Hotel shiver to its conservative foundation. "Eisenhower's administration is not motivated by the crusading spirit," he cried. "It is for big business and of big business. Last year was the billion-dollar year—General Motors made a billion dollars and the farmers lost a billion dollars."

This kind of talk, spread over the years, gave many businessmen around the country the wrong idea. They did not have the advantage of their moneyed colleagues in Minneapolis who had quietly eased Humphrey to the top. The big boys of Minneapolis are still chuckling about the trick they pulled in 1945 when the Minneapolis Junior Chamber of Commerce voted Humphrey the city's "outstanding young man" of the year. It was part of big business' big build-up. The decision had been secretly arranged by what Bradley L. Morison, editorial writer for the Minneapolis Times, later called "a prime array of bank presidents, industrial leaders, and senior executives of almost unimpeachable Republican standing."

But the wealthy Old Guard of Minneapolis had been so stealthy about their part in the Humphrey build-up and he had been so successful in hamming himself up as a liberal that in 1964, when Johnson decided to make Humphrey his running mate, some re-imaging was needed. Johnson's long-time intimate friend, the oil-rich Texas Republican Robert B. Anderson, who had been Ike's Secretary of the Treasury and Secretary of the Navy, introduced Humphrey into the right circles. Humphrey took it from there, speaking to groups of elite businessmen at every opportunity, presenting his "new" self. Suddenly the word was out, and it was understandably received as rather startling news. Austin C. Wehrwein, writing in The New York Times, saw, with surprise, Humphrey "emerging as an advocate of a new kind of 'tactical moderation' as a substitute for 'fiery debate by professional liberals.' The Democrat whom liberals have always regarded as 'reliable, available Hubert,' as he has put it, has become a champion of business-government partnership, even a defender of bigness in business."

But back home in Minneapolis it was a joke. Frank Premack, Minneapolis Tribune writer, observed: "The story of the Great Change tickles the business and labor leaders of this state who knew Hubert Humphrey back when. The story, they say, is myth."

And to prove his point, Premack threw in a quote from Mayor Naftalin: "He never assailed the economic royalist. His reputation as a flaming liberal was based on civil rights and labor legislation—he was never a doctrinaire liberal. . . ."

Far from being offended by Premack's disclosures, Humphrey went out of his way to call the Tribune's piece to the attention of U.S. News & World Report in an open letter. ("I think it helps give some balance and perspective on my more recent utterances and actions relating to the American economy.") And in the same letter to U.S. News & World Report, which would of course go into the hands of the more conservative people around the country, Humphrey ticked off other signs of his high regard for big business: "I strongly supported the investment tax credit when many others were opposed to it. . . . I strongly supported the proposal to establish a Communications Satellite Corporation. I did this in the face of bitter opposition from some of my friends in ADA and the liberal wing of the Democratic Party. . . . I was an early advocate of a reduction in both corporate and personal income taxes. . . . I led the fight in my own state to amend the state constitution to provide a more favorable tax climate for the iron-ore and steel industry."

In measuring the tip of the Humphrey scales between labor and management, one cannot go by what he says; he has said so many flattering and so few critical things about both sides. The best measure is: which side has he struck at when it displeased him? And the answer is labor. One does not have to go back to his betrayal of local labor in the choice of a police chief for Minneapolis.

One can come up to the late 1950s when Humphrey voted for the Landrum-Griffin labor reform bill, an act of heresy in the eyes of most liberals and all laborites, and one which he hardly succeeded in excusing with his statement: "You don't legislate in a vacuum. I was convinced that if we did not pass that labor bill we would have got a worse one next year."

The vote itself, however, is not so illuminating as his reaction to labor's criticism of it. Humphrey can be spiteful, and this was one of the occasions. When he heard the criticism that was being leveled at him by officials of the Central Labor Union in Minneapolis, he got George Meany, president of the AFL-CIO, to investigate the CLU to see if it was conducting its affairs properly. Apparently Humphrey had been tipped off that the CLU's operational funds were low, and that it had borrowed some cash from the pension fund. This was irregular, perhaps, but it was exactly what the national AFL-CIO was doing with its pension fund. Meany, at Humphrey's behest, put the CLU under a trusteeship, sent out a strong man who antagonized half the union officials in Minneapolis, and succeeded in splitting the CLU. It is still split, and the laboring movement in the state is to that extent much weaker. Humphrey has never pulled that kind of thing on management.

Some have suggested that Humphrey could at least show the good taste of keeping his mouth shut when confronting the imponderables of the war. On a February 11, 1968, Meet the Press show, Charles Murphy of N.B.C. asked Sen. Eugene McCarthy: "Let's say your roles were reversed. Suppose you were chosen Vice President. What would you be doing; would you be defending the President's war policies as Mr. Humphrey is?" McCarthy answered: "I don't think I would be. I have said this before. . . . I don't think there is any way in which a Vice Presi-

Guindon

"Not Only Were We Wrong About Johnson, We Were Wrong About Humphrey Too."

dent can be compelled to support publicly a position taken by a President with which he disagrees. And I anticipate that if I were the Vice President now, I think I would be quiet."

(McCarthy and Humphrey have been close acquaintances, but not bosom buddies. McCarthy has never forgiven Humphrey for standing aloof when he, McCarthy, was fighting for the DFL convention nomination to the Senate in 1958. Furthermore, while Humphrey was acting neutral, his people openly worked for McCarthy's rival.)

Such comments as that by McCarthy, a political colleague, are obviously intended to put Humphrey on the spot by suggesting that if he doesn't believe what he says about the war, he needn't say it. But there is nothing wrong with Humphrey's talking in defense of the war since he does believe in it.

Humphrey is grateful to Johnson for making him what he is today. Back in the early 1950s, Johnson said of Humphrey, "I wish I could be that boy's trainer." In the last three years he has had the opportunity as never before, and Humphrey has responded in a way that must give Johnson satisfaction. "I am Vice President because he made me Vice President." And on another occasion: "Every word we utter, everything we do, reflects directly on the President and on the White House. We must dress, act, and speak with dignity, wisely and prudently—and with that in mind. The first duty of the Vice President is loyalty. I must be his devoted and loyal friend and support." He likes Johnson; he likes the Johnson style, once comparing it with deep satisfaction to the Kennedy administration in this way: "It's like the difference between the court of Louis XIV and the early American Republic under Andrew Jackson." He left no doubt as to which he preferred.

As for Johnson's basic conservatism, Humphrey has never seen it that way, or at least he has never seen Johnson as basically more conservative than he himself is. When he and Johnson first went to the Senate in 1949, Humphrey introduced him to his wife as "that new liberal Democratic Senator from Texas." Others in those days—an era when Johnson sneered at "all those bleeding-heart liberals, those red-hots, red-eyes, and pinkos"—would have considered this to be a social gaffe, but Humphrey has always felt that Johnson was more liberal than generally rated, just as he has felt himself to be more conservative than generally rated.

The loyalty is not entirely one-sided. True, Johnson once shipped Humphrey off to Asia with so little pre-junket tutoring that he made a fool of himself at several stops. John Randolph of the Los Angeles Times reported this Humphrey happening at a 1967 diplomatic gathering in Saigon: "Going up to the Laotian delegate, Prince Outhong Souvannavong, chairman of the Laotian Royal Council, Humphrey inquired enthusiastically: 'And how is your wonderful President?' The Prince was momentarily taken aback, hesitated, and then replied: 'But Mr. Humphrey, we still have our king, you know.' A moment later Humphrey said almost the same thing to the Thai delegate—who similarly was compelled to point out that Thailand, too, was still a monarchy. Unabashed, Humphrey tried it again with Foreign Minister Narcisco Ramos of the Republic of the Philippines—and finally hit the jackpot."

On occasion Johnson has made sport of Humphrey's dignity by hoisting him onto a horse and equipping him with a totally unsuitable cowboy hat, down on the ranch. He has treated him to the indelicacies that any servant of Johnson must contend with. But on the other hand, the rushed assignment to Asia was itself an attempt on Johnson's part to bolster the sagging public popularity of Humphrey, as shown by opinion polls. "Operation Help Hubert," Barry Goldwater called it, "the most valiant rescue effort since the evacuation of Dunkirk." Since then Humphrey has been sent back to the Far East to keep his image fresh. And while Johnson subjects Humphrey to indecencies, he will not allow others to do so. "The next time you keep Hubert waiting," he told a White House aide, "I'll kick your ass down the hall."

Humphrey even dissented on one rare occasion, though he had to do it slyly. In 1966 he quietly sided with critics of the Administration's high-interest-rate policy. When Sen. Albert Gore was attacking the rates in a Senate speech, he noticed that Humphrey was listening closely and said: "I am so pleased and complimented with the attention of the distinguished presiding officer. I hope he will take this message to the right place." Humphrey sent a response to Gore by page. It read: "The Vice President doesn't set the interest rate. You are making a good fight." Humphrey's hardly concealed unhappiness with the Administration's money policies that year was counted as his first major dissent, and his last.

"The liberal approach must be experimental, the solutions tentative, the test pragmatic," Humphrey wrote in The American Scholar in 1955. That might be a good description of the liberal approach; but it is one of those all-purpose descriptions that will apply as well to the conservative approach. His statement is, in fact, a perfect specimen of the philosophical profundities found in corporations' annual reports. It points in no particular direction; it would as well apply to the problems of an expanding tractor dealership as to the problems of birth control.

Humphrey's liberal standards are such as to make him an authentic American, of a tragic type. Of those who exerted "hero" influences on his early life, William Jennings Bryan (who converted Humphrey's father to the Democratic Party) rated very high, not far behind Woodrow Wilson. Humphrey learned some of Bryan's windy speeches by heart when he was young. It will not do to draw too tightly the comparison, but just as the Wilsonian view of the world seems unusually similar to Humphrey's, so does the feeble, wavering decency of Bryan seem strikingly to have its echo in Humphrey's life. Around the turn of the century, R. F. Pettigrew, the great radical U.S. Senator from Humphrey's home state, South Dakota, described Bryan as "weak, not corrupt. He is a type of the 'good man' that so often fools the American people. He is vacillating, uncertain, overlooking the fundamental things, ignorant of the forces that are shaping American public life, incapable of thinking in terms of reality, but making phrases as a substitute for thought. He has traveled around the world, yet he knows little of international affairs. He has been from one end of the United States to another, yet he is ignorant of America. This is Bryanism—a fluent tongue, a resonant voice, the plausible statement of half-truths, an appeal to the passions and prejudices of the moment, a mediocre mind, and a verbal fealty to 'right,' 'justice,' 'liberty' and 'brotherhood.' Humphrey has a first-class mind, but in other ways the hero and the hero worshiper have a remarkable number of characteristics in common.

Mol-San, Carrefour (France)

Happy to be free of some of his old liberal pretensions, Humphrey has not, however, always had the courage to celebrate his freedom in an open way. His manner of departure from Americans for Democratic Action was symptomatic. When the ADA executive committee in February voted to support Eugene McCarthy for the Presidency, everyone wondered what Humphrey would do about his membership in that organization, which he had served as an officer for years and in which many of his oldest friendships were planted. Could he, as Johnson's number-one apologist—"our own Vietnam hog-caller," to use Hans Koningsberger's evocative phrase—keep his membership in a group supporting a politician whose main objective was to oppose LBJ's war policies? After the committee meeting, several ADA leaders held a press conference at which economist J. Kenneth Galbraith was asked if he thought Humphrey would resign. "I hope he won't," said Galbraith. "We have a great deal of affection for him." To the same question Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., said: "I don't know. I haven't talked to him about it. But this does put him in a tight spot." As these statements show, the top men in the ADA considered Humphrey to be still a member.

But the next day Humphrey's office announced that, in fact, Humphrey had quit the ADA three years earlier, when he became Vice President. "We've not said much about it," commented Norman Sherman, Humphrey's press secretary. Indeed they hadn't. In fact, they hadn't said anything about it. Joseph Rauh, who has always enjoyed serving as Humphrey's Sancho Panza, insisted that Humphrey had sent a letter of resignation to ADA headquarters, that the letter was supposed to sever all ties with the organization, and that he, Rauh, had in fact helped draft the letter. All of which was camouflage for a timorous, if not sleazily disloyal, performance by Humphrey. The letter he sent to the ADA on September 2, 1964, did not sever all ties to the organization. It assures ADA officials that "I shall retain my membership in the organization at least through the election. . . ." Until they heard from him to the contrary, the letter clearly implied, he would remain a member. But the ADA never heard from him again. He simply ceased paying his dues, tiptoed out the back door, and waited for circumstances to force him into announcing that he was gone.

But all such things are beside the point at which Humphrey's whole life and career are now focused. He is no longer interested much in organizational fealties, in issues, in ideologies, in programs, in personal independence, in private judgments, in the tensions of morality, except as these have a bearing on his aim to become President. And until recently that has been altogether a waiting game; to some degree, it still is. His immediate task, as he sees it, is to stay safe, not to think up new ideas. Despite Johnson's promise to leave the White House, the body Humphrey serves is still warm and still inhibiting; so he must wait for the national convention to free him, one way or the other.

He once described his office disparagingly as a place in which "you stand around waiting for somebody else to catch cold"—and then, perhaps, double pneumonia. Kings of old, in a usually futile effort to maintain humility, would often keep near at hand a sign reminding them of their mortality. Vice Presidents are the modern equivalent of that sign. Lyndon Johnson might have died; the job of President is very taxing and his heart had almost stopped forever in the mid-fifties. Or he might have been killed; no politician can make as many enemies as a President and no President has made more than Lyndon Johnson; he made so many, in fact, that the Secret Service quit announcing his travel schedule for fear of an assassin.

The awareness of these possibilities was always there to lift Hubert's spirits if they should sag, which was not likely. And so—when nothing so dramatic as sudden death but merely an ingrained distrust and dislike (quite measurable by polls) forced Lyndon Johnson to throw in his hand—the nation discovered, with no surprise at all, that the "girl next door," Hubert the Exuberant, had his enthusiasms all packed and ready. Gee whiz, certainly he would run in place of his Chief! Golly yes, he was eager to round up the stragglers and lead the nation on down that long, long trail toward what Hubert ecstatically described, in his announcement speech, as "the politics of Happiness . . . the politics of Joy!" The cities might be ablaze, unemployment in some ghetto retreats might be as much as 40 per cent, thousands of Negroes and whites might be literally starving because of an inadequate federal food program, the gold standard might be in precarious condition, the dollar might be anemic—but never mind that right now, because the thing that counted was that he was running again, and gosh it felt good. “It’s just like a resurrection,” he said, adding his only modest statement on his record this year, “but much less spectacular.”

Already he has gathered around him an imposing force: most of the big-city bosses are with him; the more reactionary wings of the labor hierarchy have announced for him; Southern Democratic leaders such as Texas Gov. John Connally like him, and say so publicly; and such saints of capitalism as Henry Ford II, Jacob Blaustein of the American Oil Co., and financier Sidney Weinberg are not only for him but are helping him to raise a bountiful war chest. On May 1 he spent three hours in New York and came away with promises for $750,000. His role in the fund-raising operation was a twenty-minute speech.

HARRY GOLDEN

DR. Reginald Hawkins is a middle-aged dentist in Charlotte, N.C. He has just proved that a Negro may indeed become the governor of the Tar Heel state in the near future. In the Democratic primary held several weeks ago, Dr. Hawkins, the only colored candidate, polled 125,000 out of 400,000 Negro votes in the state. Four hundred thousand Negro votes, plus 10 per cent whites, would easily nominate.

There are probably two reasons why Dr. Hawkins did not get this plurality. The first is his unpopularity. Dr. Hawkins is involved in a serious charge, which his dental board is investigating. It is alleged he overcharged poor people who were seeking dental work under the poverty program. Mecklenburg County registrars have also indicted him for abuse of election laws. Dr. Hawkins is supposed to have sworn Negroes as voters against the rules. The second reason, of course, is Negro apathy. Negroes are poor people and, as experienced politicians will testify, the poor are slow to learn that they can advance their interests at the polls. It is a sad fact, but a fact.

What Dr. Hawkins did do, however, was conduct an intelligent campaign, the kind which will eventually succeed if it unites Negroes and poor whites. The dentist proved that the poor will advance their interests only by forming a coalition with unionists and Negroes. This combination would carry any North Carolina election.

Poor whites would tend, one would think, to favor the progressive element in politics. But because of racism, poor whites enlist in the cause of the reactionaries. This is an outrageous tragedy and it is not enough to denounce it, we must abolish it.

To believe this will happen is not chimerical. Indeed, poor whites and Negroes united in the Populist movement which swept over the South in the 1890s. Negroes and whites shared the same platform and called one another

That’s quite a political honorarium: $37,500 per minute.

Big labor, big-city bosses, big business, and big boondoggle, too. As Alan Otten of The Wall Street Journal put it: “There’s the widespread though unproved belief that the Administration’s muscle—everything from defense contracts and Model City grants to patronage and public works projects—is ready to be applied in the Vice President’s behalf.”

So if some of the livelier liberals have no heart to follow this bubbling politician, he will not try to hold them. They were useful once, but not so useful as others now. He will see them off amicably, though, for he is that kind of man. “I’m sure you’ll find some of our old friends on the other side of the fence,” he says, waving in a cheerful way at some imaginary boundary. “They don’t have to take orders from me. I don’t take orders from them. Let them make their choice. I’ve made mine.”

“brethren.” One of the reasons for the introduction of Jim Crow laws and disenfranchisement was the desire of the city politicians to break up this rural organization.

Along the Lower East Side of New York little sympathy was shared among Jews, Italians and Irish. They neither married one another nor did they for that matter say hello. But Tammany Hall taught them that if they voted together they could achieve equity, which is precisely what they did achieve.

The next step in the civil rights movement should proceed from protest to politics. If the coalition of unionists, Negroes and poor whites could include the liberal and radical element of the middle class, as well as youth, it could not resolve all the problems of the South, but the South would be a lot nearer to solution than it is now.

The hurdle is to get the Negroes to the election place. Fred Alexander, a Charlotte real estate man, a graduate of Howard University, did succeed in this when he ran for the city council. Alexander was the first Negro to take a seat on the council. His election, in fact, caused an uproar in the state legislature whose die-hard members wanted to pass a law legislating against the “bullet vote.” For the Negroes in Charlotte voted only for Alexander on the long slate of councilman—a tactic which insured his election.

Some of the more astute legislators reminded the hot-heads that many an elected Representative and Senator takes his seat because his organization is instructed in the delights of the bullet vote.

Alexander has proved himself a more than competent member of the city council. For one thing, he took his seat promising a concern for all of Charlotte instead of a narrow concern for his colored constituency. This strategy has taught the councilmen they can work with him. Because they can, the Negro constituency has benefited.

THE MASK OF OBJECTIVITY

LESLIE R. COLITT

Mr. Colitt has recently left the foreign desk of The New York Times to join the Reuters News Service. He has lived for five years in Germany, and while there wrote a book, The Other Germany, which covered East Germany and was published in West Germany.

"American newspaper publishers can be grateful that their readers are not more cynical about newspapers than they already are," the Washington correspondent of a large European newspaper said to me. "The reader, for example, has little idea why Robert Kennedy got the kind of coverage he did in your best newspapers. It seems very objective on the surface—all the facts are there and the quotes are in context. Of course, you couldn't blame the Senator. What I do question is whether every utterance by him on whatever subject was fit to print day after day in the leading newspapers."

Some thoughtful American journalists, moreover, doubt that the American journalistic tradition of separating news from editorial opinion guarantees objective news presentation. James Reston, in Artillery of the Press, notes that for American news agencies and newspapers, objective reporting "came to mean that 'news' was anything any big-shot said."

Criticism on this score has become so frequent that editors say they no longer adhere to the concept of objective reporting. They now prefer "balanced reporting," a new label as misleading as the old.

I intend in a moment to compare the quality of what appears in some of the leading American papers with the standards of the best European journalism. But first consider how objectivity has distorted our best-informed, best-written and best-intentioned newspapers. How, for example, did Senator Kennedy's coverage reach such proportions? Cynics say it reflected a pact between the Senator and the newspapers sharing his aims. Other found it a natural expression of interest in the man who was attempting to carry on his brother's legacy. The case is far more subtle than either of these explanations would suggest.

Shortly after Kennedy's election to office, and in spite of a decidedly unenthusiastic press, he met individually with executives of the most important American newspapers. They were impressed by the zeal and sincerity with which he presented his ideas. Now, they would demonstrate their objectivity with a vengeance. There was no need to tell editors that Kennedy was to be given a fair hearing during his first months in office. Such policy is neither spoken nor written at a newspaper. It is sensed.

The best political reporters were assigned to the Senator and story suggestions from his aides were gratefully received. In their eagerness to please, editors overreacted. "The whole thing snowballed and nobody has the guts to stop it," said a reporter at one of the newspapers.

When publishers and editors are not mesmerized by personalities, they vaguely sense that something is lacking in the distribution of information. Thus they increasingly favor the in-depth, interpretative article. This tightrope walk on the hallowed line dividing news from comment only underscores the contradiction inherent in trying to give meaning to the news without expressing an opinion. The reporter-analyst, forced to mask his own views, falls back on that time-honored American journalistic practice, the balanced scale. Various views on an issue are presented, point-counterpoint, and the only opinion omitted is the one that would mean most to the reader—the reporter's own.

The country's best newspapers are a daily showcase for objective reporting that has no meaning or, worse yet, that is misleading. It has become accepted that any statement of a government official is news, but when an official deliberately peddles falsehoods as an exclusive story, a reporter must balk. If the temptation is too great and the information is published as given, the newspaper has compromised itself.

The New York Times, on November 10, 1967, ran the following front-page story under a Washington dateline:

The defection of Lieut. Col. Yevgeny Y. Runge, a 39-year-old Soviet intelligence officer, is regarded as a windfall by United States intelligence officials. . . .

They are utilizing the case to pursue what they consider a new emphasis on the uses of "illegal" agents in Soviet espionage, to promote closer cooperation among Western security services and to counteract what they consider the tendency of some American officials, intent on "building bridges" to the Soviet Union to minimize Soviet espionage practices. . . .

The techniques of objective reporting are adhered to—on the surface. The reporter is careful not to present the views of CIA officials as his own. He objectivizes by using the well-worn phrases "is regarded" and "what they consider." But this veneer of objectivity is suddenly discarded further on in the piece, when the reporter hammers home the message for those who didn't get it earlier:

Elements in the intelligence community have long believed that some American political officials in their desire to "build bridges" have underestimated hostile aspects of Soviet policy including espionage.

This violates a ground rule of balanced reporting; no attempt is made to give the views of the State Department bridge builders, who are the subject of some very serious accusations. And instead of enabling readers to put the accusations in some perspective by reminding them of the bitter feud between CIA and State Department officials, the reporter allows the CIA virtually to dictate the rest of his story.

In publicizing the Runge case, intelligence officials here disavow any desire of reviving the "cold war" mentality. But they are evidently concerned about some State Department officials who are so intent on steps to improve relations with the Soviet Union by stressing such "positive" steps as increased trade . . . that they advocate minimizing news of such "negative" factors as espionage and defections.

This is an insult to the intelligence of the informed reader who knows from other Times news articles that the improvement in relations has proceeded quite apart from the espionage war that continues on by both sides.

Even this story would have been much more honest if it had been presented as the opinion of the reporter, as would happen in a European newspaper. The reader would immediately know the reporter's position and could draw his own conclusion. He cannot do so when the newspaper claims objectivity, for he must assume the impartiality of every reporter in every instance.

Readers of Die Welt, the "independent newspaper for Germany" (a misnomer, but there is otherwise no mistaking Die Welt's conservatism), were long inundated by articles describing the depressed economic conditions under which their countrymen lived in East Germany. The reporters made no secret of their intent: East Germany could never be recognized by Bonn as a second German state because it could not satisfy even the basic needs of its people.

Only after a series of public opinion polls disclosed that a great number of West Germans (including readers of Die Welt) favored such recognition did the paper change its tack. Conditions in the East were thereupon described as vastly improved—as they were—but this was said to be a result of the energy of the people and not of East German socialism. Die Welt's readers continued to seek between the lines for their own opinions. It was easy, because reporters never concealed their biases.

Le Monde is the most brilliant example of the postwar European newspapers that blend information and opinion. Harrison Salisbury of the Times, who himself has often ventured across the arbitrary border between fact and opinion, has said that he is continually fascinated by Le Monde's insights.

An American reading this French paper for the first time is struck by the logical organization of the news by geographical area and by the well-informed commentary. Area experts in the Paris office, who closely follow developments in their region, often add background material to dispatches from correspondents. This practice is followed also at The New York Times, The Washington Post and the Los Angeles Times, but with an important difference. Here, the sidebar piece or shirttail material is usually written by a rewrite man or reporter who would be the first to admit he has little more knowledge of the particular subject than can be gleaned quickly from morgue clippings. It is in this way, also, that misinformation from previous articles is perpetuated.

Foreign correspondents of Le Monde, as of most European and British newspapers, are usually men with a deep interest in the area they cover. They are posted for years in one country and the feeling they develop for it is reflected in their articles. American newspaper executives believe, on the other hand, that a correspondent becomes stale after two or three years in one place, and since a theory prevails that all the world speaks English, he is not often required to have any competence in the language of the country he is to cover. In practice, that makes correspondents dependent on USIA digests of the local press. Foreign employees of their bureaus are usually the only link these correspondents have with the people of the country. A dedicated correspondent will eventually learn the language, but a year elapses before he can understand what officials are saying when they are not condescending to him in English.

"The American reporter is often unsuited by his education and experience for a post abroad," observed Philip Ben, New York correspondent of Le Monde. "We would not think of sending a man to Moscow who does not speak fluent Russian and have a solid background in Soviet affairs. American newspaper editors somehow believe that a good police reporter will make an equally good foreign reporter. No, the world is far too complex for this."

With some outstanding exceptions, past experience supports Mr. Ben's opinion. American correspondents are at their best in times of war or other crisis, when their competitive spirit is aroused. Vietnam, the Middle East War, Greece and Cyprus are made to order for them. Conversely, the worst coverage is in those areas where confusing political and social currents lie below the surface and the reporter must dig.

Thus, Europe, with the exception of Times coverage of Spain and of West Germany since 1966, has been badly reported in the United States. It is paradoxical that while editors complain of lack of space for foreign news, they continue to fill their columns with repetitive light features on the crowded highways of Western Europe (they clog a little more each year) or the used car market in Warsaw. This latter item is discovered by every new Times correspondent in Poland.

To the credit of its present foreign editor, the Times is now attempting to banish the junk feature and to improve coverage in the noncrisis areas. But the unwieldy structure of the newspaper, the lack of expert knowledge among intermediate news managers and processors, and the complacency of many correspondents make real progress questionable.

The rigid division and rivalries among foreign, national and city desks on leading American newspapers prevents them from ever relating stories on domestic problems—in housing, deteriorating city centers, welfare, etc.—with the experiences of other countries in these areas. European papers often enlighten their readers with international comparisons of this sort. Europe's revitalized cities may not answer all our questions, but editors are not even interested in asking them.

The reader who accumulates all his knowledge of Europe from the best American newspapers and who then visits Europe for the first time, or after a long absence, is dismayed that what he read conveyed so little of the immediate reality of these countries—how the people live. Louis Heren, Washington correspondent of The Times of London, quoted a reviewer in The Times Literary Supplement on the attitude of American officials toward Europe. It could equally be said of too many newspaper editors:

Their idea of Europe is a place of ruins, perhaps picturesque, quaint and civilized, but lacking in the prime reality conferred by the American present. One must also add lacking in power, hence the increasing preoccupation with the Soviet Union.

American editors who have long looked to British quality newspapers for inspiration in foreign coverage would be better advised to read Le Monde, Neue Zürcher Zeitung and Die Zeit. A recent issue of The Times of London told the story: Not one foreign news item was considered important enough for the front page, while a dozen important European newspapers, The New York Times and The Washington Post thought otherwise.

Yet British quality newspapers remain more literate, lively and direct than their American counterparts. One often encounters the reporter's provocative, unanswered question, which may cause a reader to think more than a whole array of facts.

One British and Continental practice that helps penetrate the often narrow outlook of editors is the publishing of views by knowledgeable outsiders on current political, social and cultural topics. A recent Times of London piece by Prof. Fred Hoyle placed the raging debate on British productivity in perspective:

In fairness it must be said that Americans do not achieve high productivity without social disadvantages. The pressure of American life is a form of communal urgency which prevents worthwhile relaxation. . . . I would have sympathy with a critic who argued that we do not want this sort of thing here, and that Britain, in spite of all its faults, is still a more pleasant place in which to live than the United States. My answer is that a margin of 200 per cent between the two ways of life leaves ample scope for a compromise that could be better than either.

In cultural writing the European press is consistently superior to the best American newspapers. Significantly, the Americans assign such material to the cultural news or entertainment department, which is usually subordinate to the city desk. It is not surprising, thus, that there must always be a news peg for a story on the arts and sciences, and most often a contrived one. Here again, there is little American quality newspapers can learn from their British counterparts, except to place emphasis on criticism rather than on mere reviewing of the arts. On the Continent, where newspapers maintain independent culture departments, staffed by writers educated in the arts, freedom from the arbitrarily tight deadline results in coverage which is useful to the expert and stimulates the proverbial tired businessman.

Perhaps the greatest and least excusable failing of American newspapers has been their indifference toward the quality of their environment. Apart from excellent but infrequent articles on city planning and architecture by Ada Louise Huxtable in the Times and Wolf von Eckardt in The Washington Post, newspapers have refused to deal with the very factors in the cities which have been producing the "urban crisis," a phrase they never tire of repeating.

American newspaper editors, like the public in general, are not seriously determined to achieve livable cities, although they occasionally pay lip service to the goal in editorials. The problems of the cities are treated in pot-shot fashion. The New York Times runs a slew of news stories on vest pocket parks after Mayor Lindsay appears at one prospective site in Harlem; or it devotes a front-page article to route and schedule changes in the subway system, with great detail on the expected improvements in service (none of which have come about). The article never touches on the question of whether the city has any long-range plan to modernize decrepit subway stations and install effective directional signs. It may be that Transit Authority spokesmen are not eager to discuss such matters, but that hardly excuses the reporter for having become a transmitter of news releases.

British and Continental newspapers show far more concern for the quality of city life. A typical article in The Observer earlier this year criticized London's beautification program for city squares. The reporter noted the ubiquitous flower beds: "No attempt at all to plant with wit and elegance." He cited the beautifully polished drinking fountain which doesn't work, the standard-issue park seats, the litter bin and five instant trees. Granted that American reporters might have some trouble finding flower beds to criticize, there is enough else. This kind of reporting, with suggestions for improvement, causes European city officials to listen and eventually act.

When American newspapers do touch on such questions, the precepts of balanced news reporting prevent them from advocating change. It is as if there were an unwritten rule that city officials are not to be unduly antagonized, lest the flow of handouts and exclusive leaks be jeopardized. The unwitting reporter who does suggest a story on, let us say, the miserable state of New York City's sidewalks, is asked by his editors, "What's the news peg?" That the city's sidewalks are creviced and potholed and in worse condition than in any major Western city is a condition they accept as too normal for comment. And comment in any case is what they seek to avoid. If the reporter persists, he is told to see the responsible city officials—the traditional source for an optimistic report on what is being planned for the next five years "to continue the newly expanded repair program."

The reporter resigns himself to setting down the facts. But he has been so indoctrinated with the notion that it would be highly unprofessional of him to have an opinion—and close to immoral to express it—that the facts themselves often escape his grasp.

THE NEW MEXICAN LAND WAR

CLARK KNOWLTON

Mr. Knowlton heads the Department of Sociology at the University of Texas, El Paso. For the past eight years, he has been working intensively and writing widely about the plight of Mexican Americans, and in general about the problem of poverty in the Southwest.

El Paso

Fear hangs low over the green mountains of impoverished R'io Arriba County in northern New Mexico. Its tendrils swirl down the mountain sides into the irregular streets of the half-abandoned Spanish-American adobe villages. Local inhabitants tend strictly to their own affairs. Strangers are carefully observed and avoided. Guns and dogs are kept at the bedside. Fear penetrates the isolated ranch houses of the intruding Anglo-American ranchers who hire gunmen to protect their families and property. Fear chills the atmosphere around the ranger stations. Rangers avoid the isolated sections of the national forests. It is Alianza country. Fear glints from the badges of heavily armed state troopers and deputy sheriffs patrolling the roads and watching activities in the villages. The picturesque mountains are empty of hikers and campers.

Fear, although thicker today, has always haunted the hills and valleys of northern New Mexico. For almost 250 years, Spanish-American villagers and ranchers slowly moved northward against firm Indian resistance and without much government support. Unable to secure guns and ammunition until the coming of the Americans, Spanish-American frontiersmen adopted the lances, bows and arrows of their Indian opponents. The situation in many respects came to resemble that of the Scottish-English border of the 17th century. Apache, Navajo, Comanche and Spanish-American war parties regularly tithed one another's herds, crops and children. At the same time, an intensive trade in horses, slaves, hides, furs and other products was carried on.

Each village, socially and physically isolated by mountainous topography, heavy winter snows, lack of roads, chronic Indian attacks and poverty, became a small, self-contained and slowly changing peasant world. The villagers, without schools or priests, had little contact for almost 300 years with other European groups. The distinctive peasant culture that evolved is somewhat different from the culture of other Spanish-speaking groups in the Southwest, and the reluctance of the village people to leave their villages except for short visits has always been recognized in New Mexico. The world outside was strange, alien and dangerous. Little sense of identity with any social unit larger than the village community has existed among these Spanish Americans until very recently. The concepts of ethnic solidarity, regionalism, or nationalism have had little meaning for them.

In 1847, the Spanish Americans were absorbed into the United States by military conquest and against their will. Although their property and civil rights were presumably protected by the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo that ended the Mexican War, the Spanish Americans were treated as a conquered people by the incoming Anglos. Abandoned by both the American and Mexican Governments, the rural, illiterate, Spanish-speaking village people, with little knowledge of American laws and customs, were left to the contemptuous mercy of the ruthless, dynamic, materialistic, individualistic frontier culture.

Ranchers with six-shooters drove them from their grazing lands. Businessmen entrapped them with credit and foreclosures. Anglo-American-controlled sheriffs seized their small farms and ranches for nonpayment of the hated land tax. State and federal agencies confiscated large areas of their lands without compensation. The Spanish Americans were caught in the web of unfamiliar political, economic and judicial systems. Stripped of their lands, they were reduced to the position of a rural proletariat. One authority estimates that the Spanish Americans from the 1880s to the 1930s lost more than 2 million acres of private lands and 1.7 million acres of communal lands to private holders, 1.8 million acres to the state government, and an even vaster but uncounted acreage to the federal government. The destruction of the Spanish-American rural village economy created a large depressed region marked by rates of disease, malnutrition, hunger, infant mortality, unemployment and welfare at least as high as similar rates among the Negroes of Mississippi.

Molded by their past experiences, the Spanish Americans are fearful and profoundly skeptical of the moral structure of the American political system. It is doubtful that many of them have ever understood its values or processes. And that is not surprising, since it is equally doubtful that these values or processes have ever been applied to northern New Mexico. To the local people, organized government is a conspiracy against the common welfare. Those individuals of Spanish-American origin who enter politics are dismissed as having sold out to the Anglo-Americans. Quite often the Spanish Americans are right.

Few state or federal political candidates ever visit the roadless Spanish-American settlements in the mountain canyons and valleys. Once every two years, political caravans tour the larger and more accessible villages. Alcohol, promises, money and oratory flow freely. Political manifestoes in debased Spanish (it is the one time that the Spanish language is even recognized in New Mexico) are widely distributed. Votes are bought and sold. The caravan departs in the morning, promises forgotten. For more than fifty years, Republican programs and Democratic programs have come in fanfare and departed in stealth, while social and economic conditions in northern New Mexico have continued to deteriorate.

The fires of discontent have always burned in the northern mountains. The anger flares up in an epidemic of fence cutting, barn and ranch-house burnings, and warnings to the Anglo-American ranchers and politicians to vacate Spanish-American lands. Cries for law and order bring out the troops and the National Guard. Numerous Spanish Americans are jailed, their protest organizations are repressed, their leaders are exiled, assassinated or imprisoned. The flames die down and the Anglo-Americans forget. However, the names and exploits of past Spanish-American leaders are kept alive in the stories and chronicles told and sung in the village bars. A new Spanish-American generation appears; new causes of protest arise; new protest organizations develop. The cycle starts all over again.

Anger, bitterness and resentment are blazing hot today. State officials armed with writs are traveling from village to village requiring that villagers prove their title to the irrigation water they use. Centuries-old Spanish-American customs of water use and ownership are being disregarded. The villagers are convinced that they are to lose their water as they lost their land. Spanish-American grazing rights in the national forests have been sharply reduced in the past two or three years. The small herds of beef cattle and sheep are thus forcibly reduced, since the village people have no other source of range. Anglo-American horses still graze freely in the forests. Hundreds of small farming and ranching families are faced with either emigrating to the urban slums or going on welfare.

The breaking point came suddenly in 1967. Thirteen fires were deliberately set that summer in the national forests. Anglo-American ranchers, schoolteachers, social workers and government employees reported growing hostility in the rural areas. Armed Spanish Americans were observed in the high mountains. Cars and pick-up trucks avoiding the police, whose presence is as heavy in northern New Mexico as is that of the civil guards in rural Spain, scurried from one village to another. Meetings took place in most of the villages. The local people bitterly denounced the closing of village schools, the lack of roads, malnutrition, loss of land and water, discrimination, erosion of grazing rights, and the failure of state or federal government agencies to pay attention to Spanish-American needs and aspirations. The Alianza Federal de Mercedes—the Federal Alliance of Land Grantees, now known as the Alliance of Free City States—is the largest, the fastest growing, the most vigorous, and the most important of a number of Spanish-American protest organizations. Formed around 1963, it was largely ignored by the Anglo-American community, and noticed only with ridicule by the press, which defined it as but one more of the many absurd organizations the Spanish Americans were always forming. Its meetings from 1963 to 1965 were attended largely by the rural poor, elderly Spanish Americans who still had hopes of recovering the lands taken from them.

In 1966, its membership began to spurt. Alianza organizers became active in most of the villages. Young people and veterans began to attend its meetings. Rural poor and urban poor flocked into its ranks. The message of the Alianza was simple and to the point: "You have been robbed of your lands, your water rights, your grazing rights, your language and your culture by the Anglo-Americans. No one is interested in helping you. Join us. Together, we will get the land back—preferably through the courts or Congress, but one way or another we will get it back." More and more Spanish Americans began to believe.

Reies Lopez Tijerina, the tall, thin, nervous president of the Alianza, casts a growing shadow across New Mexico. A walking encyclopedia of land-grant history, he has traveled to Spain and to Mexico in search of data on the question. Constantly on the move from one village to another, he tirelessly repeats to receptive audiences the old stories of Spanish-American wrongs. Compelling and dynamic, he uses the common Spanish better than any other Spanish-American leader in New Mexico. To the despair of reporters and newcasters, he is capable of speaking for five or six hours at a time. He is now in jail, but he still dominates the scene.

The intensity of Tijerina's bitterness stems from his own history. He was born on September 21, 1923, into a poor rural migrant family in Falls City, Tex. His father, thrice widowed, raised ten children. The family moved in the migrant stream from the Lower Rio Grande Valley up to the Midwest and back through the Panhandle of Texas. Tijerina relates that he attended twenty different schools for a total of six months' education. He says that as a child he saw his family driven away from three farms at the point of an owner's gun, to avoid the payment of wages. His father had the tendons of one leg cut during a fight with Texas Rangers. Ranchers and rangers twice almost lynched his paternal grandfather in land conflicts around Laredo.

The New Testament changed the course of Tijerina's life. A Baptist minister left a copy with the family during a visit to a migrant labor camp in the Midwest. Tijerina read it through before falling asleep that night. In his sleep, he dreamed that he had been called to be a spiritual leader of his people. Leaving the harvest fields, he enrolled at an Assembly of God seminary in Ysleta, Tex. He was licensed as a minister and became an itinerant minister and missionary, working as a migrant and preaching in the fields and camps. To the despair of his wife, he thrice gave away everything he owned to needy migrants. He finally lost his license to preach when he told his audience that they had no right to give money to the church when their families were in need.

Leading a small congregation, he moved to Pima County, Ariz. The group worked together and managed to accumulate enough money to buy a piece of land. They built houses for their families and, by farming a little themselves and working for neighboring ranchers and farmers and in nearby towns, the small group eked out a living. At first, they got along well with their Anglo-American neighbors; then, it was announced that the site containing their land had been selected for the development of a retirement colony, and land values began to rise. Tijerina and his group refused to sell. Their refusal incensed the other owners and neighbors. Accusations of burglary, immorality, trespass and Communist activities circulated in the county Houses and other buildings were burned, and there were several violent encounters between Tijerina and the Anglo-Americans. In the end, Tijerina and a small group of families moved to Tierra Amarilla, N.M.

Tierra Amarilla, founded by Spanish-American pioneers who often rose against Spanish and Mexican governors, has always been a center of anti-American sentiment. The land grant on which the town and its neighbors stood was appropriated by prominent Anglo-American politicians in the last half of the 19th century. Their descendants sold the acreage to land and cattle companies. The directors of these companies have long been campaigning to clear the land of its Spanish-American inhabitants, many of whose ancestors were among the original settlers. The Spanish Americans organized small secret societies to cut the fences, burn the houses and barns, and snipe at the incoming ranchers. In typical Spanish-American manner, few lives were taken. The Spanish Americans abhor killing in cold blood.

Reies Tijerina and his little group of followers became embroiled in the land conflicts. It is rumored that he was active with one or more secret Spanish-American societies of night riders. In any case, enraged ranchers believed that he was and threatened to kill him. As a result, he moved to Albuquerque and there worked as a janitor in a Protestant church while organizing the Alianza Federal de Mercedes.

Like wrestlers in a game of catch as catch can, the Alianza and the Forest Service circled each other cautiously through 1966 and the early spring of 1967, with state and federal law-enforcement agencies acting as interested referees. The Alianza searched for a hold that would flip the Forest Service into a federal court suit to determine the validity of forest land titles. The Forest Service, aware of growing Spanish-American hostility toward its grazing policies and knowing that its titles were flawed, called for assistance from the referees.

Alianza leaders soon found a weak point in Forest Service defenses. A section of the Kit Carson National Forest containing the Echo Amphitheatre public camp ground near Chama, N.M., was once part of a Spanish-American land grant. The titles of the villagers who had owned the land had never quite been quashed. The Alianza quietly called a series of meetings and told the local people that if they cooperated they might get some of their land back. A village organization was constituted with mayor, judge, council and sheriff.

Publicly advertised camp-ins were held at the camp ground. Reporters were in attendance. Forest signs were replaced with notices that the land once again belonged to the community of San Joaquin de Rio Chama. Trespassers, including forest personnel, were warned to keep out. Several trees were cut to symbolize the change of ownership. Although a group of rangers and forest investigators watched the scene from a nearby ridge line, they did not come near the meetings. State police cars cruised in front of the camp ground, but did not enter. It looked as though the Alianza had won.

Then on the morning of October 22, 1966, when another camp-in was scheduled, the Forest Service acted. Two forest rangers and one forest investigator stationed themselves at the camp-ground entrance to require that all entering cars buy camping permits. A cluster of state police watched from the highway. A caravan of cars driven by Alianza members and sympathizers pulled up to the entrance. Asked to buy camping permits by the rangers, although no attempt had been made to sell them to people already on the ground, the drivers refused. The caravan started up again, and the rangers had to jump aside to avoid being run over. Hot words were exchanged. People left their cars and, joined by some already there, grabbed the rangers. There were cries in Spanish of "Lynch them," "Kill them" and "Now it is our turn." Reies Tijerina, his brother, and other Alianza leaders pushed their way into the crowd and took charge of the rangers. They led them to a table behind which sat the judge of the presumed village. The judge, a bizarre Anglo-American pretender to the Spanish throne, found them guilty of trespass and ordered them to leave the area. The rangers did so. The state police, in their role of referees, studied faces and noted license numbers.

After many months, federal attorneys in Albuquerque pressed charges. Further months of legal haggling ensued during which the original charges were found defective, withdrawn, and replaced by new charges. The federal jury list for Albuquerque was challenged because it lacked Spanish Americans. The case was finally transferred from the friendly climate of northern New Mexico to the frosty atmosphere of Anglo-American southern New Mexico. Although the Alianza leaders claimed that they had rescued the rangers from bodily harm, a jury found them guilty in a Las Cruces courtroom of conspiracy to interfere with federal officials in the performance of their duty and of assault upon two forest rangers. A federal judge who permitted considerable bullying of defense witnesses sentenced the defendants to jail terms starting at six months and going up to two years for Reies Tijerina. The defendants were allowed bail. Round one, a very ambivalent victory, had gone to the Forest Service and the law enforcement agencies.

Tensions over land, water, and grazing rights accelerated during 1966 and the early spring of 1967. The Alianza sponsored in Albuquerque a series of heavily at tended meetings, where Anglo-American culture, the federal and state governments and the more conformist Spanish-American politicians were violently attacked. Representatives of militant Negro and Indian civil rights groups pledged support to the Alianza. Fraternal delegations attended from Spanish-speaking organizations throughout the Southwest. The meetings were widely reported, and New Mexico became charged with fear, excitement and unrest. Ranchers, newspapers and businessmen began to demand that the Alianza be stopped. A federal judge ordered the Alianza to turn over its membership lists. The demand was refused.

David Cargo, the Governor of New Mexico, is a maverick Republican who won his office in part because the Spanish Americans had become disenchanted with the indifference of the Democratic Party to their demands and aspirations. He is married to a Spanish-American woman who had been a member of the Alianza. Cargo now began to visit many Spanish-American villages, accompanied by reporters. After listening quietly to the often bitterly stated problems and needs of the village populations, the Governor brought these matters to the attention of the state. The first governor in more than twenty years to take the Spanish Americans seriously, he made systematic inroads into the weakening position of the Democratic Party in northern New Mexico.

To the great disgust of the state police and many Anglo-Americans, Cargo started to negotiate quietly with the Alianza. An agreement was worked out. An Alianza camp-ground meeting scheduled for June 5, 1967, could take place. There would be no police interference as long as there was no violence, destruction of property or violation of the laws of the state. The Alianza went ahead with plans for the meeting, the inflammatory language of its advance proclamations cooling perceptibly.

The day before the meeting, Governor Cargo flew to Michigan to meet with Governor Romney and to attend a Republican fund-raising dinner. A few hours after his departure, two Democrats—Alfonso Sanchez, state district attorney, former Alianza lawyer, but long-time Alianza opponent, and Captain Joseph Black, state police chief—went on the air to announce that the meeting was banned. They denounced the leaders as radical agitators and con artists, the members as dupes; they threatened to arrest any member of the Alianza who came near the camp ground. Orders of arrest were issued for Reies Tijerina and other Alianza officials. Road blocks went up. The Alianza membership list was found in a car stopped on the road to the meeting. Shortly thereafter many people lost their jobs.

Reies Lopez Tijerina and most of the important leaders of the Alianza eluded the police blockade. Furious and feeling that their agreement with the Governor had been broken by the state, they decided to resort to violence. A raiding party was formed to attack the county courthouse at Tierra Amarilla, seize Alfonso Sanchez, and free arrested Alianza members.

District Judge Paul Scarborough was sitting on the morning of the raid; Sanchez sent an assistant to present the state's case. The judge dismissed the charges against the Alianza members on the ground that the evidence against them was inadequate; the defendants left the courtroom. A few minutes later, the armed raiding party entered the courthouse and forced everyone present to lie down on the floor. The Alianzistas searched for Alfonso Sanchez and for their missing members. Finding neither, they were at a loss. Two deputy sheriffs and a janitor were wounded; one of the deputies subsequently died. The raiders finally seized two hostages and fled toward the mountains, dodging their way through police blockades.

At the news of the raid, panic and confusion swept the state offices in Santa Fe. The northern mountains, so close to the state capital, suddenly became ominous. A mass Spanish-American uprising was rumored to be slaughtering the Anglo-American population in the north. Guerrilla bands, secretly trained and led by Cuban army officers, were said to be marching on Santa Fe. Other guerrilla forces were believed, in the hysteria, to be establishing bases in the remote mountain areas, and revolutionary urban cells of the Alianza to be planning to set fire to Santa Fe and Albuquerque.

The Lieutenant Governor called out the National Guard. Units equipped with artillery and tanks, and accompanied by heavily armed state police, sheriff posses and Apache tribal police, swept through the Spanish-American villages and manned road blocks on all approaches to the area. Though martial law had not been declared, they broke into homes without warrants, detained men, women and children in a sheep corral for many hours with no food and no water except that contained in a polluted sheep tank. Private property was confiscated and suspects were held. Every Spanish American was suspect. A large part of northern New Mexico was treated as though it were an enemy country in the process of occupation.

Early on the morning of January 3, the body of Eulogio Salazar, a resident of Tierra Amarilla and a major state witness to the Alianza raid on the courthouse there, was found on the road near his house. He had been beaten to death. The bail bonds for Reies Tijerina and the Alianza members accused of taking part in the court raid were immediately revoked, and the men were rounded up during the day. Their jailing sent another violent controversy swirling through the state. Police officers and a good part of the press believed automatically that the Alianza was guilty of Salazar's murder, while Alianza sympathizers claimed that the men were being tried without evidence in the court of public opinion. Throughout the week, the police searched for evidence to convict the Alianza, while the press, television and radio discussed the implications of the case. Finally District Judge Joe Angel, appalled by the publicity, signed a gag rule prohibiting any discussion of the murder by public officials.

The Alianza members jailed for the crime were brought before the state supreme court. Their lawyers argued that the bail revocation was "arbitrary, capricious, a naked exercise of judicial power without any rational basis in fact." Under questioning, District Attorney Sanchez said that the state had no direct proof that any Alianza member was involved in Salazar's murder. He therefore was unable to file charges against any of them, although he seemed convinced of their guilt. Captain Black stated: "Tijerina is bound to be tied into it somewhere." The supreme court on January 17 ordered that bond be reinstated for all the arrested Alianza members except Reies Tijerina and three others, holding that they, through their participation in the raid on the courthouse, had been involved in a capital crime.

The death of the deputy sheriff wounded in the courthouse raid remains unresolved. The district attorney and the head of the state police maintain that Reies Tijerina and the Alianza are responsible. Persistent rumors from the Spanish-American population of Tierra Amarilla blame a small group of Anglo-American militants, ranchers and small businessmen, who are believed to have done it to incriminate the Alianza. Other rumors spreading widely have it that the police also killed Salazar to remove a witness on the verge of changing his testimony.

Judge Angel on February 8, at the close of extensive hearings on the courthouse raid, ordered Reies Tijerina and ten Alianza members bound over for trial. Charges against them were reduced from first-degree kidnaping to false imprisonment. The judge ordered that all defendants be freed when bonds were made. Charges against nine defendants, including Tijerina's beautiful 19-year-old daughter Rose, were dismissed.

On April 28, Reies Tijerina spoke to the Mexican-American student convention sponsored by No Más, a student organization on the campus of the University of Texas at El Paso. The administration had barred Tijerina from speaking on campus, so the meeting was transferred to a local motel. Back in Albuquerque, Tijerina, along with twelve other Alianza members, was arrested once again by Alfonso Sanchez and Captain Black. Twenty-five counts of second-degree kidnaping and two counts of robbery and the carrying of concealed weapons were placed against the defendants by a hand-picked grand jury in Rio Arriba County. It should be noted that these charges of kidnaping had been thrown out by Judge Angel. Bail was set at $20,500 for each defendant.

These latest charges are but further steps in a long series of arrests and releases on bail designed to bankrupt the Alianza and its supporters and to keep Reies Tijerina and other Alianza leaders behind bars. Although the Governor, the state legislature and the federal agencies have done nothing to diminish the tragic social-economic conditions in northern New Mexico that give rise to movements such as the Alianza, the state and federal law-enforcement agencies have adopted a repressive policy that will inevitably spark violence throughout the Southwest. Apparently, New Mexico must experience a serious outbreak of rural and urban terror before the authorities learn that repression and jailing are not the answer to Spanish-American problems. Reies Tijerina has become a martyr, a hero and the very symbol of the hopes and aspirations of militant young Mexican-American and Spanish-American groups from Los Angeles to San Antonio.

The massive violation of human and civil rights, the mistreatment of large numbers of rural Spanish Americans, many of whom had nothing to do with the Alianza, and the absolute refusal, thus far, of the Department of Justice and the Commission on Civil Rights to take any stand, have driven a wedge between the Spanish Americans of the north and the state and federal governments that will require years to overcome. Guerrilla warfare remains a distinct possibility. Groups more militant and deeper underground than the Alianza are being formed. The situation is not unlike that of Ireland just before the "Risings." A brooding calm now lies over the northern hills.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Good-by, Corbusier

THE RADIANT CITY. By Le Corbusier. Orion Press. Distributed by Grossman Publishers. 348 pp. $22.50.

LA TOURETTE. By Anton Henze. George Wittenborn & Co. 72 pp. $4.50.

DESIGN OF CITIES. By Edmund N. Bacon. The Viking Press. 296 pp. $15.

NATHAN SILVER

Mr. Silver is an American architect who is a member of Churchill College, Cambridge University, where he teaches at the School of Architecture. He is architecture critic of the New Statesman and author of Lost New York (Houghton Mifflin).

Besides being the subject of countless books, Le Corbusier wrote some thirty himself. Of these the most important are undoubtedly his first, Vers une Architecture (1923—called Towards a New Architecture in its English translation) and The Radiant City (1935). The first, in sum, was a lecture on the relation between architecture and technology: the necessity of finding an art to match our technology before we could have an architecture to call our own. Though the message wasn't by any means original, upon reading it young architects through half the world were influenced to believe not only in the possibility of une Architecture, as fit as any of the past but in practice a New Architecture. Towards a New Architecture was published in English four years after its appearance in French. The English edition of The Radiant City took an unaccountable thirty-two years to be published, but now at last we also have this second conspicuous work by Le Corbusier, in approximately the same format as its French edition, with a few 1964 notes by the master. And about time too. Though the words are new to us, the book has probably been the most important single influence on the modern shape of American cities.

It is clear to me now that the words were the least of it. Le Corbusier's literary style is in the evangelical mode familiar to readers on architecture who are acquainted with the writings of Frank Lloyd Wright, Buckminster Fuller or Louis Kahn. The mode goes back at least to Ruskin: Louis Sullivan had the best architectural-evangelical (or "poetic") style. Le Corbusier's text is a repetitious lot of statements, letters, doctrines, refutations; at the beginning of one section he even apologizes because he didn't catch on until too late that the chapter appeared in an earlier work. But this book sometimes also provides germane explanations, and many revealing pictures, of Corbu's town planning theories as applied—but never carried out—in Paris, Geneva, Rio, São Paulo, Montevideo, Buenos Aires, Algiers, Moscow, Antwerp, Barcelona, Stockholm, Nemours and Piace. These vain studies were mostly undertaken at the encouragement of local officials, which explains why Le Corbusier's ironic dedication (and his polemical tone) is directed to "AUTHORITY."

Paris got the most exhaustive treatment. Corbu's position was that, by historical demonstration, an old city must always be replaced by a new one. He therefore produced a series of schemes for the center of Paris which simply assumed the demolition of what was there, and the creation instead of gleaming high buildings set far apart, on columns (pilotis) with a landscape running through. First there was his City of Three Million Inhabitants (1922). Then his Voisin Plan, named in tribute to an enlightened motor-car manufacturer (the scheme dates from about 1925): the main housing towers seen from above are like four croix de Lorraine arranged into a larger cross. Then came the Radiant City itself, shown in the book by means of plates prepared for a CIAM conference (the Congrès Internationale d'Architecture Moderne, which Corbu helped to found).

The Radiant City is a scheme for a rigorously zoned urban anthropos, all head (administration), torso (housing), and hands (manufacture). Crisscrossing it are superimposed circulation grids, rectilinear and diagonal, for cars and subways—the grid lines far apart. Housing here takes the form of endless slabs, widening and narrowing to form courtyard spaces on both sides of the slabs (called redents). These courtyards were all to be over 1,000 feet wide, the buildings all the same height and on pilotis so that, as in his earlier plans, the landscape could run through with community services and sports facilities.

There are no strictly functional bugs in the scheme if you accept Le Corbusier's Spartan apartment layouts and the general principle of separated city elements. He works out the kind of redents that are geometrically best; he carefully turns his plan so apartments get maximum sunlight. His highway network is designed complete with road inter-sections, and the car parking is related to building entrances. He lays out nurseries, schools and sports grounds. Cross sections show how the roads are high above the ground. Interior "streets" in the redents contain local shopping and other neighborhood facilities. A typical office building is designed. Le Corbusier even prepares drawings and gets testimonials to show that the Radiant City would be effective against aerial bombardment, with roofs specially reinforced, ground coverage at minimum—and poison gas would be blown away by the wind through the pilotis. Best of all, he argues, the Radiant City would hold over 1,000 people per hectare, a suitably high density for those who mean cities to survive. Yet it would lack dark corridor streets and gloomy light wells.

There are two other schemes presented in the book which I ought to mention, though hundreds of illustrations explain a score or more urban design projects. One is Le Corbusier's remarkable plan for Algiers, begun in 1931 and modified many times before it was finally rejected in 1934. Here a highway through the hills facing the sea makes a continuous undulating building, housing beneath it 180,000 people. The drawings of this scheme—particularly the one at the top of page 247—are great iconographic revelations, like many of those of the Radiant City also: they are imaginary pictures of a new urban life to be lived in direct confrontation with nature.

The second scheme is one for Antwerp, the Radiant City redents this time adapted to fit a meander of the Schelde River. About a portion of the site plan Le Corbusier says:

We worked on this study for months. It is the strict representation of all the solutions found for countless individual problems, dealt with according to a systematic doctrine of city planning. It "works" everywhere! High buildings perform general functions but man—the city dweller—is taken into consideration. Try it, let him walk around in every part of this plan: he is at ease here and finds stimulation and joy. The stroller finds pleasure; and the citizen, a source of pride.

The plan is a detailed layout showing the variety of events at ground level in among the Antwerp redents, and I tried "walking through it." It really is fine.

I want to be clear about my attitude toward Le Corbusier. I believe he was indeed (as he saw himself) the Michelangelo of our own time, the greatest artist of architectural form since Pal-radio. Turning pages in the seven-volume Oeuvre Complète compiled by Boesiger (let alone visiting one of his buildings), one is amazed and moved. In building something one always seeks ingenuity. But beyond that, as Le Corbusier says in Towards a New Architecture, "suddenly you touch my heart, you do me good, I am happy and I say: 'This is beautiful.'" Le Corbusier's buildings always do that to me. The small picture book by Henze about Corbu's Dominican monastery of La Tourette (1960) demonstrates well some of the reasons why: it describes the studies he made, his care, his consideration for the objectives of the inhabitants (Corbu was a Swiss-born Protestant), the revisions and reconsiderations—and most of all, of course, the plastic reality of what he did. The form of La Tourette is the work of a man who understood his own culture from modern monasticism to technology, with piercing insight also toward both art and nature. With all this, I ought to give his work nothing but the highest praise. What stops me?

The certain feeling that something is missing, which becomes embarrassing for him now and then. In some very few of Le Corbusier's architectural works, and in his book The Radiant City most clearly, he shows that his identification with people is (to make a careful distinction) almost exclusively cultural and hardly at all social. What I mean is this. Le Corbusier has the most profound understanding of objects, whether buildings or systems or techniques—or trees or mountains, for that matter. He not only knows how to use formwork to mold concrete, he realizes the precise impact the finished form will have on a sensitive soul who has had a lifetime of cultural orientation toward Roman aqueducts, Euclidean geometry, Cubist painting, sunlight and city dust. Le Corbusier has an acute sense of history (the proposed demolition of Paris notwithstanding); he knows what "style" means in its most secret depths. In short, he is a cultural genius. He is one of the handful of men in a given time who can shape the world of objects because they truly understand them. And Le Corbusier plots this world with Cartesian logic.

But strictly speaking, culture and society are different matters. Le Corbusier can locate man without any trouble in his culture, but, a few vague egalitarian notions aside, he has shallow ideas about people's behavior; he shuns politics, he cares nothing for human differences. He knows more than enough to be able to make buildings work, of course. But he reveals his bafflement with people, the cranky wretches, in most of his writing—the politicians (sordid compromisers by definition), the opponents to his schemes (petty-minded busybodies), the conservationists (blinded against the new

THE SEDENTARIES

most of the time we sit down to write 'sitting down' down

Mark Twain made a contraption enabled him to be funny in bed in writing

Goethe and Hemingway risked varicose veins at the highdesk

sitting down we get fat round the ass

short poems not too frequent are the least fattening

if you're sitting down while reading this now is the time to get up

ANSELM HOLLO

age). His anecdotes constantly reveal it; he is a true ivory-tower inhabitant, indifferent to mundane society and social norms; a Wagner, a Sherlock Holmes. He is amazed to learn (in one anecdote) that his secretary of ten years' employment lives in a dreary suburb, hasn't enough money, is bored! And on the very first page of text of The Radiant City, Le Corbusier says: "I don't like parties and it is years since I set foot in one What would we learn at a party? The closing prices? Gossip? And what would we do there? Engage in a useless exchange of uncertain remarks."

Obvious inferences could be drawn from insight into a character such as Le Corbusier's; whether truly radical originals like him could function at all if enmeshed in a social tangle, for instance (though one remembers Tolstoy and Marx and wonders). Certainly Frank Lloyd Wright was a social dropout along similar lines. There are plenty of pat explanations about artistic temperament to account for it all, if not to make us also puzzle whether a "great" architect, as we have now come to think of one, must abstain from petty social concerns to get on with his work. But remember that I am not talking about utopian planners like Owen, Saint-Simon, Fourier or Godin, who ignored social norms to achieve basic new social objectives. I believe Le Corbusier really had only cultural objectives.

The great evidence of this is the obvious failure of the Radiant City (though not the plans for Algiers or details for Antwerp) as a city for people. It fails because of its lack of places allowing urban interaction, for all its high density; because of the Cartesian fragmentation of things needing to coexist in daily life; because the equality for all is sought merely through uniformity rather than a better individual normality. Le Corbusier's plan for the destruction of familiar places and his apartments so stiflingly small are only symptomatic of the rest. Jane Jacobs has given Le Corbusier no less than he deserves in holding his influence responsible for much of American postwar planning; I have elsewhere disparaged his ideas about a Radiant City for New York (as described in Le Corbusier's When the Cathedrals Were White). It is only necessary to add that the American planning Mrs. Jacobs criticizes wasn't unsuccessful because it was merely half-hearted Le Corbusier—the Radiant City itself would have been worse, however sublime in form.

There is now a sort of watershed in the architectural profession that separates older architects, for whom Le Corbusier was the inspired master in everything, from mostly younger architects (younger than about 35) who have some reservation in their acclaim of him. Perhaps because these younger architects didn't live through the heroic days when Corbu was forming the CIAM, or when he was losing important commissions to academic architects, or when he was standing almost alone as propagandist and prime mover of the modern movement, they think of him with less reverence than do their elders.

At any rate I'm sure it is well that this is so, because Le Corbusier, the modern movement and all that may really belong on the other side of a greater watershed in architecture itself. That divide is the new one that separates architecture as a principally artistic-culture phenomenon from architecture as a social instrument (which is not to say that culture doesn't remain part of it). Really significant architectural contributions to social advance are possible now, and maybe actually essential. If younger architects can bring off this kind of new New Architecture, against all the inertia the architectural profession alone has allowed through past indifference, it will be worth saying good-by to Le Corbusier.

Saying that will still leave him with the honors he deserves: with Palladio, he has been the most imitated of architects; with Michelangelo, the most inventive of new form; with Bernini, the most acclaimed in his own lifetime. It's enough. His designs for cities must be kept aside. Perhaps it is too much really to expect one man to master both great assignments and also vast ones. Imitators of his panache in presenting city plans —like Edmund N. Bacon with his book Design of Cities—merely copy the form but lack all the formal genius. Design of Cities is a flashy book that exploits the good will we still give to virtuoso creators, without however deserving any of it. It deliberately muddles tactics with strategy, presents merely pretty buildings as good ones, and puts about the impression that great cities must be made by strong men. Le Corbusier would have smiled ruefully because, the strongest of all, he learned otherwise.

Passengers Will Please Refrain

TO HELL IN A DAY COACH: An Exasperated Look at American Railroads. By Peter Lyon. J. B. Lippincott Co. 324 pp. $5.95.

GEORGE ZABRISKIE

Mr. Zabriskie is a long-distance commuter (Washington to Harpers Ferry, W. Va., via B&O). He is a member of the Railway and Locomotive Historical Society and the Canadian Railroad Historical Association, and has written "The Cylinder Cars" and "A Century of Steam Locomotives," among other articles on railroads and railroad history.

Peter Lyon's major interest emerges as the present sad state of the passenger business, but he gets to it after much excoriation of 19th-century financiers and investment bankers. This kind of biological economic determinism, too common among railroad historians, overlooks the technological and social forces which also operated during the period of growth. The stereotyped villains exposed by Mr. Lyon were operating within the framework of 19th-century capitalism; the railroad industry was typical, not exceptional. Chaotic economic exploitation and misapplication of technology became commonplace in a country with a political and economic organization based on enlightened 18th-century agrarianism. Society had no adequate means for coping with the sudden explosive developments of 19th-century technology, industrialization and commercialization.

But the railroads differed from other enterprises in being public utilities, vital to most of the others. With a single notable exception in America they were and are public utilities in private ownership and were never operated solely for public benefit. Furthermore, the American public has never been fully aware of what ought to be required of a public utility: so the regulation of the railroads, and later of their competitors, has been confused and confusing, with "public interest" as a nominal goal and appeasement of the carriers as pragmatic policy.

Unfortunately, America's first experiment in public ownership and management of rail transportation facilities was short-lived and, through both managerial and technological shortcomings, disastrous to the ideas it represented. The State Works of Pennsylvania, described by Charles Dickens in his American Notes and ignored by Lyon, were a coordinated line of canals, inclined planes and railroads, from Harrisburg to Pittsburgh. Built by the state in the 1830s, it was then the most technologically advanced transportation system in the world. By the 1850s, when the paralleling Pennsylvania Railroad purchased it from the state, it was already obsolete. In the interim, its management, beset by problems of maintenance and improvement and harassed by the political vagaries of the state legislature, furnished the proponents of private operation their classic dreadful example.

The effects of the panic of 1857 are also omitted from the book. By that year, after a decade of astounding technological growth, the locomotive had evolved into the prototypes for later machines: except for application of the injector, which had already been invented, no significant design changes were to appear until the beginning of the 20th century. Metal passenger cars, enclosed passageways between cars, air conditioning, metal freight cars, modern car truck designs, rail improvements, use of the telegraph in train dispatching, experimental automatic couplers, and mechanical forms of continuous brakes had all been tried or were in actual daily use.

Together with these practical improvements, innumerable fantastic devices were proposed and tested. Yet by the 1880s they were generally forgotten. The panic which closed many locomotive and car builders also ended some paper and real railroads and brought about a failure

George F. Kennan From Prague After Munich

Diplomatic Papers, 1938-1940

Epilogue by Frederick G. Heymann

When Germany occupied Czechoslovakia, most Western observers left; George Kennan stayed on. His diplomatic papers, letters, and notes from Prague illuminate fully a period discussed in his best-selling memoirs. With profound insight he conveys the political and personal effects on Czechoslovakia of Munich and the German occupation. $6.50 at bookstores

Princeton
University Press
Princeton, N.J. 08540

of nerve on the part of management. Zerah Colburn, a railroad journalist (not to be confused with the mathematical prodigy of the same name), left for England; his partner, Alexander Holley, turned his energies to the iron industry. The advent of the Civil War confirmed the regressive tendencies of management. The wooden car, the open platform, the link and pin and the hand brake were to last until the close of the century.

Lyon does not mention that the Erie provided a broad gauge route (6 feet, instead of the standard 4 feet 8½ inches) from Jersey City to Chicago, Cincinnati and St. Louis. Had the 6-foot gauge been made standard in this country we would in fact have the superrailroads which exist today in the copywriter's fancy.

The more effective part of Lyon's book begins when he leaves the 19th century. The period from 1900 to the present offers an opportunity to study the 19th-century mentality in management moving serenely and blindly through the 20th century much as if nothing had really happened since the completion of the first transcontinental railroad.

The railroads became unconscionable; common carriers, aided and abetted by compliant regulatory agencies, would decide whom and what they would carry where, and for how much. If, in recent years, competition has made them more amenable to some shippers of freight, they have hardened in their intransigence against the passenger. Needless to say, their competitors, as they have become more powerful, have sought to emulate the example set them. Rather generally, the competition has been somewhat more circumspect; but it is still possible for the attorney of a bus company to argue that commuters really do not know where they want to go, and that if they did know, it would make little difference since they are not substantive experts but prejudiced witnesses. Lyon injures his argument by presenting the railroads as standing alone in the arrogance which others have learned from them.

In the field of mergers, the author seems to feel that they ought to be good in theory if not in practice. Certainly no force since the Diesel locomotive (which requires expensive auxiliary equipment for passenger trains) has been so effective in wiping out passenger service. Generally, one of the merged roads treats the other as a captive kingdom suitable for exploitation, rather than as an equal partner. Particularly in the railroad industry, size does not make for efficiency: many an "unprofitable" branch line and small railroad lopped off during the depression is still making money under local management.

Lyon has weakened his book and some of his arguments by a number of avoidable errors in technological, labor and special history. Chronologically they range from events of the 19th century to the misadventures of the late Robert R. Young, who did not replace the C&O's entire passenger car fleet with new equipment. He bought enough equipment for two trains (four sets and spares), some of which has since been sold. The C&O is still doing business with cars over forty years old, and from time to time fobbing some of them off on the unfortunate B&O, its merged underling.

Most regrettably, Lyon does not discuss the peculiar relationship of General Motors to the railroads. America's largest corporation is America's largest shipper, and since the end of World War II, through its Electro-Motive Division, it has enjoyed a virtual monopoly of locomotive building. In the late 1940s there were five suppliers of road and heavy switching locomotives, including EMD, which eliminated its competitors during the next decade. Today, EMD has a minimum of competition from General Electric and Alco, both of which reentered the field after Robert Kennedy's threatened antitrust suit. Since General Motors, in the automotive field, has been trying to demonstrate that it has more power than the federal government, what about the railroad field? What pressures did it exert to accelerate Dieselization? To insure that electrification would not even be considered as an alternate? To limit the purchase of locomotives made by other manufacturers? Because nearly all railroad equipment is purchased through leasing agreements (banks and insurance companies generally finance the transactions) General Motors has certainly had more financial leverage than any of its competitors.

A footnote to the book's account of the fast-fading passenger business is that in the last few years the best cars of the postwar and even prewar American passenger fleet are today doing service in Canada, Mexico and other countries, including Saudi Arabia. Much of the railroad equipment which American travelers praise when they ride Canadian trains came from the B&O, C&O, Reading, Milwaukee, Wabash, New York Central and other railroads in the States.

It's possible to argue in defense of railroad management that it is no worse than the military-industrial complex which enabled it to show a profit in 1967. Lyon has been stumbling in the kingdom of the blind without finding a single one-eyed man.

Book Marks

SARA BLACKBURN

LA VIE PASSIONNEE OF RODNEY BUCKTHORNE. By R. V. Cassill. Bernard Geis Associates. 243 pp. $5.95.

If this novel about an aging college professor who yearns for his Bohemian past and sets out to recapture life by leaving his family and fleeing to New York were by another author, it would hardly be worth notice. But R. V. Cassill is such a good writer that it's hard to imagine why he should have devoted his efforts to this book. It reads discouragingly like an assigned plot staked out along a series of commercially zany events about bridging the generation gap in the East Village. Writers shouldn't have to teach in universities unless they really want to, and it is a major sadness of our time that even if they don't want to they're lucky if they can. Mr. Cassill fell into the bag that this situation so often produces; it is to be hoped that the fall is a temporary one.

THE ICE-CREAM HEADACHE: And Other Stories. By James Jones. Delacorte Press. 238 pp. $5.

The majority of the thirteen stories in this collection by a highly successful novelist, were written in the late forties and throughout the fifties; they are any-

FOR SALE DEADLY WEAPONS

ALL SIZES & SHAPES.

Special attention to the needs of guerillas and ambitious dictators. All inquiries treated with strictest confidence. Our government knows of this offer.

Read THE WEAPONS MERCHANTS and get the whole shocking story of arms and the men who supply them for today's revolutions, coups, and border wars. It's told by the top European newspaperman who personally uncovered the individuals and the governments that are secretly making millions from traffic in deadly weapons. Illustrated.

THE WEAPONS MERCHANTS

Small Wars—Big Profits
By BERNT ENGELMANN
Translated by Erica Detto

$4.95, now at your bookstore
CROWN

thing but dated, and the variety of experiences they convey results not only in very moving fiction but, cumulatively, in a compact social history of what it was like for Mr. Jones's generation to grow up, go to war, marry, and, generally, to become people in America. If you've been permanently turned off by Mr. Jones's most recent novels, reading this book may renew your interest in what he writes next.

ONWARDS: By Nat Hentoff. Simon & Schuster. 141 pp. $3.95.

Nat Hentoff's novel is so obviously deeply felt and well intentioned that the reader finds himself struggling, often successfully, not to be disappointed. Aaron Philips is a likable, over-30 New York intellectual who's stuck between his associations with the compromised politics of the old Left and the comparatively far-out activism of the New. His real struggle is to find a position in which he can become relevant, not only as political activist but—the foundation of any real politics—as a man. His peppery wife offers no solace, but a good deal of impetus to the latter quest. Mr. Hentoff has accomplished a series of touching and lifelike portraits of old and new radicals. His nice-guy main character fades away in the glare of their reality, but because Hentoff is no Beckett, their on-stage monologues lack the tension which might have made his novel a success. Flaws and all, this is a good book to read, especially for troubled, over-30 intellectuals.

LOVE TO VIETNAM. By Edita Morris. Monthly Review Press. 92 pp. $5.

What could seem soupier and more dully propagandistic than a novel about a napa-palmed Vietnamese girl and an atom-bomb-burned (Nagasaki) Japanese boy? Mrs. Morris makes it work because she has had the good sense to keep it short, and the talent to make her Japanese protagonist both tragic and funny, a really memorable character. The bond her people share is based not so much on their terrible wounds as on the common source of these wounds: their hatred of the United States is so acutely described that it is almost physically shocking. Although her novel isn't entirely free of sentimentality, the striking appeal of its hero and the success with which it makes its points are admirable. Its real irony, as Mrs. Morris surely knows, is that it is guaranteed to make Vice President Humphrey cry.

RED SKY AT MORNING. By Richard Bradford. J. B. Lippincott Co. 256 pp. $4.95.

Mr. Bradford's novel is this year's To Kill a Mockingbird, but the Southerners

(they are from Mobile) have been transplanted to a small village in New Mexico, where the Negroes have been replaced by noble, witty Mexicans. The time is World War II, and the narrator is a high school boy who describes his life and times with ironic humor. The book is always diverting, but it is the kind of superficial brotherhood script which one closes with relief at the fact that it has no role for Sidney Poitier.

THEATRE

NICHOLAS BIEL

Mr. Biel is an American playwright and poet now living in Paris. Harold Clurman is en route to Japan, where he will direct O'Neill's The Iceman Cometh for a Japanese repertory company.

Paris

When one considers the shelves of literature inspired by Sacco and Vanzetti, it is not a little surprising that the Rosenberg case, a story fully as dramatic and containing even more of the elements of tragic pathos, should be so neglected as source material for either fiction or drama. It is probably inconceivable to the young militants of 1968 that as recently as 1953 most American liberals and even outright progressives wanted nothing more than to attract as little attention to themselves as possible, and those few who did take a stand felt obliged first to cover themselves by uttering the standard incantation of the times: "While no one could be more opposed to communism than myself, I nevertheless feel etc., etc."

If it can be argued that the American Establishment felt itself more threatened by two Jews alleged to be Communists than by two Italians who were self-proclaimed anarchists, the continuing dearth of Rosenberg literature can perhaps be explained—or, since they are dead fifteen years now, it could be explained until the Unintimidated Generation arose first on behalf of civil rights and then against the war in Vietnam and poverty in general.

In any case, the conditions operating in the United States in 1953 did not exist in Europe from where the greatest number of protests against the execution came, including a plea from the anti-Communist Pope, Pius XII. Today, more than one European working-class district contains a Via or a Rue Julius et Ethel Rosenberg.

Perhaps it is in this context that one can understand why Les Trétaux de France, a government-subsidized touring theatre that plays in a 1,200-seat tent, is performing to highly enthusiastic audiences a living-newspaper play by Alain

Urban Crisis...

the enduring tradition of American privatism

THE PRIVATE CITY

Philadelphia in Three Periods of its Growth

by Sam Bass Warner, Jr.

Why Philadelphia? Because its inheritance and its failures typify the growth and decay of all American urban areas. Warner's three Philadelphias —1770-1780, 1830-1869, 1920-1930—carry the history of a city from the founding of the nation to the eve of the collapse of the national private economy. His second Philadelphia, 1830-1860, is the turning point in American urban history—the era when the big city and the American tradition of privatism first confronted each other, the time when the communitarian limits of a city of private money-makers were reached—and passed. New and Vital.

$5.95

FOUR CITIES

A Study in Comparative Policy Making

by Oliver P. Williams and
Charles R. Adrian. $6.00

SUBURBAN DIFFERENCES AND METROPOLITAN POLICIES

A Philadelphia Story

by Oliver P. Williams, et al. $6.00

UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA
PRESS Philadelphia 19104

Decaux called The Rosenbergs Must Not Die.

Decaux retells the story accurately and forthrightly, breaking no new ground either as historian or dramatist but simply holding his audience by the enormity of the narrative. Though the words of Joe McCarthy form a frame of reference for the dramatic action, there is no overt anti-Americanism in evidence. The facts are potent enough and Decaux does not overstress any of them: that the Rosenbergs were offered their lives if they would confess to the alleged crime; that they were leaving behind two young children whom they loved above life itself; that Ethel's brother testified against them under the most unsavory and questionable of circumstances; that scientists such as Harold Urey found the testimony of this brother, the government's chief witness, pure nonsense; that an implicit anti-Semitism marked much of the carnival side-show atmosphere surrounding the trial. These points and others are explicitly noted and the entire effect of the play is one of unhappy verisimilitude.

Decaux is a well-known French historian who for ten years was co-producer and writer of a highly popular television series, Le Camera Explore Le Temps, that has recently been suppressed by the Gaullist government for political reasons. In writing his play Decaux's chief references were the Rosenbergs' own letters from the Sing Sing death house, and a French anthology of articles concerning the case published in 1955, Le Chant Interrompu.

Although Les Tréaux de France has been in existence for a number of

RUMOR

*I have heard from an aeronautical engineer that this round of rock
this egg of earth,
if speeded up just three miles per hour, would smoke on its axis
like a dry drill in steel and all the farms, fowl, feathers, fields and fresh young things
from cities and shores would be flung free of the planet and float like a snow of strangers down through thinning air to the sparest gas
where a walrus will freeze in a wink.*

LAWRENCE LOCKE

years, Jean Danet, the producer, has until now done mostly standard French and European classics, modern as well as ancient—Sophocles through Claudel, Sartre and Audiberti. The Rosenbergs is the first new play he has put on. He usually travels ahead of his tent to stir up interest in schools, unions and other organizations (the best seats cost 12 francs, about $2.40), and has found no resistance to this play and much more knowledge of its contents than he supposed his audience would possess.

Jean Jacques Gauthier of the conservative Le Figaro and the most powerful single critic in the French theatre was as enthusiastic about the play as was the critic of the Communist L'Humanité. The Rosenbergs is perhaps not great art, but it works well under Jean-Marie Serreau's telling direction and the performance of an excellent cast headed by Silvia Monfort as a deeply moving Ethel (she makes no attempt to give the physical impression of the Ethel Rosenberg those who knew or remembered could recognize).

Most important of all, however, it may be the forerunner of a body of literature devoted to a story that cannot fail to take its place in the folklore of absolute courage—courage that puts to shame the tawdry accusations of a nation gone hysterical with fear of Plato's flickering shadows in the cave. For, as the French point out, even if the Rosenbergs were guilty as charged, the fact remains that they gave information to America's ally, not to its enemy, and their punishment thus far exceeded anything a civilized court could have been expected to mete out.

MUSIC

BENJAMIN BORETZ

For the past five or so years, I have been taking note in this column of the development in New York of a remarkable activity in the virtuoso performance of contemporary music that has emerged from a unique collaboration between serious composers and performers, and has seemed to prefigure a significantly new and viable way of musical life. Now it appears that this activity is under threat of imminent disintegration, largely because its own vitality within a highly concentrated context—a community of interested musicians, students and academic and artistic intellectuals—had an immediate and striking impact on a far wider musical circle and thus suggested, to some people with quite different musical commitments, the possibility of imitation and transference onto a far larger numerical and financial stage. Thus, some strong efforts have recently been made whose force has been to weaken the internal development of new-music activity as a significant musical force by diluting its energies in the direction of popularization, on the one hand, and diffusion—in terms of indiscriminate proliferation of activity and consequent dilution of resources—on the other.

I discussed the characteristics and difficulties of the Populistic approach in my last column, with specific reference to the new Hunter College series, The New Image of Sound. But the history of the tendency to proliferate dates most significantly to the moment, about three years ago, when the interest of the Rockefeller Foundation was attracted on precisely such terms. For, peculiarly, their concept of the means to broaden and deepen the base of support and the range of dissemination of this activity did not include the strengthening of groups that had already demonstrated strong internal motivation, support and continuity independent of any outside interest, and at the cost of great personal dedication. Rather, such groups (specifically, the Group for Contemporary Music at Columbia University and the Twentieth Century Innovations group under Gunther Schuller) were largely by-passed in favor of establishing new groups in contexts where no previous activity of this kind had developed indigenously and under directors who, for the most part, were "career" performers not notably involved in this domain before (with the obvious exception of Ralph Shapey in Chicago).

As I noted in a Nation column at the time, not only did the influx of huge amounts of endowment money pose a drastic survival problem for the original, unsubsidized groups in terms of com-

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION

6-17-68

500 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

Help him make sense... not headlines.

This is Kevin. A boy about to be a man. And right now he's making up his mind about what kind of man he will be.

A lot of people are filling his mind with hate. And though there are many reasons for him to hate... hate is no answer. It only brings more problems.

Our organization is dedicated to doing, not hating. Doing things like our volunteer instructional program we call education power. Without fanfare, we step in when society steps out. And start him helping himself.

It is surprising how little it takes to spark him. Sometimes it's learning to read better. To write more legibly. Even to count change correctly. Other times, it requires going beyond books to create a special, private learning situation.

Whatever it takes, we have the programs, the people and the know-how to get the job done. But we need financial help to recruit and train more volunteers to work with youngsters who are chronic truants and potential dropouts.

Send a small check... ten dollars is fine, more if you can afford it, less if you can't... to the NAACP Special Contribution Fund. If responsible citizens don't do it... and do it now... who will?

Here is my contribution to education power

$

Name

Address

City State Zip

Contributions are tax deductible
Please make check payable to:
NAACP Special Contribution Fund
Send to: NAACP Special Contribution Fund,
11th Floor, 1790 Broadway,
New York, N.Y. 10019

petition for staff from the highly restricted pool of qualified players (which had been developed through their efforts in the first place) but it also inflated the "normal" financial scale of such enterprises to a point that could never be maintained independently should foundation support be withdrawn. In short, the approach seemed about to fatten rather than strengthen new-music performing activity, and to diffuse to an alarming thinness the components of a bright new interaction whose intensity seemed at least partly to derive from the very pressure of the hermetically concentrated conditions under which it had formed.

Some of the fears expressed at that time were almost immediately realized: the Twentieth Century Innovations series, which had established Carnegie Recital Hall as a focal point for new-music activity, and had been given support to do so by the Carnegie Hall Corporation, now found itself competing with three Rockefeller-supported groups at State University of New York, Buffalo; University of Chicago and Rutgers, who were able to book their own series into Carnegie Recital Hall and, of course, pay their own expenses. Carnegie Hall naturally lost interest in Schuller's series, private support could no longer be found, and—since no Rockefeller Foundation help could be attracted either—the series, with its highly individual musical profile and pioneering enthusiasm, never reappeared. The Columbia group was spared a similar demise by strong university support, and, ultimately, by a small "emergency" Rockefeller grant (about one-eighth the yearly size of the other Rockefeller subsidies) which enabled it to meet the huge pay-scale increases resulting from the unlimited-money competition of the neighboring Rockefeller group at Rutgers. On a slightly more subtle level, one has observed the increasing frustrations involved in the attempt to develop adequately prepared programs, given the multiple demands on the schedules, loyalties and enthusiasm of the almost completely overlapping personnel among groups in the New York area. The result is that the most player-time is available to the highest bidder willing to settle for the least preparation. And any attempt by the Columbia group to expand its program into larger-ensemble domains, or to increase activity, has been as defeated by this attrition of simple player availability as by any financial limitations.

Assessing the impact of the Rockefeller program over its first three years, one ought also to consider the degree to which some of its own stated aims have been realized. To begin with, there was much talk of "encouraging the development of other sources of support" for such activity, but in fact the only major change in the support available for new-music performance appears to have been negative. Schuller's experience bears this out, as does the collapse of Max Pollikoff's Music In Our Time series (held first at the 92nd Street YMHA and then at Town Hall), and the highly puzzling recent behavior of the Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund, once among the most active of institutional new-music patrons, which appears to have withdrawn completely from such support after sponsoring a single (and, in fact, rather superior) concert in Charles Schwartz's Composers' Showcase series at Cooper Union last fall. Otherwise, there have mostly been such traditionally reliable resources as the Fromm Foundation (which sponsored the all-Wolpe program given by the Rockefeller-supported Chicago group at Town Hall this year!), the Koussevitzky Foundation (which is backing a new-music series at Lincoln Center this summer), the venerable Ditson Fund at Columbia (which has enabled the group to survive and has initiated small projects in publication and recording that may have far more effect than all the institutional millions), and the cluster of small foundations that has enabled such enterprises as the brave little series at the Greenwich House Music School (directed by the composers Joan Tower and Raoul Pleskow) to introduce new works by young and otherwise neglected composers. But there is no evidence that any sources of support—these or others—have been "encouraged" by the Rockefeller example.

It is still more significant to consider the degree to which the new groups have succeeded in establishing distinguished performers of new music previously unexposed, and in developing new groups of accomplished young players in this field. But—for whatever it does signify—the most distinguished active new-music players, whatever their present affiliations, all seem to have originated with either the original Schuller or Columbia groups. Thus, among group-affiliated pianists, both Robert Miller (who, in the possible company of Robert Helps, is surely the most accomplished ensemble and chamber-music pianist active) and Charles Wuorinen (who, along with Easley Blackwood, has virtually developed a new set of pianistic modes of articulation) are both associated with the Columbia group—Wuorinen as co-director. Harvey Sollberger, the other Columbia director, is still the incomparably superior flutist of the time. Among violinists, Paul Zukofsky (who is also a real solo virtuoso in all the rarest musical senses), now with the Rutgers group, was virtually discovered by Schuller and the Columbia group in his musical infancy; and the clarinetist Arthur Bloom, the percussionists Raymond Des Roches and Richard Fitz, the violist Jacob Glick, and the bassoonist Donald MacCourt, all with Rutgers, and the percussionist John Bergamo, at Buffalo, were all (and largely still are) members of the original New York complex. And the remarkable and still unsubsidized Composers' String Quartet (see The Nation, April 15), whose superiority in its domain is almost overwhelming, is perhaps the most interesting offshoot of the Schuller group. Then, it seems remarkable that the players who have most recently emerged are all associated with the activities at Columbia, in spite of the extreme financial disadvantage that prevails there: the flutist Sophie Sollberger (whose recital at Carnegie Recital Hall with Robert Miller was especially memorable), the violinist Jeanne Benjamin, the cellist Frederick Sherry, the brass players Ronald Anderson and James Biddlecome, and the bass players Kenneth Fricker and Jesse Miller have all made notably impressive contributions to recent performances. (On the other hand, the almost maniacally dexterous young Japanese pianist Yuji Takahashi began his American career in Buffalo.)

As far as individual programs and performances are concerned, however, the Rockefeller program has produced some notable results (although its explicit intention was to de-emphasize concerts as being merely the outgrowth of the activities). In this respect, the exceptional work of the Chicago group was discussed in my last column, and that of the Buffalo players has tended to be so marginal and capricious in programming and so erratic in preparation that, in spite of an occasional worth-while event, their New York concerts have seemed mostly vacuous. But the Rutgers group, under the direction of Arthur Weisberg, has consistently offered programs that substantially enlarged the scope of available new-musical experience, often in performances of superior ensemble accuracy. In particular, the Rutgers concerts have included works from the large-ensemble literature (almost never feasible for new-music groups) such as the Stravinsky Concerto for Piano and Winds, the Elliott Carter Double Concerto, the Chamber Symphony of Ralph Shapey, and Milton Babbitt's All Ser, as well as important

'THE PRESS AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed Study by
Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Fall issue of Columbia University Forum.

Single copies—15c; 25 copies at 10c each
Orders over 25 at 7c per copy

THE NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

works by composers not frequently represented on the other New York series, such as Seymour Shifrin, Jacob Druckman, Robert Moevs and Donald Martino.

But it is precisely in the case of the Rutgers group, where the accomplishment has been so considerable, and the intrinsic interest of the programming so high, that the real defects of the premises on which the Rockefeller program was founded become evident. For in establishing an activity of this nature where no previous impetus toward it had been internally generated, the foundation expected to provide such an impetus, to stimulate involvement in the students, and in the academic and civic communities, conceiving this as its main function, and thus justifying its neglect of places "where such things would go on anyway." Yet, every concert I witnessed at Rutgers (each was later repeated in New York) was pitifully unattended—even by some of the members of the university's own musical community—and it was evident that the essential "support" that is required for such projects, aside from simple imposition from without, can arise only from the kind of crucial professional necessity that had engendered such activity, without foundation help, in the first place. And now, finally, at the point where the original Rockefeller grant has run out, and the various universities involved are supposed to assert their commitment, both Rutgers and Buffalo apparently intend to discontinue the programs summarily—even in spite of the willingness of the foundation to continue support on a reduced scale.

This, then, is the moment of extreme danger for the entire new-music performance complex that seemed so baleful three years ago; for should the Rockefeller Foundation now decide that the failures at Rutgers and Buffalo constitute a demonstration of the unsoundness of the entire university-based approach to the performance of new music, and thus a reason for them to abandon it, the decision would probably be entirely self-fulfilling in the destruction of all such activity that would probably ensue. If, on the other hand, the foundation would recognize that those of its ensembles that have been successful—notably at Chicago and Iowa—were established on precisely the conditions of internal need and relevance that characterized the Schuller series and the Columbia group, then perhaps it might also recognize its culpability in contributing to the serious fragmentation of New York musical activity, and the serious disruption that the discontinuance of its Rutgers and Buffalo projects now threatens. One might hope in that case for it to assume its appropriate responsibility for the essential reconsolidation and restoration of a major cultural resource that its miscalculated generosity is threatening to destroy.

FILMS / Robert Hatch

Ever since the wolf packs and flying circuses of World War I (with flashbacks, of course, to Antietam and the exploits of Joshua), the movies have found their most congenial subject in battle. War is photogenic, its values and virtues are graphically simple, and the audience identifies with the flag and the uniform. A disconcerting experience is to attend a routine Nazi war film, in which all the characters and episodes are utterly familiar, but the wardrobe department seems to have mixed the costumes.

Wild in the Streets is a war picture of a very peculiar sort, and when I went to see it at a Broadway house in the middle of a weekday afternoon, a line was forming at the box office. The film obviously hits a nerve and I am a little worried. It is an account of a civil war set in our immediate future (LBJ is still President at the start of it) and the enemy, very easily distinguished from the good guys by his uniform, is the turned-on youth of the country. What the purpose of the movie may be—other than to cash in on a current anxiety—I cannot say, but the effect is unambiguous: it is to make anyone over 30 hate and fear the rising generation. There is in the film no boy or girl who is not pure poison. The leader of the successful junta and first boy President is a rock-and-roll singer who has amassed $2.5 million in as many years, gathered about him an entourage of pot-smoking child geniuses of public relations and finance (they sleep all together, like hibernating snakes, on one large circular divan), and who seizes the country by the device of getting the voting age lowered to 15. His accomplice in this coup is an opportunistic California Congressman who gives the impression of having recently worked in Hollywood.

The uprising is marked by no ideology, indeed by no ideas; it is simple seizure of power by a group whose cynicism and cruelty outrun their years. They turn the United States into a dictatorship overnight and then confront the fact that youth is a resource they cannot hoard. Maturity is represented principally by Shelley Winters and Ed Begley, who have the melancholy task of validating the frightfulness by suggesting that grown-ups are idiotic and obscene.

Is this plausible? Factually, not very; emotionally somewhat. Our nation grows younger and we have italicized the statistical shift by making a religion of youth. The generation gap does seem wider today than in other times one can remember. (On the afternoon when I saw Wild in the Streets the papers carried the

Sir George Williams University SUMMER INSTITUTES IN SOCIOLOGY AND HISTORY

July 5 - August 22, 1968

9:00 - 11:00 a.m., Monday through Friday

SOCIAL HISTORY OF THE CANADAS TO 1850. Stanley Mealing, Chairman, Department of History, Carleton University, Ottawa.

THE TRANSITION FROM PRE-INDUSTRIAL TO INDUSTRIAL SOCIETY IN THE UNITED STATES, 1843-93. Herbert Gutman, Department of History, University of Rochester, N.Y.

HISTORY AND SOCIOLOGY: THE GROWTH OF BUREAUCRACY IN MODERN CAPITALIST AND SOCIALIST SOCIETIES. Rudolf Schlesinger, University of Glasgow, Scotland.

SOCIAL CHANGE. A. N. J. Hollander, Director, Sociological Seminar, University of Amsterdam, Holland.

MEDICAL SOCIOLOGY. Renee C. Fox, Department of Social Relations, Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass.

REGISTRATION NOW OPEN
QUALIFIED STUDENTS AND GRADUATES
OF ALL UNIVERSITIES ARE WELCOME TO APPLY

Applications and enquiries may be addressed to either: Director, Summer Institute in Sociology, or Director, Summer Institute in History, SIR GEORGE WILLIAMS UNIVERSITY, Henry F. Hall Building, Maisonneuve Blvd. and Bishop St., MONTREAL QUE. (Area Code 514).

HISTORY — 879-3663 SOCIOLOGY — 879-5944

EDUCATIONAL

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA, BERKELEY CAMPUS: unique lecture notes. Hundreds of courses, taken directly in class by professionals from world-famous teachers. $1-$4. Send for free catalog. Fybate Lecture Notes. Dept. N, 1440 Bancroft Way, Berkeley, Calif. 94704.

WHO NEEDS IT? Independent study? Personal freedom? A chance to help make a new kind of college work? If you need it, write Admissions N, Franconia College, Franconia, N.H. 03580.

PERSONALS

YOU CAN BE A CITIZEN DIPLOMAT TO RUSSIA THE "GLASSBORO WAY"

3 week Study-Exchanges
LEAVE NYC: July 10, 20, 30 &
Aug. 23 or MEET CEC in Moscow

CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS

Dept. N-6/17, 10 W. 46th St., NYC 10036
Telephone: (212) LT 1-8113

DISCOVER a fun way of meeting interesting, alert Jewish singles. For FREE analytical questionnaire write: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10016

HELP FIGHT JUNK MAIL. Send it back at their expense. Labels and instructions $1.00. Artichoke, P.O. 9123C, Bridgeport, Conn. 06601.

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: write Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 30 East 42 Street, N.Y.C. 10017.

HAND-EMBROIDERED INDIAN DRESSES—of hand-woven cotton, vivid colors, indigenous designs, free catalogue. Write: ANDEAN, Box 472-A, Cuenca, Ecuador.

MANUSCRIPT IN TROUBLE? Skilled Pro editor-writer aids authors in revising Mss. for publication. Box 612, c/o The Nation.

HELP PLAN UTOPIA. Third Annual Convention, Illinois University, August 16-18. Alan Harrod, 5403 Woodlawn, Chicago, 60615.

JOIN CEC CHINA CORPS

Beginning numbered list of pioneer volunteer Americans, all ages and occupations, whom CEC will prepare to "BUILD BRIDGES TO MAINLAND CHINA" as Vice President Humphrey suggests. For information, including N.Y. Times editorials on CEC non-political programs write:

CEC CHINA CORPS
CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS
Dept. N-6/17, 10 W. 46th St., NYC 10036

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74¢ a line (6 words) 1 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10011
212-512-0000 story of a 17-year-old girl "who didn't trust adults" and whose body was found floating in a trunk in New York harbor. It turned out that she had died of an overdose of barbiturates and had been disposed of by her panicky friends. What makes the incident so horrible is that it no longer seems bizarre.)

And the young today seem peculiarly assertive, not only because of their numbers but because they have adopted a remarkably visible style of dress and behavior—which they have the money to maintain. It is easy enough to blow up Haight-Ashbury or MacDougal Street or any of the summer jazz-folk-rock festivals into the nightmare of a crusade of vicious children.

Wild in the Streets does it pretty well. The music blares, the colors are day-glo, the insurrection is circumstantial, the clothing and some of the dialogue are witty, and the young company has a distinct if rotten charm. Omitted entirely is a recognition that, from approximately the time of the first freedom marches, the moral sensitivity of the country has been conspicuously in the hands of the generation under 30. The sermon preached by Wild in the Streets is that we Americans have gotten the youth we deserve: the fact is that, miraculously, we have done a great deal better than that.

But the irresponsibility of the picture consists in the fact that it associates certain blatant fads and habits with an epidemic of social rabies. Long hair bothers some adults, beads trouble others, and almost everyone is alarmed by LSD and the other novel (non-alcoholic) drugs. If now we get it into our heads that every long-haired, beaded, embellished grass smoker in the land is intent on locking us up in concentration camps, the atmosphere will become even less promising.

This country has had so many enemies in its short life—Indians, British, Mexicans, rebels, Germans, Japanese, Communists of all flavors—that the movies have grown fat on the glamour of American victory. But not even Hollywood or the FBI can seriously suggest that we go hunting our own children. I suppose I take Wild in the Streets too seriously, but of course there is some truth in it: our society is infected and an alarming percentage of youth has caught the sickness. There was a smell of hysteria in the theatre and that eager line outside. The United States is running a little low on scapegoats just at present (the Negro no longer volunteers). Would an epidemic of hippie lynching be that impossible?

The director Marco Bellocchio was introduced to American audiences a few months ago with China Is Near; an earlier film, Fist in His Pocket, is currently showing. Two characteristics of his work are now evident. The first of these is that he lays open the surroundings and conventions of Italian middle-class life—what cinéasts call the mise en scène—with an intimacy not hitherto available to our tourist eyes. Bellocchio is a lyric melodramatist and I would not suppose that there was anything essentially Italian about his situations; but the households in which they unfold are almost aromatic with what seems authentic atmosphere.

His other characteristic is a taste for ellipsis, whereby the viewer stumbles into his films like any outsider, and must puzzle his way to a grasp of relationships and events. This could easily become a mannerism—in fiction, it is more self-conscious to withhold information than to supply it—but as of now it has given his stories an immediacy, and his audience a sense of participation, that are altogether unusual.

Fist in His Pocket is much more extreme than China Is Near—indeed, it approaches Grand Guignol. A blind old mother of intense religious preoccupations presides over a family beset by incest and stricken with epilepsy. The oldest son, who is normal, manages this household and faces the loss of all his ambitions from the weight of his load. Of his two brothers, one is afflicted almost to idiocy; the other dangerously aspires to normalcy. The daughter, who seems not physically impaired, experiments with crises and is oblivious to consequences in a degree that will not pass as sane.

The tension of the film pulls between the oldest brother and the one less afflicted. The latter is powerfully moved to be "someone," to play a part in the family fortunes, to be a hero, indeed, by freeing his impatiently dutiful brother. But in fact he is still—and will forever be—a nestling, and his only thought is to eliminate the defectives in the nest. Does the older man see what is in store? Bellocchio doesn't quite say so, but I think it is what he means. The oldest brother's tacit complicity in a course of events that will end a situation which is exhausting him to no purpose gives the film moral relevance and makes tragedy of what otherwise would be mere horror.

Fist in His Pocket is a savage film, told with unwinking compassion. It is not easy to watch and sometimes hard to understand, but it is first-class work by the most exciting and individualistic director to emerge in a number of years.

Coming Soon

Nadine Gordimer

SOUTH AFRICA: THE ON-LOOKER AND THE OUTSIDER

Crossword Puzzle No. 1254

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Not quite lucid translation of the main French relative of the guitar. (8)
- 5 A weapon in the hands of Ruth is a military obstacle. (6)
- 10 Comments of the retrospective nature writer. (5)
- 11 An early drink, for a starter. (3-6)
- 12 Archibald MacLeish said this was promises. (7)
- 13 Issue with retrospective title put away. (7)
- 14 Doesn't make port? (6)
- 15 In general, might one expect to find Mr. Shean? (7)
- 16 Attempts to keep little amphibians around for this? (7)
- 17 Company advocate, reputedly. (6)
- 18 Miracle-maker, in what they sometimes do to desert. (7)
- 19 The fruit of Fortunella japonica. (7)
- 20 Don't say so much about how to typify E. E. Hale's character! (9)
- 21 Sprung up like a petal. (5)
- 22 Are old streets associated with it in song? (6)
- 23 A lisp or a diction difficulty might show it happening at intervals. (8)

DOWN:

- Proving the color barrier can't keep a good poet down! (6)

- 2, 16 and 17 down Pindar's queer alarm? (Taking licence, possibly.) (7,2,6,3,8)
- 3 Breathe influence? (7)
- 4 Green type, next to non-pareil. (7)
- 6 Travelers often go this way, as it sounds, but it's less common now. (7)
- 7 Vehicle of the islands. (5)
- 8 It might prove material to a worker in the army, perhaps. (8)
- 9 They might measure such things as gas distances. (6)
- 16 and 17 See 2 down.
- 19 Concerning a separate location for some motors. (4,3)
- 20 Expression affected by primes. (6)
- 21 Manufactures paints and powders. (5,2)
- 22 Around 50, 20 would be less complicated. (7)
- 23 Disturbance in the stable? (6)
- 25 Possibly a rich person addressed at a public meeting frequently. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1253

ACROSS: 1 Fringe area; 6 Sigh; 10 Riddles; 11 Caribou; 12 Inch; 13 Personable; 15 Ninnies; 16 Salerno; 17 Xanthin; 20 Menaced; 22 and 24 Housemaids knee; 23 Emir; 25 Neocene; 26 Centavo; 27 East; 28 Stammerers. DOWN: 1 Foreign exchange; 2 Indican; 3 Golf; 4 Answers; 5 Excises; 7 Imbiber; 8 Household troops; 9 Trunk line; 14 Lightened; 18 Neurons; 19 Nearest; 20 Modicum; 21 Compare.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

PUBLICATIONS

THE CONSCIENCE OF A RADICAL

By Scott Nearing

A book you should read.
Have it sent postpaid for $2 clothbound or paperback at $1.

Social Science Institute
Harborside Maine 04448

NEWSPAPER CRITICISM: Grassroots Editor gives fearless Bi-Monthly analysis of Significant journalistic developments. Three dollars yearly. Sample copy one dollar. Grassroots Editor, Journalism Department, Southern Illinois University, Carbondale, Illinois 62901.

DIRECTORY TO RADICAL PERIODICALS. Entire radical spectrum. $1.00. Alpine, Dept. 17, 1340 Geddes, Ann Arbor, Mich. 48104.

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! Used bargain lists. Fiction and non-fiction. Free search. Harco, Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032.

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

PSYCHEDELIC LIGHTING MANUAL! Make Light Machines, Strobes, Color Organs etc. Send $2 to: LIGHTRAYS, 713H Pine, Philadelphia, Pa. 19106.

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION
Independent, lively, and original.
Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

AGENTS WANTED

CHRISTMAS CARDS—Business and Personal. Customer's name imprinted. Earn unusually high commissions from this medium- and high-priced line. No investment. No inventory. Free Sample Album. Process Corp. (our 47th year), 3430 S. 54th Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60650.

The Nation BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

- ☐ VIETNAM FOLLY
by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $3.95
- ☐ THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER by Ronald Sampson (Pantheon, $4.95) .. $3.95

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

6-17-68

How does he back our boys? He votes to bring them back.

FREE
WITH EACH NEW
ONE YEAR SUBSCRIPTION

Back in New Deal days, he was our editor. One of the first things he did was to publish a report by young Richard Neuberger. Entitled "The New Germany," this report gave first-hand facts on the horrors of Nazism—for the first time in America.

In an earlier stint at The NATION, as managing editor, he exposed U.S. imperialism in Latin America for what it was.

This uncommon man also fought colonialism in Alaska, and accepted appointment from Franklin Roosevelt to be governor there, to fight it better.

Read the newspapers to see how others have rallied to his lonely stand against American aggression in Vietnam, as one of two Senators who backed his words with a "Nay" vote on the notorious Tonkin Gulf resolution.

Read his biography, free with each new one-year subscription to The NATION, and find out how Ernest Gruening learned to fight the good fight for America, to bring sanity back to our politics and our soldiers back from Vietnam.

Send to:

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me free, GRUENING OF ALASKA.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6. (Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name

Street

City State Zip

N 6-17

The good fight
is now in
THE NATION
—Why not
join now?

BURLINGAME
JUN 22 1968
~~JUN 21 1968~~

Four Poems for Martin Luther King

THE

LIBRARY

NATION

JUNE 24, 1968 35 cents

WHAT VIOLENCE IS

NEWTON GARVER

EDGAR Z. FRIEDENBERG

This Spring in France

Students, Workers and the General

ALEXANDER WERTH

Vietnam: The Doctors' Dilemma

MARTIN L. ALBERT, M.D.

S-69R PL-5557
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

thinking the future

Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: Michael Crozier ["The Lonely Frontier of Reason," The Nation, May 27] is highly impressed with our country's think tanks. He forgets that the success of scientific decision making rests in large part on the power of special interests to cause their prophecies to be self-fulfilling. Perhaps realization of this power, not hyperrationality, is what is bugging so many people.

Paul J. Mackin

■ question of inference

New York City

DEAR SIR: In an otherwise appreciative review of The Autobiography of W. E. B. DuBois (The Nation, Apr. 29), Truman Nelson questions the "billing" of Herbert Aptheker as editor and manages, by a series of inferences, to question the full authenticity of the book.

With respect to the first objection, the facts are these: Herbert Aptheker was asked by the author's widow, Mrs. Shirley Graham DuBois, with the agreement of the publishers, to edit the book, in view of his scholarly knowledge of the life and work of Dr. DuBois and his long years of personal association. Besides making the necessary corrections in the text, the editor supplied useful explanatory notes about people and events little known to the contemporary reader. He also prepared the selected bibliography of Dr. DuBois' published writings and a calendar of his life, besides supplying a number of historical photographs for the book. Although the appended material takes 14 pages of the book, and is mentioned in the preface, Mr. Nelson seems to have overlooked it.

Perhaps the reason for this objection becomes more apparent when we consider the implication of the reviewer that publishers and editor are dishonest in presenting the Autobiography as published for the first time in full, and as Dr. DuBois wrote it. Mr. Nelson is careful to qualify his implication by saying "technically," the book "is not as DuBois wrote it, or left it, at his death in Ghana in 1963." Of course, "technically" it is not the same, since, as stated in the editor's preface, certain technical-editorial corrections proved necessary. In effect, citing as evidence a carbon copy of the manuscript given him in Accra by Mrs. DuBois in 1965, he infers that the entire Part I and Interlude (which do not appear, it seems, in his carbon copy) were added to the original manuscript.

Mr. Nelson neglects to inform the reader that in Part I, Dr. DuBois deals with his latest journeys abroad, particularly to the Soviet Union and China, and the Interlude, between this part and the beginning of the chronological autobiography, is a concise exposition of his belief in communism. This is as it appeared in the complete manuscript sent the publishers by Mrs. DuBois after its recovery from Accra, along with her persistent instructions that it was to be published as is, for this was how Dr. DuBois left it and wanted it to appear.

This is the complete DuBois who, as is well known, became a Communist and openly proclaimed his views. Mr. Nelson may not like them, in which case it is his privilege and duty as a reviewer to say so, instead of evading this confrontation by impugning the honesty of the publishers or the editor.

With respect to the missing dedication (which is quoted inaccurately by Mr. Nelson), Mrs. DuBois called my attention to this unfortunate omission when the book was published. On investigation, it was found that the dedication page was, indeed, in the manuscript, but due to a

(Continued on page 834)

EDITORIALS

Putting Back the Genie

By approving on June 10 the treaty for a nonproliferation of nuclear weapons, and expressing hope for the widest possible adherence to the treaty by both nuclear and non-nuclear states, the UN General Assembly forged a new link in the slowly forming chain of Soviet-American détente. President Johnson sought to give this event the appropriate aura by making one of his rare appearances before the General Assembly, where he commended the treaty in such hyperbolic terms as "the most important international agreement in the field of disarmament since the nuclear age began" and "the most important step toward peace since the founding of the United Nations."

The treaty will undoubtedly make more remote the awesome possibility that the dozen or so countries with a nuclear capability will join the five-power nuclear club in the near future, thus bringing to the world additional pressures and dangers which could make local conflicts infinitely more complex and possibly uncontrollable. In fact, few countries had intended to take on the burden of nuclear armaments, and those which do not wish to renounce atomic weapons formally or which object to certain provisions of the treaty can still refuse to sign or ratify it. But the moral imperative to become a party to the treaty (not to mention the distinct economic advantages to be derived from its nonmilitary provisions) will be strong. Failure to do so will be pointed out as a stigma, or at best an evasion of peaceful commitments.

This is especially the case for West Germany. In this context the treaty represents a great success for the Soviet Union, which from the start of these negotiations has used it as a bogey against German "revanchists," to obtain guarantees from the United States that it would not allow a German finger on the nuclear trigger. If Bonn signs and ratifies the treaty, which is likely (although possibly not before taking another look at European security arrangements), the main Russian objective will have been reached. If, on the other hand, West Germany delays ratification, the Soviet Union will have a ready-made excuse for continuing to resist any change in the European status quo.

The immediate political advantage for the United States is less clear—aside from achieving still another agreement with the Soviet Union, in addition to the 1963 test-ban treaty and the 1967 treaty banning bombs in outer space, despite the continuation of the war in Vietnam. Washington will at least be in a better position to resist extreme demands from eager allies. Another, more sweeping motive could be that the United States, wiser from its present experience as a world policeman, is anxious to prevent the compounding of problems which the spread of nuclear weapons would bring to international relations.

Be that as it may, the two superpowers have in recent months promoted the treaty with an intensity that was resented in many UN quarters as an expression of arro-

SUMMER SCHEDULE

During July and August, The Nation will appear on alternate weeks: issues will be dated July 8, July 22, August 5, August 19 and August 26.

gance on the part of countries which urged upon others what they were not willing to do themselves. Some accommodation with the non-nuclear powers—especially those industrial countries that feared paralyzing controls on their atomic technology—had been sought in the long negotiations which took place among seventeen countries in Geneva prior to the submission of the draft treaty to the General Assembly in April. Although this U.S.-USSR draft was presented by its authors on a take it or leave it basis, the combined pressure of political, regional and economic groups in the UN forced last-minute changes in order to deliver the massive vote—95 to 4, with 21 abstentions—necessary to the treaty's prestige.

The most important change promises non-nuclear countries, and especially the developing ones of Latin America, considerable assistance and leeway in the peaceful uses of atomic energy, and the assistance will not be available to states that do not become parties to the treaty. Another improvement (that falls short, however—of requests formulated by many non-nuclear states, especially India, which probably will not sign) deals with the security guarantees that the superpowers are willing to provide countries threatened or struck by nuclear aggression. This question is pending before the Security Council, where the unnamed potential villain will obviously be Peking, which has denounced the treaty in advance as a "Soviet-American plot" to strengthen the world hegemony of the two countries.

Last but not least, the nuclear superpowers had to proceed a little further than they had anticipated on the path of nuclear disarmament for themselves. Throughout the six-week debate in the UN Political Committee, the argument was made that while the treaty assured "horizontal nonproliferation," it did not touch upon the "vertical proliferation" of the ever more sophisticated arsenals of the nuclear powers. These, it was claimed, were the greatest threat to world peace, in spite of the so-called "balance of terror."

The superpowers have not agreed on a single measure of nuclear disarmament as such—a fact which causes France to hold aloof from the treaty, although its policy of not sharing its nuclear weaponry with anyone coincides with the aims of the treaty. Nevertheless, in these circumstances, President Johnson felt it necessary to make a declaration of intention before the General Assembly, in order to assure the non-nuclear nations that the United States would try urgently to negotiate with the Soviet Union a limitation of strategic nuclear weapons systems, as a beginning of nuclear de-escalation. Vice Foreign Minister Kuznetsov of the Soviet Union also pledged efforts toward nuclear disarmament. It remains to be seen whether their signatures on the treaty will be followed by a break in the arms race.

ANNE TUCKERMAN

IN THIS ISSUE

June 24, 1968

EDITORIALS

810

ARTICLES

815 This Spring in Paris:

Students, Workers and the General

Alexander Werth

819 What Violence Is

Newton Garver and
Edgar Z. Friedenberg

823 Vietnam: The Doctors' Dilemma

Martin L. Albert, M.D.

824 Broadcast Oratory:

Fallacies of Equal Time

Sally Fly

826 How Suburbia Votes

Joseph Zikmund II

BOOKS & THE ARTS

829 Unamuno: A Sense of Isolation

Allen Lacy

830 This Year at Marienbad

Robert Claiborne

831 Four Poets on

Martin Luther King

Stanley Cooperman

Lou Lipsitz

Michael Davis

Douglas Eichhorn

832 Total Recall

Richard B. Sale

833 Compassionate Fun

Curt Leviant

834 An Uneasy Alliance

H. R. Wolf

835 The Image Monoplists

Herbert I. Schiller

836 Serious Rock

John Gabree

839 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher

JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher

GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor

CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor

PHIL KERRY

Executive Editor

ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor

HELEN TULEJA

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014, Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 1256 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 for foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 206

No. 26

The 'Sick Society'

For a few days more the United States will remain in a fearful and self-flagellating mood. Ordinary people, relying on the information they get from the mass media, and professors who have given much study to our national characteristics, are alike profoundly worried. Even before Senator Kennedy died, a Wall Street Journal news roundup quoted a statistical clerk in Chicago: "Society is coming apart at the seams." "Public morality has gone to hell," said a retired Atlanta attorney. And of course as long ago as the thirties the image of America as a "sick giant" was a commonplace of political discussion.

The difference is that during the Great Depression the sick giant was a concept of the intellectuals, shared vaguely, if at all, by the millions of unemployed. Now the fixed idea of national sickness has percolated down to the masses, at a time when everybody is affluent—except, of course, the poor. Since the common people, for the most part, have neither explanation nor plausible remedy to offer, perhaps the politicians can help us? Ever since New Hampshire, Senator McCarthy has given himself to this task. President Johnson has also tried to help—with his usual amalgam of cant and platitude. He has now done the obvious, appointing another committee, the Presidential Commission on Violence, headed by Milton S. Eisenhower who, while collecting yet another honorary degree, gave us an inkling of what to expect.

"As never before in our history," said Mr. Eisenhower, "we now need citizens who can reason objectively, critically and creatively within a moral framework; we need in other words a new breed of Americans who will devote as much time and energy to being wise, democratic citizens as they do to being good physicians, engineers or businessmen." He coupled this familiar appeal with an equally familiar warning against "the coercive spread of communism." As a former educator, Mr. Eisenhower might be expected to know that the moral framework is coupled to the political framework, through the ideas of right and wrong in government inculcated by the Establishment. As for his new breed of Americans, the rebellious university students might aspire to that status, but theirs is hardly a breed of which Mr. Eisenhower would approve. And if this latest commission should come up with an original, potentially effective set of ideas, the chances are that its prescriptions would be ignored, like those of the Kerner Commission on the race question.

Can the professors perhaps contribute from their learning and prestige? One of the most prominent, Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., also speaking at a commencement exercise, came closer to reality than the former President's brother when he declared that we are today "the most frightening people on this planet" and ascribed our reputation to the assassinations of the Kennedys, the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr., the war in Vietnam, and "because the atrocities we commit trouble so little our official self-righteousness, our invincible conviction of our moral infallibility."

Shortly after making this pronouncement, however, Professor Schlesinger declared his neutrality as between Hubert Humphrey and Eugene McCarthy, on the ground that Mr.

Humphrey was amiss on the Vietnamese War, but good on the race question, while precisely the opposite was true of Mr. McCarthy. Aside from the question of accuracy in regard to Mr. McCarthy's views on domestic issues, Mr. Schlesinger gave little comfort to those who see significant differences in character between the two men, and whose nightmare is to be faced with an absence of choice between Hubert Humphrey and Richard M. Nixon next November.

In The Nation's view, the great danger in the mood of despair that follows the assassination of Robert Kennedy is that it will give place to the apathy which, together with hypocrisy, is our worst collective fault. Otherwise, there is no justification for despair. No one statement can be made truthfully about the United States without taking into account its opposite. Ours is a sick society and in parts it is not sick—didn't it trigger a world-wide student protest movement? It is a racist society in that most of its people would rather not live among Negroes, and it is not a racist society in that a great many blacks and whites continue to strive together for integration and complete equality of the races. And so in other matters. The truth is that the United States is an arena of social conflict and though the worst may come, it is not written in the stars that it must come. We have enough to plead guilty to without succumbing to self-abjection and in that humiliation finding excuse for inaction.

The crucial manifestation of American violence is the Vietnamese War, which breeds domestic violence as car-rion breeds maggots. It is a crowning irony that the arch-exponent of violence, the President of the United States, should deplore violence, seemingly without being aware of the contradiction between his words and his actions. Vice President Humphrey has supported the war without the slightest scruple and, by his own reiterated assurance, would involve us in foreign wars wherever there appeared to be danger of a take-over by Communists, or any government of the Left. And now we are told by political commentators that he has the Democratic nomination sewed up. This is nonsense on its face: the events of the past six months show how unpredictable the outcome of a political campaign is in these turbulent times. The accession of either Humphrey or Nixon to the Presidency could plunge the country into disorder incalculably greater than anything we have experienced so far in this century. The election of Senator McCarthy—or Governor Rockefeller—might at least give us a chance to straighten ourselves out. If the people submit to being led by politicians who have shown themselves so incapable of responding to the national interest, then indeed our society is much sicker than any responsible person has yet dared to suggest.

Rockefeller Awakes

Nelson A. Rockefeller has emerged from the strange apathy which, more than any other factor, has made Richard M. Nixon look like a sure winner in the race (if one can call it that) for the Republican nomination. This is good news for those millions of Americans who hold the balance of power and who, if the machine politicians insist on inviting them to a contest between Nixon and Humphrey, will enjoy the comforts of home on Election Day.

Some of these millions are followers of McCarthy, some were followers of Robert F. Kennedy. These are the dissatisfied, the activists who are tired of choosing between two evils—in this case between a lifelong opportunist and a reputed liberal who eagerly followed Lyndon B. Johnson into the Vietnamese hell.

Others are the inert, who require some dramatic shock before they can put the fate of the country before their daily concerns. These latter are the ones James Reston had in mind when he said that all politics "are based on the indifference of the majority . . ." The way Rockefeller was campaigning, he could only antagonize the concerned (as when he said he could discern no ideological difference between Ronald Reagan and himself), and confirm the apolitical in their apathy.

But when he goes forth to battle, even the unconcerned are stirred, and the spirits of the concerned are uplifted. McCarthy is the man the concerned want and should get. As James P. Warburg says in a brilliantly reasoned letter in the June 12 New York Times, there were two forward-looking opponents of the Administration in the Democratic Party, and why should the tragic death of one deny the nomination to the other? But if it should turn out that the machine politicians can force Humphrey upon those Democrats who after the past three and a half years can no longer stomach him, the concerned middle will turn to Rockefeller. He has Lieut. Gen. James M. Gavin advising him on Vietnam, and he is no longer wasting energy trying to compose his differences with right-wing Republicans, who have no more use for him now than when they howled him down at the Cow Palace in 1964.

It is fairly late for Rockefeller, but not too late. The Republican convention begins on August 5, still some weeks away. Once he started running, Rockefeller came out of the backstretch at high speed. In his June 11 speech at the National Press Club, he identified himself with the goals of Robert F. Kennedy and riddled the claims of Richard Nixon. He extolled Senator Kennedy as "a man who cared," and said he felt a personal responsibility to make Senator Kennedy's "unfulfilled dreams" of peace and social justice come true. Taking a hint from McCarthy's discussion of constituency, he contrasted the "old politics" with the "new leadership" which he said he is offering—a claim on which he must make good from now on. "The men of the old politics do not understand change," he said. "They do not comprehend the new realities of American life." He could have added that they failed, and still fail, to understand the realities of brainless anti-communism and the morass into which it has led us in Asia, that they still refuse to recognize the connection between a fruitless policy abroad and a growing crisis at home.

No Republican can be elected by Republican votes alone. The new Rockefeller is aware of that old fact, and in the advertising campaign he launched on June 12 he said: "I do not take my case to Republicans alone. It is a nation and not just a party which needs leading, healing, uniting."

Guns on Capitol Hill

A grim benefit of Senator Kennedy's assassination is the probability that a certain amount of impetus will be imparted to regulation, both federal and state, of firearm ownership. On the day that he was shot, a special nationwide Gallup survey showed the public calling for registration of all firearms as the best way to curb violence in our society. The Gallup staff interviewed by telephone a "national sample" of 442 persons. The questions asked were (1) "What do you think are the causes of violent behavior in this nation?" (2) "What steps do you think should be taken to prevent such violence in the future?"

The causes, as seen by those interviewed, were in the main quite sophisticated: the nature of our complex society, the fact that the country "has waited too long to tackle the basic causes of racial, ethnic and religious prejudice," poor discipline in the home, etc., ranging down to the traditional complaint of disrespect for God and religion. But while the proposed remedies included the other old standby—stricter law enforcement (more police, less leniency on the part of the courts)—those interrogated were also in favor of stricter gun laws. Gun owners and nonowners alike favored a law requiring registration of all guns, banning the sale of all guns through the mails, and strict restrictions on the use of guns by minors under 18.

The inclusion of long guns is vital. A revolver or pistol is a short-range weapon, inaccurate except in the hands of an expert, and then only under favorable conditions. With a moderate amount of practice, however, almost anyone can learn to kill at ranges of hundreds of yards with a rifle. But kill what? The Nation has not the slightest objection to hunting (when game restrictions are adequate) or to target practice. What it objects to is the misleading propaganda that persuades the ill-informed that the right of qualified persons to own firearms, whether long or short, is in any way threatened.

An interesting anomaly is that the purported public support of laissez faire in gun ownership is a myth. The National Rifle Association may have the support of a majority of its members but not of the public. "For three decades," the June 9 New York Times report reads, "the voice of the majority of the people in this country regarding the gun laws has gone unheeded by Congress. On May 1, 1938 . . . the Gallup Poll reported that 84 per cent of all adults favored a law requiring all owners of pistols and revolvers to register with the Government. In the latest survey (1967) 85 per cent would still back such a law."

Before the Kennedy assassination, the Congress had just got around to imposing certain narrow restrictions on commerce in hand guns, but registration was not required and long guns were not restricted at all. What the Congress was prepared to pass was a patsy bill, far less restrictive than some state laws, as in upstate New York. There it has long been the practice to require that an applicant furnish five impeccable references, and be fingerprinted, before a pistol permit may be issued—even with the restriction that the weapon is to be kept on the applicant's premises. And when the permit allows the licensee to carry the weapon in the county of issue, he is subject to arrest if he brings it to New York City, where a more stringent local law applies.

One of the new commendations Sen. Thomas Dodd has earned is by virtue of his long-continued efforts to regulate possession of firearms. Taking advantage of the national horror at Senator Kennedy's assassination, President Johnson has pressed his efforts—also meritorious—in the same direction. To what extent Congress will go along with the President and Senator Dodd, even in the present extremity, remains to be seen. Presumably the members of Congress are hesitant not only out of fear of the NRA's powerful lobby but because they feel that veterans' organizations and right-wing groups generally share the NRA view. It is time to end Congressional subservience to such narrow-minded—and narrow-based—pressure groups.

Truth In Moderation

Just a few days before John Daly took office as Director of the Voice of America, he was warned of the difficulties that would face him. In an open memorandum published in The Nation (August 28, 1967), Richard J. Walton, then recently resigned as VOA's principal United Nations correspondent, told Daly: "No matter how much authority President Johnson or USIA director Leonard Marks said you will have, you will find it precious little." On June 6, after just nine months in office, Daly angrily resigned, charging Marks with "maladministration" and "executive undercutting."

Walton had warned Daly that "... however much they think of you personally, the foreign service officers, both within USIA proper and VOA, almost certainly regard you as an outsider who will be gone in a year or two. They naturally assume that an outsider, however intelligent, doesn't really get the picture. They will not fight you; they will just pleasantly, smilingly, affably hem you in and among themselves, the club members, make many of the decisions that should be yours."

Daly quit because he learned upon returning from a business trip abroad that one of his senior aides, Leonard Reed, chief of the World-Wide English Division—the largest and most important division—had been transferred to the press service of the parent USIA without Daly's knowledge and over Reed's protests. Daly also learned that while he was away, USIA had been circulating questionnaires through VOA to determine its effectiveness.

Daly denied that USIA had made any effort to censor or control VOA broadcasts. But it can hardly be a coincidence that USIA chose to transfer Reed—long one of VOA's most intelligent, imaginative and effective executives, one who believed that VOA should tell the truth, and one who made no secret of his conviction that VOA should be an independent agency, free to practice objective journalism separate from USIA, the government's propaganda agency. Reed had carried on loyally in VOA's equivocal role as part great broadcasting organization and part propaganda machine.

What happened was that the ranking foreign-service officers in USIA, long hostile to the conviction held by most of the best VOA people that they were obligated to broadcast the truth—the whole truth, and not just the bare minimum necessary to maintain credibility—decided to end VOA's semi-autonomous state by transferring its most effective career executives and replacing them with foreign-service officers who know that their careers (next assignment Rome or Ouagadougou?) depend on not rocking the boat. What better place to start than with Reed? But USIA attempted its coup so clumsily that Daly, his authority undercut, had no choice but to resign.

His resignation made front pages and radio-TV broadcasts all over the nation, the last thing the USIA executives wanted. They don't like public discussion of their maneuvers; maybe, for a while, they'll go slow. But they are determined to muzzle the Voice of America and they'll keep trying.

Juries and the Death Penalty

The Supreme Court has recently declared unconstitutional the practice of excusing prospective jurors in capital cases on the ground that they are conscientiously opposed to the death penalty. The logic of this ruling is unassailable. Justice Potter Stewart said for the majority: "A state may not entrust the determination of whether a man should live or die to a tribunal organized to return a verdict of guilty." It seems hard to believe that it took so long for this principle to be recognized by the courts. Part of the explanation is to be found in the history of "death-qualifying juries" which was discussed in these pages some years ago by Walter E. Oberer (then at the Law School, University of Texas, now at Cornell), whose studies in this field have had a wide influence. [See "The Death Penalty and Fair Trial," April 6, 1964.] In brief, the earliest statutes assessing the death penalty left only one question for the jury—that of guilt or innocence. Most judges at this early period were so enamored of the death penalty that they did not want to share with juries the pleasure of imposing it. Only later, after juries were given some discretion about imposing the death penalty, did the practice arise of excusing jurors who had scruples about it.

The recent decision, while clearly sound, has a narrow focus. The court decided only that the death penalty could not stand when it was imposed in a jurisdiction in which the practice prevails of excusing all prospective jurors who have scruples against the penalty. In a word, the decision strikes at the penalty, not the conviction. It should put the prosecution to no disadvantage in capital cases. Cross-examination may well establish that a juror who has scruples about the penalty is quite capable of returning a fair verdict on the question of guilt or innocence. And peremptory challenges can still be used. But narrow as the decision is it may be of some assistance to 435 defendants now in death rows. If convicted by juries from which all prospective jurors acknowledging scruples against the death penalty were excluded, the penalty may be set aside in their cases, though the convictions, of course, will stand. If, at some later date, it can be established that jurors favoring the death penalty are inherently "prosecution prone," then the principle of the Supreme Court's decision may be extended.

Students, Workers and the General

ALEXANDER WERTH

Paris

This can, obviously, be only a preliminary report on those three—or rather, four—weeks that shook not only France but the whole of Europe, and after which nothing will ever be the same again. The financial and economic consequences are at the moment totally unpredictable, except for the now general conviction that, after the steep rise in wages following the de facto general strike, which at the peak involved as many as 10 million wage earners, France's competitive power within the European Common Market has been thrown out of gear. It is hard to find anybody in Paris today who does not speak of the coming vicious circle of devaluation, rise in living costs, more strikes, and so on. Only a few weeks ago, the prestige of the French franc was such that unlimited sums could be taken out of the country, and when a panic seized the bourgeoisie, hundreds dashed in their cars to Switzerland, with trunks filled with 500-franc banknotes.

It was all the easier because the French customs officials, too, were on strike, and there was no check on anybody entering or leaving the country. Several days passed before the French Government clamped a 1,000-franc limit on departing travelers—which is still twice as much as the British Government allows British tourists. But then Britain has for years been described as the Sick Man of Europe; will France now become sicker still?

Exchange control is only one minor symptom of France's sickness. According to the history books, nobody in France expected the French Revolution of 1789. Yet, in retrospect, historians have been explaining ad infinitum why it was inevitable. What has been happening in May-June, 1968, has been so extraordinarily complex that for dozens or even hundreds of years historians will no doubt be kept busy trying to explain just how and why this, too, was inevitable. Did nobody foresee it? Foresee what? More or less important strikes—yes; anyone could have foreseen them, as well as a growing ferment among the students, a world-wide phenomenon stretching from Berkeley to Prague, from Madrid to Belgrade, from Paris to Warsaw and even to Moscow—for in Russia, too, there is an overproduction of graduates. But no one in his wildest dreams could have foreseen that the Sorbonne and the Odéon Theatre would be occupied by students for weeks on end (this occupation is still continuing), or that there would be, on three or four nights, barricades in the Latin Quarter, and that the CRS (the riot police) would be called out to beat up hundreds of students with the utmost savagery—broken skulls, broken limbs, not to mention the still unconfirmed reports of young girl students being raped by the CRS in the police vans, and of about a dozen students having “disappeared”—possibly murdered by the police, who then disposed of the bodies to avoid awkward questions. Still less was a strike of 10 million workers expected. How did it all start? Historians will probably trace back the beginning of it all to Nanterre, that strange new section of Paris University recently built in a Paris suburb notorious above all for the appalling shanty towns in which thousands of Spanish, Portuguese and Arab sub-proletarians live in unspeakable conditions of filth and squalor—a constant reminder to the students that there is something seriously wrong in the “affluent society” in which they are supposed to be living.

“Student Power”—the phrase was almost unknown in France three months ago. Today it is on everybody's lips, and Herbert Marcuse, a name scarcely known to the general public, is now described as “the idol of the students.” It was at Nanterre—from the students of sociology, a segment of students whose prospects for adequate employment after graduation are even poorer than for the other students, and who object to being dumb instruments in the hands of capitalism even if they do get jobs—that the first rumblings of the approaching storm came. M. Missoffe, a member of de Gaulle's government, and following him a French Communist deputy, who had both been invited to speak at Nanterre, were shouted down and virtually thrown out of the university.

The “Movement of March 22” was constituted long before Rudolf Dutschke was shot and dangerously wounded in Berlin. Dutschke, the revolutionary rebel against the West German “affluent society,” had his counterpart in France: a group of five or six student leaders at Nanterre, the most dynamic and violent of whom is the now famous ginger-haired, 23-year-old Daniel Cohn-Bendit, here on a grant from the West German Government. Though not a person of any particular significance, he somehow became a symbol of the Students' Revolt—a German Jew, whose parents had fled from Nazi persecution to France, who was born here in 1945, but who chose German, not French, nationality. Symbolizing, as it were, persecution in his own country, he was also a heaven-sent candidate for persecution by the French Government. In one of the street demonstrations I heard hundreds of French students shouting, “We are all German Jews!” And what characterized not only the Nanterre group but the student rebellion as a whole is its internationalism, with its different Maoist, Trotskyist and anarchist slogans. At the Sorbonne today the portraits most often displayed are of Trotsky, Che Guevara and Mao Tse-tung. When, with great difficulty, I penetrated the other day into the Odéon Theatre, I heard a Yugoslav student haranguing a group of young people to the effect that, in the coming general election, they must vote for any candidate of the Left but on no account for a member of the regular French Communist Party, which suffered from the nationalism and mental sclerosis of the USSR.

In this, he was following the “Nanterre” line of Cohn-

Abu, The Guardian (London)

Bendit and the rest. To these revolutionaries, the French Communists, with their "reformism" and "revisionism," are part of the French Establishment, only too willing themselves to play loyally the parliamentary party game, and quite content, indefinitely, to get 20 or 25 per cent of the parliamentary votes and seats—in fact, "the most valuable and faithful allies of General de Gaulle." Cohn-Bendit branded the French Communists as both de Gaulle's allies and as *crapules stalinienne*s, "Stalinite jerks." And, to the Communists, Cohn-Bendit is just as much an "adventurer" and probably a foreign agent (a CIA agent, for all one knows!) as he is to de Gaulle himself and to a reactionary and anti-Semitic rag like Minute, only too delighted to make the greatest xenophobic and anti-Semitic song and dance over Cohn-Bendit's origins.

In a way, one may say that there are two sides to the Student Problem; on the one hand, there is the violent revolutionary minority, loathing both the established order, with its "affluent society," and the "regular" Communist Party, now "part of that society!" On the other hand, there is a large majority of students who have felt, for the last few years, that education, and especially higher education in France, is both archaic and inadequate. As M. Marcel Merle, a professor of the Paris Law Faculty, wrote in Le Monde of June 7:

No one can tell yet what French higher education will be like in the near future, but one thing is certain: a return to the status quo is now out of the question. There are two concepts—autonomy and joint management—which are the only things on which all the parties concerned seem at last to be agreed.

It is still far too early to say what complications of an administrative and financial order may yet arise before anything like a satisfactory solution can be found. In principle, the autonomy of the universities has been agreed to by the government; and for more than a month there has been feverish activity, not only among college students but also among high school pupils, working together with their respective professors, teachers and assistants to elaborate new structural reforms in the whole educational system. It seems certain now that they will all have their say in the elaboration of school plans, curricula, etc., instead of merely meekly submitting to the orders coming from the super-centralized Ministry of Education, i.e., from the government. The universities and even the lycées (high schools) are, indeed, faced with a thousand problems. The "population bulge" of the 1960s has made itself increasingly felt; the lycées themselves are overcrowded and, worse still, far more lycée graduates qualify for the university than the universities can accommodate. In the lycées and, above all, in the universities there is almost unimaginable overcrowding.

There is also the question of curricula, for under the present system students may leave the university with brilliant diplomas—and no training for the jobs available. And then there are the Grandes Ecoles—the pride of traditional France—for many of which three years of preparatory studies are required and which are therefore available (with rare exceptions) only to a certain bourgeois elite who can finance an extended education for their children.

On the Left, many voices have been raised for merging the Grandes Ecoles with the universities; but this naturally, meets with the strongest objections from many of the teachers in the Grandes Ecoles. The government sees in these schools a constant source of competent and reliable members of the Establishment, and it will probably fight tooth and nail to save the Grandes Ecoles (Polytechnique, Normale Supérieure, Arts-et-Métiers, etc.) despite the "democratic" complaint that not only there but even in the university itself (and even in the better lycées) the enrollment from working-class families is miserably small.

But this problem of the future of French educational reform is so enormously complex that it is still impossible, as Professor Merle points out, to say what shape reform will ultimately take. Nor is it practicable here to examine the extreme complexity of Student Power, which in France has assumed to date the most violent and revolutionary forms. It is, however, a world-wide phenomenon with differences of local emphasis. If in Prague, for example, the students put freedom above socialism, in Paris socialism, and not the "phony freedom of your affluent society," gets priority.

It would be untrue to say that the great majority of students in France are in an explosive and revolutionary mood. Most would no doubt be glad to get back to their studies and their exams; but they will, all the same, welcome any structural and organizational improvements brought about by the dynamic minority—those whom M. Christian Fouchet described as la pègre, "the scum," only a few weeks ago. "The scum" is what the Polish Government and even the Yugoslav Government called "the hooligans," not to mention the epithets bestowed on the unruly German students by the Springer Press. Now de Gaulle has fired Fouchet, the Minister of the Interior, who unleashed the riot squads against the students, along with M. Peyrefitte, the Minister of Education, though both had originally acted on de Gaulle's orders.

There can be no doubt that the students started the French Revolution of 1968. De Gaulle at first took no notice of it. Although there had already been some murderous clashes in the Latin Quarter, he cheerfully went off to Romania to preach the "abolition of the iron curtain" to the students of Bucharest University. They gave him all those enthusiastic cheers he could not have got from the French students. He was living in a different world from that of "his" people, still trying to represent the French intellectual and political leadership of the Europe of his imagination.

By the time de Gaulle returned to Paris (even he found it necessary to cut his visit short by twelve hours), France was in near chaos. Millions of workers in every branch of the economy and transport were on strike. The strikes had started from "the base," i.e., spontaneously, and without the O.K. of the labor unions. Within a few days, they had snowballed all over France. The workers reasoned: "The students got their university autonomy—why should not we get something, since the government seems in a difficult position and will have to yield?"

A few days after de Gaulle's return, it looked as though the strike was going to be settled. For two days and nights Prime Minister Pompidou and the trade union leaders negotiated in the Ministry of Social Affairs in the Rue de Grenelle. A "protocol of agreement" was signed, greatly increasing the minimum monthly wage from 400 to 600 francs, and granting an average rise of some 10 per cent on all wages.

But then something highly significant happened. La base—the rank and file—turned down the agreement, much to the consternation of the trade union leaders, not least Benoit Frachon and Georges Séguy of the CGT (Communist) labor federation with its 2 million members. The opposition appears to have come chiefly from the younger workers—i.e., from the bachelors, not from those burdened with TV and washing-machine hire-purchase installments. The CFDT (the former Catholic) trade union federation took the refusal of la base in fairly good humor, and the caution and conservatism of the Communist trade union leaders became, in the next days, the principal target of the "revolutionaries' " scorn and ridicule. These now openly treated Frachon and Séguy as the secret accomplices of the established order and of the Gaullist regime—for whose foreign policy the Communists had always had a weak spot.

Meantime, de Gaulle had made one of his most serious miscalculations. He could think of nothing better than to propose to the country a referendum to be held on June 16, which in effect amounted to asking the country for a vote of confidence in the government's plans for reorganizing both the economic and educational system. The reaction to this paternalist move among both students and workers, as well as among all the left-wing (and even Center parties), was a defiant No.

It seemed the end of the Gaullist regime. Then, on May 29, it was learned that the cabinet meeting had been canceled and that de Gaulle had left for his country house at Colombey. The reaction in Paris was extraordinary. People remembered how, in January, 1946, de Gaulle, ostensibly disgusted with parliament, had thrown in the sponge. Successors were now ready to step in. A few days before, left-wing leader François Mitterand had held a press conference announcing his intention to stand for President if (as now seemed certain) the referendum were rejected. Mendès-France was spoken of as Prime Minister. Le Monde, usually so well informed, claimed that de Gaulle had retired to his village, and that it was the best thing that could happen. Even the ultra-Gaullist France-Soir published a melancholy editorial called "De Gaulle Alone."

The foreign press screamed in its headlines of "Civil War in France." French travelers in Germany, Switzerland and England could no longer sell their francs. The strikes, which the trade unions had tried to keep within "economic" limits, were becoming increasingly "politicized," now often directed openly at the overthrow of the Gaullist regime. People in street demonstrations were singing "Adieu, de Gaulle, adieu de Gaulle, adieu!" Despite the anger of the CGT leaders, younger workers were fraternizing more and more with the students, thus by-passing the Communist Party "on the left." By their rejection of the Grenelle Protocols, they were going a step further along the path of some ill-defined revolution.

I need not repeat here the detailed reports of de Gaulle's dramatic return to Paris and the extremely tough statement he made on May 30. He was not giving up, he said. He had been elected by the people. Cleverly, in a threatening tone, he announced what, in fact, everybody had been asking for: No referendum, but dissolution of the National Assembly and new elections. So far so good. But what followed was more ominous. If the election could not take place normally, then "other means" would be used to "save the Republic." Then he announced that France was threatened by a "totalitarian Communist dictatorship"—even though the Communists had, in fact, been his least troublesome opponent. And he called for the constitution of "civil action" committees—something ominously savoring of the RPF, that near-Fascist movement de Gaulle had headed in 1947-53.

Hubert Beuve-Méry, writing in Le Monde, remarked

Picha, Special (Brussels)

next day that civisme rhymed with fascisme; he regretted that de Gaulle had tried to revive the Red bogey—though observing that he did it perhaps chiefly with an eye on provincial opinion in a general election. He also regretted that de Gaulle should have spoken with such disdain of Mitterand and especially Mendès-France as helpless prisoners of the Communists!

Although Mitterand, perhaps angered at the thought that the Presidency had so suddenly slipped out of his reach, announced that de Gaulle's speech was "a declaration of civil war" (Mendès-France was careful to make no comment), its psychological effect was, on balance, good. Ordinary living conditions, especially in Paris, were becoming difficult, and there was a prevailing mood of anxiety and tension. The feeling was also growing that Communist leader Maurice Thorez was right in 1963, at the height of the great sit-down strikes of Popular Front days, when he said that "one ought to know when to end a strike." In the next few days the men began to return to work. The Communist reaction to de Gaulle's virulent attack was typical: "He forgets that we are a party with a sense of the state." The strikers had, after all, gained enormous concessions during the days when the de Gaulle government had very nearly lost its head and been prepared to pay almost any price for a "return to normal." What the economic consequences of these concessions will be is, of course, another matter.

And, in the Champs Elysées I witnessed a spectacle which gave me very uncomfortable feelings. Here several hundred thousands gathered to acclaim de Gaulle. These were the "party of the scared ones"—the middle classes who dreaded for a few days that they were being financially ruined—and, along with them, all the old RPF and Vichyite and Algérie Française riffraff. And some were carrying—American flags. A few days before, receiving the new U.S. Ambassador, de Gaulle said in effect that France and the United States were on the same side, on the side of freedom, and that Vietnam was only "episodical." That was something new from the General.

And now for the election. In the National Assembly elected in 1967, the Fifth Republic and its allies had only a small and precarious majority. Playing now on the uneasiness and the fear of civil war produced in the country by the greatest strike in its history, and by several cases of street violence, de Gaulle (in the good old French Bonapartist tradition) is the man of law and order. There is serious danger that the liberal autocracy of the Gaullist regime will be replaced by a tough autocracy savoring of a camouflaged kind of fascism.

De Gaulle had already reduced the role of parliament to little more than a rubber stamp. But now, with what will probably be a substantial Gaullist majority, he will use parliament with all the motions of being a democratic and parliamentary leader. As Mitterand, the leader of the Left opposition, said: "It will not be easy: we have two weeks left to overcome fear." In opening the election campaign on June 7 with a fifty-minute "dialogue" with a well-trained questioner, a Gaullist member of the conservative Figaro, Mitterand spoke chiefly of "participation" as the main cure for all of France's ills. Demagogically, he condemned both communism and capitalism, and spoke of the students who would "participate" in the running of the industries. But he made sure not to mention the labor unions.

It was all disastrously reminiscent of the slogans of the RPF, the French People's Rally, one of whose greatest ambitions was to form the Labor-Capital Association—and thus abolish the labor unions. The immediate reaction of the union leaders was: "Participation, O.K., but where do the labor unions come in?" And they added that all this was very old hat, and that de Gaulle had not invented anything; the kind of "participation" he had in mind had been invented long ago, much to the joy of the capitalists, by none other than Mussolini. When pressed by his questioner on TV why de Gaulle had not brought up this question of "participation" before, Mitterand said in effect that there had been too much opposition to it (i.e., from the labor unions and from the Left generally), but that now, with the country scared and weakened, "conditions had changed."

If de Gaulle really goes to the lengths of trying to abolish the labor unions, there will be serious trouble. In any case, there is sure to be a lot of trouble and a lot of complications; but an all-out attack on the labor unions can only produce chaos.

As the days go by, more and more is being learned about one of the most dramatic and far-reaching episodes of all—de Gaulle's "flight" to Colombey, and his return twenty-four hours later when he declared that he was staying on. Having lost his head over the strikes, Prime Minister Pompidou, it is now learned, urged de Gaulle, before his departure for Colombey, to resign. He himself was proposing to set up a "Government of National Safety," with all the more thuggish Gaullist leaders taking control of such key posts as the Ministries of Defense and Interior. In fact, de Gaulle was being deserted—by the Gaullists. That would explain the startling "De Gaulle Alone" article in France-Soir. It was learned, soon after his departure for Colombey, that he arrived there at least six hours later than expected. Where had he been meantime? He had decided to play what seemed at the time his last remaining card: he visited the French army headquarters in Germany, and appealed to Massu and other "Algerian" anti-de Gaulle rebels to support him, to "save France from civil war." They agreed to support him—at what price we may some day discover. He is said to have remarked after meeting the generals: "If I have failed to make peace with the French people, I have at least the consolation, in my old age, of having made peace with the army."

He had, in fact, turned the army into a political party—which is precisely what, much to their anger, he had stopped them from being in the days of the Algerian War. Then, confident in the army's support, he returned to Paris a changed man. The "Liberal Dictatorship" of the Gaullist regime now seemed at an end. Pompidou was ordered to remain at the head of the government, and there were to be new elections in which, de Gaulle was confident, a frightened France would give the Gaullists—a very motley crowd, comprising both "liberals" and Fascists—a huge majority. Will things now settle down, or will France become a bigger "pro-American" Greece?

WHAT VIOLENCE IS

NEWTON GARVER

Mr. Garver teaches philosophy at the State University of New York, Buffalo. He is a Quaker and chairman of the Peace and Social Action Program of the New York Yearly Meeting.

Most people deplore violence, some people embrace violence (perhaps reluctantly), and a few people renounce violence. But through all these postures there runs a certain obscurity: it is never entirely clear just what violence is. Those who deplore violence loudest and most publicly are usually pillars of the status quo—school principals, businessmen, politicians, ministers. What they inveigh against most often is overt attack on property or against the “good order of society.” They rarely see violence in defense of the status quo in the same light as violence directed against it. At the time of the Watts riots in 1965 Mr. Johnson urged Negroes to realize that nothing of value can be won through violent means—a proposition which may be true but which the President did not apply to the escalation in Vietnam he was just then embarked upon, and which it would never have occurred to him to apply to the actions of the Los Angeles Police Department. Since the President is not the only leader who deplores violence while at the same time perpetrating it, a little more clarity about what exactly we deplore might help all around.

Violence often involves physical force, and the association of force with violence is very close: in many contexts the words become synonyms. An obvious instance is the reference to a violent storm, a storm of great force. But in human affairs violence and force cannot be equated. Force without violence is often used on a person's body. If a man is in the throes of drowning, the standard Red Cross life-saving techniques specify force which is certainly not violence. To equate an act of rescue with an act of violence would be to lose sight entirely of the significance of the concept. Similarly, surgeons and dentists use force without doing violence.

Violence in human affairs is much more closely connected with the idea of violation than with the idea of force. What is fundamental about violence is that a person is violated. And if one immediately senses the truth of that statement, it must be because a person has certain rights which are undeniably, indissolubly, connected with his being a person. One of these is a right to his body, to determine what his body does and what is done to his body—inalienable because without his body he would cease to be a person. Apart from a body, what is essential to one's being a person is dignity. The dignity of a person does not consist in his remaining dignified, but rather in his ability to make his own decisions. In this respect what is fundamental about a person is radically different from what is fundamental about a dog. The way I treat my dog, which seems to be a good way to treat a dog, is to train him to respond in a more or less mechanical way to certain commands. However, to treat a human being in that way is an affront to his dignity, because a minimum of autonomy is essential to a human being.

The right to one's body and the right to autonomy are undoubtedly the most fundamental natural rights of persons. A subsidiary one stems from the right to autonomy. It is characteristic of human action to be purposive and to have results and consequences; freedom therefore is normally conceived as involving not only the right to decide what to do but also the right to dispose of or cope with the consequences of one's action. One aspect of this is the right to the product of one's labor, which has played an important role in the theory of both capitalism and communism. If this line of thought is extended to the point of considering one's property an extension of his person, the scope of the concept of violence becomes greatly enlarged—perhaps in harmony with popular thought on the subject, at least on the part of propertied persons (however, one should always bear in mind that even a propertied person can reconcile himself much more readily to loss of possessions than he can to loss of life). The right to cope with one's own problems and to face the consequences of one's acts (which I do not accord my dog) is typically abrogated by paternalism.

So violence in human affairs amounts to violating persons. It occurs in several markedly different forms, and can usefully be classified into four different kinds based on two criteria, whether the violence is personal or institutionalized, and whether the violence is overt or covert and quiet.

Overt physical assault of one person on the body of another is the most obvious form of violence. Mugging, rape and murder are the flagrant “crimes of violence,” and when people speak of violence in the streets it is usually those acts that cross their minds. I share the general concern over the rising rate of these crimes, but deplore the tendency to limit the image of violence to just these three assaults. These are cases where an attack on a human body is also both clearly an attack on a person and clearly illegal. But even here we must not tie these characteristics in too tight a package, for some acts of violence are intended as a defense of law or a benefit to the person whose body is beaten—e.g., ordinary police activity (not “police brutality”) and the corporal punishment of children by parents and teachers. The fact that policemen, parents and teachers invoke socially defined roles when they resort to violence indicates that these cases have institutional aspects that overshadow the purely personal ones; but that fact cannot erase the violence done. Of course not all cases are so clear (I leave to the reader to ponder just how, in sex acts, we distinguish on practical grounds between those that are violent and those that are not). But whenever you employ force on another person's body without his consent you are attacking not just a physical entity but a person—and that is personal overt violence.

In war, what one army tries to inflict on another is what happens to individuals in cases of mugging and murder. The soldiers are responsible for acts of violence against "the enemy," at least in the logical sense that the violence would not have occurred if the soldiers had refused to act. The Nuremberg trials attempted to establish that individual soldiers are responsible morally and legally too, but this overlooked the extent to which the institutionalization of violence makes ambiguous its moral dimension. On the one hand an individual soldier is not acting on his own initiative and responsibility; on the other, a group does not have a soul and cannot act except through the agency of individual men. Thus there is a real difficulty in assigning responsibility for such institutional violence. The other side of the violence, its object, is equally ambiguous for "the enemy" is being attacked as an organized political force, and yet the bodies of individual men (and women and children) receive the blows. Warfare, therefore, because it is an institutionalized form of violence, differs from murder in certain fundamental respects.

Riots are another form of institutionalized violence, although their warlike character was not widely recognized until the publication of the report of the President's National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders. Some persons maintain that a riot is basically a massive crime wave, but it also can take on a warlike character. One of the characteristics of the Watts riot, as readers of Robert Conot's Rivers of Blood, Years of Darkness know, was that the people who were supposed to be controlling the situation, the Los Angeles police and their various reinforcements, simply did not possess basic facts about the community. In particular, they did not know what persons could exercise a sort of leadership if the group were left alone.

So the Los Angeles police force and its various allies conducted what amounted to a war campaign. They acted like an army that seizes foreign territory, and their actions had the effect of breaking down whatever social structure there might have been—which in turn had the effect of releasing more overt violence. The military flavor of urban disturbances has increased over the years, and in 1967 the authorities of Newark and Detroit employed not only machine guns and automatic rifles but also tanks and armored personnel carriers, in what the Kerner Commission characterized as "indiscriminate and excessive use of force." For that reason the urban disorders of recent summers are quite different from criminal situations in which police act against individual miscreants.

The overt forms of violence are, on the whole, easier to recognize than quiet or covert violence, which does not necessarily involve direct physical assault on anybody's person or property. There are both personal and institutional forms of quiet violence. Consider first a case of what we might call psychological violence, involving individuals. The following item appeared in The New York Times:

PHOENIX, Ariz., Feb. 6 (AP)—Linda Marie Ault killed herself, policemen said today, rather than make her dog Beauty pay for her night with a married man.

The police quoted her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Ault, as giving this account:

Linda failed to return home from a dance in Tempe Friday night. On Saturday she admitted she had spent the night with an Air Force lieutenant.

The Aults decided on a punishment that would "wake Linda up." They ordered her to shoot the dog she had owned about two years.

On Sunday, the Aults and Linda took the dog into the desert near their home. They had the girl dig a shallow grave. Then Mrs. Ault grasped the dog between her hands, and Mr. Ault gave his daughter a .22-caliber pistol and told her to shoot the dog.

Instead, the girl put the pistol to her right temple and shot herself.

The police said there were no charges that could be filed against the parents except possible cruelty to animals.

The reason there can be no charges is that the parents did no physical damage to Linda. But that they did terrible violence to the girl the father himself recognized when he said to a detective, "I killed her; I killed her. It's just like I killed her myself." If we fail to recognize that a real psychological violence can be perpetrated on people, a violation of their autonomy, their dignity, their right to determine things for themselves, to be men rather than dogs, then we fail to realize the full dimension of what it is to do violence.

One of the obvious transition cases between overt personal violence and quiet personal violence is the threat. A person who does something under threat of being shot is degraded by losing his autonomy. We recognize that in law and morals: if a person so threatened takes money out of a safe and hands it to a robber, we say that that person acted under compulsion, and the responsibility for what is done lies only with the robber.

Of course, the person coerced with the threat of injury or death needn't surrender his autonomy; he could just refuse to hand over the loot. There can be a great deal of dignity in such a refusal, and one of the messages of Sartre's moral philosophy is that whenever one acts other than with full responsibility for his own actions, he is acting in bad faith. That very demanding philosophy puts great emphasis upon autonomy and dignity, and is not to be lightly dismissed. Nevertheless one cannot expect that people will act with such uncompromising strength and dignity. To recognize that they can be broken down by threats and other psychological pressures as well as by physical attack, and that to have acted under threat or duress is as good an excuse before the law as physical restraint, establishes for the community the concept of psychological violence.

Another insidious form of psychological violence is what might be called the "Freudian rebuff." It works like this: A person makes a comment on the Vietnamese War or on civil rights or on some other current topic. The person he is talking to then says: "Well, you're just saying that because of your relations with your father." The original speaker naturally objects: "Of course I had a father, but look at the facts." And he starts bringing out the journals and newspapers and presents facts and statistics from them. "You must have a terrible Oedipus complex; you're getting so excited about this." And the person then says: "Look, I've had some fights with my father, but I've read the paper and I have an independent interest in the civil rights question. It has nothing to do with my father." To which the response is, "Well, your denial just proves how deep your Oedipus complex is."

This type of Freudian rebuff has the effect of what John Henry Newman called "poisoning the wells." It gives its victim no ground to stand on. If he tries to advance facts and statistics, they are discounted and his involvement is attributed to Freudian factors. If he attempts to prove himself free of the aberration in question, his very protest is used as evidence against him. To structure a situation against a person in such a manner does violence to him by depriving him of his dignity: no matter what he does there is no way at all, so long as he accepts the problem in the terms in which it is presented, for him to make a response that will allow him to emerge with honor.

Although this sort of cocktail-party Freudianism is not very serious in casual conversations, there are many forms of this ploy where the whole life and character of a person may be involved. A classic literary and religious version is the dispute between Charles Kingsley and John Henry Newman in the 19th century, in which Kingsley challenged Newman's integrity and ended up losing his stature as a Protestant spokesman, and which is written up in fascinating detail in Newman's Apologia. A political variation is the Marxian rebuff where, of course, it is because of your class standing that you have such and such a view, and if you deny that the class standing is influencing you in that way, your very denial shows how deeply you are imbued with the obfuscating ideology. Between parent and child, as between husband and wife, there are variations which turn upon the identification (by one insistent party) of love with some particular action, so that the other party must either surrender his autonomy or acknowledge his faithlessness.

This sort of psychological violence is most damaging when the person structuring the situation is in some position of special authority, e.g., in schools. An imaginative child does something out of the ordinary, and the teacher's response is that he is a discipline problem. It now becomes impossible for the child to get out of being a problem. If he tries to do something creative he will be stepping out of line again and thereby "confirming" that he is a discipline problem. If he stays in line he will become a scholastic problem, thereby "confirming" that he did not have potential for anything but mischief. The result is a kind of stunted person typical of schools operating in large urban areas.

This last variation of the psychological rebuff leads to the fourth general category of violence, institutionalized quiet violence. The schools are an institution, and teachers are hired not so much to act on their own as to fulfill a predetermined classroom role. Violence done by the teacher may therefore not be personal but institutional: perpetrated while acting as a faithful agent of the educational system.

The idea of such institutional violence is very important. A clearer example may be a well-established system of slavery or colonial oppression, or the life in contemporary American ghettos. Once established, such a system may require relatively little overt violence to maintain it. It is legendary that Southerners used to boast, "We understand our nigras; they are happy here and wouldn't want any other kind of life"—and there is no reason to doubt that many a Southerner, raised in the system and sheltered from the recurrent lynchings, believed it. In that setup it is possible for an institution to go along placidly, with no overt disturbances, and yet to be terribly brutal.

There is more violence in the black ghettos than anywhere else in America—even when the ghettos are quiet. At the time of the Harlem riots in 1964 the Negro psychologist Kenneth Clark said that there was more day-to-day violence in the life of the ghettos than there was in any day of those disturbances. I'm not sure exactly what he meant. There is a good deal of overt personal violence in the black ghettos, for reasons Fanon has explained in The Wretched of the Earth. But we must also recognize the quiet violence in the very operation of the system. Bernard Lafayette of SCLC speaks angrily of the violence of the status quo: "The real issue is that part of the 'good order of society' is the routine oppression and racism committed against millions of Americans every day. That is where the real violence is." A black ghetto in most American cities operates very like any system of slavery. Relatively little overt violence is needed to keep the institution going, and yet the institution violates the human beings involved because they are systematically denied the options which are open to the vast majority in the society. A systematic denial of options is one way to deprive men of autonomy.

Perhaps denying options would not do violence to people if each individual person were an island unto himself and individuality were the full truth about human life. But it is not. We are social beings; our whole sense of what we are is dependent on the fact that we live in society, and have open to us socially determined options. What access we have to the socially defined options is much more important than what language or what system of property rights we inherit at birth. The institutional form of quiet violence operates when people are deprived of choices in a systematic way by the very manner in which transactions normally take place. It is as real, and as wicked, as the thief with a knife.

'Legitimate Violence'

EDGAR Z. FRIEDENBERG

*Mr. Friedenber*g is a professor of education and sociology at the State University of New York at Buffalo. His latest book is The Dignity of Youth and Other Atavisms (Beacon Press).

Is American society naturally violent? Yes, it is; but to say so may still be misleading. For to most citizens, I believe, an affirmative answer implies that we need more law enforcement, more respect for property, more self-control, more emphasis on getting ahead and not goofing off, and the like. But these, I believe, are the major causes of the prevalence of violence in America today, and I should hate to see any one of them increased. Taking law enforcement first, it is clear that the police themselves are the major source of civil violence in the United States. It is routine in most cities of this country—the better-to-do-suburbs are still a little more genteel—for poor, black or political (i.e., hippie or "peacenik") prisoners to find themselves booked for resisting arrest after having been beaten up in the process of being arrested and booked. In Watts, San Francisco and Memphis, the spark that set off rioting was in each case the killing of a Negro youth by police. The recent report of the President's Commission on Civil Disorders emphasized the abrasive relations between police and residents of the inner city; several studies have indicated that the prevalence of racist and authoritarian attitudes is significantly higher among police than among the total population. Yet, in anticipation of expected summer rioting, police are being armed with Mace and drilling themselves in paramilitary counterinsurgency tactics. This is the second most effective way of insuring that any disturbances which occur will really be violent. The most effective way, also to be employed, is to call in the National Guard, a body which makes up in enthusiasm for its lack of professional skill.

If we were really concerned with averting violence we would not, as a matter of public policy, maintain and use such instruments. But, in fact, what we are really most concerned about is the protection of property and the restoration and maintenance of business as usual. Most of what we call violence turns out to have been looting—i.e., violence against property. Violence against persons—i.e., bloodshed—results almost solely from the attempts of the authorities to stop the looting and restore order; and nearly all of the blood is shed by poor Negroes. The newspapers were especially imprecise in distinguishing between property damage and personal injury when reporting the "violence" aroused by the murder of Dr. King. That, I believe, was largely because they wanted these eruptions to be regarded as a kind of social pathology, for which only history can be blamed, rather than as evidence of a genuine conflict of interest between owners whose property was being violated and angry Negroes who were getting beaten and shot for, breaking, entering and stealing—a rather more severe penalty than the formal processes of law provide even for such offenses.

But busting looters is legitimate; and American society has always endorsed legitimate violence. In fact, most of us do not consider it violence at all. Respect for law has become one of the nastiest features of the American character. Anything we can get legitimated passes without question. We feel free to destroy Vietnam as long as we enjoy the complicity of its officially recognized government—even though we know that government to be a fictional piece of apparatus we ourselves helped install. And any disruptive social group to which lawlessness can be imputed is a fair target for violent suppression. Student demonstrators are commonly called "rioters," and are often violently suppressed on the ground of alleged violation of local ordinances. The American ideological insistence that we live in a classless society has obscured for us the fact that law is an instrument of social policy which functions by providing access to force majeure—in the nature of things, usually on the side of the most powerful. Law is, among other things, instant violence; and worshipers of law and order are worshipers of violence (as the doctrine of the far Right illustrates), so long as that violence is used to defend existing social arrangements. To the far Right, champions of the poor, and especially of poor Negroes, must seem illegitimate per se and the most tempting of targets.

After Watts, and the mayhem committed on the people who attempted to protest President Johnson's appearance at the Century Plaza Hotel last year, to find oneself dependent for protection on the Los Angeles Police Department should seem a final irony. But our belief that legitimated violence is morally acceptable is very deeply rooted, and stems, I believe, from our opportunism—for this is ever the land of opportunity where failure, not murder, is the unforgivable sin. The commitment to empirical success leads us quite willingly to treat people like things, once the legal arrangements have been made; so that the Army saw no incongruity in setting up an exhibit in the Chicago Museum of Science and Industry in which children blasted away at a simulated Vietnamese village while a taped voice congratulated them on their effectiveness as destroyers. Opportunism as a positive faith underlies our legalism; for the only moral offense we really recognize is the rule breaking that gives competitors an unfair advantage. At the same time, victory may fairly be sought by imposing rules that favor your kind of team; and the loser is supposed to grin and try by the rules to get them changed—which is usually impossible.

Even this narrowest of moral creeds condemns the denial of economic opportunity to Negroes, and I believe that most Americans have come to disapprove the practice. But God help the Negro—or the young militant—who rejects the game itself; or who does not see people as expendable counters in a game, even if all have an equal chance to compete. It is these who constitute America's favorite victims of violence, for they undercut the very basis of society's legitimacy and threaten to halt the game. White America's fear of looters, intense as it is, is far less, I believe, than would be its fear of Negroes who did not want whiskey or TV, or who joined white leaders in a promising effort to improve not only the distribution of rewards in our society but the common view of what is rewarding.

VIETNAM: THE DOCTORS' DILEMMA

MARTIN L. ALBERT

Dr. Albert, a physician, was discharged from active duty in the Army as a conscientious objector. Since returning to civilian life, he has been a consultant for Resist, the New England Resistance, the Boston Draft Resisters' Group, the American Friends Service Committee and like-minded groups.

War is a health hazard with which doctors may properly concern themselves. In the correspondence section of the New England Journal of Medicine, several medical students signed their names to a pledge of nonparticipation in the armed forces if they must serve in Vietnam. They made this pledge "in the name of freedom, conscience and dignity." One month later this same correspondence section exploded with replies, all hostile, to the medical students' pledge. One physician was "appalled," another "disgusted"; the medical students were considered "naive," perhaps "lax in their pursuit of facts pertaining to medical science," and exponents of "the Communists' propaganda line."

Do physicians have some special, or different, obligation with reference to supporting the armed forces? As I speak with groups of physicians, medical students, para-medical and non-medical personnel, certain questions are consistently raised. As citizens, don't physicians have a peculiar obligation to serve in the armed forces? Is it right for a physician, who is supposed to prevent and relieve human suffering, to be selective in his choice of patients, refusing to treat wounded military personnel? How can a physician be a conscientious objector? He will not be asked to kill, only to heal the sick and wounded. Is it true that the role of a physician as a member of the armed forces is different from that of a civilian physician? Do physicians have the right to withhold their professional skills as a means of effecting political change?

All citizens have an equal obligation to their country. If non-physicians must accept induction, so should physicians. It is possible, however, to consider that there are other ways in which one may best serve his country, for example by working for a general improvement of medical care, an end to the arms race, an end to chemical-biological-radiological warfare. This is true for physicians and non-physicians alike. However, physicians in particular have selected a vocation dedicated to the maintenance and preservation of life. Both the Director of Selective Service and the Secretary of the Army have told me privately that they agree with the statement, "A good modern army is organized primarily to kill." It is reasonable to question whether anyone could or should support such an organization.

Physicians have always been selective in choosing their patients. They select a particular location in which to practice, limiting themselves geographically. Many physicians specialize, thereby limiting themselves to specific diseases. This traditional selectivity of the physician has left major segments of the population with inadequate medical care. Physicians may feel that by electing to serve nonmilitary individuals who need them they are accomplishing two purposes: aiding the sick and diminishing the effectiveness of an organization designed primarily to kill.

There are several reasons why a physician can be a conscientious objector: He has the legal right as an American citizen to have his basic religious and moral convictions recognized. A physician has no inherent responsibility to select as his patients only members of the armed forces. It is incorrect to assume that by not serving in the Army he is refusing to treat wounded American soldiers. Would one charge that a doctor who practices in New York is refusing to serve critically ill Bostonians? A physician may be a conscientious objector because he believes his actions in support of the armed forces would in the long run be destructive of health and life. Without his services the Army would be less efficient. Being a conscientious objector is like practicing preventive medicine.

The primary function of a military physician is to maintain the members of the armed forces at peak fighting capability. His main obligation is to the institution, rather than to the patient. This means that the military physician does not always attempt to cure or completely treat every soldier's disability. Newly inducted army medical officers have been instructed that psychiatric disability need not always be treated. They have been told, in fact, that psychotics sometimes make good soldiers. A career Army psychiatrist stated that a sergeant leading a group of men up a hill that had no protective foliage and was held by the enemy would have to be crazy. It also means that the confidentiality of the doctor-patient relationship, which many civilian physicians and their patients consider sacrosanct, is officially disregarded. It means that a physician who would make one medical decision as a civilian might have to make another as a military officer. A Navy surgeon recently returned from Vietnam said that he had seen Vietcong prisoners who were not being given proper medical attention.

For years many physicians in this country have been organized for the purpose, among others, of affecting America's political life. This organized political activity has been concerned with economics, education, health and other problems. It is not unreasonable, therefore, for physicians as a group to become involved with matters of international life and death.

In recent years more physicians, individually and in groups, have publicly opposed the war. David McLanahan in "Diary of an American Medical Intern in Vietnam" (Saturday Review, March 25, 1967) discusses the ghastly effects of the war on the Vietnamese population. Dr. Howard Levy spoke out against the war and refused to train special forces for duty in Vietnam. He did not believe that medicine was being used ethically in the war. His forthright stand has stimulated many others in the medical field to become more politically active. The National Medical Resistance Union is a loosely organized group of medical students in many states who are actively resisting the draft. In addition to personal resistance, they disseminate information and promote discussions on resistance activities. A growing organization of medical students, younger physicians and others in health-related fields, called the Medical Committee for Human Rights, has become concerned with the war. Originally a group organized to improve the health of individuals who have been excluded from the mainstream of good health care, they have become "enraged" with the war and its direct damage to international health. They have passed a formal resolution deploring the war, and are publicly working to end it.

The Physicians for Social Responsibility, a Boston-based group of doctors concerned with the social aspects of medicine, has issued a statement in opposition to the war. They have spoken out against chemical-biological-radiological warfare, and are currently preparing a booklet for physicians on alternatives to military service. When Dr. Benjamin Spock was indicted on charges of having violated the Selective Service Act by counseling young men to refuse to serve in the armed forces in the Vietnamese War, a Doctors to Support Spock Committee was started. Medical students, traditionally conservative, are being roused from their torpor. Many are seeking advice on the draft from the draft counseling and draft resistance groups that have sprung up across the country. Lectures, teach-ins and panel discussions on physicians and their relationship to the armed forces are being held in medical schools.

The physicians who stated in their letters to the New England Journal of Medicine that "the war in Vietnam is a horrible thing but is much to be desired rather than allowing the ungodly tentacles of communism slowly to strangle the world," and that "the only way to end the slavery imposed by the Communists is to beat the bloody pulp out of them and leave the people truly free" are now facing a new confrontation—that with physicians who feel that the way to end the war is to stop waging it.

Rosenhouse

BROADCAST ORATORY

FALLACIES OF EQUAL TIME

SALLY FLY

Miss Fly, writer and publicist, is currently at work on a biography, The Most Dangerous Man, about the career of her father, James Lawrence Fly, Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission from 1939 through 1944.

"Section 315 is like the weather—everyone talks about it. Nobody does anything." That is what E. William Henry, former chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, said recently. Section 315 is the passage in the Federal Communications Act that regulates political broadcasting. Called the "equal-time" provision, it requires that each licensed station treat all candidates seeking nomination or election for a particular office in the same manner: sell time, but have available an equal amount of time at the same price; give time, but give the same quality time—in equal amounts—to all.

That sounds reasonable, but it is dangerously deceptive. A candidate is not really guaranteed equal access to the electronic forum. To guarantee rich and poor candidates the same opportunity to purchase radio or TV time is a slippery sophistry. The Waldorf-Astoria is also open to rich and poor alike.

Free time is an even greater hoax. Networks cannot afford to give air time to the major party candidates for debates or straight talks if they must be equally obliging to all the minor party candidates. The result is that Section 315 reduces the opportunity of all candidates to be heard and is a disservice to the public.

In 1959, the Congress exempted newscasts, interviews, documentaries and on-the-spot coverage of legally qualified candidates from the rigors of Section 315. This makes it possible for the networks to present major party candidates who are newsworthy without being forced to present every hopeful. But imaginative broadcast journalists should not be confined to a designated type of program for presenting candidates.

After the Presidential candidates had been nominated in 1960, the Congress temporarily suspended the equal-time restriction for appearances by Presidential and Vice Presidential candidates during that campaign. This allowed the networks to present the "Great Debates" between John Kennedy and Richard Nixon. The TV networks gave more than thirty-nine hours and the radio networks forty-three hours. In the 1964 elections, however, Section 315 remained in effect. The TV networks gave only one and one-quarter hours to the candidates themselves and on the radio networks the candidates were heard for only seven and one-half hours. Almost all of these appearances were on exempt news programs. The TV networks gave no time to minority party candidates, and the radio networks gave only thirty minutes.

Jack Gould, the New York Times television critic, suggests why the provision was not lifted in 1964: "President Johnson quietly put the damper on suspension of Section 315 lest his own prominence be compromised by exposure for Senator Barry Goldwater."

On May 29 this year the Senate passed, and sent to the House, a resolution to shelve Section 315 temporarily, as in 1960. Sen. John Pastore, Democrat of Rhode Island and chairman of the subcommittee on communications of the Senate Commerce Committee, sponsored this resolution. But it would not become effective until September 1, after the nominations.

In the House, Rep. Lionel Van Deerlin, California Democrat, co-authored a similar bill with James Broyhill, Republican from North Carolina. Their bill is being held in abeyance, with no hearings scheduled. Many Congressmen are leery of Section 315 suspension. As incumbents, they're reluctant to give exposure to a relatively unknown adversary, and though at present only the two top offices are in question, the principle makes them nervous.

All Democratic and Republican Presidential candidates this year favor suspension of Section 315, except New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller who has remained mute on the issue. Dr. Frank Stanton, president of C.B.S.; Julian Goodman, president of N.B.C.; and Leonard Goldenson, president of A.B.C., all endorse immediate suspension of 315, at least as it relates to the Presidential and Vice Presidential candidates. James Hagerty, vice president of A.B.C., said: "No free time will be given to any candidate, except on the exempt programs—newscasts, interviews and the like—until or unless Section 315 is suspended."

Perhaps Stanton, Goldenson and Goodman should test the constitutionality of Section 315, as John Desmond, a New York Times Sunday editor, has suggested. It just might be declared a violation of the First Amendment. But perhaps the three network presidents enjoy the issue more than they would the victory; this way they can appear to be on the side of the angels without contributing time to the cause.

The networks assume that free time is a generous gift from them to the candidates and the public, but the gift is the other way around. The public has given the networks the privilege of using a rare public resource, the air waves. In exchange, the networks must perform some public service. James Lawrence Fly, chairman of the Federal Communications Commission from 1939 through 1944, wrote in 1953 to Arthur Schlesinger, Jr.: "The airways belong to the public, and should not be given out solely for private exploitation. The force of broadcasting in the field of public opinion is awe-inspiring. There is a very strong public interest in having the important public issues aired by this most effective means. And that interest rises higher than the private claims of candidates. The obvious danger (with startling costs) is that campaigns will be won by the richer." Fly forecast fifteen years ago what is coming to pass in the pre-nomination time of 1968.

Rose Kennedy told reporters: "It's our money and we're free to spend it any way we please. It's part of this campaign business. If you have money, you spend it to win. And the more you can afford, the more you'll spend. It's something that is not regulated. Therefore, it's not unethical." That statement is for the moment tragically irrelevant, but the situation remains. As was said about John D. Rockefeller, he never broke a law, but because of him a lot of new laws were enacted.

Even before the nominations in 1964, the GOP spent $1.2 million to turn the political broadcasting stiles for its candidates. In that same period the Democratic Presidential candidates spent $355,000, on radio and television. Robert Kennedy lavished $600,000, perhaps $750,000, on his Indiana primary campaign this spring. Nebraska cost him about $500,000, Oregon more than $400,000. More than one-third of these expenditures went for broadcasting and related costs such as broadcasting production and newspaper ads telling of the programs.

Political broadcasting began to be expensive almost four decades ago. In 1932 the Democrats ran up such a big radio bill that their creditors were not paid until 1936. Broadcasters now demand cash in advance from a politician.

There is no federal law limiting the amount of money a Presidential candidate may spend for his campaign. Nor is there a law that requires him to tell how much money he is spending. Who wins the nominations under such conditions? Millionaires? Or poor candidates pressured into Faustian bargains with campaign contributors?

It would be false to generalize that money wins. In 1964 Barry Goldwater spent the most money ever (almost $14.5 million) and lost by the biggest margin ever. Lyndon Johnson's tab for his campaign in 1964 was about $10 million. But the man with the money has an edge. Does this mean political leadership is replaced by wealth, that Croesus replaces Pericles? Not necessarily, but we teeter on that abyss. And ideas stagnate; the dialogue narrows.

And if Section 315 is to be suspended it should be for nomination as well as election. The networks should be required to give a certain amount of free time to the major party candidates, as they have pledged themselves to do. The time given to minor party candidates should be in proportion to the number of votes the party commanded in the preceding election: no votes, no time—except upon presentation of petitions bearing enough signatures to prove that some support exists for the party.

Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., extends the notion of free television time. In a letter to me he said: "It seems to me reasonable that the federal government should make available free television time to the major political parties for, say, the last eight weeks of every Presidential campaign."

Mr. Schlesinger, I assume, means that the federal government should subsidize the networks. But he neglects the pre-nomination period. If Section 315 is to be suspended, it should be done early enough to allow public opinion to express itself before the professional politicians shape the conventions results to their special requirements.

In 1964 the candidates used TV spots similar to the old Burma Shave highway signs—catchy word rhythms and name repetition. They spent 60 per cent of their television campaign dollars for these ten-to-sixty-second announcements. These spots are indeed a way to stretch the money as far as it will go, but they are mere electronic billboards. They do not edify and they often degrade. For example, a TV spot was prepared by the Democrats during the 1964 campaign which showed a fetching little girl plucking flowers. Suddenly the bucolic scene was obliterated by an atomic bomb blast. This could happen to your young if Goldwater were elected and allowed to escalate the Vietnamese War and use nuclear weapons. Complex issues cannot be thus reduced to brief slogans or simple themes. The listening or viewing voter is a captive of a spot, which is over before he can reach the set. Free time should not include them.

It has also been suggested that candidates be forbidden to buy any air time. But if such legislation were to have meaning, expenditure would have to be limited also in other media—newspapers, magazines, billboards, direct mailing, taped telephone messages, public opinion polls, etc. Today's laws on campaign finance are a mockery; they're not realistic therefore they're evaded or avoided. So-called equality of the air waves now deprives the electorate of essential information. The fight for the voter's choice should begin at the first inning—in the dialogue over the nominees. Charles Siepmann, professor emeritus of Communications in Education at New York University and now on New York Channel 13 with his own program, said of the microphone and the voter: "We can't hope for heaven in this naughty world." But we can try.

HOW SUBURBIA VOTES

JOSEPH ZIKMUND II

Mr. Zikmund is assistant professor of political science at Temple University.

What kinds of people live in suburbia and how do they vote? The stereotyped answers to these questions are that they are white, Anglo-Saxon, Protestant, upper- or middle-class, college-educated people who came to the suburbs from the central city. The husband commutes daily into the city to reach his managerial or professional job. The family has two cars and, perhaps, a boat. Politically, it is alleged, suburbanites call themselves independents, but they think and vote straight Republican.

This bland indictment is true enough to be accepted by those satisfied with superficial images and first impressions. However, it is false in many ways or has been outdated by developments of the 1960s. The suburban phenomenon was always more complex than the stereotype implied; in recent years it has become a society as complex and diverse as the general urban society upon which it culturally and economically depends.

Almost every kind of person lives in suburbia. Most suburbanites are white, but Negro families and even some Negro communities are to be found in many metropolitan areas—Mount Pleasant on the Philadelphia Main Line; Rankin outside of Pittsburgh; River Rouge, Royal Oak Township and Inkster around the periphery of Detroit, and Robbins southwest of Chicago are examples. At one recent civic gathering of Philadelphia suburbanites the only native-born Main Liner was a Negro woman whose family had come north after the Civil War. Similar diversity exists with respect to ethnic groups, education levels, religious affiliations and occupational classifications. One recent study of six major metropolitan areas disclosed that in 1960 less than half of the adults in 270 suburbs had any college education, less than half of the jobs held by suburban breadwinners fell in the managerial or professional categories, and less than half of these workers commuted to jobs in the central city. Although Protestants are probably still the largest religious group in suburbia, they too make up less than half of the population. Jewish suburbs, like Negro suburbs, are not uncommon (Upper Merion Township west of Philadelphia, Oak Park and Huntington Woods north of Detroit, Skokie north of Chicago, and Great Neck on Long Island, for example). Suburban residents vary from one metropolitan area to another, from suburb to suburb in the same metropolitan area, and quite literally, from block to block within the same suburb.

How did this social mixture come to the suburbs? Clearly, these regions have always been more diversified than was commonly thought, but that does not really answer the question. No matter what social patterns prevailed before, the tremendous postwar suburban explosion would have overrun any previous diversity or homogeneity. Most suburbs underwent extremely large population increases after 1945. Some, of course, were still farm land when the suburban migration of the fifties began. In addition, most suburbs experienced a good deal of turnover—families were moved to the metropolitan area by a national corporation and then moved some place else in a year or two. Authorities at one time believed that suburban population change followed one readily predictable course: prospering and ambitious lower-middle-class families move from the central cities to the inner ring of suburban communities; then, having acquired still more financial resources and hungering for even greater social prestige, such families move from the inner ring of suburbs to more distant areas—to the suburban fringe.

It is now evident that this impression, like other parts of the suburban stereotype, is only partially correct. Migration designs from 1955 to 1960, for example, show four distinct patterns, rather than just one. In addition to the city-to-suburb movement, there are some areas (Boston, Pittsburgh) where the suburban population has long outnumbered that of the central city and migration was almost entirely from one suburb to another. In smaller, yet established areas (Indianapolis, Minneapolis-St. Paul) the movement was about equally from the city, from other suburbs and from places beyond the metropolitan area. Finally, in areas where both the cities and the suburbs grew substantially (Atlanta, Houston, Los Angeles, Seattle), almost all the movement into the suburbs came from places outside the metropolitan area. Thus, at least some social diversity was injected into the suburban explosion by the variety of migration patterns in the 1950s and early 1960s.

Despite this complexity of population movement, the social composition of most individual suburban communities has remained very nearly constant since the end of World War II. This suggests that suburban communities develop, and at times consciously foster, their own social images, thus attracting new home owners similar to the people already living there. Property values and realtors' business practices also help to maintain stable social patterns. Richer people with executive jobs and higher social standing move into costlier, more reputable suburbs such as Villanova, Lake Forest and Grosse Pointe; at the same time families with more modest incomes and less social rank or social concern concentrate in equally "suburban" but less prestigious places like Levittown, Pa., Des Plaines, Ill., or Glenwillow, Ohio. Thus, the initial diversity in suburbia at the end of World War II was perpetuated, in individual suburbs, because complex migrations brought many different kinds of people to suburbia and settled them in suburbs composed of people very much like themselves.

Suburbs are as mixed politically as they are socially, and this too goes back at least twenty years. One recent study of four major metropolitan areas found that roughly 20 per cent of 198 suburbs investigated voted Democratic in 1948. This dropped to 15 per cent and 8 per cent in 1952 and 1956. However, more than 40 per cent of these same communities supported Kennedy in 1960, and in 1964 President Johnson won more than 75 per cent of these suburbs! More than two-thirds of the communities voted for Eisenhower in 1956 and also for Johnson in 1964. No matter what the stereotype may say, there are Democratic suburbs.

For the most part, the people who have migrated to suburbia in the last twenty years have kept the political habits or inclinations they brought with them. Many were Republicans; some were Democrats. The once popular theory that all new suburbanites are Democrats who then "convert" to the GOP after reaching the "clean fresh air" of suburbia cannot be substantiated. Most of the Democrats who came to suburbia during the fifties moved into already Democratic suburbs; they felt no social push to vote Republican. The result of the tremendous influx of people into the several varieties of suburbs, therefore, has been to make Democratic suburbs still more Democratic and to make Republican suburbs—if any change occurred —slightly less Republican. Today, the balance between Republican "identifiers" and Democratic "identifiers" is much closer than is often suspected. One recent study suggests that Democrats may constitute as high as 40 per cent of the total suburban citizenry.

However, it is hard to say whether any long-term party changes have taken place in suburban voting since World War II. In these communities 1948 was a particularly good year for Republicans, despite the fact that the Democrats won the Presidency; therefore, any comparison between the 1948 results and more recent Presidential elections will be somewhat askew. In addition, we lack any good nation-wide studies of suburban voting. The study from which the following conclusions are drawn included 270 separate suburbs in six Eastern and Midwestern metropolitan areas. Thus, it is possible that the findings may not reflect the patterns in other metropolitan areas. If this were true, it would merely point up the inter-metropolitan differences noted above.

In 1948, President Truman's plain, "common-man" style did not appeal to the better-educated, sophisticated suburban voter. Dewey did not evoke much enthusiasm either, but at least he was from the metropolitan East Coast and from the moderate wing of the Republican Party. Yet even in 1948 there were Democratic suburbs, ones that had been Democratic during the Roosevelt years and would continue so through the Eisenhower years and on into the sixties.

General Eisenhower, the national military hero who stood above partisan politics, was elected in 1952 on his public image rather than because he happened to run as a Republican. While issues such as the Korean War were important, the crucial factor in the election was Eisenhower himself. The Democrats lost heavily in the national popular vote (dropping from 49.5 to 44.4 per cent), and many Democratic Party leaders blamed the suburbs. However, this accusation seems unjustified, for in a number of metropolitan areas the central cities contributed heavily to the Eisenhower victory.

Many observers attributed the result to an increase in suburban Republicanism because, for the first time since the New Deal, suburban pluralities for the Republicans were greater than central-city pluralities for the Democrats. If you did not look closely at the returns, it was easy to assume that the increased Republican pluralities in suburbia had raised the Republican percentage of the total vote. However, many suburbs did not move in a pro-Republican direction to any great extent from 1948 to 1952. Overlooked were the increase in the number of suburban voters and the general decrease in urban Democratic pluralities in 1952.

The Cleveland metropolitan area was typical. In 1948 the Cleveland suburbs voted 37.6 per cent Democratic and produced a Republican plurality of 54,000 votes. The city of Cleveland went Democratic by 64.4 per cent and produced a Democratic plurality of 87,000 votes. Thus, the entire metropolitan area went Democratic by a 33,000 plurality. In 1952 the Cleveland suburbs were 35.9 per cent Democratic (down only 1.7 percentage points), while the city of Cleveland was 59.9 per cent Democratic (down 4.5 percentage points from 1948). The urban and suburban pluralities in 1952 were 72,000 votes for the Democrats and 79,000 votes for the Republicans, respectively. The overall result was a 7,000-vote metropolitan plurality for the Republicans. Thus, the impression of a major pro-Republican shift among suburban voters was conveyed because the Republican plurality from the suburbs increased by 25,000 votes at the same time that the Democratic plurality from the central city decreased by 15,000 votes. Virtually all of the change in the suburban plurality, however, is attributable to the increase in the total number of suburban voters, not to the slight decrease in the Democratic portion of the suburban vote.

The 1956 Presidential election confirmed and reaffirmed the voters' loyalty to President Eisenhower. Both central cities and suburbs moved even further toward the GOP; however, this shift was considerably greater in central cities than in the suburbs. Although 1956 produced a postwar low in suburban support for the Democrats, a number of individual suburban communities—generally those that had gone heaviest for Dewey in 1948—actually voted more Democratic (usually from 1 to 5 percentage points) than they had in the first Eisenhower victory. In sum, while Eisenhower had great appeal across the nation and in suburbs generally, those suburbs with the longest and strongest tradition of Republican voting seemed to be the least attracted by his Presidency and his second-term candidacy.

Kennedy's Roman Catholicism made little or no difference. In 1960 the suburbs, like the nation, shifted strongly Democratic. The lower- and lower-middle-class suburbs—and those suburbs which had voted Democratic in 1948 and before—led the way. This may reflect Catholic concentrations in lower-middle-class suburbs, or it may indicate nothing more than a return of the lower-middle-class voter to the Democratic fold after eight years of supporting President Eisenhower. In any case Kennedy did better in the suburbs than any Democrat since FDR.

President Johnson's landslide victory in 1964 did not produce the sharp black-or-white choice between ideologies and policies that Senator Goldwater had sought. Many voters felt themselves forced to choose between less than perfect alternatives. Cities, suburbs and rural areas all moved heavily Democratic, but for the first time in recent Presidential elections suburban shifts were generally greater than those of the central cities. In addition, those suburbs at the higher end of the social-economic scale had greater pro-Democratic shifts than did the more modest communities. There are two possible explanations.

First, this might reflect a hidden "white backlash" against the party most concerned with the Negro and civil rights, since the reaction is sharpest among whites economically and socially closest to vertically mobile Negroes. Second, the radical Right in this country usually has its greatest following in the working class and in the lower-middle class. If Goldwater appealed more strongly to traditional sympathizers of the radical Right than to Republicans generally, suburbs with working-class residents might be expected to resist the nation-wide swing to President Johnson.

The patterns in suburbs since the end of the Second World War do seem to indicate that most suburban areas have become more Democratic. This conclusion must be tentative, however, because 1948 was a strong Republican year in most suburbs and 1964 was a strong Democratic year.

Anyone attempting to forecast suburban voting behavior next November must keep a number of considerations in mind. First, Richard Nixon did not run well in the suburbs in 1960 (he won in only 60 per cent of the 198 places studied) when he faced a dynamic, glamorous opponent and when he represented, and to some extent defended, the old, incumbent Eisenhower administration. It remains to be seen whether he can succeed better against either of the Democratic alternatives. Second, the Republicans who have fared best in suburbia were Eastern moderates such as Dewey and Eisenhower. Third, radical-Right candidates are not likely to succeed in the suburbs, despite the economic conservatism of many suburban Republicans. Goldwater was considerably more to the suburban taste as an honest, forthright, moral, sincere man than Reagan or Wallace will ever be, and Goldwater was overwhelmed in the suburbs. Assuming that the elections will not produce a landslide victory for the Democrats, it is quite likely that a majority of the suburbs will return to the Republican column in 1968. However, the extent to which suburbs move to the GOP will depend in large measure on which candidate they nominate, what position the party takes on crucial issues, and what the Democrats do in response. Of the three Republican candidates Reagan's chances are probably the weakest because the most extreme right wingers will bolt to Wallace no matter whom the Republicans nominate. Nixon's chances and those of Governor Rockefeller are harder to predict. Rockefeller is more likely to cut into traditional Democratic support; however, he is also more likely to drive conservative Republicans into the Wallace camp or into nonvoting.

Among the Democrats, Humphrey is probably the front-running national candidate. Unfortunately, his glamor is tarnished by age and his liberalism by the Vietnamese War. Humphrey's performance in the suburbs would probably parallel that of Stevenson in 1952. Kennedy's magnetic name and personality would have made the liveliest campaign, but that same personality would have polarized the electorate (even more sharply than Nixon) and alienated the large number of intensely anti-Kennedy Democrats. Senator McCarthy's quixotic crusade has great appeal and a long way to go. If nominated, he would face a severe campaign challenge. Yet, of the two frontrunning Democrats McCarthy has the greater chance to carry the suburbs. McCarthy has a decency and righteousness which appeal to the politically "independent" suburban voter.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Unamuno: A Sense of Isolation

OUR LORD DON QUIXOTE: The Life of Don Quixote and Sancho, with Related Essays. By Miguel de Unamuno. Translated by Anthony Kerrigan. Princeton University Press. 553 pp. $6.50.

ALLEN LACY

Mr. Lacy teaches at Michigan State University, but will soon become a member of the faculty at Kirkland College. He is the author of Miguel de Unamuno: The Rhetoric of Existence (Mouton & Co., The Hague).

"No one," Miguel de Unamuno (1864-1936) often said, "will ever classify me. I am especie unica." And clearly, his place in recent European intellectual history is important, but difficult to specify. The difficulty starts with the sheer immensity and variety of his authorship, much of which has remained untranslated into English. His Obras completas—which are far from being truly complete, both because they leave out a good many of his writings and because in one instance at least (Cómo se hace una novela) the hand of the Spanish censor is evident—run to some fourteen volumes of more than 1,000 pages each, containing novels, short stories, plays, reviews, memoirs, poems and essays, both literary and philosophical. And no one of these forms seems to be primary. Unamuno was neither a philosopher who also wrote novels, like Jean-Paul Sartre, nor a novelist who also wrote philosophical essays, like Albert Camus, and it is thus perplexing to decide by what standards he should primarily be judged.

As a novelist, Unamuno was often ahead of his time, especially in his denial of the usual boundaries between life and art. Well before Pirandello, he explored the possibilities of the autonomous character: in Niebla, Augusto Pérez appears in the author's study to insist that he has greater reality than Unamuno himself. As Julián Mariás has pointed out, Unamuno was writing "existential" novels as early as Paz en la guerra (1897), long before Simone de Beauvoir or Sartre. And much of his fiction is very fresh even in the 1960s, especially for its improvisatory technique. His sense of the novel as a vehicle of serious play, as a comic metaphysic, has strong affinities to the best work of Jorge Luis Borges and John Barth; and Amor y pedagogía (1902) is an astounding forerunner of black comedy.

Certainly, his major themes (passion and choice, the opacity and contingency of human existence, anguish and finitude, dread and hope, doubt and faith), and his deep distrust of systematic philosophy, his fondness for paradox, all place him at least within the vestibule of existentialism. But one of the reasons Unamuno is so hard to label philosophically—and so interesting—is that he is not only a proto-existentialist but also a kind of independent forerunner of British and American linguistic analysis. If Unamuno is a Spanish Kierkegaard, he is also a Spanish Wittgenstein, for whom a proper philosophical method generally involves scrutiny of language: Unamuno's "man of flesh and bone" is always hombre hablante, and the misuse of language often creates genuine human mischief, as well as interesting philosophical puzzles.

As philosopher, Unamuno stands alone; there is the same solitude at the center of his work that one finds in Kierkegaard or Nietzsche. He has no ancestors and no real descendants. Raised in the third-rate scholasticism of Zeferino Gonzáles and Jaime Balmes, he rejected what he called their "bloodless offal of orthodoxy" during his freshman year at Madrid. For over a decade afterward, he claimed to be a positivist, reading Comte avidly and even translating for publication several essays by Herbert Spencer. His positivism, however, did not survive his devastating religious crisis of 1897, a crisis which left him unable either to return to the Roman Catholic faith of his youth or to remain content with the philosophical categories at his disposal. Increasingly, Unamuno complained of his sense of isolation: he saw Spain dominated by dogmatism and ideocracy to the point that a man could not speak the deepest issues of his existence without being misunderstood:

It is a hard fact that wherever one goes in Spain, giving vent to heartfelt truths, they tell you that they do not understand, or else they understand the opposite. The root of the trouble lies in the fact that people go to hear . . . something specific which they have already heard, and not to listen to what is being said.

So wrote Unamuno in 1905 in The Life of Don Quixote and Sancho, and much of his philosophical labor was the attempt to overcome the dogmatism of his society, to define communication itself as a prime philosophical problem.

As a result of his growing feeling of isolation in Spain and suspecting that he would not in his lifetime make himself understood to his fellow countrymen, Unamuno expressed as early as 1910 his longing to have his works translated into other languages, feeling that he would find his true audience outside his native land. Since 1921, when J. E. Crawford Fitch translated Tragic Sense of Life, the work by which Unamuno is chiefly known in the English-speaking world, there have been several translations of his work, sporadic and highly variable in quality. But only now, with the appearance of the first of the Bollingen Series translations of his selected works, is Unamuno genuinely accessible to the general reader in America. Under an editorial board consisting of Anthony Kerrigan, the late Federico de Onís, Martin Nozick, and Sir Herbert Read, the Bollingen Foundation has just published Our Lord Don Quixote, containing Kerrigan's translation of The Life of Don Quixote and Sancho and sixteen other essays on the Quixote theme, a theme central to Unamuno's work. Our Lord Don Quixote is splendid in every respect—handsomely printed and bound, with an exemplary introduction by Walter Starkie and very full notes of great help to the scholarly reader. Anthony Kerrigan's translation is clean, forceful and direct. Much of the material is translated for the first time, but where this is not the case, Kerrigan's is preferable to any previous efforts: his translation of The Life of Don Quixote and Sancho, for example, far surpasses in clarity the H.P. Earle translation published in 1929, now out of print.

Were he alive today, Unamuno would assuredly be delighted with the whole Bollingen venture. He was an interested student of American literature and philosophy, and the notion of a nine-volume American edition of his writings would have pleased him immensely. He would be especially pleased, I believe, that Kerrigan and his fellow editors chose The Life of Don Quixote as the first translation to appear in their series. Above all his other writings, his commentary on Don Quixote best reveals the essential contemporaneity of his work. Armando Zubizarreta has described Unamuno as "the first contemporary man," and his judgment is apt: Unamuno's individual experience is in some measure the experience of us all. His life was situated in a national history of prophetic modernity, a history marked by military uprisings and dictatorship, civil war, political assassination, riots in cities and on university campuses, and the final loss of empire: Unamuno's first fame came as spokesman for the "Generation of '98," the group of Spanish writers who attempted to assess the future of Spain following its defeat by the United States, a defeat bitter in its domestic consequences, but only the last stage of declining Spanish prestige as it lost one by one its American possessions in the 19th century. And Unamuno's own intimate history was one of strife and turmoil. He came to consciousness during the bombardment of his native Bilbao during the Second Carlist War. In 1914, he was deposed, for political reasons, from the rectorship of the University of Salamanca. Under Primo de Rivera, he spent six years in exile. His last public act was a denunciation of Franco, a gesture which resulted in his being placed under house arrest until his death—under somewhat cloudy circumstances—the last day of 1936.

How, one may ask, is it possible to do philosophy at all, in such a history? When the nation is a caldron of unrest, when men are engaged in bitter dispute with one another, when there is no public trust, what should the man of intellect do? Unamuno's answer is worked out in The Life of Don Quixote: avoiding every form of dogmatism, one must become a man of passionate conflict, recognizing that an imposed peace, in the name of public order only, is a prison for the human spirit. If "we seek a society so policed that no one can harm his neighbor," we will have in the end "a situation where no one acts badly, but where no one feels right." Peace must be sought in the midst of war: men must be united in a common civil war, a war against arrogance and the lie, especially that most convenient of all lies, the lie that men would be placid and cheerfully united, were it not for a few troublemakers.

Here, Unamuno's whole understanding of human existence is involved. Each of us is a vital self, striving to know, to create meaning and order, to give shape to the future, to love, to perpetuate himself, ultimately to "personalize the Universe," to give his own personal meaning to reality itself. Nothing is given in advance except the struggle itself—and the outcome of the struggle is inescapably tragic. To be human, we must try to carry out our projects, but our projects are doomed. To love is to suffer. Our desire and our will are infinite, as is the universe: but we are mortal and finite. The tragic truth with which we each must wrestle, as Isaac wrestled with his God, is the truth of what Rabbi Richard L. Rubenstein has called our "Holy Nothingness."

But men very often cannot accept tragedy. We cannot bear our humanity, our holy nothingness. We cannot tell the truth, and so we invent the lie. We say that the meaning of life is already given, and the answers are known in advance. The god we worship is the God Smug, the embodiment of consensus. We find human enemies, and we build human solidarity upon the existence of human opponents whom we can safely hate. The philosopher, however, offers us a chance to see and to bear manfully our human condition, by speaking to us as one man of flesh and bone to another, by speaking as a poet of the life of passionate desire and perpetual conflict. Or, as Unamuno says in The Life of Don Quixote:

Reader, listen: though I do not know you, I love you so much that if I could hold you in my hands, I would open up your breast and in your heart's core, I would make a wound and into it I would rub vinegar and salt, so that you might never again know peace, but would live in continual anguish and endless longing. If I have not succeeded in disquieting you with this Quixote of mine, it is because of my heavy-handedness, believe me, and because this dead paper on which I write neither shrieks, nor cries out, nor sighs, nor laments, and because language was not made for you and me to understand each other.

This Year at Marienbad

JOY: Expanding Human Awareness. By William C. Schutz, Grove Press. 223 pp. $5.50.

ROBERT CLAIBORNE

Mr. Claiborne is a writer and editor.

You can diagnose a sick society by its placebos. The spa was invented for the aristocracy and haute bourgeoisie of the latter 19th century, whose surfeit of Sachertorte and Goldwasser, chemin de fer and sex, could be temporarily dissipated by a course of the waters at Vichy, Saratoga or Marienbad. The educated American middle class of the latter 20th century, however, is plagued with spiritual starvation. And to dull its hunger pangs we now have the neo-spa, devoted to "expanding human awareness" and "developing human potential."

Most fashionable of these Pepsi-generation Marienbads is Esalen Institute, at Big Sur, Calif., whose scenic acreage, once the site of an unsuccessful old-time spa, has been converted by the brilliant promoter Mike Murphy into a haven for the middle-to-upper-bracket deprived. The Pop-psych monthly Psychology Today recently ran Murphy's own report, or blurb, on Esalen, illustrated with a double fold-out of "the swinging, sensuous 'Garden of the Human Potential'" depicted in painted plasticene. The result looked less like a garden than an elaborate smörgåsbord offering psychic goodies for every taste. Now William Schutz, a psychologist on the Esalen staff, has written a home cookbook for those of us who can't afford a gourmet trip to Henry Miller country.

The book is hard to read (Schutz lacks Murphy's PR gift of gab) and even harder to discuss intelligently. Esalen's approach to joy-making is eclectic; its techniques range from more or less orthodox Freudian free association to what Psychology Today called "group grope" (a phrase that vividly, if perhaps unconsciously, portrays the gang-bang-in-Macy's-window aura of some institute proceedings). Schutz describes every damn one of them—faithfully, flatly, and with no trace of critical judgment. He has equally loving feelings toward "encounter groups," the "somatic-psychic" techniques of Rolf and Lowen, Maria Ebner's "connective tissue massage," Perl's Gestalt therapy, Moreno's psychodrama and, as the old song goes, lots more. None of them, he concedes, work all the time—and from the sketchy case histories provided it is impossible to decide whether any of them, as used at Esalen or in the privacy of one's own home, work any of the time.

For Schutz employs only the vaguest—and usually subjective—language to tell us what was wrong with his—patients? clients? subjects?—before "therapy" and what happened to them afterward. An individual acquired "that beautiful feeling of being at peace with myself and the rest of the world," or became "more receptive, physically and emotionally," or "feels more able to cope"—and that's about it.

From these encomiums it is clear that the Esalen treatment possesses the essential quality of any placebo: it can make (some) people feel better. But do people not merely feel better, temporarily, but also live better? Schutz gives no convincing evidence. And knowing man's proved capacity for responding positively to sugar pills and kindred therapies, I won-

Four Poets on

Martin Luther King

FOR MARTIN LUTHER KING

The blood will continue:
and words falling like dead animals in the green pastures
of his Lord;
all around his secret
fear, the Book
he carried in his brain,
other men dreamed of corpses dancing in a strobe-light of History and skin.

He was not romantic enough: too slow for running. Someone could not forgive him that.
He never changed his name, or swore return to any other land . . .
reason enough for some Hero of metal to rip him down like a flag unmasted
when it was rising at last
to the sun he praised.

STANLEY COOPERMAN

der if there is any real evidence to give.

The suspicion that Schutz is dispensing sugar pills (unwittingly, of course) is strengthened by the observation that his dubious therapy is based on woefully inadequate diagnosis. People are unhappy, he says, because their birthright of joy "becomes depleted, distorted, contorted" by "guilt and fear," and because they "cannot express their feelings honestly" or "engage in honest interaction." This is equivalent to a doctor's saying that the patient is sick because he has a fever. As the source of suppressed feeling, of dishonesty, of guilt and fear, Schutz can only cite "our culture"—noting its numerous "words for hypocrisy [he means dishonesty] like tact, diplomacy, discretion."

The disease Schutz and Esalen are purporting to diagnose and treat is the well-known alienation-anomie-loss-of-identity syndrome, now endemic in the Western world. Its fundamental source is those social institutions which, because their activities are essentially anti-human, must for their own preservation control their victims through lies and fear. The victims must either oppose themselves to the institutions or swallow the lies, suppress outraged feelings, and internalize the fear—which thereupon becomes guilt.

AFTER THE KILLING OF MARTIN LUTHER KING

I listened to old music all day trying to console myself
— — the New Orleans jazzmen,
Big Bill Broonzy, Brownie
McGhee — things like
The Southbound Train
My Bucket's Got a Hole in It and Twelve Gates to the City

music out of the chain gangs music out of loneliness, desolation music of the poor who would not be humiliated

that shows you how to jump
the truck out of history
and pick yourself up in the dust
—damn near whole.

LOU LIPSITZ

FOR CORETTA KING

We'd always swum out too far to hear what he was shouting . . .

When we saw you standing on the sand without him, when we saw you raise and cup your hands around your mouth, when we heard your first cries like pebbles rattling in our veins, our legs and arms stopped.

Already fish have found us;
poke our pale and bloated bellies
as if we were crusts of bread.

DOUGLAS EICHORN

This, not "our culture," is what ails the middle class—along with many other Americans. For them, the dishonesty of "tact, diplomacy and discretion" is a survival technique ("Man lives by his misdeeds alone," said Brecht). Express yourself honestly to a "difficult" boss and you find yourself on unemployment insurance. Engage in "honest interaction" with a cop and you find yourself in jail—or the hospital. The explanation of our shortage of joy parallels the punch line of the old Yiddish joke about the laughing hyena: "Schmuck, what have you got to laugh about?"

The point of all this is not that Schutz should have written a call to social revolution instead of a self-improvement manual. But his manual, by wrenching individual problems out of their oppressive institutional context, prevents his readers from confronting the problems squarely. Significantly, for example, his discussion of "control" as a problem area is cast in purely interpersonal terms. Yet in fact, what makes most of us feel controlled, rather than in control, is far less our peers than our institutional superiors in the bureaucracies of government, industry, education and labor.

Even more significant is his section on Organizational (i.e., institutional) Relations—which incidentally occupies only 27 out of some 220 pages. To apply the Esalen technique within an institution, he tells us, it is essential to have "the support of the top man." What happens when the top man (or men) won't play the Esalen game is recounted in one of the book's most unintentionally amusing incidents. Student leaders at "a large Western university" (Berkeley?) asked Schutz to set up a "leadership laboratory" to help them function more effectively and "to communicate better with the school administration. . . . The workshop was held and was very successful—with one reservation. The attendance of the student leaders was remarkable. . . . But of all the administrators invited, none appeared."

Schutz has clearly not learned much from this fiasco, else he could not write such nonsense as "our institutions, our organizations, the 'establishment'—even these we are learning to use for our own joy." I hope I live long enough to derive some joy from our telephone company, our draft boards and our tactical police force—not to speak of our CIA and Strategic Air Command.

To live joyfully, we must indeed learn to relate to our fellows in freedom and honesty. But to suppose we can do this without tangling with the institutions that deal daily in fear and dishonesty is to offer a cataplasm for a social cancer. The kingdom of God may well be within us—but to truly know it, we must also contend against the kingdom of Satan that surrounds us.

mirrors and the Mass are constant images; Moore has used them liberally before. But with them menstruation takes its place as a recurring motif. Mary Dunne's personality is a complex of her sexuality and her rejected Catholic background. The accumulation of allusions to the Virgin—the distasteful drinking of Bloody Marys, the Saviour role Mary gives her author-husband, her being called "Maria" at some stages in her life, even her referring to herself once as the "un-Virgin Mary"—all stress a symbolic psychological and religious complexity. But in making this association while emphasizing the menstruation motif, Moore shocks the reader as no openly salacious writer can. "There are some things," says the hidden Mrs. Grundy in us all, "some combination of things, one just doesn't mention!" (The combining of the incongruous, mentioning the unmentionable is what makes the reading of An Answer From Limbo the terrifying experience it is.) Mary Dunne, reviewing her life and questioning her sanity, does mention them candidly and openly.

The style of Mary Dunne is at first puzzling and disappointing, for it suggests the slick women's magazines with their chic female protagonist's quest for fulfillment and happiness in the first-person point of view, and even in the precious nicknames of several of the male characters—Bat, Tee, Hat. Moore again makes the risky decision (as in all his novels) to explore that territory dangerously close to melodrama, a decision that has opened his works to the criticism of sentimentality. But it is Moore's conviction that the serious writer must skirt the melodramatic on his way to an honest resolution of events, that he must take chances; and if he fails, his work may lapse into melodrama. Moore has not failed yet; he has succeeded remarkably well in The Lonely Passion of Judith Hearne, The Luck of Ginger Coffey and An Answer From Limbo. For the final terrain which Moore reaches with his protagonist Mary Dunne is no country for the young women of the slick magazines.

The shock of the novel has its legitimate basis, I think, in this stylistic and thematic approach: what appears to be superficial and leading to easy answers moves instead into the horror void that underlies the daily activities of the "successful" American. The irony of the search for identity is that it may end successfully. The deception of the style only adds force to that revelation when it comes. Moore has shown before, in An Answer From Limbo, that his view of the abyss need not be limited to failures in Ireland; he has demonstrated again in I Am Mary Dunne that hell is here as well.

Total Recall

I AM MARY DUNNE. By Brian Moore. The Viking Press. 217 pp. $4.95.

RICHARD B. SALE

Mr. Sale is in the English Department at North Texas State University. He is at work on a study of Brian Moore's fiction for the Twayne World Authors Series.

If the unexamined life is not worth living, the examined life can be extremely dangerous. I Am Mary Dunne, Brian Moore's sixth novel, takes a woman's self-exploration as its theme. (A tentative working title, more descriptive but less dramatic, which Moore rejected, was A Woman With No Identity.) The central character, Mary Dunne, age 31, three times married, now (and permanently, likely) to an established playwright, tries to discover the many selves that she has been during her life. She is, in every practical sense, a successful woman, living comfortably in her New York apartment. Hers is not a calm, philosophical journey but an anguished searching of the past to find purpose in the present and some justification for whatever she now is. The events are contained in one day, although there are numerous cutbacks to each of her earlier "lives." She recalls her Canadian Catholic childhood, her previous two marriages (one an adolescent mistake, both to near-impotent men), her friendship with a latent Lesbian, her sexually satisfying present marriage.

Mary is without religious faith, but is permanently affected by its loss. She is forced to entertain two visitors from Canada, one a silly woman from Montreal whom she has outgrown but who serves to bring back much of the past. The other is an obnoxious acquaintance who has built his emotional life around an old infatuation with Mary. Ironically, she has almost entirely forgotten him. Telephone conversations with her mother also bring up bits of the past, including the story of her philandering father's scandalous death. These accumulated memories and experiences, many heavily sexual, bring Mary to the point of crisis.

I Am Mary Dunne displays Moore's ability to put a book together without seams, to present his story so that the candor of the telling hides all trace of the craft that produced it, as well as the amazing empathy that the author can establish with a central character who is a woman.

His earlier works have prepared the reader to expect these merits in a Moore novel. But this new book offers surprises. Moore is working in new country (for him), both technically and thematically: this is his first book written entirely in the first person. He has limited the action to a single day, and he has moved further into taboo areas (relatively speaking; Moore has never attempted to rival the happy pornographers of current fiction).

In Mary Dunne's survey of her past,

Compassionate Fun

MY FATHER, SHOLOM ALEICHEM.
By Marie Waife-Goldberg. Simon & Schuster. 333 pp. $7.50.

CURT LEVIANT

Mr. Leviant's new Sholom Aleichem collection, Some Laughter, Some Tears, will be published by Putnam in August.

Sholom Aleichem (1859-1916) was the nom de plume of Sholom Rabinowitz, one of the pillars of modern Yiddish literature, a spokesman for his people during his lifetime, and now that ashes and silence cover his world, still an enduring voice. In the half century since his death, his fame as a humorist has spread from Yiddish-speaking areas and from his native Russia—where his stories were successfully translated at the beginning of this century—to the rest of the world. Besides the many hardcover and paperback editions available in English, his works can now be found in all European languages, and even in Chinese and Japanese.

What is remarkable about Sholom Aleichem is that while creating his fictional kingdom, he was also shaping literature. In his own writings and in his brief stint as publisher, during which he urged others to write, Sholom Aleichem raised the literary level of Yiddish, and successfully demonstrated that a rich, supple and nuance-laden language nearly 1,000 years old need not necessarily play second fiddle to the then favored Hebrew. When didactic Hebrew satire was in fashion with intellectuals, romantic Yiddish potboilers were considered women's fare, and crude, unsophisticated comedy was relegated to cheap pamphlets, Sholom Aleichem was the first to utilize humor as a serious literary mode in Yiddish. Employing the entire range of the Jewish folk treasure—lore, literature and language—he developed an inimitable personal style, and by his loving and gently ironic portrayal of a complete civilization, captured the essence of the East European Jewish soul.

In addition to the works of Sholom Aleichem in English, we are now fortunate in having My Father, Sholom Aleichem, a memoir-biography by his youngest daughter, Mrs. Marie Waife-Goldberg. Utilizing her father's unfinished autobiography, published and unpublished letters, pertinent quotations from his stories, and her personal memories, Mrs. Goldberg has re-created Sholom Aleichem in all his depth, humor and compassion. She wisely avoids the pitfalls of kinsman-memoirists whose egos usually thrust them to upstage their subjects, but remains discreetly in the background. Quite properly, the hero of her book is Sholom Aleichem.

Sholom Aleichem displayed a gift for writing and humor even as a boy. He composed a little dictionary of his step-mother's lively invective, and wrote a Jewish version of Robinson Crusoe. But the spark that lit his desire to be a humorist—the Proustian biscuit in the cup of tea—is traced to the Yiddish story book that his father read to his friends. Sholom Aleichem later confessed in his autobiography that he envied the author who was able to make people roar with laughter, and wished he could "write a book like that, a little book that people would read and laugh at . . ."

Unlike that of other literary figures, Sholom Aleichem's public and private life were one. The unpretentious humorist preferred family to literary life, though he built no partition between himself and his public. One unobtrusive fact points up his family-centered existence. The only nonrelative to whom he used the familiar (du) form of address was his writer-friend, Mordecai Spector—the man who at the outset of Sholom Aleichem's career urged him to turn his attention to the then neglected Jewish provincial life.

Readers of Sholom Aleichem who know little about the author will find that the portrait emerging from the memoir may very well fit preconceptions based upon the fiction. For the empathy of the people of Kasrilevke (Sholom Aleichem's mythical Jewish Everytown), their optimism, love of life and abhorrence of violence are shared by Sholom Aleichem himself.

No wonder, then, that he was the most popular Yiddish writer of his time. (The romantic notion of the posthumously discovered genius did not apply to him; though financial rewards came only after his death.) The love showered upon him by a grateful Jewry has no contemporary analogy—for a comparison we must turn to the Pop scene: Sholom Aleichem was adored as movie stars and sports heroes are today. Yet this simile, too, is tricky, since superstars are admired from afar. No intimacy, warmth or personal contact binds fan and idol, who indeed often wears a mask for his public.

Sholom Aleichem wore no mask. Rather than seeking to escape from his people, he sought them out. Wherever he lived he would place ads in the local papers stating his address so that visitors could come to see him. On his reading tours—like Mark Twain and Dickens, Sholom Aleichem had a gift for mimicry, an excellent sense of timing, and was a superb reader of his works—thousands of Jews of varying piety and political persuasions, turned out to greet him, for they considered him their own, their official biographer.

His arrival in a town for a reading was an occasion of great excitement. A multitude of enthusiasts would come out to welcome him at the railway station. A large crowd would mill around his hotel, waiting to follow him to the lecture hall, and would press around him on his way back. This created two problems: one was that the police saw in any gathering of people a sinister political rally; the other was the physical difficulty of getting him to and from the hall in safety. Mostly the youth of the town—the college students and older high-school boys—saved the day, by forming a human chain around him to keep off the crowd, and cutting a path through the surging mass of fans. . . . After such a triumphant tour my father returned home tired . . . and also sad and depressed. He took the admiration of his audiences modestly—it was their plight that affected him.

Aside from glory and success, Mrs. Goldberg also focuses sharply on the sadder aspects of Sholom Aleichem's life. On the night when communities all over the world were celebrating Sholom Aleichem's 25th literary anniversary (October 25, 1908), the writer, removed from his beloved Jews of Russia, and recovering slowly in Italy from an attack of pulmonary tuberculosis, wrote to his friend, Spector: "You must feel, yourself, what is in my heart. At this time, when . . . Jews rejoice in my jubilee, I am here, lonely, sick, rootless, forlorn, crying bitter tears."

Despite his world-wide popularity, Sholom Aleichem was, ironically, subjected to an unending struggle to earn a living. While unscrupulous book publishers made fortunes via pirated editions and other financial manipulations, Sholom Aleichem himself often had to rely on loans to make ends meet. Concomitantly, especially in his later years, there was homelessness (Russia to Europe to America), illness, separation from his beloved Republic—his pet name for his family—and the loss of his son, who also suffered from tuberculosis.

Mrs. Goldberg's memoir is rich and variegated, spiced with humor and understanding. One incident that she records is paradigmatic of Sholom Aleichem's status as folk and culture hero. While on tour in Warsaw a young Hasidic Jew, with beard and earlocks, shyly approached Sholom Aleichem, took his hand and kissed it. "You are our consolation," he said with tears in his eyes. "You have sweetened for us the bitterness of exile." My Father, Sholom Aleichem shows that the love, the strength, that Sholom Aleichem gave to Jewry, Jewry returned tenfold. What writer, what person could ask for more?

An Uneasy Alliance

WRITERS AND PARTISANS: A History of Literary Radicalism in America. By James Burkhardt Gilbert. John Wiley & Sons. 303 pp. $6.95.

WORLD WAR I AND THE AMERICAN NOVEL. By Stanley Cooperman. The Johns Hopkins Press. 273 pp. $6.50.

THE LAST GREAT CAUSE: The Intellectuals and the Spanish Civil War. By Stanley Weintraub. Weybright and Talley. 340 pp. $8.50.

H. R. WOLF

Mr. Wolf teaches at the State University of New York at Buffalo. He has contributed articles to The Psychoanalytic Review and American Imago.

These three books share a sense of the fifties, a sense of the end of ideology, the end of historical process. For this, they suffer in different ways and should warn against the closing off of eras and epochs.

In what is obviously a last-minute insertion, James Gilbert says in a footnote at the end of Writers and Partisans:

The relationship of the Central Intelligence Agency to individuals who wrote for the Partisan Review and the sponsorship of the magazine after 1959 by the American Committee for Cultural Freedom raise the possibility that everything I have said in this book is misleading or irrelevant. It might suggest the complicity (as yet undisclosed) of the magazine itself in the thought control exercised by America's supersecret and best publicized spy agency. Concrete evidence of anything of this sort has not appeared.

This courageous admission on Gilbert's part—"the possibility that everything I have said in this book is misleading or irrelevant"—is nothing less than a tragedy of scholarship though it bears the imprint of the author's integrity, the kind of integrity that marks his careful and impartial history of literary radicalism in America as it unfolds in the "little" magazine over the course of the century. It remains for Professor Gilbert, or those who will follow his exhaustive bibliographic research, to write the re-evaluation of the material he has so arduously culled and simultaneously undermined. Professor Gilbert's self-imposed skepticism reaches beyond his book to the problem of the American writer and intellectual during the cold-war period—to the intellectual and governmental coalition, even collusion, of the postwar period—and affects the focus of his work in a way that he does not recognize: because he chooses to write through the editors and contributors to the magazines—Seven Arts, New Masses, The Soil, Anvil and, above all, Partisan Review, to name a few; because he chooses to record the shifting attitudes of writers and intellectuals toward political radicalism and radical art (the uneasy alliance that is his theme), he does not put himself outside the material and its immediate historical context. In a word, Professor Gilbert has written a history of the little magazines: a meta-history, taking literature "about" history as his controlling subject. Had he applied himself to the texts as symptoms rather than emblems, he might, among other issues, have addressed himself to the disastrous implications of the Left's anti-Stalinism and contribution to what now seems to be a myth of monolithic world communism. Then the revelation of the CIA issue would have been less devastating. Notwithstanding the awful truths of the Stalinist era, Professor Gilbert might have shown the far-reaching implications (Vietnam, among them) of an entrenched anti-Stalinism that persists even now among segments of the liberal Left.

The history of the Left's implication in what it now so passionately and justly despises needs still to be written. There are other books that Gilbert didn't write in the tightly organized one that he did. Although he well documents the catholic tastes of pre-World War I socialism, the post-Victorian humanism that opened the way to a union of new art and radical politics, one wants to know the sources in American culture of the experimental aesthetic predilections of the American radical—seen now in the psychedelic, surface-oriented taste of the New Left. Although he traces the hobo and tramp as hero within the I.W.W. and the Socialist movement he does not pursue the anarchic element in earlier American life. The fragile marriage between Bohemianism and socialism in the twenties is charted—touching on the point of revolution, both sexual and political—but the separating issues of Marxism and psychoanalysis are not examined, nor is there any discussion of the deep conflict between Trotsky and Lenin.

Gilbert follows the subtle shifts of the intellectual journalists—Rahv, MacDonald, Phillips—but he does not dig into the great ideological and aesthetic systems that engaged them. If one is in the "family" (to use Podhoretz's cannibalistic word), this book will be a welcome and thorough recollection. If one is not, it will fascinate, tease, and perhaps drive him into the theoretical currents that lie under the attitudes of the "little" magazine as it evolved from the days of the Wobblies to Commentary and The Nation.

Like Gilbert, Stanley Cooperman assumes a posture of historical closure toward his thoroughly documented history of World War I and the American Novel. Cooperman sees literature about the war after the First World War "as blunted by so many years of continuing violence." Both books have been shaped by the Second World War and the stasis of the cold-war years. As a new renaissance of art and politics charac-

LETTERS (Continued from page 810)

printer's error had been omitted inadvertently from the book. Fortunately, it has now been rescued, and it will be restored in the next printing.

James S. Allen, President and Editor
International Publishers

Newburyport, Mass.

DEAR SIR: I have never questioned the "authenticity" of the content of DuBois' Autobiography. On the contrary, I said specifically, "These are the unretouched words of a 90-year-old man squaring himself with death." My offending paragraphs dealt precisely with the point that I felt International themselves were clouding the "authenticity" of the work by adding a signed "Editor's Preface" to a perfect and poetic soliloquy; thereby implying that the book needed much more than the usual anonymity of routine editorship. As far as the two versions of the book's beginning are concerned, it is surely the duty of any critic worth his salt to state his literary preference. Mine is that the shape of the book should have followed not only the manuscript in my possession but the shape of DuBois' life which began "by a golden river . . . five years after the Emancipation Proclamation." It is obtuse to accuse me of anti-communism and an unwillingness to "confront" the fact that DuBois became a Communist, since I stated in the final paragraph of my review: "At the end he felt that only a Communist revolution could contain him and use him as the embodiment of black millions fighting to be free."

Truman Nelson

terizes the New Left, so outrage, of ■ primal quality, lies at the heart of the anti-Vietnamese War movement. This rebirth of indignation at the horrors of modern technological warfare qualifies but does not negate the "bold journey" and the "broken world" that Cooperman reconstructs, nor the response of post-World War I writers:

Among these fragments, however, there were possibilities for survival either through mastering the "buzz-saw" or being absorbed within it. And, finally, there was the possibility of achieving a different sort of survival: an assertion of positive values within negation itself.

Cooperman intelligently applies these three possibilities, with variations, to well- and lesser-known writers—a valuable catalogue for students of this period. He is especially intelligent about Hemingway and the relationship of inhibition and style. Cooperman is best at social history and in the first section, "The Bold Journey," he establishes a context that makes the anti-rhetorical posture of the postwar writers clear and meaningful. Cooperman missed ■ chance here to relate the object level of much contemporary art—the texture of projective verse, the retinal films of the underground, the surfaces of Frank Stella—to a subtle kind of humanism: a non-abstraction that rejects the failure of abstraction in this century, even at the costly price of omitting the image of man in direct forms.

All students of American literature will want to read this book, though they will not find in it an explanation of the curious passive-aggressiveness of our culture, of the violence that lies curled in the thicket of public rhetoric, or ■ reflection of the new literature that is probing the origins and nature of aggression.

Stanley Weintraub's The Last Great Cause (has he heard of the black revolution, the agony of the Third World?) is a you-were-there approach to the Spanish Civil War, but not nearly so effective as the cinematic elegy, To Die in Madrid. In essence, the book is a latent biography. Weintraub finds clues to the work in the experiences of the Civil War: Rubashov of Darkness at Noon is Koestler in the Seville prison; The Fifth Column takes off from Hemingway's days at the Hotel Florida in Madrid; a Berkeley (where else?) economics instructor, Robert Merriman, is the model of Robert Jordan. But one wants a work of this kind to go beyond the "readable"; one wants to know the convolutions of Moscow's attitudes and actions toward the anarchists, to know the deepest motivations of the American and British "neutrality" while Hitler and Mussolini played with death, to be given some hint of the unrest in contemporary Spain. Will the Spanish Civil War, in the last analysis, have contributed to Spain's progress? Cooperman or Gilbert would have unearthed this and much more.

stations; that radio stations be pried loose from broadcasting networks; that N.B.C. be liberated from RCA; that the chain ownership of radio stations, newspapers and theatres be disallowed; and that FCC control be imposed over the speculative sale of radio stations.

The latest evidence, painstakingly and impressively accumulated by Rucker, demonstrates that the trends uncovered by Ernst have become dominant and seemingly institutionalized national patterns. In a word, the movement to monopolization in the mass media has accelerated. Chains reach across the land. In 1967, newspaper combines "owned 871 of the 1,767 daily newspapers . . . or 49.3 percent of the total." Chains owned the five largest general circulation dailies, and nineteen of the top twenty-five. Chains owned 31.4 per cent of the commercial AM and a similar percentage of FM radio stations. Television, just appearing when Ernst made his pioneer study, but now the most influential of all the mass media, Rucker finds "virtually taken over by enterprising chain broadcasters," who now control 73.6 per cent of all commercial stations.

The process of concentrated control extends in all directions. Newspapers own huge numbers of television stations. In 1967, publishers "held interests in a third of the VHF stations (156) and in

The Image Monopolists

THE FIRST FREEDOM. By Bryce W. Rucker. Southern Illinois University Press. 322 pp. $12.50.

HERBERT I. SCHILLER

Mr. Schiller is research professor of economics and communications at the University of Illinois.

The original version of The First Freedom appeared in 1946, and was dedicated by its author, Morris Ernst, "To the Members of the Congress of the United States on whom we must rely to restore free enterprise in movies, radio, and press." This misplaced trust aside, the book called attention, in documented detail, to widespread monopolistic developments in the American press, radio and motion picture industries. Still, Ernst was not without hope. "I am convinced," he wrote then, that "it is not too late to stem the tide. But we must act fast and with bravery."

More than two decades later, Bryce

Rucker, with Ernst's approval, has published under the same title an updated inventory of the organizational state of American mass communications. Expectations for remedial change, along with confidence in the essential health of the media, are barely visible this second time around. In an introduction to the modernized work, Ernst observes dejectedly: "The most frightening part of Professor Rucker's exploration may well be seen in the simple and dirty fact that the abandonment of the idea of competition of ideas can scarcely be debated in our culture today. It will be of interest to note," Ernst adds, "whether the Rucker facts and thesis are even given public attention in the mass media." He concludes it would be a miracle to expect such an event.

Is this despair justified? In 1946, Ernst had recommended, among other measures, that joint communications ventures be prohibited; that newspapers be divested of the ownership of radio

AUTHORS WANTED BY NEW YORK PUBLISHER

Leading book publisher seeks manuscripts of all types: fiction, non-fiction, poetry, scholarly and juvenile works, etc. New authors welcomed. For complete information send for booklet 103. It's free. Vantage Press, 120 W. 31 St. New York, N.Y. 10001.

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION

6-24-68

222 Sixth Ave., New York 10011

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

22 percent of the UHF stations (28)." Beyond this, "newspaper-television monopolies existed in 27 American cities" and varying degrees of joint media control prevail in scores of other communities. Last year, on the newspaper front alone, there were competing dailies in only sixty-four of America's 1,547 daily newspaper cities. In several states, no competing papers exist in any localities.

In television, chain ownership is but one facet of monopoly control. Three networks (A.B.C., N.B.C., C.B.S.) largely determine what Americans see on the tube, for "only about 13 percent of all broadcast time is devoted to local-live programming." In prime time (7 to 11 P.M.), networks provide 95 per cent of the material. In addition to programing control, the networks own the most profitable stations in the largest markets. In turn, the networks are either part of larger electronics-defense-communications combines (N.B.C. resides in the RCA-corporate-supershester), or are utterly dependent on a few hundred giant advertisers for the bulk of their income. "The five largest advertisers in 1966 contributed 17.8 percent, the 35 top advertisers supplied 50.7 percent of television's total advertising income."

Bryce Rucker systematically examines the entire image-making apparatus (with the exception of motion pictures) and finds it interconnected at almost every vital point. Two international news services, AP and UPI, themselves the instruments of tightly held interests, provide the world view of most Americans, since these services, with few exceptions, are the main sources of international news for the nation's press and broadcasters.

The communications technostuctures prefer to minimize their economic impulses and to emphasize a posture of public spiritedness, but profit seeking is their driving force. In a thirteen-year period, from 1954 to 1966, "4,369 broadcasting stations as well as 538 television stations, changed hands at a total cost of $1,536,014,367." This mountain of capital gains, incidentally, derives from the assignment of licenses, granted by the FCC to private broadcasters on a temporary basis, for the use of public property—the radio spectrum.

This should suggest that the mass media are more than the well-paid servants of commerce, though they are certainly that. In structure, operation and motivation, the business of communications is distinguishable from other corporate business only in its claim of special constitutional privilege. It utilizes technology to reinforce market position, and Rucker details any number of anti-competitive practices including price fixing, kickbacks and pools.

Favorite cold-war social science models, predicated pluralism, the end of ideology and the attenuation of profit maximizing are poor guides to the performance of the mass communications industries. What is more, the media's conditions do not reflect malfunctioning in vestigial economic activities. Monopoly, profit maximization and a public-be-damned stance are located in the most dynamic, modernized and "cleanest" industries. These constitute the central nervous system of the social order. They provide the national image of what is normal, what is orderly, what is preferable, and what is just. But these perspectives are the carefully tooled products of business structures heavily concentrated, self-serving, and as indifferent to the public interest as any 19th-century trust. Moreover, the doctored outputs of the American mass media are penetrating international markets and have created a monumental problem for those concerned with safeguarding national cultural sovereignties.

Is the present course reversible? Ernst, nearly a quarter of a century ago, appealed to Congress. Rucker, more realistically, notes that "Approximately twenty-five congressmen or members of their family own interests in radio and television properties. . . . Less well known, but even more serious, probably half of the senators and representatives through their law firms represent broadcasters . . . (and) what should we call the free radio and television time given to two-thirds of the members of Congress by their local stations?" Not surprisingly, Congress is quick to censure even the mildest efforts of that notorious paper tiger regulator, the FCC, when it moves to remind broadcasters of their public responsibilities.

Obligated to be as constructive as possible in an increasingly desperate situation, Rucker proposes some legislative reforms to stymie further concentration in the mass media. His prescriptions—tax levies that discourage station sales, adjusted postal subsidies that reverse the arrangements that now benefit the large newspapers and magazines, and more prominent ownership disclosure in all media—in the unexpected event that they should be enacted, are unlikely to halt the rush to continental inter-media combination. Fewer and still more omnipotent private conduits of information and entertainment seem to be in the offing. Vast electronic, "knowledge conglomerates" are currently being assembled. This raises a question: "Can the day be far off," Rucker asks, "when criticism of the mass media will be published only by the university presses?" Answer: Southern Illinois University Press published The First Freedom.

THE BOYS IN THE BACK ROOM

Although Nixon never sincerely became as obsessed about the Red Menace as did the John Birch Society (which could see even in the absence of Communists another proof of Communist deviousness), the anti-Communist thrust as a demagogic device became a conditioned reflex with him that sometimes made him absurd. Thus when the left-wing W. E. B. DuBois (pronounced "du-boyce") Clubs were labeled by the United States Attorney General in 1966 as a Communist-front organization, Nixon, noting the similarity in sound to the Boys' Clubs of America, of which he was a nominal official, solemnly intoned that the leftists "are not unaware of the confusion they are causing among our supporters and among many other good citizens—an almost classic example of Communist deception and duplicity."

From Dancing Bear: An Inside Look at California Politics by Gladwin Hill (The World Publishing Co., $6.50). A comprehensive, realistic and witty explanation of the politics of the Golden State, by a Nation contributor.

Serious Rock

JOHN GABREE

Mr. Gabree is a free-lance writer whose particular interest is popular music.

The important thing about the current revolution in Pop music is not, as has been suggested, that it is bringing the forms and content of serious music to a wider and thus presumably crasser audience. Pop music has always done that (remember Glenn Miller's special way with the Anvil Chorus). What is new is that Pop music is reaching an audience that previously has been interested only in classical music or jazz.

Most talented young people who decide to make a career of music today seriously consider becoming Pop musicians. Many of the most creative do enter the field. On both coasts, Pop has captured large portions of the FM listening market. It has succeeded jazz and folk as the music of the campus, and the serious magazines are tripping over one another to get into the business of Pop criticism.

According to popular mythology, the Beatles are responsible for Pop's newfound respectability. But while it is true that their straightforward behavior and ood-humored, innocent appeal have had much to do with the attention being paid popular music by the mass media and others over 30, the real innovating has gone on elsewhere. The publicity attendant on Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band (Capitol), for example, has propagated the idea that the long-playing record can be a medium for serious artistic expression, and not merely a device for reproducing it, but the Beatles' record did not itself explore the possibilities very extensively.

At one time the measure of a successful album was how accurately it captured the sound of a "live" performance. But multi-track recording, which freed the engineer and producer to "mix" the various elements so as to capture the essence of the ensemble sound in its natural state, has now had the fundamental effect of directing Pop musicians away from the re-creation of their stage acts to the discovery of pure "studio" performances. Arrangements are no longer shackled by the internal dynamics of particular instruments, amplified or not. Now a piccolo is the equal of a tuba and either is the peer of an entire orchestra and can be given the same weight in an arrangement, riding together in ways that would be impossible to duplicate in "live" performance. In recent months, albums have become instruments themselves, and the most skillful recording artists are learning to play them with astounding authority.

An example of how much progress has been made already is Song Cycle (Warner Brothers) by Van Dyke Parks. Parks is the consummate studio virtuoso and his album is a milestone of American Pop music. He is also an excellent song writer. For the most part, his music suggests Broadway musical scoring, a form that seemed to have exhausted its possibilities long ago, and his verse is folk-influenced in both form and content. To make things more confusing, the final product often echoes the sound of Appalachian Mountain music. Parks's lyrics are highly sophisticated (the album abounds in ambiguities like "Dreams are still born in Hollywood") and he is a descendant of Joyce (possibly through John Lennon's prose) and Bob Dylan. He sets out to chronicle life in Southern California, which like most Angelenos he takes for a microcosm of the universe, but he escapes beyond Southern Cal to comment on the South (where he is from) and world affairs. Parks's verses are both rich and unpretentious.

But Parks's music is still more impressive. Despite the Broadway and country music strains, the composer whom he most closely resembles is Kurt Weill. The shattered images, the eclecticism, the staggered rhythms and irregular phrasing, the constant emphasis on surprise are like Weill, though of course the two "sounds" are different. The album offers Parks's peculiar, babyish voice, the thinness of which is entirely appropriate to his purposes. Lest all this appear contrived, I add that the music seems to flow entirely naturally and much of the record is quite beautiful.

Artists with visions different from Parks's are using the same techniques to achieve other ends. Frank Zappa, leader of the Mothers of Invention and the only studio musician to have matched Parks's skill, has produced a brilliant series of albums. Among the dedications on Freak Out (Verve), the Mothers' first album, are the names of Charles Mingus, Pierre Boulez, Anton Webern, Igor Stravinsky, Willie Dixon, Guitar Slim, Edgard Varèse and Muddy Waters. Elsewhere, in a list of friends and influences, are Lenny Bruce, Phil Spector (a producer of rock records in the late fifties and early sixties, who developed—in the studio—a massive sound that has had a profound influence on later rock), Willie Mae Thornton (who did the original "Hound Dog" that Elvis copied and made a hit), Roger Sessions and Howlin' Wolf. The Mothers aren't kidding; their work is a peculiar and spectacular blend of classical, jazz and rock influences that, when they are at their best, the Mothers mold into a vision all their own.

Zappa, who composes and arranges most of the band's material and is responsible for the final production of their LPs, is a student of Varèse, a follower of jazz guitarist Wes Montgomery, endowed with the same jagged humor as Bruce and, at 27, is the right age to have absorbed at first hand the developing strains of Pop and rock over the past decade and a half. In fact, it is one of the limitations of the Mothers' appeal that almost no one can pursue all the references that flash through their music. They can segue from a sophisticated piece of post-Mingus jazz or their rendition of a swatch of Stravinsky into a hilarious imitation of the Supremes or Shep and the Limelites or the Videos or any one of the myriad other groups that have surfaced and sunk since 1953. Part of Zappa's genius is to make the experience of growing up absurd in America's middle class a metaphor for what he describes as the "lameness" of modern life. He takes every adolescent crisis, from confrontation with society's moral dualism to wrinkled chinos, and invests it with universal significance. It seems to be Zappa's message that America will never grow up.

So far the Mothers have released three albums and a fourth has appeared under Zappa's name. Freak Out, a two-record set, is the most easily comprehended, although it is overshadowed in range, venturesomeness and technique by its successors. The highlights include several excellent take-offs on early rock and a couple of Zappa's famous monologues (especially "You Didn't Try to Call Me" and "Go Cry On Somebody Else's Shoulder"), a city blues inspired by the Watts riot ("Trouble Every Day"), and a piece of existential poetry called "Help, I'm A Rock." If you have already arrived at the conclusion that middle-class life is lame, Zappa can seem quite preachy, though he usually saves himself by his sense of timing. Absolutely Free, the second release, has some brilliant lyrics (about vegetables) and some very funny moments, but it fails to hold together and is only a disappointing advance over Freak Out. Equally disappointing is "Francis Vincent Zappa Conducts Lumpy Gravy" featuring "Abnuceals Emuukha Electric Symphony Orchestra & Chorus with maybe even some of the Mothers of Invention," which was recorded right after Absolutely Free and only just released. As always, Zappa has some interesting ideas but Lumpy Gravy is largely formless and finally pointless. The third Mothers album, We're Only In It For The Money (made after but released before Lumpy Gravy), the cover of which parodies the already tongue-in-cheek cover of Sgt. Pepper, is a singular achievement. The album is a unified, multi-layered "oratorio" that represents a summation of the Mothers' style, a terribly avant-garde construction the ele-

The Nation

BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

- ☐ VIETNAM FOLLY
by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by Meyer A. Zelligs (Viking, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $3.95
- ☐ THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER by Ronald Sampson (Pantheon, $4.95) .. $3.95

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

6-24-68

EDUCATIONAL

ARTHUR MORGAN SCHOOL, Burnsville 5, N.C. Grades 7, 8 and 9. Co-educational, Quaker-related, informal. Work-study program.

LANGUAGE FOR THE JET AGE—New Jerseyans: if you want to know about the international language used daily the world over, write to the New Jersey Esperanto Society, Box 2263, Paterson, New Jersey 07509.

PUBLICATIONS

PAPERBACK PICK-NICI Used bargain lists. Fiction and non-fiction. Free search. Harco, Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46031.

"SELECTED POEMS" OF GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

THE CONSCIENCE OF A RADICAL

By Sami Nearing

A book you should read.

Have it sent postpaid for $2 clothbound or paperback at $1.

Social Science Institute
Harborside Maine 04642

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION
Independent, lively, and original.
Canada's leading forum for radical thought

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

PSYCHEDELIC LIGHTING MANUAL! Make Light Machines, Strobes, Color Organs etc. Send $2 to: LIGHTTRAYS, 713H Pine, Philadelphia, Pa. 19106.

NEWSPAPER CRITICISM: Grassroots Editor gives fearless Bi-Monthly analysis of Significant journalistic developments. Three dollars yearly. Sample copy one dollar. Grassroots Editor, Journalism Department, Southern Illinois University, Carbondale, Illinois 62901.

DIRECTORY TO RADICAL PERIODICALS. Entire radical spectrum. $1.00. Alpine, Dept. 17, 1340 Geddes, Ann Arbor, Mich. 48104.

'THE PRESS AND THE LAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by

Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Fall issue of Columbia University Forum.

Single copies—15c

25 copies at 10c each

Orders over 25 at 7c per copy

THE NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

ments of which, however, are accessible to anyone who wishes to take the trouble to listen. The Mothers' usual vocabulary is present; musical references to every trend in modern music; sometimes warm, sometimes savage polemic verse (if Parks's musical vision is Weillian, the Mothers' lyric approach is pure Brecht and their sense of staging is Off-Off-Broadway). As with much current art, the work is sometimes abrasive to the point of being ugly, but it is always challenging and often shockingly funny.

Both Zappa and Parks seem to shun the techniques developed by the electronic composers. Zappa even takes pains on We're Only In It For The Money to point out that "none of the sounds are generated electronically . . . they are all the product of electronically altering the sounds of normal instruments."

Another trend among serious curators of Pop music has mixed classical and folk. The first and so far most successful of such amalgams have been the products of one-time folk singer Judy Collins and her arranger and conductor, Joshua Rifkin. The Collins-Rifkin team probably kicked off the whole trend. Two years ago Rifkin, who is a classical composer at Princeton University, arranged The Baroque Beatles Book (Elektra) and his arrangements for Miss Collins' In My Life (Elektra), released a few months later, gave the first big push to serious rock. Miss Collins is a solidly based folk musician, but she gives the impression of enjoying what she is doing now far more than she ever did when she was number two with folk fans behind Joan Baez. Rifkin approaches the studio facilities with less imagination than other Pop leaders, but his arrangements are notable for the traditional classical effects they introduce to Pop. Until Wildflowers (Elektra) was introduced last fall, In My Life had seemed an assured and fascinating album, but now it seems tentative by comparison. The newer album is as brilliant an accomplishment as Song Cycle or We're Only In It For The Money, although it is as different from the latter albums as they are from each other.

One of the strongest elements in the success of the releases by Judy Collins has been the choice of material. Both albums rely heavily on the songs of post-folk composers Joni Mitchell (a near-legendary folk performer from Toronto, Boston and Detroit who has just released her first album) and Leonard Cohen, the Canadian poet and novelist. Miss Collins' own "Aibatross," with accompaniment by the arranger, is the high point of Wildflowers. The album's only flaw is the arrangement by Robert Dennis and Robert Sylvester of Cohen's "Priests" which, though not really bad, sounds out of place in the midst of Rifkin's gems. Also included is "Lasso! di donna" by 14th-century Italian composer Francesco Landini, which is much more appealing in Miss Collins' natural voice than in the brittle singing of the formally trained operatic voices that usually tackle such music. Finally, with "La Chanson des vieux amants" by Jacques Brel, Miss Collins and Rifkin acknowledge their debt to French cabaret music from which they have derived much of the spirit with which they approach album programming.

Many other groups are following the leaders or attempting to find directions of their own. Two of the best rock qua rock groups, The Who and the Buffalo Springfield, have made tentative explorations of longer, more complex forms. On Happy Jack (Decca) The Who perform "A Quick One While He's Away," a mini-opera by the quartet's leader and guitarist Peter Townshend. It is an extended work encompassing a sequential story line and several distinct musical statements. "Broken Arrow" on Buffalo Springfield Again (Atco) attempts to tell the story of an (the) American Indian.

The most extended work in a traditional form by young rock musicians is "The Progress Suite" by Chad Stewart and Jeremy Clyde on Of Cabbages and Kings (Columbia). Despite long stretches of what must be labeled "movie music," the five-part suite features sprightly tunes and, in two sections, clever lyrics. In addition, sections of the suite where the authors have spliced in contemporary sounds work as theatre (even an atomic bomb blast manages not to be too maudlin). As a bonus, the other side features a half dozen excellent tunes in the Collins/Rifkin mode.

There has been a certain amount of bandwagon jumping, some of it successful, most of it not. The most successful recently is the first release by The United States of America (Columbia) which is a pastiche of Zappa and (mostly) Parks. It holds together only because USA's leader, Joseph Byrd, is an imaginative arranger and composer (the lyrics are so commonplace as to distract from what is otherwise a carefully conceived and executed album).

From there it is pretty much downhill. The Vanilla Fudge, a New York City quintet with a lot of skill and not much imagination, has released The Beat Goes On (Atco), a pretentious LP that features rock interpretations of pieces by Mozart, Beethoven and Cole Porter (remember the Anvil Chorus?). And one of the least competent West Coast groups, the Electric Prunes, has produced a lemon in Mass in F minor (Reprise) by David Axelrod.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1255

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

- 1 Look-see? (Give the temporary use of a rumpled bed, and keep all together.) (2, 3,6)
- 9 Might it be furnished in tasteless fashion? (4)
- 0 Gets rid of the undesirable black, traditionally. (5)
- 1 See 7 down
- 2 With candlelight coming to a gradual end? (7)
- 3 See 7 down
- 5 Took exception. (8)
- 6 Material obstruction to question? (6)
- 8 Strengthen the situation before the little dog laughed? (4,2)
- 1 German deflation implied by lowering prices? (4,4)
- 24 Most flowers have to be plugged, perhaps. (7)
- 26 Tells how the tramp is made up. (7)
- 28 You might find a bit with some trouble. (4)
- 29 As this was once a larger country, it's now a republic. (5)
- 30 See 3 down
- 31 A number of currently popular wall-hangings where they used to sleep. (4-7)

DOWN

- 2 Where a link could be charged? (2,3,4)

- 3 and 30 across Way of calling attention to the hands? (3,4,4)
- 4 Steep, possibly. (4)
- 5 How to hang on to one's mate? (7)
- 6 Heavy-sounding deposits. (5)
- 7, 11 across, 19 down and 13 across Tellers are not to be taken in by this! (6,4,3,3,7)
- 8 Inflames a city in West France. (6)
- 14 Most of 16 might be presidential material. (5)
- 17 The character of the rat? (3,6)
- 20 Iron worker? (7)
- 22 Violent enough to make an animal breathe hard! (7)
- 23 Many negative words begin where one may be asked to inquire. (6)
- 25 The literary Mr. Jones rises to coin an appropriate phrase. (5)
- 27 Was the Constellation not an air ship?

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1254

ACROSS: 1 Dulcimer; 5 Abatis; 10 Notes; 11 Eye-opener; 12 America; 13 Emanate; 14 Ostend; 15 Sherman; 18 Efforts; 21 Misery; 24 Reclaim; 26 Kumquat; 27 Stateless; 28 Leapt; 29 Laredo; 30 Sporadic. DOWN: 1 Dunbar; 2, 16 and 17 Letters of marque and reprisal; 3 Inspire; 4 Emerald; 6 Biplane; 7 Tonga; 8 Sergeant; 9 Meters; 19 Rear end; 20 Simper; 21 Makes up; 22 Simpler; 23 Static; 25 Chair.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

PERSONALS

HAND-EMBROIDERED INDIAN DRESSES—of hand-woven cotton, vivid colors, indigenous designs, free catalogue. Write: ANDEAN, Box 472-A, Cuenca, Ecuador.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10016

JOIN CEC CHINA CORPS

Beginning numbered list of pioneer volunteer Americans, all ages and occupations, whom CEC will prepare to "BUILD BRIDGES TO MAINLAND CHINA" as Vice President Humphrey suggests. For information, including N.Y. Times editorials on CEC non-political programs write:

CEC CHINA CORPS CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS

Dept. N-6/24, 10 W. 46th St., NYC 10036

HELP FIGHT JUNK MAIL. Send it back at THEIR expense. Labels and instructions $1.00. Artichoke, P.O. 9123C, Bridgeport, Conn. 06601.

DISCOVER a fun way of meeting interesting, alert Jewish singles. For FREE analytical questionnaire write: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: write Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 10 East 42 Street, N.Y.C. 10017.

YOU CAN BE A CITIZEN DIPLOMAT TO RUSSIA THE "GLASSBORO WAY"

3 week Study-Exchanges

LEAVE NYC: July 10, 20, 30

Aug. 23 or MEET CEC in Moscow

CITIZEN EXCHANGE CORPS

Dept. N-6/24, 10 W. 46th St., NYC 10036
or Telephone: (212) LT 1-8113

VACATIONS

OVER 200 acres on private lake. Excellent swimming, boating-fishing, Golf, summer theatres, restaurants and Long Island Sound nearby. Rooms with private baths. Charming house. Breakfasts only. Tel: 669-2465. Cudroff.

AGENTS WANTED

CHRISTMAS CARDS—Business and Personal. Customer's name imprinted. Earn unusually high commissions from this medium- and high-priced line. No investment. No inventory. Free Sample Album. Process Corp. (our 47th year), 3430 S. 54th Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60650.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

So what can you do about a country that is falling apart faster than Robert F. Kennedy and Martin Luther King could have put it back together?

"It is less important what happens to me than what happens to the cause I represent," said Senator Kennedy on June 4. Now Kennedy is gone, like Martin Luther King.

We said, in an editorial last week: "In all essentials that cause—a politics responsible to the people of the country and the peoples of the world—is also embraced by McCarthy. It is tragically remote from Humphrey's grasp."

But President Johnson keeps on saying that others are responsible for the era of violence into which he has led us. (Others . . . the poor, no doubt, or the Vietnamese.) And Humphrey inherits his leader's mantle.

So what can you do? A professor of English at the University of Louisville writes us: "And for God's sake, please keep up the fight, especially now with the RFK tragedy. Without you, I mean it, I would not have anything to depend on in the way of sanity. And write this now as I listen to the mouthings of LBJ and his incredibly inept preacher voice telling us why all this is. And he, with his killings! Please keep up the fight."

We will.

FREE OFFER: The authoritative report on the illegality and inhumanity of American violence in Vietnam, IN THE NAME OF AMERICA, will be sent free with each new one-year subscription. Send to:

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me free, IN THE NAME OF AMERICA.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6.

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name

Street

City State Zip

N 6-24

The good fight

is now in

THE NATION

—Why not

join now?

